Use of this digest

This publication is intended for legal research, academic study and professional reference. Editorial summaries assist access to judicial reasoning and do not replace the full text of a judgment. Readers should verify the relevant facts, procedural context, operative directions, subsequent judicial treatment and applicable statutory provisions before relying on an entry.

Reasonable care has been taken in preparing this work. Errors or omissions may nevertheless occur, and corrections brought to the author's attention will be considered for future editions. The publication does not constitute advice on any particular dispute.

Dedication

To,

The Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia.

This volume is respectfully dedicated in recognition of His Lordship's profound contribution to criminal jurisprudence and the exceptional depth, rigor and intellectual clarity with which His Lordship has addressed its most consequential questions.

His Lordship's judgments reflect a sustained and principled engagement with the foundations of criminal justice: the protection of personal liberty, the lawful limits of investigative power, fairness in criminal proceedings, and the disciplined appraisal of evidence. Their significance lies not only in the conclusions reached, but also in the analytical method by which questions of law are situated within their factual, statutory and constitutional context.

This compilation seeks to organize and make accessible the principles emerging from those decisions, while preserving the context in which each question arose. It is offered as a resource for close study, rigorous legal research and considered practical application.

May it encourage thoughtful advocacy, deepen academic engagement with criminal law, and reaffirm a lasting commitment to fairness and principle in the administration of criminal justice.

With profound respect

Preface

I am pleased to present Criminal Law: Judicial Interpretation and Application -Principles Interpreted and Applied in Criminal Decisions - Decisions delivered by Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia. This is second digest, following Judicial Exposition of Service Law by Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia. The present volume continues that work of judicial study and legal compilation, with its focus on criminal jurisprudence.

The preparation of the service-law digest brought home the care required to read a judgment closely, identify the question actually decided and place its reasoning under an appropriate subject. That discipline has guided the present work. A useful digest must help the reader locate a legal proposition while preserving the facts, procedural setting and limits that give the proposition its proper meaning.

The judgments collected here address a broad range of questions arising in the administration of criminal justice. They concern investigation and pre-trial liberty; the appreciation of evidence and conduct of trial; the ingredients and adjudication of offences; special enactments; and remedies before the High Court. They also engage with related questions of constitutional protection, victims' interests and family support under criminal procedure.

A distinctive feature of these decisions is the depth with which questions of criminal law are examined. Their reasoning calls for attention not only to the rule applied, but also to the statutory framework, the procedural stage, the evidentiary record and the consequences for the rights of the persons concerned. This digest seeks to make that reasoning easier to locate and study without detaching it from the context in which it was developed.

The material is organised through macro divisions, chapters and sub-chapters, with topics and case references designed to assist practical research. Headnotes identify the principal propositions addressed in each decision. Case-notes set out the material facts, authorities considered, issues, reasoning and relief. References to decisions of the Supreme Court are presented with regard to the manner in which those authorities are considered in the judgment being digested.

This volume is offered with profound respect for the judicial work of Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia and with the research needs of the Bench, the Bar and the academic community in view. I hope it will assist in preparing arguments, locating relevant principles and pursuing a more considered study of criminal law. Readers' corrections and suggestions will be gratefully received and may help improve future editions.

Acknowledgments

The preparation of Criminal Law: Judicial Interpretation and Application -Principles Interpreted and Applied in Criminal Decisions - Decisions delivered by Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, has required sustained reading, careful classification and extensive editorial work. I record my sincere gratitude to all those whose encouragement and assistance have supported this undertaking.

I respectfully acknowledge Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, whose judgments constitute the subject and foundation of this digest. The opportunity to study His Lordship's reasoning across a wide range of questions in criminal law has been central to the preparation of this volume.

This is my second digest, following Judicial Exposition of Service Law by Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia. I remain grateful for the encouragement extended in connection with the earlier work, which strengthened my resolve to undertake a further study of His Lordship's decisions, this time in the field of criminal jurisprudence.

I also acknowledge the contribution of the learned members of the Bench and the Bar to the continuing development and practice of law. I am particularly grateful to the colleagues who have supported this work through discussion, practical assistance and their interest in its progress.

My appreciation extends to all those who assisted with the organisation of the material, verification of references, editing, formatting, typesetting and preparation of the manuscript for publication. These tasks, though often behind the finished volume, are essential to the reliability and usefulness of a legal reference work.

My deepest personal gratitude is to my family. Their patience, understanding and encouragement have made room for the many hours this second volume has required, just as their support sustained the first. I remain profoundly thankful for their constant presence throughout this work.

Any errors or omissions that remain are my responsibility alone.

With gratitude

Principles Interpreted and Applied in Criminal Decisions

Decisions delivered by Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia | High Court of Madhya Pradesh | 2016–2026

Introduction

Criminal Law: Judicial Interpretation and Application -Principles Interpreted and Applied in Criminal Decisions - Decisions delivered by Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia is a subject-wise digest of judgments delivered by Hon'ble Shri Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia of the High Court of Madhya Pradesh. It seeks to organize the legal reasoning in the judgments covered by this volume so that readers can locate a question of law, understand the context in which it was determined and identify the decision for further study.

The judgments bring considerable analytical depth to questions arising across criminal law and procedure. Their study requires attention not only to the proposition stated, but also to the facts, procedural stage, statutory framework and reasoning through which the Court reached its conclusion. This digest is designed to assist that study by presenting the material in a structured and accessible form.

This is the second digest prepared by Advocate Vibhor Kumar Sahu. His earlier work, Judicial Exposition of Service Law by Justice Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, examined His Lordship's contribution to service jurisprudence. The present volume extends that sustained study to criminal law and draws upon the author's experience in reading judgments, preparing case-notes and developing a subject-based system of reference.

Purpose and scope

Criminal litigation may raise several distinct questions within a single decision. A case concerning an alleged offence may also consider the limits of investigation, the power to take cognizance, the conditions governing bail, the admissibility or appreciation of evidence, or the scope of appellate and inherent jurisdiction. This digest presents such questions as separate points of reference while preserving their connection to the decision in which they arose.

The coverage includes constitutional control of criminal process; criminal courts and commencement of proceedings; investigation and custody; bail; charge and trial; evidence and proof; general penal principles; offence groups and special criminal statutes; appellate and post-conviction remedies; and maintenance and family-support questions considered under criminal procedure. These classifications reflect the material addressed in the judgments included in the volume. They do not imply that every question within these fields has been decided or that the subjects have been exhaustively covered.

Organisation and use

The material is arranged into macro divisions, chapters and sub-chapters. Topics provide focused points of entry to the legal issues. The subject index supports navigation through this structure, while the table of cases enables reference by cause title and case number. Case Sr. Nos. provide a common reference between the topic entries and the corresponding case-notes.

Headnotes state the principal legal propositions concisely. Case-notes set out the material facts, precedents and statutes considered, issues, ratio or findings, and relief. This fuller account is intended to show why a proposition arose and how the Court applied it. In decisions delivered by a Division Bench, the composition of the Bench is also relevant to identifying the authority.

Editorial approach

The editorial summaries seek to distinguish the Court's reasoning from the parties' submissions and to preserve the procedural setting of each decision. A refusal to quash proceedings, for example, should be understood in light of the nature and limits of the inquiry undertaken at that stage. Supreme Court authorities discussed in a judgment are presented with attention to the propositions for which the Court cited or applied them.

The digest is a research aid and a starting point for further study. Before relying on an entry, readers should consult the full judgment and the relevant statutory provisions, and check whether the decision has received subsequent judicial consideration.

Sub-Chapter no. 1.1
Criminal-Side Writs for Investigation Control and Public Law Remedies

Investigation — no right to select an agency or dictate its manner	An accused cannot insist on a particular investigating agency, prescribe the manner of investigation or demand court monitoring. Neither the accused nor the complainant or informant is entitled to choose an investigating agency. The High Court may nevertheless issue appropriate directions under Article 226 where it is satisfied that investigative powers have been exercised mala fide. Transfer to the CBI is an exceptional remedy, to be used sparingly and cautiously where necessary to secure confidence in the investigation, complete justice or fundamental rights, rather than merely because allegations have been made against local police.	4
Criminal-side writ — pending administrative inquiry and lawful departmental action	Pendency of the Collector's inquiry did not justify a writ preventing the department from taking action authorised by law or initiating disciplinary proceedings. In the event of the petitioner's arrest in the registered Section 306/34 IPC case, the consequences under Rule 9 of the M.P. Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules, 1966 would follow their lawful course. The Court refused the collateral restraint sought in the criminal-side writ.	16
Article 226: refusal to direct arrest or predetermine the police report	On the complainant's request for police action after registration of an FIR, the Court declined to direct arrest of the accused or filing of a charge-sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, it held that courts ordinarily should not prescribe the manner or outcome of investigation. Arrest, seizure and the appropriate final report depend on the evidence and the investigating officer's statutory powers and duties. Requiring those specific steps would amount to supervision of the investigation in the manner sought. This restraint did not prevent a direction to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay.	47
Duty to conclude investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to in the judgment alongside Section 193 BNSS, requires investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must determine whether an offence is disclosed and submit the appropriate report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet; investigation cannot simply remain pending. The Court directed completion as early as possible and the lawful consequential steps, without prescribing arrest or a prosecution report. It left the petitioner free to submit any continuing grievance to the Superintendent of Police, Bhopal, for consideration according to law.	47
Exceptional writ intervention for mala fide investigation: limits on directions	The Divine Retreat Centre passage relied upon by the Court permits Article 226 intervention in the rarest cases where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC require it. Even then, the High Court may insist on compliance with the Code's process, but may not dictate how the investigation is conducted. In this petition alleging police inaction, the Court applied the ordinary statutory-remedy route and dismissed the writ with liberty to approach the Magistrate.	48
No-arrest directions while refusing to interfere with investigation	A court declining to quash proceedings or stay investigation under Section 482 CrPC or Article 226 cannot nevertheless direct that the accused should not be arrested, or that no coercive steps should be taken, until investigation ends. Such protection would grant the substance of anticipatory bail without satisfying Section 438 CrPC. Applying Neeharika Infrastructure and its discussion of Habib Abdullah Jeelani, the Court refused the agents' request for	82

	a general arrest stay during investigation.
Exceptional High Court control of mala fide investigation	Under Article 226, the High Court may intervene in the rarest of rare cases where mala fide investigation, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with the statutory investigation process require its interference. Even then, it may insist on observance of the prescribed process but cannot direct how the police must conduct the investigation.	92
Article 226 — Directions to arrest accused or predetermine investigation	In a writ seeking police action, the High Court refused to direct arrest of the accused. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, it treated directions requiring arrest or a charge sheet as impermissible supervision of the investigation. Investigation is the police's statutory responsibility; courts should ordinarily refrain from directing its manner or requiring particular investigative steps. An investigation need not necessarily end in arrest, seizure or a charge sheet.	110
Drastic investigative directions — Hearing affected persons	The precedent relied upon to refuse arrest directions condemns orders requiring arrest, seizure and a charge sheet without hearing the persons against whom the allegations are made. A judicial order carrying drastic consequences for a person's reputation requires a reasonable opportunity of hearing. Courts must also avoid uncalled-for observations capable of influencing the investigation and prejudicing persons who have not been heard.	110
Police-protection writ — No immunity from registration of an offence	A request for police protection did not establish a right to be heard before registration of an offence or a legal basis to restrain the woman's parents from lodging a report. The Court refused protection against registration of an offence. Its direction to act on any future complaint disclosing specific threats was expressly made without adverse effect on an FIR already lodged.	111
Exceptional writ control over mala fide investigation	Article 226 may be used in a rare case of clearly established abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC requiring High Court intervention. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot direct the police how to conduct the investigation.	128
Exceptional writ intervention against mala fide investigation	Article 226 permits appropriate directions in the rarest cases where mala fide exercise of investigative power and a clear abuse of power or non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC justify intervention. Even then, the High Court may require observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police must conduct the investigation.	154
Father's writ seeking control of his accused son's investigation	An accused has no right to select the investigating agency or require the police to investigate in a particular manner. Presenting that request through a relative or next friend does not enlarge the accused's control over the investigation. Applying Romila Thapar and the other cited authorities, the Court held that the father had no authority to pursue this petition for his son's exoneration or to dictate the investigative course.	158
Alternative criminal remedies before mandamus for FIR registration	Mandamus to compel registration of an FIR may be declined when the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool. Applying Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court dismissed the writ petition because a complaint before the competent criminal court was an efficacious alternative remedy, while preserving liberty to pursue that complaint.	185
Recovery from the complainant of public funds held as trap evidence	A direction requiring the trap complainant to redeposit the same public money was arbitrary and mala fide where the funds had been used to expose the alleged bribe demand, had never been used for his personal purposes and remained in official or court custody. The demand, backed by a threat of departmental action, was quashed.	198
Exceptional writ intervention requires demonstrated abuse of investigation	Article 226 permits exceptional intervention where mala fide exercise of investigation power or a clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrants it. Even then, the High Court may require observance of the	203

power	statutory process but cannot dictate how the police must conduct the investigation.
Mandatory FIR registration on disclosure of a cognizable offence	Where the complaint disclosed a cognizable offence of alleged fund misappropriation, the police were obliged to register an FIR under the rule in Lalita Kumari. The availability or outcome of Panchayat civil recovery proceedings did not remove that obligation, and the direction to lodge the FIR was upheld.	238
Judicial monitoring and supervision of investigation	In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor an investigation to ensure fair, timely progress without external interference. Monitoring does not permit the court to direct the mode or manner of investigation or supervise the investigating officer's formation of an opinion. Such supervision would intrude upon the investigating officer's function and risk influencing the trial court.	240
Disputed land use in a writ challenge to FIR registration	Where revenue reports indicate subdivision of land into plots and road construction, an unsupported assertion that the land remains under cultivation does not require interference with a direction to lodge an FIR. Disputed questions about agricultural use and colony development cannot be adjudicated in such writ proceedings at that stage. Registration of the FIR does not itself establish criminal guilt.	240
Limits on judicial directions controlling investigation	In exercising Section 482 CrPC powers, the High Court cannot supervise an investigation by directing arrest or filing of a charge sheet; those steps depend on the investigating agency's lawful assessment. The Court also relied on the failure to implead the persons against whom the allegations were made, applying the requirement of a hearing before judicial directions of such serious consequence are issued against them. The applicant could present any remaining grievance to the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	243
Ordinary statutory remedies and exceptional High Court intervention in investigation	The quoted authorities require an informant ordinarily to use the statutory police and Magistrate remedies instead of seeking High Court directions for FIR registration or proper investigation. Exceptional intervention for clearly established mala fide investigation or abuse of power may enforce the prescribed process, but cannot dictate how police should investigate. The judgment also recognises the exceptional writ grounds preserved in Shweta Bhadauria; it found no basis for a registration direction here.	255
Article 226 — directions to arrest accused or file a charge sheet during investigation	In a writ seeking action on a registered FIR, the High Court declined to direct arrest or the filing of a charge sheet. Such directions would amount to supervising the manner of investigation, which ordinarily lies within the statutory responsibility and discretion of the police.	310
Hearing before judicial directions compelling arrest, seizure and a charge sheet	In D. Venkatasubramaniam, relied upon in refusing directions controlling investigation, the Supreme Court treated directions compelling arrest, seizure and a charge sheet without hearing the persons affected as independently unsustainable. The requirement concerns judicial directions carrying such adverse consequences.	310
Article 226 investigation control — exceptional abuse and limits on directions	The ordinary statutory remedies for police inaction do not exclude exceptional Article 226 intervention where a clear case of mala fide investigation, abuse of power and breach of the prescribed criminal procedure is established. Even in that exceptional setting, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police must conduct the investigation. The duty to register cognizable information does not by itself dispense with the alternative-remedy rule.	338
Article 226: Disputed Alibi	A disputed plea of alibi cannot be adjudicated under Article 226 by accepting the accused's photographs as conclusive proof of absence. The plea requires	361

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Requires Evidence	cogent evidence. The Court therefore declined to determine the petitioner's asserted presence at a hospital as a ground for interfering with the criminal proceedings.
Writ Directions Compelling Arrest or a Charge Sheet During Investigation	A writ cannot require police to arrest the accused or submit a charge sheet merely because an FIR has been registered and investigation remains pending. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court declined directions that would prescribe investigative steps or predetermine their outcome. Arrest under Section 41 CrPC requires a cautious, nonmechanical exercise of police discretion; investigation may ultimately justify either a charge sheet or a closure report.	380
Hearing Before Judicial Directions for Arrest, Seizure and Prosecution	In the precedent relied upon to refuse prescriptive investigation directions, orders requiring arrest, seizure of property and a charge sheet against persons who had not been impleaded or heard were treated as invalid. D. Venkatasubramaniam, quoting Divine Retreat Centre, required a reasonable opportunity of hearing before judicial orders with such serious consequences and cautioned against casual observations capable of influencing the investigation.	380
Exceptional Writ Control of Abusive Investigation and Alternative Remedies	High Court intervention in investigation under Article 226 is exceptional and requires a clear case of mala fide exercise, abuse of power or non-compliance with the statutory process. Even then, the Court may insist on lawful procedure rather than dictate how the investigation must be conducted. Ordinary police-inaction grievances should follow the statutory remedies; the adopted alternative-remedy rule preserves the recognised exceptions referred to by the Division Bench.	408
Article 226 directions for arrest or a predetermined charge-sheet during investigation	A writ court cannot supervise a pending police investigation by directing arrest or the filing of a charge-sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam and the M.C. Abraham passage reproduced in it, the Court recognised that arrest under Section 41 CrPC involves discretion requiring caution because it affects liberty and reputation. Registration of a cognizable offence does not require mechanical arrest. The police must assess the evidence and may lawfully submit either a charge-sheet or a closure report. The Court therefore refused the complainant's request to compel arrest.	423
Article 226 directions for arrest, charge-sheet and investigative method	Investigation is a statutory police duty, and a writ court cannot supervise it by directing arrest or the filing of a charge-sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam and its M.C. Abraham passage, the Court recognised that Section 41 CrPC arrest power is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because it affects liberty and reputation. A cognizable FIR does not require mechanical arrest, and the evidence may support a charge-sheet or a conclusion that no case is made out. The request to compel arrest of the accused police officers was therefore refused.	427
Exceptional writ intervention in a mala fide investigation	Article 226 intervention may be justified in a rare case where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII CrPC are established. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how police should conduct the investigation.	430
Article 226: Disputed Defence Cannot Replace Facial Assessment of the FIR	Where the FIR and inquiry material, taken at face value, disclose a cognizable offence and triable allegations, the court ordinarily permits investigation to proceed. It does not resolve the suspect’s disputed explanations as though trying the case. The Sarpanch’s denials of non-construction and misuse of authority, and her explanation that the records burned accidentally, did not warrant quashing on the record before the Court.	459
Informant’s Alleged Mala Fides Are	When the complaint discloses a cognizable offence, the informant’s alleged mala fides are of secondary importance and cannot by themselves justify	459

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Insufficient by Themselves	quashing. The material collected in investigation and the evidence at trial determine the accusation's fate. Applying Renu Kumari, the Court rejected the allegation of malice as a basis for stopping this investigation before the facts were established.
Exceptional writ intervention against mala fide investigation	Under Article 226, the High Court may require observance of the investigation procedure prescribed by the CrPC in the rarest cases where mala fide exercise of investigative power and a clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII warrant intervention. Even then, the Court cannot direct the police how to conduct the investigation. This limited writ power, explained in Divine Retreat Centre, is distinct from using Section 482 to obtain FIR registration despite an available complaint remedy.	501
Limited Article 226 supervision of mala fide investigation	In the rarest cases, where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrant intervention, the High Court may insist under Article 226 on observance of the prescribed process. Even then, it cannot direct the police how the investigation should be conducted. The Court reproduced this limited supervisory power from Divine Retreat Centre while distinguishing the ordinary remedy for police inaction.	504
Alleged counterblast and informant malice in a writ seeking FIR quashing	At the FIR-quashing stage, the Court examines whether the allegations disclose an offence and does not decide the suspect's disputed defence that the prosecution is a counterblast. Where a cognizable offence is disclosed, the informant's alleged malice is secondary and does not by itself justify quashing. The petitioner identified no sufficient ground to quash the four FIRs; their allegations remained to be tested through investigation and evidence.	517
Exceptional writ control of mala fide investigation and limits on directing its manner	Article 226 permits appropriate directions where a clear, exceptional case of mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with the investigative procedure is established. Even then, the High Court may insist on compliance with the Code but cannot direct the police how to conduct the investigation. Ordinary dissatisfaction with police action remains subject to the statutory remedies.	517
Article 226 Directions Compelling Arrest or a Predetermined Police Report	In a writ petition concerning a registered FIR, the Court declined to direct arrest or submission of a charge-sheet because those directions would control the course and result of investigation. The relied-upon precedent recognises that arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously rather than as a mechanical consequence of an FIR. An investigation may lawfully result in a closure report. The precedent also disapproves drastic investigative directions affecting liberty and reputation without hearing the persons concerned.	537
Registration of an FIR — no right to compel arrest or a charge sheet	Registration of an FIR does not require the police to arrest every accused or file a charge sheet. Arrest discretion must be exercised cautiously in light of the circumstances; an investigation may disclose either a case for prosecution or no offence. Relying on D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court rejected the complainant's request under Article 226 to compel arrest or a charge sheet. Courts ordinarily cannot prescribe investigative steps or require the police to reach a predetermined result.	540
Drastic judicial directions in investigation — hearing persons likely to be affected	Before issuing judicial directions that have drastic consequences for persons against whom allegations are made, the Court must give those persons a reasonable opportunity of hearing. In rejecting the requested directions for arrest and prosecution, the Court relied on D. Venkatasubramaniam, which disapproved such directions made without impleading or hearing the affected accused.	540
Article 226 investigation directions — clear	In the rarest cases, the High Court may issue appropriate directions where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse of power or non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrants intervention. Even then, it may insist on	543

abuse and limits on judicial control	compliance with the statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police must investigate. The Court relied on this qualified principle from Divine Retreat Centre while directing the petitioner to the ordinary complaint remedy.
Section 482 CrPC — restraint against directing arrest or a predetermined charge sheet	The High Court cannot supervise an investigation by directing that the accused be arrested or that a charge sheet be filed. The authorities applied by the Court treat arrest as a statutory discretion to be exercised cautiously, rather than an automatic consequence of a cognizable accusation. Depending on the material collected, the police may lawfully conclude either that prosecution is warranted or that no case is made out. The prosecutrix's request to compel arrest was therefore refused.	547
Alibi based on attendance in court	An alibi requires cogent evidence that the accused's presence at the place of occurrence was humanly impossible. Court order-sheets showing attendance on the same day did not establish that impossibility where the incident occurred about ten kilometres away at 10:30 a.m. and attendance at 11 a.m. remained physically possible. The High Court therefore declined to accept the disputed alibi as a ground for quashing the FIR under Article 226.	614
Enmity as a ground for writ-stage quashing	Enmity may supply a motive either for false implication or for committing the offence. Deciding which inference is supported raises a disputed question of fact that cannot be resolved under Article 226 as a ground for quashing the FIR.	614
Article 226: restraint in directing arrest or a charge sheet	In a writ seeking action after FIR registration, the Court declined to direct arrest or filing of a charge sheet because those commands would prescribe the course and outcome of police investigation. Applying the investigative-restraint principle in D. Venkatasubramaniam, it recognised that an investigation may lawfully end without arrest, seizure or a charge sheet, depending on the evidence.	626
FIR-registration mandamus and unavailed statutory remedies	A direct mandamus for FIR registration may be declined where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The rule remains subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy requirement. Applying Shweta Bhadauria, the Court refused direct registration relief and left the Magistrate route open.	627
FIR-registration writ and alternative statutory remedies	Mandamus to compel FIR registration may be declined where the informant has not used Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy requirement. Applying Shweta Bhadauria, the Court dismissed the direct writ and preserved the statutory Magistrate remedy.	629
Article 226 intervention in investigation — exceptional abuse of power and limits on judicial directions	Article 226 permits exceptional intervention where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrant the High Court's interference. Even then, the Court may require observance of the statutory process but cannot direct how the police must conduct the investigation.	630
Lalita Kumari — FIR-registration duty does not itself establish entitlement to writ mandamus	The ruling in Lalita Kumari on registration of an FIR does not decide entitlement to mandamus compelling performance of the police duty under Section 154 CrPC without first availing the statutory alternative remedies. That separate writ-remedy question remains governed by the alternative-remedy rule and its recognised exceptions.	630
Writ directions compelling arrest or a charge sheet	Investigation is the police's statutory function. The High Court ordinarily cannot dictate its course by requiring arrest, seizure or filing of a charge sheet as inevitable steps. A direction compelling arrest and prosecution would amount to supervising the investigation and predetermining steps that depend on the material collected.	668
FIR-registration mandamus —	The police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence is distinct from entitlement to a writ directing registration. Applying Aleque	679

alternative remedies and recognised exceptions	Padamsee, Divine Retreat Centre, Sakiri Vasu, Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court declined mandamus where statutory remedies before superior police officers and the Magistrate were available. The Division Bench passage preserved the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool and explained that Lalita Kumari did not decide entitlement to bypass those remedies through mandamus. The petition alleging police inaction was dismissed with liberty to approach the Magistrate; the Court did not decide the merits of the complaint.
Exceptional Article 226 intervention — insist on lawful process without dictating investigation	The Divine Retreat Centre passage relied upon by the Court recognises exceptional Article 226 intervention where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse and non-compliance with the investigation provisions are established. The power is to be used in the rarest cases requiring High Court intervention. Even then, the Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police should conduct the investigation. That exceptional control is distinct from routine writ petitions seeking action on an unregistered complaint.	679
Exceptional writ intervention against mala fide investigation	Article 226 intervention against mala fide exercise of investigation power is reserved for rare cases where clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC require interference. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police should investigate. This exceptional power is distinct from ordinary police inaction, for which the statutory Magistrate remedies are available.	697
Exceptional Article 226 intervention in investigation — statutory process and limits on directions	Article 226 intervention may be exercised exceptionally where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrant interference. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how police must investigate. The ordinary alternative-remedy rule remains subject to the recognised writ exceptions referred to in Shweta Bhadauria.	702
Lalita Kumari — FIR-registration duty and entitlement to writ mandamus are distinct	Lalita Kumari's ruling on the police duty to register an FIR does not decide entitlement to mandamus without availing the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. Mandamus may be declined for non-use of those remedies, subject to the recognised writ exceptions referred to in Shweta Bhadauria.	702
Coercive judicial investigation directions — reasons and hearing of affected persons	Judicial directions prescribing arrest, seizure and a charge-sheet can seriously affect liberty and reputation. Such consequential directions cannot be issued casually or mechanically against persons who have not been given a reasonable opportunity to be heard. The High Court must give reasons for intervention and avoid uncalled-for observations capable of influencing the investigation and legal process.	704
Exceptional writ intervention in a mala fide investigation	Article 226 permits intervention in the rarest cases where mala fide investigation, clear abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrant it. Even then, the High Court may require observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how police should investigate. The rule requiring recourse to alternative remedies remains subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool, as stated in Shweta Bhadauria.	710
Pending closure report and a parallel writ direction to police	Where a closure report awaited the competent Magistrate's decision, a separate writ direction to the Superintendent of Police to look into the FIR was unwarranted. The Magistrate could consider objections and order further investigation if necessary. The Division Bench set aside the Single Judge's direction and required the CJM to dispose of the report within three months of receipt of the certified copy if it remained pending, without prejudging its merits.	714
Alternative Magistrate remedies	A petitioner alleging police inaction ordinarily must use the effective remedies under the CrPC rather than seek a writ directing registration or initiation of	719

before seeking FIR mandamus	criminal proceedings. Those remedies include a written application to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), an application to the Magistrate under Section 156(3), and a complaint under Sections 190 and 200. Applying the alternative-remedy rule, the Court dismissed the petition with liberty to file a criminal complaint.
Rare writ intervention for mala fide exercise of investigative power	Article 226 intervention remains available in the rarest cases where a clear mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC require it. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police should investigate. The alternative-remedy rule is also subject to the recognised exceptions referred to in Shweta Bhadauria.	719
Article 226 investigation control — exceptional intervention for mala fide abuse	The Divine Retreat Centre passage adopted by the Court recognises Article 226 intervention at an aggrieved person's instance where investigative power has been exercised mala fide. Such intervention is reserved for the rarest cases in which clear abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII CrPC require the High Court's involvement. Even then, the High Court may insist that the statutory process be observed but cannot prescribe how the police must conduct the investigation. The present Court reproduced this limited power while refusing the routine prayer to compel FIR registration and directing the petitioner to the available Magistrate complaint remedy.	745
Writ directions compelling arrest or filing of a charge sheet	A writ direction requiring the police to arrest the accused or file a charge sheet would impermissibly supervise the manner of investigation. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, which reproduces M.C. Abraham, the Court recognised that arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously. Registration of a cognizable offence does not by itself require arrest in every case.	781
Hearing and reasons before coercive investigative directions	The precedent relied upon by the Court disapproves judicial directions compelling arrest, seizure and a charge sheet without reasons or a hearing for the persons affected. Such directions can seriously affect liberty and reputation. Casual judicial observations that may influence the investigation must also be avoided, particularly without hearing those likely to be affected.	781
Hearing before drastic judicial directions affecting an accused	In the D. Venkatasubramaniam passage relied upon by the Court, directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge-sheet were set aside because the affected accused had not been impleaded or heard. The reproduced Divine Retreat Centre reasoning concerned a judicial order setting criminal law in motion on an anonymous petition and required a reasonable hearing before such an order with serious reputational consequences. This addresses drastic judicial directions, rather than participation in ordinary police investigation.	845
Custodial-death inquiry: unexplained injuries and omitted medical assistance	An inquiry attributing a prisoner's death to cardio-respiratory failure was inadequate where it failed to explain recorded ante-mortem injuries or examine the absence of jail first aid for chest pain. The inability of outsiders to enter the jail did not explain injuries sustained in custody. A fresh judicial inquiry was required, with witnesses examined afresh and specific findings on the injuries, availability of a jail doctor, omitted treatment and prima facie responsibility; responsibility for a suspicious death was also to be fixed if the inquiry so found.	867
Police inaction: statutory remedies before a writ for FIR registration	Information disclosing a cognizable offence attracts the police's duty to register an FIR, but failure to act ordinarily requires use of the statutory remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC before seeking mandamus. The reproduced Shweta Bhadauria ruling preserves the recognised Whirlpool exceptions and distinguishes the police-registration duty in Lalita Kumari from entitlement to a writ without using alternative remedies. The Court dismissed the petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC.	875

Matrimonial FIR against relatives — specific allegations and the prohibition on a mini-trial	An FIR need not set out every fact and detail, but the Court examines whether it makes specific allegations disclosing an offence against the relatives concerned. Allegations that the brother-in-law abused the complainant, his wife assaulted her, and the petitioners joined a later dowry-linked threatening episode were specific rather than merely omnibus. Their truth, credibility and reliability could not be adjudicated through a mini-trial under Articles 226–227 or Section 482 CrPC. The Court therefore declined to stop the investigation on the contention that those allegations were vague.	889
Investigation of cognizable offences — exceptional scope for judicial interruption	The police have the statutory right and duty to investigate cognizable offences, and courts should ordinarily permit investigation to proceed within the police's proper sphere. Quashing is exceptional and requires cautious exercise of jurisdiction. Where the FIR discloses no cognizable offence or offence of any kind, investigation need not be allowed to continue; intervention also remains available within the settled quashing standards to prevent abuse of process or miscarriage of justice. The expression 'rarest of rare' in this context denotes restraint in quashing and is distinct from the death-penalty standard.	889
Exceptional writ intervention in mala fide investigation	The High Court may intervene under Article 226 in the rarest cases where a clear abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC establish the need for intervention. Even then, it may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police must conduct the investigation.	921
Writ direction compelling arrest or filing of a charge-sheet	The Court cannot direct the police to arrest an accused or file a charge-sheet, because such a direction would control the course and outcome of investigation. Whether the evidence warrants a charge-sheet or a closure report remains for the investigating agency to decide according to law. The filing of a charge-sheet in the cross-case did not entitle the petitioner to an order compelling a charge-sheet in his own FIR.	922
Writ direction to arrest accused or predetermine a charge-sheet	Registration of an FIR does not entitle the complainant to a judicial direction compelling arrest or filing of a charge-sheet. Investigation and the decision whether the collected material warrants prosecution remain statutory functions of the police. The Court refused to supervise those functions or prescribe the result of the pending investigation. Its refusal did not remove the duty to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay.	927
Writ direction to add a particular offence during investigation	A writ direction requiring the police to add Section 452 IPC to a pending FIR would improperly supervise the investigation. The investigating agency remains free to add an offence where the material prima facie supports it. The Court therefore refused to prescribe the additional charge without determining whether the allegations actually established the ingredients of Section 452.	929
Arrest directions against persons not impleaded in the writ petition	A coercive judicial direction to arrest the persons identified by the petitioner could not be granted when they had not been impleaded. The relied-upon precedent also requires a reasonable hearing before judicial orders directing arrest, seizure or prosecution that would have drastic consequences for the affected person. This is a safeguard governing consequential judicial intervention, rather than a requirement to hear a suspect before ordinary registration or investigation of an FIR.	929
Limits on judicial directions controlling investigation	The police have the statutory duty to investigate, and the Court ordinarily cannot prescribe the manner of investigation or direct arrest, seizure and a charge-sheet as necessary outcomes. Arrest under Section 41 CrPC requires a cautious exercise of police discretion rather than a mechanical response to an FIR. Investigation may disclose a case warranting a charge-sheet or may justify a closure report. Directing arrest and a charge-sheet would amount to judicial supervision of investigation.	931 directing arrest or filing of charge-sheet during investigation	declined to direct arrest or filing of a charge-sheet because such directions would amount to supervising the police investigation. Relying on D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court distinguished impermissible directions dictating investigative steps or outcomes from a direction to complete the investigation lawfully without unnecessary delay.

A writ direction cannot predetermine filing of a charge-sheet	The court cannot direct the police to file a charge-sheet as the necessary outcome of an investigation. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the High Court held that such a direction would amount to supervising the investigation. The police must investigate in accordance with law and decide from the material whether a charge-sheet or closure report is warranted. Courts ordinarily should not dictate the investigative angle or prescribe arrest, seizure and filing of a charge-sheet as inevitable steps. The petitioner's request under Article 226 to compel a charge-sheet was therefore refused.	959
Hearing before drastic judicial directions affecting an accused's reputation	The D. Venkatasubramaniam passage adopted by the Court disapproves mechanical judicial directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge-sheet without hearing the persons against whom they operate. Drawing on Divine Retreat Centre, it requires a reasonable opportunity of hearing before such judicial orders with drastic consequences for reputation are made. The safeguard concerns those judicial directions; it does not create a general requirement to hear a suspect before the police register or investigate an FIR.	959
Alternative statutory remedies for writ demands concerning FIR registration or inquiry	The police duty to register cognizable information does not itself entitle the informant to mandamus without using the available remedies. The adopted authorities direct an aggrieved person to Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC; Shweta Bhadauria preserves the recognised Whirlpool exceptions and explains that Lalita Kumari does not decide entitlement to writ relief without those remedies. The Court accordingly declined to supervise the inquiry or direct FIR registration and dismissed the writ as not maintainable, preserving independent recourse to the Magistrate without deciding the alleged murder or suicide abetment.	961
Accused's request to direct a particular manner of investigation	An accused cannot require the police to investigate from a preferred angle or obtain directions prescribing the manner of investigation merely by seeking a fair investigation. Investigation ordinarily belongs to the police. Exceptional intervention remains available for statutory breach endangering liberty or property, abuse of investigatory power, mala fides or animosity. Applying Romila Thapar and Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court declined to prescribe an investigative angle and left the petitioner free to present his defence at trial; it did not determine the truth of the FIR allegations.	963
Monitoring cannot be used to supervise investigative choices	Monitoring maintains surveillance over fair and timely progress without external interference; supervision directs execution and can shape the investigating officer's opinion, compromising independent trial adjudication. Superior courts may monitor in rare and compelling circumstances, but cannot use that description to direct a particular investigative course. The Court therefore refused to prescribe investigative steps under the guise of monitoring.	963
Ordinary remedies for non-registration of an FIR	The police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence does not itself confer a right to immediate writ mandamus. An aggrieved informant should ordinarily pursue the remedies before superior police officers and the Magistrate under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The petition was dismissed with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS, as stated in the order.	984
Exceptional writ intervention in an abusive investigation	Article 226 permits appropriate intervention where a clear case of mala fide exercise of investigative power and abuse or non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC requires it. Even in such exceptional cases, the High Court may insist on	984 observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police should conduct the investigation.

Service-related public-interest relief sought by a stranger	Public-interest litigation is not maintainable to challenge another employee's service matters. The Court must scrutinise the applicant's credentials and the prima facie correctness, specificity and seriousness of the information, and guard against oblique motives and reckless allegations. These principles were invoked where allegations of financial irregularity were coupled with demands for service and posting action against officials.	984
Judicial directions prescribing arrest or a charge sheet	The High Court should not prescribe the course of police investigation by directing arrest of the accused or filing of a charge sheet. Whether the evidence calls for arrest, seizure, prosecution or closure is for the investigating agency to decide according to law. The Court declined the requested arrest direction because it would amount to supervision of the investigation.	985
Prompt completion of investigation under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must reach a conclusion on whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and lawful consequential steps, leaving any further grievance open to representation before the Superintendent of Police.	985
	Sub-Chapter no. 1.2 Habeas Corpus and Criminal-Side Writs for Personal Liberty
Foreign national — prison detention after completion of sentence pending repatriation	A foreign national who has completed the criminal sentences and is no longer required in a criminal case cannot be kept in prison solely because nationality and repatriation remain unresolved. Merely declaring the Central Jail a temporary detention centre did not justify the continued custody, which the Court held contrary to Articles 20 and 21 of the Constitution. Applying Bhim Singh v. Union of India, the Court directed placement in the Assam detention centre until nationality was determined and deportation effected; any necessary later transfer to another detention centre could be ordered by the competent authority.	11
Detention pending deportation — basic facilities and human dignity	Where a foreign national who has served the sentence must remain in India pending confirmation of nationality and repatriation, restriction of movement in an appropriate detention facility must preserve basic human rights and dignity. The relied-upon decision in Bhim Singh requires electricity, water and hygiene at the place of detention; the unresolved repatriation process does not justify continued treatment as a prisoner.	11
Habeas corpus after remand: review of mandatory arrest safeguards	An Article 226 petition cannot ordinarily be used to reconsider the merits of a judicial remand order or rejection of bail; those orders must be challenged before the appropriate statutory forum. Habeas corpus remains available where mandatory safeguards were not followed, the remand is wholly illegal or without jurisdiction, or the order was passed mechanically. Reading V. Senthil Balaji and Gautam Navlakha with Vihaan Kumar, the Court confined this petition to the legality of the initial arrest for breach of mandatory safeguards. The FIR-quashing prayer had been given up, and the alleged offence was not examined on its merits.	41
Habeas corpus: date relevant to the legality of detention	The legality of detention in habeas corpus proceedings is assessed on the circumstances prevailing at the return or hearing. A remand order or rejection of bail passed while the writ petition is pending must therefore be considered; the Court is not confined to the position when the petition was filed. The order's existence does not remove the limited inquiry into breach of mandatory arrest safeguards.	41
Habeas corpus relief	In a habeas corpus petition, the Court must secure production of the corpus.	431

after recovery of a minor	Where the recovered minor wishes to stay with her mother and is permitted to do so, no further custody relief remains. That does not prevent the Court, on the facts of the same petition, from examining serious police inaction concerning the recovered minor and directing accountability measures.
Adult corpus's choice of residence after appearance in habeas corpus	After the adult corpus appeared voluntarily in the habeas corpus proceedings, the Court left him free to reside at a place of his choice, subject to law. Release was directed upon furnishing a ₹1 lakh personal bond with a surety in the same amount and an undertaking to attend before the investigating officer when summoned. He was also required to provide an operational mobile number, keep it unchanged and respond to police calls.	642
Statutory matrimonial remedies after disposal of habeas corpus	While disposing of the habeas corpus petition after the husband's appearance, the Court preserved the wife's liberty to pursue statutory matrimonial remedies, including maintenance available under civil law.	642
Under-trial hospital stay — fortnightly medical review and report on treatment in jail	In the Article 226 proceedings, the Court directed doctors to review the under-trial's condition every fifteen days and give a specific finding on the need for continued hospitalization. They had to inform the jail authorities of his condition and the necessity of hospital care. The jail authorities were to forward the periodic medical recommendations to the CJM, committal court or trial court, with the Superintendent's report on whether treatment was possible in jail. Once doctors found hospitalization unnecessary, the under-trial had to be shifted immediately to jail, where the authorities were required to ensure proper treatment. Unnecessary occupation of a hospital bed merely to remain outside jail would deprive another deserving patient of treatment.	740
Under-trial medical care — hospital admission depends on medical necessity	Every under-trial is entitled to treatment, but convenience alone does not justify keeping a prisoner in hospital when treatment can be provided in jail. The Court stated that doctors, rather than the Court lacking medical expertise, must decide whether hospitalization is required. That discretion must not be used to confer exceptional treatment on a person in custody facing serious allegations. In the petition seeking transfer from a general ward to a special ward, no good reason for special accommodation or serious disease requiring hospital admission was shown. The Court therefore declined to direct a special-ward transfer while requiring medical assessment of the need for continued hospitalization.	740
	Sub-Chapter no. 1.3 Mandamus for Police Action, Protection and Public Law Compliance
FIR-registration mandamus: ordinary requirement to use statutory remedies	Police have a duty to register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence. That duty does not by itself entitle the informant to bypass the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC and obtain mandamus under Article 226. Applying Aleque Padamsee, Sakiri Vasu, Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court required recourse to the statutory procedure on the complaint of a fatal assault. The alternate-remedy rule remains subject to the exceptions recognised in the Division Bench ruling by reference to Whirlpool; it is not an absolute exclusion of writ jurisdiction.	48
Article 226 mandamus for an FIR — statutory alternative remedies	A grievance that police have failed to register an FIR or properly act on the information ordinarily requires recourse to the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The relied-upon Shweta Bhadauria ruling preserves recognised exceptions to alternative-remedy restraint and explains that Lalita Kumari does not itself decide entitlement to mandamus without using those remedies. The writ seeking fair completion of a Section 174 merg inquiry and registration of an FIR was dismissed with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202.	57

implement witness protection and secure witness attendance	and must secure their prompt attendance, including that of police witnesses, before trial courts. The State was directed to implement the Witness Protection Scheme, 2018 in letter and spirit. The DGP was directed to issue instructions on witness protection and attendance and to file the required circulars before the Principal Registrar within fifteen days.
Witness Protection Scheme, 2018 — binding force and deposition facilities	The Witness Protection Scheme, 2018, approved by the Supreme Court, must be enforced by the Union, States and Union Territories and operates as law under Articles 141 and 142 until suitable legislation is enacted. The reproduced directions also require States and Union Territories to establish Vulnerable Witness Deposition Complexes in district courts, with Central Government support. The High Court relied on those directions in ordering implementation of the Scheme in Madhya Pradesh.	61
High Court direction to register an FIR and alternative remedies	A request for a High Court direction to register an FIR may be declined where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool. Applying that principle, the Court dismissed the application under Section 528 BNSS with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	92
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Under Section 173(1) CrPC and the corresponding Section 193 BNSS referred to in the judgment, the investigating officer must complete the investigation without unnecessary delay, determine whether an offence is made out and file the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge sheet. The Court directed early completion and lawful consequential action, leaving the complainant free to submit any grievance to the Superintendent of Police.	110
Police protection for an adult couple — Specific threats must be disclosed	Two adults may live together according to their wishes, including in a live-in relationship, and no one may violate their liberty or commit an offence against them on that ground. Failure to establish the marriage prima facie did not displace that principle: the claimed registration lacked proof of the thirty-day residence requirement under Section 5 and notice transmission under Section 6 of the Special Marriage Act. Protection was refused because the complaint disclosed no specific threat or incident. If the couple later approached the authorities with specific incidents and names, the authorities were directed to act in accordance with Lata Singh.	111
Alternative statutory remedies before seeking mandamus for FIR registration	Mandamus compelling police to register an FIR may be declined where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the recognised exceptions referred to in Whirlpool. In this petition, the availability of an efficacious Magistrate remedy under Sections 156(3) and 200 led the Court to decline writ relief and reserve liberty to use the statutory remedy.	128
FIR-registration duty distinguished from entitlement to mandamus	The decision in Lalita Kumari concerning the police duty to register an FIR does not itself decide whether the informant is entitled to mandamus without first using the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The Court applied that distinction as stated in Shweta Bhadauria.	128
Non-joinder of suspected accused when seeking a writ directing FIR registration	In this writ petition, the petitioner had not impleaded the persons against whom registration of an FIR was sought. The Court treated their absence as a further reason why the requested direction could not be granted.	128
Lalita Kumari and entitlement to a writ for FIR registration	Lalita Kumari’s ruling on the police duty under Section 154 CrPC does not decide whether an informant is entitled to a writ of mandamus without first using the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC.	140
Lalita Kumari and a direct writ for FIR	Lalita Kumari’s ruling on the police duty under Section 154 CrPC does not determine entitlement to mandamus without using the alternative remedies	143

registration	under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC.
Specific pleadings and affidavit support for serious personal allegations	Serious allegations of personal wrongdoing must be clearly and specifically pleaded and supported by the petitioner's affidavit. The Court declined to act on oral accusations of removing or destroying official files where no specific allegation against the officer was pleaded and the petitioner refused the offered opportunity to bring a fresh petition with such allegations.	147
Lalita Kumari and bypassing statutory remedies for FIR registration	Lalita Kumari's ruling on the statutory police duty to register an FIR does not decide entitlement to mandamus without using the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. Mandamus may be declined for failure to use those remedies unless a recognised Whirlpool exception applies.	147
Alternative remedies against police failure to register an FIR	A complainant seeking registration of an FIR should ordinarily pursue the statutory remedies before the superior police officer and the Magistrate. Following the cited authorities, including Shweta Bhadauria, which preserves recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule, the Court declined writ intervention and left the petitioner free to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	154
FIR mandamus and statutory alternative remedies	The police duty to register cognizable information does not automatically entitle the complainant to an Article 226 direction bypassing statutory remedies. Following Aleque Padamsee, Sakiri Vasu, Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court required use of the available police-superior and Magistrate routes, subject to the recognised writ exceptions reserved in the cited authorities. It also noted that the petitioner had not impleaded the Lokayukt or its Special Police Establishment, whose inaction he challenged, and declined the requested writ relief.	159
FIR-registration duty distinguished from entitlement to writ relief	The decision in Lalita Kumari on the police duty to register an FIR does not determine whether a person may obtain mandamus without first availing the statutory criminal remedies. The statutory registration duty and the availability of writ relief remain separate questions under the rule applied in Shweta Bhadauria.	185
Protection of the trap complainant from pressure	The investigating agency was directed to protect the corruption complainant against pressure while his evidence was to be recorded. The direction accompanied the order for immediate recording of his testimony after the Court found that criminal and departmental measures were being used to harass him.	198
Ordinary remedy for failure to register an FIR is before the Magistrate	A writ seeking registration of an FIR is ordinarily declined where the complainant has not used the statutory remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The petitioner was left free to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS, as applicable.	203
FIR-registration duty does not dispense with alternative remedies for mandamus	The police duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence is distinct from the informant's entitlement to a writ compelling registration. Lalita Kumari does not decide that statutory alternative remedies may be bypassed when seeking mandamus.	203
Prompt Completion of Investigation and Submission of a Lawful Final Report	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is made out and promptly submit the appropriate final report, whether a charge sheet or a closure report. The Court directed completion as early as possible without fixing a deadline or prescribing the result, and left the petitioner free to present a grievance to the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	380

FIR-registration writ and alternative statutory remedies	Mandamus to compel registration of an FIR may be declined where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool Corporation. The police duty to register cognizable information does not by itself entitle the informant to bypass those remedies through a writ petition.	430
Alternative remedies before seeking a writ directing FIR registration	The police duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence does not make a writ petition the ordinary remedy for non-registration. The informant should use the statutory remedies before superior police officers and the Magistrate. Exceptional writ intervention remains available on the recognised grounds referred to in the adopted authorities, including clearly established mala fide investigative abuse or non-compliance with the prescribed process. Lalita Kumari does not dispense with the alternative-remedy requirement for mandamus.	465
Mandamus for FIR registration — Alternative remedies and exceptional writ intervention	Police must register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence. Their failure ordinarily requires recourse to the statutory remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC rather than a writ petition. The alternative-remedy rule remains subject to the Whirlpool exceptions recognised in Shweta Bhadauria. Divine Retreat Centre also preserves rare intervention where mala fide investigation, clear abuse of power and statutory noncompliance are shown, while prohibiting judicial directions on how police should investigate. Lalita Kumari does not decide entitlement to mandamus without using alternative remedies. The petition was dismissed with liberty to approach the Magistrate, without deciding the accusation on merits.	471
Exceptional writ control of investigation — Alternative remedies and limits on directions	Divine Retreat Centre permits rare Article 226 intervention where mala fide investigation, clear abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII CrPC require correction. Even then, the High Court may insist on lawful process but cannot dictate investigative methods. Under Shweta Bhadauria, failure to use remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 ordinarily justifies refusing mandamus, subject to the recognised Whirlpool exceptions. Lalita Kumari does not decide entitlement to bypass those remedies. This was the precedent framework relied on while rejecting direct FIR relief; the present application was under Section 482.	475
FIR mandamus under Article 226 — alternative remedies and exceptional intervention	A request for writ directions to investigate a complaint and register an offence ordinarily requires the complainant to use the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The Court adopted Shweta Bhadauria's rule preserving the Whirlpool exceptions and distinguishing the police duty discussed in Lalita Kumari from entitlement to bypass alternative remedies. Under Divine Retreat Centre, exceptional intervention is available where clearly mala fide investigation and abuse or non-compliance with Chapter XII are established; even then, the High Court may insist on the statutory process but cannot dictate how the investigation is conducted. Applying these principles, the petition was dismissed with liberty to file a Section 200 complaint.	492
FIR mandamus — alternative CrPC remedies and exceptional writ control	A complainant seeking registration of an FIR ordinarily must use the available CrPC remedies rather than seek direct mandamus under Article 226. Applying Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court recognised the Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 routes, subject to the Whirlpool exceptions. Exceptional writ control remains available for clearly mala fide exercise of investigative power and abuse or non-compliance with Chapter XII, but the	494

	High Court may insist on the statutory process without dictating the manner of investigation. Lalita Kumari's discussion of the Section 154 duty does not by itself confer entitlement to bypass alternative remedies. The petition was dismissed because an efficacious criminal-complaint remedy was available.
Alternative remedies before mandamus for FIR registration	Mandamus compelling the police to perform their duty under Section 154 CrPC may be refused when the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool Corporation. As explained in Shweta Bhadauria and relied upon by the Court, Lalita Kumari does not decide an entitlement to mandamus for FIR registration without first availing those alternative remedies.	501
Mandamus for FIR registration and unused alternative remedies	An informant may be refused mandamus to compel performance of the police duty under Section 154 CrPC when the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool Corporation. The Court relied on Shweta Bhadauria's distinction that Lalita Kumari does not determine entitlement to such mandamus without availing alternative remedies.	504
Writ direction to consider a complaint that would effectively require FIR registration	A request that police merely consider a complaint cannot avoid the ordinary statutory-remedy requirement where the requested direction would effectively require FIR registration. Subject to recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule, a person alleging police inaction should use the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The Court declined the indirect registration direction here and preserved liberty to pursue the appropriate CrPC remedy.	517
Lalita Kumari and the separate requirement to pursue remedies before seeking mandamus	The rule in Lalita Kumari concerning the police duty under Section 154 CrPC does not decide entitlement to a writ compelling registration without first using the available statutory remedies. Applying Shweta Bhadauria, the Court treated the mandatory-registration rule and the alternative-remedy requirement for writ relief as separate questions, subject to the recognised exceptions.	517
Alternative Criminal Procedure Remedies before Seeking Mandamus for FIR Registration	The police duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence does not by itself entitle an informant to immediate mandamus under Article 226. Relief may be declined where remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC have not been used, subject to the exceptions recognised in the relied-upon Division Bench decision. Rare intervention remains available for clearly established mala fide investigative abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII, but the High Court may insist on lawful procedure without prescribing how the police must investigate. The writ petition was dismissed with liberty to approach the Magistrate.	533
Mandamus for FIR registration — statutory remedies and recognised writ exceptions	A writ of mandamus to enforce the police duty under Section 154 CrPC may be declined where the informant has not pursued the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the recognised writ exceptions referred to in Shweta Bhadauria. The duty to register an FIR considered in Lalita Kumari does not itself establish an entitlement to mandamus without resort to those remedies. Applying the alternative-remedy principle, the Court dismissed the petition without examining the complaint's merits and granted liberty to file a criminal complaint before the competent court.	543
Alternative remedies and mandamus for FIR registration	A mandamus directing police to perform their duty under Section 154 CrPC may be denied where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool. Lalita Kumari concerns the police duty to register an FIR and does not determine entitlement to mandamus without using those remedies.	554
Mandatory FIR registration does not dispense with	As stated in the reproduced Shweta Bhadauria ruling, mandamus to enforce the police duty under Section 154 CrPC may be denied where the informant has not	608 alternative remedies for mandamus	used Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the Whirlpool exceptions referred to there. Lalita Kumari concerns the duty to register cognizable information and does not itself decide entitlement to mandamus without those remedies.

Mandamus for FIR registration and alternative statutory remedies	A writ seeking FIR registration is ordinarily declined where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The rule remains subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy requirement. Applying this principle, the Court left the petitioner free to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	620
Lalita Kumari and entitlement to FIR-registration mandamus	The ruling in Lalita Kumari on the police duty to register an FIR does not determine an informant's entitlement to mandamus without using the alternative remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC.	620
Lalita Kumari does not dispense with alternative remedies for mandamus	Lalita Kumari's ruling on the duty to register cognizable information does not decide entitlement to a writ of mandamus without recourse to Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The High Court applied that distinction when refusing direct FIR-registration relief.	627
Lalita Kumari and the right to seek registration mandamus	Lalita Kumari's ruling on the police duty to register cognizable information does not resolve entitlement to a writ compelling registration without using the alternative remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The Court relied on this distinction in declining the writ.	629
Specific Complaint Required for Protective Police Action; Existing FIR Unaffected	Where an adult couple's complaint disclosed no particular threat, date or identifiable offender, the Court directed that, if they submitted a complaint to the Superintendent of Police specifying offences and naming the offenders, necessary action should be taken in accordance with Lata Singh v. State of U.P., (2006) 5 SCC 475. The direction expressly left any FIR already registered unaffected.	653
Reliance on an Arya Samaj Marriage Certificate in a Protection Petition	In considering the protection petition, the Court held that the Arya Samaj Mandir had no authority to issue the marriage certificate relied on by the petitioners and declined to take that certificate into account. It read the Supreme Court's order in Secretary, Madhya Bharat Arya Pratinidhi Sabha v. State of Madhya Pradesh, SLP (Civil) No. 5315/2022, dated 4 April 2022, as permitting solemnisation subject to the prescribed conditions, without conferring authority to certify marriage. The petitioners had not claimed to be Arya Samajists for purposes of the Arya Marriage Validation Act, 1937. Their claim to protection was then considered on the basis of their adulthood and freedom of choice.	653
Mandamus for police action—Alternative statutory remedies	A writ seeking to compel the police to act under Section 154 CrPC may be declined where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool. Where an effective remedy by criminal complaint is available, the informant may be relegated to the competent criminal court.	662
Lalita Kumari and entitlement to writ mandamus	The duty to register information considered in Lalita Kumari does not itself determine entitlement to a writ compelling police action without first using the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The alternative-remedy requirement must be considered separately.	662
Section 173(1) CrPC—Completion without unnecessary delay	An investigating officer cannot keep an investigation pending indefinitely. Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion without unnecessary delay and submission of the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge sheet, as early as possible. A direction to complete the investigation promptly leaves the lawful investigative conclusion open.	668
Alternative remedies before seeking mandamus for FIR	Mandamus to compel FIR registration may be refused where the informant has not availed the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The police duty	697 registration	to register cognizable information is distinct from entitlement to a writ compelling that duty. Lalita Kumari does not decide entitlement to such mandamus without recourse to those remedies. Applying the statutory-remedy authorities and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court declined the requested FIR-registration writ.

Police failure to register an FIR — statutory complaint remedy before direct High Court relief	Police must register an FIR where the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. If they fail to act, the aggrieved informant may pursue the complaint procedure under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. That police duty does not itself establish entitlement to direct High Court relief bypassing statutory remedies. Applying that distinction, the Court dismissed the Section 482 CrPC application seeking an FIR-registration direction as not maintainable, with liberty to approach the competent Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	702
FIR registration duty and the remedy against police inaction	Police must register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence. If they fail to act, the informant must ordinarily pursue the remedies under the Code, including a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC, rather than seek an immediate writ directing registration. Applying this distinction, the Court dismissed the writ petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	710
Lalita Kumari does not dispense with alternative remedies for FIR mandamus	Lalita Kumari's rule concerning police registration of an FIR does not decide an informant's entitlement to mandamus without first using the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. Following Shweta Bhadauria, the Court treated the registration duty and entitlement to writ relief as separate questions.	710
FIR-registration precedent does not itself establish entitlement to mandamus	Following Shweta Bhadauria, the Court distinguished Lalita Kumari's FIR-registration rule from entitlement to a writ compelling registration without first using Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The existence of a statutory police duty does not itself remove the requirement to pursue the available remedies, subject to the recognised exceptions.	719
FIR-registration mandamus — statutory remedies and exceptions to alternative-remedy restraint	Applying Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court declined to direct registration of an FIR when the petitioner could use the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The adopted Division Bench rule permits denial of mandamus for failure to pursue those remedies, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool Corporation. It also distinguishes Lalita Kumari’s rule on the police duty to register an FIR from entitlement to a writ without using the statutory remedies. The petition, brought after police inaction attributed to the prosecution officer’s opinion that the dispute was civil, was dismissed as not maintainable, with liberty to approach the competent Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC.	745
Alternative remedies before seeking mandamus for FIR registration	An informant ordinarily must use the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC before seeking a writ compelling FIR registration, subject to recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. Lalita Kumari concerns the police duty to register cognizable information; it does not itself establish entitlement to mandamus without using those remedies. The Court dismissed the petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS.	763

Lalita Kumari concerns the police duty to register cognizable information; it does not itself establish entitlement to mandamus without using those remedies. The Court dismissed the petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS.	765

1 : Criminal-Side Writ Jurisdiction and Public Law Remedies

Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must determine whether an offence is made out, then submit the appropriate closure report or charge sheet promptly. The Court directed completion as early as possible and permitted a grievance application to the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	781
Alternative remedies and exceptional writ intervention over police inaction	Mandamus for FIR registration may be refused where the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC have not been used, subject to the recognised Whirlpool exceptions referred to in Shweta Bhadauria. Lalita Kumari's registration rule does not itself decide entitlement to writ relief without those remedies. Divine Retreat Centre permits rare Article 226 intervention for clearly established mala fide investigation or abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII, but even then the Court may insist on lawful process rather than dictate the manner of investigation.	786
Article 226 — Exceptional intervention despite police-complaint remedies	Mandamus for FIR registration may be declined where remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC have not been used, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool. In a rare case of clearly established mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process, but cannot prescribe how the investigation must be conducted. Lalita Kumari does not decide entitlement to mandamus without recourse to the alternative remedies.	820
Article 226 — Exceptional intervention despite police-complaint remedies	Mandamus for FIR registration may be declined where remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC have not been used, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool. In a rare case of clearly established mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process, but cannot prescribe how the investigation must be conducted. Lalita Kumari does not decide entitlement to mandamus without recourse to the alternative remedies.	822
Article 226 — Exceptional intervention despite police-complaint remedies	Mandamus for FIR registration may be declined where remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC have not been used, subject to the exceptions recognised in Whirlpool. In a rare case of clearly established mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process, but cannot prescribe how the investigation must be conducted. Lalita Kumari does not decide entitlement to mandamus without recourse to the alternative remedies. The writ petition was dismissed with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	826
FIR-registration mandamus and available statutory remedies	The police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence is distinct from an informant's entitlement to obtain immediate mandamus under Article 226. Where police do not act, the available police-superior and Magistrate remedies should ordinarily be used. A registration-duty ruling does not dispense with those remedies; the adopted Division Bench formulation preserves recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. Applying that approach, the Court dismissed the writ and left the petitioner free to complain to the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	838
Factual foundation for protection and statement-recording directions in a criminal-side writ	The Court refused the requested protection and statement-recording relief because the petitioners had laid no foundation for alleging that the police had treated the other petitioners improperly or that the girl had been beaten by the police or her parents. The request for special police or judicial statement arrangements and associated protection was therefore not granted on that record.	858 availability of statutory alternative remedies	200 CrPC, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. Finding an efficacious remedy by criminal complaint before the competent court, the High Court dismissed the petition with liberty to pursue that remedy.

Lalita Kumari does not dispense with alternative remedies for FIR-registration mandamus	The ruling in Lalita Kumari on the police duty to register an FIR does not decide entitlement to a writ compelling performance of Section 154 CrPC without first availing the alternative remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200. The statutory registration duty does not by itself resolve whether the High Court should entertain that writ.	863
FIR-registration mandamus: statutory remedies and liberty to complain to the Magistrate	A person aggrieved by police inaction should ordinarily use the statutory remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC before seeking mandamus for FIR registration, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. Applying that principle, the Court dismissed the writ petition with liberty to approach the competent Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS for redressal.	866
Lalita Kumari: registration duty does not itself establish entitlement to mandamus	Lalita Kumari does not determine entitlement to a writ compelling the police to perform their Section 154 CrPC duty without availing the statutory alternative remedies. The ruling on mandatory FIR registration therefore does not, by itself, displace the alternative-remedy inquiry in writ proceedings.	866
Writ mandamus for registration of an FIR and alternative remedies	A person complaining that the police have not registered an FIR must ordinarily use the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC before seeking mandamus under Article 226, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. Lalita Kumari concerns the police duty to register an FIR and does not itself confer an entitlement to mandamus without using those remedies. The petition was dismissed with liberty to approach the competent Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	921
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1) CrPC	The investigating officer cannot leave an investigation pending indefinitely. Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion without unnecessary delay, a conclusion on whether an offence is made out and submission of the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and lawful consequential steps, while leaving the result to the investigating officer. Any further grievance could be submitted to the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	922
Witness Protection Scheme — fresh representation to Superintendent of Police	Referring to the nationwide Witness Protection Scheme formulated in Mahender Chawla, the Court directed that, if the petitioner submitted a fresh representation seeking protection to the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior, the Superintendent should take necessary action to provide protection. The direction was conditional on that representation; the Court did not determine a threat category or prescribe particular protective measures.	941
Police inaction: statutory remedies ordinarily precede a writ for FIR registration	The duty to register an FIR when information discloses a cognizable offence is distinct from entitlement to a writ compelling registration. A complainant ordinarily must use the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. Mandamus may be refused where those remedies have not been used, subject to the recognised alternative-remedy exceptions referred to in Shweta Bhadauria. Lalita Kumari's rule about the police duty does not itself decide entitlement to mandamus without using those remedies. The petition was dismissed with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS.	945

Criminal-Side Writs for Fair and Independent Investigation

CBI investigation — exceptional constitutional	A direction entrusting investigation to the CBI is an exceptional exercise of constitutional power, to be used sparingly and cautiously. Allegations against local police alone do not justify it. The relied-upon authority identifies	10 intervention	situations requiring credibility and confidence in investigation, matters with national or international ramifications, and cases where complete justice or enforcement of fundamental rights requires such intervention; there is no inflexible formula.

Article 226 — exceptional intervention against mala fide investigation	The Divine Retreat Centre principle relied upon permits exceptional Article 226 intervention where mala fide exercise of investigative power and a clear case of abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC require the High Court's interference. The power is reserved for the rarest cases. Even then, the Court may insist on observance of the Code's process but cannot prescribe how the police must conduct the investigation.	57
Accused cannot require investigation from a chosen angle or by a chosen agency	A suspect or accused has no right to choose the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner. Applying Romila Thapar and Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki, the Court refused to direct investigation according to the accused's representation. The reproduced authorities preserve appropriate Article 226 intervention where the court is satisfied that investigative power has been exercised mala fide; vague, unsubstantiated allegations do not suffice.	134
Judicial monitoring of investigation is distinct from directing its manner or conclusions	In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor investigation to ensure proper progress, fairness and freedom from external interference. It may not supervise investigation by directing how evidence is collected or shaping the investigating officer's conclusions. Applying Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court held that directing investigation from the accused's preferred angle would amount to impermissible supervision and could compromise the trial court's independent assessment of the police report.	134
Exceptional writ intervention against mala fide investigation despite statutory remedies	Article 226 intervention remains available in an exceptional case where a clear abuse of investigative power and noncompliance with Chapter XII CrPC are established. The Divine Retreat Centre passage relied upon by the Court permits insistence on statutory process, while withholding directions on how investigation should be conducted. Shweta Bhadauria also preserves the alternative-remedy exceptions recognised in Whirlpool; no such ground was found to justify the requested direction here.	136
Writ for FIR registration and alternative remedies under the CrPC	A writ seeking to compel FIR registration may be declined when the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, unless an exception recognised in Whirlpool applies. The availability of an effective criminal-complaint remedy justified dismissal of the writ with liberty to approach the competent court.	140
Exceptional writ intervention in a mala fide investigation	Article 226 permits intervention in the rarest of rare cases where a clear abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC are established. Even then, the High Court may insist on compliance with the statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police must conduct the investigation.	140
FIR-registration writ and statutory alternative remedies	Mandamus to compel FIR registration may be refused where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, unless an exception recognised in Whirlpool applies. An effective remedy by criminal complaint justified dismissal of the writ with liberty to approach the competent court.	143
Writ control of mala fide investigation	Article 226 intervention is available in the rarest of rare cases where a clear abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC are established. The High Court may require observance of the statutory process, but even then cannot direct the police how to conduct the investigation.	143
Exceptional writ relief against mala fide exercise of investigative power	In the rarest of rare cases, a clear abuse of investigative power coupled with non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC may justify Article 226 intervention. Even then, the High Court may insist on the statutory process being observed	147

	but cannot prescribe how the investigation is to be conducted.
Exceptional intervention to secure an independent investigation	The absence of an accused's right to choose an agency does not exclude appropriate Article 226 directions against a mala fide exercise of investigative power. Transfer to the CBI or another independent agency is an exceptional measure, to be used sparingly and cautiously where needed for investigative credibility, public confidence, complete justice or enforcement of fundamental rights, or where an incident has national or international ramifications. Allegations against local police or vague assertions of mala fides do not suffice. On the father's claim of political rivalry and false implication, the Court found no case for directing a different investigative course.	158
Exceptional writ directions against mala fide investigation	In the rarest cases, clear mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse of power or non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC may justify appropriate Article 226 directions. Even then, the High Court may require compliance with the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police should investigate. The Court relied on Divine Retreat Centre for that qualified limit and on Shweta Bhadauria, which reserves the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule.	159
Constitutional intervention for mala fide investigation	Although neither the accused nor the complainant can choose the investigating agency, the High Court may issue appropriate directions under Article 226 where it is satisfied that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. Vague or unsubstantiated allegations do not establish that basis for intervention.	161
Exceptional transfer of investigation to CBI	A direction transferring investigation to CBI must be exercised sparingly and cautiously in exceptional circumstances. Allegations against local police alone are insufficient. The power may be used where necessary to restore credibility and confidence, address national or international ramifications, or secure complete justice and fundamental rights.	161
Exceptional writ intervention in mala fide investigation	Article 226 permits appropriate directions where a clear case of mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC requires intervention. The reproduced rule confines that power to rare cases. Even then, the High Court may insist on compliance with the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police should conduct the investigation.	185
Article 226 directions against mala fide investigation	The restriction on choosing an investigating agency does not remove the High Court's Article 226 power to issue appropriate directions where it is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. The Divine Retreat Centre principle reproduced through Romila Thapar distinguishes that constitutional remedy from using inherent jurisdiction to replace the investigating officer midstream with an officer of the Court's own choice.	217
Exceptional constitutional directions for CBI investigation	A constitutional direction for CBI investigation must be exercised sparingly and cautiously in exceptional circumstances. Allegations against local police alone do not justify routine transfer. The reproduced Constitution Bench standard identifies situations where transfer is necessary to restore investigative credibility, address national or international ramifications, secure complete justice or enforce fundamental rights.	217
Exceptional grounds required for transfer of investigation to the CBI	Transfer to the CBI is an extraordinary power exercised sparingly on a case-specific foundation, such as a need for credible, impartial investigation or prevention of a failure of justice. Mere allegations against local police or the size and public impact of an alleged scam do not automatically justify transfer. Here the petitioner identified no lapse in the completed investigation or charge-sheet. General allegations of a Ponzi scheme and further cheating after bail did not establish an exceptional need for CBI investigation.	299
Public confidence as a ground for independent	Independent investigation may be warranted to make the discovery of truth credible even without a conclusive finding that every act of the State police was	299

investigation	defective. The Court must be satisfied from available material that transfer would promote justice; apprehension must have a reasonable foundation. The exceptional circumstances discussed in Subrata Chattoraj and the narrated transfer cases did not dispense with that requirement, which was absent on the present record.
Article 226 intervention where investigation is exercised mala fide	The absence of a right to select an investigating agency does not exclude appropriate directions under Article 226 where the High Court is satisfied that the investigating officer has exercised the power mala fide. A vague, unsupported allegation of mala fides is insufficient; specific supporting facts are required.	311
Article 226 — exceptional CBI transfer after filing of the charge sheet	Filing of a charge sheet does not extinguish the High Court's power under Article 226 to direct CBI investigation. The power must be used sparingly and cautiously in exceptional situations, such as the need to restore investigative credibility, address national or international ramifications, secure complete justice or enforce fundamental rights. Allegations against local police alone do not suffice. No exceptional circumstance was shown to justify transfer in this case.	317
Mala fide investigation — constitutional directions despite absence of agency choice	Although neither the accused nor the complainant may choose an investigating agency as of right, appropriate directions under Article 226 remain available where the High Court is satisfied that investigative power was exercised mala fide. Vague, unsubstantiated assertions are insufficient; the claim requires specific supporting facts.	317
Article 226 — exceptional transfer of investigation	Transfer of an investigation to an independent agency cannot be ordered routinely or merely on allegations against the local police. The passages from Romila Thapar relied upon by the Court preserve Article 226 intervention for demonstrated mala fide exercise of investigative power. A direction for CBI investigation calls for sparing and cautious exercise of power in exceptional situations, such as a need to restore investigative credibility, address wider ramifications, secure complete justice or enforce fundamental rights. On the material before it, the High Court found no illegality justifying transfer.	321
Article 226 — Exceptional intervention against mala fide investigation or for an independent agency	The High Court may issue appropriate directions under Article 226 when specific material establishes mala fide exercise of investigative power. A direction for investigation by CBI or another independent agency is exceptional, requiring caution and circumstances such as the need to restore investigative credibility, protect fundamental rights or do complete justice. Mere allegations against local police or vague assertions of bias are insufficient. Neither the accused nor the complainant has a right to select an agency of choice.	359
Exceptional constitutional transfer of investigation to the CBI	A constitutional direction entrusting an investigation to the CBI requires caution and exceptional circumstances; allegations against local police alone do not justify it. The adopted precedent identifies the need to restore credibility and confidence, national or international ramifications, complete justice or enforcement of fundamental rights as relevant circumstances. The power is exercised sparingly, rather than at the choice of an accused, complainant or informant.	440
Exceptional writ correction of mala fide investigation without prescribing police methods	The adopted Divine Retreat Centre passage preserves Article 226 intervention in rare cases of demonstrated mala fide investigation, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with the Code's investigation process. Even then, the High Court may require observance of lawful procedure but cannot direct how the police must conduct the investigation. The present order applied the ordinary Magistrate-remedy route and made no finding warranting such exceptional constitutional intervention.	446

1.4 : Criminal-Side Writs for Fair and Independent Investigation

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Exceptional writ intervention in mala fide investigation	The adopted Divine Retreat Centre passage recognises exceptional Article 226 intervention where investigative power has clearly been exercised mala fide, or abuse of power and non-compliance with the prescribed criminal procedure require correction. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police must conduct the investigation. This exceptional writ standard does not convert ordinary police inaction into an entitlement to bypass the Magistrate.	466
Exceptional circumstances for transfer of an ongoing investigation to CBI	Transfer of an ongoing investigation to CBI is exceptional relief and cannot be ordered lightly. The Court refused transfer where the petitioner had not identified malice by the investigating authorities necessitating it. Allegations against the informant did not, on this record, establish a basis for changing the investigating agency.	517
Court-monitored investigation — distinction from judicial supervision of investigative steps	Court monitoring may ensure progress, fairness and freedom from outside interference in rare and compelling circumstances. It does not permit the Court to direct the mode of investigation or shape the investigating officer's opinion. Relying on Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court explained that judicial supervision of that kind risks influencing the trial court's independent assessment and is not contemplated by the Code.	540
Transfer of investigation — unfounded apprehension does not establish exceptional grounds	Transfer of investigation requires exceptional circumstances and cannot be ordered routinely or merely on the complainant's unfounded impression that the investigation is unfair. The Court declined intervention on that basis, leaving the complainant free to oppose any closure report subsequently filed.	540
Exceptional writ intervention against mala fide investigation	The High Court’s power under Article 226 to intervene against mala fide exercise of investigative power is reserved for exceptional cases showing clear abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process, but cannot prescribe how the police are to conduct the investigation.	554
Exceptional writ intervention in investigation	The relied-upon Divine Retreat Centre passage permits exceptional Article 226 intervention where mala fide use of investigative power, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with the Code are shown. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how the investigation is to be conducted. The cited Shweta Bhadauria decision also preserves the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule; ordinary police inaction is to be addressed through the Code’s remedies.	566
Exceptional writ intervention in investigation matters	Alternative statutory remedies ordinarily justify refusing a writ seeking FIR registration. The narrated Shweta Bhadauria ruling preserves the exceptions referred to in Whirlpool without treating Lalita Kumari as authority to bypass those remedies. The quoted Divine Retreat Centre passage also preserves rare Article 226 intervention where clear mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII require it. Even then, the High Court may insist on statutory process but cannot dictate how the police investigate.	595
Exceptional Article 226 intervention in a mala fide investigation	The Divine Retreat Centre passage relied on by the Court permits exceptional Article 226 intervention where a clear abuse of investigative power, mala fides and non-compliance with the statutory process require it. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the prescribed process rather than dictate how police must investigate. This is a narrow public-law exception to the ordinary statutory remedy; the present proceeding was an application under Section 528 BNSS.	608 investigation	Chapter XII CrPC are established. Even then, the High Court may require compliance with the statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police must conduct the investigation.

Exceptional Article 226 control of mala fide investigation	Exceptional intervention under Article 226 may be warranted in the rarest cases where mala fide investigative action, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC are made out. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of statutory process but cannot dictate how the investigation must be conducted.	627
Exceptional Article 226 intervention against investigative abuse	The High Court may intervene under Article 226 in the rarest cases where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC require correction. Even in such a case, the Court may insist on compliance with the statutory process but cannot dictate the manner of police investigation.	629
Exceptional writ intervention in mala fide investigation	Article 226 intervention in an investigation is reserved for exceptional cases in which mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC are established. Even then, the High Court may insist on compliance with the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police must conduct the investigation.	662
Exceptional grounds for transfer to an independent investigating agency	Transfer to CBI or another independent agency is an extraordinary power to be exercised sparingly on material showing a need to secure fair investigation, credibility or complete justice. Mere allegations against local police are insufficient. Relevant grounds may include prima facie bias, taint or influence by senior officials. The assessment depends on the available material and a reasonable apprehension of injustice; it does not require a conclusive case of police abuse. Here the Court deprecated the delay but left the merits of the fresh closure report to the CJM and ordered no transfer.	714
Exceptional writ intervention against investigative abuse	Article 226 permits exceptional intervention where a clear case of mala fide investigation, abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrants it. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the Code's process but cannot dictate how police should conduct the investigation. Ordinary police inaction should be addressed through the statutory Magistrate remedies.	763
Exceptional writ intervention against investigative abuse	Article 226 permits exceptional intervention where a clear case of mala fide investigation, abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrants it. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the Code's process but cannot dictate how police should conduct the investigation. Ordinary police inaction should be addressed through the statutory Magistrate remedies.	765
Exceptional constitutional intervention in investigation	The High Court may issue appropriate directions under Article 226 where it is satisfied that investigative powers have been exercised mala fide. Transfer to the CBI is an exceptional power to be used sparingly and cautiously when necessary for credible investigation, complete justice or enforcement of fundamental rights; mere allegations against the local police do not justify routine transfer.	790
Judicial directions where investigation is shown to be mala fide	The absence of a right to dictate investigation does not exclude appropriate directions under Article 226 where the High Court is satisfied that the investigating officer has exercised investigative power mala fide. The Romila Thapar reasoning relied on by the Court requires specific material facts and particulars; a vague, unsupported assertion of bias is insufficient. Prabal Dogra likewise reserves intervention where bias arises from extraneous considerations or mala fides.	814 grounded request for judicial intervention	evidence to ascertain whether an offence has been committed. Fair and truthful investigation protects victims as well as accused persons and is necessary for a fair trial. Judicial intervention on alleged investigative defects requires a factual foundation rather than unsupported suspicion. Applying Nasima and Dharam Pal, the Court found no prima facie basis serious enough for CBI transfer after considering the asserted anomalies and the State's witnessed panchnamas, forensic post-mortem and scientific inspection material.

Article 226— exceptional CBI investigation without State consent	Section 6 of the Delhi Special Police Establishment Act does not restrict the High Court's constitutional power under Article 226 to direct CBI investigation within a State without its consent. Such a direction does not violate federalism or separation of powers. Following the Constitution Bench in Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, the Court emphasised that this power must be exercised sparingly, cautiously and exceptionally, including where needed to secure credible investigation, complete justice or fundamental rights, or where the incident has national or international ramifications. The petitioner's supported circumstances must justify its exercise; the suspicions raised here did not.	818
Charge sheet or commenced trial— no absolute bar to exceptional reinvestigation	Superior courts may exceptionally order further investigation, fresh or de novo investigation, reinvestigation or transfer to another agency when the ends of justice require it. Vinay Tyagi treats fresh, de novo and reinvestigation as equivalent expressions, while requiring sparing and cautious exercise. State of Punjab v. CBI and Dharam Pal establish that filing a charge sheet, commencement of trial or examination of witnesses is not an absolute bar to justified intervention. The present request failed for want of a prima facie case for CBI transfer; the Court also noted that more than seven and a half years had elapsed since the death.	818
Exceptional constitutional directions for mala fide investigation	Although interested parties cannot choose the investigating agency, the High Court may issue appropriate directions under Article 226 where it is convinced that investigative powers have been exercised mala fide. A CBI direction is exceptional and must be exercised sparingly and cautiously where needed for credible investigation, complete justice or enforcement of fundamental rights. Mere allegations against local police or vague, unsubstantiated assertions of mala fides do not justify routine transfer.	832
Constitutional intervention for mala fide investigation and exceptional CBI transfer	The High Court may issue appropriate directions under Article 226 when it is convinced that investigative powers have been exercised mala fide. CBI investigation is an exceptional remedy, to be ordered sparingly and cautiously when needed to restore credibility, do complete justice or enforce fundamental rights, including in incidents of national or international significance. Mere allegations against local police or vague assertions of mala fides do not suffice. This constitutional power remains subject to restraint and does not create a party's right to select an investigating agency.	833
Exceptional Article 226 directions for mala fide investigation	The High Court may intervene under Article 226 in a rare case where mala fide use of investigative power, a clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC justify intervention. Even then, it may insist on observance of statutory process but cannot prescribe how the police must investigate. The request for an independent agency in this case resulted in no such direction; the petitioner was relegated to the Magistrate remedy.	838
Exceptional writ intervention in investigation despite alternative remedies	The adopted Divine Retreat Centre passage permits exceptional Article 226 intervention where clear mala fide exercise of investigation powers, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC require it. Even then, the High Court may insist on lawful process but cannot dictate how the police should investigate. The quoted Shweta Bhadauria ruling recognises exceptions to refusal of mandamus for failure to use statutory remedies and explains that	853

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Lalita Kumari does not itself establish an entitlement to mandamus without recourse to those remedies.
Article 226: exceptional intervention against mala fide investigative abuse	The High Court may issue appropriate directions at an aggrieved person's instance where a clear case of mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC requires exceptional intervention. Even then, it may insist on compliance with the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police must conduct the investigation.	863
Article 226: exceptional process-compliance directions for mala fide investigation	In an exceptional case clearly establishing mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC, the High Court may intervene at an aggrieved person's instance. It may require observance of the statutory process, but cannot prescribe how the police should conduct the investigation.	866
Exceptional writ intervention against abuse of investigative power	Article 226 permits appropriate intervention where mala fide exercise of investigative power or clear abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC require the High Court's interference. Under the adopted Divine Retreat Centre passage, this power is reserved for the rarest cases showing that abuse. Even then, the Court may insist on compliance with the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police conduct the investigation.	875
Article 226 investigation oversight — exceptional intervention and limits on directions	In rare cases of mala fide investigation, clear abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with criminal procedure, the High Court may issue appropriate directions under Article 226 to secure observance of the prescribed process. It cannot dictate how the police must conduct the investigation. Mandamus for FIR registration may be declined where the statutory remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC have not been used, subject to the recognised exceptional grounds for writ intervention. The mandatory-registration principle in Lalita Kumari does not by itself determine entitlement to mandamus without using those remedies. The Court discussed these constitutional qualifications while dismissing the Section 528 BNSS petition with liberty to use the Magistrate remedy.	887
Exceptional writ intervention in mala fide investigation	Article 226 permits appropriate directions where a clear case of mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC warrants exceptional intervention. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police must conduct the investigation. Ordinary police inaction is to be addressed through the Magistrate's statutory remedies. The Court considered this qualification in Divine Retreat Centre while dismissing the petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate.	945
Article 226 investigation directions — mala fides and exceptional transfer to CBI	The principles reproduced from Romila Thapar recognise that Article 226 directions may issue at an aggrieved person's instance where the Court is satisfied that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. A transfer to CBI cannot be routine or rest merely on allegations against local police. The Constitution Bench standard reproduced in that discussion requires sparing and cautious exercise in exceptional situations, such as a need to restore investigative credibility and confidence, national or international ramifications, or the requirements of complete justice and fundamental rights. Vague and unsupported allegations of mala fides are insufficient.	1008
	Sub-Chapter no. 1.5 Judicial Monitoring and Compliance in Criminal-Side Writs
Court-monitored investigation — surveillance rather than dictation of conclusions	Court monitoring of an investigation differs from supervision. In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor to ensure a fair, timely investigation free from external interference. It should not direct the investigating officer to form a predetermined opinion or control the execution	10

1.5 : Judicial Monitoring and Compliance in Criminal-Side Writs

	of investigative tasks. The officer forms the opinion reported under Section 173(2) CrPC, while the trial court must independently decide whether an offence is proved.
Court monitoring and supervision of a criminal investigation	Court monitoring may ensure that investigation progresses fairly, impartially and without undue delay or external interference. It does not permit the court to direct the mode of investigation or shape the investigating officer's opinion under Section 173(2) CrPC. Such supervision could influence the trial court's independent assessment of that opinion. Applying Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court refused to direct investigation according to the petitioners' proposed course, while preserving monitoring in rare and compelling circumstances.	82
Reasons and restraint in higher-court directions influencing investigation	Higher courts must consider the consequences of directions and observations capable of influencing an investigation. The D. Venkatasubramaniam passages relied upon by the Court reject unexplained intervention and uncalled-for observations prejudicing affected persons. They explain that Section 482 CrPC intervention serves the statutory purposes of giving effect to Code orders, preventing abuse of court process and securing justice; the present writ was disposed of with a completion direction rather than supervision of investigative choices.	139
Judicial monitoring and supervision of investigation	Monitoring may ensure fair, impartial and timely progress without external interference, but does not permit the court to direct the mode or manner of investigation. Supervision that helps formulate the investigating officer’s conclusions risks influencing the trial court and is not envisaged by the CrPC. In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor progress while leaving investigation to the agency.	147
Judicial monitoring distinguished from supervision of investigation	Judicial monitoring may, in rare and compelling circumstances, ensure that investigation progresses fairly, promptly and without external interference. It does not permit the Court to direct the mode of investigation or shape the investigating officer's opinion. The officer must form that opinion independently, and the trial Court must assess the resulting case; judicial supervision could improperly influence that later assessment. Applying Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court held that it had no jurisdiction to supervise the investigation in the manner sought.	158
Monitoring and supervision of investigation	Monitoring seeks to ensure fair, timely progress without external interference. It does not authorise a court to direct the investigative method or shape the investigating officer’s opinion. Supervision of that kind risks influencing the trial court’s independent evaluation. In rare and compelling circumstances, superior courts may monitor an investigation to secure fairness without assuming its conduct.	161
Police directions to secure compliance with written arrest grounds	The Court directed Police Headquarters to warn investigating officers that failure to supply written arrest grounds in breach of the cited Supreme Court decisions would be presumed deliberate facilitation of the offender and would entail suspension and a departmental inquiry for a major penalty. The DGP was directed to issue the circular within one month and submit compliance with guidelines by 18 August 2026; default could invite contempt proceedings.	232
Court monitoring and supervision of investigation — distinct functions	In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor progress to secure a fair investigation without undue delay or external interference. Monitoring does not authorise directing or channelling the manner of investigation. Judicial supervision that shapes the investigating officer's opinion may influence the trial court and undermine an independent trial; directing investigation in a particular manner would amount to such supervision.	317
Judicial supervision of an accused's investigation	The High Court refused the accused's request to direct the manner of investigation or supervise it. It relied on Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary for the limit on supervision and on the absence of any demonstrated	321

	illegality by the agency. This refusal must be read with the exceptional Article 226 intervention recognised in the precedent passages reproduced in the same judgment.
Hearing before drastic judicial directions affecting an accused	The passage from D. Venkatasubramaniam relied upon by the Court condemns judicial directions requiring arrest, seizure of property and filing of a charge sheet against persons who were neither impleaded nor heard. Such drastic directions, issued mechanically without an opportunity to the affected persons, were treated as a nullity in that case. The proposition concerns the consequences of those judicial directions; it does not establish a general right to participate in ordinary police investigation.	324
Reasons and restraint in judicial observations about investigation	Judicial intervention in investigation requires reasons and regard to its consequences. The Court relied on D. Venkatasubramaniam, which cautions that casual or uncalled-for observations by a higher court may influence the course of proceedings and cause serious consequences, particularly for persons not heard. In the present writ, relief was confined to the statutory duty to finish the investigation promptly rather than directing its method or result.	324
Article 226 — Monitoring investigation without directing its manner	Exceptional judicial monitoring may ensure that an investigation proceeds fairly, promptly and without external interference. It does not permit the court to direct how investigative tasks are performed. Such supervision may shape the investigator’s opinion under Section 173(2) CrPC and undermine the trial court’s independent assessment. The accused’s request for directions to collect particular call records, CCTV footage and WhatsApp chats sought control over the manner of investigation. The Court therefore refused those directions under Article 226.	353
Article 226 — Unpleaded request for a Section 41A CrPC notice	An oral request for a direction requiring police to issue a Section 41A CrPC notice was declined where the writ petition sought no such relief and pleaded no basis to apprehend that police would act unlawfully. The Court also noted the availability of an application for anticipatory bail under Section 438 CrPC. The refusal rested on those defects in the writ; it did not dispense with the police’s obligations under law.	353
Article 226 — exceptional monitoring of investigation without directing the police opinion	A constitutional court may monitor an investigation in compelling circumstances to ensure lawful progress, fairness and freedom from interference. It cannot supervise the investigation by directing its mode or shaping the investigating officer's opinion. Relying on Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court confined its examination to the manner of investigation. Its detailed observations on manipulation and harassment were limited to the writ proceedings, leaving the independent agency to investigate freely.	546
Monitoring distinguished from supervision of investigation	Judicial monitoring seeks to ensure that an investigation proceeds freely, fairly and within time without external interference. Supervision that directs execution of investigative tasks or shapes the officer's opinion under Section 173(2) CrPC would intrude into the trial court's function and risk binding or influencing its decision. The Code does not envisage such supervision. Superior courts may monitor in rare and compelling circumstances while preserving the investigating officer's independent opinion and the trial court's ultimate adjudication.	832
Constitutional monitoring and supervision of investigation	A constitutional court may monitor an investigation but cannot supervise its conduct. Relying on Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court declined interference that would amount to supervision of the ongoing investigation. The reproduced discussion of Divine Retreat Centre preserves the High Court's power under Article 226 to issue appropriate directions when satisfied that investigative power has been exercised mala fide.	840
Judicial directions for arrest and	A direction to arrest the accused and file a charge-sheet would amount to impermissible supervision of investigation. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam	845

charge-sheet during investigation	and the reproduced M.C. Abraham reasoning, the Court refused such a direction. Section 41 CrPC confers a discretionary power of arrest that must be exercised cautiously; a cognizable accusation does not require mechanical arrest. Investigation may lawfully result in a charge-sheet or in a finding that no case is made out.
Section 528 BNSS application for compulsory arrest and charge-sheet	The High Court refused, in an application under Section 528 BNSS, to direct arrest of the accused and filing of a charge-sheet because those directions would supervise investigation. The reproduced D. Venkatasubramaniam and M.C. Abraham reasoning treats arrest as a discretionary police power to be exercised cautiously, with regard to liberty and the circumstances. Registration of a cognizable case does not require mechanical arrest or dictate that investigation must end in a charge-sheet.	848
Defective custodial-death inquiry: conditional vigilance referral	Where the fresh District and Sessions Judge's inquiry found the earlier JMFC inquiry contrary to law, its report was to be forwarded through the Principal Registrar to the Principal Registrar (Vigilance) for inquiry against the former JMFC. This referral was conditional on the fresh findings. The report was also to reach the High Court and Home Department, and the widow remained free to approach the Human Rights Commission concerning the jail authorities and jail doctor.	867
Judicial monitoring distinguished from supervision of investigation	Judicial monitoring maintains surveillance to ensure proper progress and a free, fair and timely inquiry without external interference; it does not direct the mode or manner of investigation. Supervision would direct execution and help form the investigating officer’s opinion, risking influence over the trial court’s independent assessment. Superior courts may monitor in rare and compelling circumstances, but cannot supervise the police investigation. Applying Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court declined to supervise the Merg inquiry; it did not find exceptional monitoring justified.	961
Court monitoring — ensuring fair progress without supervising investigative method	Court monitoring is intended to ensure proper, timely and impartial progress without directing the mode or manner of investigation or permitting external interference. Applying Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court distinguished surveillance of progress from supervision that directs execution or helps formulate the investigator’s opinion. The latter risks influencing the trial court, whose task is independently to assess the police report and evidence. Superior courts may monitor in rare and compelling circumstances, but the direction sought by the accused to investigate in a particular manner would amount to impermissible supervision.	1008

Chapter no. 2
Constitutional Criminal Justice, Fair Trial and Fundamental Rights

Sub-Chapter no. 2.1
Speedy Trial and Delay in Criminal Proceedings

Exceptional direction to finish a trial after prolonged High Court stay	A direction to expedite and conclude a particular trial is distinct from a judicial deadline that bars further proceedings or automatically acquits the accused. Applying High Court Bar Association, Allahabad and the caution against casual expedition directions, the Court held that fixed disposal schedules ordinarily should be left to the trial court and imposed only in exceptional circumstances. Here, a rape trial arising from a 2018 charge-sheet had remained stayed by the High Court for more than five years. Speedy trial is a fundamental right of the victim as well as the accused. These circumstances justified retaining the three-month direction, which carried no automatic acquittal consequence. P. Ramachandra Rao therefore did not require its recall.	46
Speedy trial and the State's duty to	Speedy trial is part of Article 21 and also serves the administration of justice by reducing opportunities to intimidate or win over witnesses. The State must	61 produce witnesses	ensure timely attendance of its witnesses and cannot allow unexplained police-witness absences or failures to serve process to prolong an undertrial's custody and create grounds for bail based on delay.

Speedy trial — delay caused by absent police witnesses	Police witnesses cannot stay away from trial and leave an undertrial in prolonged custody without progress in the case. The Court attributed the delay entirely to the State where the investigating officer repeatedly failed to attend despite summons or notice, and his one appearance could not conclude because the case diary was unavailable. It required the prosecution to produce all witnesses on the next evidence date and the Superintendent of Police to report monthly on the departmental inquiry.	67
Speedy trial — financial and administrative inability are no excuse	The State has a constitutional obligation to provide a procedure ensuring speedy trial and cannot defeat that right by pleading financial constraints or administrative inability. Courts must enforce the right and may require positive measures to strengthen investigation, courts, staffing and equipment where necessary to secure timely proceedings.	67
Speedy-trial right — commencement, stages and protected interests	The Article 21 guarantee of speedy proceedings begins with actual restraint through arrest and incarceration and extends through investigation, inquiry, trial, appeal and revision. It protects against oppressive custody, anxiety and impairment of the defence, and also serves society's interest in timely justice. Section 309 CrPC reflects that constitutional guarantee.	67
Unreasonable trial delay — attribution and the choice of remedy	Unreasonable pendency may violate the speedy-trial right unless delay is attributable to the accused or an interim order of a superior court. The relied-upon authorities recognise quashing as a possible consequence, while also treating bail as an alternative to quashing in grave-offence cases. The remedy must be assessed in context; in this murder prosecution the Court refused bail and awarded compensation for the State's established default.	67
Enforcement of witness process in a long-pending trial	Although constitutional courts should ordinarily avoid expedition directions that disturb trial-court calendars, the prolonged pendency, the trial judge’s own concern and the circumstances of this case justified measures to secure attendance. The district Superintendent of Police was directed personally to ensure execution of witness summons and warrants and prompt appearance of witnesses.	222
Prosecution’s continuing duty to secure witnesses and protect speedy trial	Filing the charge-sheet does not end the prosecution’s duty to secure regular attendance of its witnesses. Continued unjustified absence of police witnesses, despite service and an earlier compensation order, violated the detained accused’s fundamental right to a speedy trial.	250
Unjustified police-witness absence and the right to speedy trial	Repeated failure of police witnesses to attend despite service of summons and warrants, without seeking exemption on reasonable grounds, delayed the detained accused’s trial and violated his fundamental right under Article 21. The trial record showed that the delay was attributable to the police witnesses rather than the accused.	251
Financial or administrative inability cannot excuse denial of speedy trial	The State’s constitutional duty to ensure a speedy trial cannot be avoided by pleading inadequate funds or administrative inability. Courts protecting Article 21 may direct positive measures to strengthen investigation and judicial facilities where necessary to secure that right.	251
Speedy-trial protection extends through all stages of criminal proceedings	The right to speedy trial under Article 21 begins with the restraint imposed by arrest and continues through investigation, inquiry, trial, appeal and revision. It protects against oppressive incarceration, anxiety and prejudice to the defence from impermissible and avoidable delay; Section 309 CrPC reflects that guarantee.	251
Speedy criminal justice throughout	Speedy trial is an integral part of Article 21, and the State must provide the infrastructure needed for it. The right extends through investigation, inquiry,	592

investigation and review	trial, appeal and revision. The adopted discussion treats timely adjudication as a responsibility shared by judges, lawyers, court staff, the Registry and litigants, requiring diligence rather than routine indulgence in avoidable delay.
Article 21: prosecution delay in securing official witnesses	Repeated failure to serve or return witness summons and warrants, coupled with failure to secure doctors and police witnesses despite the Superintendent of Police's assurance, infringed the undertrial's right to a speedy trial. The later lockdown did not explain the prosecution's earlier failure to produce witnesses or monitor compliance.	621
Delay alone does not create a fixed bar to criminal proceedings	Elapsed time alone does not require quashing an investigation or trial. Applying P. Ramachandra Rao, the Court affirmed that Article 21 speedy-trial guidelines are illustrative and case-specific; the fixed termination limits prescribed in Common Cause and Raj Deo Sharma are not binding time bars. Courts may assess whether the circumstances make delay oppressive and unwarranted. Here no trial order sheets were produced to show that the prosecution alone caused the delay, and four years of pendency did not by itself justify quashing.	767
Available judicial powers to protect the right to speedy trial	Criminal courts should use their available powers, including Sections 309, 311 and 258 CrPC where applicable, to give effect to the right to speedy trial. In an appropriate case, relief or suitable directions may also be sought under Section 482 CrPC or Articles 226 and 227. A fact-sensitive judicial response protects the right; the expiry of an artificial time limit does not automatically require acquittal or discharge.	767
Bail on trial delay — Need for the trial-court record	The assertion that only three witnesses had been examined during two years of custody did not establish unjustified trial delay when the applicant produced no trial-court order sheets to show that he was not responsible for it.	823
Time-bound trial direction — Absence of order sheets	Without trial-court order sheets showing witness attendance and adjournments sought by the accused, the Court declined to impose a particular deadline for conclusion of the trial. It nevertheless expected the undertrial's case to be decided as early as possible in accordance with law.	823
Police failure to secure prosecution witnesses and the right to speedy trial	The police must promptly execute trial-court summons and warrants to secure prosecution witnesses, including police personnel. Persistent failure to produce those witnesses violates the accused's fundamental right to a speedy trial. The Court relied on an earlier bail order, reproduced in this decision, in which an accused detained since May 2017 was released because repeated process against prosecution witnesses remained unserved. That example supported the finding of institutional failure; this order itself granted no bail to Bhuribai.	912
	Sub-Chapter no. 2.2 Fair Trial, Due Process and Presumption of Innocence
Fair criminal trial — judge's active and impartial assessment of evidence	A criminal judge must actively and objectively examine the relevant material to find the truth, rather than act as a mere recorder of the parties' evidence. Fair trial protects the accused while also considering the victim and society. The court must remain impartial and ensure that an attempt to misdirect the trial through perfunctory or deliberately defective material does not displace its independent assessment.	17
Judicial arrest directions — hearing persons likely to be affected	A judicial direction requiring arrest, seizure or prosecution cannot be issued mechanically against persons who have neither been impleaded nor given a reasonable opportunity of hearing. In the precedent relied upon, such directions were set aside for that defect alone. The Court also noted that the persons whose arrest was sought in the present application had not been made respondents.	51
Presumption of innocence and police projection of guilt	An arrested or detained person must be presumed innocent until convicted. Police cannot use their investigation to project the person publicly as guilty or to prejudge the allegations. Statements recorded under Section 161 CrPC are not substantive evidence on which a conviction can be based; guilt must be	61

	established before a court in a fair trial.
Fair adjudication — neutrality in assessing serious accusations	A court assessing serious criminal allegations must remain detached, neutral and fair. It must not allow the emotional force of an accusation or unsupported prejudice against the accused to replace scrutiny of the evidence and proof of guilt.	65
Earlier judicial orders and the test for recusal on alleged bias	An adverse judicial ruling or an opinion formed from judicial proceedings does not by itself establish bias requiring recusal. The adopted recusal principles distinguish such views from deep-seated favouritism or antagonism that makes fair judgment impossible. An extrajudicial source may be significant, but its presence or absence is not conclusive by itself. Here, the allegations concerned earlier orders against a co-accused, with no specific allegation of bias against this appellant. Bail had been granted to other co-accused on their own merits, and the Court rejected the recusal request.	107
Unfounded recusal pressure and litigant choice of Bench	A litigant cannot obtain a preferred Bench by making unfounded allegations of bias. Applying Indore Development Authority, the Court held that a judge who can decide impartially must discharge the assigned duty and should not yield to pressure or embarrassment caused by a recusal demand. The administrative transfer request had already been rejected. The Court then rejected the wife's judicial recusal application. It described the application as contemptuous but expressly declined to initiate contempt proceedings.	107
Decision on recusal by the judge whose participation is challenged	A request that a judge recuse from hearing a case is for that judge to decide. The adopted authority requires the judge to examine whether the case can be decided independently and impartially, unaffected by bias or outside pressure. The embarrassment of hearing a recusal request is not itself a reason to withdraw. Applying those principles, the judge decided and rejected the recusal application.	107
Chief Justice's roster authority and constitution of Benches	The recusal authority applied by the Court recognises the Chief Justice's exclusive authority to constitute Benches and allocate judicial work. That authority serves orderly administration and prevents litigants from selecting the judges who will hear their cases. Unjustified recusal demands cannot be used to take over that roster function.	107
Hearing before extraordinary judicial directions with drastic adverse consequences	In the D. Venkatasubramaniam passages relied upon by the Court, judicial directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge sheet were set aside where the affected persons had neither been impleaded nor heard. The reproduced Divine Retreat Centre principle requires a reasonable hearing before a judicial order with drastic adverse consequences. This concerns such judicial intervention in investigation, rather than a routine hearing right before police action.	135
Opportunity of hearing before drastic judicial directions affecting investigation	The D. Venkatasubramaniam passages relied upon by the Court reject casual judicial directions for arrest, seizure and filing a charge sheet against persons who were neither impleaded nor heard. The reproduced Divine Retreat Centre principle requires a reasonable hearing before a judicial order carrying drastic adverse consequences for an affected person. The principle concerns that judicial intervention, rather than a general hearing before routine police investigation.	139
Witness non-appearance and the detained accused's right to timely trial	Repeated failure of a prosecution witness to respond to summons and warrants, delaying the trial while the accused remained in custody, was treated as a violation of Article 21. After the witness was arrested and produced, the Court directed his disciplinary authority to examine the matter and take necessary action for the non-compliance.	184

connected corruption trial	criminal trial even when that trial is not the direct subject of the writ petition. It directed the Special Judge to fix the case immediately and record the trap complainant's delayed evidence without further delay.
Video cross-examination and exceptional personal production from jail	Where the accused wished to cross-examine witnesses personally, the jail authorities were directed to ensure reliable internet connectivity for video conferencing. In this case, personal production before the trial court was permitted only exceptionally, with the accused bearing the security expenses of transport from Central Jail, Bhopal.	222
Reasons required for judicial findings and refusal of relief	A judicial finding must be supported by reasons so that the litigant can understand why relief was refused and a superior court can assess the exercise of judicial power. Discretion does not permit arbitrary or summary disposal without application of mind. Although the Sessions Judge's transfer-refusal order lacked reasons, the High Court examined the alleged apprehension and affirmed the refusal on different grounds.	245
Fair trial — repayment defence remains open despite refusal of handwriting examination	An accused has a fundamental right to a fair trial and to defend the charge. Refusing handwriting-expert examination on the basis of admitted signature and delivery did not decide the accused's separate plea that he had borrowed a smaller amount and repaid it. The plausibility of that defence remained for the trial court to assess.	349
Judicial vigilance against deliberately defective investigation	A fair trial requires justice to the accused and society and a fair opportunity for the prosecution to prove its case. The presiding judge must act objectively and remain especially vigilant where a deliberately defective investigation threatens to misdirect the trial.	410
Fair trial— opportunity to present defence evidence	A fair trial protects the interests of the accused, victim and society and requires fair opportunities for the persons concerned. Presenting evidence in defence is a valuable right, and its denial can deny a fair trial. Judicial steps to obtain material evidence must preserve that fairness.	414
Fair trial and the opportunity to choose and present defence evidence	A free and fair trial is protected by Article 21, and an impediment to it may also offend Article 14. The right to defend includes a reasonable opportunity to adduce evidence under Section 243(2) CrPC. The accused ordinarily knows how to prove his defence; the nature of that evidence cannot be left entirely to the court's discretion. This right remains subject to scrutiny of bona fides, relevance and unnecessary delay. The Court allowed production of the requested records while directing completion of the eleven-year-old trial within three months of communication of its order.	556
Hearing before drastic judicial directions affecting an accused	The precedent relied upon condemned judicial directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge-sheet without notice to the persons accused. Before issuing such drastic judicial directions affecting a person's reputation, the court must provide a reasonable opportunity of hearing; the precedent treated the order made without that opportunity as a nullity.	564
Active and impartial judicial assessment in a fair criminal trial	A fair criminal trial requires attention to the interests of the accused, the victim and society. The presiding judge must actively elicit relevant material and assess it objectively, while maintaining fairness and impartiality. The judge must guard against attempts to divert the determination through a perfunctory or deliberately defective investigation.	582
Coercive judicial investigation directions — hearing persons whose reputation and interests are affected	Judicial directions requiring arrest, seizure or filing of a charge sheet can have drastic consequences and should not be issued casually without hearing the persons affected. The reproduced Supreme Court reasoning treats failure to give notice before such directions as a ground for setting the order aside and cautions against unreasoned observations that may influence the investigation or legal process.	632
Trial judge's active	Fair trial protects the interests of the accused, the victim and society. The	713

and impartial duty to ascertain the truth	presiding judge must act objectively and impartially, take an active interest in eliciting relevant material, and ensure that a perfunctory or deliberately defective investigation does not subvert the determination of guilt. The Court relied on these duties when rejecting the contention that it was bound by the prosecution doctor's evidence.
Adverse investigation directions — hearing before orders with drastic consequences	The D. Venkatasubramaniam passages relied upon by the High Court disapproved directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge-sheet against persons who had neither been impleaded nor heard. Referring to Divine Retreat Centre, the reproduced reasoning required a reasonable opportunity of hearing before a judicial order with drastic consequences for an affected person's reputation. The absence of a hearing independently rendered the impugned order in that precedent unsustainable. The principle concerns such adverse judicial directions; in the present petition the High Court refused to compel arrest and a charge-sheet, without deciding a separate factual dispute about service of notice.	741
Evidence recorded in the accused's absence: no adverse testimony or prejudice	The Court did not decide the legality of recording the evidence of three witnesses in the accused's absence, despite counsel's expressed willingness to cross-examine them. Those witnesses had turned hostile, said nothing against the accused and caused him no prejudice. The decision rested on that absence of prejudice rather than a general conclusion that counsel's consent validates examination without the accused.	774
Adverse judicial investigation directions — opportunity of hearing	Judicial directions requiring arrest, seizure of property and filing of a charge-sheet, with serious consequences for the persons accused, cannot be issued casually without giving those affected a reasonable opportunity of hearing. In the relied-upon decision, failure to implead or hear the affected persons was itself sufficient to invalidate such intrusive judicial directions.	802
Procedural irregularity, prejudice and a proportionate trial remedy	The reproduced authority distinguishes irregularities that vitiate proceedings under Section 461 CrPC from other procedural infringements, whose effect ordinarily depends on substantial prejudice to the accused. Where a defect does not itself vitiate the trial, an available remedy should preserve fair procedure and the interests of both the accused and the prosecution. Re-examination with the accused present and able to instruct counsel may protect those interests. This remedial approach does not dispense with the Section 273 right or make every breach automatically harmless.	835
Hearing before coercive judicial investigation directions against affected persons	The adopted D. Venkatasubramaniam passage, drawing on Divine Retreat Centre, condemns a judicial order directing arrest, seizure and filing of a charge sheet without hearing the persons against whom those directions operate. In that setting, the absence of a reasonable opportunity of hearing, coupled with the drastic consequences for the affected persons and their reputation, was itself a ground for setting the order aside.	854
Fair trial and the judge's duty to ascertain the truth	A fair criminal trial protects the interests of the accused, the victim and society. The presiding judge must assess the material objectively and take an active, impartial role in eliciting relevant evidence needed to reach the truth. The Court's public duty includes protecting the innocent and ensuring that a guilty person does not escape because a perfunctory or deliberately defective investigation subverts the trial.	920
Judicial directions affecting persons not heard — restraint against coercive investigation orders	In refusing to prescribe coercive steps in investigation, the Court relied on D. Venkatasubramaniam, which criticised unreasoned directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge-sheet against persons not heard. That decision referred to Divine Retreat Centre on the need to hear persons likely to suffer drastic consequences from a judicial investigation order. The present writ did not independently decide a notice defect.	941 evidence despite earlier observations in bail-cancellation proceedings	anticipatory bail do not dispense with proof at the criminal trial. While refusing to recall those observations, the Court directed that the trial be decided strictly on the evidence brought on record, thereby preserving an independent determination of the criminal charge.

	Sub-Chapter no. 2.3 Articles 14, 20, 21 and 22 in Criminal Process
Constitutional protection against torture during detention	Torture violates the right to life and human dignity under Article 21 and the requirement of non-arbitrariness under Article 14. Convicts, prisoners and undertrials retain these protections, subject only to restrictions authorised by a fair and just legal procedure. Police and prison authorities must protect the life and dignity of persons in custody, and courts may issue appropriate directions in individual custodial-torture cases.	22
Section 138 NI Act conviction and subsequent cheating prosecution	An earlier conviction under Section 138 NI Act does not bar a subsequent prosecution under Section 420 IPC merely because both arise from the same transaction. Applying Sangeetaben Mahendrabhai Patel, the Court held that the relevant comparison for double jeopardy is between the ingredients of the offences, rather than the allegations alone. Fraudulent or dishonest intention is relevant to cheating but need not be proved for cheque dishonour; in the cheque prosecution, antecedent liability is presumed subject to rebuttal by the drawer, proceedings begin by complaint, and any fine is adjusted against the legally enforceable liability. These requirements do not apply to the IPC offences discussed. The distinct ingredients therefore defeated the objection based on Article 20(2), Section 300 CrPC, Section 26 of the General Clauses Act and Section 71 IPC.	153
State duty to provide prescribed medical care to a prisoner	The State must ensure appropriate medical treatment for a person in custody. The jail superintendent was required to provide treatment advised by the doctors, and the Commissioner of Police was directed to provide adequate escorts whenever hospital treatment or a medical check-up was required.	222
Prison transfer inconsistent with Supreme Court medical directions	Where the Supreme Court had specifically directed confinement in Central Jail, Bhopal and follow-up treatment at AIIMS, Bhopal, the High Court refused transfer to another jail. To implement that order, it directed that the accused should not be transferred elsewhere, even temporarily, until conclusion of the trial.	222
Fair investigation as part of constitutional fair trial	Fair trial under Articles 20 and 21 includes an impartial, truthful and transparent investigation directed to discovering the truth. Deliberate creation of evidence and false implication violate that protection; the investigative aim cannot be conviction by any means.	410
Voluntary polygraph testing and a victim's refusal to undergo testing	Voluntarily undergoing a polygraph test does not establish that the person is truthful. A victim cannot be compelled to undergo such testing merely to expedite investigation, because forced testing intrudes unjustifiably into mental privacy. The complainant's refusal, contrasted with the applicants' participation, did not establish that the prosecution witnesses were unreliable or warrant interference with the Section 319 order.	611
Article 20(2) — mining penalty is not prior prosecution and punishment	The protection against double jeopardy under Article 20(2) requires an earlier prosecution and punishment for the same offence, which the applicant must plead and establish. Payment of the Collector's penalty under the Madhya Pradesh Sand Rules, 2019 discharged civil liability and did not constitute that prior criminal prosecution and punishment. It therefore did not bar the IPC prosecution.	688
Article 21: protection of reputation when	Reputation forms part of the protection of Article 21 and belongs equally to privileged and disadvantaged persons. When a judicial decision is likely to damage a person's reputation, the court must observe the governing legal	864 making adverse judicial observations	safeguards and afford an opportunity to be heard before making adverse observations.

Article 21 and pandemic prison decongestion: category selection and safe release	The Supreme Court's pandemic directions, applied in this bail order, treated control of COVID-19 in overcrowded prisons as an Article 21 concern. High Powered Committees were to determine suitable categories and periods of parole or interim bail by considering offence severity, sentence or charge and other relevant factors; the reference to offences punishable up to seven years was illustrative. Released prisoners were to receive transport home or the option of temporary shelter during lockdown. This release required medical examination, testing if advised, hospital treatment if positive, and arrangements to send the appellant home if medically cleared.	865
Prisoners' Article 21 protection and access to medical care	Imprisonment does not extinguish constitutional rights except to the extent lawfully curtailed. Prisoners retain protection of life and health, and State authorities must address deficiencies in prison medical assistance. All prison deaths, natural and unnatural, require documentation. The unexplained injuries and absence of jail first aid here could not be disregarded merely because the State described the death as natural.	867
Article 21 and pandemic prison decongestion in an individual bail decision	The adopted order in In Re: Contagion of COVID 19 Virus in Prisons required High Powered Committees to identify prisoners suitable for parole or interim bail, considering the nature and severity of the offence, sentence and other relevant factors. Offences punishable up to seven years were an example for consideration, while category selection remained with the committee. Considering the allegations and the need to decongest prisons during the second wave, the Court granted Section 439 bail without commenting on the merits, subject to express release conditions.	878
Hearing before consequential judicial directions in a criminal investigation	Before issuing judicial directions to arrest, seize property or file a charge-sheet that would seriously affect a person’s rights and reputation, the Court must provide that person a reasonable opportunity of being heard. The relied-upon precedent treated such directions, issued without notice to the affected persons, as a nullity. This requirement concerns consequential judicial orders controlling investigation.	922
Double jeopardy depends on identity of offence ingredients	For the double-jeopardy objection considered under Article 20(2), Section 300 CrPC, Section 26 of the General Clauses Act and Section 71 IPC, identity of the allegations or motive is not the test; the ingredients of the offences must be compared. The applicant’s earlier Section 138 NI Act conviction did not bar prosecution under Sections 406 and 420 IPC concerning the same cheque because the offences have different ingredients. The Court affirmed cognizance without determining whether the IPC charges would ultimately be proved.	924
Hearing before consequential judicial directions in a criminal investigation	Before issuing judicial directions to arrest, seize property or file a charge-sheet that would seriously affect a person’s rights and reputation, the Court must provide that person a reasonable opportunity of being heard. The relied-upon precedent treated such directions, issued without notice to the affected persons, as a nullity. This requirement concerns consequential judicial orders controlling investigation.	927
	Sub-Chapter no. 2.4 Legal Aid, Access to Justice and Effective Defence
Hearing a jail application despite defects in prescribed format	For the bail application sent from jail and argued by the appellant personally, the Court did not insist on compliance with the prescribed High Court Rules format. This relaxation allowed the application to be heard in the circumstances of that case.	222

Legal-aid counsel — allegation of incompetence for not citing a later judgment	Failure to cite a judgment pronounced after both impugned orders did not support an allegation that legal-aid counsel was incompetent. The Court refused to presume incompetence, rejected the allegation as baseless after comparing the dates, and left counsel at liberty to pursue defamation proceedings if he chose.	303
Counsel of Choice and Appointment of Existing Counsel as Amicus	An unanswered letter from counsel did not establish that the appellant wished to change representation where he had regularly appeared and been identified by the same counsel and had filed no application for replacement. Acknowledging the right to counsel of choice, the Court found no infringement on these facts when the existing advocate accepted appointment as amicus and argued the appeal on merits.	529
Opportunity to engage counsel of choice during a limited remand	Within the limited remand for fresh examination of the investigating officer, the accused was entitled to a short adjournment if he wished to engage a new lawyer of his choice. The Court balanced that opportunity with expedition by limiting the next examination date to ten days and retaining the overall timetable for evidence, further Section 313 examination and judgment.	913
Counsel of choice and experienced legal aid on capital-case remand	On remand the accused's request to engage different counsel of his choice or to receive legal aid had to be allowed. If legal-aid counsel was provided, the trial court was directed to appoint an advocate with at least fifteen years' standing and thorough knowledge of criminal law. That experience requirement was an express direction for effective representation in this case.	917

Privacy, Dignity, Liberty and Due Process in Criminal Process

Right to Privacy, Dignity and Movement

Courts' duty to protect liberty while preserving lawful investigation	Courts must protect the public interest in proper investigation and enforcement of criminal law while ensuring that criminal process is not used for selective harassment. Applying Arnab Manoranjan Goswami, the Court treated the legality of arrest and protection of personal liberty as matters requiring adjudication even though connected public-order proceedings were pending elsewhere.	41
Police media disclosure and public parading of suspects	Privacy, dignity and reputation are protected by Article 21, including for persons with criminal antecedents. Restrictions require lawful authority, reasonableness and a connection with their object; an executive police circular cannot supply the missing statutory authority. The Court quashed clauses 6-B, 8 and 11 of the DGP circular dated 2 January 2014 insofar as they permitted media production of victims or suspects and disclosure of suspects' personal details or photographs. It prohibited police disclosure of suspect and victim identities, publication of suspects' photographs with covered or uncovered faces, and public parading of suspects. Investigation updates to the media require the district Superintendent of Police's approval, with personal responsibility for deviations.	61
Custodial dignity and mental or psychological torture	A person does not lose Article 21 protection on arrest or imprisonment. Custodial restrictions must have legal authority, and police must protect the person's dignity and basic human rights. Torture includes mental or psychological suffering and humiliating treatment, as well as physical injury. Interrogation, including interrogation in the interests of State security, cannot justify torture or third-degree methods to obtain information or a confession.	61

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Confidential history sheets and discreet surveillance	History sheets and surveillance registers maintained for crime prevention must remain confidential and surveillance must be discreet. Even a person treated as a hardened criminal retains privacy, dignity and reputation. The Court held that this does not permit displaying history-sheeters' photographs even at police stations.	61
Privacy — bodily integrity, personal information and choice	The right to privacy includes protection against intrusion into the body, informational privacy and privacy of choice. It also includes control over dissemination of personal information and over the portrayal of one's life and image. The Court relied on these principles when requiring consideration of the allegations of pressure for intimate photographs and videos.	63
Dignity and protection from mental torture in custody	Arrest or prosecution does not extinguish Article 21 rights. Only restrictions authorised by law are permissible, and protection of human dignity extends to mental and psychological torment and humiliating treatment as well as physical torture.	410
Constitutional protection of consensual adult intimacy and sexual orientation	The Navtej Singh Johar passage relied upon by the Court recognises sexual orientation as intrinsic to dignity, autonomy and privacy. Consensual adult same-sex intimacy, choice of partner, equal citizenship and protection from discrimination receive constitutional protection; criminalisation of that conduct under Section 377 was unconstitutional, and Suresh Kumar Koushal was overruled.	437
Woman's dignity — No presumption of compelled sex work from a slum address	Residence in a slum does not justify a general presumption that a woman engages in sex work under compulsion. Poverty may explain an individual's circumstances, but a blanket characterisation of women living in slums cannot be made at the cost of their dignity. In considering bail, the Court rejected the inference sought solely from the applicant's Aadhaar address; it did not establish a general rule about the circumstances of every sex worker.	473
Externment and the reasonableness of restrictions on freedom of movement	Externment restricts the fundamental right to move freely under Article 19(1)(d) of the Constitution and must satisfy the test of reasonableness under Article 19(5). It is an extraordinary preventive measure to be used sparingly, with strict compliance with the governing statutory requirements and hearing safeguards. The competent authority's subjective satisfaction must rest on objective material.	512
Article 21 — overnight detention of a rape victim without lawful authority	Keeping the rape complainant at a desk within the police station did not remove the need for lawful authority to detain her. Distance from her parental home did not justify retaining her throughout the night and following day. Referring to the safeguard against a woman's night arrest in Section 46(4) CrPC, the Court held the victim's unauthorised overnight detention to violate Article 21. A direction to keep her in a secure place did not authorise police to confine her in a One Stop Centre on a purported oral judicial order.	546
A girl's right to live without threats to dignity and life	Every girl, as a citizen, has a right to live peacefully without threats to her dignity or life. The Court invoked that right when assessing the societal character of the alleged continued stalking, harassment and threats and refusing compromise-based quashing.	578
Adults' Freedom to Live Together Without Interference	Two adults willing to live their lives according to their wishes are entitled to do so without interference by others. The Court recognised this freedom in the petition for police protection and directed action on a complaint identifying specific offences and offenders, applying Lata Singh v. State of U.P.	653
An Adult's Freedom to Choose a Spouse Without Coercive Interference	An adult is free to decide whom to marry. Applying the narrated Lata Singh v. State of U.P. principles, the Court recognised that disapproval of an adult's choice does not justify threats, harassment or violence. It treated the adult complainant as free to decide her own life and choose the applicant as her spouse, while expressly refraining from determining the asserted marriage's	656

	Sub-Chapter no. 3.2 Right to Travel Abroad and Personal Liberty
Unjustified LOC restraint and the right to travel abroad	Travel abroad forms part of personal liberty under Article 21 and is an important human right, subject to lawful reasonable restrictions. The Court found that restraining a bailed accused who regularly attended trial and had permission to travel, solely through an unjustifiably continued LOC, infringed that right. His later journey did not erase the completed infringement. Because the proposed journey concerned his employment, the Court also found a violation of Article 19. The protection of life includes dignity and self-esteem.	83
Unjustified LOC restraint and the right to travel abroad	Travel abroad forms part of personal liberty under Article 21 and is an important human right, subject to lawful reasonable restrictions. The Court found that restraining a bailed accused who regularly attended trial and had permission to travel, solely through an unjustifiably continued LOC, infringed that right. His later journey did not erase the completed infringement. Because the proposed journey concerned his employment, the Court also found a violation of Article 19. The protection of life includes dignity and self-esteem. The police could seek cancellation of bail for any breach of its conditions; the Court rejected reliance on the investigation-stage LOC to override the judicially regulated departure.	85
	Sub-Chapter no. 3.3 Legality, Necessity and Proportionality in Liberty Restrictions
Legality, necessity and proportionality of restrictions on personal liberty	A restriction on life, personal liberty or privacy requires a basis in law, a legitimate State aim and proportionate means, with procedural safeguards against abuse. Procedure must be fair, just and reasonable, and the overlapping guarantees of Articles 14, 19 and 21 must be respected. Applying this framework to travel restraint, the Court held that the right to travel is qualified but that the unreviewed LOC lacked justification after bail, regular trial attendance and court permission to leave the country.	83
Legality, necessity and proportionality of restrictions on personal liberty	A restriction on life, personal liberty or privacy requires a basis in law, a legitimate State aim and proportionate means, with procedural safeguards against abuse. Procedure must be fair, just and reasonable, and the overlapping guarantees of Articles 14, 19 and 21 must be respected. Applying this framework to travel restraint, the Court held that the right to travel is qualified but that the unreviewed LOC lacked justification after bail, regular trial attendance and court permission to leave the country.	85
Externment Must Satisfy the Constitutional Test of Reasonableness	Externment is an extraordinary restriction on the freedom of movement guaranteed by Article 19(1)(d), with consequences for residence, family life and livelihood. It must be used sparingly and satisfy the reasonableness requirement of Article 19(5). The absence of material supporting the statutory grounds and present necessity rendered the externment order unreasonable in this case.	454
	Chapter no. 4 Public Law Compensation for Illegal Custody, Detention and Police Excess
	Sub-Chapter no. 4.1 Public-Law Compensation under Articles 21 and 226
Public-law compensation for established Article 21 violations	Compensation for unconstitutional deprivation of life or liberty is available in proceedings under Articles 32 and 226 as a public-law remedy in addition to private-law damages for tortious acts of public servants. For an established Article 21 violation, the claim proceeds on strict liability and cannot be defeated	22 by a defence of sovereign immunity.

Public-law compensation for established police violations of Article 21	A patent and incontrovertible violation of fundamental rights through police misconduct may attract monetary compensation against the State in writ jurisdiction. A high standard of proof applies to allegations of brutality, torture or custodial violence, and sovereign immunity is no defence to the public-law claim. Compensation depends on the circumstances and does not bar additional civil compensation in tort or compensation under Section 357 CrPC. Release from custody does not erase an earlier unlawful invasion of rights. The Court reserved the petitioner's compensation claim for further hearing on the alleged eviction and individual officers' conduct.	61
Compensation for violation of the speedy-trial right	A breach of the Article 21 right to speedy trial caused by unjustified police-witness nonappearance may be redressed by monetary compensation even where bail is refused. In this application, the Court directed the State to pay the undertrial Rs. 30,000 within one month for failing to produce its police witness and allowing the trial to remain stalled.	67
Public-law compensation after withdrawal of an unlawful LOC	Ending an unlawful restraint does not remove the court's power to compensate an established violation of fundamental rights. Applying the constitutional-compensation precedents, the Court directed the State to pay Rs. 5,00,000 for the airport restraint by depositing the amount in the High Court Registry within one month for withdrawal by the petitioner. The remedy was available despite prior deletion of the LOC, and the petitioner remained free to seek further damages through a civil suit.	83
Strict public-law liability and absence of sovereign immunity for an established Article 21 violation	Compensation under Articles 32 and 226 for an established infringement of life or personal liberty is a public-law remedy based on strict liability. Sovereign immunity is no defence to that constitutional claim. The remedy is distinct from, and additional to, damages in private law; an available civil suit does not by itself exclude appropriate constitutional redress.	83
Assessment of constitutional compensation and adjustment against civil damages	Constitutional compensation primarily redresses the injury; punishment for an offence remains for the criminal court. Its amount depends on the particular facts, without a fixed formula. Public-law compensation does not bar a lawful civil claim for damages, but the amount already paid may be adjusted against damages awarded for the same wrong.	83
Public-law compensation after withdrawal of an unlawful LOC	Ending an unlawful restraint does not remove the court's power to compensate an established violation of fundamental rights. Applying the constitutional-compensation precedents, the Court directed the State to pay Rs. 5,00,000 for the airport restraint by depositing the amount in the High Court Registry within one month for withdrawal by the petitioner. The remedy was available despite prior deletion of the LOC, and the petitioner remained free to seek further damages through a civil suit.	85
Strict public-law liability and absence of sovereign immunity for an established Article 21 violation	Compensation under Articles 32 and 226 for an established infringement of life or personal liberty is a public-law remedy based on strict liability. Sovereign immunity is no defence to that constitutional claim. The remedy is distinct from, and additional to, damages in private law; an available civil suit does not by itself exclude appropriate constitutional redress.	85

Its amount depends on the particular facts, without a fixed formula. Public-law compensation does not bar a lawful civil claim for damages, but the amount already paid may be adjusted against damages awarded for the same wrong.	85
Public-law compensation for denial of speedy trial	A breach of the fundamental right to speedy trial may be redressed by monetary compensation even when bail is refused. The State cannot claim sovereign immunity for a fundamental-right violation. For the delay attributable to the	251

despite refusal of bail	two defaulting police witnesses, the Court directed payment of Rs 20,000 within thirty days and recovery from their salaries.
Writ Appeal Against a Compensation Direction in a Bail Order	Where the State challenged only the compensation direction and left the bail order and factual findings unchallenged, the compensation direction was treated as an exercise of Article 226 jurisdiction because Section 439 CrPC did not authorise it. A writ appeal against that direction was therefore maintainable.	371
Public-law compensation for deliberate false implication and imprisonment	Acquittal alone does not warrant compensation under Article 21. Compensation was justified because the Court found deliberate false implication for oblique motives followed by substantial imprisonment. It awarded ₹1 lakh to Jagdish and ₹3 lakh each to Harnam Singh and Harkanth, taking account of their respective detention and the resulting suffering.	410
Constitutional compensation—strict liability and sovereign immunity	For an established unconstitutional deprivation of life or personal liberty by public servants, public-law compensation rests on strict liability. Sovereign immunity is no defence to that constitutional remedy, and the State may seek indemnification from the wrongdoer.	410
Public-law compensation and other remedies	Constitutional compensation supplements private-law damages and does not bar compensation under Section 357 CrPC. A civil damages claim may still be pursued, with an appropriate adjustment for public-law compensation already paid in respect of the same wrong.	410
Perjury prosecution does not preclude constitutional compensation	Prosecution for false evidence and compensation for the victim's suffering serve different purposes. Directing perjury proceedings therefore does not prevent a constitutional court from also awarding compensation for an established violation of fundamental rights.	410
Article 21 compensation for incarceration caused by false implication	Public-law compensation depends on the facts and a serious violation of Article 21; acquittal or a minor breach of public duty does not alone establish entitlement. Applying the narrated authorities on malicious prosecution, liberty and dignity, the Court found that false implication had caused almost six years of unjustified incarceration. It awarded ₹2,00,000 against the State, payable within one month, and required proof of payment before the Principal Registrar within 45 days. The award rested on the established infringement of personal liberty, rather than an automatic consequence of acquittal.	599
Further civil compensation alongside the public-law award	The narrated public-law principles treat constitutional compensation as distinct from and additional to private-law damages. In this case, the Court expressly preserved the appellant's liberty to bring a civil suit against the investigating officer and the two named witnesses for further compensation, and directed that its ₹2,00,000 award would not be adjusted in such a suit. That direction preserved a further remedy without deciding the merits of a later civil claim.	599
Article 21 compensation for established malicious prosecution and prolonged incarceration	Public-law monetary relief is available for a patent and incontrovertible violation of fundamental rights through police misconduct; the required standard of proof is high. Here the Court found deliberate malicious implication, police participation in an imaginary-encounter account, and imprisonment of about twelve and fifteen years. Those established liberty violations required compensation by the State. Each surviving appellant was awarded Rs 3 lakh, payable within three months. The entitlement rested on the established misconduct and prolonged loss of liberty, rather than acquittal alone.	836
Sovereign immunity in public-law claims for fundamental-rights violations	Violation of fundamental rights through police misconduct may attract public-law liability in addition to criminal and tort remedies. Pecuniary compensation for such an established violation is borne by the State, and sovereign immunity is not a defence to that public-law claim. The remedy remains confined to patent and incontrovertible rights violations established to the required high standard.	836
Compensatory	Public-law compensation for an established fundamental-rights violation is	836

assessment of public-law monetary relief	directed to redressing the injury rather than punishing the wrongdoer. Its amount depends on the circumstances, without a fixed formula. The duration and actual impact of loss of liberty are material: a person who remained on bail stands differently from one wrongfully incarcerated for many years. Applying that approach, the Court treated the surviving appellants' imprisonment of about twelve and fifteen years as warranting substantial monetary redress.
Civil damages in addition to constitutional compensation and adjustment	Constitutional compensation for loss of liberty does not displace a civil claim for the actual loss caused by malicious prosecution. The appellants could pursue that loss through a civil suit requiring proof of their damages. The Rs 3 lakh public-law award to each appellant was liable to adjustment against any later civil damages award, preserving both remedies while avoiding double recovery for the same loss.	836
Custodial death: public-law compensation independent of civil and criminal remedies	Compensation under Articles 32 and 226 for an established violation of Article 21 is a public-law remedy based on strict State responsibility for breach of the duty to protect fundamental rights. It is distinct from tort damages and criminal prosecution, and their availability does not alone defeat constitutional relief. On the unexplained custodial injuries and failure to provide jail first aid, the Court awarded the widow Rs. 3 lakh while ordering a fresh inquiry and preserving her right to claim compensation by civil suit. The award did not decide individual criminal responsibility or prejudge the fresh inquiry.	867
Article 21 compensation: patent violation and evidentiary safeguards	Before granting public-law compensation for custodial death or torture, the court considers whether the Article 21 violation is patent and incontrovertible, gross enough to shock its conscience, and supported by death, medical evidence or visible injury or disability. An unsupported, false or exaggerated allegation may require recourse to ordinary civil or criminal remedies. The absence of medical or independent evidence does not make custodial violence lawful or unactionable; the additional constitutional remedy depends on satisfaction of its own conditions.	867
Article 21 compensation for malicious false implication and prolonged imprisonment	Public-law compensation may redress an established violation of Article 21 through malicious prosecution and wrongful imprisonment. It does not follow from every acquittal or minor failure of public duty. Drawing on the compensation principles reproduced from Islamic Relief Committee of Gujarat and S. Nambi Narayanan, and the relief granted by the Supreme Court in Ankush Maruti Shinde, the Court held the State responsible for the investigating officer’s collusive false implication of the appellants, who had each spent more than eleven years in actual custody. It directed payment of ₹3 lakh to each appellant within one month and filing of payment receipts before the Principal Registrar within forty-five days.	950
Public-law compensation and a further civil claim for wrongful imprisonment	Compensation in public law for an established infringement of Article 21 is distinct from the private-law remedy in tort. The principles reproduced from S. Nambi Narayanan recognise that a civil claim does not bar constitutional compensation and that a public-law award does not prevent a further civil claim or compensation under Section 357 CrPC. In this case, the Court expressly left the appellants free to sue the responsible witnesses and investigating officer for further compensation and directed that its constitutional award would not be adjusted against compensation in that civil suit.	950
	Sub-Chapter no. 4.2 Recovery from Erring Officers and State Responsibility
Recovery of speedy-trial compensation from the responsible police officer	The State remained immediately liable to pay the Rs. 30,000 compensation, but was expressly permitted to recover it from the salary of the investigating officer whose unjustified nonappearance stalled the trial. The Court also required monthly progress reports on the departmental inquiry against the erring officers.	67

4.3 : Contempt and Enforcement of Constitutional Compensation

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
State compensation and recovery from responsible police officers	The State was directed to pay the constitutional compensation and recover the Rs. 5,00,000 from the salaries of the former investigating officer and the erring Superintendent of Police, Jabalpur. The cited compensation authorities recognise State redress and recourse against responsible officers. Ravikant S. Patil separately cautioned against directly fixing personal liability or an adverse service entry without the appropriate basis and hearing; the operative salary-recovery direction in this case was accompanied by further scrutiny of the officers' conduct.	83
State compensation and recovery from responsible police officers	The State was directed to pay the constitutional compensation and recover the Rs. 5,00,000 from the salaries of the former investigating officer and the erring Superintendent of Police, Jabalpur. The cited compensation authorities recognise State redress and recourse against responsible officers. Ravikant S. Patil separately cautioned against directly fixing personal liability or an adverse service entry without the appropriate basis and hearing; the operative salary-recovery direction in this case was accompanied by further scrutiny of the officers' conduct.	85
Recovery of constitutional compensation from responsible persons	After directing the State to compensate the falsely implicated appellants, the Court ordered recovery in equal shares from the two investigating officers and the three witnesses found responsible. This was a direction based on the fabricated prosecution established in this case.	410
Recovery of State compensation from responsible wrongdoers	The State was directed to pay the compensation and was permitted to recover the amount from the investigating officer’s salary or pension, and from the two named witnesses as arrears of land revenue. This permission followed the Court’s findings of false implication and did not make the appellant’s receipt of the State award depend on prior recovery from those persons.	599
State responsibility and recovery of constitutional compensation from erring persons	The State bears liability to pay compensation for the established violation of fundamental rights by its functionaries. Payment to the affected person need not await recovery from the individual wrongdoers. In directing the State to compensate the surviving appellants, the Court permitted it to recover the amount from the erring persons.	836
State compensation for custodial wrongs and recovery from defaulting officers	The State's obligation to pay constitutional compensation does not prevent it from seeking indemnification or taking lawful proceedings against the responsible officers. In directing payment to the widow, the Court expressly reserved the State's liberty to recover the compensation from the defaulting officers; individual responsibility remained subject to the fresh inquiry.	867
State responsibility and recovery of compensation for collusive false implication	Having found that the investigating officer had acted in connivance with the prosecution witnesses, the Court held the State responsible for his conduct and directed it to compensate each appellant. It permitted the State to recover the compensation from the officer’s salary or pension and from the two identified prosecution witnesses as arrears of land revenue. The permission to recover was linked to the express finding of collusive false implication; the State’s obligation to pay was not made conditional on first recovering the money from those responsible.	950

Contempt and Enforcement of Constitutional Compensation

Recovery and contempt directions on default in paying constitutional compensation	The State had one month to deposit the compensation in the High Court Registry. If it failed to do so, the Registrar General was directed to initiate recovery proceedings and register a contempt petition under Article 215 and Sections 10 and 12 of the Contempt of Courts Act. This was a conditional enforcement direction, rather than a finding of an existing default or completed contempt.	83

If it failed to do so, the Registrar General was directed to initiate recovery proceedings and register a contempt petition under Article 215 and Sections 10 and 12 of the Contempt of Courts Act. This was a conditional enforcement direction, rather than a finding of an existing default or completed contempt.
	Sub-Chapter no. 4.4 Compensation for Illegal Arrest, Custodial Violence and Detention
Reservation of a fresh compensation claim for custodial violence	After finding custodial violence and recognising the petitioner's entitlement to compensation, the Court left its determination to fresh proceedings in the absence of notice to the respondents on that relief. It expressly protected a separate compensation petition and held that the present proceeding would not bar that remedy.	22
Separate Civil Claim After a Bail-Stage Compensation Award Is Set Aside	Setting aside compensation because it exceeded Section 439 CrPC does not determine that the detainee has no entitlement to compensation. A separate civil suit against the erring officers for violation of Articles 20 and 21 remains open, and the civil court must decide it independently of the order confined to bail jurisdiction. Assessment of compensation requires consideration of the parties' status, criminal antecedents, fundamental rights and other relevant factors.	371
Assessment of compensation for violation of personal liberty	The amount of constitutional compensation depends on the circumstances, without a fixed formula. Its emphasis is compensatory: detention, humiliation, injury to reputation and the physical, mental, social and family consequences of false implication are relevant to redressing the established violation.	410
Mental agony and injury to dignity in compensation for wrongful custody	The absence of a complaint of physical custodial torture does not exhaust the enquiry into an Article 21 violation. In the principles reproduced from S. Nambi Narayanan, the Court recognised mental torment in custody and injury to reputation and dignity as relevant consequences of malicious prosecution and wrongful imprisonment. Those principles supported compensation for the appellants' prolonged custody following their collusive false implication.	950

	Chapter no. 5 Sanction, Prior Approval, Limitation and Statutory Bars
	Sub-Chapter no. 5.1 Limitation, Delay and Statutory Bar to Criminal Proceedings
Section 468 CrPC — limitation for Section 498A IPC prosecution	Section 498A IPC, which carries a maximum sentence of three years' imprisonment, attracts the three-year limitation period for taking cognizance under Section 468 CrPC. In rejecting the limitation objection, the Court noted that the wife was allegedly expelled on 30 July 2020 and lodged the FIR on 18 October 2021, within that period. This was an additional ground to the Court's finding of continuing cruelty.	2
Limitation for Section 498-A IPC and continuing mental cruelty	The limitation period for taking cognizance of an offence under Section 498-A IPC is three years under Section 468(2)(c) CrPC, ordinarily counted from the last act of cruelty. Where expulsion attributable to dowry demands or earlier cruelty compelled the wife to remain in her parental home, the resulting mental trauma could continue there without a fresh physical act at that place. On those allegations, the Court treated the offence as continuing, with a fresh cause each day, and rejected the asserted limitation bar. The lapse of more than three years since the last alleged physical acts abroad did not justify quashing.	29
Quashing where a legal bar prohibits	The inherent power may be exercised where a manifest legal bar prevents institution or continuation of the criminal proceeding, including absence of	64

criminal proceedings	required sanction. The reproduced quashing categories also recognise an express statutory bar or a specific statutory provision providing efficacious redress for the grievance.
Continuing mental cruelty and the objection that a Section 498-A complaint is time-barred	Where dowry-related cruelty compels a wife to remain at her parental home, the mental trauma may continue despite the cessation of physical assaults. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court held that such continuing cruelty gives a fresh cause of action each day. On allegations that the wife remained excluded from her matrimonial home unless further dowry was brought, the Court rejected the objection that the later FIR was time-barred merely because the last physical assault and expulsion occurred in 2017.	87
Three-year limitation and delay in complaining of matrimonial cruelty	In rejecting the delay objection, the Court applied the three-year period under Section 468 CrPC and noted that even three years from the marriage had not elapsed when the FIR was lodged. The wife's decision to wait in the hope that her marital life would improve did not make the allegations belated.	101
Absence of incident dates in a timely dowry-cruelty complaint	At the quashing stage, specific allegations of demanding a car and ₹5 lakh and beating the wife for non-fulfilment of that demand were not vague merely because the dates of individual incidents were omitted. The complaint had been made before three years had elapsed from the marriage and was within the limitation period considered under Section 468 CrPC.	190
Delay in a matrimonial-cruelty FIR within limitation	Where the prosecution is not barred by limitation, delay in lodging a matrimonial-cruelty FIR does not by itself justify quashing. In considering such delay, the Court recognised that a wife may defer legal action in the hope that her married life will improve.	192
Limitation objection to the Section 498-A proceedings	The Court rejected the limitation objection where the alleged expulsion occurred on 17 July 2019 and the FIR was lodged on 23 November 2021, within the three-year period referred to under Section 468 CrPC. It also relied on the continuing mental cruelty caused by enforced residence at the parental home.	235
Section 468 CrPC — limitation does not bar a Section 376 prosecution	The limitation bar under Section 468 CrPC does not apply to an offence under Section 376 IPC because it is punishable with imprisonment exceeding three years. The reporting delay therefore did not render the FIR time-barred on that ground.	340
Filing or Initiation of Prosecution as the Relevant Date for Limitation	For Section 468 CrPC, the relevant date is the filing of the complaint or initiation of prosecution, rather than the later date on which the Magistrate takes cognizance. Where the FIR and closure report were filed within limitation, the Magistrate’s rejection of the closure report and taking cognizance after prolonged pendency did not make the prosecution time-barred.	376
Condonation When a Complaint Is Filed Beyond Limitation	Where a complaint is filed after the limitation period, the complainant may seek condonation under Section 473 CrPC, and the court decides that application after notice and hearing to the accused and complainant. The relied-upon passage did not decide whether notice requirements differ between the explanation-of-delay and interest-of-justice limbs of Section 473.	376
Section 468 CrPC— three-year limitation in the cruelty prosecution	Applying the three-year limitation period for taking cognizance under Section 468 CrPC, the Court rejected the time-bar objection in this cruelty prosecution because the FIR was lodged within three years of the alleged permanent desertion.	411
Double jeopardy and pending food-safety proceedings	Mere pendency of food-safety penalty proceedings does not bar an FIR for the separately alleged IPC offences. Article 20(2) prohibits repeated prosecution and punishment for the same offence, while Section 300 CrPC protects against retrial following a competent court’s subsisting conviction or acquittal within its terms. Where no earlier trial or judgment and no prior penalty or punishment are shown, the pleaded double-jeopardy objection and the Section 26 General Clauses Act objection do not justify quashing.	434

5 : Sanction, Prior Approval, Limitation and Statutory Bars

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 468 CrPC limitation and offences punishable above three years	The limitation periods prescribed by Section 468 CrPC do not apply to the alleged offences punishable with imprisonment exceeding three years. The complaint alleged Section 420 IPC, carrying up to seven years; Section 467, carrying up to life imprisonment; and Section 468 IPC, carrying up to seven years. The Court therefore rejected the statutory limitation objection to the complaint concerning the earlier flat transactions. This determination concerned the applicable punishment ranges, separately from the effect of factual delay.	449
Section 468 Objection Rejected on the FIR's Timing in This Cruelty Case	In rejecting the threshold limitation objection, the Court referred to the three-year period under Section 468 CrPC for an offence punishable with a maximum of three years. The marriage was in March 2019 and the FIR was registered in March 2021. On those dates it found the allegations before it within the stated period and refused quashing on limitation.	458
Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC — Forgery before production in court	The requirement of a written court complaint under Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC applies to the specified document offences committed while the document is in court custody. A private complaint remains maintainable where the document was allegedly forged before its production in court. Later filing does not attract the bar merely because the document is then before a court. The applicants did not allege forgery in court custody, so the bar did not apply.	470
Delayed private complaint where cognizance is not barred by limitation	Where cognizance is not barred by limitation, belated filing does not by itself justify dismissal of the complaint under Section 203 CrPC. The explanation for delay may be assessed on evidence at trial. If the trial court finds a plausible explanation, the delay loses significance. The present restoration of process did not finally establish the complainant's explanation or remove delay from later evidentiary assessment.	559
Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC and a document allegedly forged before production in court	The court-complaint restriction under Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC applies to the enumerated document offences committed after the document has been produced or given in evidence in court, while it is in court custody. It did not bar a private complaint under Section 200 CrPC, or an FIR, on the allegation that an affidavit had already been forged before it was filed in the civil suit. The Court restored consideration of the complaint without deciding whether the forgery was proved.	586
Section 300(1) CrPC — prior competent-court conviction or acquittal	Section 300(1) CrPC bars a fresh trial while an earlier conviction or acquittal by a competent court remains in force, for the same offence or, on the same facts, an alternative offence chargeable or convictable under Section 221(1) or (2). Its bar is subject to the statutory qualifications. An administrative penalty, without the required earlier criminal trial, does not establish that protection.	688
Criminal limitation — offences punishable beyond three years and continuing wrongdoing	The Court rejected limitation as a ground for quashing the FIR concerning old revenue-record manipulation. Some alleged offences carried imprisonment exceeding three years, for which no period of limitation was provided. It also found that collusion with revenue authorities had initially prevented discovery and characterised the offence in question as continuing. Referring to Sections 472 and 473 CrPC, the Court stated that cognizance could be taken even after the limitation period. These were grounds for refusing quashing of the alleged collusive government-land transactions and continuing possession and commercial use; the age of the original revenue entries did not establish a bar to the prosecution.	742
Condonation of delay in appealing conviction on grounds of illness	An unsupported assertion of prolonged illness did not establish sufficient cause under Section 5 of the Limitation Act for a delay of ten years and nine days in appealing a conviction. No medical or treatment documents were produced before either the appellate court or the High Court. The applicant had not surrendered after conviction and appealed only after arrest on a perpetual warrant. Even on a lenient assessment, the delay remained unexplained.	780

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 468 CrPC — Offences punishable beyond three years	The Section 468 CrPC limitation objection failed where the offences under Sections 409, 420, 467 and 468 IPC were punishable with imprisonment exceeding three years. On the conceded punishments, Section 468 prescribed no limitation for those offences.	825
Section 189 IPC and the Section 195 CrPC bar	Section 195 CrPC does not bar proceedings for the offence under Section 189 IPC. The Court relied on the inclusion of Section 189, the explanation to Section 2(d), and the rule governing investigation of combined cognizable and non-cognizable offences to reject the request to quash an FIR under Sections 186, 189 and 34 IPC.	841
Section 468 CrPC does not time-bar prosecution for rape offences punishable above three years	Since the alleged offences under Sections 376 and 376(2)(n) IPC carry imprisonment exceeding three years, Section 468 CrPC prescribes no period of limitation barring their prosecution. The Court therefore rejected limitation as a ground for quashing the FIR.	855
Continuing dowry-related cruelty defeats the pleaded delay and limitation objections	Where the complaint alleged that the wife had been expelled for non-fulfilment of dowry demands and continued to live at her parental home as a result, the Court treated the cruelty as continuous. It therefore rejected the contention that the FIR was delayed or that the allegations were barred by time.	856
Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC: forgery before production in court	The court-complaint requirement under Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC applies to the specified document offences committed after the document has been produced or given in evidence, while it is in court custody. It does not apply merely because a document forged beforehand is later filed in court. Applying Iqbal Singh Marwah, the Court held that it could direct the Principal Registrar to lodge an FIR concerning the allegedly pre-existing forged age certificate used in bail applications.	874
Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC: forgery outside court before production	The Section 195(1)(b)(ii) restriction applies to the specified document offences committed after a document has been produced or given in evidence while it is in court custody. It does not cover a document forged outside court before its later production. Applying Iqbal Singh Marwah to the fabricated official demarcation papers, the Court directed the trial court to lodge an FIR against the two officers. This direction concerned their prior fabrication, separately from the court complaint ordered for the witness's false evidence.	879
Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC and forgery committed before production in court	The court-complaint requirement under Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC applies to the enumerated offences committed in respect of a document after it has been produced or given in evidence in court, while it is in judicial custody. Applying Iqbal Singh Marwah, the Court held that the bar did not apply to the alleged forged document in this case because it had not been manipulated while in custodia legis. Its subsequent production in court did not prevent the complainant from proceeding independently under Section 200 CrPC.	958

Sanction for Prosecution and Public Servant Protection

Reasonable connection with official duty for sanction under Section 197 CrPC	Section 197 CrPC protects an act directly and reasonably connected with official duty, including an excess in performing that duty where the connection remains real. Public office or a pretended claim of duty alone is insufficient. On the contemporaneous material, the Court found prima facie that the firing on a public road occurred without necessity or provocation and was not an act in discharge of official duty or an excess connected with it. Sanction was therefore unnecessary at that stage. The trial court was directed to assess guilt independently on the evidence.	97
Stage at which the need for prosecution sanction may be determined	The need for sanction should ordinarily be considered at cognizance, but may arise at the inception, charge stage, during evidence or at another appropriate stage, and may be raised for the first time in appeal. A prima facie decision can	97

	be reconsidered as further material emerges. Where necessary, the accused must have an opportunity to adduce evidence of the connection between the act and official duty; good or bad faith may require determination after trial.
Dereliction-of-duty test for an act claimed to be official	One test of the connection required by Section 197 CrPC is whether omission or refusal to perform the act complained of could have exposed the public servant to a charge of dereliction of official duty. An affirmative answer may indicate the required connection. The inquiry concerns the quality and scope of the particular act, since an official act may be performed properly or in dereliction of duty.	97
Competent authority's role in deciding prosecution sanction	Where prosecution sanction is necessary, the competent authority must decide it on a sound and objective assessment. The court cannot act as the sanctioning authority.	97
MGNREGA Section 30 Protection Requires Due Care and Attention	Protection for acts done or intended in good faith under Section 30 of MGNREGA requires due care and attention, applying Section 52 IPC. The allegations of payment for an unconstructed road, allowing the Sarpanch's son to control Panchayat work while she signed documents, and burning records when sought did not attract that protection. The Court therefore refused the claimed immunity at the FIR stage.	459
Section 197 CrPC — sanction question may be reconsidered after evidence	Where the allegations and available material do not establish the necessary connection with official duty, absence of sanction under Section 197 CrPC need not prevent the complaint from proceeding at the initial stage. Applying Dr. S.M. Mansoori, the Court refused to quash the proceedings but directed the trial court to decide the sanction question at final hearing on the evidence and documents produced. The trial court must decide independently, without being influenced by the High Court's preliminary observations.	483
Section 197 CrPC — protected status and connection with official duty	Section 197 CrPC requires both that the accused be a public servant not removable except by or with governmental sanction and that there be a reasonable connection between the alleged act and actual or purported official duty. Mere excess does not remove protection where that connection exists; official position cannot serve as a cloak for an unconnected act. On the charge-sheet allegations, excavation of forest land by JCB contrary to express permission conditions lacked that connection. The Court also found prima facie that employment with SECL did not establish Central Government employment attracting Section 197(1)(a). Both questions were expressly left open for the trial court after evidence.	484
Section 197 protection and reasonable connection with official duty	Section 197(1) CrPC requires previous government sanction where an eligible public servant, removable only by or with government sanction, is accused of an act done or purportedly done in discharge of official duty. The act must have a reasonable connection with that duty. Excess in performing a duty does not by itself remove protection, but official position cannot cloak an unrelated private crime. Applying the narrated authorities to both FIRs and the arrest record, the Court found the ranger's conduct connected with protecting forest land and retaining an arrestee. Cognizance without considering the sanction requirement was therefore defective.	598
Section 197 protection after retirement	The words "is or was" in Section 197(1) CrPC preserve protection for an eligible former public servant where the alleged offence was committed while acting or purporting to act in official duty. Retirement alone does not remove the requirement of prior sanction. The Court accordingly rejected the argument that the ranger's departure from service defeated his protection; the statutory status and official-duty conditions still govern.	598
Stage and supporting material for a Section 197	The need for sanction may arise at any stage of the proceeding and may have to be determined as the relevant facts emerge. Where Section 197 applies, the	598

objection	absence of sanction affects the court's jurisdiction to take cognizance. An accused raising that objection after process issues may produce relevant, admissible documents and material to assist the court in deciding applicability and correcting the jurisdictional error.
Section 197 CrPC: alleged excess reasonably connected with official duty	Sanction is required where the alleged act is directly and reasonably connected with the public servant's official duty, even if the act exceeds lawful authority. The connection must be genuine; official status cannot serve as a pretended or fanciful cloak for an independent crime. On the complaint's own account of unauthorised sand extraction from a forest river and interception by forest officials, the Court found the alleged abuse and assault connected with their forest-protection duties. Cognizance under Sections 294 and 323 IPC therefore required previous sanction under Section 197 CrPC.	877
Section 197 CrPC: bribery and conspiracy lack the required duty connection	Section 197 requires a reasonable connection between the alleged act and actual or purported official duty. Excess in carrying out a duty may retain protection, but official status cannot cloak unlawful gain. Although demarcation formed part of the officers' functions, demanding illegal gratification and conspiring for its receipt were misuse of that position, rather than performance or excessive performance of official duty. The Court therefore held that no separate Section 197 sanction was required.	879
	Sub-Chapter no. 5.3 Maintainability of Criminal Proceedings and Preliminary Objections
Advocates — no professional exemption from IPC prosecution	An act that constitutes an offence under the IPC remains an offence when committed by an advocate. Professional status does not exempt an advocate from prosecution; the Court regarded unlawful conduct by a person knowing the law as a serious matter.	64
When special legislation excludes the general criminal procedure	The existence of a special enactment does not by itself displace the CrPC. Under Section 4, exclusion depends on a special procedure or an express or necessarily implied statutory bar. A positive duty imposed on specified authorities to report wrongdoing does not, without such a bar, make their reporting power exclusive. Finding no exclusion under the relevant society legislation, the Court upheld the Magistrate's power to take cognizance of the complaint.	86
Stamp-duty penalty and criminal prosecution	The Stamp Act did not prohibit application of the IPC to the alleged deliberate evasion. The special mechanism for recovering deficient duty and imposing a penalty therefore did not bar prosecution for an independently disclosed cheating offence. Payment of the penalty did not absolve criminal liability; the penalty order was treated only as prima facie indication of evasion in the quashing inquiry.	164
Special-law reporting duty and exclusion of ordinary criminal law	A positive statutory obligation on specified officials to report financial irregularities does not, without prohibitory language or necessary implication, exclude others from setting criminal law in motion. An implied exclusion must follow from the statute's language and intended scheme. The Court applied this reasoning in rejecting the contention that the Stamp Act's special machinery displaced IPC prosecution.	164
Hearing the platform against which adverse allegations are made	Where a writ seeks transfer or monitoring of an NDPS investigation on allegations against an e-commerce platform, the court cannot accept those allegations and make prejudicial findings without hearing the platform. Amazon was therefore a necessary party. The petition failed for non-joinder after the petitioner did not take the opportunity to implead it.	169
Accused as parties to a stranger's investigation-transfer writ	In a third party's writ seeking to change the course of an ongoing criminal investigation, the persons already arrayed as accused were necessary parties for hearing. The Court distinguished that situation from an accused demanding a preferred investigating agency. A stranger was not automatically excluded for	169

	want of standing, but the requested change could not be made without hearing the affected accused.
Necessary and proper parties	A necessary party is one without whom an effective order cannot be made. A proper party is one in whose absence an effective order can be made, but whose presence is needed for complete and final adjudication. The Court applied that distinction to the proposed adverse findings and investigation-transfer relief.	169
Opportunity to cure non-joinder	A petition should not be dismissed for non-joinder of a necessary party without an opportunity to cure the defect. Once the omission was pointed out, the petitioner's insistence that it would implead the parties only on a court direction was treated as failure to use that opportunity. The consequence of non-joinder then followed.	169
Claim to be aggrieved by an order declaring a co-accused absconding	The applicant showed no legal basis on which he was an aggrieved person entitled to challenge the order declaring another accused absconding. His apprehension of bearing the civil liability if tried without that co-accused did not establish a ground for interference with the order or for delaying his own trial.	177
Special enactments and the criminal procedure under the CrPC	Under Section 4 CrPC, offences under other laws are ordinarily investigated, inquired into and tried under the Code, subject to a special enactment regulating that procedure. Exclusion of the general procedure requires an express provision or necessary implication from the special law's language and scheme; describing an enactment as a complete code is not sufficient by itself.	197
Investigation of non-cognizable allegations with a cognizable offence	Where a complaint includes a cognizable offence as well as a non-cognizable offence, the police may investigate both and submit a charge-sheet. Applying Ushaben, the Court rejected the objection to a mixed-offence charge-sheet merely because cognizance of one offence was ordinarily subject to a complaint requirement.	271
Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC — forgery before a document enters court custody	Applying Iqbal Singh Marwah, the Court held that the bar in Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC concerns the enumerated document offences committed after production or admission in evidence, while the document is in court custody. An affidavit allegedly forged outside court before being filed did not attract that bar in the challenge to cheating and forgery charges. No charge under Section 193 IPC had been framed.	318
Section 145 CrPC Proceedings During a Pending Civil Suit	Where a civil suit concerning the disputed property was already pending between the parties and interim relief could be sought from the civil court, proceedings under Section 145 CrPC and attachment of the property until disposal of the suit were unwarranted. The revisional court therefore committed no jurisdictional error in setting aside the attachment.	370
Good-Faith Protection for NHAI Officers Requires Due Care and Attention	Section 28 of the National Highways Authority of India Act protects acts done or intended in good faith under the Act or its rules and regulations. Applying Section 52 IPC, the Court required the accused invoking that protection to plead and prove due care and attention. NHAI's maintenance duty includes keeping an entrusted highway motorable. Alleged unrepaired ditches, without repair, closure or appropriate traffic regulation when the road was unsafe, prevented acceptance of good faith at the quashing stage.	387
Section 430 Companies Act does not imply an exclusion of criminal jurisdiction	The exclusion of civil-court jurisdiction under Section 430 Companies Act cannot be read as excluding criminal courts or the IPC. An exclusion of court jurisdiction must be specific and construed strictly; it cannot be supplied by inference merely because the statute assigns certain matters to the Tribunal or Appellate Tribunal. The Court rejected that proposed criminal-jurisdiction bar and declined Section 482 relief.	447
Section 4 CrPC: Exclusion of General	The CrPC applies to IPC offences and, subject to a governing special procedure, offences under other laws. A special enactment displaces the general procedure	459

5.3 : Maintainability of Criminal Proceedings and Preliminary Objections

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Procedure by a Special Law	where its terms or necessary implication exclude that procedure. Describing an enactment as a complete code or pointing to a civil recovery mechanism is insufficient without such exclusion.
Section 482 CrPC application for FIR registration — Available Magistrate remedy	A direct Section 482 CrPC application seeking police registration of an FIR was dismissed as not maintainable where the applicant could approach the Magistrate. The Court declined to direct registration and granted liberty to invoke Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS. The dismissal concerned the requested procedural route and did not adjudicate the truth of the accusation or foreclose a properly instituted complaint.	475
Parallel civil proceedings and a criminal complaint alleging forgery	Pendency of civil litigation over a document, including an appeal before a higher court, does not by itself justify dismissing or quashing a criminal complaint concerning its alleged forgery. The criminal allegations must be examined independently under the criminal procedure. The complaint alleging an affidavit forged before its production in the civil suit could not be rejected merely because the land-title litigation remained pending.	586
Priority and stay between related civil and criminal proceedings	Related civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously; neither must invariably await the other. Criminal proceedings ordinarily receive precedence so that allegations are determined promptly, but this is not an inflexible rule. Whether to stay either proceeding depends on the circumstances, including its nature and stage and the likelihood of embarrassment. The possibility of conflicting findings alone does not require a stay.	586
Section 482 CrPC — hearing co-accused joined as respondents	In a petition seeking to quash cognizance and summons against the applicants, co-accused joined as respondents did not need to be heard merely because they were parties to the same complaint. The Court therefore proceeded despite non-service on those co-accused.	803
Section 26 General Clauses Act — prior punishment objection	Where the accused had not already been punished under the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006, Section 26 of the General Clauses Act did not bar prosecution under Sections 420 and 272 IPC. This was an express ground in the quoted Manish Gupta decision which the Court applied when refusing to quash the Section 420 prosecution before it.	806
Section 528 BNSS application for FIR registration and the available statutory remedies	On a grievance that the police had not registered an FIR despite a complaint, the Court dismissed the Section 528 BNSS application and left the applicant free to approach the competent Magistrate. The authorities relied on distinguish the police duty to register cognizable information from an entitlement to bypass statutory remedies by seeking a High Court direction. The availability of remedies before police superiors and the Magistrate governed the refusal to entertain the application.	853
Parallel civil and criminal proceedings: precedence and stay depend on the circumstances	Civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously. Criminal proceedings ordinarily receive precedence because criminal justice should be prompt, but there is no rigid rule requiring a stay of the civil case. The likelihood of embarrassment and special circumstances, such as a proceeding nearing completion, inform the decision; the possibility of conflicting findings alone is insufficient.	861
Recusal sought because of an earlier direction to register an FIR	The earlier direction to register an FIR was based on the Collector's inquiry report and did not amount to an adverse judicial finding against the applicant or make the Court an aggrieved complainant. The Section 195 objection to that direction was also unfounded because the alleged forgery preceded filing. The Court rejected the request for recusal on that basis and treated the attempt to change the forum after detection of the alleged forged filing as impermissible forum shopping.	874
Section 197 sanction: stage of determination and	The need for sanction is ordinarily considered at cognizance, but the objection may arise at charge, on appeal or later as the evidence develops; the accused	877

competent authority	need not wait until charges are framed. A prima facie decision may be reconsidered on fuller material, and in some cases defence evidence or trial findings on good or bad faith are needed. Sanction itself must come from the competent authority on an objective assessment, rather than from the criminal court. Here the complaint and inquiry statements already established the duty connection, so the Court set aside cognizance and dismissed the complaint for absence of sanction.
Monitoring nomination and authority to file a PCPNDT complaint	Nomination of an Executive Magistrate to assist in monitoring implementation of the PCPNDT Act does not itself appoint that officer as the Appropriate Authority or authorise a complaint under Section 28. Following Dr. Manvinder Singh Gill, the Court held that the SDO (Revenue), nominated as officer in charge by the District Magistrate, had not filed the complaint in the capacity of the Appropriate Authority. The State's designation of District Magistrates and the monitoring nomination did not supply the necessary complaint authority.	966
Curing an improperly authorised PCPNDT complaint by the Appropriate Authority joining	The Court treated the nominated SDO's lack of proper authority as a curable irregularity, permitting the District Magistrate as Appropriate Authority to join or substitute as complainant and the SDO to testify. It construed Section 28 purposively in light of the Act's object of preventing sex selection and female foeticide, and applied M.M.T.C.'s representative-authority analogy after considering the cognizance-bar objection. The unexplained four-year challenge and advanced trial stage also weighed against quashing. This was the High Court's application of the analogy, without dispensing with Section 28's eligibility requirements. The District Magistrate was directed to seek substitution within one month and the trial to conclude within six months of receipt.	966
Eligible complainants and private notice under Section 28 PCPNDT Act	Section 28 permits cognizance on a complaint by the Appropriate Authority, an officer authorised as specified in clause (a), or a person who satisfies clause (b). A private complainant must give the Appropriate Authority at least fifteen days' notice in the prescribed manner of the alleged offence and the intention to complain to the court. The availability of that conditional private route means that the Appropriate Authority is not the only possible complainant; it does not permit unconditional initiation by anyone.	966

Preliminary Inquiry and Cognizable Information

FIR registration — absence of preliminary inquiry does not invalidate cognizable information	Under Section 154 CrPC, an FIR must be registered when the information discloses a cognizable offence; a prior inquiry into the truth or credibility of the accusation is not required. Where the information does not itself disclose a cognizable offence but indicates a need for inquiry, a limited preliminary inquiry may ascertain whether such an offence is disclosed. Its purpose is not to test veracity. The omission of a preliminary inquiry does not, by itself, invalidate an FIR or justify quashing it.	4
Preliminary inquiry — illustrative categories and case-specific discretion	Whether a preliminary inquiry is appropriate depends on the facts and circumstances. The categories identified in the relied-upon authorities include matrimonial or family disputes, commercial offences, medical negligence, corruption and unexplained abnormal delay in reporting. The list is illustrative. Even in corruption or disproportionate-assets cases, the possibility or desirability of inquiry does not create a mandatory precondition to FIR registration or an enforceable right in the accused to demand it when cognizable information is already available.	4
CBI Crime Manual	The CBI Crime Manual is a collection of administrative directions for the	4

— administrative guidance cannot override Section 154 CrPC	internal guidance of CBI officers, rather than a statute. Its preliminary-inquiry procedure cannot override the CrPC or, without support in the Code, impose a mandatory preliminary inquiry within the statutory FIR-registration scheme.
Cognizable information — sufficient basis for suspicion and flexible form	At FIR registration, the information must provide a basis to suspect the commission of a cognizable offence; the police officer need not already be convinced that the offence has been proved. The relied-upon authorities recognise that a General Diary entry containing such information may, in an appropriate case, be treated as the FIR. Formal or informal collection of information may suffice to disclose the offence; there is no fixed format of preliminary inquiry that must invariably precede registration.	4
Cognizable information — registration and limited purpose of preliminary inquiry	Where information discloses a cognizable offence, FIR registration is mandatory under Section 154 CrPC. A preliminary inquiry, where the information calls for one, is limited to determining whether a cognizable offence is disclosed and is not a prior trial of the information's truth. The investigating officer must assess the reliability of the allegations in the course of investigation rather than being directed by the Court to investigate from the accused's preferred point of view.	10
Non-cognizable allegations — Magistrate's order for police investigation	Where the allegations disclose only a non-cognizable offence, police cannot investigate without a Magistrate's order under Section 155(2) CrPC. The reproduced quashing framework distinguishes such a case from information disclosing a cognizable offence that permits investigation under Section 156(1).	64
Preliminary inquiry before registration of a matrimonial FIR	Under Section 154 CrPC, information disclosing a cognizable offence requires registration of an FIR. The fact that a complaint concerns matrimonial affairs does not make a preliminary inquiry mandatory or confer a right on the proposed accused to demand one. Whether such inquiry is appropriate depends on the facts, and its limited purpose is to ascertain disclosure of a cognizable offence, rather than test the truth of the accusation. Since the complaint disclosed prima facie cruelty, the absence of a preliminary inquiry did not vitiate the FIR.	84
Preliminary enquiry before registration of a corruption FIR	A preliminary enquiry is not mandatory before every corruption FIR. Its necessity depends on the facts and circumstances, and an accused has no right to insist upon it merely because corruption is alleged. Where information discloses a cognizable offence, the police may register the FIR without first conducting such an enquiry. Applying CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, the Court rejected the contention that absence of a preliminary enquiry by itself vitiated the FIR.	150
Limited purpose of preliminary enquiry	A preliminary enquiry serves only to ascertain whether the information reveals a cognizable offence. It does not test whether the information is true, genuine or credible. If the information already discloses a cognizable offence, an enquiry cannot be used to postpone the registration required by Section 154 CrPC.	150
CBI Manual cannot override Section 154 CrPC	The CBI Crime Manual comprises administrative instructions for the internal guidance of its officers. It is not a statute and cannot override the Code of Criminal Procedure or introduce a mandatory preliminary enquiry into Section 154 when the Code does not require one.	150
Negative preliminary inquiry — submission of report to the Magistrate	Where police conclude after a preliminary inquiry that no cognizable offence is made out, they must submit the report to the Magistrate under Section 157 CrPC. Sending the opinion only to a superior police officer and withholding it from the Magistrate is unlawful because the Magistrate must be able to consider whether investigation or an inquiry is required.	314
Sections 154 and 157 CrPC — registration	The duty to register cognizable information under Section 154 differs from the	314

and investigation thresholds	threshold for investigation under Section 157(1). The police require reason to suspect commission of an offence and may decline investigation for insufficient grounds under that provision, but must report such foreclosure to the Magistrate.
Preliminary inquiry — Omission does not by itself invalidate an FIR	In the family dispute before it, the Court considered that the police should have conducted a preliminary inquiry because the FIR expressly identified an accused as the father of the complainant's daughter-in-law. It nevertheless held that failure to conduct that inquiry did not, by itself, invalidate the FIR. Quashing followed from the separate finding that the delayed, superficial allegations were retaliatory and continuation of the proceedings would abuse the criminal process.	351
Matrimonial FIR: Absence of Preliminary Inquiry	A preliminary inquiry in a matrimonial dispute is not an indispensable condition for registering an FIR. Whether an inquiry is needed depends on the information and circumstances. Where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence, failure to hold a preliminary inquiry does not by itself vitiate the FIR. The Court therefore rejected the petitioners' demand to invalidate this FIR on that ground.	363
Preliminary Inquiry: Disclosure of an Offence Rather Than Truth of Allegations	A permissible preliminary inquiry serves to ascertain whether the information discloses a cognizable offence. Its purpose is not to determine whether the accusation is true or to conduct a trial of the accused's defence. When the information sufficiently discloses such an offence, Section 154 CrPC requires registration and investigation.	363
Investigation of a noncognizable offence and Magistrate's permission	Where the FIR and accompanying material disclose only a noncognizable offence, police investigation requires a Magistrate's order under Section 155(2) CrPC. The absence of a cognizable disclosure capable of supporting investigation under Section 156(1) is among the recognised grounds for considering quashing.	435
Magistrate's order for investigation of a noncognizable offence	Where the allegations and accompanying material disclose only a noncognizable offence, police investigation requires an order under Section 155(2) CrPC. Absence of a cognizable disclosure permitting investigation under Section 156(1) is a recognised ground for considering quashing.	436
Absence of Preliminary Inquiry Does Not by Itself Vitiate a Cognizable FIR	A preliminary inquiry is not mandatory in every case involving allegations against a public servant, including corruption allegations. Its necessity depends on the information and circumstances; the prospective accused has no universal entitlement to insist on it. Since the FIR and National Level Monitor material disclosed a cognizable offence here, the absence of a preliminary inquiry did not invalidate the FIR.	459
Preliminary Inquiry Tests Disclosure of an Offence, Not Truth of the Information	Registration under Section 154 CrPC is mandatory where the information discloses a cognizable offence. Where the information indicates the need for inquiry without itself disclosing such an offence, a preliminary inquiry may ascertain that limited question. It is not a trial of the information's truth or a substitute for investigation of the disclosed offence.	459
Preliminary inquiry — Absence is not itself a ground to quash an FIR	A preliminary inquiry serves to screen wholly frivolous or motivated complaints. Where credible information already discloses a cognizable offence and the officer is satisfied with that disclosure, an FIR may be registered without first conducting such an inquiry. Its absence does not by itself justify quashing. The FIR must be examined as a whole to determine whether its allegations disclose an offence.	472
Cognizable Rape Complaint: Limits on Preliminary Inquiry	Where information discloses a cognizable offence, Section 154 CrPC requires registration of an FIR; preliminary inquiry is confined to ascertaining whether such an offence is disclosed when the information is initially unclear, and cannot test its truth. Applying the narrated Supreme Court principles, the Court found that the police had handled the rape complaint with a preconceived view	528

6.1 : Preliminary Inquiry and Cognizable Information

	of its falsity by substituting internal inquiries for prompt registration.
Protecting the crime scene and taking investigative steps before formal FIR registration	Seizure of incriminating articles and preparation of a site plan before formal registration of the FIR did not invalidate the investigation where police had received information of firing and needed to preserve a disturbed public crime scene. Formal registration is not a necessary precondition to every investigative step: information giving reason to suspect a cognizable offence can support proceeding to the scene. The cryptic telephone message in this case was not itself treated as the FIR.	583
Preliminary inquiry is not mandatory in every matrimonial case	Where information discloses a cognizable offence, Section 154 CrPC requires registration of an FIR without first testing the truth of the allegation. If the information does not disclose such an offence but indicates a need for inquiry, a preliminary inquiry may ascertain cognizability; it must not investigate veracity. Family disputes are an illustrative category in which inquiry may be desirable according to the circumstances, rather than a mandatory prerequisite or vested right of the accused. Applying Lalita Kumari and Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, the Court refused to quash the matrimonial FIR merely because no preliminary inquiry had been held.	597
Closure after a preliminary inquiry	The Lalita Kumari directions reproduced and applied in the judgment require registration if a preliminary inquiry discloses a cognizable offence. If the inquiry instead ends in closure, the first informant must receive a copy of the closure entry promptly and no later than one week, with brief reasons for closing the complaint and taking no further steps.	597
Time and diary safeguards for preliminary inquiry	The Lalita Kumari passage reproduced in this judgment states that a preliminary inquiry must be time-bound and completed within seven days, with delay and its reasons reflected in the General Diary. It also requires meticulous diary recording of cognizable-offence information, whether it leads to an FIR or inquiry, and of the decision to conduct an inquiry.	597
Preliminary inquiry before an FIR against a public servant	Under the Lalita Kumari principles applied by the Court, information disclosing a cognizable offence requires registration of an FIR. A preliminary inquiry, where the circumstances warrant one, is confined to ascertaining whether such an offence is disclosed, rather than testing the truth of the information. Public-servant status does not make the inquiry mandatory. Its absence therefore did not vitiate the FIR, which was based on a complaint from the Collector's Food Branch.	600
Police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence	Police must register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That duty is distinct from the remedy available to the informant when police fail to perform it; the cited rule directs the informant to the statutory Magistrate process.	620
Cognizable information: police registration duty and enforcement remedy	Police have a duty to register an FIR when the information brought to them discloses a cognizable offence. That duty is distinct from the procedure available when police fail to act; the informant must ordinarily pursue the statutory complaint and Magistrate remedies.	627
Cognizable information: duty to register and remedy for inaction	Police must register an FIR when facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. The existence of that duty does not determine the complainant's remedy when police fail to perform it; the statutory complaint and Magistrate procedures remain the ordinary means of redress.	629
Preliminary inquiry before registration of a cognizable FIR	Under the Section 154 CrPC framework applied through the cited authorities, information disclosing a cognizable offence requires FIR registration without a preliminary inquiry. Where information does not itself disclose such an offence but calls for inquiry, the inquiry is limited to ascertaining cognizability, rather than testing truth. Its need depends on the facts; even illustrative corruption cases create no universal prerequisite or right of the accused to demand it.	785

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Absence of an inquiry did not vitiate this FIR, whose allegations disclosed a cognizable offence.
CBI administrative manual and statutory FIR registration	The CBI Crime Manual consists of administrative instructions for internal guidance and is not a statute. Its preliminary-inquiry procedure cannot override the Code of Criminal Procedure or import a mandatory inquiry requirement into Section 154 where the Code provides none. The governing question remains whether the information discloses a cognizable offence.	785
Section 154 CrPC — Duty to register cognizable information	Police must register an FIR where the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That statutory duty is distinct from the remedy to be pursued when the police fail to register the FIR.	820
Section 154 CrPC — Duty to register cognizable information	Police must register an FIR where the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That statutory duty is distinct from the remedy to be pursued when the police fail to register the FIR.	822
Section 154 CrPC — Duty to register cognizable information	Police must register an FIR where the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That statutory duty is distinct from the remedy to be pursued when the police fail to register the FIR.	826
Mandatory FIR registration and the limited purpose of preliminary inquiry	Where information discloses a cognizable offence, registration under Section 154 CrPC is mandatory and preliminary inquiry is not a means of testing whether the information is true. Where the information does not itself disclose such an offence but indicates a need for inquiry, the inquiry is confined to ascertaining whether a cognizable offence is disclosed. The reproduced categories, including matrimonial disputes, are illustrative and depend on the circumstances; they do not create an accused's right to insist that his defence be accepted before registration.	832
A suspect's right to a hearing before FIR registration	The CrPC does not ordinarily require a suspect to be heard before registration of an FIR or a direction under Section 156(3). Requiring such a hearing would frustrate prompt and fair investigation; the suspect may use the statutory remedies available after registration. The adopted Anju Chaudhary passage recognises that a higher court considering reversal of a rejected complaint or application may need to hear the suspect, depending on the circumstances, without creating an absolute right. The applicants therefore had no right to a hearing before the FIR. The separate complaint about absence of a hearing before the SDM's revenue order did not arise for decision because that order was not challenged.	871
Section 156(3) CrPC: registration, proper investigation and monitoring	After an unsuccessful written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), a person aggrieved by non-registration or deficient investigation may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration, require proper investigation and monitor it. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police superior, but cannot personally investigate. The Court adopted Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe in directing the petitioner to this remedy.	875
Matrimonial FIR — absence of preliminary inquiry does not by itself invalidate registration	A preliminary inquiry may be desirable in an appropriate matrimonial dispute, but it is not an invariable precondition to registering an FIR. Where the information discloses a cognizable offence, registration is mandatory. If the information indicates a need for inquiry without itself disclosing such an offence, the inquiry is limited to determining whether a cognizable offence is disclosed; it does not test the truth or credibility of the allegations. The accused has no automatic right to insist on an inquiry before registration. Because the complaint disclosed cognizable allegations, the Court held that omission of a preliminary inquiry did not, by itself, vitiate the FIR.	889

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Preliminary inquiry finding insufficient evidence — communication and submission of the report	Where a preliminary inquiry concludes that the evidence is insufficient, the Court stated that the police authority must supply the report to the complainant and file a copy before the Magistrate under Section 169 CrPC/Section 189 BNSS. No such action or final outcome of the earlier complaint was shown here. The separate contention that the later FIR was a second FIR was ultimately withdrawn and was not decided on its merits.	896
Preliminary enquiry before registration of a matrimonial FIR	A preliminary enquiry is not mandatory merely because the allegations concern a matrimonial dispute. Its purpose is to ascertain whether there is a prima facie basis to register an FIR; it is distinct from investigation under the CrPC after registration. Where the available information adequately indicates a cognizable offence, a regular case must be registered instead of undertaking a preliminary enquiry. The absence of such an enquiry did not justify quashing the FIR.	930

FIR Registration, Complaint Drafting and False Implication

Criminal complaint — particulars of the offence and each accused's role	Merely reciting statutory sections or repeating their language does not supply the necessary particulars of a criminal complaint. The complaint must identify the alleged acts constituting the offence and the role attributed to each accused. The Court relied on this requirement when finding the matrimonial allegations against the applicants too vague to sustain their prosecution.	3
FIR registration — no right of pre-registration hearing for a suspect	The CrPC does not give a suspect or prospective accused a right to notice or an opportunity to be heard before an FIR is registered. The principles of natural justice do not require a hearing at the stage of reporting a criminal offence. Consequently, an FIR cannot be quashed merely because the person named in it was not heard before registration.	4
FIR — material information rather than an exhaustive account	An FIR need not contain every minute detail of the occurrence, identify every participant, or come from an eyewitness. It must provide information disclosing a cognizable offence and a basis for the police to suspect its commission. Missing details and the truth of the allegations are investigated thereafter. The omission of minute particulars from the prompt Dehati Nalishi did not justify rejecting the prosecution evidence here.	12
FIR omissions — broad narrative assessed with the later evidentiary account	An FIR is not an exhaustive catalogue of the occurrence, and omission of a name or particular allegation does not by itself establish non-involvement or false implication. The effect of an omission must be assessed with the entire factual setting, the informant's circumstances, the other material and the trustworthiness of the account. The Court therefore did not discard specific allegations in the Section 161 statement merely because every detail was absent from the FIR.	18
Cognizable allegations and the duty to register an FIR	Applying Lalita Kumari, the Court stated that police must register an FIR when the complaint discloses a cognizable offence. In this case it found that the truck transaction, nonpayment and continued use, considered in the manner explained in the order, disclosed a cognizable Section 406 IPC allegation. The FIR therefore could not be quashed on the ground advanced.	49
Cognizable information — police duty to register and remedy for default	The Aleque Padamsee principle relied upon requires police to register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. Failure to perform that duty is addressed through the Code's statutory remedies, including a complaint under Section 190 read with Section 200. The registration duty and the procedure for enforcing it are distinct questions.	57
Police duty to register cognizable information is distinct from entitlement to writ relief	Police must register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence. That duty does not by itself entitle an informant to bypass the statutory remedies and obtain a High Court direction. The Court relied on Aleque Padamsee and Shweta Bhadauria to distinguish the police obligation from the remedy for its breach; Lalita Kumari did not decide an entitlement to mandamus	136

	without recourse to the available alternative remedies.
FIR or complaint: factual foundation rather than exhaustive detail	An FIR is not required to set out every evidentiary detail, and a complaint need not reproduce the statutory ingredients word for word. Where the essential factual foundation of the offence is present, lack of detailed pleading of a few ingredients does not by itself warrant quashing. Absence of even the basic facts necessary to disclose the offence stands differently.	142
Cognizable information and the statutory duty to register an FIR	When information placed before the police discloses a cognizable offence, the police must register an FIR. If they fail to act, the informant may use the complaint procedure under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The police duty and the informant's procedural remedy are distinct questions.	147
Prior complaint and conciliation material in a counterblast defence	The husband's earlier police complaint did not by itself establish that the wife's FIR was a false counterblast; it showed strained relations and apprehension of legal proceedings. Her conciliation statement that her husband and in-laws did not keep her properly supported the cruelty allegations rather than the asserted absence of any complaint. Those materials did not warrant quashing the specific FIR allegations.	148
FIR need not contain every evidentiary detail	An FIR is not required to contain every fact and detail concerning the reported offence. At the quashing stage the court must consider whether its allegations disclose an offence, without demanding the exhaustive evidence expected at trial or deciding disputed merits on incomplete facts.	148
FIR need not be an exhaustive account of the offence	An FIR is not required to contain every fact and evidentiary detail. In deciding a Section 482 challenge, the High Court must not scrutinise the material as a trial court would after evidence is led or conduct a detailed inquiry into the merits of the allegations.	149
Complainant's standing in criminal proceedings	Criminal law ordinarily imposes no locus standi requirement on the person setting the process in motion. The exception is where the statute creating the offence prescribes who is eligible to complain.	238
Authority to bring alleged offences to the criminal authorities' notice	Any person may set the criminal law in motion. On that basis, the Court rejected the objection to the Collector directing the Chief Municipal Officer to lodge an FIR concerning alleged illegal colonisation.	240
Investigation beyond persons and allegations named in the FIR	An FIR or complaint need not set out every relevant fact or identify every offender. Investigation may examine additional material and implicate other persons where facts discovered during enquiry or investigation justify doing so. The absence of the night-parking allegation from the FIR did not prevent investigation when the State's subsequent material disclosed unpaid charges.	290
FIR particulars and omitted minute details	An FIR need state the broad features of the occurrence rather than every minute detail. The complainant had reported and produced the accused's shirt, licence copy and diary when lodging the FIR. Failure also to narrate how he returned to the spot and collected them was not a material omission on this record.	291
FIR or complaint — factual foundation without exhaustive particulars	An FIR need not contain an exhaustive account of the case, and a complaint need not reproduce every statutory ingredient verbatim. Where the necessary factual foundation substantially discloses the offence, omission of detailed language about an ingredient does not by itself require quashing. A complaint lacking even the basic facts needed to disclose the offence stands differently. The Court relied on the reproduced Amit Kapoor, Indian Oil and Kunwar Singh principles in examining whether a triable case existed.	323
Cognizable information — police duty to register FIR and remedy for default	Police must register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That duty is distinct from the remedy available when police fail to act: the informant must ordinarily invoke the statutory remedies before the police superior or Magistrate rather than obtain a direct High Court order merely by citing the duty to register.	338

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Sexual-offence complaints — Access to registration and investigation	A complainant of sexual harassment or assault should not have to make repeated approaches merely to obtain registration of a complaint and initiation of investigation when the complaint prima facie discloses a cognizable offence. Courts have a responsibility to respond sensitively where the police fail to address such a grievance.	353
Contents of an FIR — Exhaustive evidentiary detail is unnecessary	An FIR need not contain an exhaustive account of all evidence. While considering quashing, the court must avoid scrutinising the material as a trial court would after evidence is recorded. The inquiry remains whether the allegations, taken at face value, disclose a prima facie offence.	357
Contents of an FIR — Full evidentiary detail is not required	An FIR need not set out every evidentiary detail. At the quashing stage the court must not test its contents by the detailed scrutiny appropriate after trial evidence has been recorded. The relevant threshold is whether the uncontroverted allegations, accepted at face value, make out an offence.	358
FIR When the Informant Dies Before Examination	An FIR is not substantive evidence and ordinarily serves to corroborate or contradict its maker when examined. The informant's death before examination does not destroy the prosecution's foundation: the offence may still be proved by other direct or circumstantial evidence. Proof by the officer who recorded the Dehati Nalishi established the reporting document, without making its untested allegations substantive proof of the occurrence.	381
Non-Examination of the Formal FIR Scribe	Non-examination of the officer who transcribed the formal FIR was not fatal where the officer recording the underlying Dehati Nalishi had proved it. The retired scribe could not be traced despite attempts to secure attendance, and the defence itself pressed for closure of prosecution evidence because an accused remained in custody. The Court assessed the omission in that setting rather than treating examination of the formal scribe as indispensable in every case.	381
Suppression of the earliest information received by police	Where police had searched for the missing persons before the formal FIR, the Court inferred that the prosecution had suppressed the information first received by police. The FIR's unexplained omissions about the source of information and known abductors were assessed with the other evidentiary defects.	410
Registration of FIR on prima facie disclosure of a cognizable offence	Where the complaint allegations disclose a prima facie cognizable offence, an FIR must be registered. Whether an offence is disclosed depends on the allegations and circumstances; disputes about their ultimate truth do not justify preventing investigation at inception.	435
FIR detail and incomplete investigation	An FIR need not contain every fact and detail of the reported offence. While investigation is in progress, the Court should not conclude from incomplete or hazy facts that the matter does not deserve investigation, or determine the merits of the allegations as if evidence had been collected and tested.	438
Suppression of the Earlier FIR and Failure to Produce Initial Police Records	The Court found suppression of the earlier FIR on the combined record: a witness said his wife had reported during the night, that report was not produced, the claimed telephone information was unsupported by the station diary, and the original death-inquiry statements were also withheld. The hospital messages had not identified the appellant despite the later claim of a known assailant. These omissions undermined the subsequent FIR registered after the death inquiry.	455
Criminal Law May Be Set in Motion by Any Person Unless Statutorily Restricted	In the absence of a statutory restriction, any person may report information disclosing a cognizable offence and set the criminal law in motion. Ordinary civil notions of the complainant's locus standi do not restrict that right. The Court applied this principle in rejecting the objection to registration of the Panchayat-related FIR.	459
Sufficient factual foundation without an exhaustive FIR	An FIR is not expected to contain every evidentiary detail. Where the allegations lay the factual foundation for an offence and substantially satisfy its requirements, proceedings should not be quashed merely because one or two	469

	ingredients have not been stated in detail. This does not dispense with the basic facts needed to disclose the offence; it prevents premature demands for trial-level completeness.
FIR registration — Police duty and remedy for non-registration	Police must register an FIR when facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That duty is distinct from the procedural remedy available when police do not act. As explained in Aleque Padamsee, the informant may then approach the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The registration-duty decisions do not by themselves establish entitlement to a direct High Court order. This order did not decide whether the applicant's accusation disclosed an offence.	475
FIR — omission of detailed acts does not by itself defeat later specific trial testimony	An FIR is not required to contain every detail of the occurrence. Where the applicant was named in the FIR and the witness gave specific trial testimony about his participation, the absence of a detailed account of each act in the FIR did not prevent reliance on that court evidence for summoning him under Section 319 CrPC, subject to the applicable stronger evidentiary threshold.	490
Police inaction — Sections 154(3) and 156(3) CrPC remedies	A person whose FIR is not registered may apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if no satisfactory result follows, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). Applying Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe, the Court recognised the Magistrate's power, on prima facie satisfaction, to direct registration or proper investigation and monitor it. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police authority, but cannot personally investigate. This remedy also addresses inadequate investigation after an FIR has been registered.	492
Magistrate complaint and statutory remedies for police inaction	Where police do not act on information alleging an offence, a complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate considers the complaint under Chapter XV and may take the statutory course warranted by the material, including dismissal under Section 203, issue of process, or an appropriate police-investigation direction. The Court relied on Divine Retreat Centre and also identified the remedies under Sections 154(3) and 156(3) through Shweta Bhadauria before leaving the applicant free to file a complaint.	504
Registration of FIR on Information Disclosing a Cognizable Offence	Where the complaint discloses commission of a cognizable offence, the police must register an FIR. Applying this principle, the Court treated the allegations of rape and associated offences as sufficient for registration and declined quashing.	520
Duty to register a cognizable offence and remedy for failure to register	Police must register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That statutory duty is distinct from the procedure an informant must follow when police fail to act. The adopted authorities direct the aggrieved person to the remedies provided by the Code, rather than treating the duty to register as an automatic entitlement to a High Court direction.	554
Police duty to register cognizable information	Where facts brought to the police disclose a cognizable offence, the police have a duty to register an FIR. The relied-upon Aleque Padamsee passage distinguishes that substantive duty from the statutory procedure available to an informant when the police fail to perform it.	566
Duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence	Police must register an FIR when the facts reported disclose a cognizable offence. The existence of that statutory duty does not by itself decide whether a complainant may bypass available remedies and obtain a writ of mandamus. The Court applied Aleque Padamsee and the narrated Shweta Bhadauria distinction between the registration obligation and the remedy for its breach.	595
Factual foundation required in an FIR or criminal	An FIR need not contain every detail, particularly where financial irregularities in a public scheme require investigation. Nor must a complaint reproduce the	600 complaint	legal ingredients word for word: proceedings should continue where the necessary factual foundation and substantial compliance with the offence requirements are present. Quashing remains appropriate where even the basic facts necessary to constitute the alleged offence are absent.

An FIR need not contain every detail of the reported offence	Under the Neeharika Infrastructure principles relied on by the Court, an FIR is not required to state every fact and detail. An investigation disclosing a cognizable offence should be allowed to proceed without premature conclusions on incomplete facts. If investigation reveals no substance in the complaint, the investigating officer may submit the appropriate report to the Magistrate for consideration according to law.	601
FIR particulars and a detailed merits inquiry under Section 482	An FIR is not required to contain every detail of the alleged offence. The High Court must not scrutinise the investigation material as a trial court would after evidence is adduced or use a detailed inquiry into disputed merits to decide a quashing application.	666
Limited evidentiary use of an FIR	An FIR is not substantive evidence. It may be used to corroborate or contradict its maker in the manner permitted by the Evidence Act, but cannot corroborate or contradict other witnesses. Its purpose is to obtain the earliest account of the circumstances of the crime, and minute details are not invariably expected from an informant under shock.	713
Dehati Nalishi and subsequent FIR registration at the police station	A Dehati Nalishi records information received by police away from the police station and is then sent to the station for registration as an FIR. The recorded Dehati Nalishi and subsequent FIR in this case contradicted the informant's claim that he had gone to the police station to lodge the report, contributing to doubt about the prosecution's reporting account.	716
Unexplained names in FIR accused-details column — cumulative defects establishing false implication	The prosecution failed to explain how accused names appeared in the FIR's details column when the abductee had not supplied them in its narrative. The Court assessed that inconsistency with the failure to investigate the alleged house and places of captivity, their ownership or occupation, and the absence of a seized ransom letter. In Ramlakhan's trial, the witness producing the Rojnamcha entry was not its writer; in Punjab Singh's trial, the missing-person Rojnamcha entry was not proved. In Avtar Singh's trial, the FIR writer and the person said to have accompanied the abductee to the station were not examined. On their separate records, involvement was not proved; the Court characterised Ramlakhan's and Punjab Singh's implication as false and acquitted all three appellants.	743
FIR registration implicit in a Section 156(3) investigation direction	Where a Magistrate directs investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC into information disclosing a cognizable offence, the officer in charge must register the FIR even if the direction does not expressly require registration. Registration records the substance of the cognizable information under Section 154 and precedes the further investigative steps contemplated by Chapter XII CrPC.	770
Police duty to register an FIR and remedy for non-registration	The police must register an FIR when information discloses a cognizable offence. That statutory duty is distinct from the remedy available when the police fail to act. Applying Aleque Padamsee, the Court directed the applicant to the Magistrate's complaint procedure rather than granting an FIR-registration direction in the Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS application, which was dismissed as not maintainable.	786
FIR need not contain every detail of the offence	An FIR need not contain every fact and detail relating to the reported offence. During an ongoing investigation, the Court should not decide the merits on incomplete or uncertain facts merely because the FIR is not exhaustive. If investigation reveals no substance, the officer may submit the appropriate report for the Magistrate's consideration.	795

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Basic factual foundation without exhaustive detail in an FIR or complaint	An FIR need not contain an exhaustive account of the case. Nor must a criminal complaint reproduce every legal ingredient verbatim when the necessary factual foundation is present. Proceedings should not be quashed merely because a few ingredients are not detailed if the allegations substantially disclose the offence. Interference remains justified where even the basic facts necessary to constitute the offence are absent.	837
An FIR need not contain an exhaustive account of the prosecution case	An FIR is not expected to contain every detail of the case. Adopting the quoted Kunwar Singh passage, the Court reiterated that a Section 482 inquiry must not scrutinise the material as a trial court would after evidence is adduced or undertake a detailed examination of the merits.	855
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.3 FIR Registration and Delay/Explanation
Delay in a matrimonial FIR — efforts to restore the marriage	A delay between leaving the matrimonial home and lodging the FIR cannot be used to draw an adverse inference against the wife without considering efforts made during that interval to restore matrimonial life. In the authority relied upon, the complaint followed the failure of attempts to secure the wife's return; the interval alone did not justify quashing the criminal case.	2
Delay alone as a ground for quashing a complaint or FIR	Delay in lodging a complaint or FIR does not, by itself, justify quashing the proceedings. A delayed FIR is not illegal merely because it was delayed, and prompt reporting does not conclusively establish its truth. The separate question whether Section 468 CrPC bars the proceedings must be considered where raised. No such statutory bar was claimed in this case.	30
Explained delay in reporting sexual assault	Where delay in lodging the FIR is properly explained, the prosecutrix's evidence cannot be disbelieved merely because of that delay. The Court applied this rule after considering her explanation that threats and fear prevented earlier disclosure.	38
Reconciliation efforts explaining delay in a cruelty complaint	A wife's delay in reporting cruelty may be explained by efforts to preserve the marriage and secure reconciliation. Where she reports after those efforts fail and the spouse begins matrimonial litigation, that sequence does not by itself establish a retaliatory complaint. The Court considered that explanation with the allegations and the applicants' messages rather than treating delay alone as a reason to quash.	39
Delayed reporting of rape — scrutiny of the explanation	Fear may explain a delay in reporting sexual assault, but the explanation and the complainant's reliability must still be examined on the evidence. The Court assessed the delay of almost two months together with material improvements, contradictions about later threats, unsupported recording evidence, hostility and the absence of useful forensic or medical support. Their cumulative effect left the prosecution case unproved.	65
Duty to register a cognizable offence and remedy for police inaction	The police must register an FIR when the information brought to their notice discloses a cognizable offence. That duty is distinct from the informant's entitlement to seek a High Court direction without using the available statutory remedies. The mandatory-registration rule in Lalita Kumari does not itself resolve whether such a writ should be entertained.	92
Delayed FIR and later additions to a plea of defensive firing	Although an FIR need not contain every detail, the officials' delayed first account was material when assessing their later plea of defensive firing. That account did not state that they had found persons actually cutting trees or carrying fresh-cut timber, or that an assailant had fired a gun. The delay, inconsistent later enquiry version and absence of corroborating timber or site material led the Court to reject the claimed official-duty connection prima facie, leaving guilt for trial.	97

6.3 : FIR Registration and Delay/Explanation

register an FIR and entitlement to writ relief	offence does not by itself entitle the informant to bypass statutory remedies and obtain a writ of mandamus. As explained in Shweta Bhadauria and followed here, Lalita Kumari addresses the registration duty rather than entitlement to writ relief without first using the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC.
Delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty	Delay alone does not make an FIR illegal or justify quashing it under Section 482 CrPC. Its explanation must be considered without trying disputed facts at that stage. The wife's stated effort to preserve her marriage was a plausible explanation for postponing her complaint. Prompt reporting assists investigation and reduces opportunities for fabrication, but does not itself guarantee truth.	163
Section 156(3) direction requires FIR registration, but not necessarily a charge-sheet	When the Magistrate directs investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC, the police must register an FIR. The direction does not compel a charge-sheet: after investigation, the police may submit a closure report if the allegations do not prima facie disclose an offence warranting prosecution.	200
Statutory remedies against police inaction or improper investigation	A person aggrieved by non-registration of an FIR may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if that yields no satisfactory result, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). A complaint under Sections 190 and 200 is also available. Section 156(3) may be invoked where an FIR exists but proper investigation is not being conducted.	203
FIR need not contain every detail of the incident	An FIR need not provide an exhaustive account of the incident or every minute detail. It must contain the allegations that ordinarily come to mind and assist in assessing the gravity of the crime or identifying the offender. Omission of finer details is therefore not, by itself, decisive against the prosecution.	244
FIR detail and the limits of a quashing inquiry	An FIR is not expected to be an exhaustive account of all the evidence. At the Section 482 stage, the High Court should not scrutinise the material with the detailed evidentiary assessment appropriate to a trial after evidence is led.	249
Duty to register an FIR when information discloses a cognizable offence	Police must register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That statutory duty is distinct from the question whether the informant can obtain a High Court direction without first using the prescribed remedies for police inaction.	255
Mandatory FIR registration when the complaint discloses a cognizable offence	Where the allegations in a complaint disclose a cognizable offence, an FIR must be registered. Applying Lalita Kumari, the Court held that the petitioner had not shown why the allegations of abuse, threats and a demand for money failed to disclose such an offence.	264
Delayed cruelty complaint within limitation: no automatic quashing	Where the cruelty FIR was undisputedly within limitation, failure to report immediately did not justify quashing it. The Court considered that the complainant had waited in the hope that relations would improve and reported only after that hope failed. The delay was assessed in that context, rather than treated as proof that the allegations were false.	289
Cognizable information: obligation to register the FIR	Where the information discloses cognizable offences, the police are obliged to register an FIR. The Court applied that rule to the alleged matrimonial cruelty and unlawful demand and found no ground to quash the registered FIR at the threshold.	289
FIR timing — assessment of the complete chronology and testimony	An isolated statement by the investigating officer about later police-station agitation did not establish that the FIR was antedated or antetimed. The Court read it with the scribe's evidence, the officer's prior receipt of the crime number and the witnesses' account of taking the body to hospital after reporting. It also considered that the complainant and accompanying witness were not questioned about the alleged protest chronology. On the whole evidence, the FIR recorded within twenty minutes was accepted.	319

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Delayed FIR — delay alone does not justify quashing	Delay in lodging an FIR does not, by itself, make it illegal or justify quashing it. Prompt reporting helps an immediate investigation and reduces the opportunity to invent a version, but does not guarantee truth. Genuine reasons may explain delay. The interval of about sixteen months in reporting the alleged sexual assault therefore did not, by itself, warrant quashing.	340
Omission of an Eyewitness's Name From the FIR	An eyewitness's testimony does not become unreliable merely because the FIR does not name that witness. An FIR need not list every eyewitness, particularly where the informant was injured and may not have noticed everyone present. The omission must be assessed in context and is not, by itself, a ground to discard otherwise credible evidence.	381
An Assault Omitted From the FIR but Proved by Other Evidence	Although the FIR did not mention the assaults on Ramkali and Munnalal, their investigation statements, testimony and medical reports established that the later three assailants had beaten them. The Court accepted that specific evidence of the later attack while separately assessing whether those accused shared responsibility for the earlier one. The FIR omission did not, on this record, defeat proof of those injuries.	388
FIR followed by missing-person registration for a child	Where the informant reported a missing minor girl and expressed an apprehension of kidnapping, registration of an FIR was proper. A separate missing-person entry shortly afterwards, while the precise circumstances remained uncertain, did not show that the FIR was antedated or antetimed. The same-day forwarding of the FIR to the Magistrate and its acknowledged receipt also supported its authenticity.	391
Delay in lodging a matrimonial FIR and explanation at trial	Delay in lodging an FIR does not, by itself, justify quashing criminal proceedings. Applying Ravinder Kumar and Mohammad Wajid, the Court observed that a delayed FIR is not inherently illegal and that genuine reasons may explain the delay. Delay becomes material when the complainant gives no plausible explanation. Whether the explanation is plausible is for the trial court to decide after recording evidence.	420
Cryptic Information and the Duty to Record a Telephone Message	A cryptic message about commission of an offence is not necessarily an FIR. Nevertheless, the witness's asserted telephone information to police should have been entered in the station diary. Non-production of that entry was a material defect in the Court's assessment of whether the original reporting had been suppressed.	455
Delayed Reporting While Hoping for Improvement in the Marriage	Delay alone did not justify quashing the matrimonial FIR where no limitation bar was established. The Court recognised that a woman may defer reporting ill-treatment in the hope of improvement and preservation of the marriage. It rejected an adverse inference based merely on the interval before reporting and the subsequent matrimonial litigation.	458
Delay in Reporting Sexual Assault: Threats as an Explanation	Delay in lodging an FIR does not by itself discredit the prosecution if it is plausibly explained. Where the prosecutrix attributed her delayed disclosure to threats against her and her brother, the acceptability of that explanation required evidence at trial and could not be decided under Section 482 CrPC.	520
FIR Delay Caused by Police Refusal and an Incorrect Recorded Explanation	The Court found that delayed FIR registration resulted from police non-cooperation despite the complainant's repeated approaches to authorities. The FIR instead attributed delay to her mother's absence and later arrival, which the Court found false and implausible for the long interval. The record required the police's refusal to register the complaint to be recognised as the actual explanation; the recorded delay did not justify quashing on this material.	528
Omission of an eyewitness's name from the FIR or Dehati Nalishi	An FIR must disclose the broad features and basic ingredients of a cognizable offence; it need not name every eyewitness or contain every minute detail. A witness cannot be disbelieved merely because the first report does not mention the witness's name. The omission remains a circumstance to assess with the full	583 evidence and the informant's condition, rather than an automatic ground for rejection.

Statutory remedies when police do not register an FIR	The duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence is distinct from the remedy for police inaction. Applying Aleque Padamsee, Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe, the Court directed the applicant to the statutory Magistrate route instead of granting the requested direction under Section 528 BNSS. The reproduced CrPC framework provides written recourse to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), followed where necessary by an application under Section 156(3). The Court did not determine whether the complaint itself disclosed an offence.	608
FIR delay explained by prompt initial report and handwriting verification	The later formal FIR did not justify quashing where the Dehati Nalishi followed the suicide promptly and police awaited handwriting verification to exclude fabrication of the suicide note. On receipt of the expert's attribution of the note to the deceased, the officer found a prima facie case and registered the FIR. On this chronology, the Court found no prejudice from the delay; it did not lay down a general requirement to await forensic confirmation before registration.	625
Police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence	When the facts brought to the police disclose a cognizable offence, the police have a duty to register an FIR under Section 154 CrPC. The existence of that duty and the procedural remedy available for its non-performance are separate questions; failure to perform it leads to the statutory remedies before the police superior or Magistrate considered in the judgment.	697
Delay in a student's sexual-misconduct complaint against her teacher	The complainant first approached the principal and collector, then lodged an FIR alleging sexual misconduct and examination-related pressure by her professor. The Court reasoned that a student would not necessarily complain to police immediately against a teacher; escalation after the situation became intolerable did not, on this record, warrant quashing for delay. The applicant did not contend that the allegations were time-barred. This was a contextual rejection of his delay objection, not a general finding that delay can never matter.	734
Delay in lodging an FIR — delay alone does not justify quashing	Delay in lodging or registering an FIR, by itself, is insufficient to quash criminal proceedings. Applying Ravinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, the Court noted that the law fixes no time for lodging an FIR and delayed reporting is not for that reason illegal. Prompt reporting aids early investigation and reduces the opportunity for fabrication, but does not guarantee the truth of the version; genuine causes may explain delay. Following Mohammad Wajid v. State of U.P., the Court rejected delay alone as a ground for quashing. Unless prosecution is barred by limitation, the complainant remains entitled to explain the reporting delay. The objection based on the old revenue entries therefore failed.	742
Duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence	Police must register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. The existence of that duty is distinct from the judicial remedy available to an informant when police fail to act; the Court followed the authorities directing such an informant to the statutory Magistrate remedies.	763
Duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence	Police must register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. The existence of that duty is distinct from the judicial remedy available to an informant when police fail to act; the Court followed the authorities directing such an informant to the statutory Magistrate remedies.	765
Police response to a nearby cognizable offence before formal FIR registration	Police who notice a cognizable offence within their jurisdiction need not wait for formal FIR registration before initiating lawful action. The shooting occurred about 50–60 metres from the police station, and the Court considered that officers could have responded on hearing gunfire. In that setting, the tractor engine number appearing in the FIR before the recorded seizure and the alleged variations in chronology did not establish the defence claim of an antetimed or	772 fabricated FIR or defeat the prosecution. The conclusion addressed those discrepancies in the circumstances of the case.

Delay in lodging an FIR is not by itself a ground for quashing	Delay alone does not make an FIR illegal or justify quashing a prosecution. Genuine causes may explain delayed reporting, and a satisfactorily explained FIR may be relied on. Prompt reporting aids early investigation and reduces the opportunity for concoction, but does not conclusively establish the account's truth. Applying Skoda Auto Volkswagen, Ravinder Kumar and Mohammad Wajid, the Court rejected the applicant's delay ground without determining the truth of the allegations.	855
Delay in FIR registration following police inaction and earlier High Court proceedings	Delay in registering an FIR is not by itself a ground for quashing. The complainant had approached the High Court after police inaction, and registration followed its order; the interval therefore could not simply be treated as an unexplained four-year delay. The adopted authorities recognise genuine explanations for delay, while prompt reporting, although helpful to investigation and reducing opportunity for concoction, does not guarantee truth. The Court accordingly rejected delay alone as a basis for interference.	857
Police duty to register cognizable information and the remedy for failure	Police must register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. If they fail to perform that duty, the informant may pursue a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. Decisions recognising the registration duty address a different question from the procedure available to an informant aggrieved by police inaction.	866
Sexual-assault FIR delay — eleven days does not by itself justify quashing before explanation is tested	An eleven-day interval between alleged sexual assault and FIR was no standalone ground for Section 482 quashing; whether the prosecution supplies a plausible explanation and whether delay benefits the accused are matters for the evidentiary stage, with hesitation over family reputation a possible context.	893
Police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence	The police must register an FIR where the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That duty is distinct from the question of the remedy available when the police fail to act; the existence of the duty does not dispense with the statutory remedies for police inaction.	921
Prompt and detailed FIR as corroboration of an abduction account	Prompt reporting with specific details can corroborate the informant’s account and rule out deliberation, exaggeration and false implication. The FIR naming the abductors and identifying their vehicle was lodged within thirty minutes. Together with the tested and corroborated eyewitness testimony, its promptness supported the finding that the abduction was proved.	934
Prompt FIR corroborating the first eyewitness account	An almost immediate FIR containing material particulars reduces the opportunity for deliberation and false implication and corroborates the informant’s testimony. The first version also acts as a check on the prosecution account. The injured informant reported the occurrence within half an hour, and the assault account was consistent with his testimony and the medical findings. The Court treated these features as supporting his reliability.	936
Police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence	Police officials ought to register an FIR when the facts brought to their notice disclose a cognizable offence. That duty is distinct from the remedy available on failure to perform it: the informant must use the applicable statutory remedies before the Magistrate rather than treat the registration duty itself as an entitlement to writ relief.	961
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.4 Complaint Case, Private Complaint and Magistrate Inquiry
Section 156(3) CrPC: remedy for non-registration or improper	A person complaining of non-registration may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if that fails, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). The latter remedy also addresses improper	48 investigation	investigation after registration. On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor it and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP or SP. The Magistrate cannot investigate personally. The complaint procedure under Sections 190 and 200 is also available. The petitioner was left free to approach the concerned Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 without adjudication of the complaint's factual merits.

Private complaint after police inaction: inquiry, dismissal and process	An informant may present a complaint to the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. As explained in the Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre passage reproduced through Divine Retreat Centre, the Magistrate enquires into it under Chapter XV. If the complaint discloses no offence warranting further action, it may be dismissed under Section 203. If the complaint and recorded evidence prima facie disclose an offence, the Magistrate may issue process. These judicial remedies explain why ordinary complaints of police inaction are not taken up directly in writ jurisdiction.	48
Section 156(3) CrPC — discretion to choose police investigation or complaint procedure	The word 'may' in Section 156(3) CrPC leaves the decision to order police investigation to the Magistrate's discretion. After considering the allegations, the Magistrate may direct investigation if necessary or proceed with the complaint by requiring examination under Sections 200 and 202. Recognition of the power to direct investigation in Jayant and Sakiri Vasu does not make its exercise obligatory in every case.	55
Section 202 CrPC — police assistance after examination of complainant's witnesses	Choosing to proceed with the complaint under Sections 200 and 202 CrPC does not leave the Magistrate without police assistance. If, after examining the witnesses, the Magistrate considers such assistance necessary, an enquiry by the police may still be directed under Section 202.	55
Complaint particulars — identifying each accused's act and role	The Neelu Chopra principle relied upon by the Court requires a complaint to state the particulars of the offence and the role of each accused. Merely naming statutory sections or repeating their language is insufficient. A vague complaint that does not identify the acts attributed to the persons prosecuted cannot support their continued prosecution on those general assertions alone.	56
Police inaction — complaint inquiry and the Magistrate's prima facie assessment	An informant may present a complaint to the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC when police take no action. The complaint is dealt with under Chapter XV. If it discloses no offence warranting further action, the Magistrate may dismiss it under Section 203; where the complaint and recorded evidence prima facie disclose an offence, the Magistrate may take cognizance and issue process.	57
Complainant's office-bearer status in a society and criminal locus standi	Unless a statutory provision restricts who may complain, any person may set the criminal law in motion. Current office-bearer status in a society is not necessary to report alleged forgery, misappropriation or other criminal acts concerning its affairs. The Court therefore rejected the objection based on the complainant's disputed presidency and the cancellation of competing society bodies; those disputes did not prevent cognizance of the alleged offences.	86
Complaint inquiry after refusal of a Section 156(3) CrPC request	Refusal to direct police investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC did not end the matter merely because no separate Section 200 complaint had been filed. In this case, the Magistrate was to proceed with the complaint by recording the complainant's and witnesses' statements under Sections 200 and 202. The Court upheld that procedural course and rejected the challenge to the resulting cognizance order.	86
Magistrate complaint as a remedy for police inaction	Where the police do not act on information of an offence, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must examine the complaint through the statutory inquiry process and may dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or take	92 cognizance and issue process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence. In this case, liberty was granted to use Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.

Magistrate's complaint process where police have taken no action	Where police take no action on information of an offence, the informant may present a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must inquire into it through the prescribed complaint procedure, may dismiss it under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed, and may issue process where the complaint and evidence establish a prima facie offence. The reproduced authority also recognises a direction for police investigation and report where appropriate.	128
Magistrate complaint remedy where police fail to register an FIR	A person aggrieved by police failure to register an FIR may file a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. Applying Aleque Padamsee and Divine Retreat Centre, the Court dismissed the Section 482 application for an FIR direction as not maintainable, with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200. The reproduced complaint procedure permits inquiry and issue of process on a prima facie case, or dismissal under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed.	136
Recourse under Sections 154(3) and 156(3) CrPC for police inaction	Where a police station does not register an FIR, the aggrieved person may apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC. If the grievance remains, an application may be made to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). Applying Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe, the Court recognised that this remedy also addresses a registered FIR in which proper investigation is not being conducted, subject to the Magistrate's prima facie satisfaction.	136
Magistrate’s powers on a complaint following police inaction	When the police take no action on information, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must inquire into the complaint under Chapter XV and may dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, issue process where a prima facie offence is made out, or direct police investigation at the appropriate stage.	140
Private complaint following police inaction	When the police take no action on information, the informant may file a complaint under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC before the competent Magistrate. After inquiry under Chapter XV, the Magistrate may dismiss a complaint disclosing no offence under Section 203, issue process on a prima facie offence, or direct police investigation at the appropriate stage.	143
Magistrate’s remedy for a separate complaint of police or EOW inaction	A grievance that the police or EOW have not acted on a complaint ordinarily requires use of the statutory Magistrate remedy rather than a writ compelling FIR registration. Liberty was granted to move the Magistrate under Section 156(3) CrPC or Section 175(3) BNSS. The Magistrate remained free to consider Section 210 CrPC or Section 233 BNSS concerning a complaint and a police investigation relating to the same offence.	147
Magistrate’s inquiry on a complaint after police inaction	On a complaint under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC following police inaction, the competent Magistrate must inquire under Chapter XV. The Magistrate may dismiss the complaint under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, issue process where a prima facie offence appears, or direct police investigation at the appropriate stage.	147
Magistrate complaint when police take no action	When police fail to act on information, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The complaint is then examined through the statutory inquiry procedure: it may be dismissed under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or process may issue where the complaint and evidence prima facie disclose an offence. The Court preserved the petitioner's complaint remedy under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	154

Magistrate for police inaction	competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate examines it through the statutory inquiry procedure, may dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or issue process where the complaint and evidence prima facie disclose an offence. Applying the cited complaint-remedy authorities, the Court dismissed this petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 223 BNSS.
Magistrate's complaint jurisdiction after police inaction	Where police take no action on information, the informant may complain to the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. Under the procedure described in the relied-upon authority, the Magistrate inquires into the complaint and evidence, may direct police investigation where appropriate, may dismiss a complaint disclosing no basis for further action under Section 203, or may take cognizance and issue process where a prima facie offence is disclosed.	185
Complaint proceedings before a Magistrate after police inaction	When the police take no action on information, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The relied-upon authority describes inquiry under Chapter XV, assessment of the evidence and, where appropriate, a direction for police investigation, dismissal under Section 203 or issue of process on a prima facie offence. This complaint procedure supplied the alternative remedy preserved by the High Court.	187
Standing to set criminal law in motion	Any person with knowledge of an offence may ordinarily set criminal law in motion, even without a personal interest in the matter. The rule is subject to statutory restrictions on the eligible complainant, including those contemplated by Sections 195–198 CrPC. No provision requiring a complainant of a specified official rank was shown for the alleged cooperative-society financial offences.	197
Complaint survives FIR registration under Section 156(3) CrPC	Registration of an FIR pursuant to an order under Section 156(3) CrPC does not by itself exhaust the pending complaint. The Magistrate cannot dismiss it merely because the FIR has been registered and must proceed according to law after receiving the police report.	200
Private-complaint remedy when police do not register an offence	Where the grievance was police failure to register an offence, the Court declined to issue a registration direction under Section 528 BNSS and dismissed the application as not maintainable. It left the applicant free to approach the jurisdictional Magistrate by a complaint under Section 200 CrPC, identified in the order with Section 223 BNSS, without deciding whether the alleged offence was proved.	255
Section 202(2) inquiry: examination of material complaint witnesses	Non-examination of every witness named in a complaint does not by itself deprive the Magistrate of jurisdiction to take cognizance and issue process. The proviso to Section 202(2) CrPC concerns the complainant's material witnesses; the Magistrate must still be satisfied that the evidence examined makes out a prima facie case.	281
Limited prima facie inquiry under Sections 202–204 CrPC	A complaint inquiry under Section 202 CrPC determines whether there is sufficient ground to issue process, while guarding against false or vexatious accusations. It is not a trial to determine guilt, and the evidence must not be weighed meticulously as at final adjudication. The sufficient-ground test under Sections 203, 204 and 209 asks whether a prima facie case exists, with a threshold distinct from framing a charge. The revisional court exceeded that limit by closely reappraising the material to discharge the accused from the SC/ST counts.	296
Section 156(3) CrPC — affidavit incorporating the complaint	An affidavit solemnly affirming that the complaint's contents are true to the complainant's personal knowledge and that the affidavit forms part of the complaint satisfies the safeguard in Priyanka Srivastava. Repeating every allegation within the affidavit is unnecessary. A false affirmation can expose the deponent to prosecution for a false affidavit.	314

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 156(3) application — prior police approaches and supporting documents	The relied-upon directions in Priyanka Srivastava require an application under Section 156(3) CrPC to disclose prior approaches under Sections 154(1) and 154(3), with the supporting documents filed. The application must also be supported by a duly sworn affidavit, and the Magistrate may verify the allegations in an appropriate case.	314
Section 343 CrPC — procedure on a court complaint under Section 340	The Magistrate receiving a complaint under Section 340 CrPC proceeds under Section 343 as if the case were instituted on a police report. In the warrant-case setting described in the passage from British v. State of Maharashtra relied upon by the High Court, the procedure under Sections 238–243 applies. The accused can contest the allegations and seek discharge at the prescribed stage.	320
Section 528 BNSS — statutory complaint remedy where police do not register an FIR	An application invoking the High Court's inherent jurisdiction merely to direct registration of an FIR was dismissed because the aggrieved applicant could pursue the statutory Magistrate remedy. Liberty was expressly reserved to approach the competent Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS. The dismissal did not decide the merits of the underlying allegations.	338
Private complaint — Magistrate's inquiry and decision on process	When police do not act on information, the complainant may lay a complaint before the Magistrate having jurisdiction under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must examine the complaint through the prescribed inquiry. If no offence is disclosed, the complaint may be dismissed under Section 203; where the complaint and recorded evidence prima facie disclose an offence, the Magistrate may proceed to issue process.	338
Section 156(3) CrPC — investigation direction requires FIR registration	Before taking cognizance, an empowered Magistrate may order police investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC without examining the complainant on oath. Where the complaint discloses a cognizable offence, the police must register an FIR before taking the investigative steps under Chapter XII, even if the Magistrate has not expressly directed registration. Such investigation concludes with the police report under Section 173 CrPC.	343
Non-registration of FIR — remedies before the Magistrate	A complainant alleging police failure to register an FIR has an efficacious alternative remedy by approaching the competent Magistrate under Section 156(3) CrPC or by filing a complaint under Section 200 CrPC. In view of those remedies, the High Court declined to issue further directions under Section 482 CrPC without examining the merits of the complaint.	343
Section 202(1) CrPC — police assistance after cognizance	If the Magistrate does not order investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Magistrate may take cognizance and proceed under Chapter XV. After recording the statements of the complainant and witnesses, the Magistrate may seek police assistance through an inquiry under Section 202(1) CrPC. This post-cognizance procedure is distinct from a pre-cognizance investigation under Section 156(3).	343
Magistrate Complaint as the Remedy for Police Non-Registration	Where police allegedly failed to act on accusations against the deceased woman's husband and parents-in-law, the Court declined to direct FIR registration in an application under Section 528 BNSS. It left the applicant free to approach the competent Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS for redress.	408
Magistrate's Options on a Complaint Following Police Inaction	On a private complaint after police inaction, the competent Magistrate must follow the complaint-inquiry procedure. Depending on the complaint and evidence, the Magistrate may direct investigation and a report, dismiss the complaint if no offence is disclosed, or issue process where a prima facie offence is shown.	408
Complaint before the Magistrate following police inaction	Where police take no action on information about an offence, the informant may complain to the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must deal with the complaint through the prescribed inquiry and, according to the prima facie material and the applicable statutory	430 stage, may direct investigation and a report, dismiss the complaint under Section 203, or issue process. Recourse to the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS remains available when the FIR-registration writ is dismissed.

Police inaction: Magistrate remedy and limits on writ mandamus	Where information discloses a cognizable offence, the police must register an FIR. Police inaction does not, however, ordinarily entitle the informant to a writ directing registration without using the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. The Court applied this distinction, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule, and dismissed the petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 223 BNSS. It did not decide whether the allegations disclosed an offence.	440
Accused participation before issue of process in a CrPC complaint inquiry	The adopted CrPC precedent distinguishes attendance from participation before process issues in a complaint case. Subject to specified statutory opportunities, the proposed accused has no right to participate before process under Section 204; if an inquiry is postponed under Section 202, the accused may attend but cannot participate. This proposition concerns the reproduced CrPC scheme and does not determine any separate hearing requirement under Section 223 BNSS.	440
Magistrate remedy for police inaction in registering an FIR	Police must register information disclosing a cognizable offence, but that duty does not ordinarily entitle an informant to bypass the available statutory remedies and obtain an immediate High Court direction. Applying the narrated CrPC and writ authorities to a Section 528 BNSS application alleging police inaction, the Court dismissed it with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS. The recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule remain; the order did not determine the merits of the complaint or whether it disclosed an offence.	446
Contested defence affidavits at the complaint-process stage	An affidavit attributed to the complainant's relatives, relied on to contradict the complaint, was a matter of defence to be proved by examining witnesses at trial. It did not require the High Court to set aside a cognizance order otherwise supported by sufficient prima facie material. A disputed defence is not finally determined in the limited inquiry into whether process should issue.	464
Statutory remedies for police inaction in registering or investigating an offence	An aggrieved informant may approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if that does not resolve the grievance, the Magistrate under Section 156(3). A complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 is also an available statutory route. The Court dismissed this writ petition while preserving liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS, without deciding whether the allegations established an offence.	465
Magistrate's complaint remedy for a request to compel FIR registration	Where the applicant sought directions under Section 482 CrPC requiring an FIR and a charge-sheet during a pending merg inquiry, the Court declined interference because an efficacious criminal-complaint remedy was available before the competent Magistrate. It dismissed the application with liberty to pursue that remedy. The decision did not require police to adopt a predetermined prosecutorial outcome.	466
Police inaction — Magistrate complaint and investigation remedies	An informant may complain to the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC; the complaint may be dismissed under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or process issued where the evidence establishes a prima facie offence. After approaching the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), the informant may seek an order under Section 156(3) for FIR registration or proper investigation. A prima facie satisfied Magistrate may monitor investigation and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer, but cannot investigate personally. In this case, liberty was granted to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS.	471
Magistrate remedies	Police inaction may be pursued by a complaint under Sections 190 and 200	475

— Complaint, FIR direction and investigation monitoring	CrPC. The Magistrate inquires under Chapter XV and may dismiss under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed or issue process on a prima facie case. Where written recourse to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) is ineffective, an application under Section 156(3) may seek registration or proper investigation. A prima facie satisfied Magistrate may monitor investigation and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the police superior, but cannot investigate personally.
Complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC after police inaction	When information given to the police produces no action, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The passage from Divine Retreat Centre, reproducing Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, recognises inquiry into the complaint, appropriate police investigation before process, dismissal under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed for further action, or cognizance and process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence. The liberty to pursue this remedy does not itself establish the allegations or require issuance of process.	492
Police inaction — complaint before the competent Magistrate	On police inaction, the informant may file a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC before the competent Magistrate. The adopted passage from Divine Retreat Centre, quoting Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, recognises inquiry under Chapter XV, appropriate police investigation before process, dismissal under Section 203 if the complaint discloses no offence for further action, and cognizance and process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence. The High Court preserved liberty to file a criminal complaint without directing the Magistrate to accept the allegations or issue process.	494
Magistrate complaint remedy where police fail to act	Where the police do not act on information alleging an offence, the informant may file a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate considers the complaint under Chapter XV and may take the appropriate statutory course, including dismissal under Section 203, issue of process where warranted, or a direction for police investigation as explained in Divine Retreat Centre. Because this efficacious complaint remedy was available, the Court dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC seeking registration of an FIR, with liberty to approach the competent criminal court.	501
Superintendent of Police and Magistrate Remedies for Non-Registration or Improper Investigation	An informant may complain in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC if the police station does not register the FIR. If registration or proper investigation remains wanting, the informant may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration and proper investigation, monitor its progress and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the Superintendent of Police. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate. Liberty was granted to seek relief under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC.	533
Magistrate's Complaint Procedure when Police Fail to Act	Where the police do not act on information, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must examine the complaint through the procedure in Chapter XV. If the complaint does not disclose an offence warranting further action, it may be dismissed under Section 203. If the complaint and recorded evidence prima facie disclose an offence, process may issue. The relied-upon passage also recognises a direction for police investigation and a report instead of immediate process where appropriate.	533
Police inaction — complaint to the Magistrate and available judicial responses	Where police take no action on information received, the informant may lodge a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate enquires into it under Chapter XV. In the passage relied upon by the Court, the Magistrate may direct police investigation and a report, dismiss the complaint under Section 203 where it discloses no offence	543 warranting further action, or issue process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence.

Police inaction on a complaint: remedy before the Magistrate	For the grievance that police had not registered an FIR, the Court declined a direct registration direction under Section 482 CrPC and dismissed the application as not maintainable. The applicant retained the remedy of approaching the competent Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC, corresponding to Section 223 BNSS. The decision applied the statutory complaint and investigation remedies explained in the cited authorities; it did not decide whether the underlying allegations were true.	554
Magistrate's consideration of a private complaint after police inaction	A complainant may invoke Sections 190 and 200 CrPC before the Magistrate having jurisdiction. The complaint is examined under the statutory inquiry procedure. If it discloses no basis for further action, dismissal under Section 203 is available; if the complaint and recorded evidence prima facie disclose an offence, the Magistrate may proceed to cognizance and issuance of process in accordance with the Code.	554
Proposed accused's participation in a Section 202 CrPC inquiry	At the preliminary inquiry under Section 202 CrPC, the proposed accused has no right to intervene. The Magistrate's task is to examine the complainant's evidence and inquiry material to determine whether there are sufficient grounds to issue process, while safeguarding the interests of the absent proposed accused. This proposition concerns the CrPC inquiry considered in the judgment.	559
Statutory remedies for non-registration of an FIR	An informant complaining of police inaction should ordinarily use the statutory police-superior and Magistrate remedies instead of seeking a direct High Court direction to register an FIR. Applying the cited authorities, the Court dismissed the Section 482 application with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS. The duty to register cognizable information does not by itself establish entitlement to bypass those remedies through a High Court petition.	566
Magistrate's inquiry on a complaint of police inaction	The adopted complaint procedure allows the informant to approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate examines the complaint and evidence through the statutory inquiry process, may obtain police investigation and a report where appropriate, may dismiss the complaint under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or proceed with cognizance and process when a prima facie offence is shown.	566
Prima facie sufficiency and limits of inquiry before issue of process	Sufficient ground for proceeding means a prima facie case, not evidence sufficient to convict. Inquiry under Sections 200–204 CrPC is not a full trial and does not require meticulous weighing of evidence or final adjudication of a possible defence. On the complaint evidence, further inquiry into the Teak Certificate did not justify setting aside cognizance; proof that it was forged would provide additional evidence. The Magistrate was directed to proceed with the complaint.	585
Non-examination of every listed complaint witness under the proviso to Section 202(2) CrPC	The complainant need not examine every person named in the complaint or later witness list. The requirement concerns witnesses whom the complainant considers material to establish a prima facie case for process. Non-examination of one or more listed witnesses does not by itself deprive the Magistrate of jurisdiction to take cognizance and issue process when the required prima facie satisfaction exists.	585
Magistrate remedy for police failure to register an FIR	Failure by police to register an FIR ordinarily calls for the statutory remedies rather than a direct High Court direction. Applying the narrated authorities, the Court dismissed the Section 482 CrPC petition with liberty to approach the jurisdictional Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS. The police duty to register cognizable information is distinct from the route for redressing inaction. The Court did not determine the merits of the applicant's	595 complaint.

Magistrate's scrutiny of a complaint after police inaction	The remedy under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC allows a complainant to approach a Magistrate competent to take cognizance when police take no action. The narrated procedure requires inquiry under Chapter XV. If the complaint discloses no offence warranting further action, it may be dismissed under Section 203; where the complaint and recorded evidence disclose a prima facie offence, the Magistrate may issue process.	595
Magistrate complaint remedy for police inaction	Where police fail to act, a complainant may approach the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The relied-on Aleque Padamsee and Divine Retreat Centre passages describe inquiry into the complaint, appropriate investigation, issuance of process where prima facie grounds exist, or dismissal under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed. Here, the Section 528 BNSS application was dismissed with express liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS; no complaint was decided on its merits.	608
Magistrate complaint as a remedy for police inaction	A person aggrieved by police inaction may file a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate examines the complaint under Chapter XV and may dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed or issue process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence.	620
Magistrate complaint remedy for police non-registration	Where police do not act on information alleging an offence, the informant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate examines the complaint under Chapter XV, may dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or issue process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence. The Court left the petitioner free to use Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC.	627
Complaint to Magistrate as a remedy for police non-registration	If police fail to act on information alleging an offence, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate examines the complaint under Chapter XV and may dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed or issue process where a prima facie offence emerges. The Court expressly left the petitioner free to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	629
Police inaction on a complaint — statutory remedies ordinarily precede FIR-registration mandamus	Mandamus directing FIR registration may be declined where the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the recognised writ exceptions referred to in Shweta Bhadauria. Where an efficacious criminal-complaint remedy exists, the High Court may dismiss the writ petition with liberty to approach the competent Magistrate.	630
Magistrate's powers on a private complaint after police inaction	A complainant whose information has not led to police action may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must inquire into the complaint under Chapter XV and, on the assessment described in the reproduced precedent, may direct police investigation and a report, dismiss a complaint disclosing no offence under Section 203, or take cognizance and issue process where a prima facie offence is disclosed.	630
Proposed accused's participation before cognizance in a complaint case	A suspect or proposed accused has no right to participate in complaint proceedings before cognizance. The Court stated this while applying by analogy Debendra Nath Padhi's rule that an accused has no right to introduce defence material at the stage of framing charge.	641
Non-cognizable police report treated as a complaint	While considering possible action concerning alleged bigamy in the habeas corpus proceedings, the Court stated that the Explanation to Section 2(d) CrPC permits a police report concerning a non-cognizable offence to be treated as a complaint and the investigating officer as its complainant. It also stated that registration of an FIR for a non-cognizable offence was not barred, referring	642 instead to a bar at the court's cognizance stage. The Court left the police free to continue or close the investigation.

Private complaint when police fail to act on information	Where the police take no action on information, the informant may lodge a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate proceeds under Chapter XV, considers the complaint and evidence, and may issue process if an offence is prima facie disclosed or dismiss the complaint under Section 203 if no ground for further action is disclosed.	662
Police inaction — complaint remedy before the Magistrate	A complainant aggrieved by police inaction may invoke the Magistrate's complaint jurisdiction. The Aleque Padamsee and Divine Retreat Centre passages relied upon by the Court describe recourse under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. After the prescribed inquiry and evidence, the Magistrate may act on a prima facie offence, direct appropriate investigation as described in the reproduced passage, or dismiss a complaint disclosing no ground for further action. The High Court left the petitioner free to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS; it did not order cognizance or prejudge the complaint.	679
Section 2(d) CrPC — non-cognizable police report deemed a complaint	A police report which, after investigation, discloses commission of a non-cognizable offence is deemed a complaint under the Explanation to Section 2(d) CrPC, and the reporting officer is deemed the complainant. Removal of the other counts therefore did not require quashing the remaining Section 506 IPC allegation merely because it was non-cognizable; the charge-sheet was to be treated as a complaint for that offence.	685
Complaint before the Magistrate when police do not act	Where information given to the police is not acted upon, the complainant may proceed before the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The complaint is examined through the Chapter XV procedure. If it discloses no offence warranting further action, dismissal under Section 203 is available; where the complaint and recorded evidence prima facie disclose an offence, cognizance and issue of process are available.	697
Private complaint following police inaction — Magistrate's inquiry and available orders	Where police take no action on information supplied, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must inquire into the complaint under Chapter XV. The adopted passage describes the powers to direct police investigation and a report where a prima facie case is found, dismiss a complaint disclosing no offence under Section 203, or take cognizance and issue process where the complaint and evidence prima facie disclose an offence.	702
Magistrate's inquiry on a complaint of police inaction	When police do not act on information, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must inquire into the complaint under Chapter XV and, according to the prima facie material, may direct police investigation and a report, dismiss the complaint under Section 203, or take cognizance and issue process. The High Court's liberty to approach the Magistrate did not prescribe which outcome should follow.	710
Complaint inquiry when police take no action	An informant may file a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC when police do not act. The Magistrate must inquire under Chapter XV and assess whether the evidence warrants investigation and a report, dismissal under Section 203, or cognizance and issue of process. The Court's liberty to file a complaint left that statutory assessment to the Magistrate.	719
Police inaction — Magistrate's complaint inquiry, process and	The Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre passage reproduced through Divine Retreat Centre and relied upon by the Court explains the remedy when police take no action on information. The complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC, and the complaint	745 dismissal powers	is to be inquired into under Chapter XV. The reproduced rule describes the Magistrate's power to obtain police investigation and a report instead of immediately issuing process, to dismiss an unsupported complaint under Section 203, or to proceed where the complaint and recorded evidence prima facie disclose an offence. This statutory route supported dismissal of the writ with liberty to file a Section 200 complaint.

Magistrate complaint where police do not register an FIR	A person aggrieved by police inaction may lodge a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate considers it through the complaint procedure and the evidence presented, and may dismiss it under Section 203 if no ground for further action appears or issue process where the requisite case is disclosed. The High Court's operative liberty here was to pursue the complaint remedy under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS.	763
Magistrate complaint where police do not register an FIR	A person aggrieved by police inaction may lodge a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate considers it through the complaint procedure and the evidence presented, and may dismiss it under Section 203 if no ground for further action appears or issue process where the requisite case is disclosed. The High Court's operative liberty here was to pursue the complaint remedy under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS.	765
Magistrate's complaint procedure after police inaction	A person aggrieved by police inaction may lay a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate enquires into it under Chapter XV, may dismiss it under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed, or issue process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence. The Court preserved the applicant's liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS without prescribing the result.	786
Section 202(2) CrPC — examination of material complaint witnesses	The proviso to Section 202(2) CrPC does not require the complainant to examine every person named as a witness. The expression 'all his witnesses' refers to those the complainant considers material to establish a prima facie case. Non-examination of one or more listed witnesses does not by itself remove the Magistrate's jurisdiction to take cognizance and issue process if a prima facie case is otherwise established.	805
Section 482 CrPC — Complaint remedy for police inaction	Where the police do not act on a complaint, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Court declined to direct registration of an offence through Section 482 CrPC and left the applicant free to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	820
Section 156(3) CrPC — Registration and supervision of investigation	A person aggrieved by non-registration of an FIR may first complain in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if relief is not obtained, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor the investigation and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the senior police authority. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	820
Private complaint — Magistrate's inquiry and further action	On a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC, the competent Magistrate must inquire into it under Chapter XV. The reproduced authority describes recourse to police investigation and a report where a prima facie case is found, dismissal under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed, and issuance of process where the complaint and evidence prima facie disclose an offence.	820
Article 227 — Magistrate's complaint remedy for police inaction	Where police do not act on information alleging an offence, Sections 190 and 200 CrPC provide a complaint remedy before the competent Magistrate. The Court dismissed the Article 227 petition seeking a direct FIR and investigation direction, leaving the petitioner free to approach the Magistrate under Section	822

Section 156(3) CrPC — Registration and supervision of investigation	A person aggrieved by non-registration of an FIR may first complain in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if relief is not obtained, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor the investigation and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the senior police authority. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	822
Private complaint — Magistrate's inquiry and further action	On a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC, the competent Magistrate must inquire into it under Chapter XV. The reproduced authority describes recourse to police investigation and a report where a prima facie case is found, dismissal under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed, and issuance of process where the complaint and evidence prima facie disclose an offence.	822
Section 202(2) CrPC — Examination of material complaint witnesses	The complainant need not examine every witness named in the complaint or disclosed to the Magistrate. The word 'all' in the proviso to Section 202(2) is qualified by 'his' and requires examination of witnesses the complainant considers material to establish a prima facie case. Non-examination of some named witnesses does not, by itself, remove the Magistrate's jurisdiction to take cognizance and issue process where a prima facie case exists.	825
Section 156(3) CrPC — Registration and supervision of investigation	A person aggrieved by non-registration of an FIR may first complain in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if relief is not obtained, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor the investigation and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the senior police authority. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	826
Private complaint — Magistrate's inquiry and further action	On a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC, the competent Magistrate must inquire into it under Chapter XV. The reproduced authority describes recourse to police investigation and a report where a prima facie case is found, dismissal under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed, and issuance of process where the complaint and evidence prima facie disclose an offence.	826
Magistrate complaint remedy for police inaction	A person aggrieved by police inaction may place a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must inquire into it through the prescribed complaint procedure and may act on a prima facie case, issue process, direct police investigation where appropriate, or dismiss it under Section 203 if it discloses no basis for further action. The present petitioner was expressly left free to use the Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS complaint route; the High Court did not itself direct FIR registration or decide the alleged offences.	838
Police report deemed a complaint under Section 2(d) CrPC	Where a police officer's report discloses, after investigation, the commission of a non-cognizable offence, the explanation to Section 2(d) CrPC treats that report as a complaint and the reporting officer as the complainant. The Court applied this deeming provision while refusing to quash the FIR.	841
Magistrate complaint remedy for police inaction under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS	A person aggrieved by police inaction may present a complaint to the competent Magistrate. The Court granted liberty to invoke Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS. The adopted CrPC passages explain that the Magistrate examines the complaint under Chapter XV, may dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or may proceed on a prima facie case in accordance with the Code.	853
Police inaction: complaint before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC	Where police take no action on information, the informant may complain to the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate enquires under Chapter XV and, according to the prima facie material, may take cognizance and issue process, direct a police investigation and submission of a	863

Complaint before the Magistrate when police fail to act	A complainant aggrieved by police inaction may proceed before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The adopted Divine Retreat Centre passage explains that the complaint is considered under Chapter XV: the Magistrate may require police investigation and a report where appropriate, dismiss it under Section 203 if it discloses no offence, or proceed to issue process where the complaint and evidence prima facie disclose an offence. The High Court preserved recourse to Sections 200 and 202 while declining writ relief.	875
Police inaction — statutory remedies before seeking High Court directions	The police duty to register an FIR on cognizable information is distinct from the remedy for failure to perform that duty. An aggrieved informant may complain to the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The statutory course also includes approaching the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and, if registration or proper investigation remains unsatisfactory, applying to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). These remedies ordinarily govern both non-registration and deficient investigation after registration. In the applicant's Section 528 BNSS petition seeking fair investigation concerning a showroom-payment grievance, the Court declined direct relief and expressly left him free to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	887
Magistrate complaint as a remedy for police inaction	Where the police take no action on information alleging an offence, the complainant may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC. The Magistrate examines the complaint and evidence under the prescribed procedure and may direct investigation, dismiss a complaint disclosing no basis for further action, or issue process where the required prima facie case exists. The Court preserved the petitioners' liberty to seek redress under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.	921
Private complaint: inquiry, dismissal and issue of process	A person aggrieved by police inaction may present a complaint to the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The Magistrate must examine it through the prescribed complaint procedure. If no offence warranting further action is disclosed, the complaint may be dismissed under Section 203; where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence, the Magistrate may take cognizance and issue process in accordance with law. The dismissal of the writ leaves this statutory remedy available.	945
Police report disclosing a non-cognizable offence as a deemed complaint	Under the Explanation to Section 2(d) CrPC, a police officer's report which, after investigation, discloses a non-cognizable offence is deemed to be a complaint, and the reporting officer is deemed to be the complainant. The charge-sheet alleging Section 323 IPC against the applicants was accordingly treated as a complaint, with the investigating officer as complainant, after their objection to a joint trial succeeded. This determined the report's procedural status without deciding the assault allegation.	960
Complaint before the Magistrate for police inaction or an unsatisfactory inquiry	A person aggrieved by police inaction may file a complaint before the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The reproduced authorities describe inquiry under Chapter XV, investigation where warranted, dismissal under Section 203 where no offence is disclosed, or process where the complaint and evidence disclose a prima facie offence. For dissatisfaction with the Merg inquiry, the Court reserved a complaint under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS with an application under Section 156(3) CrPC/Section 175 BNSS. The Magistrate must decide according to law, uninfluenced by dismissal of the writ petition.	961
Corporate complainant and correction of its representative's	A special statute's eligibility requirements must be satisfied by the complainant. Where a company is the eligible de jure complainant, it necessarily acts through a natural person; the person who first represented it need not continue	966

authority	throughout the proceedings. The reproduced M.M.T.C. decision permits the company to cure an initial lack of representative authority by sending a competent authorised person later. The High Court relied on that distinction by analogy when permitting the Appropriate Authority to join the PCPNDT complaint.
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.5 Closure Report, Final Report and Magistrate Control
Informant's hearing on a closure report and accused's lack of cross-examination right	The opportunity of hearing recognised in Bhagwant Singh protects the complainant. Here, the complainant had raised no objection about his opportunity before the Magistrate. The accused could not use that safeguard to insist on the complainant's examination or claim a right to cross-examine him at the stage of rejecting the closure report and taking cognizance. The Court therefore rejected their objection and upheld cognizance.	97
Extent of reasons when rejecting a closure report and taking cognizance	A Magistrate rejecting a closure report and taking cognizance is not required to give detailed reasons. The High Court's fuller factual discussion in revision was confined to the need for sanction and the existence of prima facie material warranting prosecution; it was not to influence the trial court's independent assessment of the evidence.	97
Magistrate's options on a closure report and informant's right to be heard	On a police closure report, the Magistrate may accept the report and drop proceedings, disagree and take cognizance, or direct further investigation. Before declining cognizance and dropping proceedings wholly or against any person named in the FIR, the Magistrate must give the informant notice and an opportunity to be heard.	200
Rejected closure report and earlier police cooperation—bail assessment	The applicant's availability to police and the earlier closure report did not justify anticipatory bail in this case. The Court had already found the closure report unworthy of acceptance and considered that police had shown undue favour, rather than treating the report as an exoneration entitling the applicant to protection.	413
Partial rejection of a closure report where the complaint discloses rioting and property damage	A closure report need not be accepted for every offence merely because the police recommend closure. The complaint specifically alleged stone-pelting by five persons that damaged the house's wall and doors by ₹50 or more, supplying the basic allegation of mischief under Section 427 IPC and supporting the rioting allegation. The Court upheld rejection of closure and cognizance for Sections 147 and 427 IPC. It confined review to those offences because the complainant had not challenged acceptance of closure for Section 294 IPC and Section 3(1)(x) SC/ST Act.	428
Police report where investigation finds no substance in the complaint	If investigation shows that the complaint lacks substance, the investigating officer may submit an appropriate report or summary to the Magistrate. The Magistrate must then consider it through the prescribed procedure; the possibility of such a report does not require the Court to decide the merits prematurely in a quashing petition.	438
Internal Preliminary-Inquiry Reports and Judicial Scrutiny of Closure	The police could not treat their internal negative preliminary-inquiry reports as final exoneration while withholding them from the complainant and the Magistrate. In rejecting reliance on those reports, the Court required communication of the negative finding to the complainant and forwarding for judicial scrutiny, referring to Sections 157 and 169 CrPC and Section 189 BNSS. The reports had not attained finality merely because the officers formed an opinion that the accusation was false.	528
Closure report — complainant's hearing and the Magistrate's independent scrutiny	A police closure report is subject to judicial scrutiny. The complainant must be given an opportunity of hearing before the Magistrate decides whether to accept the report, take cognizance or direct further investigation. In the passage from Abhinandan Jha relied upon by the Court, the Magistrate may direct further	540

	investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC where the investigation is incomplete or unsatisfactory, and may take cognizance under Section 190(1)(b) where the reported facts disclose an offence despite the contrary police opinion. Fair investigation does not require a report favourable to the complainant.
Section 173(1) CrPC and Section 193 BNSS — completion without unnecessary delay	Investigation must be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely, but must decide whether an offence is made out and promptly submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet. The Court may require completion as early as possible and the steps required by law, without directing which conclusion the officer must reach.	704
Procedural return of a closure report is not rejection on merits	Returning a closure report because it was not presented through the competent police officer did not amount to accepting or rejecting it on merits. The CJM had required refiling through the Superintendent of Police under Police Regulation 737. That procedural return did not establish the appellant's asserted obligation on police to file a charge-sheet. The fresh report filed through the Superintendent of Police remained for the CJM's consideration.	714
Magistrate's options on a police final report	A Magistrate considering a police final report may accept closure, decline to accept it and direct further investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC where investigation is incomplete or unsatisfactory, or take cognizance under Section 190(1)(b) if the reported facts disclose an offence despite the police opinion. Further investigation may produce either a charge-sheet or another final report. Applying Abhinandan Jha, the Court left those choices to the CJM after an opportunity for the complainant to object.	714
Magistrate's assessment of a pending closure report	On a closure report, the Magistrate must consider whether the investigating officer's opinion is proper or the investigation remains incomplete and requires further investigation. The Magistrate may accept a closure report found to be proper. Filing the report alone does not conclude this judicial assessment.	798
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to with Section 193 BNSS, requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet. The direction to conclude investigation as early as possible preserves that statutory choice. A grievance may be brought before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	901
Section 173(1) CrPC — prompt completion and an appropriate final report	Investigation must be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet. The direction to conclude the pending investigation as early as possible did not predetermine its outcome. Any further grievance could be submitted to the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	906
Section 193(1) BNSS — assessment of unnecessary investigation delay	The lapse of two and a half months after registration of the FIR did not, on the circumstances presented, establish unnecessary delay warranting a direction under Section 193(1) BNSS. The Court declined such a direction for the time being, while permitting the applicant to return if the investigation was not completed within a reasonable period.	909
Prompt completion of investigation and submission of the appropriate final report	Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to alongside Section 193 BNSS, requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot keep it pending indefinitely, but must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate closure report or charge-sheet as early as possible. The Court directed lawful completion without prescribing the result and left the applicant free to submit a grievance to the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	937

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 173(1) CrPC — investigation must conclude without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires an investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must determine whether the evidence warrants a charge-sheet or a closure report and submit the appropriate final report. The Court directed early completion and necessary lawful steps without prescribing the investigation's result or a fixed deadline.	941
Prepared closure report: police cannot withhold filing pending complainant notice	Police cannot retain a prepared closure report on the ground that the complainant has not appeared or been served. Notice and an opportunity to object arise when the Magistrate considers the filed report. Where its preparation was known and prior orders required consideration, the Magistrate should have required its filing rather than proceed without it.	975
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.6 FIR Registration — Suspect's Pre-Registration Hearing and Notice
Hearing before a direction to report a criminal offence	A suspect has no right to a hearing before a criminal offence is reported or an FIR is registered under the CrPC. The Registrar's direction to initiate criminal action against a cooperative-society employee was therefore not invalid merely because the employee had not first been heard.	197
Proposed accused's right to a hearing before FIR registration	A proposed accused has no right to a hearing before registration of an offence. Applying that principle to the Collector's direction to lodge an FIR on a revenue inquiry report, the Court rejected the demand for a prior opportunity of hearing. The investigative stage does not ordinarily require prior notice to or participation by the accused in the absence of a statutory requirement.	240
FIR registration against police officers — no general right to a pre-registration hearing	Information disclosing a cognizable offence requires FIR registration, and the proposed accused has no general right to be heard before registration. Non-joinder of the police officers in the writ therefore did not prevent a direction to register the disclosed offences. The authorities applied also explain that an accused ordinarily has no participation right during investigation and need not be heard before further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC. A discretionary hearing in an appropriate judicial transfer proceeding is not an absolute pre-registration right.	546
Public servant's claimed right to explain assets before FIR registration	In the disproportionate-assets reasoning adopted through the cited authority, the accused public servant has no right to a mandatory preliminary opportunity to account for assets before FIR registration. The investigator collects material and may seek clarification, but is not required to adjudicate the sufficiency of the accused's accounting before filing the charge sheet. A mandatory pre-FIR right cannot be founded on such an asserted pre-charge-sheet entitlement.	785
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.7 Protest Petition and Complainant's Remedy after Final Report
Cognizance on a complaint or qualifying protest petition despite police closure	A police closure report, even after its acceptance, does not bar cognizance on a complaint or protest petition satisfying the requirements of a complaint under Section 190(1)(a) CrPC. The complainant may object to closure and lead complaint evidence; the Magistrate may proceed after recording statements under Sections 200 and 202 CrPC, as applicable.	200
Complaint treated as a protest petition against an adverse police opinion	In addressing the police's failure to submit its adverse preliminary-inquiry opinion, the Court held that the complainant's complaint could also be treated as a protest petition. Had the report been placed before the Magistrate, the Magistrate could have directed investigation or decided to hold an inquiry despite the police opinion.	314
Opportunity to object and lead evidence on a pending closure report	For the fresh closure report, the CJM was directed to serve notice if not already issued and give the complainant an opportunity to file objections and examine supporting witnesses. The report was then to be decided after hearing both sides. If a final order had already been passed, the complainant was free to	714

	pursue the remedies available in law.
Complaint and closure report: joint consideration required by prior directions	Where the High Court had directed consideration of the closure report with the complainant's private complaint as a protest petition, the Magistrate could not disregard those directions and dismiss the complaint without obtaining the report. The dismissal was set aside for fresh consideration of both in accordance with the prior orders, without prejudgment from the earlier dismissal.	975
Informant's notice and hearing before acceptance of a closure report	Before accepting a police report that would drop the proceedings or exclude persons named in the FIR, the Magistrate must notify the informant and provide an opportunity to be heard. The relied-upon direction also required access to the investigation report, witness statements and related documents in accordance with law before a final decision on closure.	975

Multiple FIRs, Counter-Cases and Cross-Cases

Cross-cases — same judge, separate evidence and separate judgments	Cross-cases arising from the same incident should be tried successively by the same judge, who records evidence and hears arguments in each, reserves judgment in each, and pronounces separate judgments one after the other. Each case must be decided on its own evidence and arguments, without importing evidence from the other. This procedure avoids conflicting judgments; the investigating officer must endeavour to distinguish truth from falsehood in the rival versions.	12
Allegation that an FIR is a counterblast does not alone justify quashing	The existence of an FIR by the accused side and the assertion that the opposing FIR is a counterblast do not by themselves justify quashing. Where the allegations in the impugned FIR disclose a cognizable offence, disputed rival accounts cannot be resolved by accepting the accused's defence at the quashing stage.	209
Separate FIRs from one raid — inference of mala fides	Registration of three FIRs under different statutes after a single house raid did not, by itself, establish mala fides. The Court considered the recovery of illicit liquor, ganja and a loaded unlicensed firearm and found no demonstrated illegality warranting transfer of the investigation. The holding concerns the claimed mala fides in this writ petition; it does not decide a general rule about the validity of successive FIRs arising from the same transaction.	321
Separate cheating transactions require separate FIRs despite a common scheme	Distinct transactions involving different cheated investors or traders constitute separate offences; a common scheme does not by itself make them one transaction. The Court held that police should have registered separate FIRs instead of treating one victim as complainant and the others merely as witnesses. It distinguished separate FIRs and reports from limited joinder for trial under the Code. Since co-accused had already been charge-sheeted, it issued no fresh registration direction in this case, but directed communication of the governing law to the DGP.	443
Interconnected offences on successive days — one transaction does not require separate FIRs	Obstruction and threats during electricity anti-theft repairs, followed by detection of electricity theft during the next day's inspection, were treated as interconnected incidents forming one transaction. Separate FIRs for offences forming that transaction were not permissible, and charges concerning the earlier incident could be framed in the same case.	631
Second FIR — distinct scope of community-incitement allegations	Although both FIRs arose from the same conversation, the first concerned personal and caste-related abuse of its recipient, while the second alleged a statement likely to incite offences between communities under Section 505 IPC, a provision absent from the first FIR. Applying the exception for FIRs with different scope, the Court held that the Section 505 investigation was not barred as a second FIR for the same offence.	686
Successive FIRs — test of sameness	To decide whether a later FIR is impermissibly repetitive, the Court examines	686

	the facts and circumstances of both reports and whether they concern the same occurrence or parts of the same transaction. A fresh FIR used to subject a person to repeated investigation of that transaction may be quashed, subject to recognised exceptions for genuinely different scope, incidents, rival versions or new discoveries.
Counter-complaint presenting a rival version of the same incident	The bar against a repetitive FIR does not prevent an aggrieved person or an accused named in the first FIR from lodging a counter-complaint giving a rival version of the incident. Both versions may be investigated; the first report cannot deprive the other side of the right to place its account before the police.	686
Later FIR based on new facts, a larger conspiracy or a separate incident	A later FIR may be permissible when investigation or other proceedings reveal previously unknown facts, a larger conspiracy, an offence distinct from the one first investigated, or a separate incident. Similarity of offences or an overlap in surrounding circumstances does not by itself resolve whether the later FIR has a distinct permissible scope.	686
Rival FIRs and the disputed identity of the aggressor	Where both sides alleged an incident on the same morning through opposing FIRs, the question whether the applicants or the complainant's side were the aggressors was a disputed question of fact. The High Court could not resolve that dispute under Section 482 CrPC or Section 528 BNSS merely because the applicants had also lodged their own FIR.	857
Earlier complaint not registered as an FIR — later FIR is not barred as a second FIR	An earlier complaint containing similar allegations does not bar registration of an FIR on a later complaint where the earlier complaint never culminated in an FIR. The rule against a second FIR for the same offence did not apply because no first FIR had been registered. The Court also rejected the claim of double jeopardy: the applicant had not previously been prosecuted and tried for the same offence. The later complaint could therefore lawfully lead to the FIR.	1001
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.9 Non-Cognizable Police Report Deemed Complaint — CrPC Section 2(d)
Police report disclosing a non-cognizable offence treated as a complaint	Under the Explanation to Section 2(d) CrPC, a police report disclosing, after investigation, commission of a non-cognizable offence is deemed a complaint, and the reporting police officer is deemed the complainant. The Court applied this as an alternative answer to the objection that the proceedings must fail if the Section 294 IPC offence were absent, while maintaining its finding that Section 294 was prima facie disclosed.	244
Police report deemed to be a complaint under Section 2(d) CrPC	Under the Explanation to Section 2(d) CrPC, a police report which, after investigation, discloses a non-cognizable offence is deemed to be a complaint, and the police officer making the report is deemed to be the complainant.	271
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.10 BNSS Section 175 Pre-Cognizance Investigation Direction — Section 223 Hearing Distinction
Section 175 BNSS investigation order and the Section 223(1) hearing requirement	An order directing investigation under Section 175 BNSS is made before cognizance. The Magistrate must apply judicial mind to whether such a direction is necessary, but the Section 223(1) hearing requirement does not apply to that pre-cognizance order. The Court rejected the applicants' objection that the Magistrate's investigation direction was invalid because they had not been heard under Section 223.	424
Section 223 BNSS hearing when proceeding on a complaint instead of directing police registration	Where the Magistrate, on considering an application for police action under Section 175(3) BNSS, finds no basis to direct FIR registration and proceeds on the complaint under Section 223, the first proviso to Section 223(1) requires an opportunity of hearing to the accused before cognizance. The Court criticised omission of the doctors sought to be prosecuted from the application. Its discussion distinguishes the complaint-cognizance stage from the request for a police-investigation direction.	588

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Sub-Chapter no. 6.11 FIR Forwarding to Magistrate — Section 157 CrPC Promptness and Evidentiary Effect
Section 157 CrPC — delayed forwarding of FIR and prejudice	Prompt forwarding of the FIR to the Magistrate is a public duty and an external check against manipulation. Delay must be assessed with the entire evidence and any explanation sought, but does not by itself prove ante-timing, vitiate the trial or require acquittal. Where the FIR was promptly recorded, investigation began on it and no prejudice from delayed forwarding was shown, the delay did not undermine the prosecution case.	12
Delayed forwarding of a timely FIR and recording of witness statements	Police delay in forwarding an FIR to the Magistrate under Section 157 CrPC or recording witness statements did not discredit the prosecution where the FIR had already been promptly registered with the relevant details, named the eyewitnesses, and contained no material contradiction with their statements. Those subsequent police delays could not be attributed to the complainant party.	21
FIR forwarding and immediate investigative steps	Failure to prove formal compliance with Section 157 CrPC was not fatal where the investigative machinery acted immediately after the FIR. Prompt medical examination of injured persons and dispatch of the body for post-mortem supported the conclusion that the FIR was not ante-timed. Such compliance cannot be treated as an automatic ground to reject every FIR.	165
Section 157(1) CrPC — FIR dispatch safeguard and consequence of non-compliance	Prompt dispatch of the FIR to the Magistrate provides an external check against deliberation, antedating and antetiming. 'Forthwith' requires reasonable dispatch in the circumstances, not a universal fixed interval. Non-compliance or delay does not automatically establish fabrication or defeat the prosecution, but requires close scrutiny of the remaining ocular and medical evidence. The dispatch duty rests on the investigating officer, not the first informant; extraordinary unexplained delay may cast doubt on the FIR's authenticity.	319
Delayed forwarding of an FIR as an evidentiary circumstance	Section 157 CrPC requires prompt forwarding of the FIR to the competent court to guard against later improvement and enable judicial oversight. Delay does not alone defeat an otherwise reliably proved prosecution, but must be weighed with the other evidence. Here the delay exceeding 24 hours, considered with serious contradictions in the prosecution account, substantially weakened its credibility.	716
	Chapter no. 7 Criminal Courts, Jurisdiction and Court Competence
	Sub-Chapter no. 7.1 Territorial and Subject-Matter Jurisdiction in Criminal Proceedings
Territorial jurisdiction over alleged continuing matrimonial cruelty	Section 178 CrPC permits inquiry or trial in any relevant local area where an offence continues across areas or comprises acts in different areas. On the allegations of continuing cruelty and intended remarriage, and noting that the husband's parents lived within the Adhartal police-station area, the Court upheld that station's jurisdiction to register and investigate the FIR despite the principal acts of cruelty having allegedly occurred in Arizona.	29
Territorial objection to an FIR and transfer of investigation	A dispute about the alleged place of matrimonial residence does not by itself justify quashing an otherwise cognizable FIR. Even assuming the spouses never stayed at the stated place, the appropriate consequence could be transfer of investigation to the police station having territorial jurisdiction. The Court left the disputed residence to evidence and did not finally identify the competent station.	39
Liberty petition at a High Court Bench while a connected PIL is pending at the	Where the entire cause of action arises within a Bench's territorial jurisdiction, a pending PIL at the Principal Seat does not require the Bench to decline a separate petition concerning personal liberty if the issues differ and conflicting decisions are not possible. The legality of arrest concerned the implementation	41

7.1 : Territorial and Subject-Matter Jurisdiction in Criminal Proceedings

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Principal Seat	of a law-and-order direction, whereas the PIL concerned permission to install a statue. The petitioner was therefore not required to file a new petition or an interlocutory application at the Principal Seat.
Section 179 CrPC — continuing consequences of matrimonial cruelty may found jurisdiction at the parental home	Where cruelty at the matrimonial home drives the wife to take shelter with her parents and its adverse mental consequences continue there, those consequences may themselves constitute cruelty under Section 498-A IPC at that place. The relied-upon decision in Rupali Devi treats such repeated consequences as attracting Section 179 CrPC. The proposition depends on continuing cruelty-related consequences, not merely on the wife's residence at another address.	76
Continuing mental cruelty and jurisdiction at the wife's parental home	Where matrimonial cruelty compels a wife to take shelter with her parents, the resulting mental trauma may continue there even though physical assaults do not recur at that place. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court treated the wife's compelled separation on account of physical and mental harassment and dowry demands as continuing cruelty at Jabalpur, giving a fresh cause of action each day. The Jabalpur police could accordingly register the FIR, investigate and file the charge-sheet despite the contention that the principal earlier acts occurred at Pune.	84
Territorial jurisdiction where a wife takes shelter after matrimonial cruelty	Where a wife takes shelter at her parental home because of matrimonial cruelty, its continuing mental consequences may give that place jurisdiction under Section 179 CrPC, depending on the facts. Here, the alleged compulsory residence at Datia with her child, pending fulfilment of the unlawful demand, formed part of the cruelty. Datia police therefore did not lack territorial jurisdiction merely because much of the alleged abuse occurred in Lucknow.	289
Section 126 CrPC — Actual residence and territorial jurisdiction in maintenance proceedings	A maintenance application under Section 125 CrPC may be filed in a district where the person proceeded against is, where he or his wife resides, or where he last resided with his wife or, as applicable, the mother of an illegitimate child. Residence need not be permanent: genuine residence for the time being may suffice. A casual stay, a flying visit or an address assumed solely to create jurisdiction does not. The wife’s parental home and occasional visits to Gwalior did not establish residence there when she and her daughter actually lived in Delhi and the spouses had not last lived together in Gwalior. The Gwalior proceeding lacked territorial jurisdiction; liberty remained to apply before a competent court.	350
Section 126 CrPC — Effect of a subsequent transfer on jurisdiction	Where the wife’s residence at the time of filing gives a court jurisdiction under Section 126 CrPC, that court does not lose jurisdiction merely because she is subsequently transferred elsewhere. This observation does not permit filing at a place where she was not residing when the application was instituted.	350
Sections 177–178 CrPC — Territorial jurisdiction where alleged acts occur in different areas	Where an offence is committed partly in different local areas or consists of acts done in different areas, Section 178 CrPC permits inquiry or trial in any of those areas. On the FIR’s allegations, job-offer calls received by the complainant in Morena induced her to travel to Delhi, where the alleged assault and threat occurred. The Court treated that inducement as part of the transaction and upheld registration of the FIR at Morena. The alleged physical act having occurred in Delhi did not, on that account alone, require Morena police to register a zero FIR and transfer the case.	353
Local property transactions supporting police territorial jurisdiction	The company's registered office and asserted decision-making at Noida did not exclude Sirol police jurisdiction over alleged sham sale deeds executed in Gwalior concerning a township within that station's area. The Court found the alleged offence territorially connected to Gwalior. Even assuming a Noida decision formed part of the offence, each police station connected to a part could investigate. It therefore rejected the territorial objection at the Section 482 stage, without finally determining the fraud allegations.	447

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Alternative territorial venues under Sections 177–179 CrPC	The adopted territorial-venue authority states that an offence is ordinarily inquired into and tried where committed. Where its location is uncertain, it is committed partly in different areas, continues across areas or consists of acts in different areas, a court in any qualifying area may inquire into or try it under Section 178. Where an act constitutes an offence by reason of both the act and its consequence, Section 179 permits venue where either occurred. The Court used those principles to support rejection of the investigation-jurisdiction objection.	447
Section 498-A IPC — Continuing mental cruelty and parental-home jurisdiction	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC includes mental suffering. Where cruelty drives a wife from the matrimonial home to her parents, the resulting trauma and psychological distress may continue there even without a fresh physical act at that place. Compelling her to remain at the parental home on account of cruelty was treated as continuing cruelty. Applying Rupali Devi and the Court's Amar Singh decision to the allegations, Mahila Thana, Bhopal also had territorial jurisdiction to investigate while the complainant was residing there. The holding was not based on residence alone.	476
Territorial jurisdiction — continuing mental cruelty at the wife's parental home	Under Section 178 CrPC, an offence occurring partly in different local areas may be inquired into or tried by a court having jurisdiction over any such area. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court held that mental cruelty can continue at the parental home where a wife has been compelled to take shelter after dowry-related expulsion, even if the earlier physical acts occurred elsewhere. The allegations of continued forced residence at Gwalior, together with a renewed dowry demand there, supported the jurisdiction of the Gwalior Mahila Thana to investigate.	549
Territorial jurisdiction where continuing cruelty affects the wife at her parental home	Where dowry-related expulsion from the matrimonial home continues to cause mental cruelty while the wife is compelled to live at her parental home, part of the cause of action arises there. The allegation that the physical acts occurred in Delhi therefore did not exclude Bhopal's territorial connection. Mahila Thana, Bhopal had jurisdiction to investigate, and its charge-sheet could not be quashed as having been filed without jurisdiction on that ground.	926
	Sub-Chapter no. 7.2 Magistrate, Sessions Court and Special Court Competence
Direct cognizance by the Special Court after amendment of Section 14	Distinguishing the earlier committal requirement from the amended Section 14, the Court stated that, after 1 January 2016, the Special Judge could take cognizance of SC/ST Act offences as a court of original jurisdiction and a complaint before the Magistrate would not be maintainable. That later position did not govern the validity of the complaint and summons issued in 2012.	241
Section 193 CrPC after a committal without a merits decision	The Sessions Court retains its Section 193 CrPC power where the committal Magistrate has not decided on the merits whether persons omitted from the charge-sheet should be summoned. Here, the Magistrate declined the Section 190 application solely because the offence was Sessions triable and left the involvement question to that court. This was passive committal, so the Sessions Court's refusal to exercise Section 193 was set aside and cognizance directed.	606
Effect of a Magistrate's merits rejection of summoning omitted accused	Where the Magistrate has actively considered and rejected on the merits a request to proceed against persons omitted from the charge-sheet, the Sessions Court cannot ordinarily entertain the same application again under Section 193 CrPC. Applying Balveer Singh, the Court stated that the Sessions Court would then have to resort to Section 319 on the requisite trial evidence. That limitation did not apply here because the committal order had expressly left the merits open.	606

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Sub-Chapter no. 7.3 Committal, Transfer and Case Allocation
Cognizance of dacoity — case must be committed to the Sessions Court for trial	Where the material warrants cognizance of the offence under Section 395 IPC, the case must be committed to the Sessions Court because that offence is triable by that court. After correcting the refusal to take cognizance, the High Court directed the Magistrate to commit the case accordingly.	74
Appearance of accused before committal of an SC/ST Act complaint	For the complaint validly instituted before the Magistrate under the pre-amendment procedure, the case had to be committed to the Special Court for trial. The Magistrate could not commit it without the accused's appearance; entertaining the complaint and issuing summons to secure that appearance was therefore lawful.	241
Adverse bail orders alone do not justify transfer of criminal trial	Transfer requires circumstances giving rise to an apprehension of injustice that appears reasonable to the Court; proof that justice will inevitably fail is unnecessary, but a subjective or imaginary apprehension is insufficient. An adverse bail order does not by itself establish bias or justify transfer. An allegedly erroneous bail grant should be challenged before the proper superior forum; failure to challenge it did not support a real apprehension warranting transfer in this case.	245
Transfer request does not itself require the trial judge to recuse	The filing of a transfer application and unsupported allegations against a trial judge do not, by themselves, oblige the judge to decline the trial. When asked for comments, the judge may answer the allegations and continue performing judicial duties. Transfer should not be based merely on the judge's refusal to accept such allegations or used to enable a litigant to select a more comfortable court.	245
Whose convenience matters in transfer of a criminal case	Convenience relevant to criminal transfer is assessed with reference to the prosecution, the other accused, the witnesses and the larger societal interest, rather than the applicant's convenience alone. The question of transfer depends on the circumstances of each case and cannot be decided by an inflexible rule.	245
	Chapter no. 8 Cognizance, Summoning, Process and Pre-Trial Court Control
	Sub-Chapter no. 8.1 Warrants, Proclamation and Attachment
WhatsApp transmission in place of executing an arrest warrant	In addressing the unexecuted warrant against a prosecution witness, the Court considered the SSP's reply that the officers should have executed the warrant and that forwarding it to the person by WhatsApp was not the prescribed procedure. The Court required further compliance before the trial court and a report on action against the responsible police personnel.	184
	Sub-Chapter no. 8.2 Cognizance by Magistrate and Application of Mind
Section 13 Notaries Act objection to a mixed-offence police charge-sheet	In a revision concerning a notary prosecuted with other accused for alleged cheating and forgery, the Court rejected the argument that Section 13 of the Notaries Act required the charge-sheet to be quashed for want of an authorised officer's complaint. Applying Section 2(d) CrPC and the reasoning in Ushaben, it treated the police charge-sheet as a complaint. It also held, in the alternative, that an assumed defect in the investigating officer's competence did not by itself justify quashing.	271
Cognizance is taken of the offence rather than each offender	A criminal court takes cognizance of the offence, not separately of each offender. Once cognizance of the offence has been taken, it need not be taken afresh against every accused.	271

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Civil judgment: relevance at cognizance without binding criminal findings	Civil findings do not ordinarily bind the criminal court, which must decide the case on its own evidence and the applicable criminal standard of proof. The relevance and effect of a prior judgment remain governed by Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act. Here, the civil court's reasoned suspicion about the death certificate could support prima facie consideration of the complaint without conclusively establishing forgery or guilt.	281
Judicial application of mind before issuing process on a complaint	Taking cognizance on a complaint and issuing process requires judicial application of mind to whether the allegations, recorded statements and inquiry material disclose an offence calling for the accused's appearance. Summoning is a serious step and cannot be mechanical. That requirement does not authorise a conviction-level assessment of the evidence at the process stage.	296
Section 156(3) CrPC — investigation direction before cognizance	A Magistrate may direct investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC before taking cognizance. In reconsidering the complaint on remand, reappreciation of the existing material sufficed. The Court rejected a requirement to collect additional complaint evidence first, reasoning that this would move the matter beyond the pre-cognizance stage and require proceeding under Section 200 CrPC.	314
Private complaint: application of mind before issuing process	Before issuing process on a complaint, the Magistrate must apply judicial mind to the allegations, the statements recorded and the inquiry material, and decide whether they disclose an offence and sufficient grounds to proceed. Summoning a person into criminal proceedings is a serious judicial act, not a mechanical step. This scrutiny remains preliminary and does not determine the ultimate truth of disputed allegations.	559
Section 186 IPC — written public-servant complaint required by Section 195(1)(a)(i) CrPC	Section 195(1)(a)(i) CrPC bars cognizance of offences under Sections 172–188 IPC, their abetment or attempted commission, and conspiracy to commit them, except on a written complaint by the concerned public servant or a public servant to whom that officer is administratively subordinate. In the absence of the required complaint, cognizance of Section 186 IPC could not be taken and its charge could not be framed.	631
Section 195 CrPC — distinct Section 353 IPC offence remains triable despite overlapping obstruction allegations	Sections 186 and 353 IPC create distinct offences. Section 186 concerns voluntary obstruction of a public servant in public functions; Section 353 requires assault or criminal force while the public servant performs official duty and is cognizable. Section 195 CrPC does not bar trial for a distinct offence outside its scope merely because the same facts also disclose an offence covered by it. Absence of the complaint required for Section 186 therefore did not bar trial under Section 353; the charges under Section 506 Part II IPC and Section 135 of the Electricity Act also remained.	631
Bigamy allegations and proof of marriage rituals at cognizance	At the stage of cognizance of alleged bigamy, the complainant need not establish the actual performance of Saptapadi or prove the second marriage as required at trial. Applying K. Neelaveni, the Court stated that allegations of a second marriage during the subsistence of the first were sufficient for cognizance under Section 494 IPC or Section 82 BNS. This observation arose in habeas corpus proceedings in which the alleged second marriage was disputed.	642
Section 190 CrPC— judicial sufficiency review without weighing evidence	At cognizance, a Magistrate may refuse to proceed if the complaint, case diary, witness statements and other material disclose no offence. This is a judicial assessment of the material, but it does not permit the Magistrate to decide which evidence is acceptable or reliable, or to weigh the balance of probabilities. The Court relied on the reproduced rule in Ajay Kumar Parmar when rejecting the preliminary evaluation of disputed evidence.	812
Cognizance on a police report containing Sections	In Ushaben, whose reasoning the Court reproduced and relied upon, Section 198-A CrPC permitted cognizance of an offence under Section 498-A IPC on a police report. Where the complaint also alleged the cognizable offence under	841

498-A and 494 IPC allegations	Section 498-A along with Section 494 IPC, cognizance could be taken on the police report; the police could investigate both allegations. The reproduced decision distinguished a prosecution confined to offences under Chapter XX IPC requiring an aggrieved person's complaint.
Summoning an uncharge-sheeted person under Section 190 CrPC	Cognizance is taken of an offence, rather than only of the persons sent for trial by the police. A Magistrate may issue process against another person implicated by the available material even after process has been issued against some accused, without waiting for the Section 319 CrPC stage. In this Magistrate-triable case, the FIR's specific allegation against the applicant supported recourse to Section 190 even assuming that trial evidence had not begun.	983

Summoning of Accused and Prima Facie Satisfaction

Summoning distant relatives — specific role and supporting material	Mere naming of a husband's distant relatives is insufficient to summon them in dowry-related proceedings. The court must identify a specific role supported by tangible material. General allegations against all family members, particularly brothers, sisters and other relatives, require scrutiny to determine whether harassment is attributed to each person named.	69
Complaint-stage inquiry: sufficient grounds to proceed, not proof to convict	At the stage of Sections 203 and 204 CrPC, the Magistrate considers whether the complaint and preliminary evidence disclose sufficient prima facie grounds to proceed. The inquiry is not a full trial and does not require evidence sufficient for conviction. A possible defence is ordinarily left to the appropriate later stage; the evidence is not to be weighed as at trial.	281
Prima facie sufficient ground for complaint process and limits of evidence scrutiny	Sufficient ground under Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC means a prima facie case for proceeding, rather than evidence sufficient for conviction. Applying Shivjee Singh and the passages from Chandra Deo Singh, Kewal Krishan and Mohinder Singh reproduced in it, the Court held that the complaint inquiry does not permit meticulous trial-like weighing of evidence or adjudication of the accused's defence. Process may be refused where the complainant's evidence is self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy. Here the complaint and Section 200 statement prima facie disclosed Section 498-A IPC cruelty, so the merits did not warrant interference.	425
Prima facie cognizance and limits of weighing rival witness accounts	Sufficient ground under Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC means a prima facie case to proceed, rather than proof sufficient for conviction. Applying Shivjee Singh and its Chandra Deo Singh, Kewal Krishan and Mohinder Singh passages, the Court declined meticulous appreciation of evidence at cognizance. The accused's reliance on affidavits denying the incident and an alleged ulterior motive did not require a full trial of those disputes at this stage. The preliminary threshold nevertheless permits refusal of process where the complainant's evidence is self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy. No ground for interference with the cognizance order was found here.	428
Prima facie grounds for process on a private complaint	The sufficient-ground inquiry under Sections 203–204 CrPC concerns a prima facie case, rather than proof sufficient for conviction. The Magistrate considers the complaint and evidence under Sections 200 and 202 without meticulously weighing them as at trial; even the charge-framing standard is distinct. Here, the reported expenditure for a well not found on site and the mismatch with the amount credited to the complainant supplied sufficient prima facie material to uphold cognizance.	464
Section 202 CrPC inquiry: sufficient grounds to proceed, not proof of guilt	The inquiry under Section 202 CrPC is limited to deciding whether a prima facie case justifies process and preventing false, vexatious or harassing complaints from proceeding. The Magistrate must elicit the relevant facts both to protect an absent proposed accused and to bring alleged offenders to trial where justified. The evidence is not weighed as in a full trial. Sufficient ground	559

	for process under Sections 203–204 is distinct from sufficient proof for conviction; the preliminary standard is also different from that governing framing of charge.
Proof of a receipt not required by law to be attested	Under Section 72 of the Evidence Act, a document not legally required to be attested may be proved as an unattested document even if it bears attestation. Examination of the receipt's attesting witnesses was therefore unnecessary. The revisional court erred in setting aside cognizance on the ground that those witnesses had not been examined.	585
Unproved alibi material and cognizance against persons omitted from the charge-sheet	Defence material not establishing an accused's absence cannot be treated as conclusive so as to defeat cognizance merely because the police relied on it to omit that person from the charge-sheet. Applying the alibi reasoning narrated in Harjinder Singh, the Court found the medical prescription, statements and CCTV material insufficient against the specific accusation of shooting. It directed cognizance under Section 193 CrPC, without determining guilt or applying Section 319's separate evidentiary trigger.	606
Later summoning of the company as an additional accused	The company's initial non-joinder did not require quashing of the prosecution against the applicant in this case. The Court stated that the company could be impleaded later through the powers to summon an additional accused under Sections 190, 193 and 319 CrPC. It therefore rejected non-joinder as a ground for interference.	617
Sections 203–204 CrPC — prima facie grounds for issuing process	Sufficient ground for proceeding means a prima facie case against the accused, rather than evidence sufficient for conviction. At the preliminary inquiry, the Magistrate should not conduct a full trial or weigh evidence meticulously as at trial or charge-framing. Where the complainant and her witness supplied only suspicion without substantial material connecting the respondent to the homicide, dismissal of the complaint under Section 203 CrPC was justified.	805
Non-expert witness — bare suspicion of the offender's identity	A non-expert witness's bare opinion that a particular person committed the offence does not supply a legal basis for proceeding against that person. The Section 202 witness merely expressed suspicion against the respondent, and that opinion did not establish sufficient grounds to issue process.	805
Issue of process — prima facie evidence and a possible defence	Where prima facie evidence supports the complaint, process should issue even if the proposed accused may have a defence, which must be decided at the appropriate stage. In the relied-upon formulation, process may be refused where the complainant's evidence is self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy.	805
Issue of process — Sufficient ground and prima facie satisfaction	Sufficient ground under Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC means a prima facie case for proceeding, not proof sufficient for conviction. The Section 202 inquiry is limited to that question and is not a full trial or meticulous weighing of evidence; its standard also differs from that at framing of charge. Where prima facie evidence exists, process must issue and the defence is left for the appropriate stage. Self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy complainant evidence may justify refusal of process.	825
Materials supporting process against a person omitted from the police report	When considering process against a person not sent for trial by the police, the Magistrate must examine material indicating that person's involvement. The material is not confined to the FIR, charge sheet or police report; a statement recorded under Section 164 CrPC may also be considered.	983

	Chapter no. 9 Investigation, Further Investigation, Reinvestigation and Case Diary
	Sub-Chapter no. 9.1 Investigation Control, Agency Selection and Limits on Accused's Role
Investigation directions — accused's hearing is not required as a matter of course	An accused is not entitled, as a matter of course, to be heard in a writ petition seeking an impartial investigation. The relied-upon authority also states that an accused has no right to be heard at the investigation stage. Non-impleadment or absence of a hearing does not, by itself, render a justified order entrusting investigation to the CBI a nullity.	4
Accused's role — no right to dictate investigation or select an agency	An accused cannot require the police to investigate in a particular manner, choose an investigating agency or adopt the accused's alternative account of events merely by seeking a fair investigation. In the absence of a specific allegation of investigative mala fides, the Court declined to direct the police to investigate the applicant's account of the complainant's movements and refused to interfere with rejection of his Section 156(3) CrPC application. The relied-upon principles preserve Article 226 directions where the High Court is satisfied that investigative powers have been exercised mala fide.	10
Investigation proceedings — accused's hearing is not automatic	An accused is not entitled as a matter of course to a hearing in a writ petition seeking an impartial investigation. The relied-upon authority states that the accused has no right to be heard at the investigation stage, and that non-impleadment or absence of a hearing does not by itself make an otherwise justified order entrusting investigation to the CBI a nullity.	10
Suspect's role — investigation method and choice of investigating agency	A suspect has no right to dictate how an investigation is conducted or to choose the investigating agency. The Court applied Romila Thapar in rejecting a demand to restrain the investigating agency pending a separate inquiry. The reproduced authority nevertheless preserves appropriate Article 226 directions where the High Court is satisfied that investigative powers have been exercised mala fide; the restriction on an accused's choice does not displace that qualification.	16
Impartial-investigation writ — accused has no automatic hearing entitlement	An accused is not entitled as a matter of course to be heard in a writ petition seeking an impartial investigation. In the relied-upon investigation context, non-impleadment or absence of a hearing does not by itself make an otherwise justified order entrusting investigation to the CBI a nullity.	16
Accused's demand to choose the investigating agency or method	An accused has no right to select the investigating agency or require investigation to follow the accused's wishes. Article 226 nevertheless permits appropriate intervention where mala fide investigation is established. Transfer to the CBI is an exceptional power, to be exercised sparingly and cautiously where necessary for credible investigation, complete justice or enforcement of fundamental rights; allegations against the local police alone are insufficient. The Court found no exceptional circumstances supporting the accused agents' request for an SIT, STF or CBI investigation.	82
Omission of other alleged offenders as a ground for discharge or acquittal	An accused cannot obtain discharge or acquittal merely because other persons alleged to have committed the offence have not been made accused. The agents' admitted solicitation of investments and receipt of commissions supplied a prima facie basis for proceeding against them, notwithstanding their allegation that the company owners were not being pursued. The Court also noted the powers to summon other persons under Sections 190 and 319 CrPC, corresponding to Sections 210 and 358 BNSS, at the appropriate stage.	82

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Accused's hearing before investigative decisions or further investigation	Subject to statutory exceptions, an accused has no right to prior notice or participation as a matter of course while police collect material during investigation. The same principle applies to a direction for further investigation: Section 173(8) CrPC does not require the court to hear every potential accused before issuing it. The accused retains the opportunity at trial to challenge the authenticity, admissibility and evidentiary value of the material collected.	82
Directions compelling arrest or a charge-sheet during investigation	The High Court cannot supervise an investigation by directing police to arrest the accused or file a charge-sheet. Investigative steps and the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence remain for the investigating agency under the law; an investigation need not necessarily result in arrest, seizure or a charge-sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused the informant's request for an arrest direction.	88
Accused's apprehension of false implication — No right to dictate investigation	A prior request to the police for protection against possible false implication was not accepted as a defence warranting quashing. An accused has no right to dictate how the investigating agency should investigate. Referring to Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court also declined judicial supervision of the investigation under Article 226, treating investigation as the prosecution's domain.	119
No routine right of an accused to a hearing on investigative decisions	An accused is not entitled, as a matter of course, to prior notice or a hearing on the manner of investigation or on a direction for further investigation. The Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki passages relied upon by the Court preserve express statutory exceptions. They also recognise that the accused may challenge the authenticity, admissibility and significance of the collected evidence at trial.	134
Request for ED or CBI investigation without approaching or impleading the agency	No further direction for ED or CBI investigation was warranted where the petitioner had neither made a complaint to those agencies nor impleaded them as parties. The refusal rested on those defects in the request and did not determine the merits of the alleged irregularities.	147
No routine right of hearing or participation during investigation	The CrPC authorities applied by the Court distinguish investigation from adjudication: collection of material does not ordinarily require prior notice or hearing of the accused. Subject to the Code's specified exceptions, the accused has no right to control or participate in a police investigation before the final report under Section 173(2), or in a complaint proceeding before process under Section 204. In a postponed-process inquiry under Section 202, the accused may attend but cannot participate. A decision about the investigating agency likewise does not require hearing the accused as a matter of course.	158
Accused’s request to direct the manner of investigation	An accused or suspect cannot demand that the investigation follow a particular method or that a chosen agency investigate the case. The applicant’s request that police be directed to consider his representations and investigate accordingly was refused. In exercising Section 528 BNSS jurisdiction, the Court could not supervise the investigation to give effect to that request.	161
Opportunity of hearing during investigation	An accused has no general right to prior notice or participation in the method of investigation, subject to the specific opportunities provided by statute. Such a hearing is not required as a matter of course before an order for further investigation or selection of an investigating agency. The accused retains the opportunity at trial to challenge the authenticity, admissibility and evidentiary value of the material gathered.	161
Accused’s participation and choice of investigating agency	An accused cannot insist on choosing the investigating agency or directing the manner of investigation, including a demand for court-monitored investigation. Nor is the accused entitled to participate in the investigation before process is issued, subject to strict compliance with the requirements of a fair investigation.	197
Additional Commissioner's lack	The Additional Commissioner did not possess investigative powers under the CrPC and was not a senior police officer. His direction to the Superintendent of	217

9.1 : Investigation Control, Agency Selection and Limits on Accused's Role

of authority over police investigation	Police to enquire into the accused persons' complaint during the criminal investigation was therefore without jurisdiction and a nullity.
Choice of investigating agency and control of investigation	An accused cannot select the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner, including court-monitored investigation. The relied-upon authorities also deny an entitlement to the complainant or informant to choose an agency. Applying Romila Thapar, Prabal Dogra and the narrated supervision principle from Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court refused the accused applicants' request under Section 482 CrPC to prescribe or supervise the investigation.	217
Accused's hearing in a writ seeking impartial investigation	An accused is not entitled as a matter of course to be heard in a writ seeking impartial investigation. In the reproduced E. Sivakumar discussion, absence of impleadment or hearing did not by itself make the order entrusting investigation to CBI a nullity. The principle concerns participation in investigation and agency selection.	217
Judicial restraint during investigation of cognizable offences	Police have the statutory duty to investigate disclosed cognizable offences, and courts should ordinarily allow the investigation to be completed. Judicial intervention remains available in exceptional cases to prevent miscarriage of justice or abuse of process, including where no offence is disclosed; incomplete or hazy facts do not justify deciding the merits prematurely.	233
Independent police investigation despite administrative audit proceedings	The Dhanraj N. Asawani reasoning relied upon by the Court recognises the police's independent power and duty to investigate information disclosing an offence. Proceedings challenging an administrative decision to set aside an audit report and order a fresh audit do not themselves prevent investigation where the governing statute creates no express or necessarily implied bar.	238
Accused's choice of investigating agency or method	An accused cannot insist upon a particular investigating agency or require an investigation to be conducted in a particular manner. The absence of such a right does not exclude appropriate directions under Article 226 where the High Court is satisfied that investigative power has been exercised mala fide.	240
Accused's request to direct collection and preservation of CCTV and call records	The Court refused a Section 482 CrPC direction requiring police to preserve specified private CCTV footage and call records in support of the accused's asserted absence from the scene. An accused has no right to require investigation from a chosen angle or in a particular manner. The Court left the applicants free to present their defence at trial.	265
No entitlement to select an investigating agency	An accused cannot choose the agency that will investigate the alleged offence or insist on a particular manner of investigation or mode of prosecution. The Romila Thapar passage relied on by the Court also recognises that the complainant or informant is not entitled to select an investigating agency of choice.	265
Monitoring investigation distinguished from supervising investigative steps	Court monitoring in rare and compelling circumstances seeks a fair, timely investigation free from external interference. It does not permit the court to direct particular investigative steps or shape the investigating officer's opinion. Supervising the formation of the report under Section 173(2) CrPC risks influencing the trial court's independent decision. The Court cannot use the label of monitoring to direct investigation in a particular manner.	265
Accused's demand for investigation based on an asserted hotel CCTV alibi	An accused cannot require police to investigate from a particular angle by asking for a free and fair investigation under Section 482 CrPC or Section 528 BNSS. Applying Romila Thapar and Prabal Dogra, the Court refused to direct the investigation in accordance with the applicant's claim that hotel CCTV placed him elsewhere.	266
No routine right to prior hearing or participation during police investigation	During police investigation the accused has no general right to dictate the method of collecting material or demand prior notice and hearing before every investigative action. This rule is subject to statutory provisions providing a hearing in specified circumstances. The adopted Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki	266

	passage also states that an accused need not be heard as a matter of course before a direction for further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC; the material can be contested at trial.
Monitoring cannot direct the manner of investigation or shape the police opinion	Court monitoring seeks proper progress and a fair, timely investigation free from external interference. It does not authorise supervision that directs the investigating officer's steps or influences the opinion in the report under Section 173(2) CrPC. Such supervision would risk constraining the trial court's independent assessment. Monitoring is available only in rare and compelling circumstances within those limits.	266
Accused's demand to transfer or control investigation on an allegation of bias	An accused has no right to select the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner. Officers do not become biased merely because they refuse to proceed according to the accused's wishes. Applying Romila Thapar, Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki and Prabal Dogra, the Court refused transfer; relying on Manohar Lal Sharma, it also declined to supervise investigative steps within the agency's domain.	269
Accused's participation and prior hearing during investigation	An accused has no routine right to prior notice and hearing on the collection of investigative material or the choice of agency, subject to statutory exceptions granting a hearing in specified circumstances. The adopted Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki passage also recognises that a court need not hear the accused as a matter of course before directing further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC. The accused can contest the evidentiary material at trial.	269
Proper investigation and preference for a particular agency	An aggrieved person may seek proper investigation but cannot insist on an agency of choice. An accused likewise cannot dictate the agency or manner of investigation. Those limits do not prevent a constitutional court from ordering an exceptional transfer when the material establishes its necessity. The petitioner's preference for the CBI, without identified investigative lapses or another sufficient exceptional basis, did not justify transfer here.	299
Accused's claim to choose the investigating agency or manner of investigation	An accused has no entitlement to choose the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner. A complaint to the Superintendent of Police did not establish a right to compel the investigative method sought by the applicant. The Court applied Romila Thapar, Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki and Prabal Dogra in refusing interference.	311
Investigation — no routine prior notice or participation right of an accused	When the investigating officer is collecting material to ascertain whether a prima facie case exists, natural justice does not ordinarily require prior notice or a hearing for the accused. Subject to statutory exceptions, the accused cannot participate as of right in the manner and method of investigation. The opportunity to challenge the prosecution's evidence remains available at trial.	311
Accused's entitlement to choose the agency or manner of investigation	An accused cannot demand a particular investigating agency, method of investigation or court monitoring as a matter of right. Applying Romila Thapar, Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki and Prabal Dogra, the Court rejected the petitioners' demand for investigative control. This ordinary rule remains subject to the constitutional court's power to intervene on established exceptional grounds.	317
Investigation — accused's prior hearing and participation rights	When police collect material to determine whether a prima facie case exists, an accused has no general entitlement to prior notice or participation in the investigation, subject to statutory exceptions. Nor is hearing the accused routinely required before directing an impartial investigation by another agency. The accused retains the opportunity at trial to challenge the authenticity, admissibility and significance of the material collected.	317
Accused's choice of investigating agency or method	An accused has no right to select the investigating agency or require an investigation to be conducted in a particular manner. Applying Romila Thapar v. Union of India and referring to Prabal Dogra, the High Court rejected the	321

	accused's demand for a different agency where no illegality by the existing agency had been shown. This absence of an entitlement does not remove the exceptional constitutional power to intervene when a proper basis for intervention is established.
Investigation-transfer writ — hearing of the accused	The accused is not entitled, as a matter of course, to a hearing in a writ seeking an impartial investigation. The passage from E. Sivakumar reproduced through Romila Thapar explains that failure to implead or hear the accused does not, by itself, make an order entrusting investigation to CBI a nullity. That proposition forms part of the authority relied upon for the limits on an accused's control over the investigative process.	321
Section 528 BNSS — no direction prescribing arrest and a charge sheet	The High Court cannot use inherent jurisdiction to dictate that a police investigation must result in arrest of the accused and filing of a charge sheet. Such directions improperly control the manner and outcome of investigation, which depend on the evidence collected. An investigation may disclose grounds for prosecution or may warrant a closure report. The Court therefore refused the complainant's requested directions for arrest and a charge sheet.	347
Investigation — Accused has no right to choose the agency or dictate its method	An accused cannot claim a right to choose the investigating agency, prescribe the manner of investigation or demand court monitoring on that basis. Merely addressing the merits of the accusation does not establish authority to dictate investigative steps. The applicant's general request for a free and fair investigation supplied no basis for the supervisory directions he sought, and the application was dismissed. This limit on an accused's control does not extinguish the court's exceptional constitutional power to remedy a substantiated abuse.	359
Judicial monitoring of investigation — Fair progress without supervision of investigative choices	In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor an investigation to ensure fair, timely progress without external interference. Monitoring does not authorise directing the manner in which investigative tasks are carried out. Supervision that shapes the investigator's opinion under Section 173(2) CrPC risks influencing the trial court and undermining its independent adjudication. The Court therefore refused to intervene on the merits or direct the investigation in the manner sought under its writ or inherent jurisdiction.	359
Investigation and pre-process inquiry — No general right of accused participation or prior hearing	Collection of investigative material does not ordinarily require prior notice or a hearing for the accused where the statute creates no such obligation. Subject to specific statutory exceptions, there is no right to participate before the police report under Section 173(2) CrPC or, in a complaint case, before process under Section 204. An accused may attend a Section 202 inquiry but cannot participate as of right. The absence of a general investigative hearing does not prevent challenging the prosecution evidence through cross-examination and other trial remedies.	359
Investigation: Accused Cannot Dictate Its Course	An accused cannot insist on the choice of investigating agency or require the investigation to be conducted in a particular manner. The Court declined the petitioners' requested control over an incomplete investigation, including their demand for an exonerating report and overseas investigative arrangements. This restraint does not exclude appropriate judicial directions where mala fide exercise of investigative power or clear abuse of the statutory process is established.	363
Investigation: No Routine Right of Prior Hearing	A suspect or accused has no general right to prior notice or a hearing during investigation merely because the investigating officer is collecting material against that person. The statutory exceptions remain applicable. The absence of a routine investigative hearing does not reduce the prosecution's burden at trial or the accused's opportunity to question the evidence then.	363
Investigation: Accused Cannot	Investigation and collection of evidence are the investigating officer's statutory responsibility. An accused cannot require investigation to proceed in a	364

Dictate Forensic Procedure	particular manner. Where the Supreme Court's protection from arrest expressly required cooperation, the petitioner could not obstruct the DNA process on that basis. The Court declined interference because it found the notice within the officer's jurisdiction and the comparison necessary to test the allegation.
Investigation cannot proceed at the accused's direction	The accused has no right to dictate the investigation. The Court treated an investigation conducted according to the applicant's convenience, with undue police favour despite his availability, as contrary to that principle when refusing anticipatory bail.	413
Investigation is not confined to the original FIR allegations	An FIR or complaint need not contain every fact that investigation may reveal. Investigation may extend to subsequently discovered allegations and may implicate other persons when the discovered facts justify it. The Court applied that principle while considering an objection that EOW had gone beyond the original allegations.	417
No general right to a hearing before FIR registration	A suspect has no general right to advance notice or a hearing before registration of an FIR or during investigative collection of material. The Court rejected the claim that the applicants' show-cause reply and defence had to be decided before the FIR. The rule remains subject to a specific statutory requirement for hearing.	418
Accused cannot choose the investigating agency or direct its methods	An accused has no entitlement to select the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner, including as a demand for court monitoring. That restriction on control over investigation does not itself remove available legal remedies against an established misuse of investigative power.	418
Section 36 CrPC—impermissible parallel inquiry and exclusion of its report	Section 36 CrPC does not authorise an independent inquiry running alongside a pending FIR investigation. The SDO(P)'s parallel report declaring the FIR false was therefore a nullity and could not form part of the case diary, investigation or final police report. The investigating officer could not be directed to consider or adopt it.	419
Accused's lack of entitlement to choose or direct the investigation	A suspect or accused cannot insist on a chosen investigating agency, dictate investigative methods or demand participation and a prior hearing as a matter of course during investigation. The Court adopted those limits in refusing intervention. They remain subject to express statutory opportunities and exceptional constitutional relief for demonstrated mala fide investigation or clear abuse of power; even then, the court may require lawful process without prescribing police methods.	440
Judicial monitoring distinguished from supervision of investigation	In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor an investigation to secure fair, timely progress without external interference. Monitoring does not authorise directions controlling the collection of evidence or formulation of the investigating officer's opinion. Such supervision risks influencing the trial court and is not envisaged by the Code. Applying that distinction, the Court held that directing the police to investigate in a particular manner would amount to impermissible supervision.	440
Refusal to direct handwriting examination during a pending investigation	A suspected accused cannot require police to investigate from his defence perspective merely by denying signatures or alleging false implication. The Court refused a Section 482 CrPC direction to obtain handwriting-expert examination where no bias against the investigating officer was alleged and the applicant had not clarified his directorship when the agreement was made. It preserved exceptional constitutional correction of demonstrated mala fide investigation. If a charge-sheet relies on the disputed signatures, the applicant may challenge their authenticity and seek expert examination before the trial court at the appropriate stage; the refusal did not authenticate them.	448
No automatic hearing before an investigation is	The Romila Thapar passage adopted by the Court states that an accused has no entitlement to be heard as a matter of course at the investigation stage. In	448 entrusted to another agency	proceedings seeking impartial investigation, failure to implead or hear the accused before entrusting investigation to the CBI does not by itself make the order a nullity. This limits a claimed procedural veto; it does not give either the accused or the complainant a right to choose the investigating agency.

Jurisdictional Invalidity of a Separate Parallel Police Inquiry during Investigation	Section 36 CrPC does not authorise a separate independent inquiry alongside an ongoing investigation into the same FIR. The police circular considered in the relied-upon Supreme Court order did not authorise the parallel procedure followed by the officers. The SDO(P)'s separate inquiry, initiated on the accused's request while investigation against him remained pending, was therefore without jurisdiction, and its findings were a nullity. Its favourable conclusion could not support quashing of the criminal proceedings.	539
Accused's role in investigation — no right to choose the agency or dictate its manner	An accused has no right to select the investigating agency or dictate the manner of investigation or mode of prosecution. Applying the authorities reproduced through Romila Thapar, the Court rejected an investigation conducted at the implicated person's direction while the complainant's evidence and complaints were neglected. It declined another substitution of the local investigating officer where the earlier substitution had failed to restore independence.	546
Accused's request for a chosen investigating agency	An accused cannot insist on changing the investigating agency or prescribe the manner of investigation, including court monitoring. That restriction does not remove the High Court's power under Article 226 to correct demonstrated mala fide investigation. CBI investigation is an exceptional remedy, exercised sparingly and cautiously where necessary to restore credibility, secure complete justice or enforce fundamental rights; allegations against local police alone do not suffice. The petitioner established no ground for the requested transfer.	614
Investigation directions — Court cannot prescribe arrest, seizure or a charge-sheet	Investigation is the statutory function of police, and courts ordinarily should not prescribe its manner, angle or particular steps. A direction to arrest the accused and file a charge-sheet amounts to impermissible supervision of investigative discretion. Every investigation need not result in arrest, seizure or prosecution: the evidence may justify a charge-sheet or a conclusion that no case is made out. A direction for prompt lawful completion must leave that assessment to the investigating agency.	704
Right to proper investigation does not include choice of agency	An aggrieved person may insist on proper investigation but has no right to require investigation by an agency of personal choice. A complainant's request for CBI investigation cannot be granted merely because it is made. Equally, an accused cannot require a change of agency or dictate the manner of investigation.	714
Accused's request to compel acceptance of defence documents during investigation	An accused cannot choose the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner. Applying Romila Thapar v. Union of India, the Court refused under Section 482 CrPC to direct the investigating officer to accept the accused's selected defence documents, because such a direction would amount to judicial supervision of the investigation. The relied-upon authority preserves Article 226 relief where mala fide exercise of investigative power is established by specific material; vague, unsupported allegations do not suffice.	750
Court monitoring distinguished from supervision of investigation	In rare and compelling circumstances, superior courts may monitor an investigation to ensure fairness, timely completion and freedom from external interference. Monitoring does not permit the court to direct how the investigation is conducted or what opinion the investigating officer should form. Such supervision risks influencing the police report under Section 173(2) CrPC and prejudging the trial. This distinction supported refusal of a direction compelling acceptance of particular defence documents.	750
Section 482 CrPC — directions requiring arrest or a charge	A direction requiring the police to arrest the accused and file a charge sheet would amount to judicial supervision of the investigation. Investigation lies within the police's statutory domain and may lead either to a charge sheet or a	755

sheet	closure report, depending on the evidence. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court declined to prescribe those investigative steps or their outcome. The reproduced authority requires cautious exercise of Section 482 CrPC for its stated purposes, with reasons for interference and regard to the consequences for affected persons.
Political interference and reporting a parallel inquiry to a legislator	A legislator has no assigned investigative role under CrPC. In the earlier decision reproduced and relied on by the Court, directing an independent parallel inquiry on an MLA's recommendation and forwarding the resulting report to that MLA were condemned as interference with lawful investigation. The demand for a fair investigation did not justify that procedure or political control of the inquiry.	769
Accused's request for investigation from a particular viewpoint	A representation to the Superintendent of Police seeking a fair investigation does not entitle the accused to require the police to investigate from his viewpoint. The accused cannot insist on a particular investigating agency, manner of investigation or court-monitored investigation.	790
Accused's hearing before investigative steps	The accused has no general right to participate in the manner or method of investigation or to receive a prior hearing before investigative steps, subject to statutory exceptions. A direction for further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC does not itself require the accused to be heard; the accused may challenge the evidence at trial.	790
Judicial supervision distinguished from monitoring of investigation	The Court cannot take over supervision of the investigation. Judicial supervision and monitoring are distinct, and the distinction must be preserved when considering a request for court intervention in investigation.	790
Accused's request to choose the investigating agency or method	An accused has no right to choose the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner, including by seeking court-monitored investigation. Applying the relied-upon authorities, the Court declined to direct the police inquiry sought by the accused on his allegations of false implication and his claimed alibi.	807
Court-monitored investigation — distinction from supervision	Court monitoring may ensure timely, free and fair investigative progress without external interference in rare and compelling circumstances. It must not direct the investigative method or help formulate the investigating officer's opinion. Such supervision risks influencing the trial court's independent decision on the police report. A direction prescribing how to investigate the accused's claim would amount to impermissible supervision.	807
Investigation — accused's hearing and participation	The accused is not entitled as a matter of course to prior notice or participation while police collect material during investigation, subject to the Code's specified exceptions. Nor does a complaint inquiry confer a right to participate before process issues; attendance at a postponed Section 202 inquiry does not itself confer participation. A direction for impartial investigation or a change of agency is not invalid merely because the accused was not impleaded or heard.	807
Accused's request to direct investigation from an alibi-based viewpoint	An accused has no right to select the investigating agency or dictate the manner or viewpoint of investigation. Relying on Romila Thapar and Prabal Dogra, the Court refused a Section 482 CrPC direction requiring the police to investigate from the applicants' preferred alibi-based perspective. The police could not be compelled to rely on documents they did not accept. The refusal, made while proceedings under Sections 82–83 CrPC were pending, did not determine the truth of the alibi or guilt.	814
Accused's representations and control over investigation	An accused cannot compel the investigating officer to investigate from his chosen viewpoint or dictate the agency, manner of investigation or mode of prosecution. His representations asserting a defence do not confer such a right. On that basis, the Court found no error in submission of the charge sheet without accepting or considering the applicant's defence in the manner he sought. This	832 restriction does not exclude exceptional constitutional intervention where mala fide investigation is established.

Accused's hearing as of course in proceedings for impartial investigation	An accused is not entitled as a matter of course to a hearing in a writ petition seeking impartial investigation. Non-impleadment or absence of such a hearing does not by itself render an order entrusting investigation to the CBI a nullity where that course is otherwise justified by the case. This rule concerns participation in investigation and does not determine guilt.	832
Accused's choice of investigative agency or manner of investigation	An accused or suspect cannot insist that an offence be investigated by an agency of his choice, from his preferred viewpoint or in a particular manner. The same restriction applies to an interested complainant or informant's choice of agency. Alleged defects in the investigation did not entitle these petitioners to a direction prescribing how the police should proceed. Exceptional constitutional relief for established mala fides remains distinct from such a claimed right of control.	833
Participation and prior hearing during investigation or pre-process complaint inquiry	Subject to statutory exceptions, an accused has no participation as of right in the method of investigation before the police report under Section 173(2) CrPC, and natural justice does not generally require prior notice before investigative steps. In a complaint proceeding, participation does not arise as of right before process under Section 204; if process is postponed under Section 202, the accused may attend the inquiry but cannot participate. An order for further investigation under Section 173(8), including entrustment to the CBI, does not itself require a prior hearing or impleadment of every potential accused. The prosecution must prove its case at trial, where the accused may challenge the authenticity, admissibility and significance of the collected material.	833
Accused's right to choose the investigating agency or method	A suspected accused cannot choose the investigating agency or require the investigating officer to investigate in a particular manner. Applying Romila Thapar, the Court rejected the accused's request for directions on the strength of his asserted alibi. The quoted rule does not exclude appropriate directions under Article 226 where the High Court is satisfied that investigative power has been exercised mala fide.	840
Accused's hearing at the investigation stage	An accused is not entitled, as a matter of course, to a hearing in a writ petition seeking impartial investigation and has no right to be heard at the investigation stage. In the precedent passage reproduced and relied upon by the Court, failure to implead or hear the accused did not by itself make an order entrusting investigation to the CBI a nullity.	840
Police discretion over arrest and charge sheet, subject to timely completion of investigation	The High Court refused under Section 482 CrPC to direct arrest of the accused or filing of a charge sheet, since those directions would supervise the manner and outcome of investigation. The adopted precedent explains that arrest under Section 41 is discretionary, must be exercised cautiously and does not follow mechanically from a cognizable allegation; investigation may lead either to a charge sheet or to closure. Section 173(1), however, requires completion without unnecessary delay. The Court therefore directed an early conclusion and lawful final report, leaving any further grievance open to representation before the Superintendent of Police.	854
Inherent jurisdiction — no predetermined arrest or charge-sheet directions	In exercising inherent jurisdiction, the High Court cannot ordinarily dictate how the police should investigate or direct arrest and filing of a charge-sheet as inevitable steps. Arrest involves a cautious exercise of statutory discretion and does not follow mechanically from registration of a cognizable offence. Depending on the evidence, investigation may result in either a charge-sheet or a closure report.	901
Section 482 CrPC — no direction making arrest and charge-	The High Court cannot ordinarily dictate the course of an investigation by ordering arrest and filing of a charge-sheet. Section 41 CrPC requires a cautious exercise of police discretion, since arrest affects liberty and reputation;	906 sheet inevitable	registration of a cognizable offence does not make arrest automatic. Investigation may properly conclude that no case is made out. The requested coercive directions were also sought without impleading the suspected persons.

Section 528 BNSS — no predetermined arrest or charge-sheet directions	Registration of an FIR does not require immediate arrest or a charge-sheet in every case. Arrest involves a cautious exercise of statutory discretion, and investigation may lawfully end in a closure report if no offence is made out. The High Court cannot ordinarily remove that discretion by directing arrest and prosecution. The requested directions were also sought without impleading the accused.	909
Limits of Section 482 directions controlling investigation	The High Court cannot supervise investigation by directing arrest of named accused and the filing of a charge-sheet. Investigative steps and the decision whether evidence warrants a charge-sheet remain within the police's statutory function. Section 482 power must be exercised sparingly to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of process or secure the ends of justice. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused to predetermine arrest and the investigative result.	937
No entitlement to choose the investigating agency	Neither an accused nor a complainant or informant is entitled to select the investigating agency. The High Court cannot use inherent jurisdiction to replace an investigating officer midstream with an officer of its own choice on any asserted basis. Article 226 nevertheless permits appropriate directions where the Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. The Court adopted these limits through Romila Thapar and its discussion of Divine Retreat Centre.	963
Accused's hearing in a writ seeking impartial investigation	An accused is not entitled, as a matter of course, to a hearing in a writ seeking impartial investigation. The adopted passage from E. Sivakumar explains that failure to implead or hear the accused does not by itself make an order entrusting investigation to the CBI a nullity where the transfer was warranted by the case's peculiar circumstances.	963
Accused's representations do not confer a right to dictate the investigation	An accused cannot insist that the police investigate in a particular manner or choose the investigating agency merely because representations advancing the defence have been submitted. This restriction does not exclude appropriate constitutional directions where mala fide exercise of investigative power is established; exceptional intervention requires a specific foundation, rather than vague allegations against the police.	970
Judicial monitoring and supervision of investigation: distinction	In exercising power under section 528 BNSS, the Court cannot direct the police to investigate in the particular manner sought by the accused, since that would amount to supervision. Monitoring is limited to ensuring lawful, fair and timely progress, including completion under section 193(1) BNSS or section 173(1) CrPC, without directing investigative choices or the investigating officer's opinion.	970
Investigative-stage hearing: no general right of participation by the accused	Subject to specific statutory exceptions, an accused has no general right to prior notice, a hearing or participation while the police collect evidence. Section 173(8) CrPC does not require a hearing before a direction for further investigation. The accused may challenge the authenticity, admissibility and evidentiary value of the material at trial.	970
Accused's writ petition — no right to choose the agency or dictate investigation	An accused has no right to choose the investigating agency or require investigation in a particular manner. Applying Romila Thapar and Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki, the Court rejected an accused's Article 226 petition seeking directions for investigation of the FIR against him. A direction prescribing how the agency should investigate would constitute supervision of the investigation. The accused's request for fair and impartial investigation did not give him control over its manner or method.	1008

Investigation-stage hearing — no routine right of prior participation by the accused	The accused has no general right to prior notice or participation in the collection of investigative material or to a hearing before investigation is entrusted to another agency. The passages from Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki and W.N. Chadha relied on by the Court preserve specified statutory exceptions rather than imposing a hearing in every investigative step. They also explain that Section 173(8) CrPC does not require hearing the accused before a direction for further investigation. The accused retains the opportunity at trial to challenge the authenticity, admissibility and legal significance of the evidence gathered.	1008

Timely Investigation and Police Report — No Predetermined Arrest or Charge Sheet

Section 173(1) CrPC — completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely, but must decide as early as possible whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet. A direction to complete the investigation promptly does not determine which report the evidence must support.	51
FIR registration does not require arrest or a predetermined charge-sheet outcome	Registration of an FIR obliges the police to investigate according to law, but does not necessarily require arrest, seizure or filing of a charge sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused to direct arrest and filing of a charge sheet under Section 528 BNSS because those directions would amount to supervising the investigation. The evidence may justify either prosecution or a closure report.	135
Duty to complete investigation without unnecessary delay	Investigation must be completed without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to with Section 193 BNSS. The investigating officer cannot leave it indefinitely pending, but must reach a conclusion and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and lawful consequential steps, with liberty to approach the Superintendent of Police about any remaining grievance.	135
Judicial restraint in directing arrest or a particular investigation outcome	The police duty to investigate does not require every FIR to result in arrest, seizure or a charge sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court held that directions to arrest the accused and file a charge sheet would amount to impermissible supervision of investigation. Decisions on necessary investigative steps and whether the evidence warrants prosecution remain with the investigating agency acting according to law.	139
Early completion of investigation without prescribing charge sheet or closure	Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to with Section 193(1) BNSS, requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must reach a conclusion and submit the appropriate final report, which may be a closure report or a charge sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and lawful further steps, while permitting a remaining grievance to be submitted to the Superintendent of Police. It did not fix a particular investigative outcome.	139
Section 173(1) CrPC: completion of a long-pending investigation	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. Where an FIR had remained pending for over five years and the petitioner stated that no final report had been filed, the investigating officer was directed to finish the investigation without further delay and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet. The direction did not determine the correctness of the FIR allegations.	147
Investigation must conclude without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to alongside Section 193 BNSS, requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a charge sheet or closure report. The Court may require early completion and necessary lawful steps without prescribing	174 the outcome of the investigation.

Writ directions cannot predetermine arrest or filing of a charge sheet	Investigation is the statutory responsibility of the police. The Court should not direct its manner by requiring the arrest of the accused or filing of a charge sheet in advance of the investigating officer's assessment. Arrest is not an automatic consequence of a cognizable accusation and must be considered cautiously in the circumstances. Investigation may lawfully result in a closure report where no case is made out.	174
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot keep it pending indefinitely and must decide whether an offence is made out. The Court may require prompt completion and lawful further steps without prescribing arrest, a charge sheet or the outcome of the investigation.	243
Police failure to file completed charge-sheets	The Court treated the failure to file a prepared charge-sheet as a serious lapse in investigation and supervision, noting that the SHO had found forty-nine completed Excise Act investigations with charge-sheets still unfiled. The investigating officer's explanation that he had forgotten the file was rejected in light of the monthly crime-control reporting process. The cases had been allowed to reach the permission issue under Section 61(2) of the M.P. Excise Act without timely action.	276
Non-arrest of a co-accused and filing against arrested accused	The non-arrest of a co-accused did not prevent the police from filing the charge-sheet against the arrested accused. The investigating officer's admission on this point formed part of the Court's assessment that the prolonged failure to complete and file the case was unjustified.	276
Unexplained delay in a corruption investigation	A corruption investigation should not remain pending without reason. After a preliminary enquiry had continued for more than four years, the Court directed the agency to conclude investigation as early as possible, preferably within nine months. The nine-month period was a direction in this case, not a general statutory deadline.	290
Section 482 CrPC — no direction compelling a charge-sheet	A complainant cannot obtain a direction under Section 482 CrPC requiring police to file a charge-sheet in a pending investigation. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court held that prescribing that outcome would amount to supervising the investigation. Police must assess the evidence and may lawfully conclude either that a charge-sheet is warranted or that no case is made out.	305
Section 173(1) CrPC — timely investigation and final report	Refusal to direct a charge-sheet does not permit an investigation to remain indefinitely pending. Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is made out, conclude the investigation as early as possible and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet. The Court directed prompt completion and lawful steps, leaving the applicant free to raise a grievance before the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior, for consideration according to law.	305
Section 173(1) CrPC — completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	The investigating officer must conclude the investigation without unnecessary delay, determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate report, whether a closure report or a charge sheet. The Court directed early completion and the steps required by law, leaving the lawful outcome of the investigation open.	310
Complainant's writ for arrest — cognizable FIR does not make arrest compulsory or court-directed	A complainant's Article 226 petition cannot convert registration of cognizable FIRs into an order compelling arrest of named accused. The Court applied D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, which reproduced M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649: Section 41 CrPC confers a cautious investigative discretion, and arrest is not a	324

	mechanical consequence of an FIR because it affects liberty and reputation. Whether arrest is necessary depends on investigation and circumstances, not the complainant's demand. The petitioner alleged no arrest in two 2024 FIRs; the Court refused that relief without deciding the accused's guilt or whether arrest could later lawfully occur (paras 2–5).
Investigation directions — no predetermined charge sheet	The court should not direct police to investigate from a particular angle, compel specified investigative steps or require a charge sheet irrespective of the evidence. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the High Court treated directions to arrest the accused and file a charge sheet as impermissible supervision of the investigation. An investigation may result in a closure report or a charge sheet. The Court did not impose the petitioner's requested fifteen-day deadline.	324
Section 173(1) CrPC / Section 193 BNSS — completion without unnecessary delay	Investigation must be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge sheet. Referring to Section 173(1) CrPC and Section 193 BNSS, the Court directed completion as early as possible and lawful consequential action. It also permitted the petitioner to approach the Superintendent of Police with a grievance, for consideration in accordance with law.	324
Investigation — timely conclusion without a predetermined outcome	Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to with Section 193 BNSS in the order, requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave the matter pending indefinitely and must reach a conclusion and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge sheet. The Court directed an early lawful conclusion without prescribing the result. The complainant remained free to raise a grievance before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	347
Section 173(1) CrPC —timely completion without directing a particular result	The investigating officer was required to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1) CrPC and submit the appropriate final report, charge-sheet or closure report. Exclusion of the unlawful parallel-inquiry report did not require closure of the FIR or predetermine the lawful investigation’s outcome.	419
Section 173(1) CrPC duty to complete investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. An investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must determine whether an offence is made out, then submit the appropriate closure report or charge-sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and the taking of steps required by law. It also permitted the petitioner to raise any further grievance before the Superintendent of Police for consideration in accordance with law.	423
Duty to complete investigation promptly while leaving its conclusion to the evidence	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must not keep it pending and must reach a conclusion on whether an offence is made out. The Court directed completion as early as possible and the taking of steps required by law, while declining to predetermine arrest or a charge-sheet. It also permitted a further grievance application to the Superintendent of Police, Bhind, for consideration according to law.	427
No prior headquarters clearance for filing a charge-sheet merely because a case is labelled sensational	The designation of a case as sensational does not require prior permission or prior intimation to the IG (Coordination), Crime Investigation Wing, before filing a charge-sheet under the 2 February 2012 Police Headquarters circular. In the clarification accepted by the Court, the DGP stated that the CrPC imposed no such requirement, the circular could not override the Code, and neither the District Prosecution Officer nor the investigating officer could withhold a charge-sheet on that pretext. The Court accepted the corrective circulars and expected compliance with the DGP's affidavits and directions.	429

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 482: No Direction Predetermining Arrest or Charge-Sheet	The statutory duty to investigate does not permit the court to prescribe the investigation's course by directing arrest of the accused and filing of a charge-sheet. An investigation may lawfully result in a charge-sheet or in a finding that no case is made out. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused the requested coercive directions while leaving the investigative conclusion to the police.	457
Section 173(1): Investigation Must Conclude Without Unnecessary Delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet, as early as possible. The Court directed lawful completion and permitted any further grievance to be placed before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	457
No direction compelling arrest or filing of a charge-sheet	The High Court should not use Section 482 CrPC to prescribe the course or result of a police investigation by directing arrest and filing of a charge-sheet. A lawful investigation may disclose an offence requiring a charge-sheet or may warrant closure. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused the requested arrest direction and also noted that the suspects had not been impleaded.	462
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must reach a conclusion whether an offence is disclosed, filing the appropriate closure report or charge-sheet without delay. The Court directed early completion and lawful consequential action, while leaving the applicant free to raise a remaining grievance before the Superintendent of Police.	462
Limits on Directions for Arrest and Charge-Sheet under Section 482 CrPC	The High Court cannot direct the police to arrest accused persons or file a charge-sheet merely because a cognizable offence has been registered. Such directions would dictate the course and result of the investigation. Section 41 CrPC confers discretion to arrest, which must be exercised cautiously rather than mechanically. Depending on the evidence, the police may submit a charge-sheet or a closure report. The relied-upon precedent also disapproves drastic investigative directions affecting a person's liberty and reputation without an opportunity of hearing.	530
Completion of Investigation without Unnecessary Delay under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires the investigating officer to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay, determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a charge-sheet or a closure report. The Court may require prompt completion without directing arrest or predetermining the report. The officer was directed to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law. Any further grievance could be placed before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	530
Section 528 BNSS and Directions Compelling Arrest or a Charge-Sheet	An informant alleging inaction after registration of an FIR cannot obtain directions under Section 528 BNSS compelling arrest or submission of a charge-sheet. Such directions would control the course and outcome of the police investigation. The Court applied the precedent recognising cautious, discretionary arrest under Section 41 CrPC and the possibility of a closure report where no offence is established. That precedent also disapproves drastic investigative directions affecting liberty and reputation without hearing the persons concerned. The requests for arrest and a compulsory charge-sheet were refused.	535
Prompt Completion of Investigation and Submission of the Appropriate Final Report	An investigation must be completed without unnecessary delay. Referring to Section 173(1) CrPC and Section 193 BNSS, the Court required the investigating officer to determine whether an offence was made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet. The	535

Duty to Conclude Investigation Promptly under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a charge-sheet or a closure report. The Court directed completion as early as possible and the taking of steps required by law, without predetermining arrest or the report's outcome. Further grievances could be placed before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	537
Section 173(1) CrPC — investigation and final report without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must reach a conclusion and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge sheet, as early as possible. The Court directed expeditious completion and lawful steps without prescribing the result. Any continuing grievance could be presented to the Superintendent of Police for consideration in accordance with law.	547
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely but must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and the necessary steps under law without predetermining the result.	564
Section 482 CrPC cannot prescribe arrest or a charge-sheet	The High Court cannot direct police to arrest named accused or file a charge-sheet as a predetermined outcome of a pending investigation. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court held that those directions would improperly supervise the manner of investigation. Police must reach their own lawful conclusion from the material collected; every investigation need not result in arrest, seizure or prosecution.	607
Prompt completion of investigation under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and necessary action according to law without prescribing the result. It also permitted the applicant to approach the Superintendent of Police with any grievance for lawful consideration.	607
Section 173(1) CrPC: investigation without unnecessary delay	The investigating officer must complete the investigation without unnecessary delay, decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether closure report or charge sheet. The Court may require prompt lawful completion without prescribing that result. A further grievance to the Superintendent of Police was left open for consideration according to law.	624
Section 173(1) CrPC: prompt investigation and an appropriate final report	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The officer must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate closure report or charge sheet promptly. The Court directed completion as early as possible and necessary lawful steps without fixing a deadline or prescribing the conclusion. A further grievance could be placed before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	626
Section 173(1) CrPC — investigation must conclude without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of every investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely, but must decide whether an offence is disclosed and promptly submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge sheet. A direction to conclude investigation as early as possible leaves that statutory decision open.	632

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 482 CrPC — courts cannot dictate arrest or a charge-sheet	The High Court cannot use Section 482 CrPC to supervise an investigation by directing arrest of the accused or requiring a charge-sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, including its discussion of M.C. Abraham, the Court explained that Section 41 confers a power to arrest that must be exercised cautiously in the circumstances of the case. Registration of a cognizable offence does not make immediate arrest obligatory. Investigation may lead either to a charge-sheet or to the conclusion that no case is made out. The complainant's request for predetermined investigative steps was therefore refused.	672
Section 173(1) CrPC — investigation must conclude without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires every investigation under the relevant chapter to be completed without unnecessary delay. Although the High Court declined to direct arrest or a charge-sheet, it held that the investigating officer could not leave the investigation pending and had to decide whether an offence was made out. It directed completion as early as possible and further steps required by law. The complainant could also place any grievance before the Superintendent of Police for consideration in accordance with law. No fixed completion date or predetermined investigative outcome was ordered.	672
Section 482 CrPC — no direction compelling arrest or filing of a charge-sheet	The High Court declined to direct the police to arrest the accused or file a charge-sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, it held that such directions would amount to supervising the investigation and prescribing its outcome. Investigation is the police's statutory responsibility; the evidence may justify a charge-sheet or a conclusion that no case is made out. Every investigation need not lead to arrest, seizure or prosecution. The Court therefore refused the requested direction while separately requiring timely completion of the investigation under Section 173(1) CrPC and lawful consequential steps.	741
Section 173(1) CrPC — investigation must conclude without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires every investigation under the Chapter to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave the investigation pending indefinitely and must decide whether an offence is made out. While refusing to compel arrest or a charge-sheet, the Court directed the officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law. It also permitted the petitioner to raise any grievance before the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior, for consideration according to law. The direction required a lawful conclusion to the investigation without prescribing that the final report must accuse the persons concerned.	741
Direction to file a charge-sheet during a pending investigation	A direction under Section 482 CrPC requiring the police to file a charge-sheet would improperly supervise the investigation. The investigating officer must assess the evidence and may submit either a charge-sheet or a closure report; the Court cannot predetermine that outcome.	791
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must reach a conclusion as to whether an offence is disclosed and submit the appropriate final report promptly. A direction to conclude investigation as early as possible does not require a charge-sheet rather than a closure report.	791
Section 482 CrPC — directions to arrest and file a charge-sheet	A direction compelling the police to arrest accused persons and file a charge-sheet would improperly prescribe the conduct and outcome of the pending investigation. Arrest under Section 41 CrPC requires the investigating officer's cautious exercise of discretion and is not an automatic consequence of a cognizable allegation. Investigation may result in a charge-sheet or a closure report according to the material found.	802
Section 173(1) CrPC — completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a charge-sheet or	802

	a closure report, without delay. The Court directed completion as early as possible and the taking of necessary lawful steps. Any grievance could be placed before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.
Prompt completion of investigation and submission of the appropriate final report	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, which may be a closure report or a charge-sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and necessary lawful steps, without prescribing a particular result or calendar deadline. Any further grievance could be submitted to the Superintendent of Police, Indore for consideration according to law.	927
Prompt investigation without a predetermined charge-sheet or closure report	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether closure or charge-sheet. The Court directed completion as early as possible and lawful consequential steps, while declining to prescribe arrest, addition of Section 452 IPC or a particular report. Any remaining grievance could be submitted to the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior for consideration according to law.	929
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot keep it pending indefinitely, but must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet, as early as possible. The Court directed timely completion and lawful consequential steps while leaving the investigative conclusion open. Any further grievance could be submitted to the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	931
Completion of investigation and submission of the appropriate final report without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC, referred to with Section 193 BNSS in the order, requires completion of an investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave the matter pending indefinitely: the officer must determine whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a charge-sheet or closure report. The Court accordingly directed conclusion of the investigation as early as possible and the steps required by law. It also permitted the petitioner to place any further grievance before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	959
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay — closure report or charge sheet according to the evidence	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely, but must decide whether an offence is made out and submit a closure report or charge sheet as warranted. The Court referred also to Section 193 BNSS and directed early completion of the investigation and the taking of necessary lawful steps. It refused to dictate arrest or the filing of a charge sheet, since those directions would control the investigation and predetermine its outcome.	1000
Section 173(1) CrPC — prompt investigation without a prescribed arrest or charge-sheet outcome	The statutory duty to investigate requires completion without unnecessary delay and a decision whether an offence is made out. The investigating officer must conclude the investigation as early as possible and file the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge sheet. The Court directed compliance with Section 173(1) CrPC while refusing to require arrest or filing of a charge sheet: prescribing those steps would amount to supervision of the investigation. The required report must follow the investigating officer's lawful assessment of the case.	1004
	Sub-Chapter no. 9.3 Further Investigation and Section 173(8) CrPC
Failure to investigate after rejection of a closure report	Where the Magistrate rejects a closure report and directs further investigation, the police cannot leave the matter pending without carrying out that direction	81 and submitting the appropriate final report. Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The Court found prolonged inaction after rejection of the closure report and ordered an inquiry into police responsibility. It left the merits of the subsequently filed closure report to the Magistrate before whom it was pending.

Further investigation after a police report and hearing of the accused	Section 173(8) CrPC permits further investigation after submission of the police report, including after cognizance on that report. The reproduced authorities state that the police should desirably inform the Court and seek formal permission. The Court need not hear the accused before directing further investigation. The accused may challenge the authenticity, admissibility and evidentiary value of the resulting material at trial.	158
Independent investigation after a charge-sheet or commencement of trial	Filing a charge-sheet, commencement of trial or examination of some witnesses does not absolutely bar constitutional courts from directing investigation by an independent agency where necessary to secure a fair investigation and justice. Such intervention remains exceptional; completed investigations ordinarily should be left to the trial court unless the material justifies reopening or additional investigation. The present writ failed for want of that foundation, rather than because filing of the charge-sheet had extinguished the Court's power.	299
Section 173(8) CrPC — further investigation after a police report	The police may conduct further investigation after submitting a report, including after cognizance has been taken. The precedent reproduced by the Court states that informing the court and seeking formal permission is desirable. Section 173(8) does not oblige the court to hear the accused before directing further investigation.	311
Section 173(8) CrPC — further investigation and absence of a routine hearing obligation	Further investigation remains permissible after submission of a police report and after cognizance. The relied-upon authority describes informing the court and seeking formal permission as desirable. Section 173(8) does not require the court to hear the accused before directing further investigation.	317
Section 173(8) CrPC — Further investigation after a police report and cognizance	Police may conduct further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC after submitting the final report and even after the court has taken cognizance. It is desirable for police to inform the court and seek formal permission. Section 173(8) does not require the accused to be heard before the court directs further investigation. The accused remains entitled to contest the authenticity, admissibility and legal effect of the resulting material at trial.	359
Further investigation after police report and cognizance—hearing	Section 173(8) CrPC permits further investigation after the police report, including after cognizance. The reproduced authority treats informing the Court and seeking formal permission as desirable, but does not impose a general obligation to hear the accused before a direction for further investigation.	418
Further investigation after a police report and absence of routine prior hearing	Under the Section 173(8) CrPC principles adopted by the Court, filing a police report, or even taking cognizance on it, does not by itself preclude further police investigation. The narrated authority states that the police should desirably inform the court and seek formal permission. An accused has no automatic right to be heard before further investigation is directed, while retaining the opportunity at trial to challenge the authenticity, admissibility and significance of evidence collected.	440
Further investigation into persons originally named in the FIR	After finding the prosecution's case against the appellant unreliable, the Court directed further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC against the two persons originally named in the FIR. The direction addressed the unresolved killings in light of the rival motive and flawed investigation. It required further inquiry rather than treating those persons' guilt as finally established.	599
Further investigation and the	Section 173(8) CrPC permits further investigation after submission of the police report and even after cognizance. The reproduced authorities state that the	614

accused's opportunity of hearing	police should inform the Court and seek formal permission, and that the Court is not obliged to hear the accused before directing further investigation. The accused may contest the authenticity, admissibility and legal significance of material obtained during that investigation at trial.
Earlier filing under Section 299 CrPC did not remove the need for identification investigation	The investigating officer relied on an earlier charge-sheet described as filed under Section 299 CrPC to suggest that no supplementary charge-sheet was needed when the applicant was subsequently produced. The Court's questioning established that further investigation into identification was necessary after arrest or production and had not been undertaken. The earlier filing therefore did not answer the failure to collect admissible evidence concerning the accused now before the trial court. The Court criticised the omission without directing a particular supplementary report.	674
Further investigation distinguished from repeated investigation through a new FIR	Section 173(8) CrPC permits further investigation, collection of additional oral or documentary evidence and submission of a supplementary report. That power does not justify repeatedly opening fresh investigations through successive FIRs concerning the same transaction. The reproduced authority regards obtaining the court's permission for further investigation as appropriate.	686
Further investigation after a police report or cognizance	Section 173(8) CrPC permits further police investigation after submission of the final report, including after cognizance on that report. For further investigation, it is desirable that the police inform the court and seek formal permission.	790
Section 173(8) CrPC — further investigation after the police report	Police may conduct further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC after submitting the final report and even after cognizance has been taken. The relied-upon authority states that it is desirable to inform the court and seek formal permission. The court may direct further investigation without first hearing every possible accused; Section 173(8) imposes no such general hearing obligation.	807
Further investigation after a police report, cognizance or closure report	Section 173(8) CrPC permits further police investigation after submission of a final report, even after cognizance has been taken on it. The reproduced rule states that the police should desirably inform the court and seek formal permission. A Magistrate receiving a closure report may identify investigative lapses and direct further investigation. These powers do not confer on a suspect a right to have the High Court supervise a pending investigation or dictate its method.	833
Further investigation after a police report or cognizance: power and court intimation	Filing the police report under Section 173(2) CrPC or taking cognizance does not exhaust the police power of further investigation under Section 173(8). State of A.P. v. A.S. Peter states that prior judicial permission is not legally mandatory. The passages from Ram Lal Narang reproduced in the relied-upon authorities nevertheless make it ordinarily desirable to inform the court and seek formal permission when fresh facts emerge, respecting pending judicial proceedings. Hasanbhai Valibhai Qureshi further establishes that possible delay to the trial does not bar necessary further investigation directed towards discovering the truth.	911
	Sub-Chapter no. 9.4 Fair Investigation and Preservation of Official Record
Transfer of implicated police staff to protect records and investigation	Where the police staff had attempted to manipulate official records and interfere with a fair inquiry and investigation, the Court directed their transfer to separate places at least 900 kilometres from the district within ten days. The separation was ordered to prevent further concerted interference with records and evidence.	22
Daily case-diary entries and	Paragraph 642 of the Police Regulations requires the investigating officer to record daily investigative action in the case diary. These entries enable the work	81

verification of claimed investigation	claimed to have been done to be checked against the contemporaneous record. The absence of entries and Rojnamcha records for the dates of purported witness and accused statements, together with the inconsistent later diary account, led the Court to suspect that statements had been fabricated and records manipulated. It directed investigation into the officers' conduct without deciding the merits of the underlying criminal case.
Duty to conclude investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires every investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot leave it pending indefinitely and must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet. The Court directed prompt completion and lawful further steps without requiring arrest or predetermining the outcome. The informant remained free to approach the Superintendent of Police with a grievance.	88
Investigation based solely on co-accused confessions	The Court disapproved filing charge-sheets solely on co-accused confessions without collecting substantive evidence. It called on the Police Department to improve officers' knowledge of evidence law and directed communication of the order through the Superintendent of Police to the DGP concerning the identified deficiency.	146
Fair investigation: investigating the true occurrence without suppressing adverse facts	The investigating authority must investigate neutrally and seek the truth without regard to the desired result. Suppression of material facts, including serious injuries on the accused's side and the associated counter-version, cannot be overlooked merely because other evidence appears persuasive. The Court applied this concern when assessing the unexplained fatal beating and the prosecution's incomplete account.	287
Failure to Examine Available Railway CCTV Left the Alleged Journey Unverified	The prosecution alleged that the accused took the child through the railway stations and boarded a train. The investigating officer admitted that station CCTV footage remained available for six months but that he had not checked it. The Court treated the failure to collect that available evidence as a material gap in proof of the alleged movements. The conclusion turns on the availability and relevance of the footage in this case.	389
Investigative Videography Must Record the Actual Proceedings	Videography should preserve the investigation as it actually occurs. Recreating a completed proceeding later for filming creates false evidence rather than a reliable record. Referring to Section 161(3) CrPC and the State circular of 7 March 2019, the Court emphasised contemporaneous recording with the investigator, witness and document visible; the circular also covers seizure and arrest documents requiring witness signatures. Although issued for rape investigations, the Court observed that those safeguards could be applied to other cases. It found the impugned recordings staged, apart from the body-recovery proceeding.	389
Reliability of arrest, seizure and spot-map records contradicted by witness movements	The arrest and seizure records showed a witness as present in the village after he had left with the injured for hospital. The spot map was said to have been prepared on another witness's instructions, although that witness had also accompanied the injured; the map bore neither date nor time. The incompatible chronology and accounts led the Court to find that the arrest memo, seizure memo and spot map were antedated and antetimed and could not reliably support the prosecution case.	390
Investigator's duty of truthful and fair investigation	An investigating officer must investigate diligently, truthfully and fairly and remains answerable for the method used. Courts cannot overlook flagrant defaults revealing deliberate misconduct or irresponsible investigation, whether or not the default prejudiced the prosecution.	410
Prompt and effective investigation of sensational and non-	Every criminal case must be investigated promptly and effectively, whether labelled sensational or non-sensational. After requiring clarification of the claimed distinction, the Court accepted the 8 April 2022 correction and	429 sensational cases alike	observed that every offence affects both the individual and society. The prosecution cannot use its own classification to investigate one case vigilantly while handling another case with similar allegations casually. The Court expected the investigating officers to follow the corrected circular and the DGP's assurances in letter and spirit.

Official requisition cannot be withheld as a private record	A requisition received by a Tahsildar in discharge of official duties is an official record, rather than material to be withheld in a personal file. The Court rejected the recorder's explanation for not producing it and inferred that private retention was intended to prevent access through the official record, including under the Right to Information Act. That withholding contributed to doubt about whether and when the dying declaration had been requested.	467
Protecting Investigation from an Accused Police Officer's Influence	Where the accused head constable had access to internal exonerating reports withheld from the complainant, the police suppressed her complaint and the officer avoided blood-sample collection during the pending investigation, the Court found continuing influence over the process. To protect a fair investigation, it directed his immediate transfer to another part of the State, vacated the no-coercive-action order and left the police free to take him into custody.	528
Section 161 statements — faithful recording and compliance with videography safeguards	An investigating officer must record a witness's statement faithfully and cannot add allegations or omit material parts according to the officer's own version. Under the police circulars applied by the Court, videography must show the witness, the officer and the paper on which the statement is being written; recording questions or taking notes without simultaneously recording the statement did not comply. Material differences between the videos and written statements supported the finding of manipulation. The Court directed registration of offences under Sections 467, 468 and 471 IPC and related provisions against the recording officer, subject to independent investigation.	546
Case diary — contemporaneous recording of the time of each investigative action	Regulation 742(a) of the M.P. Police Regulations requires the investigating officer to record the time of each investigative action contemporaneously with the fact itself. A case diary must show what was ascertained and done from day to day. The Court found non-compliance where timings were omitted throughout and material steps were absent from the diary; later general-diary entries did not provide a reliable substitute for a properly maintained investigative record.	546
Fair investigation — the victim's entitlement alongside the accused's Article 21 rights	Fair investigation protects the victim as well as the accused. The State must investigate impartially even where allegations concern its own officers. The accused's entitlement to fairness cannot justify police intimidation of a rape victim, pressure to change her account or deliberate omission of allegations to shield a suspect. The Court applied these principles in finding the local investigation tainted.	546
Court-premises CCTV — request through the Superintendent to the District Judge	An investigating officer could not direct the District Prosecution Officer to supply CCTV footage from cameras within the court premises. If that footage was needed for investigation, the officer was to inform the Superintendent of Police so that a request could be sent to the District Judge. The Court treated the direct demand to the prosecution officer as beyond the investigating officer's authority.	546
Fair investigation — prompt preservation of the scene and material evidence	Preparing the spot map and promptly securing material from the alleged place of occurrence are important parts of investigation. The Court relied on the failure to visit or seal the scene and to seize the victim's torn clothing promptly, despite the recorded allegations, as evidence of a tainted investigation. It left the remaining issues concerning the delayed seizure and handling of clothing for independent investigation.	546
Proposed digital	The Court expressed the need for a lawful software-based investigation system	599

recording and access for investigations	available to investigating officers by mobile app, with time and location records linked to police headquarters and supervisory access for senior officers. It envisaged access for the trial judge after filing of the charge-sheet to assist the exercise of Section 165 Evidence Act powers, while recognising the separate domains of investigation and trial. The Chief Secretary and DGP were expected to take necessary action. This was a proposed administrative measure, rather than a finding that such a system already existed.
Fair investigation and protection of an arrested person's rights	The police must investigate fairly, and the Magistracy must ensure fair investigation and trial. The narrated Delhi Judicial Service Association passage treats those roles as complementary. The breadth of police arrest powers carries a corresponding obligation to respect the arrested person's constitutional and fundamental rights; arrest does not displace those protections.	599
Section 173(1) CrPC — completion of investigation without unnecessary delay	Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot keep it pending indefinitely and must decide whether an offence is made out, then submit the appropriate final report, whether a charge sheet or closure report. The Court directed completion as early as possible and the taking of lawful necessary steps, while refusing to require arrest or a charge sheet. Any continuing grievance could be placed before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	755
Duty to produce or account for court-preserved material	Police subject to a preservation order must produce the material or truthfully explain its nonproduction and identify responsibility for noncompliance. The trial court must seek that account rather than casually accept an assertion that records were not preserved. Deliberate suppression of material already received, despite the judicial order, harms the search for truth and the parties' right to a fair investigation and trial. The Court required the available records to be placed before the trial court.	769
Case diaries are not substantive evidence or freely accessible records	Section 172 CrPC permits a criminal court to call for investigation diaries to aid an inquiry or trial, but not to use them as substantive evidence. Accused persons do not gain a right to call for or inspect them merely because the court refers to them. Where the maker uses a diary to refresh memory or the court uses it to contradict that officer, the statutory evidentiary safeguards apply. In the earlier order reproduced here, the Court criticised providing case-diary material to the accused and the recommending legislator.	769
Magistrate's Section 156(3) power to ensure proper investigation	Under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Magistrate may direct and monitor a proper investigation if satisfied that the police have not investigated properly or are not doing so. This remedy remains available even after registration of the FIR and during or after police investigation. The provision includes incidental powers necessary to secure a proper investigation. The reproduced Sakiri Vasu passage also explains recourse to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) where the police fail to register an FIR, followed by an application to the Magistrate if that recourse is ineffective.	770
Judicial monitoring without supervising the investigating officer's opinion	In rare and compelling circumstances, a superior court may monitor progress to ensure a free, fair and timely investigation without external interference or channelling its mode. Monitoring differs from supervising the execution of investigative tasks or shaping the officer's Section 173(2) CrPC opinion. Such supervision risks influencing the trial court's independent assessment and is not envisaged by the Code. The High Court therefore declined to prescribe investigative steps at the suspects' instance while investigation was pending.	833
Completion of investigation without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1) CrPC	Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer cannot keep it pending indefinitely: the officer must determine whether an offence is made out, conclude the investigation as early as possible and file the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet. The Court directed prompt completion and lawful	845 consequential steps, while leaving any further grievance to be raised before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.

Timely completion of investigation under Section 193 BNSS and Section 173(1) CrPC	Invoking Section 173(1) CrPC and Section 193 BNSS, the Court held that investigation must be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must determine whether an offence is disclosed and file the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet. The officer was directed to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law; any further grievance could be raised before the Superintendent of Police for consideration according to law.	848
Fair investigation for the accused and victim where seized evidence is suppressed	Fair investigation and fair trial protect the accused's rights under Article 21, and the victim is equally entitled to a fair investigation. Relying on Nirmal Singh Kahlon and Vinubhai Haribhai Malaviya, the Court emphasised that investigation must bring actual offenders to trial while protecting innocent persons from prosecution. The deliberate omission of a seized diary containing acknowledgments of payment from the charge-sheet, handwriting examination and malkhana undermined that obligation. A court cannot perpetuate such suppression by refusing further investigation when the concealment is discovered.	911
	Sub-Chapter no. 9.5 Defective or Biased Police Inquiry and Its Consequences
Spot-map omissions — assessment with timing and available physical evidence	Non-production of an initial cursory spot map and absence of blood at every location shown in a later map did not by themselves establish suppression or falsity in this case. The material witnesses had been taken to hospital when the initial inspection occurred, bloodstained earth was seized, and the detailed map was prepared three days later at a public place. Those circumstances explained the omissions relied upon by the defence.	12
Defective investigation — independent scrutiny of the remaining evidence	An illegal, suspicious or defective investigation does not automatically require acquittal. The court must examine the remaining evidence independently and with appropriate caution; credible evidence may still establish guilt despite investigative wrongdoing. The result cannot depend solely on the investigating officer's probity, nor may defects replace scrutiny of the evidence actually relied upon.	17
Inquiry into an internal report contradicted by CCTV evidence	An internal fact-finding report exonerating police officials could not be accepted when the official account was contradicted by the undisputed audio-video record. The DGP was directed to inquire into the report and register a criminal case against its author if the facts warranted that course.	22
Investigation revealing prior insanity — psychiatric examination and production of the medical evidence are required	Where investigation reveals a prior history of insanity, the investigator should have the accused medically examined and place that evidence before the court. Failure to do so creates a serious infirmity in the prosecution case and attracts the benefit-of-doubt principle stated in the relied-upon decision. The accused's burden concerning Section 84 remains, and the relevant inquiry concerns the mental condition when the offence occurred.	77
Section 36 CrPC and an independent parallel police inquiry	Section 36 CrPC does not authorise a superior police officer to conduct an independent inquiry alongside an ongoing FIR investigation. A parallel inquiry giving an accused a clean chit on an alibi lacked lawful authority and did not bar summoning him on trial evidence under Section 319. The cited Supreme Court order distinguished a circular consistent with Section 36 from the unauthorised procedure actually followed.	141
Delay in investigation and credible oral	Delay in investigation does not by itself justify discarding credible oral prosecution evidence or acquitting the accused. The Court rejected the delay objection because the accepted evidence could not be treated as wholly false	160

evidence	implication on that ground.
Defective investigation and otherwise reliable proof	A faulty or tainted investigation does not by itself displace the whole prosecution case. The court must closely examine the testimony, corroboration and independent circumstances to determine whether the defect undermines the case or whether the reliable evidence still excludes false implication and supports conviction.	166
Investigative illegality and validity of cognizance or trial	An illegality in investigation does not by itself deprive the criminal Court of jurisdiction or nullify cognizance and trial. Once cognizance has been taken and the case tried, the result cannot be set aside for that illegality without a resulting miscarriage of justice. This rule concerns investigative defects and does not dispense with mandatory provisions governing the Court's own competence to take cognizance or conduct trial.	197
Police informant investigating the same offence	A competent police officer is not automatically disqualified from investigating a cognizable offence merely because the officer recorded the FIR as informant. A challenge on grounds of bias or real likelihood of bias depends on the facts and circumstances; unfairness cannot be presumed solely from the officer's dual role.	197
Non-seizure of a weapon despite reliable eyewitness evidence	Failure to seize the deceased security guard's gun did not undermine the prosecution case where reliable eyewitness evidence established the attack beyond reasonable doubt. The significance of that omission depended on the evidence and circumstances of the case.	220
Complainant and investigating officer being the same person	The prosecution cannot be rejected merely because the complainant and investigating officer are the same person, unless bias in the investigation is shown. Applying V. Jayapaul and its earlier decision in Anil alias Bhura, the Court rejected the argument that this circumstance alone vitiated the investigation; Megha Singh did not establish the broad automatic-invalidity rule asserted by the applicant.	247
Investigative illegality and the validity of cognizance or trial	A defect or illegality in investigation does not by itself remove the court's competence to take cognizance or conduct the trial. A valid police investigation is not the foundation of the court's jurisdiction under Section 190 CrPC. Where cognizance and trial have followed, the result is not set aside merely for an investigative defect unless that defect is shown to have caused a miscarriage of justice.	247
Investigative defects do not by themselves defeat trustworthy direct evidence	Faulty investigation does not by itself require rejection of trustworthy eyewitness evidence. The Court assessed the omissions in the spot map in light of the officer's simultaneous crowd-control duties. It also refused to give the accused the benefit of a later station-recorded merg intimation that omitted firing already described in the complainant's spot report and had not been recorded on his information.	253
Informant investigator overlap requires case-specific proof of bias or prejudice	The investigation is not vitiated merely because the informant police officer also investigated the case. Under Mukesh Singh, bias or prejudice must be assessed from the circumstances of the particular case; the accused is not entitled to acquittal solely because the roles overlap. The Court applied that rule to reject the categorical objection and noted the overruling of Mohan Lal's contrary rule.	257
Personal impleadment of persons accused of mala fides or bias	A person against whom mala fides or bias is alleged must be individually impleaded and given an opportunity to answer the allegations. Naming the State through an officer does not by itself implead that officer personally. The Court declined to examine allegations against persons who had not been joined in the required capacity, since condemning them without a hearing would violate natural justice.	264
Heavy burden of	The person alleging mala fides bears a heavy burden of establishing them	264

proving allegations of mala fides	through clear, credible proof. The allegations must be specific. Improper motive need not be proved only by direct evidence, but must be discernible from the impugned action or arise as a reasonable and inescapable inference from established surrounding facts. Grave allegations cannot rest on doubtful inferences from incomplete facts.
Investigation illegality and validity of cognizance or trial	A defect or illegality in investigation does not, by itself, remove the court's competence to take cognizance or conduct the trial. A trial result following such investigation is not vitiated unless the illegality caused a miscarriage of justice. The Court relied on H.N. Rishbud after noting that the charge-sheet had already been filed, distinguishing investigative defects from mandatory provisions governing the court's own competence or procedure.	264
Effect of an unauthorised or otherwise defective investigation	An illegality in investigation does not by itself deprive the court of competence to take cognizance or try the case. Where cognizance has been taken and the trial has concluded, the result is not vitiated unless the investigative illegality caused a miscarriage of justice. Applying this principle, the Court declined to quash the charge-sheet merely on an assumed defect in the investigating officer's competence.	271
Death of investigating officer — assessment of the remaining evidence	The death of the officer who conducted the inquest and registered the FIR, followed by continuation of the investigation by a subordinate officer, did not by itself entitle the accused to acquittal. The prosecution case had to be assessed in the light of the other relevant evidence.	301
Informant acting as investigating officer — no automatic vitiation of trial	Investigation and trial are not vitiated merely because the informant and investigating officer are the same person. Bias or prejudice must be assessed on the facts of each case. Applying Mukesh Singh, the Court rejected an automatic right to acquittal on that ground; the contrary rule in Mohan Lal had been overruled, while earlier acquittal decisions were confined to their facts.	312
Defective investigation — careful evaluation rather than automatic acquittal	Investigative defects or negligence do not by themselves require rejection of the prosecution case or acquittal. The Court must evaluate the other evidence carefully and analytically to determine whether it remains credible and establishes the case. The Court applied this approach to the unproved dispatch of the FIR and the omission of a light pole from the site plan.	319
Informant investigating the NDPS case — proof of bias or prejudice	Investigation is not invalid merely because the informant officer conducted it. Applying Mukesh Singh, the Court required bias, prejudice or unfairness to be assessed on the facts of the case, rather than presumed from the officer's dual role. Established bias and sole reliance on the informant-investigator's evidence may affect its weight. Mukesh Singh expressly overruled Mohan Lal's contrary rule of automatic acquittal. The objection based solely on the complainant conducting most of this investigation was rejected.	327
Section 36 CrPC — independent parallel inquiry during a pending investigation	Section 36 CrPC does not authorise an independent inquiry running parallel to the investigation of the same FIR. A CSP report obtained through such an inquiry on the Superintendent of Police's direction was held to be without jurisdiction and a nullity. It could not be relied upon to exclude the applicant despite the FIR, witness statements and trial evidence implicating him.	336
Omission of Lighting from Site Plan: Effect on Reliable Testimony	Failure by the investigating officer to show the stated source of light in the site plan does not by itself justify rejecting otherwise trustworthy eyewitness evidence. The Court treated that omission as an investigative defect and assessed the testimony in the circumstances of the illuminated gathering, applying the narrated reasoning in Prithvi.	360
Investigation Where a Previous History of Insanity Is Revealed	The Hari Singh Gond passage relied upon by the Court states that, where investigation reveals a previous history of insanity, the investigator must obtain a medical examination and place that evidence before the court. Failure to do so creates a serious infirmity in the prosecution case for which, as stated in that	384 authority, the accused is to receive the benefit of doubt. This duty concerns evidence bearing on the legal defence; it does not replace the enquiry into cognitive incapacity at the time of the offence.

Court's Duty to Address Deliberately Fabricated Investigation	An investigator must collect relevant evidence fairly and truthfully; deliberate fabrication is a breach of that duty, rather than an ordinary omission to be ignored. Applying Dayal Singh, the Court considered accountability necessary where the evidence showed apparent scripting of recoveries and tutoring of witnesses. It directed prosecution steps against the concerned officials and witnesses after finding the statutory threshold satisfied. Their eventual criminal liability remained for adjudication in the ensuing proceedings.	389
Effect of investigative omissions on otherwise reliable proof	An investigative defect does not require rejection of the prosecution case if the remaining reliable evidence proves guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Defects creating reasonable doubt remain material. Here, non-seizure of the school bag and bottle and the failure to compare scalp hair did not displace the other convincing evidence; the Court also considered the law-and-order demands on the investigator.	391
Investigative illegality does not automatically invalidate cognizance or trial	A defect or illegality in investigation does not by itself deprive a competent court of jurisdiction to take cognizance or try the case. Once the case has proceeded to judgment, the investigative defect warrants reversal only where it caused a miscarriage of justice. This is distinct from non-compliance with a statutory condition governing the Court's competence to take cognizance.	418
Early discovery of a mandatory investigative breach —corrective orders	Where a mandatory investigative breach is brought to the Court's notice sufficiently early, it should assess the nature and extent of the violation and order the necessary correction, including such whole or partial reinvestigation as the circumstances require. The accused should not simply be left to prove a miscarriage of justice after the trial ends.	418
Cumulative Investigative Defects and Failure to Prove Guilt	The missing first report, unreliable recoveries, medical inconsistencies and defects in the investigation cumulatively prevented proof beyond reasonable doubt. The Court also questioned the failure to search for the appellant's bloodstained clothing and the unexplained transfer of investigation from available senior officers to a head constable. Assessing the entire record, it found apparent false implication and acquitted the appellant.	455
Unproved Arrest Location and the Accused's Explanation	The prosecution's claim that the appellant was arrested at the scene was inconsistent with witnesses who said she had fled and was brought back by police later. The Court found her Section 313 explanation that she was arrested in Bhopal trustworthy and held that the prosecution had wrongly projected an arrest at the place of occurrence.	455
Unexplained first police information and missing daily-diary record	The investigation left the source and contents of the earliest police information unexplained. The police and scene scientist had attended the scene before the information described in the later death report, yet the relevant daily-diary entry was not produced. The Court treated this unresolved chronology as a deficiency in the prosecution investigation when assessing the case as a whole.	553
Defective investigation and independent scrutiny of reliable evidence	Defects or suspected manipulation in an investigation do not by themselves require acquittal. The court must scrutinise the remaining evidence independently and with caution, and may act on testimony it finds credible despite the investigating officer's misconduct. The judicial determination must not depend solely on the propriety of the investigation.	582
Accountability for blameworthy investigation and prosecution lapses	Where investigative or prosecuting lapses contribute to acquittal, responsible officials must be identified and the lapse assessed as innocent or blameworthy. Appropriate departmental action and, according to culpability, withdrawal of investigative duties may follow. Applying the narrated Ankush Maruti Shinde guidance to its finding of false implication, the Court directed a DIG inquiry	599

	into the investigator's conduct and a Home Department inquiry and departmental action against erring officials still in service within two months. It did not itself select a final disciplinary penalty.
Defective investigation — non-seizure of witnesses' bloodstained clothes does not require automatic acquittal	Investigative defects require extra caution in evaluating the remaining evidence, rather than automatic rejection of an otherwise proved prosecution case. If a defect creates reasonable doubt, the accused is entitled to its benefit; credible occurrence testimony may otherwise be assessed independently of the investigator's failings. Failure to seize the bloodstained clothes of the witnesses who carried the injured person did not discredit the reliable, corroborated eyewitness account.	638
Section 36 CrPC and parallel senior-officer inquiry	A senior police officer cannot conduct an independent inquiry parallel to an ongoing FIR investigation under Section 36 CrPC. Applying Deepak alias Preetam Verma and the Supreme Court's decision in Surendra Singh Gaur, the Court held the parallel inquiry impermissible. Its conclusion favouring the applicant's omission from the charge-sheet did not defeat the subsequent Section 319 summons, particularly where the claimed alibi rested on inadequate material.	645
Failure to examine a material person — unsupported police explanation rejected	The investigating officer failed to record the statement of a person who had stayed with the deceased and the appellant on the night of the killing. His explanation that the person would not give a statement because he was related to the appellant was unsupported by any corresponding case-diary entry. The Court declined to accept that explanation and treated the omission as part of the defective investigation contributing to doubt. The finding concerned the unsubstantiated explanation and the person's material presence on this record.	677
Independent scrutiny of evidence despite defective investigation	A defective, illegal or suspicious investigation does not by itself require acquittal where independently scrutinised evidence is credible and sufficient. The Court must evaluate the evidence cautiously and objectively, ensuring that perfunctory or deliberately defective investigation does not subvert the trial. Its duty of a fair trial extends to the accused, victim and society, and requires an active effort to elicit relevant material rather than passive acceptance of the prosecution's presentation.	693
Defective investigation does not by itself require acquittal	A defective or suspicious investigation requires careful scrutiny of the remaining evidence, rather than automatic acquittal. If independently assessed eyewitness testimony is credible, the Court may act on it despite investigative manipulation or lapses. Applying Dayal Singh, the Bench assessed the full evidentiary record instead of allowing the defective medical examination to determine the case by itself.	713
Disputed document fabrication and the prohibition on a mini-trial	Whether the documents relied upon by the complainant were fabricated was a disputed question of fact requiring evidence. The High Court could not determine their authenticity through a mini-trial to grant the requested FIR quashing or use the allegation as a basis for prescribing the course of investigation. Refusal of interference left that factual dispute unresolved.	833
Investigating officer's duty of diligent, truthful and fair investigation	Investigating officers must act diligently, truthfully and fairly and are answerable for the methods used in investigation. Flagrant omissions indicating deliberate wrongdoing or an irresponsible investigative approach cannot be ignored merely because prejudice to the prosecution is not shown. Doctors involved in an investigation must likewise follow recognised medical practice.	869
Discovery of deliberately withheld evidence as a ground for further investigation	Discovery that an investigating officer deliberately suppressed material already collected during investigation may constitute a new fact warranting further investigation. A defective investigation discovered during trial may be cured where the circumstances permit, even if further investigation delays disposal. On discovering the withheld personal diary, the Court allowed further investigation into both the documentary material and the investigating officer's	911

	role. It also observed that deliberate withholding, if established, could attract prosecution under Section 201 IPC and Section 120B where conspiracy is involved; it made no finding of criminal guilt against the officer.
Defective investigation and independent scrutiny of other evidence	Defective, illegal or suspicious investigation does not by itself require acquittal. The Court must scrutinise the remaining evidence independently and cautiously, and may act on evidence found credible and acceptable despite the investigating officer's misconduct. Acquittal solely because of an investigative defect may allow a deliberately defective investigation to defeat justice.	920
Defective investigation leaving essential incriminating links unproved	The investigation failed to establish how and by whom the deceased was taken to hospital, who owned the alleged bullock cart, or whether the hospital worker said to have declared him dead had examined him. The cart was not seized and the worker was not examined. Leads in the appellant's report and circumstances of the alleged discovery were also left unexplored. These omissions left essential links unproved; medical evidence of homicide could not bridge them or identify the appellants as the killers. The Court found that the deliberately deficient investigation had facilitated false implication.	942
Collusive false implication established by unsupported naming and manipulated identification	The investigating officer could not substantiate the information on which the accused were named in the FIR before the alleged abductee's return. No statements recorded in the missing-person enquiry were produced, and the informant had withheld his alleged source from the officer. The officer also contradicted the alleged victim's account of escape by claiming police recovery and allowed witnesses to see the appellants at the police station instead of holding a test identification parade. Considered with the unreliable prosecution evidence and the witnesses' motive to implicate the accused, these circumstances led the Court expressly to find that the officer had acted in connivance with the prosecution witnesses to prepare a false case.	950
Failure to send merg documents to a police superior and otherwise reliable evidence	Defective investigation does not by itself require acquittal where the prosecution evidence is trustworthy. The failure to send the merg and related documents to the SDO(P), raised with reference to Police Regulation 174, did not establish that the FIR was antedated when contemporaneous investigative steps showed its prompt registration. Applying Prithvi and State of U.P. v. Jagdeo, the Court rejected this investigative lapse as a ground for displacing the otherwise reliable evidence against Pawan.	951
Investigation omissions and otherwise established prosecution evidence	A lapse or omission by the investigating officer does not by itself make a prosecution case doubtful where reliable direct testimony of injured witnesses, corroborated by medical evidence, fully establishes the case. The Court assessed the alleged investigative deficiencies against that independently accepted evidence.	987
Investigative illegality — no jurisdictional nullity without miscarriage of justice	A defect or illegality in investigation does not by itself affect the criminal court's competence to take cognizance or conduct the trial. Applying H.N. Rishbud, the Court distinguished an antecedent investigative defect from a statutory restriction on the court's jurisdiction. An invalid police report is not for that reason a nullity under Section 190 CrPC. Where cognizance has been taken and the trial has concluded, the result is not vitiated unless the investigative illegality has caused a miscarriage of justice. This principle answered the contention that the manner of obtaining the recording necessarily defeated the prosecution.	1009

Parallel Police Enquiry During FIR Investigation — CrPC Section 36 Limits

Parallel enquiry by a senior police officer during investigation	Section 36 CrPC does not authorise an independent enquiry running parallel to the regular FIR investigation. Applying Mahendra Kumar Vaidya and the Supreme Court decision reproduced within it, the Court treated the report of a	210

	senior officer who was not the investigating officer as having no legal sanctity. The adopted precedent also excludes such a report from the case diary, investigation and final police report.
Section 36 CrPC — independent parallel inquiry during a pending FIR investigation is impermissible	Section 36 CrPC and the police circulars considered in the reproduced Supreme Court ruling do not authorise an independent inquiry alongside an ongoing investigation into the same FIR. A circular conforming to Section 36 does not validate an inquiry conducted contrary to its procedure. Applying that rule, the High Court treated the Additional Superintendent of Police's parallel inquiry as outside the lawful investigative process.	637
Section 36 does not authorise an independent parallel police inquiry	Section 36 CrPC and the cited police circulars did not authorise the independent parallel inquiry conducted alongside the regular investigation in the earlier Deepak case. The reproduced Supreme Court order rejected the officers' challenge and held that their procedure was inconsistent with law and the circular. The Court relied on that prior conduct and its judicial treatment when assessing the senior officer's present misconduct.	769
Parallel police enquiry under Section 36 CrPC	Section 36 CrPC does not authorise an independent enquiry running alongside the assigned officer's FIR investigation without withdrawal of that investigation. A report from such a parallel enquiry cannot be relied on to displace the investigation. The CSP report recommending that investigation await the divorce decision therefore had no legal sanctity.	793
	Sub-Chapter no. 9.7 Police Response to Cognizable Information and Law-and-Order Inputs
Police duty on information disclosing a cognizable offence	Where information discloses a cognizable offence, the officer in charge must record it under Section 154 CrPC and investigate it. Registration cannot be refused merely because the officer is not satisfied about the information's reasonableness or credibility.	197
Continuing Cruelty: Territorial Connection for Investigation	Where the FIR alleges that cruelty compelled a wife to leave the matrimonial home and that its mental effects continue at her parental home, the police at the latter place may investigate on that territorial connection. The Court accordingly rejected the objection to Bhopal Mahila Thana's jurisdiction, although the alleged physical acts occurred at Kanpur.	363
Accountability for failure to register cognizable information	A police officer cannot avoid registering an FIR where the information discloses a cognizable offence. The adopted Lalita Kumari directions require action against officers who fail to perform that duty.	597
Zero-number FIR received outside station territory — registration followed by transfer to competent station	A police station cannot refuse to register an FIR on the ground that the occurrence falls outside its territorial jurisdiction. It must transfer the FIR to the police station competent to investigate. The Court rejected the territorial objection because Mahila Thana, Vidisha had registered the FIR at serial No. 0 and transferred it to Gulabganj police station.	856
	Sub-Chapter no. 9.8 Reinvestigation, Fresh Investigation and De Novo Investigation
Further investigation under Section 173(8) and exceptional fresh investigation	Further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC is distinct from fresh or de novo investigation. Investigating agencies and subordinate courts act within the Code's limits, whereas those limits do not extinguish the High Court's inherent or constitutional power to order fresh investigation where exceptionally necessary to secure justice. Reinvestigation is not the ordinary response to an investigative defect; further investigation may be the appropriate course.	299
De novo investigation precedent — distinction from	A precedent directing de novo investigation after an unacceptable police closure report does not, on that basis, govern a request for initial FIR registration. The Court distinguished Neetu Kumar Nagaich because it concerned a homicidal	494

initial FIR registration	death and a closure report based on the absence of a clue about the offender; the Supreme Court had ordered de novo investigation in that setting, rather than registration of an FIR on a complaint.
Further investigation and exceptional fresh investigation are distinct powers	Police and subordinate criminal courts exercise their investigation powers within the CrPC. Section 173(8) permits further investigation after a Section 173(2) report, but that power does not itself authorise a fresh investigation or reinvestigation. Those statutory limits do not extinguish the High Court's inherent power under Section 482 or constitutional powers to order exceptional fresh or independent investigation when necessary to secure justice.	714
	Sub-Chapter no. 9.9 Magistrate's Section 156(3) CrPC Power to Direct and Monitor Proper Investigation
Section 156(3) CrPC — registration, proper investigation and monitoring	After approaching the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC without satisfactory relief, a person complaining of non-registration or improper investigation may approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. Monitoring does not authorise the Magistrate to investigate the case personally, which remains the police's function.	57
Proper investigation — Magistrate's recommendation to change the investigating officer	Under the Sudhir Tambe principle relied upon, a Magistrate addressing a proper-investigation grievance under Section 156(3) CrPC may, if considered necessary, recommend to the SSP or SP a change of investigating officer. This is a discretionary measure to secure proper investigation, alongside monitoring, and does not permit the Magistrate to undertake the investigation personally.	57
Magistrate's powers to secure and monitor proper investigation	If a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC does not resolve non-registration or defective investigation, the aggrieved person may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor its progress and, where necessary, recommend to the SSP or SP a change of investigating officer. The Magistrate cannot personally conduct the investigation.	92
Magistrate may direct and monitor proper investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC	On prima facie satisfaction, a Magistrate acting under Section 156(3) CrPC may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor its progress. The Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe passage relied upon by the Court also permits a recommendation to the competent police superior for a change of investigating officer where necessary. The Magistrate may ensure proper investigation but cannot personally conduct it.	136
Magistrate’s powers to secure proper investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC	After resort to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), an aggrieved informant may seek relief under Section 156(3) CrPC for non-registration or improper investigation. On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor it and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the SP or SSP. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	147
Magistrate's powers to secure registration and proper investigation	If a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC does not resolve non-registration or defective investigation, the complainant may apply under Section 156(3). On being prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct registration and proper investigation, monitor its progress and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police authority. The Magistrate may ensure proper investigation but cannot personally undertake it.	154
Registration and investigation directions under	A complainant dissatisfied after a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct registration of the FIR	159

Section 156(3) CrPC	or proper investigation, monitor the investigation and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP or SP. The Magistrate may secure proper investigation but cannot personally conduct it.
Magistrate may direct and monitor proper investigation without investigating personally	On being prima facie satisfied under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Magistrate may direct registration of an FIR, require proper investigation and monitor it. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police superior, but cannot personally conduct the investigation.	203
Magistrate-directed registration, proper investigation and monitoring	Under the CrPC remedies discussed in the judgment, an informant may first approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and then the Magistrate under Section 156(3) if registration or proper investigation remains lacking. On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration and proper investigation, monitor compliance and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	255
Magistrate's oversight — direction to investigate without dictating method	Upon the police report declining investigation, the Magistrate may direct investigation or hold an inquiry. Although the Magistrate is kept informed at the statutory stages, this oversight does not authorise interference with the actual investigation or directions prescribing how the police must conduct it.	314
Section 156(3) CrPC — directions and monitoring for proper investigation	A person aggrieved by non-registration of an FIR may first approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if that yields no satisfactory result, apply to the competent Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration and proper investigation, monitor compliance and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer. The Magistrate may not personally conduct the police investigation.	338
Police Inaction, Supervisory Complaint and Magistrate Monitoring	A person aggrieved by non-registration of an FIR may first approach the Superintendent of Police in writing under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if the grievance remains, the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance, including recommending a change of investigating officer where necessary. The Magistrate does not personally conduct the investigation.	408
Magistrate's power to direct and monitor proper investigation	An informant whose FIR is not registered may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC. If that produces no satisfactory result, or a registered case is not properly investigated, an application may be made under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor the investigation and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police superior. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	430
Magistrate's power to secure registration and a proper investigation	An informant dissatisfied with police inaction may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and then approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or a proper investigation and monitor progress. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the senior police authority, but cannot personally investigate. The Court relied on these powers in directing the petitioner to the available statutory forum.	440
Magistrate's Section 156(3) power to direct and monitor a proper investigation	Under the CrPC authorities adopted by the Court, an informant may apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), then approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3) if the grievance persists. On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or a proper investigation, monitor progress and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the senior police authority. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate. Those powers supported the Court's direction to use the statutory forum.	446

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Magistrate's power to secure and monitor proper investigation	On prima facie satisfaction under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Magistrate may direct registration of an FIR or proper investigation of an already registered case and may monitor that investigation. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the senior police authority. The Magistrate supervises compliance but does not personally investigate, since investigation remains the police function.	465
Magistrate's power to secure proper investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC	A Magistrate satisfied of a prima facie case under Section 156(3) CrPC may direct registration of an FIR or proper investigation of an FIR already registered, and may monitor that investigation. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police authority. Monitoring does not authorise the Magistrate to investigate personally.	517
Recourse to the Superintendent of Police and Magistrate for registration or proper investigation	An informant aggrieved by refusal to register an FIR may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC. If satisfactory action still does not follow, an application may be made to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate can direct registration or proper investigation and monitor its progress. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent superior police officer, but cannot conduct the investigation personally.	554
Magistrate's power to secure and monitor proper investigation	For refusal to register an FIR, the aggrieved person may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC. If no satisfactory action follows, or a registered case is not properly investigated, an application may be made under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor it and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the police superior. The Magistrate cannot personally undertake the investigation.	566
Magistrate's power to secure registration and proper investigation	A person complaining of non-registration may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC. If registration or proper investigation still does not follow, an application lies to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration and proper investigation, monitor its progress and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP or SP. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	595
Magistrate's power to secure and monitor proper investigation	Under the CrPC framework reproduced from Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe, a Magistrate who is prima facie satisfied may direct registration of an FIR or proper investigation under Section 156(3), and monitor compliance. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the SP or SSP. Monitoring does not authorise the Magistrate personally to conduct the investigation, which remains the police's function.	608
Section 156(3) CrPC: registration, proper investigation and monitoring	If a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC yields no satisfactory action, the aggrieved person may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the SP or SSP, but cannot personally investigate.	620
Section 156(3) CrPC: proper investigation and judicial monitoring	If written recourse to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC produces no satisfactory response, the informant may apply under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor it. Where needed, a change of investigating officer may be recommended to the SP or SSP, but the Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	627

CrPC: registration and proper-investigation supervision	Section 154(3) CrPC, the informant may apply under Section 156(3). If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. A change of investigating officer may be recommended to the SP or SSP where necessary, but the Magistrate cannot investigate personally.
Section 156(3) CrPC — registration, proper investigation and monitoring	The Sakiri Vasu passage adopted by the Court permits a complainant first to approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if relief remains unsatisfactory, the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe further explains that the Magistrate may, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police superior. Monitoring does not authorise the Magistrate personally to investigate; investigation remains the police function.	679
Magistrate's powers where an FIR is not registered or investigation is deficient	A person aggrieved by non-registration of an FIR may first apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if dissatisfied, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor it. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police superior, but cannot personally conduct the investigation.	697
Non-registration or improper investigation — recourse under Sections 154(3) and 156(3) CrPC	An informant aggrieved by non-registration may first submit a written application to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC. If registration still does not follow, or investigation after registration is improper, the informant may apply to the competent Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate can direct registration and proper investigation and monitor compliance.	702
Magistrate's investigation supervision — recommendation to change investigating officer	When ensuring proper investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Magistrate may, if considered necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the Superintendent of Police or Senior Superintendent of Police. The Magistrate may monitor the investigation but cannot personally conduct it, because investigation remains the function of the police.	702
Section 156(3) remedy for FIR registration and proper investigation	An informant may first complain in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if the grievance remains, apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation, monitor the investigation and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police superior. The Magistrate cannot personally investigate.	710
Magistrate's powers to secure proper investigation under Section 156(3)	On prima facie satisfaction under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the appropriate police superior, but cannot personally investigate. These powers provide an effective remedy when police fail to register an FIR or investigate properly.	719
Section 156(3) remedy for nonregistration or inadequate investigation	After a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC fails to yield satisfactory action, an aggrieved person may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor compliance and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP/SP. The Magistrate supervises the process but does not personally investigate.	763
Section 156(3) remedy for nonregistration or inadequate investigation	After a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC fails to yield satisfactory action, an aggrieved person may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation, monitor compliance and, if	765 necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP/SP. The Magistrate supervises the process but does not personally investigate.

Section 156(3) investigation before cognizance: no examination on oath	A Judicial Magistrate who orders police investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC before taking cognizance does not examine the complainant on oath at that stage, because the Magistrate is not then taking cognizance of the offence. The Magistrate may direct registration of an FIR to enable the police to begin investigation.	770
Section 156(3) remedy for non-registration or improper investigation	An aggrieved person may first submit a written application to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if relief remains unsatisfactory, approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation, monitor compliance and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent police authority. The Magistrate cannot personally undertake the police investigation.	786
Section 156(3) CrPC: registration, proper investigation and monitoring	On failure of police action, a complainant may approach the Superintendent of Police in writing under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if that yields no satisfactory result, seek an order under Section 156(3). If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor progress. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the police superior. The Magistrate does not personally investigate, since that remains the police function.	838
Section 156(3) CrPC powers to secure and monitor proper investigation	Under the adopted passages from Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe, an informant may first approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if that does not produce a satisfactory result, apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor it. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend to the competent police superior a change of investigating officer, but cannot personally conduct the investigation.	853
Section 156(3) CrPC: directing and monitoring proper investigation	After an unsuccessful written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), an aggrieved person may approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3) concerning non-registration or inadequate investigation. On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP or SP, but cannot personally investigate.	866
Section 156(3) CrPC — Magistrate's supervision of proper investigation	Where the Magistrate is prima facie satisfied on an application under Section 156(3) CrPC, he may direct registration of the FIR or proper investigation of an existing FIR and monitor compliance. If necessary, he may recommend to the Superintendent or Senior Superintendent of Police that the investigating officer be changed. The Magistrate supervises the investigation and cannot himself undertake it, since investigation is the function of the police.	887
Section 156(3) CrPC application — affidavit and prior resort to the police	The rule reproduced from Priyanka Shrivastava requires a Section 156(3) application to be supported by a sworn affidavit. Prior applications under Sections 154(1) and 154(3) must be stated and supported by documents. In an appropriate case, the Magistrate may verify the allegations, having regard to their nature and any delay. The affidavit makes the applicant accountable, including liability for prosecution if it is false. The quoted requirement concerns Section 156(3) applications.	899
Magistrate's power to direct and monitor proper investigation	If a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC does not produce satisfactory action, the aggrieved person may apply under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the	921 competent police authority, but cannot personally conduct the investigation.

Magistrate's power to secure and monitor proper investigation	After an unsuccessful written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC, a person complaining of non-registration of an FIR or improper investigation may approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct registration and proper investigation, monitor compliance, and, where necessary in the Magistrate's discretion, recommend a change of investigating officer to the police authorities. The Magistrate may supervise the process but cannot personally conduct the investigation.	945
Magistrate's powers to secure and monitor proper investigation	If approaching the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC does not secure registration or proper investigation, the aggrieved person may apply under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor it. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP or SP, but cannot personally investigate because investigation belongs to the police.	961
Magistrate's power to secure and monitor proper investigation	On a prima facie satisfactory application under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Magistrate may direct registration of an FIR or proper investigation and monitor compliance. Where necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the competent senior police officer. The Magistrate may supervise the investigation but cannot personally investigate.	984
	Chapter no. 10 Police Accountability, Custodial Violence and State Responsibility
	Sub-Chapter no. 10.1 Criminal Action Against Police Personnel for Custodial Abuse
Criminal action for custodial assault and fabricated complaint material	An internal police inquiry giving officers a clean chit could not shield them from criminal investigation when undisputed CCTV footage contradicted its conclusions and showed custodial assault and creation of false complaint material. Exercising jurisdiction over an individual case of custodial torture, the High Court directed the Director General of Police to register an FIR against the implicated officers.	22
Alleged police abuse — time-bound trial and execution of warrants	In view of serious allegations of misuse of police powers, the Court directed completion of this trial within six months, with day-to-day hearing if required and adjournments not exceeding four days. If an accused police officer failed to appear, the Superintendent of Police was personally responsible for promptly executing the arrest warrant because the department knew the officer's whereabouts. Failure to execute the warrant was to be reported by the trial court to the High Court for further action.	483
Custodial assault of a rape complainant — criminal action on prima facie material	The complainant's account before the Magistrate, medical records, video material and police-station chronology supported, for the purposes of the writ, a prima facie finding of police assault intended to change her version. The Court directed registration of an FIR against the identified and unknown officers for the assault, unlawful detention under Section 341 IPC and other disclosed offences. It also directed investigation to identify the other assailants, including a test identification parade. The findings did not determine criminal guilt.	546
	Sub-Chapter no. 10.2 DGP Oversight and Police Accountability
Police accountability for prolonged inaction and suspected protection of accused persons	Where police records showed a pending investigation but the matter was presented as closed in monthly review, and prolonged inaction and suspected record manipulation were left unchecked, the Court directed the DGP to inquire into the responsibility of the investigating and supervisory officers. On finding prima facie misconduct intended to give undue advantage to the accused, it also	81

	directed registration of an offence against the then investigating officer and SHO under the pre-2018 Section 13(1)(d) of the Prevention of Corruption Act. Other persons could be implicated if their involvement was found during inquiry. The writ remained pending.
Personal DGP inquiry after ineffective compliance by subordinate officers	Where the Superintendent of Police delegated a court-directed inquiry and the resulting response failed to address the apparent police misconduct, the Court required the DGP personally to conduct the inquiry, without delegating it to another officer. It rejected the request to substitute an Inspector General and required the report within one month, supported by the DGP's own affidavit.	81
DGP review of misleading inquiry claims and protection of the delinquent officer	After finding that police officials had misrepresented inquiry progress and shielded the investigating officer, the Court directed the DGP to decide whether the identified Jabalpur and Katni officers required criminal or service proceedings and report by 5 March 2025. It found revocation of the officer's suspension improper while she was not cooperating, dispensed with further preliminary inquiry, and ordered copies of the judgment to be kept in the erring officers' service books, with compliance reported within one month.	83
DGP review of misleading inquiry claims and protection of the delinquent officer	After finding that police officials had misrepresented inquiry progress and shielded the investigating officer, the Court directed the DGP to decide whether the identified Jabalpur and Katni officers required criminal or service proceedings and report by 5 March 2025. It found revocation of the officer's suspension improper while she was not cooperating, dispensed with further preliminary inquiry, and ordered copies of the judgment to be kept in the erring officers' service books, with compliance reported within one month.	85
Supervisory reporting on action for failure to execute a warrant	Issuing show-cause notices to the police personnel did not conclude the Court's compliance inquiry. As the time allowed for their responses had expired, the SSP was directed to report to the Principal Registrar by a fixed date the action or decision taken on the notices. The order required the outcome of the supervisory process to be reported.	184
DGP assessment of investigation and supervisory lapses	On finding serious lapses in investigation and supervision, the Court directed the DGP to assess whether action against the investigating officer or Superintendent of Police was warranted. If action was considered necessary, it was to be taken within one month, with a report to the Principal Registrar by the specified date. The direction left that assessment to the DGP.	276
Police accountability for withholding negative preliminary-inquiry reports	The Court directed circulation of the reporting requirement through the DGP and Superintendents of Police to all SHOs. It warned that future deviations would be treated seriously and could support a presumption that the SHO deliberately withheld the matter to benefit the accused.	314
Police Accountability: Failure to Produce or Formally Arrest a Known Prisoner	The unexplained failure to produce an imprisoned accused under a production warrant or to arrest him formally in the pending case was held to violate his life and liberty. The Court directed the Inspector General to inquire into the station officer's conduct and submit a report to the Principal Registrar within one month.	368
Police training directed for failure to collect substantive evidence	After questioning the SHO, the Court found a lack of legal knowledge and investigative efficiency in leaving identification work undone despite knowledge of the applicant’s custody and the earlier bail order. It also noted repeated charge-sheets based only on accused persons’ confessional statements without attempts to collect substantive evidence. It directed the Director General of Police to send the concerned SHO to a police training school of the DGP’s choice for at least six months and report to the Principal Registrar within fifteen days. This was a corrective direction concerning the officer examined by the Court.	674
DGP accountability	Efficient execution of judicial process is the police department's own duty and	912

for ineffective execution of trial-court process	should not depend on repeated judicial prompting. A report confined to High Court warrants did not adequately address neglect of trial-court process against witnesses. After rejecting the misleading and perfunctory inquiry report, the Court required the DGP's personal affidavit on process execution, witness protection and responsibility for defaults, with a response to every issue raised.
Unauthorised retention of closure report: inquiry into police responsibility	Where police retained a prepared closure report without justification despite representations that it had been filed, the Court directed a senior police inquiry to identify the responsible station officers and investigating officer and report the proposed action. Responsibility and disciplinary consequences were left to that inquiry.	975
	Sub-Chapter no. 10.3 Departmental Enquiry and Police Service Discipline
Disciplinary jurisdiction after transfer of the delinquent police officer	Where the alleged misconduct and all relevant proceedings arose in Jabalpur, the officer's later transfer to Katni did not itself make the Superintendent of Police, Katni the disciplinary authority. The Court found no explained basis for moving the preliminary inquiry there. It required an immediate departmental inquiry against the former investigating officer, conducted by an officer of at least Superintendent rank who had never served in Jabalpur or Katni, and completion within six months. A reasoned decision on departmental action against the responsible Superintendents was also required.	83
Disciplinary jurisdiction after transfer of the delinquent police officer	Where the alleged misconduct and all relevant proceedings arose in Jabalpur, the officer's later transfer to Katni did not itself make the Superintendent of Police, Katni the disciplinary authority. The Court found no explained basis for moving the preliminary inquiry there. It required an immediate departmental inquiry against the former investigating officer, conducted by an officer of at least Superintendent rank who had never served in Jabalpur or Katni, and completion within six months. A reasoned decision on departmental action against the responsible Superintendents was also required.	85
Police officer's failure to answer the trial court's direction	An SHO directed by the trial court to explain why action should not be taken for his default was required to provide a written response. The assertion that he had made oral submissions was rejected because the subsequent order sheets did not record them. The High Court fixed a deadline for his written reply and directed the trial court to pass a specific order considering its earlier direction and the SSP's report.	184
Police departmental inquiry and criminal prosecution — distinct charges may proceed simultaneously	A departmental inquiry may proceed alongside criminal prosecution where the disciplinary charges are not identical to the allegations in the FIR. Leaving headquarters without superior permission was an independent service charge, while misconduct in police uniform was only partly based on the criminal allegations. The overlap in the underlying incident therefore did not require quashing the disciplinary charge-sheet or stopping the inquiry.	337
Police uniform — forcible entry without investigative purpose as misconduct	Forcibly entering a spa in police uniform, when the officer had not gone there to investigate an offence, was held to constitute serious misconduct independently of the overlapping criminal allegations. That independent disciplinary aspect supported continuation of the departmental inquiry alongside the prosecution.	337
Criminal Acquittal and an Independent Police Disciplinary Enquiry	A criminal acquittal does not by itself invalidate a departmental charge sheet based on an independent preliminary enquiry and distinct allegations of police misconduct. Criminal guilt requires proof beyond reasonable doubt, whereas disciplinary findings rest on a preponderance of probabilities. Here the prosecutrix supported the criminal case but her parents turned hostile, and the Court regarded the acquittal as other than honourable. It permitted the disciplinary enquiry to continue without deciding whether the misconduct	382

	charges were proved.
Writ Review of a Departmental Charge Sheet at the Initial Stage	A departmental charge sheet ordinarily creates no immediate cause of action because it does not itself impose punishment or finally affect the employee's rights. Its factual correctness is for the disciplinary authority, and the writ court should not decide disputed merits at that stage. Patent lack of jurisdiction or issuing competence may justify interference; the relied-upon passage also recognises established mala fides as an exceptional ground. No such basis was made out here, so the Court declined to quash the charge sheet.	382
Meaning of Honourable Acquittal in Disciplinary Proceedings	The expressions 'honourable acquittal' and 'fully exonerated' are judicial descriptions, not forms of acquittal defined in the IPC or CrPC. The relied-upon authorities distinguish full exoneration after consideration of the prosecution evidence from an acquittal for technical reasons or because material witnesses turned hostile or were not examined. The latter does not carry the same effect when the disciplinary authority independently assesses misconduct.	382
No Automatic Reinstatement Merely on Criminal Acquittal	The Samuthiram passages relied upon by the Court state that criminal acquittal does not automatically confer service benefits or reinstatement. Even an honourable acquittal must be considered with the applicable service rules; in the absence of a rule conferring the benefit, acquittal alone does not create that right. The different standards governing criminal trial and disciplinary proof remain relevant.	382
Delay as a Ground to Quash Disciplinary Proceedings	Under the Prabhash Chandra Mirdha passage relied upon through Jagdish Baheti, delayed initiation or failure to conclude a disciplinary enquiry within a reasonable period does not alone justify quashing it. The delay must prejudice the employee, and the gravity of the alleged misconduct is relevant. In this case the earlier judicial stay was vacated, and the authorities were directed to conclude the enquiry within six months.	382
Police accountability for repeated defaults in witness attendance and summons or warrant execution	In accepting the revised Police Headquarters directions, the Court expected effective service of summons and execution of warrants, with particular attention to police witnesses' attendance for evidence. The DGP's 8 April 2022 affidavit provided for preliminary inquiry into repeated failure to attend or repeated laxity in service or execution. The Court further expressed the expectation that repeated non-execution would lead to inquiry and adequate action against the defaulting personnel, protecting witnesses and complainants from avoidable harassment.	429
Consideration of Disciplinary Action Against an Accused Police Officer	Alongside directions to insulate the rape investigation from the accused head constable’s influence, the Court left it to the competent authority to consider action against him under Rules 9 and 14 of the M.P. Civil Services (Classification, Control & Appeal) Rules, 1966. The direction was to consider action; it did not itself impose a disciplinary penalty.	528
Police misconduct — departmental proceedings alongside criminal investigation	Prima facie involvement in custodial violence, partisan investigation and failure to conduct a responsible inquiry warranted departmental action in addition to criminal investigation. The Court directed the competent authorities to initiate departmental proceedings against the responsible officers and directed their immediate transfer outside the Gwalior and Morena ranges because their continued local presence was not conducive to the inquiry. These were protective and disciplinary directions in the writ, subject to the independent investigation.	546
Departmental consideration of police failures causing trial delay	Where the Superintendent of Police failed to honour an assurance to secure official witnesses and the prosecution’s negligence prolonged trial, the Court left possible departmental action to the competent authority instead of initiating contempt proceedings. The Chief Secretary and DGP were also to consider action for the doctors’ and police witnesses’ non-appearance. A copy of the order was directed to be placed in the Superintendent’s service book, with	621 compliance reported within fifteen days.

Departmental proceedings for deliberate interference with preserved evidence	Deliberately withholding records received under a court order, failing to forward them and causing a false compliance reply justified departmental proceedings against the senior police officer. The Court directed the DGP to initiate inquiry, issue a disciplinary charge-sheet within one month, report issuance to the Principal Registrar by 20 May 2025 and place a certified copy of the order in the officer's service record. The direction initiated disciplinary process; it did not impose a final service penalty.	769
Parallel police disciplinary inquiry and criminal prosecution — grounds for stay	There is no automatic bar to a departmental inquiry proceeding alongside a criminal case. Stay requires a case-specific assessment of prejudice to the employee's criminal defence, the gravity of the charge, complicated questions of fact and law, and overlap in facts and evidence. These factors must be balanced against prompt disciplinary action. Here no complicated question was shown, the criminal charge-sheet was not produced, and the Court found the criminal allegation distinct from the service charge.	894
Stayed disciplinary inquiry — resumption where the criminal case is delayed	A departmental inquiry cannot remain stayed indefinitely merely because a criminal investigation or trial is pending. Even an earlier stay may be reconsidered where the criminal case does not progress or is unduly delayed. With the inquiry stayed for over three years, no substantive progress shown in the criminal case and no complicated issue identified, the Court vacated the stay and directed completion of the inquiry within six months.	894
Criminal prosecution and disciplinary inquiry — different purposes and standards of proof	Criminal prosecution determines whether an offence is proved beyond reasonable doubt. A departmental inquiry addresses service misconduct and discipline, which may be established on a preponderance of probabilities. The strict evidentiary rules governing a criminal trial do not apply in the same manner to departmental proceedings. These differences inform the decision whether parallel proceedings should continue.	894
Criminal acquittal — no automatic release from disciplinary liability	Acquittal in a criminal case does not by itself absolve an employee of disciplinary liability or bar action otherwise permissible under the governing service rules. The criminal and departmental proceedings have different objectives, rules of evidence and standards of proof.	894
	Sub-Chapter no. 10.4 Police Failure to Record Sexual-Offence Information — Section 166A(c) IPC
Nominal FIR registration and police liability under Section 166A(c) IPC	Section 166A(c) IPC penalises failure to record information under Section 154(1) CrPC concerning the offences specified in that provision. In the circumstances of a recovered minor whose statements disclosed enticement and sexual relations, mere registration of an FIR against unknown persons followed by inaction did not fulfil the provision's purpose. The Court directed registration of an FIR against the investigating and station officers; the direction did not determine their guilt.	431
	Sub-Chapter no. 10.5 Official Duty Nexus and Protection of Public Servants
Official-duty nexus of custodial assault and fabricated allegations	The conduct of officers in retaliatory roadside violence, custodial assault and creation of false complaint material was held to have no reasonable nexus with discharge of their official duties.	22
Police misconduct — official-duty nexus cannot rest on designation alone	The office of Town Inspector did not by itself establish that alleged forcible entry, search, assault and removal of a resident to the police station occurred in discharge or purported discharge of official duty. The officer relied on patrol duty and alleged gambling but showed no registered gambling offence or warrant and did not explain the treatment of the supposed other gamblers. On that record, the Court found no basis for requiring sanction under Section 197	483

	CrPC at the initial stage. It distinguished D. Devaraja and applied Dr. S.M. Mansoori, while leaving the final sanction question open for decision on trial evidence.

Chapter no. 11
Arrest, Custody, Remand and Rights of Accused

Sub-Chapter no. 11.1
Communication of Grounds of Arrest and Written Intimation

Written grounds of arrest: timing and the exceptional oral-communication procedure	Under Article 22(1) and Section 47 BNSS, grounds of arrest must be communicated in writing in a language the arrested person understands. Where an exceptional situation prevents written communication on or soon after arrest, the grounds may first be conveyed orally, but writing must follow within a reasonable time and at least two hours before production for remand. Applying Mihir Rajesh Shah, the Court found no urgency where the cooperative petitioner had already been in police custody for hours before formal arrest at 23:40. No written grounds were supplied at any stage, and the station diary did not show communication of the particular offence alleged. The arrest was therefore illegal.	41
Burden of proving communication of grounds of arrest	When an arrested person alleges non-compliance with Article 22(1), the investigating officer or agency bears the burden of proving compliance. Communication must effectively give the arrested person sufficient knowledge of the basic facts constituting the grounds, in a language that person understands, so that the constitutional safeguard can be exercised.	41
Admission of oral communication does not waive the right to written arrest grounds	An arrested person's admission before the remand Magistrate that the grounds of arrest were communicated does not waive the fundamental safeguard. Where written grounds were never supplied, that admission does not cure the breach. A statement suggesting only that the person's conduct hurt community feelings also does not establish that the particular offence forming the basis of arrest was communicated.	41
Arrest intimation to a nominated relative, friend or other person	The arresting officer must inform the arrested person of the right to nominate a relative, friend or other person to receive arrest information. That nominated person must promptly be informed of the arrest, reasons and place of detention, and the officer must record who was informed. The remand Magistrate must verify compliance. As explained in Mihir Rajesh Shah, these requirements under Section 50A read with Section 50 CrPC, corresponding to Sections 48 and 47 BNSS, are additional to communication of arrest grounds to the arrested person.	41
Substantial communication of arrest grounds through NDPS documents	On the facts of this habeas corpus petition, the Court treated a written Section 50 NDPS Act notice identifying the proposed contraband search, seizure memoranda signed by the accused, and information given to his brother as substantial compliance with Section 47 BNSS. The petitioner did not contend that the accused was unaware of the reasons for arrest. The finding was confined to these circumstances, while the Court reaffirmed the mandatory requirement of written grounds.	232
Written arrest grounds in a language understood by the accused	The constitutional duty to communicate grounds of arrest applies to all offences and requires written grounds in a language the arrested person understands. Where written communication at arrest or immediately afterwards is impracticable, the grounds must be given orally and then supplied in writing within a reasonable time, at least two hours before production for remand. The Court reaffirmed this obligation while assessing substantial compliance on the particular facts.	232
Purpose of meaningful	Communication of arrest grounds must equip the arrested person to obtain legal advice, oppose remand and seek bail. Merely reading out lengthy grounds or	232

communication of arrest grounds	allowing the person to read them without supplying a copy does not ordinarily serve that purpose; furnishing written grounds under acknowledgment also avoids disputes about whether they were communicated.
Redaction of sensitive material from PMLA arrest grounds	The Pankaj Bansal reasoning adopted by the Court permits sensitive investigative material in recorded PMLA arrest grounds to be redacted before the written copy is supplied. Concern for investigative secrecy does not justify withholding the written grounds altogether.	232
	Sub-Chapter no. 11.2 Consequences of Illegal Arrest
Illegal arrest: release and the continuing validity of prosecution	Failure to comply with Article 22(1) vitiates the arrest and subsequent remand and requires release, even where statutory bail restrictions apply. As explained in Vihaan Kumar and applied by the Court, that illegality does not invalidate the investigation, charge-sheet or trial, and filing a charge-sheet does not cure the constitutional breach. The Court ordered liberty relief on the conditions stated separately, while leaving the FIR, investigation and any trial to proceed according to law without findings on guilt.	41
Illegality resulting from failure to communicate arrest grounds	Failure to communicate arrest grounds as constitutionally required violates personal liberty and renders the arrest illegal; non-compliance with the written-grounds safeguard may require release and invalidate the ensuing custody. The Court nevertheless refused habeas relief here because it found substantial compliance through the particular written NDPS documents and surrounding circumstances.	232
Effect of an allegedly illegal arrest on proof of guilt	An irregular or illegal arrest does not affect culpability when the offence is established by cogent evidence. In this case, the Court also rejected the premise of an unsupported arrest because an already recorded last-seen statement supplied material against the accused.	391
	Sub-Chapter no. 11.3 Custody, Formal Arrest and Pre-FIR Restraint
Police custody and formal arrest are distinct	Arrest necessarily involves custody, but custody does not necessarily amount to formal arrest. Custody has a wider meaning. The Court therefore did not accept that the petitioner's earlier restraint and return with police, by themselves, established that formal arrest had occurred before registration of the FIR. The period already spent in custody remained relevant to whether there was any practical obstacle to furnishing written grounds at formal arrest.	41
Taking an offender into custody before registration of an FIR	Police are not invariably prohibited from taking an offender into custody merely because an FIR has not yet been registered. The Court illustrated this with an offender fleeing after committing an offence. It added that a person taken into custody before an FIR cannot be kept there for an unreasonable period without an FIR, but expressly declined a fuller examination of that issue on the facts before it.	41
Police detention without formal arrest under a mistaken identity	Police cannot avoid the safeguards governing arrest and detention by keeping a person in custody without formally arresting him. Applying D.K. Basu, the Court held the petitioner's detention under a mistaken identity to be illegal and the publication of his photograph as a criminal to violate his reputation, privacy and dignity. Breach of the safeguards may attract departmental action and contempt. The Court directed separate contempt show-cause proceedings against two officers for noncompliance with the safeguards.	61
Section 439 CrPC: Police Cannot Defeat Bail by Withholding Formal Arrest	Where police knew that the applicant was already in jail in another case and had obtained a production warrant, their failure either to produce him or to arrest him formally in the present case could not be used to defeat his Section 439 CrPC remedy. The Court rejected the State's maintainability objection,	368

	holding that police could not unlawfully curtail the accused's access to legal advice and remedies.
	Sub-Chapter no. 11.4 Look Out Circulars, Immigration Restraint and Criminal Process
Review and deletion of an investigation-stage Look Out Circular	The originating agency must review an LOC quarterly and annually and immediately request deletion when the person is no longer wanted or its purpose has ended. It bears responsibility for immigration action taken under the LOC. On the facts, the petitioner had cooperated with investigation, appeared before the trial court, obtained bail, attended proceedings and secured permission to travel. With no continuing flight risk or periodic review shown, keeping the investigation-stage LOC active was unlawful. Its later deletion removed the need for a quashing order but did not resolve the earlier restraint.	83
Review and deletion of an investigation-stage Look Out Circular	The originating agency must review an LOC quarterly and annually and immediately request deletion when the person is no longer wanted or its purpose has ended. It bears responsibility for immigration action taken under the LOC. On the facts, the petitioner had cooperated with investigation, appeared before the trial court, obtained bail, attended proceedings and secured permission to travel. With no continuing flight risk or periodic review shown, keeping the investigation-stage LOC active was unlawful. An LOC does not expire automatically; the originator must send the deletion request. Its later deletion removed the need for a quashing order but did not resolve the earlier restraint.	85
	Sub-Chapter no. 11.5 Constitutional and Statutory Safeguards at Arrest
Magistrate's duty to verify arrest safeguards before remand	Remand is a judicial function requiring application of mind to the material and the need for custody. The Magistrate must ascertain compliance with Article 22(1) and other mandatory arrest safeguards rather than authorise detention mechanically. Applying the reproduced authorities, the Court found that the remand had been ordered without due application of mind, while declining to entertain an ordinary merits challenge to that order in the writ petition.	41
Arrest after a cognizable report: discretion rather than automatic action	In the arrest-discretion passage reproduced through D. Venkatasubramaniam and relied upon by the Court, Section 41 CrPC confers a power to arrest without a Magistrate's order or warrant in the specified situations; it does not require arrest mechanically whenever a cognizable offence is reported. The officer may assess the necessity of arrest after investigation. Because arrest affects liberty, reputation and status, the power requires caution and attention to the nature of the alleged offence and the person's circumstances. This principle supported refusal to order arrest at the complainant's request.	47
Section 41 CrPC — arrest is not automatic upon a cognizable FIR	The Section 41 principles relied upon by the Court treat arrest as a discretionary investigative decision, not an automatic consequence of a cognizable allegation. The officer must consider whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances and exercise the power cautiously because it affects personal liberty, reputation and status. The nature of the alleged offence and the persons accused are relevant to that decision.	51
Handcuffing — necessity and individual justification	Handcuffs or fetters cannot be used routinely or merely for the convenience of custody or escort. Their use requires circumstances, including the prisoner's conduct and character, that create a reasonable apprehension of escape or violent disturbance of peace. Handcuffing must be a last resort where security can otherwise be ensured; unjustified handcuffing violates fundamental rights.	61
Arrest safeguards — officer identification and arrest records	Officers conducting an arrest or interrogation must display accurate identification and name tags with their designations, and their particulars must be recorded. An arrest memo must state the time and date, be attested by a family member or a respectable local person, and be countersigned by the	61

	arrested person. The detention diary must identify the person informed of the arrest and the officers having custody.
Arrest or detention — information to relatives and control rooms	A person in police custody is entitled to have a friend, relative or other person interested in his welfare informed as soon as practicable of the arrest and place of detention, unless the arrest-memo witness already serves that role. The detained person must be told of this right. Where the next friend or relative lives outside the district or town, notification is required through the specified legal-aid and police channels within eight to twelve hours. The arrest and place of custody must also be communicated to the district or State control room within twelve hours and publicly displayed there.	61
Custody — injury records and periodic medical examination	At the arrested person's request, examination at arrest must record major and minor injuries in an inspection memo signed by the person and the arresting officer, with a copy given to the person. During custody, a trained doctor from the prescribed approved panel must conduct a medical examination every forty-eight hours.	61
Custodial safeguards — Magistrate records and access to counsel	Copies of the prescribed arrest documents, including the arrest memo, must be sent to the jurisdictional Magistrate for the record. The arrested person may meet a lawyer during interrogation, though counsel need not remain present throughout the interrogation.	61
Arrest is not an automatic consequence of a cognizable FIR	The power to arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because it affects liberty and reputation. The investigating officer is not bound to arrest every accused immediately after a cognizable offence is reported; the need for arrest depends on the investigative circumstances, including the nature of the alleged offence and the person concerned.	88
Arrest after a cognizable FIR — Discretion and caution	The Section 41 CrPC principle reproduced and relied upon in refusing arrest directions treats arrest as a discretionary investigative decision. Registration of a cognizable offence does not by itself require immediate arrest. The officer may first investigate whether arrest is necessary and must exercise the power cautiously, having regard to the alleged offence and the persons concerned, because arrest affects liberty, reputation and status.	110
Arrest discretion must be exercised cautiously rather than mechanically	A police officer is not bound to arrest immediately upon a report of a cognizable offence. The M.C. Abraham passage relied upon through D. Venkatasubramaniam treats arrest as a discretionary decision requiring caution in light of personal liberty, reputation, the alleged offence and the circumstances of the accused. The necessity of arrest is to be assessed during investigation.	135
Necessity and caution govern police discretion to arrest	Arrest is not an automatic consequence of a cognizable-offence allegation. The M.C. Abraham passage relied upon through D. Venkatasubramaniam requires the investigating officer to assess whether arrest is necessary, with caution because it affects liberty, reputation and status. The decision depends on the alleged offence and the relevant circumstances rather than a mechanical response to the FIR.	139
Judicial scrutiny of police remand requests	When considering remand under Section 187 BNSS, the Magistrate must apply judicial mind to the supporting material and hear the accused or counsel to determine whether custody is justified within the statutory limits. Production for remand provides an opportunity to contest detention; the Magistrate must not merely approve police papers mechanically.	232
Information to relatives and verification of arrest safeguards	Section 48 BNSS requires prompt information about the arrest and place of detention to a relative, friend or nominated person and to the designated district police officer. The arrested person must be informed of this right, the recipient must be recorded at the police station, and the Magistrate must satisfy himself that the statutory requirements concerning notice of the right and the entry have	232 been met.

Arrest is not automatic upon allegation of a cognizable offence	The police power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously, with regard to the nature of the alleged offence and the circumstances of the accused. An investigating officer is not bound to arrest mechanically as soon as a report of a cognizable offence is lodged and may assess the necessity of arrest after investigation.	243
Arrest during investigation — cautious exercise of statutory discretion	An allegation of a cognizable offence does not invariably require arrest as soon as the report is lodged. In the M.C. Abraham passage reproduced through D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court relied on the investigating officer's statutory discretion to assess whether arrest is necessary. Because arrest affects personal liberty and reputation, that discretion requires caution and attention to the circumstances rather than a mechanical direction to arrest.	305
Section 41 CrPC — arrest is discretionary and must not be mechanical	The police are not bound to arrest an accused merely because a cognizable offence is alleged. The discretion under Section 41 CrPC must be exercised cautiously, having regard to the nature of the alleged offence and the circumstances of the accused. The investigating officer may first investigate and then assess whether arrest is necessary.	310
Doctor accused of negligence — arrest must not be routine	A doctor should not be arrested merely because criminal rashness or negligence is alleged. Under the guidelines relied upon, arrest should be supported by investigative necessity, the need to collect evidence or the investigating officer's satisfaction that the doctor would otherwise not make himself available to face prosecution.	339
Arrest during investigation — discretion must be exercised cautiously	Registration of a cognizable offence does not mechanically require the accused's arrest. The police must assess the necessity of arrest in the course of investigation and exercise the statutory discretion cautiously, having regard to the alleged offence and the circumstances of the accused. Arrest affects liberty and reputation. The Court relied on this principle in refusing a direction compelling arrest.	347
Arrest of Doctors Accused of Criminal Negligence	A doctor should not be arrested routinely merely because criminal negligence is alleged. Arrest must be justified by the needs of investigation or collection of evidence, or by the investigating officer's satisfaction that the doctor would otherwise not be available to face prosecution.	408
Arrest Is Not Automatic on Registration of a Cognizable Offence	A police officer's power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because arrest encroaches on liberty and affects reputation. Registration of a cognizable offence does not require mechanical arrest; the officer may assess its necessity during investigation in light of the relevant circumstances.	457
Arrest under Section 41 CrPC is not automatic on a cognizable allegation	The discretionary power to arrest must be exercised cautiously because it affects liberty and reputation. A police officer is not required to arrest mechanically whenever a report alleging a cognizable offence is lodged. The need for arrest depends on the investigation and relevant circumstances, including the alleged offence and persons concerned.	462
Arrest is not automatic upon registration of a cognizable offence	The police power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because arrest affects liberty, reputation and status. A cognizable allegation does not require immediate mechanical arrest in every case. The investigating officer may assess the necessity of arrest after investigation, considering the offence and the circumstances of the accused.	564
Arrest safeguards for a doctor accused of rash or negligent treatment	A doctor should not be arrested routinely merely because rashness or negligence is alleged. Under the adopted guidelines, arrest requires a need to advance the investigation or collect evidence, or a justified concern that the doctor will not make himself available for prosecution without arrest. The medical-negligence accusation alone does not establish that need.	588

11.5 : Constitutional and Statutory Safeguards at Arrest

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Discretion and caution in arrest during investigation	Registration of a cognizable case does not itself require immediate arrest. Under the Section 41 CrPC principles reproduced from M.C. Abraham through D. Venkatasubramaniam, the officer must assess whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances and exercise the power cautiously. Because arrest affects liberty and reputation, a court should not replace that investigative discretion with a mechanical command to arrest.	607
Section 41 CrPC: arrest requires a cautious discretionary assessment	Registration of a cognizable offence does not make arrest automatic. Under the Section 41 principle reproduced and applied in the judgment, the investigating officer must assess whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances and exercise the power cautiously because it affects liberty and reputation. The mere lodging of a report does not require mechanical arrest.	624
Section 41 CrPC: FIR registration does not require mechanical arrest	Police discretion to arrest must be exercised cautiously in light of the circumstances and the intrusion on liberty and reputation. An allegation of a cognizable offence does not itself make arrest mandatory. The investigating officer may assess the necessity of arrest after investigation rather than arresting automatically as soon as a report is lodged.	626
Section 41 CrPC — registration of a cognizable offence does not make arrest automatic	The police power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously, with regard to the alleged offence and the person concerned. An accused need not be arrested mechanically as soon as an FIR is lodged. The investigating officer may assess the need for arrest after some investigation, bearing in mind its effect on personal liberty, reputation and status.	632
Section 41 CrPC— Arrest is not automatic on registration of an FIR	Registration of a cognizable offence does not require immediate arrest in every case. The police must consider whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances and exercise the statutory power cautiously, having regard to the offence and the person concerned. Arrest affects liberty, reputation and status; the power must not be exercised mechanically.	668
Section 41 CrPC — registration of a cognizable case does not require automatic arrest	The power to arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously. A police officer need not mechanically arrest an accused as soon as a report is lodged merely because it alleges a cognizable offence. The officer may assess the necessity of arrest during investigation, having regard to the offence and relevant circumstances. Arrest intrudes upon liberty and affects reputation, requiring caution and circumspection rather than a judicial direction dictating that step.	704
Section 41 CrPC — arrest is discretionary and requires cautious assessment	In the M.C. Abraham passage reproduced within D. Venkatasubramaniam and relied upon by the High Court, Section 41 CrPC confers discretion to arrest in the specified circumstances; registration of a cognizable-offence report does not mechanically require immediate arrest. The investigating officer may first investigate and assess whether arrest is necessary. Because arrest encroaches on liberty and affects reputation and status, that power must be exercised cautiously, having regard, among other matters, to the alleged offence and the persons accused. This principle supported refusal of a judicial direction compelling arrest during the investigation.	741
Section 41 CrPC — arrest is not automatic upon registration of a cognizable offence	The power to arrest under Section 41 CrPC must be exercised cautiously within its statutory conditions, considering whether arrest is necessary, the nature of the offence and the person accused. Registration of a cognizable offence does not require mechanical or immediate arrest. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam and its reproduced M.C. Abraham principle, the Court refused the complainant's request for a direction to arrest the accused.	755
Discretion and caution in arrest during investigation	The power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously. Registration of a cognizable offence does not automatically require arrest. The investigating officer may first investigate and assess whether arrest is necessary; the Court ordinarily does not direct the	791

Arrest during investigation requires a cautious exercise of discretion	The power to arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because arrest affects personal liberty and reputation. The police are not bound to arrest an accused mechanically as soon as a cognizable offence is reported. The investigating officer must consider whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances.	922
Arrest during investigation requires a cautious exercise of discretion	The power to arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because arrest affects personal liberty and reputation. The police are not bound to arrest an accused mechanically as soon as a cognizable offence is reported. The investigating officer must consider whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances.	927
Discretion to arrest after registration of a cognizable offence	The police are not bound to arrest an accused mechanically merely because a cognizable offence has been reported. Section 41 CrPC confers discretion that must be exercised cautiously, considering the need for arrest and its effect on liberty and reputation. The investigation may lawfully conclude without arrest, seizure or a charge-sheet where the evidence does not warrant those steps.	929
Cautious exercise of arrest powers under Section 41 CrPC	Section 41 permits arrest without a Magistrate's order or warrant in its specified circumstances, but a cognizable accusation does not require mechanical arrest. The investigating officer may investigate before deciding whether arrest is necessary. Because arrest restricts liberty and affects reputation, the statutory power must be exercised cautiously, considering the alleged offence and the person concerned.	937
Arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary, not automatic upon accusation	Applying the principle reproduced from M.C. Abraham in D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court treated arrest under Section 41 CrPC as a statutory discretion to be exercised cautiously, not mechanically upon registration of a cognizable accusation. The investigating officer may consider the circumstances and necessity of arrest during investigation; arrest affects personal liberty and reputation. The High Court therefore declined to compel the arrest sought in the writ petition.	941
Registration of a cognizable offence does not make arrest automatic	The M.C. Abraham principles reproduced through D. Venkatasubramaniam recognise that the police power of arrest must be exercised cautiously rather than mechanically whenever an offence is reported. An investigating officer may assess whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances; the mere allegation of a cognizable offence does not invariably require arrest. Since arrest affects liberty, reputation and status, its use depends on the statutory situations and relevant circumstances, including the nature of the allegation. This qualification supports the Court's refusal to prescribe arrest as an inevitable investigative step.	959
Section 174-A IPC accusation: arrest is not automatic	In the section 174-A IPC case treated as punishable with less than seven years' imprisonment, arrest was not mandatory merely because the complainant sought it. The police had to assess the necessity of arrest under section 41 CrPC in accordance with Arnesh Kumar. The Court therefore upheld refusal to compel arrest.	974
Section 41 CrPC: checklist and reasons supporting arrest	Police must assess the necessity of arrest under the statutory criteria rather than arrest automatically. When producing an arrested accused for further detention, the officer must forward the completed section 41(1)(b)(ii) checklist together with the reasons and materials necessitating arrest.	974
Magistrate's scrutiny before authorising detention	Before authorising detention, the Magistrate must examine the police report setting out the necessity for arrest and record satisfaction. Detention must not be authorised casually or mechanically.	974
Non-arrest decision and section 41-A	Under the reproduced Arnesh Kumar directions, the decision not to arrest must be forwarded to the Magistrate within two weeks of institution of the case, and	974

notice: prescribed timelines	a notice of appearance under section 41-A CrPC must be served within two weeks. The district Superintendent of Police may extend these periods for reasons recorded in writing.
Non-compliance with arrest and detention safeguards: accountability	Failure by police officers to comply with the reproduced Arnesh Kumar directions may attract departmental action and contempt proceedings before the High Court having territorial jurisdiction. A Judicial Magistrate who authorises detention without recording the required reasons may face departmental action by the appropriate High Court.	974
Arrest on registration of a cognizable offence	Registration of a cognizable offence does not require mechanical arrest of every accused. The investigating officer must exercise the discretion under Section 41 CrPC cautiously and consider whether arrest is necessary in the circumstances, having regard to its effect on personal liberty and reputation.	985
Section 41 CrPC — arrest is not automatic upon registration of a cognizable offence	Registration of a cognizable offence does not by itself require the police to arrest the accused. Under Section 41 CrPC, the investigating officer must assess the need for arrest in the statutory circumstances and exercise the power cautiously, having regard to personal liberty, reputation, the nature of the offence and the persons accused. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam and the passage from M.C. Abraham reproduced in it, the Court refused to direct the arrest of the accused. A court ordinarily cannot require a particular investigative step merely because the complainant seeks it.	1000
Section 41 CrPC — no automatic arrest upon registration of a cognizable FIR	The power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC must be exercised cautiously in the circumstances specified by the provision. Registration of a cognizable offence does not require immediate or mechanical arrest in every case. The investigating officer must assess its necessity, taking account of the nature of the alleged offence and the consequences for liberty, reputation and status. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam and its quotation from M.C. Abraham, the Court refused the complainant's request for a direction compelling the accused persons' arrest under Section 482 CrPC.	1004

	Sub-Chapter no. 12.1 Custody, Release and Disposal of Seized Property
Interim custody of a mining vehicle — release may be refused to preserve material evidence at risk of destruction	In considering release under Sections 451 and 457 CrPC, the Court treated the dumper used to carry illegally excavated sand concealed beneath black soil as important evidence. It found that release to the applicant created a risk of destruction of that evidence and upheld refusal of supurdagi. Compounding of the mining offence and the later power of attorney did not require release in those circumstances.	79
Interim custody of a vehicle allegedly used in repeated offences	Applying Sunderbhai Ambalal Desai, the Court permitted interim custody under Section 451 CrPC of a vehicle allegedly used in more than one offence, subject to stringent safeguards. The applicant had to prove his permanent address, explain the purchase from another State and, because the purchase invoice had not been filed, deposit ₹10 lakh as cash surety. Undertakings were required against further criminal use, with immediate surrender of the vehicle upon such use and forfeiture of the deposit if the applicant committed a further offence. The applicant also had to accept the vehicle's identity, preserve its nature, colour and ownership until disposal, refrain from parting with possession by lease, rent, gift or temporary use, and produce it whenever directed, particularly for witness evidence. These conditions reflected the circumstances of that release order.	242

owner's vehicle	unwillingness to examine witnesses. The authority must consider his written reply and the parties' evidence and allow final arguments. Here, cross-examination of departmental witnesses did not cure the denial of defence evidence and final submissions or the failure to address the owner's defence and knowledge of the offence. The confiscation and subsequent appellate and revisional orders were set aside, with remand for a fresh decision after those opportunities.
Interim Custody of a Stolen Vehicle Used in a Subsequent Offence	A stolen vehicle need not remain in police custody merely because it was later used in another offence and is evidence in both cases. Where the claimant had reported its theft and was not an accused in the subsequent offence, the Court applied Sunderbhai Ambalal Desai v. State of Gujarat, (2002) 10 SCC 283, and directed interim release under Sections 451 and 457 CrPC upon proof of registered ownership. Release was subject to a bank guarantee of Rs. 30,000, an undertaking against alteration and for production when directed, and a prohibition on alienation until both trials concluded.	651
Prompt Release of Seized Property With Preservation of Evidence	Powers under Section 451 CrPC should be exercised promptly and judiciously so that property does not remain unused or exposed to misappropriation and courts and police do not bear unnecessary custody burdens. Applying the narrated principles in Sunderbhai Ambalal Desai, the Court recognised that a proper panchnama, supported where necessary by evidence describing the property, can preserve its evidentiary value without continued physical retention. Before delivery of a seized vehicle, photographs and a detailed panchnama should be prepared, with appropriate security to secure its return when required.	651
Restitution after unauthorised seizure—Personal liability for missing crop	After quashing the unauthorised seizure and related proceedings, the Court required return of the entire crop in proper condition and made the SDM personally responsible for ensuring compliance within five days. Missing quantity or loss in quality attracted the SDM's personal liability to pay the cost to the affected applicants.	664
State liability for the value of seized property lost in official custody	Where seized property is lost, stolen or destroyed and no prima facie defence of due care and caution is made out, the court may, in an appropriate case required by the ends of justice, direct payment of its value. Following Basava Kom Dyamogouda Patil, the Court required the State to pay for ornaments missing from the treasury under judicial custody directions. The respondents' own valuation established compensation of ₹80 lakh, with release subject to certification of the competing successors' shares.	813
Judicial control of seized property without physical court custody	Production of seized property before a court does not require the court to retain its physical possession. Where the court directs an officer to keep the property safely and obtain its verification or valuation, judicial control over that custody places the property in the custody of law. The Court adopted this reasoning in Basava Kom Dyamogouda Patil when addressing ornaments lost from the treasury.	813
Valuation of lost seized property—articles actually recovered	Compensation for loss from official custody is based on the value of the property actually recovered and seized, rather than the total property originally reported stolen. The Court relied on Basava Kom Dyamogouda Patil's distinction between those amounts. In the present case, the respondents themselves had ascertained the value of the seized ornaments, which supplied the basis for the compensation direction.	813
Competing succession claims to compensation for lost seized property	The writ court did not determine the competing successors' entitlement to the compensation payable for lost seized ornaments. It directed release according to succession certificates establishing their respective shares. The earlier provisional allocation for interim custody did not settle the ultimate entitlement to compensation.	813

	Sub-Chapter no. 12.2 Seizure Memo, Independent Witnesses and Police Witnesses
Inconsistent seizure account attributed to instructions	The witness's inconsistent account of whether a lathi or farsa was seized from one accused, coupled with his statement that the earlier answer followed the prosecutor's instruction, made that seizure evidence unreliable. The Court nevertheless accepted his separately tested evidence of the gun recovery, which withstood cross-examination.	167
Unproved possession link in an alleged recovery of ransom money	Identification of currency as ransom money could not cure the failure to prove its recovery from the accused. The officer who brought the accused and cash to the police station prepared no seizure memo, gave no recorded statement and was not examined. The documents did not disclose where the cash was found or show recovery from the accused's body, and there was no disclosure leading to discovery. Considered together with unreliable identification of the accused, these deficiencies defeated the alleged recovery and conviction.	183
Corroboration of disputed seizure through the investigating officer	A seizure may be proved through the investigating officer, but that possibility does not dispense with scrutiny of reliability. Here, the seizure witness did not establish production of the knife by the appellant, the other seizure witness was not examined, and the investigating officer's account contained serious discrepancies. The Court therefore declined to rely on his uncorroborated account and found the knife recovery unproved beyond reasonable doubt.	219
Credible police evidence despite hostile independent seizure witnesses	A police witness's testimony cannot be discarded solely because of official status; it must be assessed like other witness evidence. Reliable police testimony may prove seizure and sustain a conviction even when independent seizure witnesses turn hostile. Here, criticism of the officer's status disclosed no feature making his evidence untrustworthy or unreliable.	247
Failure to Examine the Officer Accountable for a Preserved Blood Sample	The autopsy evidence showed that five millilitres of the deceased's blood had been handed to police and entered in a seizure memo prepared by Tulsiram. Another officer identified his handwriting, but the prosecution did not examine Tulsiram or show that he was dead or untraceable. In the Court's assessment, he was the person who could explain the sample's whereabouts, and his unexplained absence caused a serious evidentiary gap.	389
Independent attestation of a discovery memorandum is not invariably required	Neither Section 27 of the Evidence Act nor Section 161 CrPC requires independent witnesses to sign the record of an accused's disclosure. The investigating officer's evidence of a resulting recovery must be assessed on its own reliability. Absence of independent attestation alone does not justify rejecting it, although an actual reason to doubt the record may make the absence of independent witnesses relevant.	575
Proof of seizure despite independent witnesses' denial	The seizure was not treated as unproved merely because the independent witnesses said the memorandum had been prepared outside their presence. The investigating officer testified to seizure of the burnt clothes, matchbox and kerosene container and their dispatch to the forensic laboratory. The Court relied on that evidence in rejecting the challenge to this seizure. Its conclusion depended on the officer's evidence available on this record.	593
Seizure proof — police testimony may establish recovery despite independent witness's non-support	An independent seizure witness's failure to support recovery does not prevent the prosecution from proving the seizure through police testimony. The Court expressly accepted that possibility even though the independent witness denied seizure of the farsa despite his signature on the memo. In this case, however, proof of seizure did not establish the asserted incriminating blood link: there was no usable evidence that blood, including human blood, had been found on the farsa or the appellant's clothing. The prosecution therefore failed to prove the alleged recovery of bloodstained articles as a circumstance connecting him to the offence.	747

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Unexplained non-production of contraband and hostile seizure witnesses	The Vijay Jain passage reproduced through Vijay Pandey requires cogent proof that contraband was seized from the accused and identifies production of the seized material as the best evidence. Where the material is not produced without explanation, mere oral evidence of seizure is insufficient, particularly when the panch witnesses have turned hostile. This qualified evidentiary rule is consistent with Sahi Ram's distinction between non-production alone and non-production accompanied by other evidentiary failures.	843
Recovery accepted despite seizure witnesses denying their presence	On the evidence in this case, the recovery of the knife was accepted although the seizure witnesses denied that it occurred in their presence: they admitted their signatures on the seizure memo, and the investigating officer described the seizure. The denial was assessed with that supporting evidence.	971
	Sub-Chapter no. 12.3 Field Recovery, Seizure Procedure and Recovery Documentation
Weapon or cartridge non-recovery — effect where direct evidence is reliable	Recovery of the weapon or spent cartridge is not an indispensable condition for conviction where reliable direct evidence, supported by the other evidence, establishes the offence. Non-recovery does not by itself disprove the occurrence or make eyewitnesses unreliable. Here, failure to recover the cartridge belt did not defeat consistent evidence of its use during repeated firing, particularly where its carrier had absconded and could have concealed or destroyed it.	12
Non-recovery of the firearm where the accused absconded	On this record, failure to recover the firearm did not defeat the prosecution case. The appellant had remained absent during investigation, leaving no opportunity for seizure from him, and the Court accepted the eyewitness and medical evidence establishing the shooting.	214
Delay in recovery of a vehicle from the scene	Although the investigating officer should act promptly to avoid the possibility of manipulation, delay in recovering a vehicle from the scene does not necessarily undermine an otherwise reliable prosecution case. On the reporting and recovery chronology and the trustworthy eyewitness evidence, the delay in recovering the deceased's motorcycle did not cast doubt on the case.	248
Contradictory Recovery Evidence From an Accessible and Unsealed Scene	The alleged discovery of the bloodstained stone was not proved. The seizure date conflicted with household witnesses' accounts of when police brought the appellant; an earlier officer had minutely inspected the room without seeing the stone, while another witness said it lay close to the place already searched. The room remained unsealed and accessible, leaving an opportunity for manipulation. These combined defects defeated the claimed disclosure-based recovery.	455
Claimed Bloodstained-Earth Recovery Beneath a Cemented Floor	The Court rejected the claimed recovery of bloodstained earth beneath a cemented floor where the prosecution failed to explain why the bloodstained cement itself was not seized or how blood had reached the underlying earth. On the evidence in this case, it treated the asserted recovery as a camouflage rather than reliable corroboration.	455
Section 27 recovery — independent attestation is not a mandatory condition	Section 27 of the Evidence Act does not require the accused's statement to be recorded in the presence of independent witnesses. Nor must a document recording the resulting recovery invariably bear independent attestation. Absence of such witnesses or signatures does not automatically invalidate the recovery; the investigating officer's evidence must be evaluated for reliability, with the absence of independent support considered where there is reason for suspicion.	905
Disclosure-led recovery of weapons used in the assault	The seizure witnesses and investigating officers proved the disclosure statements and resulting recovery of the sword, firearms and lathi attributed to the appellants. The objects were identified in evidence, and the Court accepted that the weapons of offence had been seized from their possession.	936

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Sub-Chapter no. 12.4 Malkhana, Seal Integrity and Chain of Custody
Link between the forensic sample and the alleged seized contraband	A forensic report identifying a sample as ganja does not establish recovery from the accused unless the prosecution connects that sample with the substance allegedly seized. Applying the relied-upon NDPS authorities, the Court found that unexplained non-production of the alleged contraband left that evidentiary connection unproved. The laboratory result did not cure the failure to establish recovery on this record.	186
Challenge to firearm sealing without questioning the armourer	An objection that the armourer had not returned the firearm in sealed condition could not discredit his evidence when no question about that circumstance had been put to him. Before criticising a witness on such a circumstance, the defence must give the witness an opportunity to explain it.	247
Unproved Sealing and Malkhana Custody of Forensic Exhibits	The claimed handling of the clothing was unsupported by a reliable sealed-custody trail. The identification officer received open articles, the record did not show proper resealing or a specimen seal, the seal used on dispatch did not match the asserted intervening custody, and no malkhana record explained storage and movement. The Court found that the slacks remained open until their later dispatch, leaving an opportunity for manipulation. These failures undermined the identity and integrity of the exhibits sent for forensic examination.	389
Different descriptions of sealed specimen containers	Describing a specimen container as a bottle in the medical record and a box in the seizure record did not establish substitution. The Court treated both expressions as descriptions of a broad-necked container, relied on the intact hospital seal received by the laboratory, and noted that the carrier had not been questioned about the terminology and had denied opening the sealed articles.	391
Correlation of seized narcotic sample with the sample tested	In Vijay Pandey, whose reasoning the Court reproduced, a laboratory report establishing that the tested sample contained narcotics was not conclusive by itself. The prosecution had to connect the sample tested with the substance seized from the accused; failure to establish that connection undermined the conviction.	843
Proof of safe sample custody despite non-production of the malkhana register	The objection to safe custody was rejected on the deposit certificate, packet identification and prompt sealed receipt at the forensic laboratory. The officer proved deposit of the two sealed two-gram samples and the four-gram balance, identifying the packets and signatures. The certificate recorded the malkhana entry. The next-day forwarding document and the laboratory's receipt of sample A1 in sealed condition supported the chain, and the laboratory report identified diacetylmorphine. These records established continuity of the seized sample beyond reasonable doubt.	935
	Chapter no. 13 Preventive Proceedings, Bonds and Public-Order Custodial Controls
	Sub-Chapter no. 13.1 Sections 145–146 CrPC — Preventive Possession Proceedings and Emergency Attachment
Preventive scope of Section 145 possession proceedings	Section 145 CrPC provides a provisional remedy to prevent breach of peace arising from a dispute over actual possession. The Magistrate determines possession at the relevant preliminary-order date, subject to the statutory treatment of recent forcible dispossession, without deciding title or the parties' legal right to possess. Applying M. Siddiq, the Court treated that jurisdiction as temporary and subordinate to adjudication of civil rights by the competent court.	646
Parallel Section 145 proceedings during	Section 145 CrPC proceedings should not continue where a competent civil court is examining title or possession of the same property and can grant	646

civil litigation over the same property	appropriate protective relief. A final civil decision is not necessary before applying this rule. Relying on Ram Sumer Puri Mahant, M. Siddiq and Amresh Tiwari, the Court held that the parties should seek interim protection in their pending civil litigation rather than duplicate it through criminal possession proceedings.
Crop attachment without an emergency finding during pending civil proceedings	The standing-crop attachment under Section 146(1) CrPC was materially illegal where no emergency finding had been recorded, the parties could seek interim orders in pending civil proceedings over the land, and the respondents' application for temporary injunction had already been rejected. The Court quashed both the attachment order and the revisional order sustaining it.	646
Injunction between co-sharers in joint possession	Each co-sharer is treated as in possession of jointly held property. An injunction against another co-sharer requires exclusive possession to that other's exclusion; while possession remains joint, the appropriate remedy is partition. The Court applied this rule to the admitted joint-possession record when rejecting the standing-crop attachment sought after refusal of civil interim relief.	646
Later civil suit and an already concluded Section 145 order	A civil suit filed after a concluded Section 145 CrPC order does not, merely by its institution, require that order to be quashed. The Amresh Tiwari passage adopted by the Court distinguishes that situation from ongoing Section 145 proceedings commenced despite an earlier same-property civil title or possession suit in which protective relief is available.	646
Effect of Section 145 findings before the competent civil court	A summary order under Sections 145–146 CrPC does not bind the competent court's adjudication of title or entitlement to possession. The order may evidence the dispute, parties, preliminary or attachment order, and the possession found by the Magistrate, but the competent court may reach a different finding on the evidence. In this setting, the civil court's determination governs the provisional criminal possession order.	646
Civil interim order departing from an Executive Magistrate's possession arrangement	A competent court ordinarily respects an Executive Magistrate's possession arrangement but retains jurisdiction to make a different interim order in an exceptional case. A strong prima facie showing that the executive order is without jurisdiction, palpably wrong or self-contradictory may justify departure, with reasons recorded. Where the property is attached, the competent court may examine whether to continue the attachment, change the receiver or make another interim arrangement.	646
Section 146 orders—Opportunity to the opposite party	In the pending preventive dispute considered by the Court, an order under Section 146 CrPC required an opportunity for the opposite party to present its case. The SDM could not bypass that opportunity by directing seizure and receivership through administrative correspondence behind that party’s back.	664
	Sub-Chapter no. 13.2 Public Order Directions and Criminal Process
Non-compliance by others does not excuse breach of a preventive-bond order	Failure by other persons to execute their preventive bonds, or by the Executive Magistrate to take further action under Section 141 BNSS, does not validate the petitioner's own non-compliance with an existing order under Sections 126 and 135 BNSS. The Court took that continuing obligation into account when directing its fulfilment as a condition of release.	41
Ordinary Law-and-Order Offences and Public-Order Necessity	Ordinary law and order is distinct from public order. The later offences registered against the petitioner did not, on the material before the Court, show prejudice to public-order maintenance or conduct causing or calculated to cause alarm, danger or harm to person or property. Their registration could not by itself establish the necessity for externment.	454
Pending Section 145 proceedings—	Once Section 145 CrPC proceedings are registered and notices issued, an application for urgent seizure or custody of the disputed crop must be dealt with	664

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Judicial orders for crop seizure and receivership	by an order recorded in those proceedings. An administrative endorsement or letter to the police cannot replace a judicial order appointing a receiver or authorising seizure. The SDM's administrative directions, unsupported by any such order on the order sheets, were beyond his authority.
Section 145(4) CrPC — possession inquiry and the two-month dispossession proviso	The ordinary inquiry under Section 145(4) CrPC concerns possession on the date of the preliminary order under Section 145(1), without determining the merits of a claim to the right to possess. The proviso permits a party forcibly and wrongfully dispossessed to be treated as in possession if dispossession occurred within two months before receipt of the police report or other information by the Magistrate, or after that receipt and before the preliminary order. Continuing dispossession from an earlier date does not satisfy the proviso merely because it persists. Applicability of the time requirement must be decided after finding when dispossession occurred.	703
Proceedings under one statute — no surprise decision under a different statutory power	Parties prepare their evidence and defence by reference to the statutory provision under which proceedings have been initiated. They cannot be taken by surprise through a decision under a different statute requiring different evidence and a different defence. In the remanded Section 145 CrPC matter, the Court therefore declined to decide the suggested alternative powers under Section 133 CrPC or Section 250 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code.	703

Macro Division IV
Bail and Pre-Trial Liberty

Chapter no. 14
Bail Under Special Statutes and Restrictive Conditions

Sub-Chapter no. 14.1
Article 226 Liberty Relief and Exceptional Bail-Type Writ Intervention

Article 226 — no-coercive-action relief after refusal of anticipatory bail	A request to restrain police action while a Collector's inquiry into a suicide note remained pending would, in substance, grant pre-arrest protection after the High Court had refused anticipatory bail under Section 438 CrPC. On these facts, Article 226 could not be used to nullify that refusal. The Court therefore rejected the no-coercive-action request.	16
Conditions imposed on release for breach of arrest safeguards	After finding the arrest illegal, the Court considered the Article 226 bail principles in Arnab Manoranjan Goswami and the petitioner's outstanding preventive-bond obligation. It ordered release on a personal bond of ₹1 lakh with one surety for the same amount to the CJM's satisfaction, execution of the bond or bail bond already directed under Sections 126 and 135 BNSS, a law-and-order undertaking before the CJM, and the other bail conditions. Execution of the preventive bond and the undertaking were conditions precedent to release. The Senior Superintendent of Police was directed to make immediate arrangements enabling compliance while the petitioner remained in custody. These were the conditions of this particular writ relief.	41
Factors governing bail-type liberty relief under Article 226	In an appropriate case seeking liberty under Article 226, the Court considers the nature of the accusation and punishment, risks of interference with witnesses or the complainant, appearance at trial and flight, antecedents and individual circumstances, whether the FIR prima facie discloses the offence, and the interests of the public or State. Arnab Manoranjan Goswami requires caution: the writ jurisdiction is not a routine substitute for the statutory bail remedy. These factors were considered when the Court framed the conditions of release.	41
Anticipatory bail and exceptional Article 226 arrest protection	Registration of a cognizable FIR does not make arrest mandatory. An accused who apprehends arrest may seek Section 438 CrPC relief on its statutory conditions. Article 226 must not routinely be converted into anticipatory-bail	436 proceedings, but exceptional protection may be granted where refusal would cause gross miscarriage of justice and no case for arrest is made out, provided the relief is sparingly exercised and justified by reasons.

	Chapter no. 15 Bail, Anticipatory Bail, Default Bail, Cancellation and Bonds
	Sub-Chapter no. 15.1 Successive Bail, Change in Circumstances and Parity
Successive regular bail and the need for changed circumstances	Although res judicata does not apply to bail applications, a fresh application after rejection on merits must be supported by changed circumstances or valid grounds establishing a tenable new case. Without such a change, reconsidering the same merits amounts to impermissible review of the earlier order. The applicant, who insisted on rearguing merits and identified no changed circumstance, could not maintain his third application under Section 439 CrPC.	28
Successive bail applications before the same judge	The forum-shopping principles relied upon by the Court state that successive bail applications should be heard by the same judge. Repeated applications before different judges in pursuit of a favourable order encourage forum shopping. The principle formed part of the Court's reasons for refusing an unfounded recusal demand in a repeat bail appeal.	107
Bail parity and successive applications — Relevant factors remain decisive	A co-accused's release does not justify granting bail by ignoring the gravity of the accusation and the supporting evidence. The Court applied Bhupat Singh, which declined to treat co-accused bail orders as a precedent where they disregarded material considerations. The adopted passage from Virupakshappa Gouda also disapproves renewed efforts to secure bail on the same factual basis after rejection by a superior court. In the present fourth application, the co-accused's bail order did not secure release merely because most prosecution witnesses had been examined.	112
Delay-based bail and defence contribution to delayed trial	A plea for bail based on trial delay must be assessed against the actual progress of the proceedings. Although the record showed failures of service, non-production of exhibits, witness absence and lockdown interruption, it also disclosed repeated defence requests to defer or avoid cross-examination of witnesses who were present. Finding that the applicant's counsel had adopted delaying tactics, the Court refused the eighth application under Section 439 CrPC.	152
Parity in a successive bail application after earlier rejection	Bail granted to a co-accused did not justify release on parity where the applicant's earlier bail application had been rejected and his criminal antecedents remained material. The co-accused's order had been obtained without disclosure of material antecedents and was itself made subject to a show-cause notice for recall. In these circumstances, the Court rejected the applicant's second application under Section 439 CrPC.	180
Successive bail appeal must disclose material relied on in earlier rejection	A document material to an earlier rejection of bail cannot be withheld in a successive appeal. The joint marriage affidavit was decisive to the first refusal, and its repeated omission after an earlier withdrawal amounted to suppression of material facts. Counsel’s duty to the Court required candid disclosure.	208
Further detention did not establish a changed circumstance for successive bail	Where the first bail appeal had been rejected on merits, the appellant had to identify a change in circumstances supporting renewed relief. The additional period of detention invoked in the third appeal was not accepted as a sufficient change on the facts, and bail was refused.	208
Successive bail on prosecution-caused trial delay	The sixth Section 439 CrPC bail application was allowed because prolonged custody since 24 March 2021 continued while the prosecution failed to secure its witnesses and the police offered an incorrect explanation concerning summons. Bail was granted on a ₹1 lakh personal bond with one surety of the	239

	same amount and attendance before the trial court. The order remained effective through trial, becoming ineffective on a bail jump.
Time-bound trial and personal supervision of police-witness attendance	On the successive bail application based on trial delay, the Court directed a day-to-day trial to conclude within three months of receipt of its order. The Superintendent of Police was made personally responsible for witness attendance; any request to excuse a witness's absence had to be supported by the Superintendent's affidavit stating the reasons. The application was disposed of without an express direction releasing the applicant on bail.	250
Prosecution-caused delay in a successive NDPS bail application	The Court distinguished bona fide delay beyond the prosecution's control, which may justify considering bail, from unjustified nonappearance of State witnesses. It refused to allow such defaults to become a means of securing bail. In this application it refused bail in view of the allegations and expected the remaining witnesses to be examined promptly when normal court functioning resumed.	251
Successive bail application seeking a contrary view on the same minority issue	Where the previous bail application had been rejected in the light of Independent Thought and the school record continued to show that the prosecutrix was below eighteen at the incident, the Court found no ground to take a contrary view on the sixth application. It left the final determination of age to the trial court.	263
Successive Bail: Same-Bench Listing and the 2022 Vacation Exception	Under the roster circular applied in this case, bail applications arising from the same crime and police station or connected case were to be listed before the judge who decided the first criminal revision or bail application. Unavailability of that judge required listing in accordance with the Chief Justice's directions. The temporary summer-vacation exception did not create a continuing entitlement to have later applications heard by the vacation bench, and it expressly excluded repeat applications.	365
Successive Bail: Bench Hunting Through an Earlier Listing	An applicant cannot take advantage of counsel's failure to disclose the proper same-crime bench assignment when an earlier bail application is heard after a temporary roster relaxation has ended. The Court treated the later insistence on returning to that coordinate bench, after taking a chance there without seeking proper listing, as bench hunting and held that the repeat application belonged before the bench assigned the linked earlier matters.	365
Bail Parity: Comparison of the Accused's Actual Role	Parity requires consideration of the accused's actual alleged role and the gravity of that role. It cannot be founded on treating materially different allegations as identical. The respondent was alleged to have participated in the fatal assault and concealment of the deceased's identity, whereas the bailed co-accused were alleged only to have given false information. Ignoring that distinction and describing all as assailants rendered the parity reasoning unsustainable.	367
Successive bail — custody-delay plea without trial order sheets	The Court declined to grant bail on the asserted length of custody when the applicant failed to produce trial order sheets showing that he was not responsible for the delay. The same deficiency had already led to rejection of his delay plea in an earlier application. In the seventh Section 439 CrPC application, following an earlier rejection on merits, the unsupported delay contention did not establish a ground for release.	488
Parity in bail where periods of custody and relevant circumstances differ	Bail granted to a co-accused after one year and five months in custody did not justify parity for an accused detained for less than two months. The Sessions Court had also failed to examine the merits. In setting aside its unreasoned grant, the High Court considered the specific allegations of dowry demand and cruelty, death within three years of marriage, and the accused's abscondence for over a year after recall of her earlier anticipatory bail. These were considerations for bail review, without deciding guilt.	510

Prosecution Witnesses	them, is not by itself sufficient for bail where they support the prosecution. The Court must also consider the prima facie case, gravity of the accusation, likely punishment, risk of absconding or repetition, the accused's circumstances and the interests of justice. On these grounds, completed witness examination did not justify the sixth bail application after the earlier rejection on merits.
Bail-Stage Limits on Assessing Witness Reliability and Credibility	A bail application is not the stage for a trial-like decision on the reliability and credibility of prosecution witnesses. The Court declined to adjudicate the claim that witnesses were unreliable because they supported the prosecution against the applicant but not against some co-accused. Bail requires reasonable or prima facie grounds, rather than proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	523
Parity cannot displace consideration of serious criminal antecedents	Reliance on parity does not justify overlooking an accused's serious criminal antecedents. The narrated decision in Neeru Yadav treats failure to consider a history of heinous offences as a defect in the original grant of bail. Such an order may be set aside for its unsound exercise of discretion, independently of later misconduct.	590
Change in circumstances in a successive bail application	The fifth bail application under Section 439 CrPC was rejected where the applicant showed no change in circumstances after the previous rejection and the deceased's statement implicating him remained available for consideration.	615
Parity with co-accused granted anticipatory bail on payment of mining penalty	A co-accused's anticipatory bail based on payment of a mining penalty did not establish the applicant's entitlement to regular bail on the same basis. The High Court noted that the Sessions Court had not considered its Banti and Rajiv Sharma decisions, and applied the Supreme Court's subsequent Jayant ruling on continuing IPC liability. It refused regular bail and separately issued notice to the co-accused to show cause why his anticipatory-bail order should not be set aside. That notice initiated consideration of the earlier order; it did not itself cancel the co-accused's bail.	670
Successive bail — unresolved identification gap and no substantive evidence	On the second Section 439 CrPC application, the Court found that the identification work noted at the first refusal remained incomplete, no recovery had been made and no substantive admissible evidence was available against the applicant. It granted bail without expressing an opinion on the merits. The applicant's residence outside Madhya Pradesh and three registered criminal cases were addressed by stringent conditions, including cash surety of ₹1,50,000 and attendance before the trial court. Framing of charges did not alter the absence of evidence identified on this record.	674
Renewed bail after non-appearance — detention and the remaining witness's materiality	On the renewed Section 439 CrPC application following cancellation for non-appearance, the Court considered the period of renewed detention and the nature of the witness whose presence had occasioned the earlier cancellation. The witness had registered the FIR and prepared the spot map and, on this record, was not material to the substantive allegations. Those considerations supported fresh conditional release despite the earlier refusal with liberty to renew after that witness's examination.	709
Hostile testimony in a successive bail application	The prosecutrix's hostile testimony, which had already been considered, did not warrant bail in a third application under Section 439 CrPC. The Court considered the earlier finding of pressure on the prosecutrix together with the FSL report recording human sperm on her slide and swab. Because scientific evidence could sustain the prosecution despite hostile testimony, the asserted ground did not justify release.	727
Repeat bail — examination of the prosecutrix is not by itself sufficient for release	The Court rejected a fifth application under Section 439 CrPC based on the contention that examination of the prosecutrix had removed the possibility of pressuring prosecution witnesses. The State submitted that she had supported the prosecution. Relying on Bhupat Singh, the Court held that completed witness examination cannot alone justify bail while the gravity of the	749

	accusations, the supporting evidence and the severity of possible punishment remain relevant. The earlier decision rejected reliance on reduced tampering opportunity in isolation where the material witnesses had supported the prosecution. Applying that reasoning, the Court dismissed the repeat application concerning alleged gang rape, house-trespass, intimidation and POCSO offences.
Successive bail — the same factual basis cannot circumvent a superior court's refusal	In the Virupakshappa Gouda passage reproduced and relied upon through Bhupat Singh, grant of bail was disapproved where earlier applications had been rejected and the matter had already reached the Supreme Court. After that Court declined release, the same factual basis could not properly be projected again to obtain bail contrary to its refusal. The passage characterises that course as improper and treats it as a ground to set aside the grant. In Ramniwas's fifth application, the High Court relied on the quoted bail principles while deciding the separate contention that completed witness examination alone warranted release.	749
Co-accused bail — orders ignoring material factors do not supply controlling parity	The Bhupat Singh order reproduced and relied upon by the Court declined to treat two coordinate-bench orders granting bail to co-accused as precedents in the circumstances described there. The material eyewitnesses had supported the prosecution, and the gravity of the allegations and severity of punishment remained relevant. Bail could not rest only on completed witness examination and the asserted absence of a further opportunity to influence them. That earlier reasoning forms part of the rule applied in dismissing Ramniwas's application; the co-accused identified in the quoted order belonged to Bhupat Singh's case, and no fresh parity claim concerning them was adjudicated here.	749
Defence-caused trial delay in a successive bail application	An assertion of trial delay must be tested against the actual order sheets. In the fourth application under Section 439 CrPC, the record showed repeated adjournments sought by counsel for the accused at the charge stage, followed by a co-accused's absconding. The Court found no delay attributable to the prosecution and rejected the delay ground for bail on this record.	775
Completion of witness examination as a ground for bail	Examination of prosecution witnesses, and the resulting reduction in the risk of influencing them, is not by itself sufficient to grant bail while other material factors remain adverse. Where a witness continued to support the prosecution's seizure evidence against the applicant, completion of witness examination did not justify release.	796
Parity where evidence against co-accused differs	A co-accused's release on bail does not require release of the applicant where the evidentiary position differs. Bail granted after a witness failed to support the case against the co-accused did not overcome another witness's continuing support for the seizure evidence against the applicant.	796
Successive bail — Co-accused release without disclosure of earlier rejection	Judicial discipline requires relevant prior bail decisions to be brought to the coordinate Bench's notice. Where later orders granting bail to co-accused did not note the applicant's earlier rejection on merits, the Court considered his successive application independently rather than treating those releases as decisive parity. It expressly recognised that negative parity does not apply.	828
Successive SC/ST Act bail appeal: hostile testimony and absence of a DNA match	In the fifth appeal under Section 14-A(2) of the SC/ST Act, the Court considered the prosecutrix's intervening examination without support for the prosecution and a newly received DNA report that did not reveal the appellant's profile on the examined articles. Those developments, conceded by the State, were considered with the allegations, duration of detention and need for prison decongestion during the second COVID-19 wave. Conditional bail was granted without expressing an opinion on the merits of the charge.	865
Successive anticipatory bail after withdrawal	A subsequent application under Section 438 CrPC cannot be used to review a coordinate Bench's order allowing withdrawal of the earlier application without liberty to renew, where no objection to that restriction was raised when	870

without liberty to renew	withdrawing. The Court also examined whether circumstances had changed. It found no distinguishing feature between the applicant Sarpanch and the Panchayat Secretary whose anticipatory bail had earlier been refused on merits, as both attended the Gram Sabha that passed the disputed resolution. The asserted subsequent developments did not establish a change in circumstances. The repeat application was therefore refused on merits and in light of the earlier withdrawal order.
SC/ST Act bail parity requires comparison of each accused's actual role, not shared case or superficial weapon label	Under a Section 14A(2) appeal, bail granted to persons alleged only to have supplied a false name did not confer parity on one specifically alleged to have assaulted the victim and helped admit him under a dead man's identity. A separate bail grant to another alleged assailant rested on materially erroneous descriptions of the charge sheet and could not dictate the appellant's release.	897
Framing of charge as a ground for successive bail	After rejection of bail on merits, the later framing of charges does not by itself amount to a favourable change of circumstance. It reflects the trial court's finding of prima facie material warranting trial. Applying Virupakshappa Gouda, which treats filing of a charge-sheet as insufficient to establish a changed circumstance for bail, the Court rejected the same contention based on framing of charges.	932
Proof of trial delay in a successive bail application	A claim of trial delay did not justify successive bail where the applicant produced no order sheets showing delay for which he was not responsible. He also failed to produce the record showing that he had not sought adjournments for arguments on charge. On that record, reliance on Dipak Shubhashchandra Mehta was misplaced. The Court additionally noted the non-disclosure of the dismissed Section 482 challenge to the charge-sheet, and found no changed circumstance warranting bail.	932
Bail parity requires comparison of the accused's role and the allegations	Parity in bail requires comparison of the roles attributed to the accused, their positions in relation to the incident and victim, and the material allegations against each. A bare statement that two cases are identical is insufficient. Applying Ramesh Bhavan Rathod and Shri Mahadev Meena through the reproduced discussion in Sikandar Singh Narvariya, the Court found the father-in-law's case materially different from that of the co-accused daughter-in-law. The latter had received anticipatory bail on vague and omnibus allegations, whereas a specific demand of ₹3 lakh and dowry-related harassment were attributed to the father-in-law. The Sessions Court's failure to examine that difference made its reliance on parity unsustainable.	952
	Sub-Chapter no. 15.2 Regular Bail and Pre-Trial Detention Parameters
State-caused trial delay — bail assessed on the case's circumstances	A finding that the State caused trial delay did not itself compel bail in this Section 439 CrPC application. Having considered the alleged murder arising from a property dispute and the accompanying charges under Sections 201 and 34 IPC, the Court held that the case was not fit for bail. It instead granted monetary redress for the speedy-trial violation and directions to secure the prosecution evidence.	67
Custody and proof of trial delay in a murder bail appeal	The Court could not assess the claim of prolonged custody without trial progress because complete trial-court order sheets had not been filed to show that the appellant or co-accused were not responsible for delay. It also applied Anil Kumar Yadav's observation that one year's custody in a murder case was not excessive. Bail was refused, with liberty to renew the request upon producing the complete order sheets showing that the accused were not responsible for the delay.	107
Pandemic prison	On a second Section 439 CrPC application concerning alleged possession of	108

decongestion in deciding repeat regular bail	liquor unfit for consumption, the Court considered the allegations and the need to decongest prisons during the second COVID-19 wave, and granted conditional bail without deciding the merits. It relied on the Supreme Court's 23.03.2020 prison-decongestion directions under Article 21. Those directions entrusted High Powered Committees with selecting release categories by the nature and severity of offences, sentence and other relevant factors; offences punishable up to seven years were given as an example for consideration.
Examination of prosecution witnesses — Insufficient by itself for bail	Examination of the prosecution witnesses and a resulting reduction in the risk of influencing them do not by themselves justify bail under Section 439 CrPC. The Court must also consider the prima facie case, nature and gravity of the accusation, supporting material, likely punishment, risk of absconding, the accused's character, conduct, means and standing, risk of repetition or obstruction of justice, threats to the complainant and the larger public interest. Applying those considerations, the Court refused the fourth bail application in a prosecution for dacoity with murder, where twenty-nine of thirty-three witnesses had been examined and the trial was at an advanced stage.	112
Bail-stage assessment — Prima facie case, not proof beyond reasonable doubt	At the bail stage, the Court considers whether reasonable grounds support a genuine case against the accused and whether the prosecution can produce prima facie evidence supporting the charge. It does not require evidence establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt at that stage. This limited assessment remains subject to the other relevant considerations governing bail.	112
Section 439 bail after charge-sheet where no admissible substantive link was shown	First regular bail under Section 439 CrPC was granted in a Section 34(2) MP Excise Act case where the charge-sheet had been filed, the applicant had no criminal history, and implication rested solely on an inadmissible co-accused confession without substantive evidence or a TIP. Release required a ₹1,00,000 personal bond and one surety of the same amount, with attendance before the trial court. The order remained effective through trial unless bail was jumped.	146
Hostile prosecutrix does not by itself establish entitlement to bail	The prosecutrix's turning hostile did not by itself justify bail where scientific evidence remained available. Applying Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi, the Court recognised that conviction may be supported by scientific evidence despite hostile testimony and relied, at the bail stage, on the FSL finding of human sperm in the slide and swab. Bail was refused; this was not a final determination of guilt.	175
Criminal antecedents and likelihood of repetition in regular bail	Criminal antecedents and the likelihood of repeating an offence are relevant considerations when deciding bail. Applying the Supreme Court's bail principles, the Court considered the applicant's pending excise cases together with the earlier rejection of bail and declined the second application. The assessment concerned bail and did not determine guilt in the pending cases.	180
Relevant considerations in exercising bail discretion	Bail discretion must be exercised judicially with regard to the prima facie case, nature and gravity of the accusation, supporting material, possible punishment, the accused's individual circumstances and antecedents, risk of absconding or repeating the offence, interference with witnesses or evidence, and the interests of justice and society. No exhaustive list or mechanical rule replaces consideration of the circumstances of the particular case.	180
Prima facie assessment at the bail stage	A court considering bail examines whether there are reasonable grounds and prima facie material supporting the charge. It need not demand proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt or conduct a detailed examination that anticipates conviction or acquittal. Observations made for deciding bail do not bind the outcome of the trial.	180
Custody period considered with antecedents and other bail factors	The period spent in custody is relevant to bail but must be weighed with the totality of the circumstances and the accused's criminal antecedents. Individual liberty must be considered together with the societal concerns involved in release, including the risk posed to victims and witnesses.	180

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Bail where prosecution failure delays a material DNA report	An accused cannot be kept in custody because the prosecution is unable to provide a material DNA report. After repeated opportunities to obtain the report failed because the forensic laboratory lacked consumables and standard kits, the Court placed responsibility for the delay on the prosecution and granted bail without deciding the merits. The prosecutrix had turned hostile, but the report remained relevant to the prosecution case.	182
Pandemic decongestion as an additional consideration for bail	The need to decongest prisons during the second wave of COVID-19 was considered together with the circumstances justifying bail. The reproduced Supreme Court directions left identification of release categories to the High Powered Committee by reference to the offence, sentence or charge severity and other relevant factors. The Court granted bail on the combined circumstances without deciding the merits.	182
Successive bail based on delay after the absent witness is produced	Where earlier bail applications had been rejected on merits and the fifth application relied only on trial delay, the arrest and production of the absent prosecution witness removed the identified apprehension of further delay. The Court therefore found no basis to take a different view on bail and rejected the application under Section 439 CrPC.	184
Regular bail because of prolonged police failure to file the charge-sheet	Where the applicants remained in custody although the police had prepared but not filed the charge-sheet, the Court found no useful purpose in rejecting bail. It granted bail under Section 439 CrPC expressly because of the investigating officer's and SHO's negligence, on a personal bond of Rs. 1,00,000 each with a like surety. The order continued until the end of trial, subject to becoming ineffective on bail jump.	276
Regular Bail: Relevant Factors, Reasons and Prima Facie Assessment	Bail discretion must be exercised judiciously, with cogent reasons addressing the accusation, supporting evidence, severity of punishment, prima facie involvement, antecedents, flight risk and possible interference with witnesses or justice. The court balances liberty with the administration of justice, without determining guilt through a detailed trial-like analysis. Charge-sheet filing, absence of antecedents, trial delay and generic references to these factors did not cure the failure to consider the respondent's distinct alleged role.	367
Regular Bail: Custody Reckoned from the Production-Warrant Request	For this bail application, the Court presumed custody from 21 March 2022, when police sought the applicant's production despite knowing he was imprisoned in another case. It considered that period of detention, the absence of a recovery and the police failure to secure production or formal arrest in granting bail. The custody reckoning was expressly limited to the application before it.	368
Compensation for Illegal Detention Beyond Section 439 CrPC	Section 439 CrPC confines the court to deciding bail and does not authorise compensation for illegal detention. A compensation direction made while deciding a bail application exceeds that jurisdiction and is liable to be set aside.	371
Prima Facie Assessment and Scientific Tests in Bail Proceedings	A court deciding bail considers the gravity of the offence, the nature of the evidence, the accused’s position relative to the victim and witnesses, and the risks of absconding, repetition, witness tampering or obstruction of justice. It assesses whether a prima facie case exists. It must not conduct a meticulous examination of the evidence or order lie-detector, brain-mapping or narco-analysis tests so as to turn the bail hearing into a mini-trial.	371
Collateral Banking Directions in a Bail Application	A court exercising Section 439 CrPC jurisdiction must remain within the issues relevant to bail. Directions distributing money recovered from an accused among bank depositors, with consequences for the working of banks, fall outside that jurisdiction.	371
Retention of a Bail File for Criminal Justice Reform	Jurisdiction under Section 439 CrPC ends when the bail application is finally decided. A court cannot retain the file and issue directions requiring the State to form a committee on the reformation and rehabilitation of accused or	371

Directions	convicted persons under the guise of improving the criminal justice system.
Infructuous Bail Application After Release by Another Court	When a bail application has become infructuous because the District Court has already released the applicant, it should be dismissed as infructuous. That application provides no occasion to decide questions of retesting or wrongful confinement beyond the limits of bail jurisdiction.	371
Criminal Antecedents and Parity in Bail Decisions	Criminal antecedents are a relevant consideration in deciding bail and must be assessed with the nature and gravity of the offences. Parity cannot justify overlooking a serious criminal history. Granting bail on an incomplete account of the antecedents, while material history in the record goes unnoticed, is an improper exercise of discretion.	373
Relevant Factors in Deciding Regular Bail	The court must consider prima facie involvement, the nature and gravity of the charge, likely punishment, the risk of absconding, the accused's character, behaviour, means and standing, the likelihood of repetition, the risk of influencing witnesses, and the danger of obstructing justice. Relevant circumstances peculiar to the accused and the effect of release on witnesses and society also bear on the decision.	373
Vague Apprehension of Witness Tampering and Demonstrated Intimidation Risk	A vague allegation that the accused may tamper with evidence or witnesses may not justify refusing bail. Bail may be refused, however, where the accused's character makes his presence at large intimidating to witnesses, or material shows that he would use liberty to subvert justice or interfere with evidence.	373
Period of Custody Considered with Antecedents and Societal Concerns	The period spent in custody is relevant to bail, but it must be weighed with the total circumstances and the accused's criminal antecedents. The circumstances favouring release must be assessed in the wider context of societal concerns alongside the individual's liberty.	373
Regular bail — final appraisal of prosecution witnesses is reserved for trial	At the bail stage, the Court may assess the prima facie case and the nature and gravity of the offence, but must not decide the credibility or evidentiary value of prosecution witnesses as though conducting the trial. Applying Satish Jaggi, the Court declined to adjudicate alleged discrepancies in the testimony already recorded. A final assessment of witness reliability at that stage could prejudice the pending prosecution.	488
Regular bail during COVID-19 — prison decongestion and the available record	In deciding a first Section 439 CrPC bail application under Sections 8/20 NDPS Act without the case diary, the Court proceeded on the application and the impugned order. It considered the allegations and the need to decongest prisons during COVID-19 and granted conditional bail without expressing an opinion on the merits. The reproduced Supreme Court order required High Powered Committees to identify suitable prisoner categories with regard to the nature and severity of the offence, sentence and other relevant factors; offences punishable up to seven years were an illustration. It did not prescribe automatic release of every prisoner. The applicant's asserted age, lack of knowledge and absence of antecedents remained submissions, with antecedents expressly left for verification before release.	493
Pandemic prison decongestion and High Powered Committee discretion	The Court referred to the Supreme Court's 23 March 2020 directions in In Re: Contagion of COVID-19 Virus in Prisons, which required States and Union Territories to form High Powered Committees to identify categories of prisoners for temporary parole or interim bail. The committees could consider the nature and severity of the offence, sentence and other relevant factors. Offences punishable with up to seven years were an illustrative category for consideration, rather than an automatic entitlement to release. These directions supplied the pandemic context for the bail assessment.	505

accused's Inadmissible Confession	collected call details. The Court also considered prison decongestion during the second COVID-19 wave. Release was expressly without comment on merits and required ₹1,00,000 cash surety. Under this order, a single default in appearance or registration of a new offence would automatically end bail and forfeit the cash surety; bail jump or breach of its conditions would also end the order's effect.
Three Years' Pre-Trial Detention in a Case Punishable with Life Imprisonment	In this successive bail application involving murder, attempted murder and Arms Act allegations, three years of pre-trial detention was not considered sufficient by itself to release the applicant facing an offence punishable with life imprisonment. The Court rejected bail after considering the supporting witness testimony and the limits on assessing its credibility at that stage.	523
Regular bail — prima facie reasons must address the accused's role and gravity of allegations	A bail order must state the factors that justify release, although detailed examination of the evidence or a final assessment of guilt is unnecessary. General statements that the record and circumstances have been considered do not demonstrate application of mind. The Court found the Special Judge's references to flight risk, tampering, antecedents and possible trial delay insufficient because the order did not address the allegation that a teacher had repeatedly raped a minor pupil aged about sixteen years or the gravity of that allegation. It set aside the bail order for this failure to consider the material circumstances.	545
Hostile prosecution witnesses and bail where material eyewitnesses remain unexamined	The fact that four examined eyewitnesses had not supported the prosecution did not secure bail in this murder case. The Court found that two other material eyewitnesses had been wrongly given up and directed steps for their examination. Considering those circumstances and the allegation of a fatal firearm assault, it declined bail under Section 439 CrPC.	557
Temporary bail where pending sanction prevents trial progress	Where prosecution sanction had not been obtained and the trial could not proceed, the Court held that the accused could not remain detained without progress in the trial. It treated the alleged receipt of illegal gratification by a CBI inspector during a court-directed inspection as especially serious, but balanced that gravity against the stalled proceedings and granted temporary bail.	569
Temporary regular bail distinguished from default bail	The temporary release was granted because detention continued without progress in the trial, and not under the statutory default-bail provisions of Section 167(2) CrPC or Section 187 BNSS. The order therefore rested on the regular-bail assessment of stalled proceedings rather than a determination of the statutory default-bail entitlement.	569
Relevant considerations in exercising bail discretion	Bail discretion must be exercised judicially in the circumstances of the case. Relevant considerations include prima facie support for the accusation, its nature and gravity, the likely punishment, the accused's character and antecedents, the risk of absconding or repeating the offence, possible influence on witnesses or tampering with evidence, and the danger of obstructing justice. The accused's liberty must be considered with the interests of victims, society and a fair trial. These considerations are not an exhaustive checklist, and no single formula decides every bail application.	590
Prima facie assessment at the bail stage	A bail court should assess whether the material discloses a genuine prima facie case, without conducting a detailed evaluation of evidence or an elaborate determination of guilt. Its reasons must address the material circumstances while avoiding conclusions suggesting that conviction or acquittal is already assured. Observations made when deciding bail do not bind the outcome of the trial.	590
Custody period as one factor in deciding bail	The period already spent in custody must be weighed with the totality of the circumstances and any criminal antecedents. Custody duration cannot be assessed in isolation from the societal concern involved in releasing the accused	590 and the individual's claim to liberty.

Regular bail for prolonged custody and prosecution-caused trial delay	An undertrial cannot remain in custody indefinitely at the prosecution's mercy. Despite the serious charge of a fatal lathi assault under Section 302/34 IPC, custody since December 2016 and unexplained prosecution delay in producing official witnesses justified bail under Section 439 CrPC. The assessment did not decide the merits of the accusation.	621
COVID-19 prison decongestion: category assessment by High Powered Committees	The Supreme Court's March 2020 prison-decongestion direction required each State or Union Territory to constitute a High Powered Committee to determine suitable categories for parole or interim bail. The suggested category of offences punishable up to seven years was illustrative. Selection remained for the committee, having regard to the offence, sentence or charge and other relevant factors; the direction did not confer automatic release.	621
Surrender Before Seeking Regular Bail While on Pandemic Parole	An undertrial released on parole in the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic was held not to satisfy the custody requirement for an application under Section 439 CrPC until surrender before the trial court. Applying the narrated Niranjan Singh v. Prabhakar Rajaram Kharote test, custody requires physical control or at least physical presence in court coupled with submission to its jurisdiction and orders. The Court recalled bail granted on an incorrect impression of six months' actual custody when the applicant had already been released on undisclosed parole, and permitted a renewed bail request after surrender.	657
Distinction Between Parole and Temporary Bail for Section 439 Custody	Parole and bail have different legal meanings even though both permit release from confinement. In deciding whether a pandemic parolee could apply under Section 439 CrPC without surrender, the Court applied the narrated distinctions in State of Haryana v. Mohinder Singh and Sunil Fulchand Shah v. Union of India. It declined to apply Kanaksinh Mohansinh Mangrola v. State of Gujarat, which concerned an accused on temporary bail rather than parole. Continued control during parole was not treated as sufficient Section 439 custody in this case.	657
Counting Pandemic Parole When Assessing an Undertrial's Detention	The Court held that the pandemic-parole period before it could not be counted towards the undertrial's period of detention. It noted that Section 31-A of the Prisoners Act, 1900 and the Madhya Pradesh Prisoners' Leave Rules, 1989 govern convicted prisoners and do not directly apply to undertrials, but took guidance from Section 31-A(4), which excludes release time from sentence computation. The applicant did not claim that his parole order required the period to be counted. The Court distinguished the statutory preventive-detention context of Sunil Fulchand Shah rather than treating every form of temporary release as actual detention.	657
Declaration of Parole Status in a Regular-Bail Application	Whenever an application under Section 439 CrPC is filed, the applicant must declare that he is not on parole. The Court issued this requirement after a bail application founded on the duration of actual custody failed to disclose that the applicant had already been released on pandemic parole.	657
Magistrate-triable non-bailable offence — gravity remains relevant to bail	An accused does not acquire a right to bail merely because a non-bailable offence is triable by a Magistrate. Adopting its Rajiv Sharma decision in the illegal sand-mining context, the Court explained that the allegations and gravity of the offence must still be considered. The reproduced reasoning treated harm to rivers, the environment and aquatic life, together with loss of royalty to the State, as relevant to the assessment. Magistrate triability could not require the Court to disregard those considerations.	670
Bail discretion — relevant factors and prima facie assessment without a trial	Bail requires a case-specific balance between personal liberty and the administration of justice. Relevant factors include prima facie involvement, the nature and gravity of the accusation, possible punishment, supporting evidence, risk of flight, antecedents and circumstances of the accused, repetition of offending, witness influence or threats to the complainant, and obstruction of	707 justice. The genuineness or frivolity of the prosecution must also be considered; doubt about its genuineness ordinarily favours bail. The factors are illustrative, not exhaustive. Detailed assessment to establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt belongs to trial; bail nevertheless requires reasonable grounds supporting the prima facie assessment.

COVID-19 prison decongestion — High Powered Committee assessment of release categories	The reproduced Supreme Court direction required each State or Union Territory to constitute a High Powered Committee to determine categories of prisoners for parole or interim bail during the pandemic, having regard to Article 21 and prison overcrowding. The Committee was to consider the offence, sentence or severity of the charge and other relevant factors. The reference to offences punishable with up to seven years, and prisoners sentenced below the maximum, was illustrative; it did not confer automatic release on every prisoner within that description.	709
Witness influence through the prosecutrix's representation	An accused cannot arrange a lawyer for the prosecutrix to obtain an affidavit of his own choice. The accused's procurement of her vakalatnama before her examination, and its possession by his own counsel for engaging another lawyer, supported the Court's finding that he was attempting to influence prosecution witnesses. That conduct was material to refusal of bail.	727
Witness influence through procurement of the prosecutrix's vakalatnama	An accused cannot engage a lawyer for the prosecutrix to procure an affidavit of his own choice. The accused's procurement of her vakalatnama, which his counsel held for arranging representation and a favourable affidavit, supported the finding of an attempt to win over prosecution witnesses. The Court treated that conduct as a ground to refuse bail under Section 439 CrPC.	728
Withdrawal of bail application amid witness-influence findings	The Court refused permission to withdraw the bail application after finding that the accused had procured the prosecutrix's vakalatnama for representation intended to produce a favourable no-objection affidavit. In those circumstances, it rejected the withdrawal request and dismissed the application.	728
Bail is temporary liberty — balance between under-trial, society and complainant	The Court stated that release on bail cannot be equated with acquittal. Bail gives temporary respite to an accused so that the rights of the under-trial, society and the complainant can be balanced. Here, bail had been granted in view of detention already undergone and on conditions requiring a ₹5,00,000 deposit and cash surety. Those conditions and the grant of liberty did not justify projecting release as a public victory. The Court applied the distinction between provisional release and acquittal while examining the procession, firing and challenge to the complainant, and cancelled bail for the resulting misuse of liberty.	746
Bail discretion — accusation, evidence, liberty risks and public interests must be assessed together	The bail principles adopted through Bhupat Singh and Virupakshappa Gouda require consideration of the prima facie case, the nature and gravity of the accusation, supporting evidence and likely punishment. Relevant factors also include the risk of flight, securing the accused’s presence, character and conduct, means and standing, the likelihood of repetition, witness influence or threats, and obstruction of justice. The larger interests of the public and State must be considered with the individual’s liberty. The reproduced Neeru Yadav reasoning requires decisions under established legal parameters rather than whim. In the present application, the Court applied this assessment instead of treating completed examination of witnesses as sufficient by itself.	749
Bail-stage proof — reasonable grounds and prima facie support, not proof beyond reasonable doubt	The CBI v. V. Vijay Sai Reddy passage reproduced through Virupakshappa Gouda and Bhupat Singh explains the evidentiary assessment required for bail. The court considers whether there is a genuine case against the accused and whether the prosecution can produce prima facie evidence supporting the charge. At that stage, it is not expected to have evidence establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt. This distinction forms part of the adopted assessment of the accusation and supporting evidence. It supported the Court’s refusal to	749 decide the repeat application solely by whether witnesses had already testified.

Regular bail: alleged leading role, defence delay and absconding co-accused	While considering bail in a prosecution under Sections 420 and 406/34 IPC, the Court considered the allegation that the applicant led a scheme of taking vehicles on rent and mortgaging them, together with delay attributable to defence counsel and a co-accused's absconding. On those factors it refused bail, while permitting renewal after the absconding co-accused surrendered. The assessment concerned bail and did not determine guilt at trial.	775
Relevant factors governing regular bail	Bail requires consideration of the prima facie accusation and supporting material, gravity of the offence, possible punishment, risk of absconding, the accused's circumstances and conduct, likelihood of repetition, interference with witnesses, and the interests of justice and the public. Reduced risk of witness interference does not displace the remaining factors.	796
Prima facie standard in deciding bail	At the bail stage, the Court considers whether there is a genuine case supported by prima facie material. It is not expected to require evidence establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	796
Bail-stage age finding — Risk of prejudicing the trial	A finding on the prosecutrix's age is ordinarily unnecessary at the bail stage while the trial is pending, because it may prejudice the trial court. The Court undertook the age assessment here only after counsel expressly insisted on a finding despite that caution.	823
Section 436A CrPC — Two years' custody and statutory release claim	In the prosecution before the Court, where the minimum sentence was ten years, custody of about two years had not given the applicant a statutory right to release under Section 436A CrPC.	823
Bail — Threats and violence to influence trial witnesses	Allegations of threats and armed violence intended to force witnesses to change their testimony are material to bail because they indicate interference with the administration of justice. The Court treated the alleged attack on the complainant's family for that purpose as a ground to refuse release, while recognising the victim's interest in effective criminal justice alongside the accused's liberty.	828
Bail orders — Restraint in detailed discussion of merits	Detailed discussion and elaborate documentation of merits should ordinarily be avoided in a bail order because of their potential effect on the trial. The Court warned counsel of that risk and recorded detailed reasons only after counsel insisted despite the warning.	828
Regular bail — Relevant factors for judicial discretion	Bail requires consideration of the prima facie grounds connecting the accused to the offence, the nature and gravity of the accusation, supporting evidence and the severity of possible punishment. Relevant risks include absconding, repetition of the offence, threats to the complainant, influence on witnesses and obstruction of justice. The accused's character, behaviour, means, position and standing must also be considered.	828
Bail precedents — Application in their factual context	Observations in Sanjay Chandra cannot be applied mechanically to every bail request. The nature of the offence and the manner of its commission require independent consideration, and the Court must understand the factual context of the precedent before applying it.	828
Use of a forged certificate to obtain bail: effect on discretionary relief	The Court refused bail in the forgery case in view of the applicant's use of a forged age certificate in earlier bail proceedings to mislead the Court and obtain release. It held that this conduct warranted no sympathetic exercise of bail discretion. The ruling concerned the Section 439 application arising from the separate certificate-forgery FIR.	874
Bail in cheating cases — repayment offer and the prohibition on debt	A court deciding bail or anticipatory bail cannot act as the complainant's recovery agent. Applying the principle stated in Dilip Singh, the Court declined the accused's offer to deposit one-third of the allegedly cheated amount and	892 recovery	considered the bail application on its merits.

Corporate nominee's lack of civil liability does not answer alleged personal participation in depositor fraud at bail stage	For a nominee shareholder in a company allegedly collecting unlicensed deposits, the asserted absence of civil liability during the director's lifetime did not negate witness accounts that the nominee himself induced deposits by promising doubled returns; bail was refused on those prima facie allegations.	892
Grant of bail — reasoned assessment of relevant factors without deciding guilt	Bail discretion must be exercised judicially with reasons reflecting the record. Relevant, non-exhaustive factors include prima facie involvement, genuineness of the prosecution, the charge's nature and gravity, supporting evidence, likely punishment, risk of absconding or repeating the offence, the accused's character, behaviour, means and standing, interference with witnesses or evidence, threats to the victim or complainant and their relatives or friends, and obstruction of justice. Social standing alone is insufficient. A doubt about the genuineness of the prosecution ordinarily favours bail. The Court must balance liberty and the administration of justice without a detailed determination of guilt; formulaic references to the facts and circumstances do not replace reasons.	897
Regular bail where an acknowledged legal hurdle prevents progress of trial	For the Section 439 CrPC application, the Court considered the prosecution's admission that the trial could not presently proceed because sanction for prosecution of the public servants was awaited. The applicant was a private person, and the charge-sheet had been filed. Given the acknowledged lack of progress and the presumption of innocence until guilt is established, the Court held that she could not be left to languish in custody and granted bail. The decision rested on those circumstances and did not independently decide whether sanction was legally required for prosecution of the private applicant.	928
Later filing of a charge-sheet and the grounds for regular bail	The fact that a charge-sheet was filed after the bail application did not prevent consideration of the present inability of the trial to proceed. The Court was deciding regular bail under Section 439 CrPC on that ground, rather than a claim to statutory default bail. It therefore rejected the investigating officer's objection based on the sequence of filing, without determining any default-bail period or entitlement.	928
Lawful pre-trial detention and the safeguards in Section 436A CrPC	Pre-trial detention is not punishment, but detention authorised by law for a non-bailable offence is not, merely for that reason, contrary to Article 21. The Court treated Section 436A CrPC as a guide to custody duration. For offences outside its death-penalty exception, the reproduced provision requires release on personal bond, with or without sureties, after one-half of the maximum term, subject to the court's power to continue detention after hearing the Public Prosecutor and recording written reasons, or to grant bail instead. Detention cannot exceed the maximum term, and delay caused by the accused is excluded from the calculation. The applicant had not claimed to have reached the half-term threshold.	932
Temporary bail to arrange accommodation for a spouse	Temporary bail sought to arrange accommodation for the applicant's wife was refused because the available family support did not establish that nobody could look after her. The applicant's mother was alive, and the asserted estrangement from the wife's parents following a marriage without their consent was unsupported by the record.	932
Regular bail in a case of a medical certificate used to obtain judicial relief	For the first application under Section 439 CrPC, the Court considered the police inquiry reporting forged hospital records and a medical certificate used to obtain another person's anticipatory bail. The alleged interference with the administration of justice, assessed on that inquiry record, weighed against bail. The application was refused on the circumstances of the case.	989

	Sub-Chapter no. 15.3 Bail Conditions, Surety and Conduct Restrictions
Medical screening and safe transit under pandemic bail directions	Applying the Supreme Court's 07.04.2020 safe-transit directions, the Court required medical examination before release and a COVID-19 test if the doctor considered it necessary. If the applicant was not suspected of infection or tested negative, the local administration was to arrange transport home; a positive result required immediate hospital treatment. The applicant had to follow applicable pandemic instructions and provide the bail order to the police station of his residence. Breach of those instructions would make the order ineffective and result in return to custody.	108
Stringent bail conditions where witnesses turn hostile after pressure by the accused	Where the accused had obtained witness affidavits before cross-examination and the Court found that he had pressured the witnesses, their subsequent hostility led to grant of bail only on stringent conditions, without any finding on the merits. The order required ₹3 lakh cash surety, attendance before the trial court and twice-monthly attendance before the SHO, with compliance reports to the trial court. It expressly provided for automatic cessation of bail and forfeiture of the cash surety upon a single attendance default or registration of a new offence. These conditions arose from the circumstances of this bail application.	130
Medical screening and safe transit on release during COVID-19	The pandemic-related release directions required medical examination before release, COVID-19 testing if advised by the doctor, and arrangements for safe return home where infection was not suspected or the test was negative. A person testing positive was to be sent promptly to the appropriate hospital for treatment. These safeguards implemented the Supreme Court's directions that released prisoners receive safe transit or access to temporary shelter during lockdown.	182
Bail in public-money misappropriation cases — exceptional consideration of voluntary deposit	In an exceptional case alleging misappropriation of public money, the court may consider an accused’s voluntary offer to account for the whole or part of that money before finally considering bail or anticipatory bail, where the deposit serves the larger public interest. This approach does not extend to private disputes alleging cheating of private parties’ money. Applying that principle, the Court accepted the voluntary offer of ₹10 lakh and made release conditional on deposit with the State Civil Supplies Corporation within the stipulated time, proof of payment and the required bond and surety.	334
Bail protection — compliance with undertaking to withdraw parallel writ petition	Where the applicant undertook to withdraw a parallel writ petition carrying interim protection against coercive steps, the bail order expressly provided that failure to withdraw that petition would automatically cancel the protection. Subject to that condition, the order was to remain effective until the end of trial, but would become ineffective on bail jump, leaving the trial court free to take the applicant into custody.	334
Pandemic bail — medical screening, surety, transit and compliance conditions	The case-specific release order required a ₹1,00,000 personal bond, an undertaking to follow the applicable COVID-19 instructions, and a surety of the same amount within one month after the lockdown was completely lifted. The jail authorities had to arrange medical examination and testing if the doctor considered it necessary. Following the reproduced Supreme Court transit directions, the local administration was to arrange travel home if the applicant was not suspected of infection or tested negative; a positive result required hospital treatment. Antecedents had to be checked before release, and additional registered cases would make the order ineffective. Bail continued until conclusion of trial subject to Sections 437 and 439 CrPC and the stated conditions. Breach of public-health instructions required return to custody; bail jump or violation of any condition would also end the order's effect. A copy had to be supplied to the police station for the applicant's residence.	493

COVID-19 compliance conditions in the anticipatory-bail order	In the anticipatory-bail order made during the COVID-19 pandemic, release was conditional on appearance before the Investigating Officer by 23 September 2021 and a personal bond of ₹1 lakh with one surety of the same amount for each appellant. The appellants had to undertake compliance with government and local COVID-19 instructions, supply the order to the police station for their residence, and observe the other Section 438 CrPC conditions. The order expressly provided that breach of its conditions would terminate its effect and directed custody for violation of the specified public-health instructions.	505
Intimation of grant of bail to the complainant	Applying Aparna Bhat v. State of Madhya Pradesh, the Court directed that intimation of the grant of anticipatory bail be sent to the complainant. This notification direction formed part of the disposal of the appellants' SC/ST Act bail appeal.	505
COVID-19 Bail Release: Medical Screening, Safe Transit and Compliance Conditions	Applying the Supreme Court's prison-decongestion and safe-transit directions during the COVID-19 pandemic, the Court required examination by a competent doctor before release and testing if medically indicated. A suspected-free or test-negative applicant was to be sent home through local administrative arrangements; a positive applicant was to receive hospital treatment. The bail order required compliance with governmental COVID-19 instructions and provided for loss of its effect and return to custody upon breach.	521
Attendance and surrender on production of prosecution sanction	The Court required a personal bond of Rs. 1,00,000 with one surety in the same amount and attendance before the trial court on each fixed date. Its express sanction-linked direction kept temporary bail effective until prosecution sanction was filed, and required surrender on the date the CBI produced that sanction.	569
Pandemic-era bail: release safeguards, surety and compliance	In this 2020 bail order, release required a ₹1 lakh personal bond, with an equal surety to be furnished within one month after the lockdown was completely lifted. Medical examination, testing if medically advised, treatment if positive and safe transit home if cleared were directed. Compliance with pandemic directions and the other bail conditions was required; the order specified that breach or bail jump would end its operation. Bail otherwise continued until conclusion of trial.	621
Bail with cash surety — attendance and further-offence conditions	In granting bail despite the applicant's out-of-State residence and criminal history, the Court required cash surety of ₹1,50,000 and appearance on the trial court's dates. Its order was to remain effective until the end of trial, subject to termination on bail jump. The Court further specified that a single default in appearance or registration of a new offence would automatically end the bail order and forfeit the cash surety without a further reference to the Court. These were the express conditions imposed in this case.	674
Fresh bail after a bail jump — bond deposit, surety and continuing compliance	Fresh release after the earlier bail jump was conditioned on depositing the amount of the previous bail bond and furnishing a personal bond of Rs.1,00,000 with one surety for the same amount. The order retained the applicable conditions under Sections 437 and 439 CrPC and required compliance with the then-operative governmental and local COVID-19 instructions. Bail was to continue until the conclusion of trial, but the order expressly provided that it would lose effect on another bail jump or breach of its conditions.	709
Pandemic release safeguards — medical examination, treatment and safe transit	Under the pandemic directions applied in this order, release required examination by a competent doctor and COVID-19 testing if medically considered necessary. A person not suspected of infection or testing negative was to receive arrangements for safe travel home; a positive case was to be sent promptly to the appropriate hospital for treatment. The reproduced Supreme Court direction also required safe transit or the option of temporary shelter during lockdown so that released prisoners were not stranded. The bail recipient	709 had to follow the applicable public-health instructions and provide the order to the police station of residence.

Anticipatory bail — Voluntary deposit of allegedly misappropriated public money	In exceptional cases involving alleged misappropriation of public money, the Court may consider an accused's voluntary offer to deposit all or part of that money before finally considering bail, where the larger public interest and circumstances justify it. This approach is not warranted in private cheating disputes. On the applicant's offer, protection was made conditional on depositing ₹10 lakh with the State Civil Supplies Corporation and appearing before the investigating officer with the receipt by 28 September 2024, followed by a ₹1 lakh personal bond and one surety of the same amount. Failure to deposit or appear by that date would automatically end the protection.	821
Intimation of bail to the complainant	Relying on Aparna Bhat v. State of Madhya Pradesh, the Court directed that the complainant be informed of the grant of anticipatory bail.	842
Pandemic bail order: compliance undertaking and cessation on breach	The appellant's release was made conditional on an undertaking to follow applicable COVID-19 directions and compliance with the other bail conditions. The order was to operate until conclusion of trial, but expressly provided that a bail jump or breach of its conditions would cause it to lose effect. For breach of the pandemic directions, the local administration or police were directed to take the appellant into custody and return him to the same jail. A copy of the order was also to be supplied to the police station for his place of residence.	865
Pandemic bail: health safeguards, safe transit and pre-release verification	Applying the reproduced Supreme Court safe-transit directions, the Court required medical examination, a COVID test if the doctor considered it necessary, treatment in hospital if positive, and arrangements to send the applicant home if not suspected or testing negative. Release required a ₹1,00,000 personal bond and one surety for the same amount, compliance with pandemic instructions and supply of the order to the local police station. The trial court had to verify criminal antecedents and previous pandemic parole; additional registered offences or an earlier temporary-parole release would end the order before release. The order operated until trial ended, subject to its stated lapse upon bail jumping or breach of conditions.	878
Bail in public-money misappropriation cases — exceptional consideration of a voluntary deposit	In an exceptional case alleging misappropriation of public money, the court may consider an accused's voluntary offer to account for all or part of that money and permit its deposit in the larger public interest before finally considering anticipatory or regular bail. This approach is not warranted in private disputes concerning money allegedly lost through cheating. In considering regular bail for a society computer operator accused of feeding false procurement entries, the Court treated his asserted pressure from others as insufficient to make his own act irrelevant to possible responsibility. Taking account of more than four months in custody and his voluntary offer, it made release conditional on depositing ₹10 lakh with Madhya Pradesh State Civil Supplies Corporation Limited, producing the receipt, and furnishing a ₹1 lakh personal bond with one surety for the same amount.	880
	Sub-Chapter no. 15.4 Anticipatory Bail and Pre-Arrest Protection
Anticipatory bail and consent induced through marriage affidavits	In deciding the first application under Section 438 CrPC in a case under Section 376(2)(n) IPC, the Court considered the marriage and divorce affidavits obtained by the applicant. It viewed those documents as a fraud on the prosecutrix and treated the consent so obtained as falling within Section 375 Fourthly IPC. On that assessment, the Court refused anticipatory bail.	156
Anticipatory bail — ordinary duration and reasoned limits	Protection under Section 438 CrPC ordinarily need not be limited to a fixed period and may continue until the end of trial. Summons, appearance or framing of charge do not normally end it. Special facts may justify limiting protection	304

	to a period or event, but reasons must be recorded. Applying Sushila Aggarwal and Nathu Singh, the Court held that the unrestricted anticipatory-bail order in this case continued through trial and did not expire merely because the charge-sheet was filed and the applicants appeared before the Magistrate.
Anticipatory bail—evasion of arrest and risk of witness pressure	Anticipatory bail was refused in the gang-rape prosecution after the Court found that the applicant was avoiding arrest, the investigation had unduly favoured him and the rejected closure report did not merit acceptance. On the totality of those circumstances, the possibility of pressure on witnesses could not be ruled out.	413
Summons or arrest warrant after closure rejection—anticipatory-bail claim	The objection that the Special Judge should have issued summons instead of an arrest warrant on rejecting the closure report did not justify anticipatory bail in this case. The Court reasoned that even on summons the applicant would have to appear and seek regular bail before the trial court.	417
Anticipatory bail in the corruption prosecution—prima facie material	The Court refused anticipatory bail after considering the prima facie allegations of wrongly sanctioned grants, the unexamined HRA allegation, the rejected closure report and the seriousness of corruption. Those were observations for the bail application while the cognizance order was separately under challenge.	417
Fact-dependent limit of anticipatory bail until filing of the charge-sheet	Applying Sushila Aggarwal to the circumstances of this case, the Court upheld the parents-in-law's anticipatory bail but limited its duration to the filing of the charge-sheet. On that date they were required to seek regular bail. That application was to be considered afresh, without influence from observations made while investigation was incomplete. The direction imposed a case-specific limit rather than requiring every anticipatory-bail order to expire with the charge-sheet.	461
Anticipatory Bail in an Excise Case Involving a Large Quantity of Liquor and Flight	In the prosecution under Sections 34(2) and 49-A of the M.P. Excise Act, anticipatory bail was refused having regard to the large quantity of OP liquor and packing material, the applicant's flight on seeing the police, and Section 59-A of the Act. The Court assessed these circumstances at the pre-arrest stage without finally deciding guilt.	532
Anticipatory bail in a housing-allotment dispute: unexplained delay and corrective offer	In assessing anticipatory bail for alleged cheating and criminal breach of trust over excessive plot allotments, the Court considered that payments had gone to the society or Collector, a public cancellation notice had followed shortly afterwards and the police complaint was made over twelve years later without explanation. The applicant offered leases within the 3,000-square-foot allotment limit and refund of the excess payment. With investigation at an initial stage, these circumstances supported conditional protection under Section 438 CrPC. Whether the larger allotments were a mistake or deliberate deception remained undecided. Protection required appearance, a personal bond and surety, availability for interrogation, production of original documents required by the investigating officer, non-interference with evidence or witnesses, and compliance with Section 438(2).	551
Public prosecutor's duty of accurate assistance in remote bail hearings	Where a video hearing leaves the physical case diary with government counsel and the Court must rely on counsel's reading, the public prosecutor has a heightened duty to state the allegations and identify documents accurately. Repeatedly describing an instrument titled a sale deed as an agreement to sell failed that duty. The Court accepted the eventual unconditional apology without imposing a separate disciplinary penalty.	628
Anticipatory bail: inconsistent later transfer undermining the loan defence	In the cheating and conspiracy case, the applicants had consented to a notarised sale deed allegedly executed for ₹9.4 lakh, followed by another notarised deed to the executant's daughter without consideration. Their assertion that the first instrument was intended only as a loan document was unsupported because it did not explain the later deed to the daughter. On the totality of those	628

	circumstances, the Court refused anticipatory bail under Section 438 CrPC.
Bail assessment: distinguishing a sale deed from an agreement to sell	The actual nature of a disputed instrument must be correctly identified when assessing a cheating allegation for anticipatory bail. A sale deed relating to property worth more than ₹100 requires registration and is materially different from an agreement to sell. Here, the Court treated obtaining notarisation instead of registration as evasion of stamp duty, while recognising that stamp duty was payable by the purchaser.	628
COVID-19 prison overcrowding — Article 21 decongestion concerns informed individual anticipatory-bail discretion	The reproduced Supreme Court order linked prison overcrowding during COVID-19 to Article 21 and required State and Union Territory High Powered Committees to identify categories for parole or interim bail. Categories were left to the committees, considering offence nature or severity, sentence and other relevant factors; the reference to offences punishable up to seven years was illustrative. Considering the allegations and the deteriorating second-wave situation, the High Court granted one applicant conditional anticipatory bail without expressing a view on merits.	639
Anticipatory bail in dowry-death allegations—Nature and gravity	The nature and gravity of the allegations must be considered when deciding anticipatory bail. Death within four years of marriage, together with a written police complaint of dowry harassment made by the deceased during her lifetime and the other material against the applicant, weighed against pre-arrest bail. The detailed observations made for deciding bail were not to prejudice the trial court.	665
Addition of a non-bailable offence — significance of the earlier bail assessment	Where bail was granted after considering the material on record, mere addition of further penal sections without additional material does not by itself require the accused to surrender and return to custody. That qualification did not govern an earlier release granted solely because the offences were described as bailable, without considering the allegations. When Section 307 IPC was subsequently taken into cognizance, the allegations therefore required consideration in deciding the fresh anticipatory-bail application.	707
Anticipatory bail subject to timely appearance and cooperation	Without commenting on the merits, the Court granted anticipatory bail on the condition that the applicant appear before the investigating or arresting officer by 18 January 2022 and furnish a personal bond of ₹1,00,000 with one surety for the same amount. She was required to attend interrogation when called and comply with Section 438(2) CrPC. Failure to appear by the specified date would make the protective order ineffective and leave the investigating officer free to take her into custody.	842
Anticipatory bail — professional status, nonappearance and misleading disclosure	Status as a practising advocate does not confer an exemption from criminal law or, by itself, justify leniency; a lawyer is expected to uphold the law, and the Court viewed its alleged violation by a legally informed person seriously. Although the applicant had received a Section 41A CrPC notice and had not been arrested during investigation, he had not appeared before the Magistrate when the charge-sheet was filed. His earlier quashing petition described him as a student despite Bar Association membership since 2020, and counsel could not explain the misleading description. The Court rejected the assurance that he had approached it with clean hands and would not mislead it, and refused anticipatory bail on the totality of these circumstances and the alleged forcible removal and assault.	883
Anticipatory bail — marriage certificate from an institution acting despite a subsisting restraint	The Court rejected reliance on a marriage certificate issued by the particular Arya Samaj institution that had been restrained from performing marriages in Shalu Sharma. The review stay concerned a separate direction to the representative body to amend its guidelines; the restraint against the institution itself remained in force on the material before the Court. It treated the marriage performed in breach of that restraint as invalid. The certificate therefore did not support the applicant's request for anticipatory bail in the alleged minor's rape	1007

	Sub-Chapter no. 15.5 Cancellation of Bail and Misuse of Liberty
Show-cause notice for recall of bail obtained by suppressing antecedents	Where material criminal antecedents appeared to have been suppressed when a co-accused obtained bail, the Court directed notice requiring him to explain why the bail order should not be recalled and ordered registration of a separate cancellation proceeding. The order initiated that process and did not itself cancel the co-accused's bail.	180
Witness intimidation after testimony as a ground for cancelling bail	Threatening prosecution witnesses to compel a compromise may amount to misuse of bail even after they have testified. Completion of their examination does not eliminate the possibility of pressure to secure a compromise, and the risk is greater where another material witness remains unexamined. In the circumstances considered, threats accompanied by gunfire and false counter-complaints justified cancellation under Section 439(2) CrPC.	221
Cancellation of bail for misuse of liberty and proper conduct of trial	Cancellation of bail requires care and cannot serve as punishment for merely perceived indiscipline. That caution does not prevent cancellation where post-release intimidation and false complaints show misuse of liberty affecting the proper conduct of trial. The Court distinguished Bhuri Bai because the application concerned such subsequent misuse.	221
Forum for cancellation of bail: misuse of liberty and erroneous grant	Where bail cancellation is sought because the accused misused liberty after release, the application lies before the court that granted bail. Where the complaint is that bail was wrongly granted without considering material on record, the challenge lies before a superior court. Section 439(2) CrPC does not confer a power to review the original bail order on its merits; Section 362 bars such review in the absence of an express enabling provision.	245
Cancellation of anticipatory bail — consequential release by Magistrate	A separate challenge to the Magistrate's release order was unnecessary where that order merely implemented a continuing High Court grant of anticipatory bail. The Magistrate had accepted bonds because anticipatory bail already existed and had not independently assessed the facts, seriousness or gravity of the allegations. That consequential order did not support the applicants' contention that the earlier protection had merged into a separate regular-bail grant, preventing its cancellation.	304
Bail: Setting Aside an Unjustified Grant and Cancellation for Later Conduct	Scrutiny of the original grant of bail differs from cancellation based on later misconduct, breach of conditions or supervening circumstances. An original grant may be set aside where it is perverse, illegal or unjustified because the court ignored material facts or exercised discretion arbitrarily. Applying that distinction under Section 439(2) CrPC, the Court set aside the bail order for non-application of mind to the prosecution record.	367
Setting Aside Bail for Failure to Consider Material Antecedents	Bail may be cancelled for misuse of liberty or set aside because the granting court overlooked material factors bearing on the decision. Where the court failed to consider the accused's extensive criminal history available in the record, the original bail order could be set aside without requiring subsequent misconduct as the sole basis for interference. A superior court ordinarily respects bail discretion exercised on relevant material, but may intervene where the order suffers from serious infirmity or perversity.	373
Setting aside a perverse or unreasoned grant of bail under Section 439(2) CrPC	A bail order that ignores material evidence and gives no reasons may be set aside as perverse under Section 439(2) CrPC. Correction of an unjustified, illegal or perverse grant is distinct from cancellation for later misconduct or new circumstances; proof of a subsequent misuse of liberty is therefore not necessary for that challenge.	510 challenging the merits of a Sessions Court's bail grant	superior High Court under Section 439(2) CrPC. A return to the Sessions Court is unnecessary merely to challenge that same merits decision. This differs from seeking cancellation before the Sessions Court on newly arisen circumstances.

Aggrieved person's standing to seek cancellation of bail	An aggrieved person, as well as the State, may apply for cancellation of bail. Applying this principle from Puran v. Rambilas, the High Court entertained the deceased woman's father's challenge under Section 439(2) CrPC to the Sessions Court's bail order.	510
Section 439(2) CrPC — setting aside an infirm bail order without subsequent misuse	A superior court may set aside a bail order that is illegal, perverse or unjustified because relevant material was ignored, irrelevant factors were considered or judicial discretion was exercised without due application of mind. Proof of subsequent misuse of liberty is not required for that review. This differs from cancellation based on later misconduct or supervening circumstances, which requires cogent and overwhelming grounds such as interference with justice, evasion or abuse of the concession; cancellation must not be mechanical. The Court rejected the contention that bail could be cancelled only upon misuse and examined the soundness of the Special Judge's original order.	545
Superior-court challenge to bail — illegality of grant and later misuse are distinct	A challenge to the legal sustainability of an initial bail order differs from cancellation for subsequent misconduct or supervening circumstances. A superior court may set aside a perverse, illegal or unjustified grant where relevant material was ignored or discretion exercised arbitrarily, without requiring a later breach of bail conditions. Interference must be reasoned and approached with restraint; it is not a routine substitution of discretion merely because another view is possible.	707
Same-court reconsideration of bail — Section 362 finality and superior review	An application to the court that granted bail ordinarily seeks cancellation for misuse of liberty; reconsidering the same grant on other grounds may encounter the bar under Section 362 CrPC. This restriction does not prevent a superior court from examining whether bail was originally granted erroneously through failure to consider the allegations, their severity or the relevant investigation material.	707
Bail cancellation — post-release glorification and intimidating conduct amounting to misuse of liberty	Applying Ms. P. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, the Court cancelled bail under Section 439(2) CrPC for misuse of liberty after release. The videos showed a large crowd garlanding the accused, touching his feet and chanting slogans, his procession in an open jeep, subsequent firing in the air, and a supporter challenging the complainant. The Court found that this conduct projected him as a warrior and that such glorification adversely affected society and the justice system. It also noted that witnesses had begun turning hostile and said this might result from the glorification or release. On these combined circumstances, the bail order was cancelled and the accused was directed to surrender by 16 November 2022.	746
Facially erroneous co-accused bail grant — separate Section 439(2) show-cause process before recall	Where the Sessions Judge’s order misstated the charge-sheet role of an alleged assailant and compared him with non-assault co-accused, the High Court ordered a separate Section 439(2) CrPC proceeding and notice to show cause why that bail should not be recalled. The present judgment initiated review; it did not finally cancel his bail or rely on post-release misconduct.	897
Erroneous bail grant — review differs from cancellation for later misconduct	Review of an order granting bail asks whether discretion was exercised improperly or arbitrarily and whether the order is perverse, illegal or unjustified. It differs from cancellation ordinarily based on later circumstances or breach of bail conditions. Ignoring relevant factors, relying on irrelevant considerations or misreading the prima facie record may justify setting aside the original grant without proof of later misconduct. Here those concerns led to a separate show-cause proceeding, not an immediate final cancellation.	897 challenged as fraudulently obtained	a forged medical certificate, deciding the certificate's genuineness forms part of that proceeding. The Court distinguished the limit on further directions after deciding an ordinary bail application and upheld consideration of the prosecutor's undertaking for departmental and criminal action concerning the alleged forgery.

Bail cancellation based on a forged certificate — recording the prosecutor's undertaking	Where cancellation of anticipatory bail was sought on the sole ground that a forged medical certificate had secured bail, the Court had to examine that certificate's authenticity. After considering the State's enquiry report, which included the issuing doctor's statement, the Court could record the prosecutor's undertaking to take departmental and criminal action and express an expectation that it would be honoured. The observation was not treated as a binding direction requiring recall for want of a separate hearing. The later grant of Specialist charge and absence of departmental proceedings also showed that the observation had not prejudiced the doctor's superior officers. M. Murugeson, concerning further directions after disposal of an ordinary bail application under Section 439 CrPC, was distinguished because the alleged forgery was itself the ground of cancellation.	990
	Sub-Chapter no. 15.6 Bail Bonds, Anticipatory Bail Conditions and Post-Bail Compliance
Cash surety and automatic termination conditions in an excise bail order	The Court required cash surety of Rs. 2,00,000 and made bail effective until the conclusion of trial, subject to the stated conditions. The order provided that a single default in trial-court appearance or registration of a new offence would terminate bail and forfeit the cash surety without further reference to the Court. Bail jump or breach of the other conditions would also make the order ineffective.	108
Duration and breach of conditions of pandemic-related bail	The bail order remained effective until the trial concluded, subject to the applicable conditions under Sections 437 and 439 CrPC and compliance with governmental COVID-19 directions. The applicant had to furnish an undertaking and supply the order to the police station for his residence. The Court directed that a bail jump or breach of the specified conditions would cause the order to lose effect, with custody to follow breach of the pandemic directions.	182
Nonappearance and Unknown Whereabouts After Release on Bail	Repeated applications under Section 317 CrPC in place of personal appearance, combined with a police report that the accused no longer lived at the stated address and that his family did not know his whereabouts or mobile number, supported a finding that he had absconded after release on bail.	373
Anticipatory bail conditional on appearance by a specified date	Where the anticipatory-bail order expressly required the applicant to appear before the investigating officer by a specified date, failure to appear by that date would make the order ineffective and leave the officer free to take the applicant into custody. The deadline was an express condition of this particular grant.	551
Anticipatory bail until trial conclusion — protection depended on timely appearance and continuing compliance	The anticipatory-bail order required the protected applicant to appear before the investigating officer by 8 September 2021 and furnish a personal bond of Rs.1,00,000 to that officer's satisfaction. He also had to undertake compliance with applicable Central, State and local COVID-19 instructions, while the other Section 438 CrPC conditions remained operative. Protection continued until conclusion of trial, but would lose effect upon failure to appear by the stated date, a bail jump or breach of a specified condition.	639
	Sub-Chapter no. 15.7 Bail Grant Order — Initial Legality, Reasons and Superior-Court Review
Bail orders — Reliance on irrelevant material	A bail order becomes liable to be set aside when it relies on irrelevant material while leaving relevant considerations out of account. Bail discretion must follow established legal parameters and cannot be exercised arbitrarily. The	112 and omission of relevant factors	principle was adopted to reject reliance on completion of witness examination as the sole justification for release while disregarding the accusation, supporting evidence and potential punishment.

Reasons for granting or refusing bail	An order deciding bail must show application of judicial mind to the material circumstances and give brief reasons supporting the conclusion. An elaborate discussion of the evidence is unnecessary, but the parties' consent to an unreasoned order cannot dispense with this duty. The requirement protects the exercise of discretion and permits judicial scrutiny.	180
Challenge to an unlawful bail grant and cancellation for later circumstances	A bail order may be challenged before a higher forum for perversity, illegality or failure to consider material circumstances supporting a prima facie case, even without a subsequent change of circumstances. Cancellation sought because of circumstances arising after release is a distinct ground under Section 439(2) CrPC. Failure to consider criminal antecedents may affect the legality of the original grant.	180
Distinct grounds for setting aside an order granting bail	Bail may be cancelled for subsequent misuse of liberty or breach of its conditions, or because the original order granted bail while ignoring material facts. These grounds involve different considerations. The application before the Court proceeded on subsequent misuse of liberty and breach of bail conditions.	221
Reasons Supporting a Prima Facie Decision to Grant Bail	A bail court need not examine the evidence in detail or give an elaborate account of the merits, but it must state reasons for its prima facie decision to grant bail, particularly in a serious offence. A mechanical order lacking those reasons suffers from non-application of mind.	373
Prima facie scrutiny without detailed assessment of evidence in bail proceedings	A bail court may consider whether reasonable grounds prima facie connect the accused with an offence and may consider its gravity. It should avoid an extensive assessment of evidence or merits capable of prejudicing the prosecution or defence. Examining whether specific allegations connect particular accused with the alleged offence does not, by itself, amount to an impermissible detailed trial of the evidence.	461
Setting aside anticipatory bail for an unlawful initial grant	The prosecution, complainant or victim may approach the superior court where bail was granted without considering material on record. This review concerns the legality of the original grant and does not require proof of later misuse of liberty. Cancellation for subsequent misconduct or supervening circumstances involves a different inquiry. In reviewing anticipatory bail amid specific allegations of dowry harassment and an unnatural sexual act, the High Court found that the lower court had casually treated delayed disclosure against the wife without considering her efforts to preserve the marriage and her alleged disclosure to her in-laws. Given these circumstances and the seriousness of the allegations, the grant was materially unlawful and was set aside.	590
Duty to give reasons for granting or refusing bail	An order granting or refusing bail must show application of judicial mind and give brief, relevant reasons. Consent of counsel to dispense with further reasons cannot remove that duty, because bail affects personal liberty, victims' interests and the public administration of criminal justice. Reasons make the exercise of discretion open to scrutiny and restrain arbitrary decision-making. A formulaic or mechanical order cannot replace consideration of the material circumstances.	590
Bail orders — reasons must explain the exercise of discretion	A bail order must give reasons, even briefly, showing why release is justified on the relevant material. A recital that the record was perused, the parties were heard or the facts and circumstances were considered does not by itself explain the decision. Avoiding a detailed merits examination does not excuse the absence of a prima facie assessment. Failure to assign reasons may demonstrate non-application of mind and justify setting aside the grant. The fresh anticipatory-bail order here failed to explain why the accused was entitled to protection despite the alleged firearm injury.	707

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Bail grant — irrelevant considerations or omission of material factors expose the order to annulment	The adopted Dinesh M.N. principle states that a bail order becomes vulnerable to annulment when irrelevant material is considered and relevant material is left out. It is reproduced within Virupakshappa Gouda and repeated in Bhupat Singh's reasoning relied upon by the Court. Completed examination of witnesses cannot be treated as decisive while ignoring their support for the prosecution, the seriousness of the allegations and the possible punishment. The present Court used that principle to reject the ground urged for repeat bail; the application before it sought release, rather than cancellation of an existing bail order.	749
Bail order based on irrelevant material or exclusion of relevant material	A bail order becomes vulnerable to annulment when it relies on irrelevant material while leaving relevant considerations out of account. The Court must apply the established bail parameters rather than act arbitrarily.	796
Superior-court interference with an illegal bail grant without subsequent misuse of liberty	A challenge to the original legality of a bail order is distinct from cancellation based on later misconduct, breach of conditions or other supervening circumstances. A superior court may set aside a perverse, illegal or unjustified grant that ignores material evidence or rests on irrelevant considerations, even where subsequent misuse is not alleged. Applying the principles reproduced from Brijmani Devi, Mahipal, Neeru Yadav and Padmakar Tukaram Bhavnagare, the Court entertained the father's application under Section 439(2) CrPC against the Sessions Court's anticipatory-bail order. It set aside that unreasoned grant, directed surrender within fifteen days and permitted arrest warrants on default.	952
Bail orders must give reasons showing consideration of relevant factors	A bail decision must disclose a judicial assessment of the relevant material. The court should consider the nature and gravity of the accusation, severity of possible punishment, prima facie supporting material, antecedents and character of the accused, risk of absconding or repeated offending, and the possibility of influencing witnesses, tampering with evidence or obstructing justice. The genuineness of the prosecution and individual liberty also bear on that assessment. Detailed evaluation of the evidence or a finding of guilt is unnecessary at the bail stage, but brief reasons must show application of mind. The authorities reproduced from Kamla Devi, Brijmani Devi, Jaibunisha and Manoj Kumar Khokhar also make clear that the parties' consent to an unreasoned order cannot dispense with that duty. A bare assertion of parity did not satisfy it here.	952
	Sub-Chapter no. 15.8 Bail After Addition of Graver Cognizable and Non-Bailable Offences
Custody after addition of a murder charge following earlier bail	Where bail had been granted for the offence under Section 307 IPC and the injured later died, the Court rejected the contention that Section 302 IPC was not an aggravated offence and that the accused could not be taken into custody without first cancelling the earlier bail. It found no error in taking the applicant into custody after the murder offence was registered.	615
	Sub-Chapter no. 15.9 Bail Order Finality — Reconsideration Before Signature and Section 362 CrPC
Reconsideration of a Dictated Bail-Withdrawal Order Before Signature	Where dismissal of a Section 439 CrPC bail application as withdrawn had been dictated but the order had not been typed or signed, the Court permitted counsel to retract the withdrawal request and heard the application again. Applying Kushalbhai Ratanbhai Rohit v. State of Gujarat, (2014) 9 SCC 124, the Court treated the unsigned order as capable of alteration. The narrated discussion of Surendra Singh v. State of U.P., AIR 1954 SC 194, explains that even a signed draft becomes operative only on formal delivery. The decision concerns reconsideration before finalisation of the order.	650

Section 362 CrPC and the forum for challenging the legality of a bail order	An order granting bail cannot be substantively reviewed by the same court in the absence of an express statutory power; Section 362 CrPC bars alteration or review of a final order apart from correction of clerical or arithmetical error. Applying Abdul Basit, the Court distinguished such review from cancellation on subsequent misuse of liberty. A challenge alleging that the original grant ignored relevant material must be brought before the superior court, while an application based on misuse of the liberty may be brought before the court that granted bail. The superior-court challenge to the Sessions Court's original anticipatory-bail grant was therefore maintainable.	952
	Chapter no. 16 Bail Conditions and Travel Permission
	Sub-Chapter no. 16.1 Foreign Travel Permission During Criminal Proceedings
Duty to communicate court permission for foreign travel to immigration authorities	The LOC's originating agency must urgently communicate relevant court orders to the Bureau of Immigration and keep track of the criminal proceedings through the Public Prosecutor. It could not justify noncommunication of travel permission merely by claiming that the prosecutor had not informed it or that the final order preceded departure by only a short interval. Reading the trial court's two orders together, the Court found permission to travel had been granted and rejected the attempt to defeat it through the unreviewed LOC.	83
Passport issuance and permission to travel during a pending trial	Prior permission of the court conducting the trial is not required merely to obtain a passport, but permission is required to travel abroad. The Court distinguished these matters while construing the trial court's orders as allowing the bailed petitioner's journey to the United States.	83

	Chapter no. 17 Trial Procedure, Witness Management and Fair Opportunity
	Sub-Chapter no. 17.1 Closure of Evidence and Defence Evidence
Section 91 CrPC — seeking documents for the defence at an appropriate stage	Refusal to order investigation according to the accused's preferred theory does not prevent the accused from defending the case at the appropriate stages. The Court identified an application under Section 91 CrPC as a means to seek production by hotel owners or other persons of the documents on which the accused wished to rely. That opportunity did not justify directing the police, during the ongoing investigation, to follow the accused's account.	10
Withdrawal of a witness — impermissible after	A party may give up a summoned witness before examination begins, but cannot withdraw the witness after examination-in-chief has started and thereby deprive the opponent of cross-examination. The defence could not abandon its	12 examination-in-chief begins	doctor when the prosecution began eliciting medical reports of other injured persons. The Court rejected the trial court's exclusion of his partially recorded testimony and read that evidence in the circumstances of this case.

Voluntary defence testimony and explanation of conduct at sentencing	Where the accused voluntarily testified under Section 315 CrPC, the Court assessed his admissions and his explanation of the conduct relied on in defence. His admitted arrears, absence of payment receipts and failure in that testimony to claim that he had stopped running the mill were material when considering the later plea for leniency.	25
Accused giving evidence as a defence witness and answering incriminating questions	An accused who voluntarily gives evidence as a defence witness under Section 315 CrPC is treated as a witness for examination and cross-examination. In that capacity, the accused cannot refuse a question merely because its answer may be incriminating, and admissions in the testimony may be used against the accused. The Court applied that principle when assessing the appellant's sworn defence.	124
Accused who elects to testify is assessed as a witness	Once the accused enters the witness box, his testimony is assessed like that of another witness. In evaluating the explanation offered to rebut the cheque presumption, the Court considered his failure to explain the adverse circumstances, including the undisputed signature and the absence of a consistent account or report of the alleged theft. His examination under Section 313 was distinguished from his evidence as a defence witness.	176
Defence witnesses must be assessed on the same footing as prosecution witnesses	Defence witnesses are entitled to the same standard of assessment as prosecution witnesses. Their evidence must be considered on its merits; here, the defence testimony itself supported that the occurrence had taken place, although the witnesses avoided identifying the assailants.	206
Official defence evidence relevant to disputed incident timing	Where the time of the incident remained disputed because of an apparent alteration in the initial intimation, official records of an electricity outage could assist the trial court in resolving that issue. The difference between the outage period and the prosecution's stated incident time did not make the evidence immaterial before the correct timing was determined. The Court found the certificate essential to a just decision and directed summoning of the electricity engineer with the original records.	212
Section 233(3) CrPC — summoning government officials for defence	When the accused seeks process for a defence witness or production of a document or thing, Section 233(3) CrPC requires its issue unless the judge records reasons that the request is for vexation, delay or defeating the ends of justice. Possible disruption of government work is not, by itself, a statutory ground to refuse government officials as defence witnesses. The High Court set aside that part of the refusal order and remanded the request for decision under Section 233; it did not order unconditional summons.	322
Closing Prosecution Evidence After Repeated Failure to Produce Witnesses	The Raj Deo Sharma passage quoted through Shambhu Nath Singh recognises the trial court's power to close prosecution evidence where witnesses are not produced despite repeated opportunities. It links that power to Section 309's requirement of expeditious proceedings and continuous witness examination. The stated basis is repeated default, rather than a fixed automatic deadline.	386
Assessment of defence witnesses	Defence evidence must be appreciated in the same manner as prosecution evidence. The Court rejected the two defence witnesses because their accounts contained material contradictions and doubtful claims about the accused’s visit, rather than because they appeared for the defence.	391
Reasoned consideration of a request for material hospital records	Where the evidence about treatment was disputed and the hospital maintained a drug-administration register capable of testing it, rejecting the accused’s request to summon that register without reasons was a material irregularity. The missing drug and indoor registers also weakened the doctor’s account of treatment, admission and transfer in this case.	467

17.1 : Closure of Evidence and Defence Evidence

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 243(2) CrPC: process for relevant defence evidence and reasons for refusal	An accused who has entered upon the defence may seek process for production of documents under Section 243(2) CrPC. The court must consider whether the request is bona fide and the material relevant. Refusal on the statutory grounds of vexation, delay or defeating the ends of justice requires reasons recorded in writing. The provision does not permit summoning wholly irrelevant evidence or unnecessarily prolonging the trial. Here, the trial court had found neither the requested records irrelevant nor the application dilatory, so refusal of process was set aside.	556
Possible RTI access does not by itself justify refusal to summon defence records	The possibility of obtaining documents under the Right to Information Act was not a sufficient reason to refuse court process where the accused specifically asserted that the records concerned a third party and would not be supplied to him. The bank loan and industrial-registration records were sought to establish his defence that he was not the factory's proprietor, and the trial court had not found them irrelevant. He was entitled to an opportunity to bring that material before the court.	556
Summoning defence documents does not dispense with their proof	Production of documents through court process under Section 243(2) CrPC does not establish their contents or decide the defence. The accused must still prove the documents in accordance with law. The trial court must assess their evidentiary effect and decide whether they establish the asserted defence.	556
Closing prosecution evidence without securing an essential witness and original records	A trial court should not mechanically close prosecution evidence when an important witness has not been secured and essential original medical records have not been produced. The Court criticised closure without using the available coercive process against the non-cooperating witness, because it prevented important evidence bearing on the declarant's fitness from reaching the record.	580
Production of preserved defence records under Section 233 CrPC	A refusal to produce court-preserved defence material could not stand once the police assertion of its unavailability proved false. The requested CDRs and mobile-location records had been received on the then SP's official email and were later recovered into the present SP's possession. The Court set aside rejection of the Section 233 application and directed filing of the complete record within ten days, if not already filed. Its evidentiary use and what it proved remained for the trial court.	769
Defence use of an unexhibited prosecution document	An accused may take advantage in defence of a prosecution document even if that document has remained unexhibited. The Court stated this principle while rejecting the request to compel police acceptance of the applicants' alibi documents and leaving the defence to be proved through evidence.	814
Defence affidavits filed with written arguments cannot substitute for witness examination	In the warrant-case procedure applicable through Section 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, Section 243 CrPC requires the accused to produce defence witnesses or seek process subject to its statutory conditions. Affidavits of unexamined persons, filed with written arguments after the defence declined to lead evidence, could not prove that the work was completed. No leave had been sought or granted, and the prosecution had no opportunity to cross-examine. The Khandesh Spinning passage concerning authorised affidavit proof in industrial and civil procedure was used by analogy; the Court expressly stated that CPC provisions did not apply to this criminal trial.	914
Reopened prosecution evidence and renewed defence opportunity before final arguments	By directing production of the awaited DNA report, the trial court implicitly reopened the prosecution case and should not have simultaneously fixed final arguments before completing the ensuing stages. Sections 232–234 CrPC require consideration of acquittal, an effective opportunity to enter the defence where applicable, and only then final submissions. On remand, the report was to be exhibited afresh after the objections were decided or the scientific officer examined. Any request to cross-examine that officer and to lead defence evidence in light of the report had to be considered in accordance with law	917

	before final arguments were scheduled.
Accused's reliance on a favourable unexhibited prosecution document	An accused may rely on an unexhibited prosecution document that supports the defence. That principle applied to the handwriting report said to have been filed by the prosecution, although its favourable contents did not by themselves establish that no other evidence supported the pending prosecution.	973
Section 91 CrPC: necessity, stage and purpose of document production	Necessity or desirability of producing a document under section 91 must be assessed in light of the stage, purpose and party seeking it. An accused cannot invoke the provision at the initial charge stage to seek defence documents to establish innocence; entitlement ordinarily arises at the defence stage. The provision compels production and does not give an accused a right to introduce documents already in the accused's possession or conduct a fishing inquiry.	978

Recall of Witnesses, Cross-Examination and Fair Trial Control

Sections 138 and 154 Evidence Act — scope of questioning a defence witness	Cross-examination may extend to relevant facts beyond those covered in examination-in-chief. A doctor called by the defence to prove an accused's injuries could therefore be questioned by the prosecution about other injured persons whom he had also examined. The calling party has no ordinary right to cross-examine its own witness; it may seek the Court's permission under Section 154 or seek re-examination under Section 138 to explain matters arising in cross-examination.	12
Section 311 CrPC: recall of a prosecutrix who alleges that her earlier testimony was under pressure	Recall under Section 311 CrPC must be necessary for a just decision and directed to finding the truth or obtaining proper proof. The discretion requires strong reasons, fair opportunity and care for the interests of the accused, victim and society. Applying Rajaram Prasad Yadav and referring to its earlier reliance on Zahira Habibullah Sheikh, the Court found no reason to disturb recall of a prosecutrix who had turned hostile and later alleged pressure and a change in the accused's position. Its observation that consent obtained under a misconception of fact would not be free consent under Section 90 IPC explained why further evidence mattered; it did not finally determine guilt. The Court clarified its earlier decision without conducting a fresh merits adjudication of the marriage affidavit or rape charge.	46
Section 311 CrPC: additional evidence, prejudice and a fair opportunity to rebut	The Section 311 power must be exercised judiciously to obtain evidence essential to a just decision, rather than leave the case on incomplete or speculative facts. As explained in the Rajaram Prasad Yadav passage accepted by the Court, recall is not to be labelled filling a prosecution gap unless the circumstances show serious prejudice causing a miscarriage of justice. Relevant material omitted inadvertently may be permitted, but additional evidence cannot be a disguise for changing the case. The other side must have a fair opportunity to rebut it, with particular care to protect the accused's opportunity to defend.	46
Section 311 CrPC — recall for matters outside a forensic witness's responsibility	Recall of laboratory scientists under Section 311 CrPC was not necessary for cross-examination about collection, safe custody and transport of blood samples when they had no role in those matters. Their responsibility concerned the procedures followed inside the laboratory. As the stated purpose of recall did not concern matters connected with those witnesses, rejection of the application disclosed no jurisdictional error warranting Section 482 interference.	59
Section 311 CrPC — discretionary power and mandatory essential-evidence duty	The Section 311 principles adopted permit a criminal court, at any stage of inquiry, trial or other proceedings under the Code, to summon a witness, examine a person present though not summoned, or recall and re-examine a witness already examined. The second part is mandatory: the court must summon and examine, or recall and re-examine, a person whose evidence appears essential to a just decision of the case.	59

Section 311 CrPC — strong reasons, evidentiary clarity and prevention of abuse	Section 311 CrPC is exercised to secure justice, clarify ambiguity in the evidence and keep the record accurate without causing prejudice. The adopted principles require strong and valid reasons, caution, and consideration of the particular circumstances. The power must not be used where the court considers the application an abuse of process.	59
Belated or successive recall applications — explanation and prejudice	The principles relied upon caution against summoning a witness long after prosecution evidence has closed where the earlier non-examination is not satisfactorily explained and the belated step would seriously prejudice the accused. Successive applications to recall the same witness should also not be encouraged. The assessment remains tied to the circumstances and the requirement of evidence essential to a just decision.	59
Duty to consider cross-examination when assessing witness evidence	The court must assess the evidence elicited in cross-examination as well as examination-in-chief, including whether contradictions and improvements are minor or material. Reproducing the examination-in-chief while ignoring cross-examination fails to consider the defence's means of testing the prosecution account. The Court criticised that omission in the trial judgment while acquitting the appellant.	99
Recall under Section 311 based on alleged inadequacy of earlier counsel	Witnesses cannot be recalled under Section 311 CrPC merely because newly engaged counsel considers earlier cross-examination ineffective. The Court declined to presume a registered practising lawyer incompetent and applied Shiv Kumar Yadav, which requires regard to fair opportunity, concrete prejudice, expeditious trial and avoidance of undue harassment of the victim. Here, the accused had received a full opportunity and had taken no action against the former lawyer. Allegations of professional misconduct alone did not justify recalling nine witnesses. The Court identified Bar Council proceedings and a claim for compensation as remedies for the alleged misconduct, while dismissing the recall challenge.	104
Recall after represented waiver of cross-examination and alleged counsel misconduct	Section 311 CrPC allows further examination when necessary for a just decision, but recall must be refused where the sole intention is delay or harassment of a prosecution witness. Here, the witness testified in the presence of local defence counsel, who declined cross-examination, and did not support the prosecution. The Court rejected the claim that lead counsel learnt of this only about two years later. No complaint to the Bar Council supported the allegation of counsel misconduct, which the Court treated as an afterthought. An offer to pay costs and compensate the witness did not justify recalling him merely for the accused's satisfaction.	109
Judicial questioning under Section 165 Evidence Act and alleged bias	To discover or obtain proper proof of relevant facts, a judge may question witnesses at any stage, even about an otherwise irrelevant fact, and order production of a document or thing. Parties cannot object to such questions or cross-examine on the answers without the Court's leave. The power remains subject to the statutory limits on privilege, improper questions and primary evidence, and the judgment must rest on relevant facts duly proved. A criminal court has a participatory role under Section 311 CrPC and Section 165 Evidence Act. Its questioning of defence witnesses did not by itself establish bias warranting transfer.	211
Judicial questioning and blanket recall of defence witnesses	Section 165 Evidence Act permits a judge to question witnesses to discover or obtain proper proof of relevant facts. Parties cannot object to those questions or cross-examine on the answers without leave, subject to the section's limits on proof, privilege and improper questions. Reiterating the criminal court's participatory role, the Court rejected the request to cancel all defence testimony and exhibits and recall every defence witness merely because the judge had questioned them.	212
Judicial questioning	Under Section 165 Evidence Act, a judge may question a witness or order	214

to discover truth and its limits	production to discover or obtain proper proof of relevant facts. The power remains subject to privileges, restrictions on improper questions and primary-evidence requirements, and the judgment must rest on relevant facts duly proved. Applying Sidhartha Vashist, the Court explained that a judge should assist the search for truth but must not confuse, coerce or intimidate the witness.
Summoning essential witnesses under Section 311 CrPC after final arguments	Section 311 CrPC permits the court to summon, examine or recall a witness at any stage and requires it to do so when the evidence appears essential to a just decision. An order summoning additional prosecution witnesses cannot be set aside merely because the accused describes it as filling a prosecution lacuna. The Court upheld the order where the accused identified no specific lacuna and the trial court committed no jurisdictional error in exercising that power.	262
Court's participatory role under Section 311 CrPC and Section 165 Evidence Act	A criminal court must play a participatory role in determining whether further evidence is necessary for a just decision, while avoiding the role of a prosecutor. The powers under Section 311 CrPC and Section 165 Evidence Act support that role. In relying on the cited authorities, the Court also recognised that parties cannot object to questions put by the court under Section 165.	262
Section 311 CrPC: substituting a witness after hostile testimony	Section 311 CrPC cannot be used as a disguise to change the prosecution case. After the original last-seen witness turned hostile, the complainant sought a replacement who had neither been examined during investigation nor cited as a witness. In the circumstances, summoning him was not essential to a just decision and the order permitting it was set aside.	283
Section 311 CrPC: duty to obtain evidence essential to a just decision	Section 311 CrPC confers a discretionary power to summon, examine or recall a witness, and makes its exercise obligatory when the evidence appears essential to a just decision. Its purpose is to obtain the truth and prevent failure of justice caused by missing evidence or ambiguity. Evidence is not disqualified merely because it supports the prosecution; the power must be exercised judicially and for valid reasons.	283
Closure of prosecution evidence does not extinguish Section 311 power	Even after prosecution evidence has been closed, the Court may invoke Section 311 CrPC if a witness's evidence is essential to a just decision. Directions intended to secure a speedy trial do not remove that statutory power or duty. Closure alone is therefore not a sufficient reason to reject the request.	283
Additional evidence under Section 311: prejudice and opportunity to rebut	Obtaining evidence needed to discover the truth is not merely filling a prosecution gap unless the circumstances show serious prejudice to the accused resulting in miscarriage of justice. The evidence must be relevant to the issue, and the other party must receive a fair opportunity to rebut it. The Court must guard against arbitrary use of the power and disguised alteration of the case.	283
Closure of cross-examination after repeated deliberate delay	The valuable right to cross-examine prosecution witnesses may be treated as given up where the accused deliberately delay the trial to harass witnesses. Here cross-examination remained incomplete for five to six years. Despite an express warning to arrange alternative counsel if necessary, the accused sought another adjournment to engage counsel and supplied no order sheets to rebut the history of delay. On that record, closure of their opportunity disclosed no jurisdictional error.	293
Offer of costs after prolonged avoidance of cross-examination	An offer to pay costs does not necessarily justify reopening an opportunity to cross-examine after prolonged deliberate delay. After the accused had obtained adjournments for five to six years, the Court rejected their request for one last opportunity on payment of ₹5,000, having regard to the rights of the victim and witnesses.	293
Section 311 CrPC — essential evidence and bona fide grounds for recall	Section 311 CrPC confers wide power, and a duty where evidence is essential to a just decision, to summon, recall or re-examine a witness. The power requires judicial reasons, care and caution; an assertion of fair trial does not make recall automatic. Applying Rajaram Prasad Yadav, Shiv Kumar Yadav	308

	and Ram Mehar, the Court considered essentiality, bona fides, witness hardship and the interests of the accused, victim and society. Recall was refused where counsel voluntarily left cross-examination without substantiating the alleged recording error and the accused himself created the loss of opportunity.
Section 311 CrPC — explanation for delay in seeking recall	Delay in seeking recall is an important factor requiring explanation. Following Ratanlal v. Prahlad Jat, the Court treated the delay from closure of cross-examination until the later recall application as material in the circumstances, particularly when no immediate recording complaint had been made. The belated recall allowed to protect a fair defence in P. Sanjeeva Rao did not make delay irrelevant or establish an automatic right to recall here.	308
Section 311 CrPC — correction of error and the objection of filling a lacuna	Evidence essential to a just decision may be received to correct a bona fide mistake or remove ambiguity; Section 311 is not confined to the accused's benefit and may operate even after evidence has been closed. A truth-seeking recall is not necessarily an impermissible attempt to fill a prosecution lacuna. The court must examine whether it serves a just decision or instead causes serious prejudice and miscarriage of justice. The Rajaram Prasad Yadav principles relied upon require that assessment on the actual circumstances.	308
Section 311 CrPC — relevance, rebuttal and prohibition of a disguised retrial	Additional evidence received through Section 311 must be germane to the issue and supported by strong, valid reasons. The other party must have an opportunity to rebut it. Recall cannot be used as a disguise for retrial, to alter the nature of the case or to give an unfair advantage causing serious prejudice. These limits accompany the wide recall power in the Natasha Singh and Rajaram Prasad Yadav passages relied upon by the Court.	308
Defective investigation — trial court's powers to obtain necessary evidence	In evaluating a defective investigation, the court may take an active and analytical role to discover the truth, using Section 311 CrPC and Section 165 of the Evidence Act at the appropriate stage. The relied-upon Zahira Habibulla decision explains that deliberate or negligent omissions should not prevent the court from obtaining and evaluating necessary evidence.	319
Section 233(3) CrPC — recalling an examined prosecution witness for defence	The Court upheld refusal to summon as a defence witness a person already examined for the prosecution where the accused had been given a full opportunity to cross-examine him. It applied State of M.P. v. Badri Yadav, which treats use of Section 233(3) to recall examined and cross-examined prosecution witnesses after unsuccessful recall proceedings, for a purpose defeating justice, as impermissible. The decision does not dispense with the statutory assessment of vexation, delay or defeat of justice in other applications.	322
Change of Counsel and Allegedly Inadequate Cross-Examination	A change of counsel or an assertion that the earlier lawyer failed to cross-examine effectively does not by itself justify recalling witnesses under Section 311 CrPC. Incompetence of counsel chosen by the accused cannot be presumed. Applying Ram Mehar and Shiv Kumar Yadav, the Court rejected recall sought on that basis and found no jurisdictional error in the trial court's refusal.	385
Essentiality, Bona Fides and Competing Interests in Witness Recall	Section 311 CrPC permits recall where it is essential to a just decision, but a general appeal to fairness is insufficient without tangible reasons showing why further examination is needed. A bona fide mistake may be corrected, yet the court must balance the request against unnecessary hardship to witnesses and delay. The accused's custody does not mean that only the accused is affected by prolonging the trial or that recall follows as a matter of course.	385
No Automatic Defence Recall Because Prosecution Witnesses Were Recalled	Earlier permission for the prosecution to recall witnesses does not confer an equivalent entitlement on the defence without an independently acceptable ground. The Ram Mehar passage relied upon by the Court rejects an arithmetical distribution of opportunities: a liberal approach remains governed by judicial principles and the need for a just decision, rather than generosity alone.	385

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Closure of Cross-Examination After Repeated Dilatory Requests	The Court upheld closure of the accused's right to cross-examine the prosecutrix after repeated deferment requests found to be intended to harass her. Her chief-examination had been recorded, cross-examination was deferred for lack of defence preparation, and a newly engaged advocate later sought further time while refusing witness costs. Although loss of cross-examination could seriously prejudice the accused, the Court held that he had created that situation through his own delaying conduct. The ruling rested on that sequence of opportunities and conduct.	386
Defence Use of Cross-Examination When a Witness Was Examined Twice	The same witness was inadvertently examined once as PW 6 and again as PW 33. The trial court directed that the second examination be ignored, but the High Court set that order aside: the defence remained entitled to rely on favourable facts elicited in the later cross-examination. Both recorded examinations therefore had to be read for the evidentiary assessment.	389
Section 311 CrPC—summoning an essential age-proof witness	Section 311 CrPC permits the Court to summon a witness on its own initiative and requires it to do so where the evidence appears essential to a just decision. The prosecution's failure to cite the school teacher or headmaster did not justify leaving the relied-upon age record unproved; the trial court should have examined that person as a court witness.	414
Section 311 CrPC—truth-seeking evidence and unfair filling of gaps	The controlling question under Section 311 is whether the proposed evidence is essential to a just decision. The power cannot be used merely to repair a party's case unfairly, change its nature or cause serious prejudice, but obtaining essential evidence is not improper simply because it remedies an omission or supports the prosecution. Strong, valid reasons and a judicial exercise of discretion are required.	414
Court-called witness—opportunity to cross-examine and rebut	A witness summoned by the Court under Section 311 CrPC is not the witness of either party. A party against whom that testimony is given must have a fair opportunity to cross-examine under the Evidence Act and rebut the additional evidence.	414
No Reliance on Testimony Where the Accused Had No Cross-Examination Opportunity	A witness's evidence cannot be read against the accused where cross-examination was deferred and the accused was never given an opportunity to conduct it. An order-sheet entry recording examination and cross-examination did not cure the defect when the trial record showed that the witness's examination had been adjourned at the end of working hours. The Court excluded the testimony and assessed the remaining evidence.	451
Giving up material eyewitnesses on an unsupported prediction of hostility	The Court found it arbitrary to give up two unexamined eyewitnesses, including the deceased's father, merely on the assertion that they would not support the prosecution and that their examination would waste time. The prosecutor did not explain how he knew their proposed evidence: neither witness was present when given up, and his affidavit identified no communication from them. Another witness who did not support the prosecution had nevertheless been examined. Those circumstances did not provide a sound basis for withholding the material witnesses.	557
Section 311 CrPC application to examine wrongly omitted witnesses	After finding that the prosecutor had wrongly given up material eyewitnesses, the High Court directed the Public Prosecutor to apply immediately under Section 311 CrPC for permission to examine them. The trial court was to decide that application after considering the witnesses' importance. The direction required an application and judicial consideration; it did not itself compel examination or establish what the witnesses would say.	557
Leading questions on disputed material facts in examination-in-chief	A prosecutor cannot use leading questions to supply the desired account of disputed material facts to a witness who has not been declared hostile. Section 142 permits such questions for introductory, undisputed or sufficiently proved matters, which did not include the disputed instigation here. The witness's old age and the lapse of years did not justify that procedure. The Court excluded	563

	the instigation answers elicited through those questions; the adopted precedent treated such prompting on the prosecution's material case as an infringement of the fair-trial right under Article 21.
Section 311 CrPC — officer's opinion from an unlawful parallel inquiry did not justify summoning	Summoning the officer merely to establish an exonerating opinion reached in an impermissible parallel inquiry would serve no purpose. Examining him for that purpose would endorse a report produced outside the lawful process, and his opinion on the accusations was not legally relevant. The High Court therefore upheld rejection of the Section 311 CrPC application on that ground, although the trial court had relied on different reasons concerning expeditious disposal.	637
Essential Additional Evidence Under Section 311 and the Prosecution-Lacuna Objection	Section 311 CrPC must be exercised judiciously, for strong and valid reasons, to obtain evidence essential to finding the truth and deciding the case justly. Applying Rajaram Prasad Yadav and Rajendra Prasad, the Court distinguished prosecutorial oversight from an impermissible attempt to fill a prejudicial lacuna. Relevant evidence omitted through inadvertence may be received, but it must not disguise a change in the case, cause serious prejudice amounting to miscarriage of justice, or deny the other side an opportunity to rebut it. Fair opportunity must be preserved for the accused, victim and prosecution. The DNA direction based on the positive FSL result met the just-decision requirement and disclosed no jurisdictional error.	658
Complainant's role in seeking production and recall in a Sessions trial	A Sessions trial is conducted by the public prosecutor; the complainant may assist the prosecutor but has no independent right to conduct the trial. The applicant, who was a witness to identification and investigative proceedings, showed no authority or locus to challenge the investigating agency's failure to produce seized articles through a request for production and recall of witnesses. The Court refused interference on that basis and because non-production alone did not justify acquittal.	843
Section 311 CrPC: active judicial control of material witness evidence	The trial court must seek the truth and remain alert to material evidence omitted or misstated by the prosecution. Under Section 311, it may summon, examine, recall or re-examine a witness at any stage and must do so when that evidence appears essential to a just decision. It may prompt clarification or put appropriate questions to reconcile testimony with the witness's own record, while avoiding prejudice to either side. Prosecution control of a Sessions trial under Sections 225, 226 and 301 does not eclipse those powers.	868
An alleged investigative omission must be put specifically to the witness	Evidence appreciation cannot proceed on an assumption not established in the testimony. A witness must have a fair opportunity to explain the particular circumstance alleged against him. The defence's general suggestion that documents came from a disposed-of file did not establish that the investigating officer deliberately omitted existing order sheets. The Court rejected that contention because no specific question about their alleged deliberate non-seizure had been put to him.	879
Complainant's Section 311 CrPC application — factual basis for invoking the Court's intervention	A complainant relying on the procedure recognised in Rekha Murarka must set out the factual basis for intervention, including the Public Prosecutor's material omission despite suggestions and the matter brought to the judge's notice. Where the application alleged no lapse by the prosecutor and did not assert that any issue had been brought to the Court's notice, the High Court held that the complainant's Section 311 application could not be considered.	890
Suo motu recall under Section 311 CrPC after production of material evidence	Where a recovered personal diary is taken on record as part of the charge-sheet or supplementary charge-sheet, the trial court must recall prosecution witnesses suo motu under Section 311 CrPC if further examination concerning that diary is required. The direction depends on the need for further examination and does not require recall of every witness or determine the diary's authenticity.	911
Section 273 CrPC:	When the prosecution failed to produce the jailed accused, examination of a	917

fresh examination of material witnesses in the jailed accused's presence	witness concerning only a co-accused's mobile number caused him no prejudice. The position differed for two doctors whose evidence about his semen slide, underwear and pubic hairs was used in the trial court's Section 377 IPC analysis. Following Atma Ram, the Court required those material witnesses to be examined afresh in the accused's presence, preserving his opportunity to observe their testimony and instruct effective cross-examination. The remedy addressed the affected evidence rather than requiring automatic acquittal or a fresh trial of every issue.
Section 311 CrPC examination of a material witness whom the prosecution seeks to give up	The trial court could examine Ramvir as a court witness under Section 311 CrPC despite the prosecutor's request to give him up, because the FIR specifically named him as a person who could disclose the assailants. The High Court considered the prosecutor's attempt to withdraw him, in the circumstances of his cross-case position and the witnesses' denial of his presence, as part of the effort to suppress the real incident. The decision concerns the court's response to a material evidentiary need, not a duty to examine every witness proposed and later withdrawn by the prosecution.	919

Fair Opportunity, Adjournment and Trial Management

Unopposed request — court must decide the legal issue on its merits	When a legal question arises for decision, the court must decide it on its merits even if the opposite party raises no objection. The prosecution's failure to oppose withdrawal of the defence doctor did not justify allowing withdrawal without deciding whether a witness already examined and partly cross-examined could lawfully be given up.	12
Prosecution's choice not to examine every listed witness	The prosecution may choose to examine all or some of its listed witnesses. Its decision not to examine the deceased's wife did not, on the facts, establish malice or undermine the consistent testimony of the injured eyewitnesses.	21
Section 138 NI Act — dismissal for absence on the first date after transfer	Where the complainant had attended on several dates and her cross-examination had been completed, dismissal of the Section 138 NI Act complaint for non-prosecution on its first date before the transferee Magistrate was materially illegal. The Court considered the earlier proceedings, including occasions when the complainant attended but her evidence was not recorded, and set aside the dismissal.	52
Complainant's completed cross-examination — closure of further evidence instead of dismissal	After the complainant's cross-examination had been completed in the Section 138 NI Act case, the Magistrate, if satisfied that she was deliberately delaying the remaining evidence, should have closed her right to examine further witnesses and fixed the case for the accused's statement instead of dismissing the complaint for non-prosecution.	52
Section 165 Evidence Act — active judicial inquiry may clarify material bearing on legal insanity	When medical evidence and conduct raise a material question about the accused's capacity at the time of the offence, the judge should use Section 165 to discover and obtain proper proof of relevant facts rather than remain a silent spectator. The power includes questioning witnesses and ordering documents, but the judgment must rest on relevant facts duly proved. Statutory protections concerning privileged answers or documents, improper questions and primary documentary evidence continue to apply.	77
Timely supply of legible complaint documents to the accused	The complainant must supply the documents to the accused at the first appearance or send them with the notice. Repeatedly leaving a complaint pending without supplying legible copies calls for firm case management. The exceptional final opportunity granted here did not excuse routine failure to provide the complaint and its supporting documents.	126
Prosecutor's refusal to examine an available witness	When defence counsel sought to defer cross-examination of one witness, the Special Public Prosecutor repeatedly refused the trial Court's directions to record another available witness's examination-in-chief. The High Court	152

	directed immediate withdrawal of the case from that prosecutor and required the competent authorities to review her continuation, after giving her a full opportunity of hearing, and to submit an action report within one month.
Transfer sought on adverse orders and an unsubstantiated caste remark	Rejection of applications is not by itself a ground to transfer a criminal trial. The Court did not accept the allegation that the trial judge had made a caste-based remark and considered transfer inappropriate when the trial had reached final arguments. It therefore upheld refusal of the transfer request.	211
Attributing trial delay without considering prosecution adjournments	In assessing delay in an old trial, the trial court should consider adjournments attributable to the prosecution as well as those sought by the defence. The Court disapproved attributing the entire delay to six defence adjournments when the order did not address prosecution-witness non-appearance or explain why prosecution evidence had taken about five years to close.	212
Police failure to execute witness process and undertrial custody	An undertrial cannot be left in custody at the mercy of police inaction in executing summons, bailable warrants and arrest warrants issued for witnesses. After checking the trial court's report against the SSP's explanation, the Court found that summons had been issued and police failure to secure the witnesses had delayed trial; it directed that the order be sent to the DGP.	239
Section 309 CrPC and adjournment when witnesses attend	Once examination of witnesses begins, Section 309 CrPC requires it to continue from day to day until the attending witnesses are examined, unless a departure is necessary for recorded reasons. When witnesses are present, postponement without examining them requires special reasons recorded in writing; counsel's mere inconvenience does not satisfy that requirement. Cross-examination should ordinarily follow examination-in-chief on the same day, or the next day if examination continues until late hours.	293
Counsel of choice and the duty to arrange alternative representation	An accused's right to counsel of choice does not permit indefinite adjournments. The Court must balance that choice with witness hardship and proper progress of the trial. When counsel has unavoidable difficulty attending, arrangements should be made for examination of witnesses already present. Here the failure to arrange alternative counsel despite an express warning, with elderly or unwell witnesses awaiting cross-examination for years, supported refusal of a further adjournment.	293
Chosen counsel's withdrawal — appointment of a substitute amicus	The constitutional duty stated in Mohd. Ajmal Amir Kasab requires counsel for an unrepresented accused at the commencement of trial unless the accused voluntarily and clearly makes an informed choice to defend himself. The present accused already had counsel, who left during cross-examination; when offered the opportunity to proceed, the accused insisted that the same advocate alone would cross-examine. In those circumstances, the Court held that appointment of another lawyer as amicus was not obligatory and upheld closure of that witness's cross-examination. The conclusion rested on the recorded opportunity and refusal.	308
Section 309 CrPC — attendance of witnesses and refusal to cross-examine	Day-to-day continuation of a criminal trial is the rule and adjournment the exception. Once witness examination begins, it should continue daily; a witness in attendance should not be sent away without special reasons recorded in writing. Counsel's engagement elsewhere is not a ground for adjournment. Section 309 also permits appropriate orders dispensing with examination or cross-examination when a party or counsel is absent or, though present, unwilling to proceed. Applying the statute and the cited trial-management authorities, the Court upheld closure after counsel's unsupported withdrawal and the accused's refusal of the opportunity offered.	308
Alleged misrecording of evidence — specific and prompt	An allegation that the trial judge misrecorded a witness's answer required a factual foundation identifying the question, the answer given and the different answer recorded. Counsel's departure midway through cross-examination was not justified by an unspecified allegation, particularly when no prompt	308

objection	application raised the grievance before the trial court. In applying the professional-duty authorities, the Court recognised fearless advocacy within the limits of propriety and counsel's duty of fairness to the court and the parties. It assessed the departure only for the recall request and left the separate contempt matter undetermined.
Challenge to trial order-sheet — belated affidavit and deposition chronology	The absence of an event from the deposition sheet did not, by itself, establish that a later order-sheet recording the event was false. The Court distinguished closure of the deposition from the subsequent preparation of the order-sheet. It rejected as an afterthought the affidavit denying counsel's return to court, because the point had not been raised in either the original recall application or the Section 482 petition and appeared only during the latter proceeding.	308
Trial expedition — restraint against cursory directions disrupting the calendar	A High Court should not direct expedition of a trial in a cursory manner that disturbs the trial court's calendar. Applying M. Gopalakrishnan v. Pasumpon Muthuramalingan, the Court declined the applicant's custody-based request for an expedition direction. The order did not decide a developed claim of unconstitutional trial delay or analyse a particular trial schedule.	329
Section 165 Evidence Act — active judicial questioning with safeguards	A judge should actively seek the truth rather than remain a silent spectator. Section 165 permits questions, in any form and at any time, to discover or obtain proper proof of relevant facts, and permits orders for production. Judgment must nevertheless rest on relevant, duly proved facts. The statutory protections for privileged answers and documents, restrictions on improper questions, and rules concerning primary evidence remain applicable. Judicial questions must not confuse, coerce or intimidate a witness.	342
Alleged Professional Misconduct by Defence Counsel	Failure to ask certain questions does not, by itself, establish professional misconduct by the accused's chosen lawyer. The Court declined to presume misconduct where no complaint had been made to the Bar Council. Relying on R. Muthukrishnan, it identified the Bar Council as the competent disciplinary forum.	385
Trial Court's Duty to Control Unwarranted Adjournments	In the passages adopted through Ram Mehar, Section 309 CrPC requires orderly progress of the trial, and the trial court must actively control unwarranted adjournments rather than leave proceedings to counsel. Fair trial protects both the accused and the wider interests of justice. That duty does not curtail the full operation of Section 311 where further evidence is genuinely needed for a just decision.	385
Day-to-Day Examination and Special Reasons for Adjournment	Under Section 309 CrPC, once witness examination begins it must ordinarily continue from day to day until attending witnesses are examined. Postponement beyond the following day requires recorded reasons; postponement without examining a witness already present requires special reasons recorded in writing. Cross-examination should ordinarily follow chief-examination the same day, or the next day if proceedings continue late. Counsel's convenience or lack of preparation alone does not satisfy that discipline. The court must account for witness hardship and fairness to both prosecution and accused.	386
Change of Counsel and Costs of Repeated Witness Attendance	An accused who knows the next trial date must arrange representation in time; engaging a new advocate when the witness attends does not itself justify another adjournment. Here the further request and refusal to pay witness costs supported the finding of deliberate delay. The relied-upon Shambhu Nath Singh passage permits costs commensurate with a witness's attendance expenses and loss where the accused or counsel obstructs day-to-day examination.	386
Trial-Control Measures for Non-Cooperation With Witness Examination	The Shambhu Nath Singh passage relied upon by the Court identifies remand to custody and costs as measures available under Section 309 when the accused or counsel obstructs continuous examination. The quoted provision limits a Magistrate's remand to fifteen days at a time. Where an accused on bail is absent while a witness attends, cancellation of bail is identified as an option. The	386 passage preserves an alternative application permitting counsel to examine the witness in the accused's absence, supported by a written undertaking not to dispute identity.

Counsel's Duty to Arrange Examination of Attending Witnesses	In the N.G. Dastane passage adopted through Mohd. Khalid, counsel with an unavoidable difficulty must make other arrangements for examination of witnesses already present. Repeated requests for postponement without such arrangements, causing witness hardship, may amount to professional misconduct; tactics intended to delay proceedings are also condemned as misconduct. The passage imposes a duty toward the court and attending witnesses.	386
Evidence recorded without the accused in breach of Section 273 CrPC	Subject to express statutory exceptions, evidence must be recorded in the accused's presence, or in the pleader's presence where personal attendance has been dispensed with. The two material witnesses' examination in the accused's absence, initially also without counsel, violated Section 273. Later cross-examination by counsel did not establish a valid dispensation on this record. The resulting serious prejudice required fresh examination; the breach was treated as a curable irregularity rather than a ground for automatic acquittal.	395
Unsubstantiated ineffective-assistance claim and de novo trial	A general allegation that assigned counsel lacked experience and failed to cross-examine properly did not justify a de novo trial on this record. Counsel had seventeen years' standing, no material showed absence of criminal-trial experience or incompetence, the accused was present when evidence was recorded, and no objection to counsel's competence had then been raised. The remand application was rejected on those circumstances.	397
Later opportunity to challenge evidence collected in investigation	Absence of participation during investigation does not determine the validity or evidentiary weight of the prosecution material. At trial, the accused may cross-examine witnesses and contest the authenticity, admissibility and legal significance of material gathered, including through further investigation.	418
Verification Before Reporting a Litigant's Death to Obtain an Adjournment	Counsel should verify a litigant's death before making that statement to the court and should not make a false statement to obtain an adjournment. When a later application disclosed that the person reported dead was alive, the Court criticised the conduct and called for thorough verification before such statements are made.	458
Section 165 Evidence Act — Active judicial inquiry and safeguards	A trial judge should actively seek the truth and may ask questions or order production under Section 165 of the Evidence Act, while remaining impartial. Questions must not confuse, coerce or intimidate a witness. The judgment must rest on relevant facts duly proved. The statutory power does not override protected refusals under Sections 121–131, permit improper questions under Sections 148–149, or dispense with required primary documentary evidence. Cross-examination on answers to the judge's questions requires the court's leave.	478
Evidence in counsel's presence after dispensation of personal attendance	Section 273 CrPC permits trial evidence to be recorded in the pleader's presence when the accused's personal attendance has been lawfully dispensed with. Applying U.P. Pollution Control Board v. Mohan Meakins, exemption may be conditioned on counsel attending, identity not being disputed and the accused appearing when required. Here, the recorded Section 317 dispensation, counsel's undertaking to cross-examine and express concession on identity made the complainant's examination in the appellants' absence permissible. The Court distinguished Atma Ram, where evidence had been recorded despite objection and without willingness or lawful dispensation.	508
Missing case diary and adjournment of a bail hearing	The investigating agency's failure to send the case diary did not justify postponing the bail hearing where it had advance notice of the listing and the investigating officer was present through video conferencing. The Court refused to leave the accused in custody at the officer's convenience and	569 proceeded to hear the application.

Further adjournment after prolonged failure to file a response	A respondent who has entered appearance is expected to file the response promptly and cannot withhold it until specifically directed by the Court. Notice provides an opportunity to put forward a defence, rather than a basis for repeatedly seeking time. Where counsel had appeared months earlier without filing a reply, the Court rejected a further adjournment, applying the duty of preparedness and the principles against needless delay narrated in Nandu @ Gandharva Singh.	592
Unnecessary adjournments and counsel's professional duty	An advocate who accepts a brief must prepare the case, present it properly and assist the Court. Seeking adjournments without reason to delay proceedings breaches that responsibility and may amount to professional misconduct. The fact that older cases remain pending does not entitle counsel to refuse to argue a listed matter. The Court adopted these principles in refusing further time, without initiating disciplinary action against counsel in this matter.	592
Counsel's duty when witnesses attend for examination	Where witnesses attend court for examination, counsel must facilitate their examination rather than seek postponement merely for personal convenience. An unavoidable difficulty requires arrangements for their examination. Repeated dereliction causing unnecessary adjournments and hardship to attending witnesses may amount to professional misconduct. The narrated authorities also require the court to examine an attending witness on that day rather than adjourn casually.	592
Day-to-day attendance after accepting a criminal-trial brief	An advocate who accepts a brief in a criminal case has a professional duty to attend the trial from day to day. Difficulty in doing so does not, by itself, excuse the obligation. The Court's adopted discussion of adjournments reproduced this principle from Lt. Col. S.J. Chaudhary through Noor Mohammed.	592
Cross-examination adjournments — prompt completion and recorded special reasons protect trial fairness	Cross-examination should ordinarily be completed on the day examination-in-chief ends; if examination continues until late, it may continue the following day. Deferral for long periods risks pressure on witnesses and prevarication. Trial courts must follow the procedural requirement of special reasons for adjournment and protect the lawful interests of the accused, prosecution, victim and society when managing examination of witnesses.	638
Protection of a Diligent Litigant From Counsel's Default	Applying the narrated Rafiq v. Munshilal reasoning, the Court recognised that a litigant who has done what is required to participate effectively should not suffer merely because the chosen advocate defaults. The principle does not itself establish disputed allegations that documents were supplied or instructions ignored. Where those allegations amounted to professional misconduct and were pending before the Bar Council, the Court declined to determine them in the recall petition and reserved liberty to revive it after the counsel's guilt was established there.	654
Section 173(5) requires statements of proposed prosecution witnesses; the defence may seek other material or call other witnesses	The Court read Section 173(5) CrPC as requiring the police report to be accompanied by documents on which the prosecution proposes to rely and Section 161 statements of persons it proposes to examine. The investigating officer had questioned two school persons who reportedly knew nothing of the incident, and the prosecution did not propose to call them. Their statements therefore did not have to accompany the charge sheet merely because recorded. If the accused considered material necessary, an application under Section 91 could seek it, and a person not cited by the prosecution could be called as a defence witness. The ruling concerns this statutory forwarding duty and available defence avenues, not an absolute bar on disclosure required by another law or order.	678
Section 145 inquiry — an administrative report cannot	An inquiry report submitted by an authority is neither evidence nor a judgment and cannot by itself substitute for evidence in deciding a Section 145 CrPC dispute. The decision must rest on evidence brought on record after both parties	703

replace evidence and hearing	have had an opportunity to adduce evidence and be heard. A decision made without completing that process warrants a fresh inquiry.
Illness and exemption from personal appearance	The applicant's illness and need for frequent dialysis did not provide a ground to quash the criminal proceedings. If regular attendance caused inconvenience, the applicant could seek exemption from personal appearance before the trial court. The High Court left that application to be made there; it did not itself grant exemption.	767
Precedence between parallel criminal and civil proceedings	Criminal proceedings should ordinarily receive precedence over related civil proceedings so that criminal justice is not delayed. This is not an inflexible rule: special circumstances, including a related case being close to conclusion, may justify another course. The possibility of conflicting decisions alone is not the governing consideration.	793
Refusal to argue after accepting a brief and repeated opportunities	Filing a fresh vakalatnama and accepting the brief did not, in the circumstances, establish a sufficient ground for adjournment. After time to prepare and repeated opportunities to argue, counsel's refusal to address the matter did not prevent the Court from considering the pleaded grounds, examining the available case diary and hearing the State. The Court deprecated the conduct it found intended to avoid the assigned Bench and decided the application on its merits.	832
Witness examination in the accused's absence under Section 273 CrPC	Except where otherwise expressly provided, trial evidence must be recorded in the accused's presence or, where personal attendance has been dispensed with, in the presence of his pleader. The record did not show an undertaking by the appellant allowing examination in his absence or counsel's assumption of responsibility for cross-examination on that basis. Examination of the material prosecution witnesses without him violated his valuable right to observe and effectively cross-examine them in his presence. The Court therefore declined to affirm the convictions under Sections 323 and 354 IPC.	835
Section 309 CrPC: day-to-day examination and recorded reasons for adjournment	Once witness examination begins, it must continue from day to day until the witnesses in attendance are examined, unless a necessary departure is supported by recorded reasons. An adjournment without examining an attending witness requires special reasons recorded in writing; counsel's convenience or engagement in another court is insufficient. Cross-examination should ordinarily follow examination-in-chief on the same day, or the next day if the examination runs late. Where a party or counsel is absent or unready, the court may record the witness and make an appropriate order dispensing with examination or cross-examination under Section 309(2).	860
Advocate's duty to arrange examination of attending witnesses	An advocate who faces unavoidable inconvenience must make other arrangements for examining witnesses who are present. Seeking postponement without making such arrangements causes hardship to witnesses and amounts to dereliction of duty; repeated dereliction and deliberate tactics to prolong proceedings may amount to professional misconduct.	860
Trial court's duty to prevent obstruction and protect a fair trial	The trial court must actively control proceedings in accordance with the statutory procedure and cannot surrender their conduct to counsel seeking unjustified delays. Its duty to secure a fair trial protects the interests of the accused and the prosecution, as well as the collective interest in justice. An accused cannot use obstructive conduct to jeopardise that trial.	860
Section 309 CrPC: measures against non-cooperation with witness examination	Where non-cooperation by the accused or counsel prevents day-to-day witness examination, the court may use the measures described in Section 309, including appropriate remand or costs commensurate with the witnesses' loss and attendance expenses. The relied-upon precedent also recognises cancellation of bail where the accused is absent while a witness attends, subject to a request that counsel examine the witness in the accused's absence and a written undertaking not to dispute identity.	860

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Early eyewitness examination and the trial court's power to regulate sequence	Unjustified withholding of eyewitnesses while corroborative witnesses are examined exposes the trial to pressure and compromise. The trial court may regulate witness sequence and must secure eyewitness examination at the beginning of trial, even if the prosecutor fails to request it. The Court directed rejection of contrary requests by either side and recording of examination-in-chief whenever witnesses attend, despite defence counsel being unready to cross-examine. These directions did not dispense with cross-examination.	868
Early recording of witness evidence as a measure of witness protection	Police responsibility for witness protection includes securing early recording of evidence so that witnesses are not exposed to prolonged pressure from accused persons. Referring to the Witness Protection Scheme formulated in Mahender Chawla, the Court connected effective protection with prompt service of trial-court process and timely production of civilian and police witnesses. Its subsequent questions to the DGP sought an affidavit about compliance and accountability; they did not finally determine every administrative issue raised.	912
Section 273 CrPC: accused's presence during prosecution evidence	Trial evidence must be recorded in the accused's presence, subject to express statutory exceptions such as Sections 299 and 317 CrPC, or in counsel's presence when personal attendance has been dispensed with. Following Atma Ram, the Court held that counsel's attendance did not imply consent to recording the investigating officer's evidence while the jailed accused remained unproduced without explanation, dispensation or undertaking. The accused lost the opportunity to observe this important witness and obtain explanations through counsel, causing prejudice. Atma Ram left open whether dispensation could be implied on different facts.	913
Section 317 CrPC: reasoned dispensation cannot be presumed from non-production	For dispensation under Section 317 CrPC, the trial court must record why the accused's personal attendance is unnecessary in the interests of justice or that the accused persistently disrupts proceedings. The effect of an accused's application accepting representation through counsel and disclaiming objections to identity or evidence in the accused's absence may then be considered. Mere failure to produce a jailed accused, with no explanation, application, consent or reasoned order, did not satisfy those conditions in this case.	913
Prompt examination on scheduled trial dates without demonstrated prejudice	Sections 230 and 231 CrPC require the trial court to take available prosecution evidence on the dates fixed, while permitting deferral or recall of cross-examination where appropriate. The advance trial programme was not opposed, counsel cross-examined the witnesses, and no inability to cross-examine effectively or later need for recall on that ground was shown. Applying Gouri Shankar, the Court rejected the contention that prompt examination itself made the trial unfair. Expedition serves the accused's right to a speedy trial, but this conclusion did not excuse the separate presence and late-DNA-report violations.	917
Counsel's uninstructed consent and dispensation under Section 317 CrPC	A lawyer's no-objection to recording evidence does not bind a jailed accused when given without his instructions after the prosecution has failed to produce him. Section 317 dispensation requires the relevant application or declaration and a reasoned judicial assessment of why attendance is unnecessary in the interests of justice or why the accused persistently disrupts proceedings. Here the accused was not responsible for his absence, and the prosecution's default could not be used to his disadvantage. Counsel's unsupported undertaking did not cure the Section 273 breach.	917
Section 234 CrPC: effective preparation and hearing of final arguments	Final arguments under Section 234 CrPC are a substantive opportunity founded on natural justice, requiring sufficient preparation and a patient hearing of both parties. In this case a DNA report was admitted, further Section 313 examination conducted and final arguments heard on the same day. Consent recorded for that sequence did not remove the demonstrated prejudice from lack	917

	of preparation on the newly admitted material. The Court required at least one week for preparation and argument after the renewed defence stage on remand; it did not prohibit expeditious final hearings in every case.
Priority between parallel civil and criminal proceedings	Criminal proceedings ordinarily receive precedence over parallel civil litigation so that evidence remains fresh and guilt or innocence is determined promptly, consistently with a fair trial. This is not an inflexible rule. The likelihood of embarrassment and special circumstances must be considered, including whether another proceeding is so near completion that a different course would be more expedient and just. The possibility of conflicting decisions is not, by itself, a relevant reason for deciding which proceeding should wait.	940
Belated DNA testing: refusal to postpone delivery of judgment	Allowance of DNA testing did not require judgment to be postponed where the accused sought the test about five years after the alleged rape, without explaining the delay, and the trial had reached the stage of examination under Section 313 CrPC. The Court refused a stay of judgment despite the outstanding report. It nevertheless required the investigating officer to seek the result promptly and the forensic laboratory to endeavour to give the examination priority.	946

Examination of Accused Under Section 313 CrPC/BNSS Equivalent

Section 313 CrPC — omitted question about material evidence and prejudice	The Gadhvi and Nar Singh passages relied upon distinguish a trial court's omission to put material evidence to the accused under Section 313 CrPC from the prosecution's failure to produce or suppression of that evidence. The omission requires assessment of prejudice in the context of the available evidence. In Gadhvi, the objection was first raised in the Supreme Court and no prejudice was found on the record; the omission did not invalidate the conviction on that ground.	58
Incriminating FSL circumstance omitted from Section 313 examination	An incriminating FSL report received after the accused's Section 313 CrPC examination must be put to him before its findings can be used against him. The trial court wrongly rejected the finding of human blood on recovered clothes at that stage merely because blood grouping was inconclusive. Inconclusive grouping alone did not warrant discarding the circumstance. However, because the accused had no opportunity to explain the human-blood finding, the appellate court could not rely on it. It declined to remand the case for a further examination after fifteen years and assessed the remaining evidence.	103
Opportunity to explain material incriminating circumstances under Section 313 CrPC	Each material circumstance intended to support conviction must be put specifically and distinctly to the accused so that the accused has a fair chance to explain it. Failure may vitiate the trial where prejudice or a miscarriage of justice results. Answers may be considered with the prosecution evidence under Section 313(4), but cannot be treated in isolation as a substitute for that evidence.	294
Section 313 CrPC — silence and failure to explain matters within personal knowledge	The Court distinguished an accused’s mere silence from failure to explain incriminating circumstances or facts within his personal knowledge. The husband did not state under Section 313 CrPC that dissatisfaction with the marriage or a wish to move to another town had led the deceased to suicide. In assessing the defence advanced through other evidence, the Court treated that omission, together with the proved circumstances contradicting the hanging account, as a failure to establish the suggested defence.	302
Section 313 CrPC — opportunity to explain an incriminating FSL report	Each material incriminating circumstance must be put specifically, distinctly and separately to the accused so that it can be explained. Failure may vitiate proceedings where prejudice or miscarriage of justice results. Since the firearm FSL report was not put to the appellants, the Court excluded it from consideration while assessing the remaining evidence independently.	319

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 313 CrPC — exclusion of omitted material and possible remittal	The reproduced Samsul Haque decision states that inculpatory material not put to the accused should ordinarily be excluded from use against the accused. It also recognises that a perfunctory examination may be remedied by remittal for retrial from the stage after prosecution evidence closed, subject to prejudice or miscarriage of justice. In the present appeals, the Court chose exclusion of the unput FSL report.	319
Section 313 CrPC — explanation of incriminating circumstances	The Court relied on S. Govindaraju for the principle that an accused's explanation of incriminating circumstances put during Section 313 examination must be considered with the evidence. Failure to give an appropriate explanation, or a false answer, may count as an additional link in the circumstances described in that passage. Here the Court considered the evasive response concerning the reconciliation agreement together with the undisputed signature and the prosecution evidence; the response was not the sole proof of cruelty or abetment.	328
Section 313 examination following a limited witness re-examination	On the limited remand, any new facts emerging from the two witnesses' fresh examination had to be put to the accused under Section 313 CrPC. Further examination of the accused was confined to that purpose. The order allowed neither side to lead other evidence and did not permit an additional defence that had not been taken at trial or in the earlier Section 313 statement.	395
Defence Suggestion Assessed With the Accused's Contrary Section 313 Explanation	A question or suggestion put by defence counsel cannot simply be ignored, but its significance must be assessed in the overall circumstances. There was no basis to find that the suggestion placing the appellant at the house had been given on her instructions, and her Section 313 statement specifically denied visiting it before arrest. The Court considered that stand with the weaknesses in the prosecution evidence rather than treating the suggestion as a conclusive admission.	455
Section 313 CrPC: late forensic evidence must be put to the accused	An incriminating circumstance cannot be used to convict an accused who was not given an opportunity to explain it under Section 313 CrPC. Although the forensic report was admissible under Section 293 CrPC, supplying its copy to counsel did not replace questioning the accused about its adverse finding. The report arrived after final arguments, remained unexhibited and was not put to the appellant in a further examination. Its finding of human blood on the knife was therefore excluded. A question about recovery of a weapon does not by itself invite an explanation of a later forensic finding of human blood on it.	550
Section 313 CrPC: DNA report received after examination of the accused	An incriminating circumstance must be put to the accused under Section 313 CrPC before it can be used against him. A copy of a later DNA report and its admission as an exhibit without objection did not replace that opportunity. The report arrived after the appellant's examination, but the trial court did not question him further about the DNA finding before relying on it as the sole basis of conviction. The Court excluded that circumstance. Questioning about recovery alone is distinct from questioning about an adverse scientific finding subsequently obtained from the recovered material.	553
Use of an admission in the accused's Section 313 explanation	An admission contained in the accused's explanation under Section 313 CrPC may be considered when testing a factual objection to the prosecution account. Here the defence itself admitted that the roofs were connected and that the deceased was shot on the accused's roof. The Court used those admissions to reject the alleged twenty-five-foot separation and to assess the plausibility of the escape route and the alternative shooting account.	693
Signed but unanswered Section 313 questionnaire	Section 313 CrPC requires a meaningful opportunity to explain material incriminating circumstances. Rakesh's signatures on 29 pages did not cure the omission to record answers to almost all 222 prepared questions. A circumstance not put to the accused must be excluded where the omission causes prejudice or miscarriage of justice; an omission causing no prejudice	713

	may have no adverse effect. The denial of an opportunity to explain the incriminating case furnished an additional ground for Rakesh's acquittal.
Ballistic report not put to the accused under Section 313 CrPC	An RFSL report linking the recovered bullet to the accused's pistol could not be read against him where it remained unexhibited and the incriminating circumstance was never put to him under Section 313 CrPC. Receipt of the report and supply of its copy to defence counsel did not overcome that omission. The Court refused reliance on the report even in view of Section 293 CrPC and assessed the remaining evidence independently.	782
Section 313 CrPC — false explanation of proved incriminating circumstances	The accused's explanation of incriminating circumstances put to him must be considered when assessing a circumstantial case. A false answer or failure to give an appropriate explanation may provide an additional link, while the prosecution retains the burden of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Here the Court rejected the husband's account of discovering the body on returning at 4 p.m. and his explanation about taking his wife for treatment, and treated that false account as an additional circumstance.	898
Limited Section 313 CrPC examination after a witness is re-examined on remand	If fresh examination of PW-20 brings new facts on record, those facts must be put to the accused in a further statement under Section 313 CrPC for that limited purpose. The remand did not permit either side to lead other evidence or the accused to introduce an additional defence not previously taken at trial or in the earlier Section 313 statement. The prosecution had to secure the presence of both the witness and the accused, and the further proceedings were subject to the Court's short timetable without prejudging their result.	913
Section 313 CrPC admissions: independent prosecution proof and the statement as a whole	Answers under Section 313 CrPC cannot themselves form the foundation of conviction: the prosecution retains the burden of proof, and inculpatory answers cannot be detached from the accused's exculpatory explanation. Accepting the narrated principles from Pramila, Darshan Singh and Palvinder Kaur, the Court first assessed witnesses, CCTV and DNA independently. It then used voluntary admissions about taking the child, his account to her father, medical samples and flight as reinforcement. Having examined the answers as a whole, it found no reasonable exculpatory account beyond an unsupported claim of animosity; absence of visiting relations did not establish false implication.	915
Section 313 admissions read with the prosecution evidence	The Court read the accused persons' admissions under Section 313 CrPC together with the prosecution evidence. Their admissions established the manager's instructions and the probationary officer's lack of independent authority to issue cover notes. Considered with insureds' payments, unremitted premiums, complaints and manipulated records, those admissions supported the convictions. The Court did not treat either accused's disputed explanation as a confession of all offence ingredients or use the answers in isolation.	968

Authenticity of Court Filings, Vakalatnama and Affidavit Oath Administration

Accused's control of the prosecutrix's representation and no-objection affidavit	An accused cannot engage a lawyer on behalf of the prosecutrix in order to procure an affidavit of his own choice. Obtaining her vakalatnama before her examination and supplying it to counsel for the accused side to arrange representation was treated as an attempt to win over the witness. Her subsequent hostility was therefore considered against the recorded concern about pressure on her.	175
Affidavit: sworn declaration before an authorised person	An affidavit is a declaration made on oath or affirmation before a person legally authorised to administer it. Its sworn verification gives it evidentiary significance and requires the maker to respect the obligation to state the truth.	282
Forged vakalatnama — absence of authority to	A vakalatnama is the litigant's authority for representation, and an advocate cannot represent a party on a forged instrument. After the advocate declined to challenge the expert opinion excluding the litigant's signature, the Court held	309

represent a litigant	the appearance unauthorised and restrained further representation. It also rejected withdrawal qualified by continued insistence that the signature was genuine, observing that fresh genuine authority could resolve such a dispute. The Court noted the separate position of designated Senior Advocates when explaining the ordinary requirement of a vakalatnama. The advocate received a warning and conditional acceptance of apology on payment of ₹15,000 costs.
M.P. High Court Rule 13 — understanding and proper swearing of an affidavit	Under Chapter 9 Rule 13, the oath administrator must ascertain that the affiant has read and understood the affidavit, arrange reading or explanation when necessary, and withhold swearing until satisfied. Where it is read, translated or explained, the required written certification must be made. The rule also requires impounding and referral to the Registrar where the affiant refutes the contents, impersonation is found, statements are manifestly false or another sufficient reason exists, with the date and circumstances certified. The Court found non-compliance in the attestation here, directed expert comparison of the notary's signature and reserved further action pending the report.	309
Notarial attestation — oath, presence and register safeguards	An affidavit is a solemn voluntary statement sworn or affirmed before an authorised person, not a document made valid by signature and attestation as an empty formality. In relying on United India Insurance Co. v. Arti Bano, the Court stressed proper administration of the oath or affirmation in the deponent's presence and compliance with notarial-register requirements, including the executant's signature and prescribed particulars of the act. These safeguards protect the reliability of affidavits on which courts determine rights.	309
Affidavit — oath administered by a legally authorised person	An affidavit is a solemn statement on oath or affirmation administered by a person authorised by law, and carries evidentiary value and penal consequences. The Court relied on the Oaths Act and the narrated decision in Kamla Sharma to reject treating an affidavit as an ordinary or valueless piece of paper.	318
Original vakalatnama and prescribed fees after online filing	Filing a vakalatnama online did not dispense with the requirement under the High Court Rules to file the original. The Court also required scrutiny of the prescribed court fee and Adhivakta Kalyan Nidhi, which were absent from the online vakalatnama. Failure to identify those defects led to a direction for explanations and action according to law.	592
Affidavit as a solemn declaration on oath	An affidavit is a written statement affirmed or sworn as true before a person authorised to administer an oath or accept an affirmation. Its evidentiary significance lies in that solemn verification. Relying on New Okhla Industrial Development Authority v. Ravindra Kumar Singhvi and its reproduction of M. Veerabhadra Rao, the Court rejected treating a supporting affidavit as a mere sheet of paper or evading responsibility through deliberately vague verification.	643
Care in notarising affidavits and due process before action concerning a notary's licence	A notary administering an oath must perform that duty with care and verify the affidavit's contents. An affidavit describing Ahmedabad as being in Maharashtra, despite the notary's Ahmedabad, Gujarat seal, led the Court to find casual notarisation and direct the Gujarat Law Secretary to examine whether the licence should continue. Any action had to follow the due process required under the Notaries Act.	858

Public Prosecutor Control and Private Counsel Participation in Criminal Trials

Private Counsel's Limited Role in a Sessions Prosecution under Sections 248 and 338(2) BNSS	A Sessions prosecution must be conducted by the Public Prosecutor. Under Section 338(2) BNSS, privately instructed counsel acts under the prosecutor's directions and may, with the Court's permission, submit written arguments after the evidence closes. The provision does not confer an independent right to make oral arguments or cross-examine witnesses. An application seeking participation at charge framing was therefore rightly refused. The applicant's	400 assertion that his representation led to the FIR did not justify enlarging this statutory role.

Prosecution's duty to disclose inconvenient evidence	The prosecution must fairly place relevant facts before the Court and must not deliberately withhold witnesses merely because their evidence may favour the accused. A fair selection among numerous eyewitnesses is permissible; suppression of inconvenient witnesses can constitute a serious infirmity in proof.	410
Withdrawal of important trials from a prosecutor pending inquiry	Having lost confidence in the prosecutor's unexplained handling of material eyewitnesses, the Court directed the Public Prosecutor to take over the case and required the competent authority to inquire into whether the prosecutor should continue in office. Pending the inquiry, murder, attempt-to-murder, rape/POCSO and other important Sessions matters were to be withdrawn from him. Reassignment depended on the inquiry outcome; the competent authority was to decide the question of his continuation within two months.	557
Section 301(2) CrPC: private counsel's limited role and independent judicial powers	A privately instructed pleader acts under the directions of the Public Prosecutor or Assistant Public Prosecutor and may submit written arguments after evidence closes with the court's permission. Those limits on private participation do not prevent the court from considering whether its own Section 311 powers are needed to correct an evidentiary omission or anomaly brought to its notice.	868
	Sub-Chapter no. 17.7 Section 319 CrPC — Summoning Additional Accused on Trial Evidence
Section 319 CrPC: examination-in-chief and the right to a fresh trial	A court may summon an additional accused on examination-in-chief satisfying the Section 319 standard without waiting for cross-examination. The proposed accused has no right to an intermediate opportunity to cross-examine before being added. Section 319(4) protects that person through fresh proceedings in which prosecution witnesses may be cross-examined and defence evidence and arguments presented.	141
Section 319 CrPC: persons omitted from the charge-sheet and the protest-petition stage	Omission from the charge-sheet does not prevent summoning a person under Section 319 CrPC when qualifying evidence of involvement emerges in court. The power remains available even after the opportunity to seek summoning through a protest petition has passed. Repetition in court of a specific accusation already made in the FIR does not, for that reason alone, disqualify the testimony from consideration.	141
Pre-summoning hearing on an application under Section 319 CrPC	A person proposed to be added as an accused has no right to a hearing before the court exercises Section 319 CrPC merely because the order may affect that person. The availability of a legal remedy against the summoning order and the trial safeguards do not require a separate pre-summoning hearing.	141
Section 319 CrPC: specific evidence against distant relatives	Distant relationship or separate residence does not prevent summoning under Section 319 CrPC where trial evidence attributes a specific role in dowry demand and harassment to the proposed accused. Mere naming or omnibus allegations against relatives are insufficient without tangible supporting material. Allegations following an unnatural death require a pragmatic assessment, but the Court must be satisfied that the named relatives also caused harassment. The Court upheld summoning where investigation statements and court testimony specifically attributed a dowry demand and subsequent physical and mental harassment to the applicants.	724
	Chapter no. 18 Charge, Discharge, Framing of Charge and Trial Structuring
	Sub-Chapter no. 18.1 Alteration of Charge and Defective Charge
Unspecified Section	A charge under Section 376(2) IPC should identify the particular clause alleged.	38

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
376(2) IPC clause and prejudice to the accused	The omission did not vitiate the conviction here because the prosecution case clearly informed the accused that they were being tried for rape of a girl below sixteen, and no prejudice resulted. The High Court identified the applicable provision as Section 376(2)(i), with Section 120-B IPC for the conspirator; it did not approve the practice of framing an imprecise charge.
Section 498-A conviction without a separate charge after a Section 304-B charge	A person charged with and acquitted of dowry death under Section 304-B IPC may nevertheless be convicted under Section 498-A without a separate charge under that section, if the case of cruelty is proved. Applying that principle, the Court rejected the objection to the appellants' Section 498-A convictions based on the absence of a specific charge.	122
Maintaining the charged rape conviction where the aggravated provision was not charged	Although the prosecutrix was found below sixteen, the trial court had not framed a charge under Section 376(2)(i) IPC. The High Court therefore maintained the conviction under the charged provision, Section 376(1), rather than substituting the aggravated provision on appeal.	124
Separate rioting charge and Section 149 IPC	Where murder is charged with the aid of Section 149 IPC, separate charges under Sections 143 and 147 need not be framed unless separate convictions under those provisions are sought. The ingredients of unlawful assembly and rioting remain necessary to the charge incorporating Section 149.	160
Typing error in the sentencing paragraph	A mistaken name in the sentencing paragraph did not establish conviction on an unframed murder charge where the charges and the operative conviction finding correctly identified the direct offenders. Suresh and Rajesh had been charged with and convicted of Section 302 IPC; Hukum Singh had been convicted under Section 302 read with Section 149. The substitution of Hukum’s name for Suresh’s at sentencing was a typing error.	165
Charge under Section 294 IPC did not support conviction under Section 504	A conviction under Section 504 IPC could not be sustained on a charge confined to Section 294, because the offences have different ingredients. Section 294 concerns obscene words causing annoyance, whereas Section 504 concerns intentional insult provoking the particular victim to breach the peace. The uncharged Section 504 conviction was therefore set aside.	207
Separate rioting charge when Section 149 liability is invoked	Where an offence such as murder is charged with Section 149 IPC, separate charges under Sections 143 and 147 are unnecessary unless separate convictions under those provisions are sought. Applying Mahadev Sharma, the Court explained that the constituent unlawful-assembly and rioting ingredients are included in the composite charge, while the prosecution must still prove the unlawful assembly and common object.	215
Wrong name in charge-framing order without prejudice to the accused	An incorrect accused name in the order directing framing of charges did not vitiate the trial where the actual charges correctly named the accused and the mistake caused no prejudice. The Court declined interference because the error had no substantive effect on the outcome.	226
Lesser hurt offences within a charge of attempted murder	A charge under Section 307 read with Section 34 IPC can support conviction for a lesser hurt offence, though the converse does not follow. On the charges concerning injuries to the same victim in this case, separate lesser hurt charges were unnecessary. Their inclusion caused no prejudice and did not affect the result.	226
Evidence from one trial cannot be used in a separately tried co-accused’s appeal	Where absconding co-accused were arrested later and tried separately on evidence recorded afresh, the evidence from the earlier trial could not be read either for or against them. Although the appeals were heard together, the appeal arising from the separate trial required its own judgment on its own evidence.	227
Omitted separate victim counts and the test of prejudice from a defective	An error or omission in a charge does not invalidate a conviction by a competent court unless it actually causes a failure of justice under Section 464 CrPC. The Court considers whether the accused knew the case and received a fair	291

charge	opportunity to defend it. Although the charges did not separately label two murder counts and two attempted-murder counts, they identified all four victims and the acts alleged. The accused understood those allegations, and no prejudice was shown.
Substitution of Section 34 for Section 149 IPC: Overlap and Prejudice	A charge under Section 149 IPC may support conviction with the aid of Section 34 when the facts and evidence also establish common intention and the substitution causes no injustice or prejudice to the defence. Common object and common intention differ, so substitution is not automatic upon the acquittal of some accused. The Court applied Section 34 to the three armed participants because their concerted firing proved the shared intention.	360
Alteration from Joint to Direct Liability: Specific Charge and Absence of Prejudice	The Court altered the Section 302/34 and Section 307/34 convictions of two appellants to direct liability under Sections 302 and 307 because their own acts were proved, specific direct charges had been framed and the alteration caused no prejudice. It made the murder-count alteration despite the absence of a State appeal on that finding. Conversely, it declined a direct Section 302 conviction for another victim where the appellant had faced only the corresponding Section 302/149 charge.	360
Separate Rioting Charge and Liability Under Section 149 IPC	The Mahadev Sharma passage relied upon by the Court explains that a separate charge under Sections 143 or 147 is not essential merely to sustain a substantive offence charged with Section 149. The ingredients of unlawful assembly must nevertheless be proved. Separate charges are required where separate convictions under those provisions are sought; omission of a separate rioting charge does not dispense with the common-object enquiry.	383
Unauthorised counsel at the charge hearing and failure of justice	Counsel who lacked authority from the accused or the appointed legal-aid lawyer was not competent to argue on framing of charge. The irregularity nevertheless did not require retrial from that stage where the prosecution record disclosed grave suspicion warranting trial and no prejudice resulting in failure of justice was shown. The Court applied Sections 461 and 464 CrPC and required the trial court to ensure representation by engaged or duly provided counsel.	391
Correction of a Misdescription in a Framed Charge	An alleged error in naming the complainant wife in a framed charge may be addressed by an application for correction of the charge. Such a misdescription did not, by itself, require quashing the charges.	401
Addition of a charge on the date of judgment—prejudice to the accused	Adding a charge under Section 412 IPC after final arguments and pronouncing conviction on the same day caused prejudice in the circumstances of this trial. The Court reached that conclusion despite the order recording that the accused did not wish to lead defence evidence and that arguments on the added charge were heard.	410
Substitution of Section 34 for Section 149 IPC — Common intention and absence of prejudice	An appellate court may substitute Section 34 for Section 149 where the proved facts support common intention and substantially the same facts and evidence were in issue, without prejudice or failure of justice. Common intention involves concert and a meeting of minds; common object does not necessarily do so. If the common-object charge does not encompass common intention, substitution may prejudice the defence and must not be automatic. Applying Sections 216, 386 and 464 CrPC and the narrated Mala Singh authorities, the Court sustained Rajesh's two murder convictions under Section 302/34 after the assembly case failed.	474
Unframed aggravated rape charge in a conviction appeal	Although the prosecutrix was below sixteen, no charge under Section 376(2) IPC had been framed. On that basis, the Court confined its affirmation to the conviction under Section 376(1) IPC.	560
Conviction under Section 411 IPC	The accused charged with the alleged extortion-based robbery under Section 394 IPC could not, on acquittal of that charge, be convicted under Section 411	574

without a corresponding charge	IPC when neither a corresponding alternative charge nor a specific allegation of that offence was present. The Court found the relevant ingredients different and held that the omission was not a curable irregularity under Section 215 CrPC or a case covered by the illustration to Section 221 CrPC.
Incorrect complainant name in a charge and correction under Section 216 CrPC	An incorrect complainant name in a charge may be brought before the trial court through an application under Section 216 CrPC for alteration or correction. Here, no such application had been made and serious prejudice from the wrong name was not asserted. The Court therefore declined to interfere with the charges on that ground, while leaving the applicant free to seek correction under Section 216.	603
Conviction for a lesser offence after trial on a graver charge	A person tried for a graver offence may be convicted of the lesser offence established at trial. The Court relied on this possibility as an additional reason for declining interference where the applicants sought discharge from the grievous-hurt charge under Section 333 IPC rather than complete discharge from all charges.	647
Substitution of Section 34 for Section 149 and prejudice from the charge	A conviction under Section 302 read with Section 34 may follow a charge under Sections 302 and 149 when the facts and evidence supporting the charged common object also establish common intention and the substitution causes no prejudice or failure of justice. Sections 216, 386 and 464 CrPC permit charge alteration within those limits. If the charged common object does not involve common intention, substitution may prejudice the defence and must not be permitted. Applying Mala Singh, the Court sustained Section 34 liability for the four proved attackers.	713
Included rape offence despite absence of a separate Section 376(1) charge	The aggravated offences under Section 376(2)(h) and (m) IPC included the underlying element of rape. Where no prosecution case of pregnancy or the specified grievous harm, maiming, disfigurement or danger to life supported those aggravators, the aggravated conviction could not stand. The Court nevertheless convicted under Section 376(1), although no separate charge under that subsection had been framed, because the proved rape element was included in the graver charged offences.	876
Altered charges do not require a fresh trial without actual prejudice	After alteration, charges must be read and explained to the accused, and the court must consider prejudice to the defence or prosecution. It may continue where no prejudice is likely, or direct a new trial or adjournment where needed; witness recall is governed by Section 217 CrPC. Here the altered charges rested on the same material, the appellants further cross-examined their selected witnesses and led defence evidence, and no lost opportunity was identified. Conviction itself was not procedural prejudice, and describing the earlier charges as cancelled did not require a de novo trial.	879
Section 216 CrPC: the Court's exclusive power to add or alter a charge	The Court may add or alter a charge at any time before pronouncing judgment, even after evidence, arguments or reservation of judgment. The power belongs exclusively to the Court; a party has no right to demand alteration merely by filing an application. The proposed charge must have a direct link to the factual ingredients disclosed by the material on record, whether from the original complaint and documents or evidence during trial, and must be exercised judiciously with fair-trial safeguards.	879
Absence of a Section 294 IPC charge in an acquittal appeal	The Court declined to convict Kaushlendra under Section 294 IPC merely on the allegation that he abused witnesses when no charge under that provision had been framed. The finding was made while rejecting the prosecution's attempt to establish his participation in the shooting; it did not supply an alternative conviction on an unframed abuse charge.	916
Specific charge for aggravated rape under Section 376(2)	A charge framed generally under Section 376 IPC cannot be treated as a specific charge under Section 376(2)(i) merely because the police charge sheet invoked that clause. The trial court must frame the specific charge. The Court affirmed	980

(i) IPC	the convictions under Section 376 IPC and Section 4 POCSO Act on the charges actually framed.
Section 216 CrPC — initial charges may be altered after evidence is adduced	An initial charge sheet or order framing charges does not make the charges unalterable. In applying Vinod Raghuvanshi to caution against premature termination of a prosecution, the Court reproduced the principle that charges may be altered or amended, or a charge added, at a later stage after evidence is adduced under Section 216 CrPC. The initial assessment must therefore be understood in light of the trial court's power to deal with the charges as the evidence develops.	1001

Framing of Charge and Strong Suspicion Standard

Framing charges — grave suspicion supported by material	A charge may be framed where the prosecution material, taken at face value, discloses the offence's ingredients and gives rise to grave or strong suspicion that the accused committed it. The judge must apply judicial mind and may sift the material, consider its overall effect and identify basic infirmities, but cannot conduct a roving inquiry or assess its probative value as at trial. The material must be capable of becoming evidence at trial. The Court need not predict conviction or apply the final test of proof beyond reasonable doubt.	60
Framing charges — separate consideration of accused persons	Before framing charges, the trial court must apply its mind to the material concerning the different categories of accused. Strong suspicion must have a basis in material supporting a prima facie involvement in the offence; suspicion alone is insufficient.	60
Remand to the pre-charge stage does not amount to discharge	An order restoring a case to the pre-charge stage for fresh consideration of charges does not itself discharge the accused or decide the merits in his favour. Where the earlier revision left the question open, the trial court must reconsider framing charges on the entire factual and legal position.	62
Framing charges — consideration of the entire prosecution case	At the stage of Sections 227–228 CrPC, the court must sift the prosecution material to determine whether the alleged offence's essential ingredients and material-based grave suspicion are present. It must consider the material as a whole, broad probabilities and basic infirmities, without treating the prosecution's version as unquestionable or weighing reliability as at trial. The Court held that overlooking the consent issue and the separate allegations of coercive demands for images was a material illegality requiring the charge order to be set aside and reconsidered on the entire FIR.	63
Framing of charge — limited judicial scrutiny and grave suspicion, without a trial of the evidence	At the stage of Sections 227–228 CrPC, the judge must apply an independent judicial mind and may sift the prosecution material to determine whether its face-value facts disclose the ingredients of an offence and a prima facie case. Strong or grave suspicion founded on that material can justify a charge. Where two views are equally possible and the material raises only suspicion, discharge is permissible. The judge must consider basic infirmities and the overall material, but cannot conduct a roving inquiry, assess reliability as at trial, or require proof sufficient for conviction.	73
Framing of charge — the accused has no right to introduce defence material at that stage	At the charge stage, hearing the accused under Section 227 CrPC is confined to submissions on the prosecution record and documents submitted with it. The accused has no right at that stage to produce material establishing a defence, such as an alibi. Permitting that evidentiary inquiry would turn charge framing into a mini-trial; the defence is to be established through evidence at trial.	73
Framing of charge — grave suspicion must arise from material capable of establishing the offence at trial	A charge may be framed where the prosecution material, accepted at face value, discloses the offence's ingredients and gives rise to strong or grave suspicion. The judge must independently sift the record, consider its overall effect and basic infirmities, and may discharge where it raises only ordinary suspicion or cannot establish the offence even if accepted. The suspicion must rest on	74

	material capable of becoming evidence at trial. Detailed assessment of reliability, a roving inquiry and a prediction of conviction are impermissible at that stage.
Discharge and framing of charge — submissions are confined to the prosecution record, without a right to adduce defence documents	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record comprises the documents and articles produced by the prosecution. The accused may address submissions on that material and explain the circumstances said to create grave suspicion, but has no right to introduce defence documents at the charge stage. The court must not undertake a trial of the proposed defence.	74
Section 91 CrPC at charge stage — court satisfaction about crucial withheld material is essential	Necessity or desirability of production under Section 91 CrPC depends on the procedural stage and the party seeking it. An accused ordinarily cannot invoke the provision at charge framing to establish a defence outside the prosecution record. The court may summon withheld material of sterling quality having a crucial bearing on the charge, but the accused has no independent right to demand production without the court's satisfaction. The private diary sought to contest signatures did not satisfy that requirement in the face of specific ocular evidence of cheating, and refusal of production was upheld.	75
Separate residence and disputed alibi at the charge stage	An accused relative's plea of separate residence did not displace specific allegations that she assaulted the complainant. The Court held that alibi required cogent and reliable evidence and could not be decided at the stage of framing charges. A rent note indicating residence elsewhere, coupled with an unsupported claim of practising dentistry there, did not justify discharge. The allegation against the relative remained subject to proof at trial.	101
Material-based grave suspicion and limited scrutiny when framing charges	At the charge stage, the court must apply its judicial mind and sift the prosecution material for a sufficient basis to proceed. Grave or strong suspicion must rest on material capable of becoming evidence at trial; unsupported suspicion alone is insufficient. If the material, accepted at face value, cannot show commission of the offence, or supports only suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge is permissible. Broad probabilities and basic infirmities may be considered, but a roving inquiry, assessment of probative value or final test of guilt is impermissible. Under Section 227 CrPC, the accused's submissions are confined to prosecution material and there is no right to produce defence documents at this stage.	101
Grave suspicion based on the record is sufficient for framing charges	Grave suspicion that the accused may have committed an offence is sufficient at the charge-framing stage, but that suspicion must arise from material discernible in the record. Refusal to quash on this limited assessment does not determine guilt or bind the trial court’s appreciation of the evidence.	204
Abetment-of-suicide charge — tentative assessment of the record	When examining a challenge to a charge of abetment of suicide, the court forms a tentative view from the record and accompanying documents rather than evaluating and marshalling the evidence to determine guilt. Applying Praveen Pradhan and Amit Kapur, the Court found prima facie material in the alleged continuous deprivation of the deceased’s livelihood and refused to interfere with the charge under Sections 306/34 IPC.	306
Framing of charge — material supporting grave suspicion and limited sifting of evidence	At the stage of framing charge, the judge must apply judicial mind to the prosecution statements and documents and consider whether the facts, taken at face value, disclose the ingredients of the alleged offence. Grave or strong suspicion must rest on material capable of becoming evidence at trial. The judge may sift the material for this limited purpose and consider its overall effect and basic infirmities, but must not assess its probative value, conduct a roving inquiry or apply the standard required for conviction.	330
Section 227 CrPC — defence documents	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record of the case consists of the documents and articles produced by the prosecution. The accused has no right	330

at the charge stage	to introduce defence documents at the stage of framing charge, and submissions must remain confined to the police material. The accused may explain the material said to raise grave suspicion, but the probable defence is not to be weighed as though the trial has taken place.
Charge-stage review — Tentative assessment without weighing evidence as at trial	In reviewing whether an abetment-of-suicide charge can proceed, the court forms a tentative view from the record and accompanying documents. It does not marshal or evaluate the evidence to make a final finding that the offence has been committed. This limited assessment still requires examination of whether the allegations disclose the ingredients of abetment.	352
Framing of charge — Accused has no right to tender defence documents	At the stage of framing charges, the accused has no right to file documents in defence. The Court relied on this rule as an additional reason why the accused's defence on the merits did not entitle him to the investigative directions sought.	359
Framing of Charge: Grave Suspicion	Charges must be framed where the material on record indicates grave suspicion that the accused might have committed the offence. At that stage the court does not undertake the detailed assessment of evidence required to decide guilt at trial.	362
Limited assessment of material at the charge stage	Under Section 227 CrPC, the judge may sift and weigh the prosecution material to determine whether a prima facie case and grave suspicion warrant trial. The judge must consider broad probabilities and basic infirmities, without acting merely as the prosecution's mouthpiece or conducting a roving trial of the evidence. Defence material is not to be introduced for such a trial at the charge stage. These limits informed the finding that the representation defect caused no failure of justice.	391
Limited sifting of evidence at the stage of framing charge	At the charge stage, the judge may sift and weigh the material to determine whether it discloses a prima facie case on the essential elements, considering broad probabilities and the overall effect of the evidence and documents. Unexplained grave suspicion justifies a charge; where two views are equally possible and the material creates only suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge may be justified. The judge must not merely transmit the prosecution's case, but must also avoid a roving inquiry or trial-like assessment of competing versions. An objection that supplementary witness statements were afterthoughts did not require their reliability to be finally decided where sufficient material for trial existed.	432
Material-based grave suspicion at the stage of framing charges	Charges require a prima facie foundation in material capable of becoming evidence, giving rise to grave or strong suspicion that the accused might have committed the offence. The judge must apply an independent mind, including to the different categories of accused, and may sift the prosecution material for this limited purpose. Mere suspicion is insufficient and may justify discharge where two views are possible. The court does not assess probative value, conduct a roving inquiry or apply the final test of guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	463
Grave suspicion and the limits of scrutiny when framing charges	At the charge stage, a roving inquiry and meticulous appreciation of evidence are impermissible. Material giving rise to grave suspicion that the accused might have committed the offence is sufficient to proceed to trial. Having examined the statements and age documents, the Court found a prima facie case and declined revisional interference, leaving final guilt for trial.	468
Limited Sifting and Strong Suspicion at Charge Framing	Under Sections 227 and 228 CrPC, the Judge must independently assess the prosecution record and the ingredients of the offence. Evidence may be sifted for that limited purpose without deciding credibility or conducting a trial. Strong or grave suspicion may justify a charge even though conviction requires proof beyond reasonable doubt. Where two views are possible and the material raises only suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge may be justified. If the prosecution material, fully accepted, cannot establish the offence, there is	536

	no sufficient ground to proceed. The allegations here provided sufficient prima facie material; the evidence remained for trial.
Material-based grave suspicion at the charge stage	A charge may be framed where prosecution material taken at face value discloses the offence's ingredients and supports a strong or grave suspicion that the accused committed it. The judge must apply judicial mind, consider broad probabilities and basic infirmities, and sift the record for that limited purpose. The court must not conduct a roving inquiry or assess probative value as at trial. Final proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt is not required for framing a charge or deciding revision against it.	568
Defence material at the stage of framing charges	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record consists of the prosecution's documents and articles. The accused has no right at that stage to introduce defence documents; submissions must remain confined to the police material. The accused may explain the material said to create grave suspicion, but the probable defence is not to be weighed as trial evidence.	568
Prosecution material governs framing of charges	At the stage of framing charges, the accused cannot require the court to decide a defence; the decision rests on the material relied on by the prosecution. Applying State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, the Court declined to accept the unsupported plea of false implication because of old enmity. Its observations were confined to charge-stage review and could not prejudice the trial, which had to be decided on the evidence led.	603
Defence documents at the stage of framing charge	An accused has no right to file documents in defence at the stage of framing charges and may produce them at the appropriate later stage. The Court distinguished that ordinary charge-stage restriction from the exceptional consideration of conclusive defence material by the High Court for quashing.	613
Prima facie cruelty charges against the husband and parents-in-law	Where the allegations against the husband and his parents, taken at face value, disclose a triable cruelty case, whether harassment actually occurred is a matter for trial. Decisions granting relief to relatives on different facts do not create an inflexible rule requiring quashing in every matrimonial prosecution. The Court found sufficient prima facie material against the husband and parents-in-law and maintained their charges under Section 498-A IPC read with Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act.	619
Framing of charge — material-based grave suspicion permits limited sifting without a trial of credibility	The court must apply its judicial mind and sift the prosecution material to determine whether its face-value contents disclose the offence and a basis for grave suspicion. It is not a mere conduit for the prosecution. If two views are possible and the material raises only suspicion, rather than grave suspicion, discharge is permissible. Basic infirmities, broad probabilities and the total effect of the material may be considered, but its probative value cannot be tried through a roving inquiry or a demand for proof beyond reasonable doubt.	635
Delayed rape allegation and disputed explanation — credibility cannot be finally resolved at the charge stage	Delay in alleging rape is not, by itself, a ground for discharge; a plausible explanation can be consistent with a conviction after trial. Whether an initial statement of voluntary departure resulted from pressure, and whether the later allegation is false, concern credibility and facts requiring proof at trial. Those disputed matters do not justify treating the witness's account as false when framing charges.	635
Limited sifting and grave suspicion at the charge stage	At discharge or charge stage, the judge must assess the prosecution material, its broad probabilities and basic infirmities to determine whether there is sufficient ground to proceed. Mere suspicion, as distinct from grave suspicion supported by material, may justify discharge; prosecution evidence that cannot show the offence even if accepted does not justify trial. The judge is not a mere conduit for the prosecution but cannot weigh probative value or conduct a roving inquiry. Applying M.E. Shivalingamurthy, the Court found no jurisdictional error in the impugned charge order.	647

18.2 : Framing of Charge and Strong Suspicion Standard

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Strong suspicion and limited evaluation at the charge stage	At the stage of framing charge, the Court must apply its judicial mind to whether the prosecution material, taken at face value, discloses the offence's ingredients. Strong or grave suspicion founded on that material is sufficient; proof beyond reasonable doubt is required at trial. The Judge may sift the material for a prima facie case, considering broad probabilities and basic infirmities, but cannot conduct a roving inquiry or assess evidence as at the end of trial.	715
No right to introduce defence material at framing of charge	At framing of charge, the accused's submissions are confined to the prosecution record and documents filed with it; the accused has no right to introduce separate defence material for adjudication at that stage. Allowing such an inquiry would create a mini-trial. A defence such as alibi is to be established through evidence at trial.	715
Prima facie scrutiny, strong suspicion and limited sifting at charge stage	At the charge stage, prosecution material taken at face value must disclose the ingredients of the alleged offence. Strong or grave suspicion founded on that material may justify a charge; proof sufficient for conviction is unnecessary. The judge may sift the material for this limited purpose and consider broad probabilities and basic infirmities, without conducting a roving trial of the evidence. Where two views are equally possible and the material raises only some suspicion, rather than grave suspicion, discharge is permissible. Under Section 239 CrPC, discharge requires a finding, with recorded reasons, that the charge is groundless; Section 240 requires ground for presuming commission of the offence.	726
Defence documents at the stage of framing charges	Relying on State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, the Court stated that an accused is not entitled to file defence documents or have the defence considered at the stage of framing charges. It invoked that rule as an additional reason for refusing, during the pending investigation, a Section 482 CrPC direction requiring the investigating officer to accept defence documents; granting that relief would directly or indirectly supervise the investigation.	750
Framing charges — grave suspicion founded on prosecution material	At charge framing, the court must apply its judicial mind and sift the prosecution material for a prima facie case. Grave or strong suspicion must rest on material capable of becoming evidence at trial; suspicion alone is insufficient. If the accepted prosecution material cannot disclose the offence, or supports only mere suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge may follow. The court may consider broad probabilities and basic infirmities and hear an explanation of the material, but must not weigh probative value or conduct a roving inquiry. Defence documents cannot be introduced as of right, and submissions remain confined to the prosecution record.	758
Material-based grave suspicion at the charge stage	A charge requires grave or strong suspicion founded on material capable of becoming evidence at trial, rather than mere suspicion. If two views are possible and one creates only suspicion, discharge is permissible. The Judge must apply an independent mind and sift prosecution material for face-value ingredients, broad probabilities and basic infirmities, but cannot assess probative value as at trial or conduct a roving inquiry. If the proposed evidence, fully accepted, cannot show the offence, there is no sufficient ground to proceed. Framing a charge does not require proof of certain guilt or conviction beyond reasonable doubt.	788
Material supporting grave suspicion at the charge stage	A charge may be framed where the prosecution record, taken at face value, discloses the alleged ingredients and supports strong or grave suspicion that the accused committed the offence. The judge must apply judicial mind and may sift the record for sufficient grounds, but must not conduct a roving enquiry, assess ultimate probative value or require proof beyond reasonable doubt.	799
Disputed detention or abetment left for trial at the charge stage	On the alleged payment to procure a person kept in a brothel room, whether the detention occurred with the applicant's concurrence or his procurement amounted to abetment under Section 6 of the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act	799

	required evidence at trial. These questions were left open when interference with the charge was refused; the Court did not finally establish detention or abetment by the customer.
Framing charges — Sections 161 and 164 statements and the prima facie test	At the charge stage, the court considers whether the collected material prima facie discloses an offence, without a roving inquiry or trial-like weighing of evidence. The Court could not prefer the Section 164 statement over the Section 161 statement and thereby eliminate the prima facie case. The charges were sustained, with an express direction that the trial be decided on evidence tested by cross-examination, without influence from the revision court's provisional observations.	808
Framing and alteration of charges beyond the police charge sheet	A criminal court may frame a charge for an offence supported by the material even if the police have not included that offence in the charge sheet; charges may also be altered under Section 216 CrPC. Where charges had not yet been framed, the Court regarded selling substandard food without informing customers of its quality as prima facie cheating. The omission of Section 420 IPC from the charge sheet did not justify quashing the proceedings.	810
Framing an FSSA charge where the material discloses an offence under that Act	In refusing to quash the FIR, the Court adopted the direction in Neelkamal Sharma that, if the trial court concludes that the accused committed an offence requiring penalty or punishment under the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006, it may frame a charge for that offence. Possible error in invoking Sections 272–273 IPC did not require the entire FIR to be quashed where the cheating allegation survived.	811
Section 409 IPC— agency allegation at the charge stage	Whether Section 409 IPC is prima facie attracted must be considered from the charge sheet as a whole. A specific allegation in the FIR and Section 161 CrPC statement that the accused was appointed as an agent could not be rejected through a detailed inquiry into the truth of that allegation at the preliminary stage. The genuineness of a disputed document did not have to be established by a handwriting expert before proceeding. The Court restored the committal order without finally deciding agency, entrustment or misappropriation.	812
Section 227 CrPC— limited sifting and grave suspicion	At the discharge stage, the judge must apply an independent judicial mind and may sift the prosecution material to determine whether there is sufficient ground for trial. Grave or strong suspicion may justify a charge, although it cannot replace proof at trial. Where two views are equally possible and the material raises only some suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge is permissible. The inquiry must not become a detailed balancing of credibility and probabilities as at trial.	812
Section 34 charge— reconsideration of Sections 147, 148 and 149 IPC	The trial court framed Section 307 with Section 34, while the prosecution account described five armed assailants. The High Court dismissed the revision but expressly directed the trial court to reconsider whether Sections 147, 148 and 149 IPC were made out or whether use of Section 34 was correct. Whether the participants formed an unlawful assembly, shared a common object or shared intention remained for proper charge assessment and, as necessary, trial evidence. The direction was not itself a substituted charge or a final determination of guilt or the mental element of every participant.	819
Framing charges on grave suspicion without a mini-trial	At the charge stage, the court considers whether the prosecution material, taken at face value, discloses the ingredients of the alleged offence and gives rise to grave suspicion that the accused might have committed it. Proof sufficient for conviction is unnecessary. The judge may sift the material for the limited prima facie purpose and consider broad probabilities and basic infirmities, but cannot conduct a roving or meticulous assessment as at trial. The accused's submissions under Section 227 CrPC are confined to the prosecution record and accompanying documents; they do not confer a right to introduce defence material or require a defence plea such as alibi to be tried at that stage.	830

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Material supporting grave suspicion at the stage of framing charges	A charge requires strong or grave suspicion founded on material capable of becoming evidence at trial; bare suspicion alone is insufficient. The judge must apply an independent judicial mind, examine the prosecution record at face value for the offence ingredients and may sift it for the limited purpose of deciding whether to proceed. Broad probabilities and basic infirmities may be considered, but there can be no roving inquiry, conviction-level weighing or assessment of the probable defence. Under Section 227 CrPC, the accused's submissions remain confined to the police material, without a right to produce defence documents. If two views are possible and one raises only suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge is permissible; likewise, there is no sufficient ground to proceed if the prosecution material, fully accepted, cannot show commission of the offence. The findings sustaining charges remain nonconclusive at trial.	832
Judicial consideration of the material before framing a charge	The adopted Satish Mehra passage, drawing on L. Muniswamy and Century Spinning, explains that framing a charge substantially affects liberty, so the court must judicially consider whether the material warrants it rather than blindly accept the prosecution's decision to proceed. The narrated Section 227 principle requires reasons for discharge where there is insufficient ground to proceed, enabling a superior court to examine the decision's correctness.	859
Framing of charge — grave suspicion and limited sifting of evidence	Grave suspicion may justify framing a charge without a roving inquiry into the evidence. Applying P. Vijayan v. State of Kerala, the Court explained that the judge must independently sift the police material and documents to determine whether there is sufficient ground for trial, rather than act as a mere conduit for the prosecution. If two views are possible and one creates only suspicion, as distinct from grave suspicion, discharge may be appropriate. The judge does not weigh evidence and probabilities as at trial or predict conviction or acquittal. The material alleging fraudulent withdrawals and the resulting debt was sufficient to permit the prosecution to continue.	992
	Sub-Chapter no. 18.3 Joinder of Charges, Common Trial and Separate Trial
Separate trial records despite joint hearing of connected appeals	Evidence recorded afresh in a separate trial cannot be read for or against co-accused tried in another proceeding merely because their appeals are heard together. Applying A.T. Maydeen, the Court confined this appeal to the later trial of Balram and Ramjilal and directed that Govind Das and Gudda's appeal be decided by a separate judgment on its own record.	106
Separate trials — Evidence cannot be exchanged between connected appeals	Evidence recorded in the appellant's separate trial could not be read against the co-accused tried separately, or vice versa. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Bench confined each appeal to its own trial record. Hearing the connected appeals simultaneously did not merge their evidence, and the appeals were decided by separate judgments.	115
Separate trials and separate evidentiary records	Evidence recorded in the separately conducted trial of a co-accused could not be read against the present appellants, or vice versa. Hearing the appeals together did not merge those records. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court decided the separately tried co-accused’s appeal by a separate judgment.	166
Acquittal of a co-accused in a separate trial	A co-accused’s acquittal for failure to establish his identity as the substitute examinee did not establish that no impersonation offence occurred. That acquittal, reached in a trial conducted while the applicant was absconding, did not by itself entitle the applicant to quashing without facing his own trial.	231
Separate trial records in simultaneously heard connected appeals	Where an absconding co-accused’s trial resumed after the other accused were convicted and the remaining witnesses were examined again, the appeals could be heard together while being decided by separate judgments. The Court followed that course to avoid confusion between the evidence led in the	291

	respective trials.
Evidence from a separately tried co-accused	Evidence recorded in the later, separate trial of an absconding co-accused cannot be read as evidence in the appellants' trial.	410
Separate police reports and statutory limits on joint trial of cheating transactions	The adopted authorities distinguish registration and reporting of each distinct cheating transaction from joinder by the court at the charge stage. Under the narrated Section 219 CrPC rule, joinder depends on the statutory requirements and permits no more than three qualifying offences at one trial. Section 218's proviso concerns offences before the same Magistrate; it does not itself transfer cases from other courts. Section 220 requires acts sufficiently connected to form the same transaction, which separate victims' independent transactions do not become merely through a common scheme.	443
Separate trial of an absconding accused — evidence governing his appeal	Where an accused is separately tried after the co-accused's trial, his appeal must be decided on the evidence recorded in his own trial. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court expressly excluded the evidence recorded in the earlier co-accused trial. Their convictions, acquittal and appellate history supplied procedural context rather than proof against this appellant. His conviction under Sections 302/34 IPC was assessed on the declaration, oral testimony and medical evidence received in his separate proceeding.	499
Evidence from separately tried co-accused	Evidence led in the separate trial of a co-accused cannot be read to decide another accused's case merely because their appeals are heard analogously. The Court therefore reserved the separately tried co-accused's appeal for an independent decision. It also assessed separately the evidence recorded while Pramod alone faced trial and the evidence recorded after witnesses were re-summoned following the other appellants' arrests.	563
Effect of a co-accused's acquittal in a separate trial	Evidence led in the trial of co-accused cannot be read as evidence in another accused's case. Their acquittal after witnesses turned hostile did not justify quashing the FIR against a petitioner alleged to have personally participated in the fatal assault. The conspiracy ruling in Akhilesh Singh was distinguishable because the principal conspirator there had been discharged and no other material connected the remaining accused.	614
Separate trials: evidence confined to the accused's own record	Evidence recorded in one accused's separate trial cannot be read for or against another separately tried accused, or vice versa. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court kept the supplementary-trial record separate from the co-accused's record and decided the simultaneously heard appeals by separate judgments.	622
Separate trials — evidence in one co-accused's case cannot be read in another	Following A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department, the Court held that evidence recorded in one appellant's separate trial could not be read either for or against another appellant. The three appeals arose from the same alleged abduction, but the appellants had been arrested at different times and tried separately. Although the appeals were heard simultaneously and decided by a common judgment, the Court examined each record independently. Punjab Singh's evidence had been recorded before Avtar Singh's trial; his later examination under Section 313 CrPC and later judgment resulted from his absence after prosecution evidence had closed. That chronology did not permit evidence from the other trials to be used in his appeal.	743
Seeking a separate trial while a co-accused remains absconding	After refusing bail where a co-accused had absconded, the Court left the applicant free to apply for separation of his trial from that co-accused in the meantime. The liberty was to seek separation through an application; the order did not itself separate the trials.	775
Evidence recorded in a separate trial of a co-accused	Evidence recorded in the separate trial of a co-accused cannot be read as evidence in the accused's trial. While acknowledging that restriction, the Court referred to the witness's evidence in the connected trial when discussing departmental procedure. That limited reference does not establish a general rule	920 permitting evidence from another trial to be used as substantive proof.

Evidence recorded only in a co-accused's trial cannot determine another accused's guilt	Subject to lawful exceptions, guilt must be determined on evidence recorded in the accused's own trial, in the presence of the accused or counsel and with an opportunity to cross-examine. Evidence given only in a separately tried co-accused's case cannot be imported to decide another accused's culpability. The witnesses had previously testified in the appellant's presence; their later evidence was recorded only for the co-accused. The appellant could not obtain the benefit of statements made in that later examination merely because they concerned the same occurrence.	944
Independent assault and the same-transaction requirement for joint trial	Section 223(d) CrPC permits persons accused of different offences to be tried jointly when those offences were committed in the same transaction. The wife's and son's alleged assault on the prosecutrix arose from their opposition to the co-accused's relationship with her. There was no allegation that they facilitated, abetted or conspired in his alleged repeated rape. Their assault was therefore independent of the alleged rape and did not satisfy the same-transaction requirement. The charge order was set aside only insofar as it rejected their joint-trial objection; the Court did not determine guilt on the assault charge.	960
Separate simultaneous trials before the same court for connected accusations	Although the alleged assault and rape did not form the same transaction for a joint trial, their direct nexus justified retaining both matters before the same Sessions Court instead of sending the assault case to the JMFC. The Court directed separate but simultaneous trials, with evidence recorded separately and two different judgments. The common forum and timing did not authorise a common evidentiary record.	960
Separate trials where connected offences cause difficulty to the defence	Where several accused are alleged to have committed several offences, separate trials may be the more reasonable normal course. For offences forming part of the same transaction, the consideration justifying separate trials is the embarrassment or difficulty caused to the accused in defending themselves. The Court adopted this principle from Cheemalapati Ganeswara Rao while first asking whether the offences before it formed the same transaction.	960
Separate unlawful-assembly and rioting charges with Section 149 IPC	Where an offence is charged with the aid of Section 149 IPC, separate charges under Sections 143 and 147 are unnecessary unless separate convictions under those provisions are sought. Their requisite ingredients remain implicit in the Section 149 charge and must be established.	987
Separate trials — appraisal of the evidence recorded against each accused	Where accused persons were tried at different stages and witnesses were recalled or examined afresh, the appellate court must consider the evidence against each appellant from the depositions recorded in the trial concerning him. Applying A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department, the Bench separately assessed the evidence against the two lathi assailants and against the accused tried later. The rejection of a witness in the earlier trial and the failure of witnesses to support the prosecution in the later trial were kept distinct. The earlier testimony was not treated as automatically available against the separately tried accused.	993
	Sub-Chapter no. 18.4 Section 319 CrPC — Summoning Additional Accused on Trial Evidence
Section 319 CrPC: strong and cogent evidence beyond the charge-framing standard	Section 319 CrPC is an extraordinary discretionary power to be used sparingly on strong and cogent evidence. The evidence must establish more than the prima facie case required to frame a charge, while falling short of the satisfaction that unrebutted evidence would warrant conviction. Specific allegations of firing in the FIR and the complainant's examination-in-chief were sufficient to summon the omitted accused, without deciding guilt.	141
Arrest warrant on summoning an	The arrest warrant issued with the Section 319 order was upheld where the trial court had recorded the proposed accused's absence and the absence of any	141

additional accused under Section 319 CrPC	application on his behalf, and counsel suggested that notice on the application had already been issued. The finding of legality rested on those circumstances and did not prescribe arrest warrants as the routine first process under Section 319.
Section 319 CrPC — trial evidence implicating a person omitted from the charge-sheet	Summoning the applicant as an additional accused under Section 319 CrPC was upheld where the FIR specifically named him and witnesses admitted his involvement in their cross-examination at trial. His omission from the charge-sheet on the basis of a void parallel police inquiry did not defeat the trial evidence supporting the summons. The order concerned his addition as an accused and did not determine guilt.	336
Section 319 CrPC: Strong and Cogent Evidence for Summoning an Additional Accused	Section 319 CrPC confers an extraordinary discretionary power to be exercised sparingly on strong and cogent evidence led before the court. The evidence, though not necessarily tested by cross-examination, must exceed the prima facie standard for framing a charge while remaining short of satisfaction that unrebutted evidence would lead to conviction. The court does not decide guilt at this stage. Specific allegations of overt acts, considered with the material on record, met that standard where the police had excluded the proposed accused on an unsupported alibi.	374
Evidentiary Satisfaction for Summoning an Additional Accused under Section 319 CrPC	Section 319 CrPC requires reasonable satisfaction from the evidence that a person not already arraigned has committed an offence and could be tried with the existing accused; mere doubt about involvement is insufficient. The assessment stands above the ordinary prima facie discharge inquiry. Specific accusations supported by the complainant's testimony, corresponding medical injuries and other witnesses justified summoning here, without finally determining guilt.	403
Discretion and the Fresh-Trial Consequences of Section 319 CrPC	The power to add an accused under Section 319 CrPC is discretionary, not compulsory whenever another person is implicated. The Court must consider the evidence, the trial's stage, the work already undertaken and the requirement to commence proceedings afresh and re-examine witnesses for the added accused. The adopted test requires a reasonable prospect of conviction, without treating the summoning decision as a final finding of guilt.	403
No Mandatory Pre-Summons Hearing under Section 319 CrPC	A person omitted from the police report, or not named there as an accused, may be summoned under Section 319 CrPC without a prior notice or hearing. The absence of such a hearing does not remove the person's remedy against an illegal or improper summoning order or the rights available during the subsequent trial.	403
Examination-in-Chief as Evidence for Section 319 CrPC	The Court may exercise Section 319 CrPC after examination-in-chief without waiting for cross-examination, provided its recorded reasons establish the required satisfaction about the additional person's involvement. A mini-trial is unnecessary. Under Section 319(4), the newly added accused is entitled to fresh proceedings with the opportunity to cross-examine prosecution witnesses, lead defence evidence and address arguments.	403
Unproved Alibi and Possible Self-Infliction at the Section 319 Stage	An alibi requires cogent proof at trial. Untested statements placing the proposed accused at a seminar, unsupported by attendance or similar documents, did not displace the evidence supporting the Section 319 summons. A medical opinion that an injury could be self-inflicted likewise raised an evidentiary question for trial. The High Court's assessment was confined to summoning and was not to prejudice the trial court's final decision.	403
Section 227 Discharge Cannot Undo a Proper Section 319 Summons	An accused properly added under Section 319 CrPC cannot undo that order by seeking discharge under Section 227 on the lower prima facie standard. That course would make the earlier exercise under the higher Section 319 standard futile. A legal challenge to an illegal or improper exercise of the summoning power remains available.	403

18.4 : Section 319 CrPC — Summoning Additional Accused on Trial Evidence

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 319 CrPC — evidentiary threshold for summoning an additional accused	Section 319 CrPC is an extraordinary discretionary power to be used sparingly on strong and cogent evidence recorded before the court. The evidence must exceed the prima facie threshold for framing a charge, while falling short of satisfaction that unrebutted evidence would lead to conviction. Examination-in-chief may suffice without awaiting cross-examination. Applying Hardeep Singh, the Court upheld the summons on PW-1's specific trial testimony placing the applicant at the assault and attributing participation and exhortation to him. Police statements could assist assessment of that testimony but could not replace the required court evidence. The assessment did not determine guilt, and the trial court had to decide independently on the evidence subsequently recorded.	490
Section 319 CrPC — pending closure report and earlier cognizance revision	A pending police closure report does not prevent the trial court from summoning an additional accused under Section 319 CrPC on the requisite trial evidence. An earlier refusal to entertain a revision concerning Section 193 cognizance did not bar scrutiny at this distinct stage. Applying Brijendra Singh, the Court had to examine contrary investigative material when assessing whether the trial testimony met the stronger evidentiary threshold; the High Court retained that duty even if the trial court had overlooked the material. The trial court need not await the Magistrate's decision on the closure report. In this case, the subsequent valid Section 319 order deprived the pending closure report of effect and left it unnecessary for the Magistrate to decide.	490
Evidentiary threshold for summoning under Section 319 CrPC	Section 319 CrPC requires evidence stronger than the prima facie case sufficient for framing a charge and stronger than a mere probability of involvement. The satisfaction must nevertheless fall short of a conclusion that unrebutted evidence would lead to conviction. Applying the reproduced Hardeep Singh test, the Court held that the specific trial evidence of instigation met that threshold. The power concerns whether the person could be tried with the accused; it does not decide guilt.	602
Police exoneration and contrary trial evidence under Section 319 CrPC	Omission of a person from the charge-sheet does not prevent summoning under Section 319 CrPC where the evidence before the trial court satisfies the required higher threshold. The complainant specifically repeated his allegation of instigation in examination-in-chief. In the circumstances, the Court found that the investigating officer had sought to protect the applicant and declined to treat the exculpatory police statements as decisive. It upheld the summons without deciding final guilt.	602
Section 319 CrPC may be invoked before cross-examination	Evidence led before the court need not first be tested by cross-examination before the court exercises Section 319 CrPC. The examination-in-chief must still satisfy the stronger evidentiary standard laid down in Hardeep Singh. On that basis, the Court upheld summoning after the complainant’s examination-in-chief; the absence of cross-examination did not itself bar the order.	602
Evidence required to summon an additional accused under Section 319 CrPC	Section 319 CrPC requires evidence stronger than the prima facie case sufficient for framing a charge, but short of satisfaction that the evidence, if unrebutted, would lead to conviction. Evidence led before the Court need not already have been tested by cross-examination. The Court considers whether the person could be tried with the existing accused and must not form a final opinion on guilt. Applying this standard, the High Court found no perversity in the order summoning the applicants.	611
Section 319 CrPC: trial-stage addition of omitted offenders	Where trial evidence shows that a person who was not charge-sheeted committed the offence, the trial court may add that person as an accused under Section 319 CrPC. The possibility of such trial-stage addition supports the conclusion that omission of other possible offenders does not itself invalidate the prosecution of those already charge-sheeted.	625
Strong and cogent	Section 319 CrPC is an extraordinary and discretionary power to be exercised	643

evidence required for Section 319 summons	sparingly on strong and cogent evidence. Applying Hardeep Singh, the evidence must exceed the prima facie threshold for framing charge and show more than a mere probability of complicity, while falling short of the satisfaction required for conviction. The court does not decide guilt when summoning an additional accused.
Evasive supporting affidavit as material for Section 319 summons	An affidavit declaring that an anticipatory-bail application was the first such application supported an inference, on this record, that the deponent had read the application and its annexures. Where the application relied on a false medical certificate, omission of an express verification of every factual statement did not protect the deponent from consideration under Section 319 CrPC. The Court found sufficient material that he knew of the false contents and documents yet supported the application by an evasive affidavit, and sustained his summons as an additional accused.	643
Mere presence with accused insufficient to infer fabrication conspiracy	Presence with existing accused at the police station did not, without further material, establish sufficient involvement in preparing a false medical certificate to justify summons under Section 319 CrPC. The Court refused to presume conspiracy from that presence alone and set aside the summons against the two applicants whom no other material linked to the certificate's preparation.	643
Section 319 summons before cross-examination of the witness	The court may exercise Section 319 CrPC on a witness's examination-in-chief without awaiting cross-examination. Applying Hardeep Singh, the Court rejected the contention that evidence could not be acted upon until cross-examination, while retaining the requirement of sufficiently strong material against each proposed additional accused.	643
	Sub-Chapter no. 18.5 Discharge and Groundless Accusation at Pre-Trial Stage
Discharge where prosecution material cannot support the accusation	If the prosecution's proposed evidence, even when fully accepted before cross-examination or rebuttal, cannot show that the accused committed the offence, there is no sufficient ground to proceed to trial. Where two views are possible and one raises only suspicion rather than grave suspicion, the trial judge is empowered to discharge the accused.	60
Section 227 CrPC — prosecution record and defence documents	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record of the case consists of the documents and articles produced by the prosecution. The accused has no right at the charge-framing stage to introduce defence documents and must confine submissions to the police-produced material. The accused may explain material said to create grave suspicion within that record; the probable defence is not weighed as if the trial had begun.	60
Discharge where the prosecution case raises only suspicion	Where two views are possible and the prosecution material raises only suspicion rather than grave suspicion, the judge may discharge the accused. A charge cannot stand where the proposed prosecution evidence, even fully accepted before cross-examination or rebuttal, cannot show commission of the particular offence. The court need not decide whether the material will ultimately secure a conviction.	63
Section 227 CrPC — limits on introducing defence documents	The record considered for discharge under Section 227 CrPC consists of the prosecution's documents and articles. The accused has no right at the charge-framing stage to produce defence documents and must address the police-produced material. He may explain the material said to create grave suspicion, but cannot demand that the court conduct a trial of the defence case.	63
Discharge distinguished from evidence-based acquittal	A discharge founded on the failure of uncontroverted allegations to disclose an offence differs from an acquittal founded on appreciation of trial evidence. The discharge reasoning in Akhilesh Singh therefore did not give an accused tried later an automatic right to quashing merely because a co-accused had been	231

	acquitted on evidence in his absence.
Discharge — suspicion falling short of grave suspicion	Where two views of the prosecution material are possible and one gives rise only to suspicion, as distinct from grave suspicion, the trial judge may discharge the accused. If the proposed prosecution evidence, even fully accepted before cross-examination or defence rebuttal, cannot show commission of the offence by the accused, there is no sufficient ground to proceed to trial.	330
Prosecution record and defence submissions at the discharge stage	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record of the case comprises the documents and articles produced by the prosecution. The accused has no right at the stage of framing charges to introduce separate defence documents; submissions must address the police material. An accused may explain the material said to create grave suspicion, but the court does not decide a contested defence through an evidentiary inquiry at that stage.	463
Defence Documents Requiring Proof at the Discharge and Quashing Stages	An accused cannot obtain discharge by relying on disputed defence documents outside the charge-sheet that require formal proof. Under Section 91 CrPC, necessity or desirability of production depends on the stage and the party seeking it. The accused ordinarily cannot invoke that provision at charge framing to establish innocence through defence material; the relevant record at that stage is the prosecution record under Section 173 CrPC. In the Section 482 challenge to refusal of discharge, the Court declined to decide the defence on the additional accounting and machinery documents.	531
Discharge where prosecution material does not support the offence	If the prosecution material, even if fully accepted, cannot show that the accused committed the alleged offence, there is no sufficient ground to proceed. Where two views are possible and one gives rise only to suspicion rather than grave suspicion, the judge may discharge the accused. Mere suspicion unsupported by material cannot justify a charge.	568
Section 227 CrPC — discharge submissions are confined to the prosecution record	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record of the case consists of the documents and articles produced by the prosecution. The accused has no right at that stage to introduce defence documents. Submissions seeking to explain away material creating grave suspicion must remain confined to the material produced by the police; the probable defence is not to be tried then.	635
Defence document outside the prosecution record at discharge stage	The record considered under Section 227 CrPC comprises the prosecution's documents and articles; the accused has no right to introduce separate defence material at the stage of framing charge. Applying Debendra Nath Padhi, the Court declined to act on a police report sent to the Additional Advocate General in a separate bail matter because it was not part of the charge-sheet or case diary. The applicants could use that report in defence at the appropriate trial stage.	647
Accused's explanation of prosecution material at discharge hearing	An accused may explain material said to create grave suspicion when seeking discharge, but the submission at a Section 227 CrPC hearing must remain confined to the material produced by the police. The adopted M.E. Shivalingamurthy principles preserve that opportunity while excluding introduction of separate defence documents at charge stage.	647
Ordinary suspicion and discharge under Section 227 CrPC	If two views are equally possible and the material raises only ordinary suspicion rather than grave suspicion, the Judge may discharge the accused. Where the proposed prosecution evidence, even fully accepted, cannot show commission of the offence, there is no sufficient ground to proceed. The Judge must make this limited judicial assessment and cannot merely accept the prosecution's request for charge.	715
Defence documents and the prosecution record under Section 227 CrPC	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record of the case consists of the documents and articles produced by the prosecution. The accused has no right to introduce defence documents at the charge stage; submissions must be confined to the police material. The accused may explain the material giving	788

	rise to grave suspicion, but the Court does not try a separate defence case or assess its probable success at that stage.
Prosecution record and defence explanations under Section 227 CrPC	For discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the record consists of the prosecution's documents and articles. The accused may explain material said to create grave suspicion through submissions on that record, but has no right to introduce defence documents at the charge stage. The probable defence is not weighed as though the trial had taken place.	799
Mere suspicion and discharge where two views are possible	Where two views are possible and the material gives rise only to suspicion rather than grave suspicion, the trial judge may discharge the accused. Suspicion without supporting material is insufficient to frame a charge; the judge does not act merely as a conduit for the prosecution.	799
Sections 227, 239 and 245(1) CrPC — discharge standards and stages	Section 227 uses the test of insufficient ground to proceed, Section 239 asks whether the charge is groundless, and Section 245(1) asks whether the unrefuted evidence would warrant conviction. Sections 227 and 239 operate before evidence is recorded, on the police-report material and after hearing the parties; Section 245(1) follows the evidence under Section 244. Despite their different wording and stages, the relied-upon authority requires a prima facie case before a charge is framed, rather than a trial-like inquiry.	808
Discharge where equally possible views raise suspicion but not grave suspicion	In considering discharge under Section 227 CrPC, the judge must examine the broad probabilities, the overall effect of the prosecution material and any basic infirmities rather than act merely as a mouthpiece of the prosecution. If two views are equally possible and the material raises only some suspicion, rather than grave suspicion, the judge may discharge the accused. This limited assessment does not permit weighing the evidence as though conducting the trial.	830
Challenge to suicide-abetment charge — allegations tested without a final assessment of guilt	At the stage of challenging a charge for abetment of suicide, the assessment is tentative rather than a final weighing of evidence to determine guilt. Where the prosecution allegations, even accepted as true, do not disclose abetment under Sections 306 and 107 IPC, the charge cannot stand and the accused may be discharged.	902
Fresh discharge request after framing of charges: absence of review power	A subordinate criminal court cannot recall its cognizance order by invoking a review or inherent power it does not possess. Applying that principle, the Court upheld rejection of a fresh application for discharge or acquittal based on a later handwriting report after charges had been framed and evidence had commenced. The applicant’s request for termination was separately examined under section 482 CrPC.	973

Summoning Additional Accused under Section 319 CrPC — Strong Evidence Threshold

Strong-evidence threshold for summoning an additional accused	Section 319 CrPC requires strong and cogent court evidence exceeding the prima facie standard for framing charge, though short of the satisfaction required for conviction. The power is extraordinary, discretionary and exercisable sparingly. Applying Sagar's reproduction of Hardeep Singh and the rule in Sartaj Singh, the Court found the injured witness's specific trial attribution of an active Farsa assault sufficient to sustain the summons.	645
Section 319 power on examination-in-chief	The court need not await cross-examination before summoning an additional accused under Section 319 CrPC. Examination-in-chief may provide the necessary evidence if it satisfies the strong-evidence threshold. The Court applied Sartaj Singh and Hardeep Singh to the injured witness's trial account.	645
Police omission from charge-sheet does not bar Section 319 summons	A person named in the FIR but not charge-sheeted may be summoned under Section 319 CrPC on sufficiently strong trial evidence. Repetition in court of the central accusation made in the FIR does not itself disqualify that evidence. The Court applied Sartaj Singh and sustained the summons where the injured	645 witness attributed an active assault despite the police's earlier acceptance of an inadequately supported alibi.

	Chapter no. 19 Compounding, Plea Bargaining, Withdrawal and Settlement
	Sub-Chapter no. 19.1 Compounding of Offences and Legal Effect of Compromise
Section 498-A IPC: non-compoundability under Section 320 CrPC	An offence under Section 498-A IPC is not compoundable under Section 320 CrPC. The Court accepted that the wife's compounding application had therefore been rejected. Her subsequent decision not to support the prosecution, resulting in acquittal, was considered separately as evidence of her attempt to preserve the marriage; it was not treated as a statutory composition of the offence.	42
Section 23-A MMDR Act — compounding bars the compounded mining offence but does not terminate IPC proceedings	Where an offence is compounded under Section 23-A(1) MMDR Act, subsection (2) bars proceedings or further proceedings for the MMDR or rule offence so compounded. That bar does not extend to distinct IPC offences such as Sections 379 and 414, which may continue. Applying Jayant, the Court held that payment of the mining penalty did not end the separate IPC proceedings or require release of the seized vehicle. Recovery of penalty and royalty alone also did not bar resort to the Penal Code under the rule considered in Banti.	79
Compromise of non-compoundable forgery and conspiracy offences	A voluntary settlement does not make offences under Sections 467, 468, 471 and 120-B IPC compoundable under Section 320 CrPC. The Court affirmed the convictions despite the verified compromise and assessed sentence separately.	273
Section 320(2) permission and support from all separately affected victims	Permission under Section 320(2) CrPC is for the court before which the prosecution is pending. Filing a Section 482 petition did not make the High Court that court where no appeal or revision prosecution was before it and investigation against the applicant remained pending. In this multi-victim case, the compounding application also required supporting affidavits from every affected victim; photocopies annexed to it did not substitute for affidavits in support. The Court declined to exercise the trial court's function on the record before it, leaving the statutory trial-court route available.	443
Voluntary compounding of a cheque-dishonour conviction in revision	A Section 138 NI Act conviction may be compounded in revision after the conviction has been affirmed on appeal. The Court accepted the compromise after the Principal Registrar verified that both parties acted freely and without pressure or coercion. It set aside the conviction and acquitted the applicant subject to deposit of the prescribed compounding costs. The private settlement did not dispense with that condition.	609
Non-compoundability of murder	An offence under Section 302 IPC is not compoundable. The Court therefore declined to apply a decision concerning an amicable settlement to the prosecution involving the alleged fatal assault.	614
	Macro Division VI Evidence and Proof
	Chapter no. 20 Witnesses, Oral Testimony and Credibility Assessment
	Sub-Chapter no. 20.1 Child Witness, Prosecutrix and Vulnerable Witness Credibility
Child eyewitness — reliable testimony despite minor omissions	A child's testimony cannot be rejected merely because of tender age or minor contradictions and omissions which do not affect material particulars. If the child withstands cross-examination and gives a confidence-inspiring account which rules out tutoring, that testimony may by itself support conviction.	8

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Corroboration may be sought as a precaution, rather than as an inflexible legal requirement. Here the child's account was also supported by the injured eyewitness, the parents' observations and medical evidence.
Prosecutrix's testimony — sole reliance and material contradictions	A conviction for rape may rest on the prosecutrix's testimony alone if it is reliable and inspires confidence. Corroboration is not a routine requirement, and discrepancies that do not materially affect credibility should not defeat an otherwise reliable case. Here, significant improvements and contradictions, an unproduced and unsupported claim of recorded threats, and the absence of useful medical or scientific support undermined confidence in the prosecution evidence. The Court therefore found the guilt of the accused unproved.	65
Reliability of a child witness and allegations of tutoring	Tender age and residence with relatives do not by themselves establish tutoring. The court must scrutinise a child's ability to understand and answer, the content of the testimony, cross-examination and recorded demeanour. A competent child whose account inspires confidence may be the sole basis of conviction; corroboration is a safeguard of prudence rather than an inflexible legal requirement. Here, the six-year-old injured survivor's natural fear on seeing the accused, confident account of what she witnessed and express denial of coaching supported reliability despite her admission that her grandparents had also spoken about the killings.	103
Child witness — Reliability and prudential corroboration	A child's evidence requires careful assessment of understanding, reliability and the possibility of tutoring. Corroboration is a safeguard of prudence, not an inflexible legal condition: trustworthy child testimony may itself sustain conviction. The child's observation that the deceased left with the appellant remained unchallenged in cross-examination and was also supported by another witness. Her lack of personal knowledge of the killing did not displace that last-seen observation.	118
Child eyewitness account corroborated by forensic evidence	The child's direct account of his father pouring kerosene on his mother and pushing her towards an electric heater was accepted after cross-examination. Kerosene detected in the deceased's scalp hair independently corroborated that account, as did his disclosure of the incident to his grandparents. His age and the denied suggestion of tutoring did not displace the evidence accepted by the Court.	173
Reliable prosecutrix testimony does not require further corroboration	Where the prosecutrix's evidence is reliable and trustworthy, further corroboration is not a necessary condition for accepting it. The Court applied that principle to her account of rape; the FSL finding of human sperm was also available in support of the prosecution case.	179
Minor contradictions in an injured child witness's account	Minor contradictions in an injured child witness's testimony do not make the evidence unreliable when they do not affect the substance of the prosecution case and the account inspires confidence about the accused's involvement.	199
Reliability, tutoring and corroboration of a child eyewitness	A child's evidence requires close scrutiny for tutoring, bias and material inconsistencies. Corroboration is ordinarily a precaution rather than an inflexible legal condition, and a competent child's sole testimony may support conviction if its quality and reliability satisfy the Court. Here, the six-year-old eyewitness's natural answers, consistent identification of her father's act and supporting evidence overcame the tutoring objection. Minor variations attributable to her age and unfamiliarity with court did not make her evidence unreliable.	214
Preliminary assessment of a child's competence to testify	Tender age does not itself disqualify a witness under Section 118 Evidence Act. The trial judge must assess whether the child can understand questions and give rational answers, taking account of the child's intelligence and capacity. This assessment is distinct from credibility and understanding an oath. The trial judge's assessment may be disturbed on appeal if the preserved record shows it	214 to be erroneous. The child here was found able to depose after preliminary questions.

Child witness: residence with maternal relatives does not establish tutoring	A child witness is not to be disbelieved merely because she lives with maternal relatives after her mother's death. Tutoring requires prompting the child to describe acts that did not occur; asking her to speak the truth is different. The Court tested the seven-year-old daughter's account in cross-examination and against the surrounding evidence, and found no basis to reject her evidence against her father merely because her relatives cared for her.	288
Child awakened during an incident may still witness relevant events	A child who was initially asleep is not necessarily incapable of witnessing the incident after being awakened by noise. The Court must consider when she woke, the place and course of events, and what she could then observe. The daughter's evidence could not be rejected wholesale merely because she woke during the burning in the shared two-room accommodation.	288
Child witness — capacity, careful scrutiny and natural discrepancies	The trial judge primarily assesses a child's intelligence and ability to understand the obligation of an oath from the child's manner and examination. Because children may be susceptible to tutoring or influence, their evidence requires careful scrutiny, but a truthful account may be accepted. Minor discrepancies natural to a young witness did not justify rejecting testimony that inspired confidence on the accused's involvement. A higher court may disturb the capacity assessment if the preserved record shows it to be erroneous.	315
Child prosecutrix — testimony assessed with surrounding and scientific evidence	The six-year-old prosecutrix’s account was assessed together with evidence that she emerged crying from the accused’s room, blood on her body and clothes, medical signs of inflammation and the DNA report. The Court considered the alternative explanation of injury by a cow, but accepted the doctor’s categorical rejection of that explanation and found rape proved beyond reasonable doubt on the combined ocular, medical and scientific evidence.	332
Child eyewitness — careful scrutiny and corroboration as a rule of prudence	A child's evidence cannot be rejected merely because of age. It requires careful scrutiny for reliability and tutoring. Corroboration is desirable as a matter of prudence, rather than an inflexible rule of law. Conviction may rest on a child's sole testimony when the Court is satisfied that it is truthful and free from tutoring. Here, the child's natural presence, unshaken account of the assault and immediate disclosures, corroborated by other witnesses, justified reliance on her evidence despite partial hostility on motive.	341
Child eyewitness — reliable testimony and prudential corroboration	A child's testimony is not to be rejected merely because of age. It must be closely examined for tutoring, bias, contradictions and reliability. Corroboration is ordinarily sought as a matter of caution, but reliable testimony of a competent child may by itself support conviction. The child eyewitness's natural account identifying the accused as her mother's assailant remained unshaken in cross-examination and was corroborated by medical evidence and recovery of the stone.	342
Section 118 Evidence Act — understanding, rather than a fixed age, determines competence	Competence to testify is the rule. A child's tender age does not disqualify the child if the child can understand the questions and give rational answers. No fixed age determines that capacity. The Court must be satisfied about the child's intelligence and ability to appreciate the duty of speaking the truth.	342
Child witness — preliminary inquiry and review of the competence finding	The trial judge should conduct a preliminary inquiry to assess the child's understanding and mental capacity before recording evidence. The judge may examine the child for that purpose and observe the child's manner and intelligence. Failure to conduct such an inquiry is not, by itself, necessarily fatal to the evidence. The competence finding may be disturbed on appeal where the preserved record shows that it was erroneous.	342
Child witness —	A child may be competent to give evidence even where an oath cannot properly	342 competence to testify is distinct from administration of oath	be administered. Admissibility and assessment of that evidence depend on the child's capacity and the safeguards governing child testimony.

Child Eyewitness Account Supported by Immediate Disclosure and Medical Evidence	The child daughter's account that she saw her father repeatedly strike her mother with a wooden pillar was accepted where she maintained her direct observation in cross-examination, denied tutoring, and immediately informed her uncle. Her account was supported by the uncle's observation of the accused leaving with the pillar and by medical evidence excluding an accidental fall.	377
Sexual-assault testimony — Contextual meaning of ordinary expressions	Courts should understand a witness's ordinary expressions in their linguistic and evidentiary context, without insisting on statutory terminology or graphic details of sexual acts. Sexual-assault evidence must be recorded sensitively and unnecessary obscenity avoided. Here, the adult eyewitness's expression 'Bura Kaam', read with the surrounding account, injuries and the parties' understood issue of penetration, conveyed the alleged sexual act. The infant victim did not testify; this was an assessment of the adult eyewitness's words, not a statement made by the child.	477
Child eyewitness — Competence, tutoring scrutiny and prudential corroboration	Under Section 118 of the Evidence Act, tender age does not itself disqualify a witness. The trial judge must assess understanding, rational answers and the ability to give reliable evidence, ordinarily through a preliminary inquiry. Testimony requires close scrutiny for tutoring, bias and material infirmities. Read with the cited authorities and paragraphs 62–64, corroboration is ordinarily a precaution rather than an inflexible legal requirement; a competent child's wholly reliable sole testimony may sustain conviction. Here, the approximately twelve-year-old daughter's account remained unshaken and was supported by two other witnesses.	478
Reliable Prosecutrix Testimony and Actual Medical and Forensic Support	Reliable and trustworthy prosecutrix testimony does not require independent corroboration as a rule. Here the Court nevertheless considered the whole evidentiary setting: no fresh injuries or definite medical opinion on recent intercourse, but human semen and sperm on the vaginal samples and clothing, proved age evidence, and an unestablished alibi. It distinguished authorities involving unreliable age records or missing medical witnesses. The counterblast allegation also failed because the father's separate Section 307 case arose later on the unrebutted evidence.	529
Material contradictions affecting a sole child eyewitness	A conviction cannot safely rest on a sole child eyewitness whose claimed presence and account contain material contradictions. Conflicting versions about attending school, residence, the sequence of medical treatment and accompanying the injured, considered with the altered attendance record, made the testimony unreliable in this case.	571
Omission from a spot map and reliable direct evidence	The investigating officer's failure to mark the shop in the spot map did not undermine the otherwise reliable testimony of the prosecutrix. The accused could not obtain an advantage from that investigative fault where her evidence and prompt disclosures were accepted as reliable.	616
Discussion of testimony with a parent and alleged tutoring	In the circumstances of this case, the minor prosecutrix's discussion with her father about narrating the incident in court did not by itself establish tutoring. The Court rejected the tutoring objection after accepting her account and finding that the alleged family dispute had not been shown to have caused false implication.	616
Conviction on the prosecutrix's reliable testimony without corroboration	The reliable testimony of a prosecutrix that inspires confidence may alone sustain conviction; corroboration is not a mandatory legal requirement, and she is not an accomplice. Compelling reasons may nevertheless require evidence giving assurance to her account. Minor discrepancies do not defeat an otherwise reliable case, but serious infirmities, material inconsistencies or inherent	618

	improbability cannot be ignored. After considering the disclosures, cross-examination and other evidence, the Court accepted the prosecutrix's account and upheld the conviction.
Rape conviction on the prosecutrix's sole testimony	A conviction for rape may rest solely on the prosecutrix's testimony when the Court is satisfied that it is truthful and of a quality sufficient to sustain conviction, without circumstances casting doubt on her veracity. Where the evidence fails that standard, it is unsafe to convict solely on her testimony. The Court applied this test and found the evidence insufficient in the circumstances before it.	694
Reliance on a seven-year-old sole eyewitness after careful scrutiny	A child's evidence is not rejected merely because of age, but requires greater care because of susceptibility to tutoring. The trial court tested Devendra's ability to understand and answer questions before recording his evidence without oath. His presence with his parents was natural and admitted by the appellant, his account of the axe attack remained unshaken, and his immediate reporting conduct supported it. Finding no basis for the tutoring suggestion, the Court accepted him as a reliable sole eyewitness.	718
Speculation about a child witness's conduct without seeking his explanation	The defence could not discredit the twelve-year-old brother merely by speculating why he allowed his sister to leave with the accused for ice cream instead of accompanying her. He had not been asked to explain his own reasons, and the record did not show that the same offer had been made to him. The Court declined to reconstruct an undisclosed reason through speculation by either counsel or the Court.	915

Injured, Related and Interested Witnesses — Credibility Standards

Independent witnesses — quality of credible eyewitness evidence governs	Non-examination of independent witnesses is not, by itself, fatal to the prosecution. The quality of evidence matters more than the number of witnesses. The Court relied on the consistent testimony of the injured sister and the child eyewitness, supported by the immediate observations of the deceased's parents and the medical findings, to reject the objection that independent witnesses had not been examined.	8
Injured eyewitness — special weight subject to credibility and probabilities	An injury sustained in the occurrence ordinarily assures the witness's presence and gives the testimony special weight. Such evidence should not be rejected without strong grounds such as major contradictions or discrepancies, but must still accord with probabilities and cannot be accepted mechanically. Minor variations that did not undermine the core account of the shooting were insufficient to reject the injured eyewitnesses here.	12
Credibility of injured relatives and independent corroboration	Relationship with the deceased does not by itself discredit a witness. Where a relative shares the deceased's hostility towards the accused, the court must carefully examine the witness's presence, probabilities and possible false implication, but independent corroboration is not a legal prerequisite. Injured relatives who naturally reached an assault outside their home and gave materially consistent accounts were accepted where previous enmity was not established.	21
Conviction on the testimony of a sole related or inimical eyewitness	A witness's relationship with the deceased does not by itself make the testimony unreliable or require independent corroboration. Interested or inimical evidence must be examined with particular care for probability, consistency and possible false implication. Where a motive for false implication appears, material corroboration should be sought. A sole eyewitness may nevertheless sustain conviction if the account withstands that scrutiny and is found trustworthy; here the witness's natural presence and medically corroborated account met that standard.	23
Non-examination of	The prosecution case cannot be rejected merely because independent persons	23

independent witnesses despite trustworthy eyewitness evidence	were not examined when the eyewitness account is otherwise trustworthy. Public reluctance to participate in investigation or court proceedings must be considered. The officer's inquiries also indicated that the two persons named by the defence had not witnessed the incident, so their non-examination did not weaken the accepted eyewitness account.
Weight of an injured eyewitness's testimony	Injuries sustained in the occurrence support an eyewitness's presence and give the testimony particular weight. Such evidence ordinarily deserves reliance because the injured witness is unlikely to spare the actual assailant and falsely implicate another person. It remains open to rejection for major contradictions or other substantial grounds affecting credibility. Consistent injured-eyewitness accounts corroborated by medical evidence were accepted in this case.	32
Relationship with the victim and witness credibility	A witness's relationship with the victim does not by itself discredit the testimony. The Court must examine related witnesses' evidence carefully for cogency and credibility, including the foundation of any plea of false implication. Reliable evidence cannot be discarded solely because the witness is a relative.	32
Related or interested witnesses: cautious scrutiny without automatic rejection	Testimony cannot be rejected solely because the witness is related to the victim. Applying Jayabalan, the Court required caution and attention to consistency when assessing interested witnesses, rather than automatic suspicion or a rigid rejection. It accepted the supporting accounts after considering their consistency and the corroborating medical and police evidence.	45
Interested testimony — effect of established enmity	Enmity can explain either commission of an offence or a false accusation. Where hostility is established, the prosecutrix's testimony must be carefully tested for reliability, consistency and a convincing account of the core allegations. If that account survives cross-examination, past hostility does not itself negate guilt. In this case, all four prosecution witnesses had reasons for hostility, and the Court found the material inconsistencies and lack of corroboration prevented reliance on their evidence.	65
Reliability of related eyewitnesses	The testimony of eyewitnesses who were close relatives of the deceased could be relied upon where their account consistently identified the accused as the shooter and remained credible and trustworthy. In this case, their account of the shooting was corroborated by the medical evidence, and their relationship to the deceased did not prevent reliance on their testimony.	90
Careful scrutiny of related or interested eyewitnesses	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself justify rejecting an eyewitness's evidence. The court must examine it carefully for consistency and credibility rather than approach it with automatic suspicion. Credible evidence is not discredited merely because the witness is related or because other cited witnesses turn hostile. Here, the wife and brother-in-law's direct account of the knife attack was found natural and reliable, with no indication of false implication.	93
Related witnesses, interested witnesses and careful scrutiny	A related witness is not necessarily an interested witness. Interest requires some benefit from the litigation or a reason to secure conviction beyond the relationship itself. A relative whose presence is natural may give reliable evidence. Interested testimony must be scrutinised cautiously to exclude false implication, but independent corroboration is not an invariable legal requirement where the testimony is intrinsically reliable. Here, the witnesses' presence in their fields was natural and cross-examination disclosed no material reason to reject their evidence.	98
Weight of injured-eyewitness testimony and failure to raise an alarm	Injuries sustained in the occurrence support an eyewitness's presence and give the testimony special evidentiary weight. Cogent grounds, such as major contradictions or discrepancies, are required to reject that evidence. Applying the narrated injured-witness authorities, the Court relied on the child survivor's proved head injuries. Her failure to raise an alarm did not show that she had not	103

	witnessed the assault: people react differently, and a frightened six-year-old confronted by her uncle could remain silent.
Related eyewitnesses — Natural presence and careful scrutiny	Relationship with the deceased does not by itself make an eyewitness interested or unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in securing punishment, arising from enmity or another motive for false implication. A plea of false implication requires a foundation, and the testimony must be examined closely for reliability, probability, cogency and consistency. Family witnesses naturally present outside their home during the morning attack could not be rejected merely because they were related to the victims.	115
Non-examination of independent witnesses — Effect on credible eyewitness evidence	Failure to examine nearby independent witnesses does not by itself discredit an otherwise trustworthy eyewitness account. Credible evidence from related or injured witnesses remains usable after careful scrutiny; the prosecution is not required to examine every person who may have witnessed the occurrence. The absence of independent testimony did not justify discarding the three eyewitnesses accepted in this case.	115
Prior enmity — Motive for crime and for false implication	Prior enmity can supply a motive both for committing the offence and for falsely implicating an accused. Its presence therefore does not by itself destroy the prosecution case. The Court must assess it with the evidence and circumstances when deciding whether the accusation and eyewitness account are reliable.	115
Eyewitness failure to intervene in a violent assault	An otherwise reliable eyewitness account cannot be rejected merely because the witness did not intervene when close relatives were being violently assaulted. The Court applied that principle where the father and son were subjected to a severe armed attack, and it also found that an eyewitness had in fact sustained injury while intervening.	115
Injured eyewitness — Explained delay in medical examination	Delay in medically examining an injured eyewitness does not necessarily make the account unreliable when the surrounding circumstances explain it. Here, one victim died and another required urgent referral, while the witness's own injury was not grievous and the family was occupied with treatment and investigation. Her examination later that day did not discredit her presence or testimony.	115
Cautious assessment of related, partisan and inimical witnesses	A witness's relationship to the deceased or enmity with the accused does not, by itself, justify rejecting the evidence. Consistent and trustworthy testimony may be accepted after cautious scrutiny. Where partisan witnesses make material improvements, prudence requires looking for independent ocular or circumstantial corroboration. Here, substantial infirmities and the absence of such support made their evidence unsafe to accept.	123
Concealment of relationship to claim independence as an eyewitness	An attempt by alleged eyewitnesses to conceal their close relationship to the deceased may undermine their credibility when other evidence establishes that relationship. Here, the nephews' categorical denials conflicted with the complainant's admission and formed part of the Court's assessment of their material falsehoods and improvements.	123
Relationship with the deceased does not by itself discredit a witness	A witness's close relationship with the victim is not by itself a ground to reject otherwise credible evidence. The testimony requires careful scrutiny for false implication rather than mechanical rejection. The Court relied on the reproduced Bhagwan Jagannath Markad principles while evaluating the deceased's son and wife and accepted the corroborated part of their evidence.	132
Related or interested witnesses and absence of independent testimony	The testimony of related or interested witnesses cannot be rejected merely because of that relationship or because no independent witness was examined, even where the incident occurred in a populated area in daylight. The court must scrutinise their evidence cautiously, considering material discrepancies, its genuineness and the truth of the account.	145

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Injured eyewitness: proved presence and consistent testimony	Medical proof of an eyewitness's injuries, together with substantial consistency between the FIR, police statement and testimony, supported the witness's presence and credibility. A discrepancy concerning a broken part of the sword did not undermine that assessment. The evidence was accepted after close scrutiny, including consideration of the asserted hostility toward the appellant.	145
Alleged hostility of a witness must be linked to the appellant	Complaints naming other accused, but not the appellant, did not establish hostility between the eyewitness and that appellant. A further suggestion that a complaint had been lodged against the witness remained unsupported when the document was not produced. Those matters did not justify treating the witness as inimical toward the appellant.	145
Evidence of the child victim's mother as an eyewitness	An eyewitness's evidence cannot be rejected merely because she is the victim's mother. Her account that she saw the accused committing the sexual act remained consistent on the material allegation, the suggested enmity was not established, and the forensic report corroborated the prosecution evidence. The omissions and contradictions relied upon did not make her testimony unreliable.	151
Related and interested witnesses	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself make a witness interested or untrustworthy. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in punishment and a motive for false implication, such as prior enmity. Related testimony requires careful scrutiny for inherent reliability, probability, consistency and cogency. The family witnesses' presence outside their own home in the morning was natural, and their evidence was accepted after scrutiny.	166
Enmity and credibility of prosecution witnesses	Enmity can supply a motive both for committing the offence and for falsely implicating an accused. Its existence must therefore be assessed with the other evidence rather than treated automatically as a reason to reject prosecution testimony. The prior platform and water disputes were considered in that manner.	166
Absence of independent witnesses	Non-examination of independent persons does not by itself defeat otherwise trustworthy eyewitness evidence. The Court considered the explanation that villagers had not disclosed information and no independent witness came forward, and accepted the family witnesses after close scrutiny.	166
Eyewitness's failure to intervene	An eyewitness's failure to intervene during a ferocious assault does not alone justify rejecting the account. The conduct must be viewed in the circumstances of the attack. The Court rejected that criticism where the witnesses had seen the father and son being severely beaten.	166
Explained delay in examining an injured witness	An injured witness's delayed medical examination did not make her evidence unreliable where the family first attended to a person declared dead, another critically injured person and urgent police and treatment arrangements, while her own injuries were not grievous. Her abrasions were consistent with the explanation that the weapon blow broke her bangles and the fragments injured her.	166
Weight and limits of injured-eyewitness testimony	Injuries sustained at the time and place of the occurrence support an eyewitness's presence and give the testimony special weight. Such evidence should ordinarily be relied on unless major contradictions or discrepancies justify rejection. The Court accepted the injured eyewitnesses' consistent account identifying the appellants as the assailants and found the prosecution case proved.	199
Injury supports a witness's presence at the occurrence	The injuries suffered by the two eyewitnesses supported their presence at the scene. Their detailed accounts of the appellants' roles, against which no discrepancy was shown, were accepted along with the other evidence in holding the prosecution case proved beyond reasonable doubt.	206
Related witnesses, independent	Relationship to the deceased, or being the sole witness, does not justify rejecting otherwise credible evidence. Courts must examine consistency and reliability	214

witnesses and evidentiary quality	with care rather than presume untruthfulness. Non-production of an independent witness, or hostility of other independent witnesses, does not by itself discredit trustworthy related testimony. Applying Jayabalan, Seeman and Jodhan, the Court accepted the consistent account of the deceased's brother, materially confirmed by his companions.
Related testimony and non-examination of independent witnesses	Relationship to the deceased does not itself impair a witness's credibility, and non-examination of independent witnesses is not by itself fatal where the testimony relied on is trustworthy. Evidentiary quality matters more than the number of witnesses. Where false implication is properly raised, the Court must scrutinise credibility cautiously. Applying those principles, the Court accepted the reliable accounts of the related witnesses.	215
Simple injuries, witness presence and minor discrepancies	Injuries sustained by a witness support the witness's presence at the occurrence and lend weight to the account of the assault. In rejecting the suggestion of self-inflicted simple injuries, the Court treated the injured witnesses as credible and held that minor discrepancies did not undermine the prosecution case on this record.	215
Conviction on truthful testimony of related witnesses	The testimony of a related witness may sustain a conviction if it is found truthful. Non-examination of independent witnesses does not by itself require rejection of otherwise credible eyewitness evidence.	220
Related and interested witnesses: distinction and assessment	Relationship to the deceased is not the same as an interest in securing conviction. Related or interested testimony must be assessed for natural presence, intrinsic reliability and possible false implication, rather than rejected mechanically. Careful scrutiny is required as a matter of prudence; credible testimony may be accepted without a fixed requirement of independent corroboration. The Court also declined to reject a witness merely because he knew or was employed by the deceased, particularly where that connection explained his presence.	248
Eyewitness remaining uninjured during the assault	An eyewitness's presence or credibility is not disproved merely because the assailants left him unharmed. Presence must be assessed from all the circumstances; the prosecution is not required to explain the assailants' mental process in sparing a witness. Applying this principle, the Court did not reject the accompanying eyewitness merely because he suffered no injury.	248
Non-examination of available independent witnesses	Non-examination of other independent persons does not by itself undermine the prosecution where the eyewitness evidence produced is trustworthy. The failure to examine customers present when the earlier threat was made therefore did not require rejection of the reliable witnesses who testified about it.	248
Relationship to the prosecutrix does not by itself discredit a witness	The mother’s evidence could not be discarded merely because she was related to the prosecutrix. She reached the spot immediately after hearing the alarm, and the suggestion of false implication due to enmity was not supported by circumstances undermining her reliability. Her testimony was assessed on its merits.	254
Credibility of related and interested eyewitnesses	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself justify rejecting an eyewitness. The evidence must be carefully scrutinised for truth and credibility, with greater caution where the witness also has an interest in conviction or hostility towards the accused. Credible evidence can be relied on without a mandatory rule of corroboration. Here, the Court accepted the related eyewitnesses after examining their cross-examination and the corroborating circumstances.	274
Prior enmity and the credibility of eyewitnesses	Prior enmity may supply a motive both for the offence and for false implication. Its effect on credibility must therefore be assessed against the prosecution evidence as a whole. Here, after accepting the eyewitness and corroborative evidence, the Court treated the enmity as a motive for the murder.	274
Related or interested	A witness's relationship to the deceased or interest in the prosecution is not by	275

witnesses and the need for corroboration	itself a ground to reject the evidence. Presence at the scene, intrinsic reliability, surrounding probabilities and consistency with other evidence must be carefully examined. Corroboration is not universally required, but the court may seek independent assurance where enmity, embellishment or other circumstances create a risk of false implication.
Enmity as a possible motive for crime or false implication	Enmity can provide both a motive for the offence and a reason for false implication. It does not require automatic rejection of a witness. The court must weigh the evidence carefully and assess the foundation for the allegation of false implication; where the account is trustworthy, enmity may support the prosecution's motive case.	275
Related witnesses, enmity and careful credibility scrutiny	Relationship to a victim or prior hostility towards the accused does not by itself justify rejecting credible testimony. Enmity may explain either false implication or the commission of the offence. The court must therefore scrutinise such evidence with more than ordinary care before relying on it.	279
Related or inimical witnesses: careful scrutiny of credibility	Relationship with the deceased or hostility towards the accused does not by itself disqualify a witness. The Court must carefully examine the witness's presence, the probabilities of the account and any infirmities. Consistent testimony from naturally present relatives may be accepted; independent corroboration is not an indispensable requirement in every case.	280
Relationship with the deceased does not by itself discredit testimony	A witness's testimony cannot be rejected in its entirety merely because the witness is the deceased's son. The Court must evaluate the evidence and the significance of any contradictions. The son's consistent account of the armed assault was accepted because the variations identified did not materially undermine it.	285
Related witnesses: retain reliable portions despite partial disbelief	Relationship alone does not make a witness interested or require rejection of the evidence. Nor does disbelief concerning some accused or part of the account require rejection of everything the witness says. The Court must separate reliable evidence from exaggeration. Here, the relatives' admission that they arrived after the victim was already burning limited their claim to have seen ignition, while reliable evidence concerning the husband could still be assessed separately.	288
Weight of an injured eyewitness's account despite a minor difference in sequence	An injury proved to have been sustained in the occurrence supports the witness's presence and gives the testimony special evidentiary weight, although major contradictions or strong grounds may justify rejection. Ajab Singh's injuries and corroboration by another eyewitness supported his account that the assault on him preceded the fatal firing. The difference in sequence from a witness watching at a distance did not undermine the core account of a rapidly unfolding incident.	291
Related witnesses and interested witnesses	Relationship with a victim does not by itself make a witness interested or unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in the accused's conviction giving a motive for false implication. The Court must carefully test reliability, probability and consistency rather than mechanically reject such evidence. Here no basis for an intention to falsely implicate the appellants was shown in the accounts of the related eyewitnesses.	291
Related eyewitnesses — scrutiny despite hostile independent witnesses	A witness's relationship to the deceased does not by itself justify rejecting otherwise credible testimony. Jayabalan and Seeman require careful scrutiny for consistency, with attention to the quality rather than the number of witnesses. Jodhan confirms that hostile independent witnesses do not, by themselves, discredit reliable related witnesses. Applying those principles, the Court accepted the related eyewitnesses' consistent account of the appellant firing at the deceased despite the independent shopkeepers' failure to support the prosecution.	307

20.2 : Injured, Related and Interested Witnesses — Credibility Standards

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Related witnesses — conviction despite absence of independent eyewitnesses	Testimony of related witnesses can sustain conviction if it is found truthful. The absence of independent eyewitnesses did not require rejection of the accepted account, which the Court assessed with the medical evidence and the supporting evidence of witnesses who reached the scene immediately after the incident.	315
Related and interested witnesses — credibility after careful scrutiny	Relationship to the deceased or friendship with him does not by itself make a witness unreliable or establish an interest in false implication. The evidence must be assessed for its inherent reliability, probability and consistency, with greater caution where the witness also has hostility towards the accused. Corroboration is not an invariable legal requirement, though the particular infirmities and a demonstrated motive for false implication may call for it.	319
Prior enmity — motive for both false implication and the offence	Enmity can supply a motive for false implication and also a motive for committing the offence. It therefore does not by itself discredit a witness. The court must examine the testimony with due caution and assess whether the claimed false implication has a factual foundation.	319
Non-examination of independent witnesses — fact-dependent effect	Independent corroboration is not an absolute requirement where the examined eyewitnesses are credible after careful scrutiny. The effect of omitting independent witnesses depends on the circumstances, including their materiality, discrepancies in the evidence and reasons for their absence. Here, the market closed after the attack, potential witnesses had left, and reluctance to incur local hostility supported the Court's refusal to reject the accepted eyewitness evidence on that ground.	319
Related and interested witnesses — credibility and corroboration	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself justify rejection of a witness's evidence. The authorities relied upon by the Court require careful scrutiny of credibility, possible interest, hostility and material infirmities. Independent corroboration is not an invariable condition of relying on trustworthy related evidence, although established hostility calls for greater caution and a motive for false implication may require corroboration. The Court accepted the family witnesses' evidence alongside the husband's signed agreement. Its quoted discussion, including Raju, does not impose a rigid equation between relationship and disqualifying interest.	328
Non-examination of every witness — quality and necessary evidence	The prosecution need not multiply witnesses or call every person said to have seen the occurrence. The passages from Harbeer Singh and Raghubir Singh relied upon by the Court emphasise production of material witnesses needed to unfold the case and the quality, rather than number, of witnesses. In this cruelty prosecution, failure to examine neighbours did not by itself discredit the family witnesses, whose accounts were also considered with documentary evidence.	328
Related and Interested Witnesses: Distinction and Scrutiny	Relationship to the victim does not by itself make a witness interested or render the testimony unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect interest in the accused's punishment arising from enmity or another reason supplying a motive for false implication. The Court must examine whether the testimony is reliable, probable, cogent and consistent, rather than reject it merely because the witness is a relative.	360
Injured Witnesses: Special Evidentiary Weight	An injury sustained in the occurrence strongly establishes the witness's presence and gives the testimony special evidentiary weight. Such evidence should ordinarily be relied on unless major contradictions or discrepancies provide strong grounds for rejection. That status does not establish every identification of an assailant: the Court retained the injured witnesses' reliable testimony while rejecting particular unsupported attributions.	360
Scrutiny of Related Witnesses' Evidence	A witness's evidence cannot be rejected merely because the witness is related to the injured person, but it requires close scrutiny. Where the related witnesses' accounts contain material contradictions and cannot withstand that scrutiny, they do not establish the accused's guilt.	372

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Delayed Disclosure and Uncorroborated Presence of a Claimed Eyewitness	An eyewitness's two-day silence about an alleged deliberate collision, despite opportunities to inform nearby police, raised doubt about whether he had witnessed it. His claimed travel in an auto remained uncorroborated: neither the driver nor the auto was identified, the footage did not show it, and no permit allowed its operation on the highway. His inability to read English also made his claimed identification of the vehicle's English-letter registration doubtful. These circumstances justified rejecting his account.	375
Injured Witness and the Quality Rather Than Number of Witnesses	The quality of testimony, rather than the number of witnesses, determines proof. An injured eyewitness has a special evidentiary position because the injuries assure presence at the scene. Failure of an independent witness to support the assault does not by itself require rejection of an injured witness whose account withstands scrutiny.	378
Weight of Injured Eyewitness Testimony	An injury sustained in the occurrence lends assurance to a witness's presence and gives the testimony special weight. Such evidence remains open to rejection on strong grounds, including material contradictions or discrepancies. The Court accepted the injured witnesses' account after examining its consistency and medical corroboration; their injuries did not dispense with scrutiny of credibility.	381
Related Witnesses Distinguished From Interested Witnesses	Relationship to the victim does not by itself establish an interest in falsely securing conviction. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in the result, such as a motive for false implication arising from prior enmity. A relative naturally present at the occurrence must be assessed for reliability, probability and consistency; the evidence cannot be mechanically rejected for kinship. Alleged partisanship calls for careful scrutiny supported by a factual foundation.	381
Non-Examination of Independent or Material Witnesses	The absence of independent witnesses does not by itself defeat reliable eyewitness evidence, especially where serious village hostility explains their reluctance to testify. A different question arises when an available material witness is withheld and that witness could explain the origin of the occurrence or fill an otherwise unresolved essential gap. Adverse inference then depends on the witness's necessity and availability; it is not warranted merely because additional testimony would repeat reliable evidence already given.	381
Assessment of Related Injured Witnesses	Relationship to the deceased is not by itself a reason to discard witness evidence as interested. The Court assessed the injured family witnesses' accounts with the medical evidence and distinguished what they proved about each phase and victim. It accepted the consistent account of the first attack and the specific proof of the later injuries, while declining to extend the later group's liability to an earlier assault not established against it.	388
Enmity and scrutiny of a plea of false implication	Enmity may supply a motive both for the offence and for false implication. The evidence must therefore be weighed carefully; otherwise acceptable testimony cannot be rejected merely because of enmity. A plea of false implication requires a foundation and deeper scrutiny of the accusations. Here, the witnesses' doubtful opportunity to observe, material omissions and inconsistent accounts, together with unreliable police records, supported the finding that the accused had been falsely implicated because of enmity.	390
Reliability of a relative or interested witness	Relationship with the victim does not by itself justify rejecting testimony. The court must scrutinise the evidence cautiously, looking for consistency and credibility rather than treating relationship as a reason for suspicion. Reliable evidence is not discredited merely because the witness is also the sole witness or an independent witness has not been examined. These principles informed acceptance of the sister's last-seen account.	393 distinction from interested witnesses	securing punishment, such as a motive for false implication; a relative's account must be assessed for inherent reliability, probability, cogency and consistency. Applying cautious scrutiny rather than automatic suspicion, the Court accepted the eyewitness accounts of the victims' relatives in the overall evidentiary assessment.

Careful Scrutiny of Related and Inimical Eyewitnesses	Relationship to a victim does not itself discredit a witness. Courts must examine the witness's actual interest and hostility and scrutinise the account carefully, with greater caution where family relationship is accompanied by enmity. Here the witnesses' natural presence while travelling to court, the injured witness's presence and the prompt report supported acceptance of their testimony after that scrutiny.	409
Weight of Injured-Witness Testimony and the Need to Test Probabilities	An injured witness's testimony ordinarily carries substantial weight because the injury supports presence and such a witness is unlikely to spare the real assailant for an innocent person. It must nevertheless be examined against the probabilities; injury does not require mechanical acceptance of every assertion.	409
Independent Corroboration of Interested Testimony as a Rule of Prudence	Interested testimony is not inherently inadmissible or unreliable, and there is no invariable rule requiring independent corroboration before conviction. Carefully scrutinised evidence that is intrinsically credible and probable may suffice. Where a motive for false implication or other infirmity appears, the Court should seek corroboration in material particulars and assess the account with correspondingly greater caution.	409
Injured relative's evidence despite a hostile eyewitness	Relationship to the deceased is not by itself a ground to reject a witness's evidence. The injured brother's account withstood cross-examination and was corroborated by medical evidence, the deceased's admissible statements and weapon recoveries. The independent eyewitness's hostility did not displace that sufficient evidence.	412
Related witnesses and interested witnesses	Relationship with the victim does not by itself make a witness interested or render the testimony unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in the result, including a motive to implicate the accused falsely through enmity or another reason. Related testimony must be assessed cautiously for inherent reliability, probability, cogency and consistency, without treating it as inherently tainted or rejecting it merely because of kinship.	433
Assessment of related and acquainted eyewitnesses	Relationship with the deceased or acquaintance with the complainant does not, by itself, justify rejecting otherwise credible eyewitness evidence. Such evidence requires careful scrutiny for truthfulness and reliability. The Court accepted the brother's explanation for accompanying the deceased and assessed both eyewitnesses against the surrounding circumstances, prompt FIR and ballistic corroboration. Suggestions about family interests, past cases and associations did not discredit their accepted accounts on this record.	445
Related Eyewitnesses: Careful Scrutiny Rather Than Automatic Rejection	An eyewitness's relationship to the victim does not by itself justify rejecting the testimony. Where the relative shares hostility towards the assailant, presence at the scene, probabilities and infirmities require careful scrutiny. Independent corroboration is not an inflexible requirement. The Court accepted the deceased's brother and mother as credible eyewitnesses after examining their evidence and cross-examination and finding support in the medical and surrounding evidence.	450
Credibility of the Injured Eyewitness Supported by Independent and Medical Evidence	The injured eyewitness's account was accepted where cross-examination disclosed no circumstance undermining the assault allegation, other admissible eyewitnesses supported it, the medical findings corroborated the injuries, and the Dehati Nalishi was recorded promptly. The Court also observed the missing finger and bodily scars. It upheld the prosecution case on this remaining evidence after excluding the witness whom the accused had no opportunity to cross-examine.	451

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Interested Household Witnesses and Material Doubts About the Alleged Presence	The household witnesses' account was disbelieved on material circumstances, including strained relations arising from the pending matrimonial dispute, the unexplained alleged visit of the separately residing appellant with her daughter, silence about the daughter after the claimed flight, and the initial failure to identify the appellant as assailant. The suppressed report and disputed arrest further undermined them. The Court found a motive for false implication in this evidentiary setting.	455
Related and interested witnesses — Distinction and careful scrutiny	Relationship to the victim does not by itself make a witness interested or render the testimony unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in securing conviction, such as prior enmity supplying a motive for false implication. The evidence must be assessed carefully for inherent reliability, probability, cogency and consistency. Credible testimony may be acted upon despite kinship; neither relationship nor a label of partisanship warrants mechanical rejection. The reliable evidence identifying Rajesh survived that scrutiny.	474
Non-examination of independent witnesses — Quality of available testimony	A prosecution case cannot be rejected merely because independent witnesses were not examined, if the available testimony survives careful scrutiny and is trustworthy. The court weighs the quality of evidence rather than counting witnesses. The isolated location of the complainant's house reduced the likelihood of independent observers, and their non-examination did not undermine the credible case against Rajesh.	474
Related witnesses — Credibility and factual foundation for false implication	Kinship alone does not make testimony untrustworthy or turn a related witness into an interested witness. Interest requires a direct or indirect benefit or motive to secure a false conviction, including prior enmity. Courts must carefully examine reliability, probability, cogency and consistency; mechanical rejection is impermissible. The asserted land dispute concerned the mother's brother rather than the child's parents and lacked documentary support. The Court found no established vested interest sufficient to discredit the otherwise accepted testimony.	477
Related and interested witnesses — careful scrutiny and effect of established hostility	Relationship with the deceased does not by itself discredit a witness or make independent corroboration invariably necessary. Credible testimony may support conviction after careful scrutiny. An interest in securing conviction, established hostility or a motive for false implication calls for closer examination of infirmities and, where appropriate, corroboration on material particulars. Natural presence does not necessarily establish disinterest. Applying these principles, the Court accepted that a loan existed but rejected the relatives' account of repayment and additional exactions because available supporting evidence was not produced.	480
Related and interested witnesses — relationship and natural presence do not determine credibility	A witness is not interested merely because of relationship with the victim. An interest in securing punishment arising from prior enmity or another motive for false implication distinguishes an interested witness from a related witness. Related testimony must be assessed for inherent reliability, probability, consistency and credibility. The neighbours' arrival after hearing screams was natural; their shared caste did not dispense with scrutiny of their accounts. The Court examined their evidence together with the prosecutrix's admissions and the material inconsistencies.	481
Related eyewitnesses — close scrutiny with independent and medical corroboration	The evidence of the deceased's son and daughter required minute scrutiny because of their relationship, but the Court did not reject it solely on that ground. It accepted the natural account in conjunction with the prompt FIR, three independent eyewitnesses and medical proof of firearm injuries. The accepted evidence supported the finding of common intention and murder. The Court's conclusion rested on that combined assessment rather than an automatic presumption that related testimony was either true or false.	497

20.2 : Injured, Related and Interested Witnesses — Credibility Standards

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Related and interested witnesses — distinction and credibility assessment	Relationship to the victim does not by itself make a witness interested or unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in punishment, such as a motive arising from prior enmity to implicate the accused falsely. The Court must examine whether the testimony is reliable, probable, cogent and consistent, using caution rather than mechanical suspicion or rejection. In this case, the deceased's brothers were accepted after assessment of the prompt FIR, the reliable dying declaration, prior acquaintance with the appellant and corresponding medical injuries.	499
Related Eyewitnesses: Opportunity to Observe and Contradictory Accounts	The claimed eyewitness account was unreliable where the spot map contradicted the daughter's asserted proximity, her statement placed other alleged eyewitnesses at the scene only after the assault, and the alleged dragging of the body lacked supporting blood or drag marks. The Court also considered her failure to intervene or visit her father and the absence of independent witnesses to an alleged public-road assault. On this combined assessment, her testimony and the other claimed eyewitness accounts could not establish the prosecution case.	522
Enmity as a Motive for Both False Implication and the Offence	Enmity may motivate false implication as well as commission of an offence, so its effect must be tested against the evidence. Earlier preventive proceedings under Section 151 CrPC did not establish fabrication where the defence produced no record of injuries in that earlier incident, seven victims sustained medically supported injuries including two fractures, and the ocular account was corroborated. The Court rejected the suggestion that those injuries had been self-inflicted merely to create a defence to the preventive proceedings.	527
Related sole eyewitness: credibility and need for corroboration	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself discredit a witness. The witness's presence, the probabilities of the account and its material infirmities require careful scrutiny, particularly where the witness shares the deceased's hostility to the accused. Independent corroboration is not invariably required. Here, conflicting accounts of the earlier encounter and the other family members' presence made the sole eyewitness's account unreliable enough to require corroboration, which the prosecution did not supply.	550
Interested witnesses: quality of evidence and independent corroboration	Where the prosecution principally relies on witnesses who appear interested, independent corroboration is not an indispensable requirement. Credibility depends on the quality of the evidence rather than the number of witnesses. The evidence must nevertheless withstand scrutiny of its material infirmities.	550
Prosecution need not examine every eyewitness	The prosecution need not multiply witnesses to the same occurrence. It must produce the material witnesses needed to unfold its case; it is not bound to examine everyone said to have witnessed the incident. The Court adopted this principle while separately examining why a material family witness had been withheld.	550
Chance eyewitness: unexplained presence, prolonged silence and subsequent conduct	A chance witness's testimony cannot be rejected solely because his presence was coincidental, but the presence must be satisfactorily explained and the evidence closely scrutinised. Subsequent conduct, including whether the witness told anyone about the occurrence, bears on credibility. Here, the related witness claimed to have seen a late-night assault but neither sought available help nor informed nearby police, continued his ordinary work and remained silent for seventeen days. His claim that a relative later took him to the police was unsupported by that relative. In these circumstances, the explanation of fear was rejected and the trial court's rejection of his testimony was upheld.	553
Related witnesses: careful scrutiny and independent corroboration	Relationship to the deceased is not by itself a reason to reject testimony. The witness's presence, the probabilities of the account and its infirmities require careful examination, particularly where the witness shares hostility to the accused. Independent corroboration is not invariably indispensable, and the quality of testimony matters more than the number of witnesses. The	555 prosecution need not examine every eyewitness or multiply repetitive testimony, but must present the material witnesses needed to unfold its case. The Court accepted the related witnesses' materially consistent account with medical support.

Evidentiary weight of an injured eyewitness	An eyewitness injured in the occurrence has special evidentiary weight because the injury supports the witness's presence and makes it unlikely that the actual assailant would be spared to implicate another person. Such testimony should ordinarily be accepted unless major contradictions or discrepancies provide strong grounds for rejection. The medically proved injuries and the defence witness's admission of several witnesses' presence supported their reliability in this case.	561
Related witnesses and interested witnesses	Relationship to the victim does not by itself make a witness interested or untrustworthy, nor does it create a requirement of independent corroboration. An interested witness has a direct or indirect interest in securing punishment, arising from enmity or another motive for false implication. The evidence must be assessed cautiously for reliability, probability, cogency and consistency. The Court accepted the related witnesses whose material accounts remained reliable on that assessment.	561
Credibility of injured witnesses related to the victim	Relationship to the victim does not by itself discredit an injured eyewitness. Where the witness's presence is supported by the injuries and the account is consistent and medically corroborated, the evidence may be accepted after careful scrutiny. Doubts about another witness and minor differences concerning a peripheral injury do not necessarily undermine that reliable account.	570
Corroborated evidence of an injured witness and related eyewitnesses	An injured witness's presence may be supported by the injuries sustained while intervening in the assault. The Court accepted the account where several eyewitnesses consistently supported the attack and their evidence was corroborated by medical findings; the asserted association or intimacy of other eyewitnesses with the victim had not been established.	572
An injured eyewitness's account still requires scrutiny	Injuries support a witness's presence and give the testimony special weight, but do not require automatic acceptance. Material changes in the identity of the alleged assailants, unsupported by the earlier report and police statement, may make the account unreliable despite the witness's injuries. The Court applied that principle where the witness first named one pair of assailants and attributed the attack to a different pair at trial.	573
Careful scrutiny where prior enmity raises a plea of false implication	Prior enmity may supply a motive both for the offence and for false implication. The court must scrutinise the evidence carefully so that an accused is neither wrongly acquitted nor wrongly convicted on that basis. A plea of false implication calls for deeper examination of whether the accusations are supported.	573
Weight of an injured eyewitness's testimony	An injury sustained during the occurrence supports the witness's presence and gives the testimony special weight. Such evidence should be assessed with that significance and ordinarily accepted unless major contradictions or discrepancies justify rejection. The Court accepted the injured wife's account after examining her opportunity to observe the continuing attack and the challenges to her credibility.	577
Related witnesses and interested witnesses: distinction and assessment of credibility	Relationship to the victim does not by itself make a witness interested or render the testimony untrustworthy. Interest requires a direct or indirect stake in punishment, arising from prior enmity or another reason that supplies a motive for false implication. The evidence must be assessed for reliability, probability, cogency and consistency. The relatives' presence in hospital was natural and no motive for false testimony was shown, but their accounts still required scrutiny on the merits.	580

20.2 : Injured, Related and Interested Witnesses — Credibility Standards

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Scrutiny of related or interested eyewitnesses and the effect of enmity	Kinship alone does not justify rejecting a witness. The testimony must be examined for reliability, probability, cogency and consistency, with greater care where the witness shares hostility towards the accused. Enmity may explain either an assault or false implication. Independent corroboration is not invariably required for intrinsically reliable testimony, although a demonstrated motive for false implication calls for corroboration in material particulars. The Court accepted Umesh after close scrutiny despite his relationship to the victims.	583
Absence of independent witnesses where the remaining testimony is trustworthy	Non-examination of independent witnesses is not invariably fatal. The court must consider the circumstances, including public fear after a violent incident, and closely scrutinise the testimony actually produced. There is no universal rule that related witnesses cannot be accepted without independent testimony where their evidence is otherwise reliable.	583
Related witnesses and prior enmity: careful scrutiny	Relationship with the deceased is not by itself a reason to reject a witness. Applying Jayabalan, the Court required cautious scrutiny for consistency, without a pedantic or automatically suspicious approach. Previous enmity may explain either the assault or false implication and therefore calls for closer examination. The Court accepted the relatives' testimony after considering it with the deceased's accounts and medical evidence; family relationship did not replace scrutiny of the evidence.	593
Credibility of related witnesses whose presence is natural	Relationship with the deceased does not by itself discredit eyewitness testimony or create a requirement of independent corroboration. The evidence must be assessed carefully for reliability, probability, consistency and cogency. Here, nearby shops and the joint family's customary gathering explained the witnesses' presence; a contemporaneous medical record naming a witness as the injured person's attendant also supported it. The Court accepted the testimony after that assessment.	605
A related witness is not necessarily an interested witness	A witness is not interested merely because of kinship with the victim. Interest involves a direct or indirect benefit from conviction, including a motive to implicate the accused falsely through prior enmity or another reason. Applying Mohd. Rojali Ali, the Court distinguished that concern from natural family presence at the scene and required assessment of reliability and consistency rather than automatic rejection.	605
Credibility of related and interested witnesses	Relationship with the deceased does not by itself discredit a witness. The evidence must be examined carefully for consistency, inherent reliability and any motive for false implication. Where prior enmity is shown, closer scrutiny is required. Reliable testimony may be accepted without independent corroboration. Applying these principles, the Court accepted the wife's and parents' accounts of the deceased's oral dying declaration.	610
Non-examination of independent witnesses	An otherwise true and acceptable prosecution case cannot be rejected merely because independent witnesses have not been examined or because independent corroboration is absent. The reluctance of independent persons to assist the investigation or testify does not by itself discredit reliable evidence. The Court applied this principle when accepting the relatives' evidence of the oral dying declaration.	610
Related eyewitnesses: reliability and distinction from interested witnesses	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself make a witness interested or unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect benefit or motive in securing the accused's punishment, including a motive for false implication. The evidence must be assessed cautiously for credibility, probability and consistency. Kinship alone neither requires corroboration nor justifies rejection; natural presence and contemporaneous corroborating circumstances remain relevant.	622
Non-examination of	A prosecution case that is otherwise true and acceptable cannot be rejected	622

independent bystanders	solely because independent bystanders were not examined. Public reluctance to assist investigation is relevant when assessing that omission. Applying Ambika Prasad, the Court accepted the reliable occurrence evidence despite the absence of independent shopkeeper witnesses.
Injured eyewitnesses — established presence and medical corroboration support the assault account	The injured eyewitnesses' presence at the scene was established by their injuries, and their categorical account of the assault was supported by the medical evidence of incised wounds and by other eyewitness testimony. One supporting witness was related to the injured persons, while another was treated as independent. On that evidence, and after rejecting the alleged counter-assault, the Court accepted the assault account and sustained the Section 324 IPC conviction.	633
Related witnesses — relationship alone does not justify discarding testimony	A witness's testimony cannot be disbelieved merely because the witness is related to the deceased. Relationship must be distinguished from interestedness; the bare fact of kinship did not justify rejecting the witnesses' accounts or quashing the proceedings.	636
Related or interested witnesses — careful scrutiny is required rather than mechanical rejection	Relationship to the victim or partisan interest does not, by itself, justify discarding testimony. A plea of false implication requires a foundation, and the court must examine whether the account is cogent and credible. Reliable testimony may be accepted after careful and thorough scrutiny even when the witness is related or interested.	638
Related eyewitnesses — careful scrutiny rather than automatic rejection	A witness’s relationship to the deceased does not by itself discredit the testimony. The authorities reproduced by the Court require careful assessment of credibility, with greater caution where the witness also has an interest in conviction or shares hostility towards the accused. Such scrutiny is a rule of prudence, not an absolute legal demand for corroboration; the quality of the evidence matters. After close scrutiny, the Court accepted the wife’s account, which two independent witnesses supported. It rejected the mother’s claim to be an eyewitness because her cross-examination showed that she arrived after being informed of the incident.	675
Related witnesses — scrutiny and the absence of independent corroboration	Relationship to the victim does not by itself require rejection of a witness’s evidence. The authorities adopted by the Court require careful scrutiny of credibility, with particular caution where interest or enmity creates a risk of false implication. Reliable related testimony may support conviction without an invariable requirement for independent corroboration. Here, the natural presence and accounts of the wife and nephews were accepted after scrutiny; no foundation showed a plan to implicate the appellants in place of the actual assailants. Non-examination of independent persons, including those at a nearby school, did not by itself render the prosecution unreliable.	678
Credibility of related and interested witnesses	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself make a witness interested or render the testimony unreliable. An interest in the result, arising from prior enmity or another motive to implicate the accused falsely, must be distinguished from kinship. The Court must examine whether the evidence is reliable, probable, cogent and consistent, with a careful approach where false implication is alleged. The deceased’s brothers were natural witnesses whose testimony could not be rejected merely because of their relationship.	693
Evidentiary weight of an injured eyewitness	An injury proved to have been sustained during the occurrence supports the witness’s presence and gives the testimony special evidentiary weight. An injured witness is generally unlikely to spare the actual assailant and implicate another person falsely. The evidence nevertheless remains open to rejection on convincing grounds, including major contradictions or discrepancies. Here the medically proved injuries and consistent evidence supported the injured witnesses, whose relationship to each other and the deceased did not alone discredit their accounts.	698

20.2 : Injured, Related and Interested Witnesses — Credibility Standards

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Scrutiny of related, interested and inimical witnesses	Kinship does not by itself discredit testimony or establish an interest in falsely prosecuting the accused. Related or interested evidence must be scrutinised carefully for credibility and inherent probability; where the witness also shares hostility towards the accused, greater care is required. Reliable interested testimony can sustain conviction without an invariable requirement of independent corroboration. Where a motive for false implication or material infirmity appears, the need for corroboration must be assessed in the particular circumstances.	698

An injured witness is generally unlikely to spare the actual assailant and implicate another person falsely. The evidence nevertheless remains open to rejection on convincing grounds, including major contradictions or discrepancies. Here the medically proved injuries and consistent evidence supported the injured witnesses, whose relationship to each other and the deceased did not alone discredit their accounts.	699

Reliable interested testimony can sustain conviction without an invariable requirement of independent corroboration. Where a motive for false implication or material infirmity appears, the need for corroboration must be assessed in the particular circumstances.	699
Related and interested witnesses — careful scrutiny without automatic rejection	Evidence cannot be rejected solely because the witness is related to the victim or interested in the prosecution. The Court must scrutinise it carefully for consistency and credibility, without treating the relationship itself as a reason for suspicion. Credible testimony may be accepted even where the related witness is the sole witness. The injured mother's account in this case was accepted because it was medically supported and remained reliable under cross-examination.	700
Injured eyewitness — evidentiary significance and grounds for rejection	An injury sustained during the occurrence supports the witness's presence at the scene and gives the testimony special evidentiary significance. Such a witness is ordinarily unlikely to spare the actual assailant in order to implicate another. The testimony nevertheless remains open to rejection on strong grounds, including major contradictions or inconsistencies. Cogent and reliable injured-witness evidence is not discarded merely because the witness is related to the victim or other witnesses have turned hostile.	700

The Court must scrutinise it carefully for consistency and credibility, without treating the relationship itself as a reason for suspicion. The injured mother's account in this case was accepted because it was medically supported and remained reliable under cross-examination.	701

trustworthy testimony of related witnesses	despite the non-examination of independent witnesses. The Court accepted the related witnesses' account after examining its credibility and corroboration by the prompt report, dying declaration and medical evidence.
Related injured eyewitnesses assessed carefully, not discarded mechanically	Bhagwan Jagannath Markad, (2016) 10 SCC 537, and Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 426, were quoted on careful scrutiny of interested or hostile-to-accused relatives, the absence of an inflexible independent-corroboration demand, and evidence quality over witness count. Roop Singh, Shivnarayan, Bir Singh and Baikunthi had medically documented injuries consistent with their presence and material account; the defence witness also placed Baikunthi at the field. Relationship and field-boundary hostility called for scrutiny, but did not alone negate their testimony.	735
Related witnesses with established enmity — scrutiny of supported and exaggerated allegations	Relationship alone does not justify rejection of a witness, but established enmity requires careful scrutiny because innocent persons may be implicated along with the guilty. Applying Raju alias Balachandran and its reproduced Dalip Singh principle, the Court accepted the injured relatives' medically supported account of the fatal shot and axe or lathi assaults. It rejected the uncorroborated allegations of repeated firing by other accused, considering the single gunshot wound, absence of firearm injuries to the other injured witnesses and prior hostility, and extended benefit of doubt to those accused.	753
Related injured witnesses with enmity — acceptance of reliable portions of testimony	Kinship alone does not discredit a witness. Where enmity is established, however, the evidence must be scrutinised carefully because innocent persons may be implicated along with the guilty. Applying Raju alias Balachandran and the reproduced Dalip Singh principle, the Court accepted the injured relatives' account of the fatal shot and medically supported axe or lathi assaults. It treated their wider, uncorroborated allegation of repeated firing by other accused as exaggeration in the setting of the established rivalry.	754
Special evidentiary weight of an injured eyewitness	Injury sustained during the occurrence supports an eyewitness's presence and ordinarily makes false substitution of an assailant unlikely. Such testimony deserves due weight and should not be rejected without strong grounds, such as major contradictions or discrepancies. The medically proved injuries supported the witnesses' presence, but did not prevent the Court from rejecting separately tainted identification evidence.	761
Relationship alone does not discredit a seizure witness	A seizure witness's relationship with the deceased is not, by itself, a reason to discard the evidence or treat the witness as interested. A suggestion about a family dispute did not demolish the proved recovery where nothing established that the witnesses were interested. The Court therefore accepted the seizure evidence while independently examining whether the recovered property was identified.	761
Relationship does not by itself discredit an eyewitness	A witness's relationship with the deceased is no ground to reject testimony that inspires confidence. Related witnesses ordinarily seek punishment of the real offender, but their evidence must still be evaluated. The Court accepted the eyewitness accounts after scrutiny and found them supported by the medical evidence; it did not treat kinship as a substitute for proof.	766
Prior enmity requires closer scrutiny of prosecution evidence	Enmity may explain either the assault or false implication. It is therefore unsafe to reject prosecution evidence solely because the parties were hostile. The Court must examine such evidence more carefully than usual. After that scrutiny, the Court rejected the contention that the prior dynamo dispute established false implication.	766
Related and interested witnesses —careful scrutiny without mandatory independent	Relationship with the victim or partisanship does not by itself make a witness unreliable. Such evidence must be scrutinised carefully and accepted with caution, but independent corroboration is not an invariable requirement where the testimony is intrinsically reliable and inherently probable. Applying P. Venkateswarlu and Abhishek Sharma, the Court accepted the natural and	817

corroboration	consistent eyewitness accounts, supported by the contemporaneous reports and medical and forensic evidence, after testing them against cross-examination and the alleged possibility of false implication.
Injured eyewitness testimony supported by medical and forensic evidence	The Court accepted the injured eyewitnesses' account of the firearm attack because their evidence remained materially unchanged in cross-examination and their presence at the scene was not doubtful. The medical examinations, radiographs, treatment and postmortem findings supported the firearm injuries and homicidal death, while the positive forensic report added corroboration. Minor discrepancies in supporting witnesses did not displace the accepted account.	873
Related or inimical witnesses — careful scrutiny without automatic rejection	Relationship alone does not make a witness interested; the latter description requires an interest in securing conviction through animus or another reason. Even interested or inimical testimony may sustain conviction if careful scrutiny establishes its credibility and inherent probability. Presence, possible hostility and infirmities must be examined. Where a motive for false implication is shown, corroboration on material particulars should be sought, although independent corroboration is not invariably required. Here the prompt hospital report and medical evidence supported the injured man and his relatives despite the hostility of independent witnesses and the omissions raised in cross-examination.	908
Injured eyewitness — significance of proved presence and corroboration	An eyewitness's injuries are a weighty indication of presence at the occurrence and give the testimony particular evidentiary importance. Such evidence remains subject to careful scrutiny for credibility. In this case, the injured witness's account could not be discredited in cross-examination and was corroborated by the prompt Dehati Nalisi and medical evidence, supporting its acceptance despite the independent witnesses turning hostile.	908
Related and interested witnesses: cross-case motive and reliability scrutiny	Relationship to the deceased does not itself make a witness interested or render natural testimony unreliable. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in punishment of the accused and a motive to implicate falsely; even then the evidence requires cautious scrutiny for reliability, probability and consistency rather than automatic rejection. Applying Mohd. Rojali Ali and its reproduced authorities, the Court found a concrete cross-case interest coupled with material improvements, suppression of deaths and injuries, and alteration of the scene. The testimony of Angad, Mahesh, Ram Singh and Munesh failed that scrutiny for reasons beyond kinship.	919
Credibility of injured, related and interested eyewitnesses	Relationship or interest does not by itself justify rejection of testimony. Related or interested witnesses, especially those sharing enmity with the accused, require careful scrutiny for credibility and false implication. Reliable testimony may be accepted without an inflexible requirement of independent corroboration, and absence of unrelated witnesses alone does not defeat the prosecution. Injuries sustained in the occurrence support a witness's presence and give the account particular weight, subject to major contradictions or other sound reasons for rejection. The four eyewitnesses were accepted after scrutiny, supported by the injured witnesses' medical evidence and the prompt, consistent account.	936
Related or inimical witnesses: careful scrutiny of credibility	Relationship alone does not justify discarding a witness's evidence. Enmity may supply a motive either for the offence or for false implication, so testimony must be scrutinised carefully. Otherwise convincing and consistent evidence cannot be rejected merely because the witness is related or hostile to the accused. Here the Court found false implication after examining material improvements, inconsistent accounts and missing corroboration; hostility by itself was not the basis for rejecting the witnesses.	942
Related and	Kinship does not by itself make a witness interested or discredit the testimony.	947

interested witnesses: distinction and scrutiny of credibility	Interest concerns a particular stake in the litigation's result, and even a natural eyewitness may be interested. The Court must carefully examine presence, consistency, infirmities and the surrounding evidence. Independent corroboration is not an invariable requirement, although the circumstances may make corroborative assurance prudent. Injured testimony carries particular importance but remains open to scrutiny. Here the injured witness and his brother gave materially consistent accounts supported by medical evidence, and their relationship did not justify rejection.
Related or inimical witnesses: scrutiny without automatic rejection	Enmity may motivate either an offence or false implication. It does not by itself justify rejecting testimony, and relationship with the deceased is likewise no ground for exclusion where the evidence otherwise inspires confidence. These circumstances require deeper scrutiny with more than ordinary care. After examining the record, the Court accepted the prosecution's eyewitness account despite the admitted earlier hostility and the complainant's relationship with the deceased.	948
Injured eyewitness: presence, scrutiny and reliability despite kinship	Injuries sustained in the same occurrence give an eyewitness's testimony special weight by establishing presence at the scene. Strong grounds, such as major contradictions or discrepancies, are needed to reject that evidence; injury does not make it immune from scrutiny. The injured husband's account assigned the appellants' roles and was medically corroborated. Relationship with the deceased did not justify rejection, and the suggested motive to grab adjoining land lacked an evidentiary foundation. The Court accepted his evidence after scrutiny despite the rejected dying declaration and unsupportive witnesses.	949
Scrutiny of related eyewitnesses who share hostility towards the accused	Relationship to the deceased does not by itself make an eyewitness unreliable or require independent corroboration in every case. Where related witnesses also share hostility towards the accused, their evidence requires particularly careful scrutiny of presence, probability, consistency and material infirmities. The Court applied the principles reproduced from Mahavir Singh, Harbeer Singh, Vijendra Singh, Raju, Jodhan, Yogesh Singh and the other cited authorities. It examined the witnesses' evidence separately for each accused, accepted the reliable account of Pawan's firing given by Mukesh, Rakesh and Rishabh, and rejected the additions implicating Banti and Khemraj.	951
Non-examination of independent witnesses where the available evidence is reliable	A prosecution is not rendered unreliable merely because independent persons who could have witnessed the incident were not examined. What matters is whether the evidence produced is trustworthy. Relying on Ambika Prasad and its reproduced discussion of State of U.P. v. Anil Singh, the Court rejected the argument that the occurrence in a populated locality required rejection of the relatives' otherwise reliable evidence against Pawan for want of independent corroboration.	951
Credible direct evidence despite failure to prove weapon recovery	Failure to prove seizure of the weapon from the accused did not defeat the accepted direct and medical evidence of assault. The eyewitness placed the spanner at the scene, the officer claimed recovery from the accused about ten days later, and no FSL report was filed to establish blood on it. Nevertheless, the injured's account, the eyewitness's testimony, the accused's observed flight and medical findings proved the attack. The flying-stone suggestion was denied and unsupported by scene evidence. A separate claim that the injured had named the attacker was rejected because he had become unconscious. The recovery defect was assessed against the remaining evidence.	969
Related eyewitnesses: relationship alone does not discredit reliable testimony	An eyewitness's relationship with the deceased is not by itself a ground for rejecting the evidence or insisting on corroboration. Where false implication is alleged, the evidence must be carefully examined for credibility. The parents' consistent account of the knife assault, supported by medical evidence, was	971 accepted after scrutiny.

Non-examination of other eyewitnesses where reliable direct evidence is available	Non-examination of other named eyewitnesses did not defeat the prosecution where the investigating officer explained their absence by fear arising from absconding accused, and the examined eyewitnesses gave a credible and medically corroborated account of the assault.	971
Scrutiny of related and interested witnesses	Relationship to the victim alone does not justify rejecting a witness. Where a related witness may share hostility towards the accused, the Court must carefully examine presence at the scene, probabilities and all infirmities in the account. Independent corroboration is not an invariable requirement. The Court accepted the related injured witnesses after finding their core account consistent with the medical evidence.	987
Careful assessment of related witnesses	A witness's relationship to the deceased is not by itself a ground to reject the evidence. The testimony must nevertheless be assessed meticulously. The Court examined the related witnesses' internal inconsistencies, earlier statements and conduct before deciding whether their account was reliable.	988
Related eyewitnesses and prior enmity — careful assessment of credibility	Prior enmity can provide a motive for false implication as well as a motive for the offence. Following Kunwarpal and Ruli Ram, the Court required careful assessment of the evidence and a foundation for the plea of false implication. It accepted the wife and her brother as reliable eyewitnesses after examining their accounts and the circumstances of their presence. Their relationship to the deceased and admitted enmity did not, by themselves, require rejection of otherwise acceptable testimony.	993
Non-examination of independent witnesses — circumstances of the village scene	The absence of a bus passenger or another independent witness did not invalidate the accepted eyewitness evidence. The Court declined to assume that passengers must have been present merely because the assault occurred near a village bus stand: buses were infrequent, their times were known, and no witness had been asked whether a bus arrived during the incident. It also considered the reluctance of independent witnesses to depose where the accused had criminal antecedents. In those circumstances, non-examination of an independent witness did not make the wife’s and her brother’s testimony unreliable.	993

Contradictions, Omissions and Improvements in Criminal Testimony

Witness discrepancies — minor mistakes and material consistency	Minor inconsistencies do not justify rejecting otherwise reliable evidence when they do not affect the material account of the occurrence. The Court assessed the child eyewitness's account, the injured witness's unchanged cross-examination and the corroborating medical record together. The authority relied upon also treats a peripheral mistake in identifying the officer who recorded a statement as insufficient, by itself, to discredit the prosecution.	8
Partly unreliable testimony — separating supported evidence from falsehood	Rejection of part of a witness's account does not compel rejection of the whole testimony or acquittal of every accused. The Court must assess whether the reliable residue independently proves guilt. Where truth and falsehood cannot be separated without reconstructing a new prosecution case by discarding essential context, the testimony must be rejected as a whole. The maxim that falsity in one matter makes everything false is not a mandatory rule of evidence in India.	12
Chaotic occurrence — minor variations and precise recital of every detail	Evidence must be assessed in the setting in which witnesses observed the occurrence. During indiscriminate firing and flight for safety, witnesses cannot ordinarily be expected to identify every shot, sequence and utterance with minute precision. Natural minor variations that do not affect the core case need not discredit them; an artificially identical recital may itself warrant scrutiny for tutoring. The discrepancies identified here were not material to the proved roles	12

	and shooting.
Material inconsistency between a cross-FIR and defence testimony	An earlier cross-FIR did not establish the defence version when its maker's testimony materially departed from the report, introduced the deceased's alleged participation and accidental fall, and was unsupported by proved medical evidence of the alleged defence-side injuries. The defence account failed even on probabilities, although its admission of a scuffle supported the occurrence of the incident.	21
Discrepancy in viewing distance where the assault remained visible	A difference between the distance shown in a site plan and the witness's stated viewing distance was not material where the assault was visible from either position. The bulb light was unchallenged, no obstruction was shown, and the witness knew the assailants. Recognition of familiar villagers in limited light must be assessed in their rural setting rather than by the visual habits of persons accustomed to bright urban lighting.	23
Holistic appreciation of testimony and isolated discrepancies	A reliable prosecution account must be assessed as a whole rather than unsettled by an isolated sentence. One witness's failure to notice the eyewitness briefly returning to the scene did not contradict the latter's account where he promptly left for the police station after seeing the body and did not remain at the spot.	23
Testing defence testimony against the witness's admitted location	A defence witness's account of meeting the eyewitness on the way to the field was rejected when his own description placed his field on the opposite side of the village from the route in question. His admissions instead supported the site plan and the prosecution's explanation of the eyewitness's movements.	23
Material contradictions and minor discrepancies in witness testimony	Minor discrepancies, trivial embellishments and ordinary differences arising from observation, memory or shock do not justify rejecting otherwise trustworthy testimony. Contradictions or omissions that go to the root of the case and create serious doubt about a witness's truthfulness may undermine the prosecution. The controlling question is whether the evidence, assessed as a whole, inspires confidence.	32
Minor contradictions and omissions: effect on otherwise reliable testimony	Contradictions and omissions must be assessed for their significance. Trivial discrepancies that do not materially affect the account do not make the whole testimony unreliable. The Court found that the discrepancies in the witnesses' accounts of seeing the deceased with the accused were minor rather than grave and did not undermine their evidence.	45
Last-seen testimony — material improvements absent from the police statement undermine reliability	An account of seeing the accused with the deceased cannot safely be relied on where the witness's police statement contains no such allegation and the witness cannot explain the omission. The Court treated the newly asserted sightings and joint drinking as a major contradiction and rejected that witness's last-seen account as untrustworthy.	70
Minor discrepancies in otherwise consistent eyewitness testimony	Discrepancies about beer consumption and the presence of other persons were treated as trivial where the eyewitnesses consistently identified the accused and described the shooting. In assessing those variations, the Court considered the two-year interval before their examination and the emotional effect of witnessing a relative's murder.	90
Material contradictions affecting proof of sexual assault	Discrepancies must be assessed against the evidence as a whole. Minor differences that do not affect its core do not justify rejection, but contradictions that undermine the credibility of the account may do so. Here, conflicting accounts of the first disclosure, recovery of consciousness, change of clothes and condition of the room materially weakened the rape allegation. The child's original and recalled testimony did not establish rape by the appellant.	91
Material inconsistencies in the account of an	The fact that the complainant was injured did not resolve the defects in the prosecution account. His police statement omitted material allegations about the demand for money, weapons and individual acts. His wife's claim that she	95

injured witness and corroborating witness	saw the assault in progress conflicted with her admission that he was already lying on the ground when she arrived. Assessed with the unexplained defence injuries and the cross-case, these deficiencies left the origin of the incident and the claim that the appellants were the aggressors unproved beyond reasonable doubt.
Eyewitnesses observing from different positions need not notice each other	One eyewitness's failure to mention the other did not make the other's presence doubtful where they had not gone together, observed from different positions and could have been concentrating on the assault. Their presence in their own fields was natural, and no material unreliability was shown in the supporting evidence.	98
Omission of the sole last-seen circumstance as a material contradiction	An omission affecting the core of the prosecution case may make a witness unreliable, unlike a minor discrepancy on a trivial matter. Here, the witnesses' police statements omitted the entire allegation that the appellant had taken the deceased away. Since last seen together was the sole asserted circumstance linking him to the killings, its first introduction in court was a major contradiction going to the root of the case. The accounts were therefore found untrustworthy.	99
Limited use of statements recorded by police under Section 161 CrPC	Statements recorded under Section 161 CrPC are not substantive evidence. Subject to Section 162, an accused may use them to contradict a witness in accordance with Section 145 of the Evidence Act. The prosecution may also contradict the witness with the court's leave, and re-examination may address the matter where necessary. The police statement cannot simply be read as proof of its contents.	99
Proof of a contradiction through a previous written statement	Before a previous written statement is used to contradict a witness, attention must be drawn to the relevant part and the confrontation must appear in the deposition. If the witness admits it, further proof is unnecessary. If it is denied, the marked passage must be proved through the investigating officer. A court cannot on its own use an unproved police statement to contradict testimony. Here, although specific questions about the omissions would have been preferable, the witnesses' admissions that the material account was first disclosed in court, read with the officer's evidence that he had added or omitted nothing, were held substantially to satisfy the requirement.	99
Explained delay in recording an injured child's Section 161 statement	Delay in recording a witness's Section 161 CrPC statement does not automatically destroy credibility. The court must assess the explanation together with whether the eventual testimony is cogent and credible; unexplained delay may raise doubt about engineered implication. Here, the investigating officer's attempts to examine the injured child were frustrated by unconsciousness and memory loss after hospital discharge. Her continuing treatment and the defence's question about dizziness supported that explanation. The Court accepted the delayed statement and rejected the inference that delay necessarily established tutoring.	103
Minor recollection differences after prolonged delay caused by abscondence	Minor discrepancies attributable to fading memory after a long interval do not by themselves discredit otherwise reliable eyewitness evidence. Applying Sadhu Suran Singh, the Court treated differing recollections about travel by foot, bicycle or motorcycle, and an isolated early-morning time for an inquest notice, as peripheral errors after about nine years. The delay in trial followed the appellants' abscondence. The eyewitness account of the assault remained reliable and was corroborated by the medical evidence.	106
Section 162 restriction on contents of a signed police witness statement	The Court held that the contents of a police witness statement bearing witnesses' signatures were hit by Section 162 CrPC. It nevertheless noted that the signatures showed the eyewitnesses were available to the investigating officer. Their availability, despite the failure to record their individual statements, supported the finding of deliberate investigative omissions.	106

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Minor variations in the timing of an exhortation	Ordinary differences in observation, memory and perspective do not discredit testimony unless they materially affect the core account or cannot reasonably be reconciled. In a rapidly unfolding assault, differences about whether the appellant exhorted before, during or after particular blows were treated as minor. The Court assessed the evidence as a whole and also checked the police statement, which recorded the exhortation alleged to have been omitted. Material omissions or improvements raising serious doubts about truthfulness stand on a different footing.	115
Partly unreliable testimony — Acceptance of the credible remainder	A false or unreliable part of a witness's account does not require rejection of the whole testimony. The Court must separate trustworthy evidence from exaggeration or error, considering corroborating evidence and the circumstances. A witness may be accepted in part, and the same body of evidence may justify different conclusions for different accused according to their proved involvement.	115
Former inconsistent statements — Contradiction and impeachment	Section 145 of the Evidence Act requires the witness's attention to be drawn to the part of a former statement relied upon for contradiction. Section 155 permits credibility to be impeached through a former inconsistent statement. A mere difference in wording or detail is insufficient: the inconsistency must bear on the credibility of the present account.	115
Minor omissions and contradictions in otherwise reliable prosecution evidence	Minor discrepancies and omissions on trivial matters do not justify rejecting a witness's evidence when they do not affect the core prosecution case. The Court must separate truth from exaggeration and improvements and decide whether the remaining evidence is sufficient to convict. Material contradictions that undermine the basic account require a different assessment.	122
Material improvements concerning a witness's opportunity to see the offence	Changes that create an opportunity to witness the offence are material, rather than minor discrepancies. The complainant's later claim to have seen the assault was absent from his prompt FIR and police statement. The alleged eyewitnesses also changed their account from travelling to inform him to calling him from the scene, contrary to the distance and other evidence. Those changes undermined their claimed presence and reliability.	123
Material improvement in testimony does not require rejection of its independently credible part	A material improvement claiming direct observation of an assault may be rejected while the witness's consistent account of seeing the accused flee with the weapon is considered separately. The Court accepted that consistent part after scrutiny and corroboration. Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus is not a rule of general application in India. The credible part may be relied upon, but the court cannot reconstruct a new prosecution story where its essential foundation is disbelieved.	132
Minor discrepancies about an adjacent room and platform	A difference about whether witnesses were inside a room or on the adjoining platform when they heard cries was a natural minor discrepancy, rather than a material improvement. Their consistent account that they reached the nearby scene while the assault continued was not displaced by that variation.	145
Variations about an occurrence not witnessed by the witness	The victim's father had not witnessed the sexual act. The Court therefore treated the omissions and contradictions elicited from him about its commission as immaterial when assessing the prosecution case, which rested on the victim's testimony, his mother's eyewitness account and the forensic evidence.	151
Material omission of a known accused's presence and role	An omission from a Section 161 CrPC statement may amount to a contradiction when it is significant and relevant in its context; every discrepancy is not a material contradiction. Here, a witness who already knew the appellant first attributed a jeep-pushing role to him in Court, without explaining its omission from his police statement. The FIR named five persons and contained neither that role nor the stalled-jeep account. Applying Baldev Singh and Shyamal Ghosh, the Court treated the addition as material and disbelieved the evidence of the appellant's presence and participation.	157

20.3 : Contradictions, Omissions and Improvements in Criminal Testimony

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Reading testimony as a whole when assessing contradictions	A witness's testimony must be read as a whole rather than by selecting an isolated passage. A genuine clarification should be distinguished from a contradiction that undermines the evidence materially. Whether an omission or variation is a material contradiction depends on its significance and context in the particular case.	157
Minor contradictions and assessment of testimony	Minor contradictions, omissions or improvements on trivial matters do not justify rejecting testimony that remains credible on the essential prosecution account. The evidence must be read as a whole, and the identified defects assessed for their effect on its reliability. Applying Mallikarjun and the authorities reproduced there, the Court found the discrepancies insufficient to undermine the materially consistent account of the armed attack.	160
Minor variations and material contradictions	Natural witnesses may differ through perception, memory, shock or elaboration. Minor discrepancies that do not affect the essential prosecution account do not justify rejecting it. The court must assess the whole testimony with corroborating evidence; irreconcilable changes affecting its core can discredit it. The Court found the variations insufficient to undermine the accepted assault account.	166
Contradiction by a previous statement	To contradict a witness under Section 145 of the Evidence Act, attention must be drawn to the part of the earlier statement relied upon. The inconsistency must discredit the present testimony; a limited variation is not automatically a material contradiction. Section 155 permits credibility to be impeached through former inconsistent statements.	166
Partial acceptance of a witness's evidence	A witness's untruthfulness on one aspect does not require rejection of the whole account. The court must separate reliable portions from unreliable ones. The same evidence may support conviction of some accused and acquittal of others according to the proved involvement; the rule of rejecting everything because one part is false has no general application.	166
Reliable evidence despite a false second-shooter attribution	Falsehood in one material part does not compel rejection of the whole testimony. The court must separate reliable evidence from the false portion. Although the FIR and witnesses attributed the second shot to another man, the FSL linked both spent cartridges to the convicted appellant's gun. The Court rejected the second-shooter attribution while accepting the corroborated evidence against that appellant.	167
Material improvement changing the place of an accused group	A change that initially appears minor may be material when tested against the scene and direction of attack. Replacing the earlier account of arrival from the village with a claim of hiding in bushes shifted the accused group from in front of the tractor to behind it, where the shots came from. The inconsistent accounts and absence of bushes at the claimed position undermined the evidence against the six alleged assembly members.	167
Material inconsistencies between abductees on ransom and threats	Material differences in the abductees' accounts of the ransom demand and threat were significant where they had remained together throughout captivity. One described a call demanding a collective sum without alleging a threat, another described a demand without threat, and the third described separate demands accompanied by a death threat. The Court found the essential additional conditions of Section 364-A unproved because those accounts did not support one another on the material events.	188
Material omissions undermined a later allegation of participation	The allegation that a co-accused had also abused the deceased was absent from the FIR and the relevant witnesses' Section 161 CrPC statements. Those material omissions undermined the later account and supported the finding that his physical or oral participation in the offence had not been proved.	207
Minor discrepancies that do not affect the prosecution case	Minor contradictions, omissions or inconsistencies on trivial matters do not justify rejecting otherwise credible testimony when the witnesses remain firm	220

	on material aspects. The evidence must be assessed as a whole to determine whether the identified defects undermine its reliability.
Material changes in the accused's weapon and role	Unexplained changes between the police statement and testimony concerning whether an accused used a lathi or a gun handle, coupled with another witness's failure to assign him a specific assault and an identification deficiency, left the evidence against him unreliable. In those circumstances the trial court's acquittal was not perverse.	226
Embellishment in an earlier account and the reliable core of testimony	An exaggeration or inconsistency does not require rejection of the entire prosecution case if careful scrutiny separates it from a credible account of the material incident. Here, the earlier allegation that a tractor had been run over the victim was absent from the trial testimony and unsupported by medical evidence, but did not displace the reliable armed-assault evidence. If the core or a material part of the prosecution case is disbelieved, however, the Court cannot construct a new prosecution story from what remains.	248
Using an earlier inconsistent statement to contradict a witness	When a previous statement is used to contradict a witness, attention must be drawn to the relevant part under Section 145 of the Evidence Act. A mere variation does not necessarily discredit the witness: the inconsistency must be assessed for its effect on the credibility of the testimony, particularly the material account of the incident.	248
Material improvement alleging exhortation cannot establish common-object liability	The witnesses' later claim that all the accused exhorted the gunman to kill was absent from the earliest report and their police statements. The omission was put to the witnesses and investigating officer and remained unexplained. The Court rejected that material improvement; constructive liability had to be assessed from the other proved conduct.	253
Omissions that do not undermine the proved central allegation	Omissions from the FIR and the Section 164 CrPC statement concerning earlier stalking, demands for photographs and a mobile number, and threats did not, in this case, undermine the prosecutrix's intact and reliable account of the appellant catching her hand with sexual intent. The Court treated those omissions as nonfatal to the truthfulness of the central allegation.	254
Normal discrepancies distinguished from material contradictions	Discrepancies arising from ordinary errors of observation, lapse of memory or the shock of an occurrence do not necessarily undermine credibility. They must be distinguished from material discrepancies affecting the prosecution case. The Court found no material circumstance in cross-examination that rendered the eyewitnesses unreliable.	274
Separating reliable evidence from a rejected part of the prosecution case	Rejection of evidence about an alleged conspiracy did not require rejection of independent eyewitness evidence of the actual shooting. The rule that falsity in one part makes the whole testimony false is not a mandatory rule of Indian evidence law. The court must separate reliable evidence from falsehood; the whole may be discarded where the two are inseparable and separation would require reconstructing a new prosecution case.	275
Minor omissions and discrepancies in an otherwise truthful account	Testimony must be assessed as a whole. Omissions, inconsistencies or embellishments that do not affect the core of the prosecution case do not by themselves justify rejecting an otherwise truthful account. Material discrepancies that undermine credibility must be distinguished from normal errors of observation or memory and the effects of shock.	275
Using a previous inconsistent statement to contradict a witness	Under Section 145 of the Evidence Act, a witness's attention must be drawn to the part of the earlier statement proposed to be used for contradiction. For the inconsistency to discredit the present testimony, it must affect credibility; a mere variation in some detail is insufficient.	275
Unchallenged trial disclosure does not itself make a new	The defence's failure to cross-examine a witness about an omission does not, by itself, establish that another witness must be summoned under Section 311 CrPC. Here, the asserted last-seen information was absent from the earlier	283

witness essential	Sections 161 and 164 statements, and its alleged source was not an investigation witness. Lack of a specific cross-examination question did not justify introducing that source as a substitute witness.
Minor contradictions: assess their effect on the core prosecution case	Minor contradictions, omissions or improvements on trivial matters do not justify rejecting testimony in its entirety when they leave the core prosecution account intact. The evidence must be read as a whole, and the identified deficiencies assessed for their actual effect on credibility. Here, the consistent account of the shooting, prompt FIR and medical corroboration supported acceptance of the witnesses despite peripheral variations.	285
Material omission of co-accused: confrontation and proof	An omission concerning the presence and acts of co-accused may materially undermine their later implication. Here, the child was confronted under Section 145 of the Evidence Act with her earlier police statement naming only her father, and could not explain the omission of the other accused. The investigating officer confirmed recording her own words. Their alleged participation consequently remained unproved beyond reasonable doubt.	288
Minor omissions and discrepancies in otherwise credible testimony	Minor discrepancies or elaborations that leave the core prosecution case intact do not require rejection of a witness's evidence. Material omissions or contradictions that create serious doubt about truthfulness must be distinguished from trivial differences. The omission to describe in the FIR the complainant's return to collect the accused's shirt did not undermine his account, which was supported by contemporaneous seizure of the articles.	291
Material omission in one part of an otherwise reliable witness's account	A material improvement need not require rejection of every part of a witness's testimony. The neighbour's claim that the accused took his wife downstairs while beating her was omitted from his police statement and was not relied on. His evidence that they were together on the roof and quarreling was accepted in light of the other evidence and the accused's own admissions, despite the earlier dispute between the witness and accused.	294
Witness omission — injury detail and the recorded dowry allegations	The maternal uncle's omission to tell police that he had personally seen injuries did not make his account of dowry harassment a material improvement. His police statement already recorded the deceased's allegations of harassment and demands for money and a vehicle. The Court distinguished the omitted injury detail from those recorded allegations and, after considering the cross-examination and other evidence, accepted the dowry-related testimony.	302
Minor discrepancies — separation of doubtful detail from reliable testimony	Minor discrepancies arising from ordinary errors of perception, observation or memory should not be given undue weight if they do not shake the prosecution's basic version. The Appabhai principles applied by the Court require the evidence to be assessed as a whole, excluding exaggeration where appropriate. Doubt about a particular fact warrants rejection of the entire account only when it reaches the root of the case. The Court treated the variations in the related eyewitnesses' accounts as insufficient to undermine their reliable evidence of the shooting.	307
Contradictions and omissions — effect on the core of the prosecution case	Minor discrepancies, omissions or improvements on trivial matters do not warrant rejecting otherwise credible testimony when they leave the core of the prosecution case intact. Evidence must be read as a whole and the identified deficiencies assessed for their effect on credibility. The Court found the discrepancies peripheral and the witnesses firm on the material assault allegation.	315
Witness evidence — whole testimony and material discrepancies	Evidence must be read as a whole rather than judged from a stray sentence. Deficiencies and contradictions require assessment for whether they undermine the substance and credibility of the account. Discrepancies that leave the core intact do not justify rejecting the entire testimony.	319
Exaggerated testimony —	The rule that falsity in one part necessarily makes all testimony false does not	319

separating the reliable account from additions	apply. An exaggerated version may contain a true account with added false details. The court must separate reliable evidence from the additions; wholesale rejection is justified where truth and falsehood are so inseparable that no real evidence survives.
Belated affidavit repudiating sworn prosecution testimony	In the passage from Yakub Ismailbhai Patel v. State of Gujarat reproduced through State of M.P. v. Badri Yadav, the Supreme Court upheld rejection of a witness's belated affidavit claiming that his sworn prosecution evidence had been false and given at police instance. It noted his intervening imprisonment with the accused and rejected the attempt to resile from the sworn testimony. The High Court relied on that discussion when refusing to summon an already examined prosecution witness for the defence.	322
Testimonial omissions — material contradictions and minor variations	An omission or variation undermines credibility when it concerns a material particular, reaches the root of the case or creates serious doubt about the account. Minor differences caused by observation, memory or the circumstances of narration do not justify rejection of otherwise reliable testimony. Even an inconsistency on a material point does not mechanically require rejection of the witness's entire evidence. Applying Yogesh Singh and Narayan Chetanram Chaudhary, the Court treated the omissions raised here as minor and assessed the evidence as a whole.	328
Contradictions: Materiality and the Circumstances of the Witness	Minor inconsistencies caused by shock, trauma, lapse of time or the confusion of repeated firing do not justify rejecting otherwise reliable testimony. Contradictions affecting a material part of the account must be assessed separately. The Court rejected particular shooter attributions contradicted by prior statements while accepting the witnesses' reliable evidence on other aspects, with medical and other evidence providing support.	360
Previous Written Statements: Procedure for Proving Contradictions	Before a previous written statement is used to contradict a witness, Section 145 of the Evidence Act requires attention to be drawn to the specific passage. An admitted contradiction needs no further proof. If the witness denies it, the relevant passage must subsequently be proved through the investigating officer. The court cannot itself use an unconfronted, unproved police statement to contradict the witness.	360
Partly Unreliable Testimony: Separating Truth from Falsehood	Disbelief of one part of a witness's evidence does not compel rejection of the whole testimony. The court must separate reliable evidence from falsehood where this can be done without reconstructing a new prosecution case. If truth and falsehood are inseparably mixed and separation would require replacing essential features of the prosecution account, the testimony must be discarded as a whole.	360
Witness Conduct: No Uniform Reaction to a Violent Occurrence	Witnesses' reactions to a violent occurrence cannot be judged by a single uniform standard. In rejecting the contention based on the failure to telephone the police, the Court considered that several persons had been killed or injured and that different people could react differently to those circumstances.	360
Omissions in the First Report: Trauma and Corroborated Later Account	An omission or mistaken attribution in the first report must be assessed in its context and against the subsequent evidence. The Court rejected deliberate suppression of the cross-case death where the body had been moved and the informant had lost close family members. It also accepted a corrected assailant attribution only after finding support in other witnesses' evidence.	360
Partly Disputed Allegations: No Automatic Rejection of the Entire Case	The maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus does not apply as a rule requiring rejection of the whole prosecution account. A challenge to one part of the allegations does not automatically dispose of other specific allegations. The Court applied this principle to the disputed return from Australia, leaving the earlier alleged cruelty for investigation.	363
Material Contradictions	Where the witnesses gave irreconcilable accounts of the time and manner of the	372

20.3 : Contradictions, Omissions and Improvements in Criminal Testimony

About the Incident and Identification of Assailants	incident, the prosecution failed to establish its genesis. Material omissions and contradictions, together with the injured witness's inability to speak during treatment and inconsistent accounts of naming the assailants, made the alleged identification unreliable and left the charge under Section 307 IPC unproved.
Minor Discrepancies That Do Not Affect the Core of the Prosecution Case	Omissions, contradictions or discrepancies do not require rejection of the entire testimony where they do not affect its essential account. The court must separate dependable evidence from exaggeration and improvements and decide whether the remaining evidence proves guilt; minor variations in recalling details should not receive undue weight.	378
Partial Rejection of a Witness's Account and Acquittal of Co-Accused	The maxim that falsity in one matter makes the whole testimony false is not a mandatory rule in India. Acquittal of some accused does not require rejection of reliable testimony against others. The court must separate truth from falsehood, but must discard the whole account where they are inseparably mixed and accepting a portion would require reconstructing an entirely new prosecution case.	379
Normal and Material Discrepancies in Witness Testimony	Normal errors of observation, memory or reaction to a shocking event do not ordinarily destroy credibility. The court must read testimony as a whole and distinguish those variations from discrepancies affecting the core and reliability of the account. Only material incompatibilities justify rejection on that basis.	379
Minor Differences in the Description of a Shared Place of Occurrence	Evidence must be assessed as a whole rather than rejected through isolated answers. Different descriptions of adjoining platforms and doors in a family house did not establish that the prosecution had shifted the place of occurrence. The common house and kitchen, the witnesses' full accounts and blood found at the platform explained the differences. Discrepancies that do not affect the core of otherwise reliable testimony do not justify its rejection.	381
Accepting the Reliable Part of a Witness's Evidence	A witness's evidence need not be accepted or rejected in its entirety. The rule that falsity in one part invalidates the whole has no general application in India; the court must separate reliable evidence from exaggeration or untruth where that can properly be done. Differences warrant rejection only when they materially impair credibility, and the assessment must address the testimony as a whole.	381
Contradiction by a Previous Inconsistent Statement	To contradict a witness under Section 145 of the Evidence Act, attention must be drawn to the particular part of the previous statement relied upon. A mere variation is not enough: the earlier statement must materially discredit the testimony in court. The Court applied this approach while examining the alleged inconsistencies in the eyewitness accounts.	381
When a Section 161 Omission Amounts to a Contradiction	Under the Explanation to Section 162 CrPC, an omission from a statement recorded under Section 161 may amount to a contradiction only when it is significant and relevant in its context. Whether that threshold is met is a question of fact. Applying Baldev Singh, the Court held that minor or trivial omissions and differences were insufficient to discredit the otherwise accepted witness account.	388
Material omissions and doubtful opportunity to observe an assault	Claimed eyewitness testimony was unreliable where the witnesses' asserted observation was inconsistent with the distance and height of the standing crop, material parts of their accounts were absent from their police statements, and their evidence contained major inconsistencies. The omissions concerned their presence and their having witnessed the assault, rather than minor details. Considered with the surrounding evidence, these defects prevented reliance on their identification of the accused.	390
Confronting a witness with an omission in a previous written	A party seeking to contradict a witness through a previous written statement must first draw the witness's attention to the relevant part, as required by Section 145 of the Evidence Act. The defence could not use the omission of	391

statement	last-seen information from the FIR to discredit the informant when his attention had not been drawn to that omission in cross-examination.
Reading a witness's evidence as a whole	A witness's evidence must be assessed as a whole rather than rejected by isolating a stray sentence from cross-examination. The disputed statement about seeing the child at school was read with the witness's examination-in-chief, the informant's account and the school's proximity to the place of occurrence; it did not displace the accepted last-seen evidence.	391
Proving contradictions in a police statement	To contradict a witness through a statement under Section 161 CrPC, the relevant part must first be put to that witness under Section 145 of the Evidence Act and the previous statement duly proved through the investigating officer who recorded it. Without the required confrontation and proof, alleged omissions and contradictions cannot be used to impeach the testimony. The challenge here failed because the relevant testimony had not been challenged during cross-examination.	393
Assessment of testimony as a whole	A witness's evidence must be considered as a whole when assessing its reliability. The Court applied that approach alongside the requirements for proving alleged contradictions, rather than treating unproved omissions as a basis for rejecting the prosecution evidence.	393
Reading testimony in continuity and as a whole	Witness evidence must be read in its entirety; a stray sentence cannot be detached from its context to reject the account. Read with the sequence of searches and recovery, the witness's statement that he stayed at the police station did not establish that he had remained there throughout the earlier searches. The Court applied the whole-evidence approach in rejecting that challenge.	397
Trivial contradictions and the credibility of eyewitness accounts	Minor contradictions that are neither grave nor significant do not make the whole prosecution evidence unreliable. The Court found the variations concerning the appellants' roles trivial and accepted the eyewitness accounts after assessing their substance and consistency with the rest of the evidence. The conclusion depended on the immaterial nature of the discrepancies in this case.	399
Minor Variations in Individual Roles during a Large Armed Assault	In a large group attack, witnesses may differ in describing each assailant's precise role. Minor variations do not require rejection of testimony whose essential account remains credible and is supported by medical and forensic evidence. Mathematical uniformity is not expected, and normal differences in observation or reaction must be distinguished from material contradictions.	409
Omission of an Individual Role from the FIR	An FIR need state the broad occurrence and is not an exhaustive account of every role or detail. In a prompt report without indications of fabrication, omission of a specific role does not by itself require rejection of later reliable evidence. The Court applied this where the accused was named in the FIR's accused column but no separate act was assigned in its narrative.	409
Separating Reliable Evidence from False or Exaggerated Portions	The maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus is not a mandatory rule in India. Rejection of part of a witness's account, including accusations against acquitted co-accused, does not automatically destroy the remainder. The Court must separate credible truth from falsehood; if the two are inseparable and separation would require constructing an entirely new prosecution case, the evidence must be discarded as a whole.	409
Unexhibited police statements—compliance with Section 145 Evidence Act	Failure formally to mark the police statements as exhibits was treated as an irregularity where the witnesses' attention had been drawn to the omissions and they had an opportunity to explain them. The Court therefore considered those omissions and contradictions as satisfying Section 145 of the Evidence Act in this case.	410
When an omission in	An omission from a Section 161 CrPC statement amounts to a contradiction	412

a police statement amounts to contradiction	only if it is significant and relevant in its context. Whether a particular omission meets that requirement is a question of fact; every omitted detail is not a contradiction to the witness's trial evidence.
Trivial contradictions in otherwise reliable eyewitness testimony	Minor contradictions that are trivial and do not materially affect the prosecution account do not make the whole eyewitness testimony unreliable. The Court must assess their significance rather than reject consistent evidence merely because some variations exist.	433
Explanation for Omissions About Earlier Conduct in a Police Statement	Omissions about the appellant's earlier conduct did not make the injured witness unreliable where she explained that police had asked no questions on that subject. The Court accepted the explanation as bona fide, found that her account of the actual assault had not been materially undermined in cross-examination, and relied on her testimony.	451
Site-plan statements — Section 162 CrPC and proper contradiction	A site-plan mark based on a witness's statement to the investigating officer is subject to Section 162 CrPC and is not substantive proof of the narrated fact. It may be used for the permitted purpose of contradiction through the proper procedure, including drawing the witness's attention to the relevant earlier statement. The officer's own observations remain admissible as direct evidence under Section 60 of the Evidence Act. The witness-supplied firing distance in the plan could not discredit eyewitnesses when no relevant witness had been confronted with it.	474
Partly false testimony — Separation of reliable evidence against individual accused	The maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus is not a mandatory rule of evidence in India. A witness disbelieved against one accused may still supply reliable evidence against another. Courts must separate truth from falsehood and assess whether the residual testimony proves the charge. Entire rejection is necessary where the two are inseparable and accepting a part would require constructing a substantially new prosecution case.	474
Witness discrepancies — Material contradictions and ordinary variations	Ordinary errors of observation or memory, shock and minor elaboration do not necessarily impair credible testimony. Omissions or improvements that affect the core of the prosecution case may discredit it. Evidence must be read as a whole to decide whether a discrepancy changes its essential truth. Exaggerations about the number of shots did not require discarding the reliable account against Rajesh, while material improvements concerning the five other appellants contributed to their acquittal.	474
Co-accused's acquittal — Separable credible evidence may still support conviction	Acquittal of a co-accused does not require rejection of the same witnesses' entire testimony or automatic acquittal of another accused. The court must separate reliable evidence from falsehood and decide whether the remaining evidence proves that accused's guilt. It cannot reject the prosecution's essential case and construct a different one from selected fragments; where truth and falsehood are inseparable, the evidence must be discarded. The Court rejected automatic acquittal by parity, but independently found the prosecution case against this appellant unproved.	479
Witness discrepancies — Ordinary variation versus material contradiction	Normal errors of observation or memory, lapse of time, shock and incidental embellishment do not necessarily impair a witness's credibility. Material discrepancies affecting the substance of the account require a different assessment and may undermine the prosecution case. The court must identify the nature of the discrepancy rather than reject all testimony mechanically. Here, the conflicting accounts were tested against the actual condition of the register and the other evidence before guilt was found unproved.	479
Material contradictions and admissions — reasonable doubt about house trespass	Material contradictions about pursuit of the accused and recovery of his shawl must be considered with the prosecutrix's admissions bearing on the possibility of false implication. Witnesses differed on whether the appellant was caught, only his shawl was caught, or the shawl remained with the prosecutrix inside the house. She admitted that the appellant visited her home and that her husband	481

and assault	suspected her and quarrelled with her over those visits. Considering these circumstances together, the Court found that the prosecution had not proved the offences under Sections 457 and 354 IPC beyond reasonable doubt and acquitted the appellant.
Eyewitness testimony — ignorance about investigation documents	Witnesses' inability to recall documents they signed, the place of signing or the documents' contents did not undermine their direct account of the kidnapping when those matters concerned investigation and did not affect what they had witnessed. The Court accepted the independent eyewitnesses' account because their testimony about the incident remained unshaken and no enmity with them was alleged.	482
Witness discrepancies — material contradictions and assessment of testimony as a whole	Minor variations or elaborations that do not affect the core of the prosecution case do not justify rejection of witness evidence. A significant omission may amount to a contradiction under the Explanation to Section 162 CrPC, depending on its context and effect on credibility. Testimony must be considered as a whole rather than through isolated passages. At the Section 482 stage, the Court found no discrepancy going to the root of this case and declined to treat general differences in statements as a ground for quashing.	484
Section 164 CrPC recantation — effect on a quashing application	A later Section 164 CrPC statement denying the rape allegations could not automatically be preferred over the FIR and Section 161 statement to quash the prosecution. The Court held that the divergent Sections 161 and 164 statements could be used for omissions and contradictions, but the earlier prosecution account could not be ignored merely because it was not supported in the Section 164 statement. In view of the specific allegations of coercion through the professional relationship, the inconsistency did not justify quashing; the Court did not finally determine which account was true.	496
Delayed testimony — ordinary failures of memory and material contradictions	Witnesses examined long after an occurrence cannot be expected to recall every surrounding detail with mathematical exactness. Applying Jeewan, the Court treated the recorder's inability after eighteen years to remember the doctor's name and other minute details in context, particularly because the appellant's abscondence had delayed the trial. It similarly considered ordinary memory lapses in the eyewitness evidence. The adopted authorities distinguish such normal discrepancies from material contradictions that affect credibility; lapse of time does not excuse every inconsistency.	499
Partial disbelief — separating reliable testimony from falsehood	The rule that falsity in one part requires rejection of the whole testimony does not apply in India. Disbelief of a witness concerning one accused does not compel rejection concerning another. The Court must carefully separate the credible evidence from exaggeration or falsehood. If the true and false portions are inseparable and accepting the evidence would require reconstruction of a new prosecution case, the evidence must be discarded as a whole. Applying the narrated Rai Singh, Shakila Abdul Gafar Khan and Ranjit Singh principles, Babu Singh's acquittal did not automatically invalidate the evidence against this appellant.	499
Minor discrepancies and material contradictions in eyewitness evidence	Contradictions, omissions or improvements warrant scrutiny of whether they materially affect the prosecution case. Trivial variations that leave its core intact do not justify rejecting otherwise credible testimony as a whole. The evidence must be read in its entirety and the identified infirmities assessed for their effect on credibility. Here, the Court found the discrepancies minor and the witnesses consistent on material aspects, with medical corroboration.	555
Clarification of an eyewitness's account in cross-examination	An initial attribution of the fatal blow to the wrong appellant did not make the eyewitness unreliable where the defence's own cross-examination elicited a clarification identifying the appellant to whom the prosecution had attributed that blow. Reading the clarified account with the other evidence, the Court found no discrepancy undermining the witnesses' reliability.	561

20.3 : Contradictions, Omissions and Improvements in Criminal Testimony

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Proving a contradiction from a previous written statement	To contradict a witness by a previous written statement, attention must first be drawn to the specific passage relied upon. An admitted contradiction needs no further proof; if denied, the marked passage must be proved through the investigating officer. The court cannot itself use an unproved police statement as a contradiction, and the previous statement as a whole is not substantive evidence. Since Mohwati was not confronted with the relevant omission, it could not be used in the appellants' favour.	563
Witness unable to perceive the act attributed to an accused	The Court rejected a witness's assertion that an additional accused had strangulated the deceased where her own cross-examination showed that she had fallen unconscious after being pushed and reached the courtyard after the incident was over. That account did not provide a reliable basis for identifying him as a participant in the strangulation.	563
Minor differences concerning the place of occurrence	A suggested variation of a few feet in the place of occurrence does not necessarily undermine consistent eyewitness evidence when the investigating officer's site plan and the witnesses' route explain the location. The Court rejected the challenge after comparing the rough site plan with the later patwari plan and the eyewitness account.	570
Omission of individual blows from an FIR lodged during a medical emergency	An FIR lodged when the victim is critically injured need not contain the complete sequence of the assault or attribute every particular injury to an individual assailant. In the circumstances considered, omission of that detail did not undermine the otherwise established prosecution account.	570
Unexplained overwriting in a school attendance record	An explanation that an absence mark was merely rewritten for clarity may be rejected when inspection of the attendance register shows that a pre-existing mark was erased or overwritten and similar alterations appear repeatedly only against the relevant pupil. The Court considered those features with the witness's changing account when assessing whether she attended school on the day of the incident.	571
Hearsay cannot supply missing substantive evidence of identity	Witnesses who arrived after the assault and named assailants only on information from others could not supply substantive proof of the assailants' identity. In the absence of reliable substantive evidence, their hearsay accounts had no corroborative value in this case.	573
Use of a police statement requires confronting the witness	The Court could not use the mother's earlier case-diary statement about the duration of the marriage because she had not been confronted with that statement. It assessed the marriage-period issue on the admissible evidence remaining before it.	576
An unproved police-statement omission cannot be used as a contradiction	To rely on an omission or contradiction in a prior police statement, the witness's attention must be drawn to the relevant part in compliance with Section 145 of the Evidence Act. Where that was not done, the Court could not use the omission on its own to impeach the trial testimony.	577
Proof of an admitted or denied prior contradictory statement	When confronted with the relevant part of a prior written statement, a witness's admission proves that part without further proof. If the witness denies it, confrontation alone only brings the contradiction on record; the relevant passage must then be proved through the investigating officer. The deposition must record the portion put to the witness.	577
Restricted use of statements recorded under Section 161 CrPC	A statement recorded by police under Section 161 CrPC is not substantive evidence. Subject to the statutory exceptions, it may be used to contradict the prosecution witness in the prescribed manner, by the accused or by the prosecution with the Court's permission. Re-examination may use the statement only to explain the matter raised by that contradiction, including its context.	577
When an omission in a police statement amounts to	An omission may amount to a contradiction when it is significant and relevant in its context; that is a question of fact. The earlier statement and the trial assertion must be inconsistent in the material sense. A minor omission cannot	577

contradiction	be treated as a proved contradiction merely because the earlier record lacks the later detail.
A contradiction must concern the trial assertion and the earlier statement	The contradiction must be between what the witness asserts in evidence and the prior police statement. It cannot be manufactured by first eliciting an answer about what the witness says was told to police and then contrasting only that answer with the recorded statement. Section 162 CrPC does not permit that route to introduce the police account indirectly.	577
Material improvements and delayed statements concerning an oral dying declaration	A claim to have heard an oral dying declaration was unreliable where the witness's police statement said that the declarant had died before his arrival. Another witness's omission of the declaration from both earlier statements also undermined his later account. The Court further considered a third witness's statement recorded more than a year after the incident and his denial that the police had recorded it. These defects required assessment of each account rather than acceptance of the alleged declarations merely because several relatives testified.	580
Minor discrepancies and contextual assessment of witness testimony	Witness evidence must be read as a whole, without isolating sentences or demanding exact agreement on trivial details. Variations that do not affect the core of the prosecution case do not justify rejecting otherwise trustworthy testimony. The court must consider shock, memory, the circumstances of the occurrence and differing human reactions. Here, differences about who first reached the vehicle and the omission of a witness's name from an immediate police statement did not undermine the account when assessed in that context.	583
Separating credible testimony from exaggeration	Exaggeration does not require rejection of the whole testimony. The court must try to separate the reliable part and consider whether it is sufficient and corroborated where necessary. The maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus is not a general rule for rejecting criminal testimony. The whole account may be discarded where truth and falsehood are so inseparable that no reliable evidence remains.	583
Effect of minor contradictions and omissions	Contradictions and omissions that are trivial rather than significant do not justify rejecting a witness’s evidence as a whole. The Court assessed the discrepancies against the deceased’s Dehati Nalishi, her statement, the other testimony and medical evidence, and found that they did not undermine the prosecution’s essential account. This was an assessment of the combined record, rather than a rule that an omission about an assailant’s role must always be immaterial.	593
Material gaps and contradictions in proof of the assailant	The Court found the evidence unreliable in attributing the two killings to the appellant. The immediate FIR named other men; one asserted eyewitness described a blow on only one victim, several claimed eyewitnesses did not support the prosecution, and other witnesses had material contradictions and omissions. Those defects were assessed with the weapon and medical discrepancy, non-examination of the initial source of information and absence of motive. Their combined effect defeated the prosecution case; the judgment did not treat every inconsistency or hostile witness as independently decisive.	599
Delayed further cross-examination — an implausible later retreat may be rejected on the whole evidence	A later answer in further cross-examination need not displace an earlier reliable deposition when the whole evidence shows an attempt to retreat from it. The recalled witness's assertion of a thirty-foot firing distance, made more than three years after his original examination and cross-examination, was rejected because the shooting consistently occurred inside an eight-foot shop, with blood found there and close-range medical findings. The isolated later answer therefore did not establish a fatal conflict between ocular and medical evidence.	638
Minor testimonial discrepancies — only defects affecting	Omissions, contradictions or improvements do not require rejection of the whole testimony where they are minor and do not shake the basic prosecution account. The court must use care and caution to separate reliable evidence from	638

the core account justify rejecting reliable residual evidence	untruth, exaggeration and improvements, and assess whether the remaining evidence is sufficient to convict.
Immaterial contradictions and omissions in prosecution testimony	Contradictions and omissions that are not material to the prosecution case do not by themselves defeat it. The Court examined the objection to discrepancies in the witnesses' accounts and found them immaterial and not fatal to the proof accepted against the appellants.	648
Normal discrepancies distinguished from material contradictions	The Kishanpal passage reproduced by the Court distinguishes ordinary discrepancies caused by errors of observation, lapse of memory, shock or horror from material discrepancies that undermine credibility. Normal variations may occur even in truthful testimony; material inconsistencies require a different assessment. The Court must identify the nature and significance of the discrepancy rather than reject evidence mechanically. This distinction formed part of the credibility principles used when closely scrutinising the related eyewitness and comparing her account with independent testimony.	675
Material admissions in cross-examination can undermine a witness even if FIR omissions were not formally proved	Dev Singh said in chief he found Premnarayan dead outside on waking, yet in cross-examination said he walked to the well, learned of the death from Komal and previously knew nothing. The Court did not use his unproved FIR-to-deposition variations as contradictions, since counsel had not drawn his attention to the FIR, but held his own sworn admissions independently irreconcilable with his claimed immediate observation. With cots at the house and the body reportedly in a pool of blood, the changed account made the sole incriminating witness unreliable. This is a case-specific assessment of material inconsistency rather than permission to rely on an unproved police statement.	677
Minor improvements and omissions — effect on the core eyewitness account	Only material omissions or contradictions that undermine credibility justify rejecting the central prosecution account. Applying Shyamlal Ghosh and Menoka Malik, the Court treated later weapon attributions as improvements but found that the appellants' presence and participation were otherwise established. It also accepted the accounts of witnesses who observed from a distance although the injured had not named them as eyewitnesses in the FIR. Their presence among those accompanying him to the police station supported their account. The description of the incident as near the well rather than in the field was minor because the well was in that field.	678
Delayed Section 161 examination does not by itself defeat testimony when the investigating officer was not asked to explain it	The Court considered V.K. Mishra v. State of Uttarakhand, Ganeshlal v. State of Maharashtra and Banti v. State of M.P. for the contextual treatment of delayed witness examination. Pista's police statement was recorded weeks after the event, but the defence did not put the delay to the investigating officer; no universal rule makes such a statement unreliable. Her in-court account was tested against the FIR, dying declaration and other evidence, and the Court declined to discard it solely for delay. The authorities do not immunise a genuinely unexplained, prejudicial delay in every case.	678
Partial disbelief does not require rejection of separable credible evidence	The rule that falsity in one part destroys all testimony is not a mandatory rule of Indian evidence. Applying Shakila Abdul Gafar Khan and Menoka Malik, the Court required careful separation of credible truth from exaggeration. Where the two cannot be separated without reconstructing an entirely new prosecution case, the evidence must be rejected as a whole. Here, the witnesses' failure to support accusations against three acquitted persons did not make their entire account unreliable. The evidence implicating the remaining appellants was separately assessed and accepted.	678
Witness testimony — whole deposition and material contradictions	A witness's evidence must be read cumulatively and in context. Trustworthy testimony should not be discarded by isolating a line or an immaterial variation; only material or serious contradictions impairing reliability are consequential.	682

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	The Court resolved the seizure witness's confusion over the accused's name from his opening identification and the absence of confrontation, and rejected an isolated statement about the date of learning of the death when read against the record as a whole.
Witness testimony — isolated name discrepancy and overall reliability	Evidence must be read as a whole rather than rejected because of an isolated line. Only material or serious contradictions affecting reliability are consequential. Applying that approach, the Court rejected the objection based on the officer's use of a different name for the truck driver when the whole testimony and surrounding evidence identified the driver and the truck involved.	683
Partial disbelief of witnesses and acquittal of a co-accused	The rule that falsity in one part makes all testimony false does not apply as a mandatory rule in India. Courts must separate reliable evidence from exaggeration or deficiency; a co-accused's acquittal does not require rejection of separable evidence proving another accused's guilt. If truth and falsehood cannot be separated without reconstructing an entirely new prosecution case, the evidence must be discarded. Normal discrepancies do not necessarily impair credibility, but material discrepancies do, and unresolved reasonable doubt benefits the accused.	693
Delay in recording statements under Section 161 CrPC	Delay in examining a witness does not automatically make the prosecution version suspect. Its explanation and the reliability of the testimony must be assessed; unexplained delay may create suspicion. The investigating officer must be specifically asked to explain the delay before the defence seeks advantage from it. Here no such question was put, two injured witnesses explained their later return to the village, other material witnesses were examined the next day, and the Court rejected delay alone as a reason to disbelieve the evidence.	698
Delay in recording statements under Section 161 CrPC	Delay in examining a witness does not automatically make the prosecution version suspect. Its explanation and the reliability of the testimony must be assessed; unexplained delay may create suspicion. The investigating officer must be specifically asked to explain the delay before the defence seeks advantage from it. Here no such question was put, two injured witnesses explained their later return to the village, other material witnesses were examined the next day, and the Court rejected delay alone as a reason to disbelieve the evidence.	699
Minor omissions in a traumatised eyewitness's account	Whether contradictions and omissions are material must be assessed in the circumstances in which the witness experienced and described the occurrence. The suddenness of an incident, the witness's limited education and the trauma of seeing her son killed were relevant to assessing the omissions here. With her account otherwise reliable and medically supported, those non-material discrepancies did not undermine the prosecution case.	700
Minor omissions in a traumatised eyewitness's account	Whether contradictions and omissions are material must be assessed in the circumstances in which the witness experienced and described the occurrence. The suddenness of an incident, the witness's limited education and the trauma of seeing her son killed were relevant to assessing the omissions here. With her account otherwise reliable and medically supported, those non-material discrepancies did not undermine the prosecution case.	701
Fear explaining omission of individual overt acts from the FIR	An FIR need not contain every detail of the occurrence. The informant's mental shock and fear must be considered when assessing omissions. The Court accepted Datar Singh's explanation that he was frightened by the killing and therefore had not detailed each blow in the first report; the later specific accounts against the four weapon-users were assessed with the medical evidence.	713
Confrontation with a	Drawing Ram Singh's attention in cross-examination to the vital omission from	716

police-statement omission under Section 145	his police statement satisfied Section 145 of the Evidence Act, although the statement had not been given a defence exhibit mark. The Court treated his new account of being escorted into the forest as an improvement. Mangilal had not been confronted with his corresponding omission, so that omission could not be treated as his proved contradiction, though his account remained open to assessment against the other evidence.
Prior-statement contradiction affecting some eyewitnesses only	The complainant's earlier Section 200 CrPC statement placed his wife and son at the scene only on the following morning. The material contradiction with their later claim to have witnessed the night incident led the Court to reject their eyewitness accounts. The two guests named as present in the earlier statement consistently supported the complainant and withstood cross-examination, so their evidence remained reliable.	717
Minor discrepancies and assessment of testimony as a whole	Minor contradictions, omissions or improvements on trivial matters do not justify rejecting otherwise credible testimony when they do not affect the core prosecution case. The evidence must be read as a whole and the alleged deficiencies examined for their actual effect on credibility. The inconsistencies concerning the injured person's consciousness did not undermine the material account of the assault.	720
Night-time identification — darkness and contradictory accounts defeat the alleged fleeing-accused link	The Court rejected the claim that family witnesses had seen the appellant fleeing after the assault. Banwari admitted that he could not identify the person in the darkness and had named nobody in the FIR or his police statement. Kamleshbai acknowledged that the injuries became visible only after a chimney was lit. Guddya's account of identifying the appellant and informing his elder brother was contradicted by Shivraj, who had been told only that somebody had assaulted their father. Reading these accounts together, the Court found the alleged identification untrustworthy and held that the prosecution had not proved this circumstance against the appellant.	747
Witness credibility — examination-in-chief must be tested against cross-examination	A trial court must assess a witness's credibility and reliability by testing the examination-in-chief against the answers elicited in cross-examination. The Court criticised the trial court for ignoring material admissions and disposing of the issue in a formulaic statement that nothing had emerged to make the witnesses unreliable. Cross-examination is the defence's means of dislodging the prosecution account, and personal liberty cannot be curtailed on such a bare assurance. Here, the ignored admissions concerned inability to identify in darkness, omissions in the first account and inconsistencies about disclosure of the assailant's identity; they materially undermined the prosecution's asserted identification.	747
Claimed eyewitness presence contradicted by admissions, conduct and material omissions	A claimed eyewitness account was rejected where the witness's own admissions or the other evidence showed that he arrived after the firing, or where his presence was doubtful in light of his conduct and material omissions or contradictions. On that assessment, only the two injured witnesses were found to have witnessed the shooting; witnesses who arrived after hearing cries or gunfire could not establish who fired the fatal shot.	753
Claimed eyewitness presence tested against admissions, conduct and material omissions	Witnesses who arrived after hearing gunfire or cries did not reliably establish that they had seen the fatal shooting. The Court assessed their claimed presence against their own admissions, conduct and material omissions or contradictions. One witness's doubtful presence and material improvements, and others' admissions that they reached after the shot or did not see the assault, led the Court to reject their claimed eyewitness accounts. Only the two injured witnesses were found to have witnessed the firing.	754
Minor discrepancies in a shooting lasting only seconds	Where two persons fire at the same victim in an incident lasting only seconds, precise attribution of each wound to a particular gun and shot sequence cannot be assumed. The Court therefore rejected the objection based on inability to	772

	allocate the injuries between the shooters. It also held the contradictions and omissions concerning the brief occurrence nonfatal on this record, having accepted the eyewitness account with medical support and the evidence of the investigating officer and memorandum and seizure witnesses.
Case-diary allegations absent from testimony are not substantive evidence	A case-diary statement is not substantive evidence. The Court considered Ex. D-1 in the context of Section 145 of the Evidence Act to assess contradictions or improvements. The State could not rely against the accused on allegations of earlier intercourse appearing only in that statement and absent from the prosecutrix's evidence in Court. Those allegations therefore could not establish the State's suggested earlier statutory rape.	776
Failure to name the assailant to the treating doctor	Failure to disclose the assailant's name to a treating doctor does not by itself establish that a later named report was ante-timed, ante-dated or falsely implicates the accused. Applying Bhargavan v. State of Kerala and Pattipati Venkaiah v. State of Andhra Pradesh, the Court explained that the doctor's primary duty is treatment, rather than identifying who caused the injury.	782
Minor variation in the genesis of an assault	The difference between an initial report that the accused offered liquor and testimony that he demanded money for liquor was not material where both accounts attributed the shooting to refusal over liquor. The Court allowed for a minor deviation in recollection after a chest gunshot injury and accepted the injured man's identification as the solitary eyewitness, supported as to the injury by medical evidence.	782
Defence eyewitness—unstable account contradicted by unchallenged testimony	The defence eyewitness's account of unidentified assailants was rejected because her court testimony was inconsistent with her police account and shifted during cross-examination. A prosecution witness's account that she had spoken to the appellant during the assault was not challenged. Taken together, these features deprived her version of credibility; the Court assessed her evidence rather than rejecting it merely because she appeared for the defence.	817
Eyewitness credibility after admitting arrival after the occurrence	A witness who admitted that he reached the scene only after hearing noise and found the deceased already lying there was not accepted as an eyewitness merely because he subsequently changed his version and claimed to have seen the incident. That material reversal led the Court to reject his account as unreliable. The assessment concerned the particular testimony of the witness, who was twelve at the time of the incident.	834
Material improvements distinguished from minor discrepancies in witness testimony	Minor contradictions or omissions on trivial matters do not justify rejecting otherwise credible testimony when they leave the prosecution's essential case intact. The evidence must be read as a whole and the identified infirmities assessed for their effect on credibility; an appellate court ordinarily needs justifiable reasons to reopen the trial court's credibility assessment. Applying these principles, the Court accepted the other last-seen witnesses despite peripheral discrepancies, but rejected one witness's claimed sighting because that material fact was absent from his police statement. The officers' differing accounts of the report's submission were also discounted in light of the FIR exhibit and the lapse of time.	850
Material omissions in a prompt FIR and later attribution of a firearm role	Although an FIR need not contain every detail, a material omission that undermines the prosecution's substantive account cannot be treated as a minor discrepancy. Applying Yogesh Singh and Tomaso Bruno, the Court distinguished harmless variations from contradictions affecting credibility at its core. The prompt, detailed Dehati Nalishi named three gunmen but attributed no firearm, shot or participation during firing to Kaushlendra. His later alleged shooting role, coupled with inconsistent accounts of whom he injured, was therefore a material improvement. The adverse conclusion rested on these omissions and contradictions, rather than delay alone in recording injured witnesses' statements.	916

20.3 : Contradictions, Omissions and Improvements in Criminal Testimony

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Suppression of the incident's origin and material changes in eyewitness accounts	Material changes about how an incident began and who committed the shooting can undermine the claimed eyewitness account. Here witnesses denied a fireworks dispute despite earlier police and complaint statements and letters describing it, gave incompatible versions of the first shot, and claimed to have identified the assailant to an informant who had lodged an FIR against unknown persons. Their absence from contemporaneous police proceedings and other contradictions also undermined the asserted opportunity to witness the attack. These defects concerned the origin and identification of the incident, rather than minor memory lapses after four years. The Court found the claimed eyewitnesses unreliable.	919
Minor discrepancies in preparations for a search	Minor omissions or contradictions that do not affect the investigation's outcome should not receive undue weight. Differing accounts of whether the weighing machine was procured before or after the messenger returned from the superior officer's office concerned raid preparations and did not undermine recovery. The contemporaneous station-diary entry supported the recorded sequence and was not displaced by minor variations in oral recollection.	935
Minor variations in descriptions of the place of occurrence	Normal errors of observation or recollection and minor variations that do not affect the core prosecution case do not justify rejection of otherwise reliable testimony. Material omissions or improvements going to the root require a different assessment. The witnesses' references to neighbouring houses and the nearby junction did not establish conflicting scenes: the spot map and the Patwari's unchallenged evidence showed that the houses adjoined one another.	936
Delayed recording of statements of eyewitnesses already named in the FIR	Delay in recording a police statement does not automatically make a witness unreliable; its significance depends on whether it indicates unfair introduction of a false witness. Here the three witnesses whose statements were recorded after twenty-five days were already named in the prompt FIR, and one injured witness was medically examined on police requisition that day. No question seeking an explanation for the delay was put to the investigating officer. In those circumstances, the delay did not discredit their testimony.	936
Material omissions and improvements affecting witness credibility	Under the Explanation to Section 162 CrPC, an omission may amount to a contradiction when it is significant and relevant in its context; that assessment is a question of fact. Improvements creating serious doubt about a witness's truthfulness may discredit the testimony. Ordinary errors of observation or memory and minor variations that do not affect the prosecution case's core do not justify rejecting the evidence in its entirety. The omissions concerning the alleged poisoning, prior kerosene incident, return of the deceased and transport to hospital were material to the incriminating account.	942
Assessment of examination-in-chief in light of cross-examination	A trial court must test prosecution evidence against cross-examination rather than accept examination-in-chief without scrutiny. Admissions and material contradictions elicited in cross-examination require due weight. If the Court considers a contradiction immaterial, it should explain that assessment; it cannot properly decide the trial by ignoring cross-examination.	942
Witness's statement must be read in its full context	An admission that the injured person was lying on the ground when a witness reached the spot did not contradict the witness's account of seeing the assault while approaching. The Court read the admission with the witness's earlier account and recognised the distinction between observing an occurrence from a distance and physically reaching the scene. The isolated answer did not justify concluding that the witness saw no part of the incident.	947
Explained delay in recording a corroborating eyewitness's statement	Delay in recording a Section 161 CrPC statement is not automatically fatal. The Court must examine the circumstances, the witness's availability, the information available to the investigator, and the explanation; the officer should be asked specifically about delay and its reasons. Here the witness explained that fear led him to leave for his aunt's house and then Raipur. His presence	949

	was not seriously disputed in cross-examination, and his account corroborated the injured eyewitness. The Court accepted his explanation for the two to two-and-a-half month delay and found the evidence credible.
Later cross-examination consistent with an earlier admission cannot be discarded as a changed account	A witness's later cross-examination cannot be disregarded as an attempt to retract the examination-in-chief merely because it occurred after an adjournment. The abductee had already admitted during cross-examination on the day of his examination-in-chief that he learnt the appellants' names only after they were shown to him at the police station. His later answers were consistent with that admission. Reading both parts together, the Court rejected the State's contention that the witness had been won over and distinguished Khujji, which concerned a subsequent change in the witness's account of identification.	950
Material improvements adding participation and instigation in a murder prosecution	Minor discrepancies that do not affect the core of a prosecution case do not justify rejecting the evidence. An unexplained omission becomes material when the later account adds participation essential to an accused's criminal liability and creates serious doubt about the witness's truthfulness. Applying S. Govindaraju and Yogesh Singh, the Court found that the trial allegations that Banti pushed the deceased, was sent to call his brothers with guns, returned with them and instigated the killing were major improvements over the FIR and police statements. The altered account of Khemraj's earlier presence also undermined the role attributed to him. The consistent allegation of Pawan's fatal shot remained separately assessable.	951
An eyewitness's omission from the FIR does not by itself discredit the testimony	An FIR need not name every eyewitness, and omission of a witness's name does not by itself make that witness's testimony suspect or require its rejection. Applying State of M.P. v. Mansingh, Pramod Mahto and Nirpal Singh as reproduced in the judgment, the Court rejected the objection to Rishabh's testimony founded only on the absence of his name from the FIR. His evidence remained subject to assessment on its own reliability.	951
Minor discrepancies and material contradictions in eyewitness testimony	Minor discrepancies, ordinary errors of observation or memory, and trivial embellishments do not justify rejecting otherwise trustworthy evidence. A contradiction or omission is material when it affects the core of the prosecution case and creates serious doubt about the witness's credibility. The witnesses remained consistent on the appellant's knife assault despite minor variations.	971
Nonmaterial contradictions and omissions in eyewitness testimony	Contradictions and omissions must be assessed for their effect on the prosecution's core account. The Court found the identified differences nonmaterial where the injured witnesses consistently established the collective assault and their account was supported by medical evidence. Those differences did not justify rejecting the prosecution case.	987
Material improvements affecting the feasibility of a witness's account	Changes in the witnesses' account of when they left home, whether they returned to the village, and how they followed a blood trail materially affected the asserted observation of the accused disposing of the body. In admitted darkness, those changes bore directly on visibility and the sequence of events. The Court treated them as material contradictions undermining the confession and body-disposal account.	988
Eyewitness names omitted from a hastily lodged FIR	An FIR need only state the broad prosecution case; omission of an eyewitness's name does not by itself justify rejecting the testimony or doubting the witness's presence. Applying V.K. Mishra and Kunwarpal, the Court considered that the report was made in haste while the victim was critically injured and required urgent attention. It therefore declined to discard the wife's and her brother's evidence merely because the FIR did not name them. Their presence and reliability remained matters for assessment on the evidence.	993

	Sub-Chapter no. 20.4 Police, Official and Seizure Witnesses
Official document — witness's description tested against its actual contents	The Court was not bound by an official witness's statement that a measurement book contained measurements when inspection of the book showed otherwise. Article B repeated the estimate and bore a general satisfaction stamp, but contained no actual measurements or sufficient description of the hand pump and platform. The Court assessed the document with the spot panchnama and the entire file rather than accepting the witness's unsupported description.	17
Proof of recovery despite hostile seizure witnesses	Recovery evidence need not be rejected merely because the seizure witnesses do not support the prosecution, if the investigating officer's evidence of recovery is convincing. Here, the arrest, memorandum and seizure records supported the officer's account, and the forensic report corroborated use of the recovered firearm in the incident. The Court therefore accepted the recovery evidence despite the hostile witnesses and the objection that fingerprints had not been collected.	90
Assessment of police witnesses to an alleged recovery	A witness's testimony cannot be discarded merely because the witness is a police officer, but it must be assessed cautiously. Here, inconsistencies concerning the recovery, the persons present and the source of the articles made the police seizure witness's evidence unreliable.	157
Proof of seizure through reliable police testimony	A seizure may be proved through the investigating officer even when an attesting witness turns hostile and another is not examined. Police testimony is not rejected merely because of official status or absence of independent corroboration; it must be carefully assessed for reliability and infirmities. The Court accepted the officer's evidence of Kamal Kishore's disclosure and recovery because no discrepancy making those steps unreliable was shown.	183
Noncorroboration by seizure witnesses is not necessarily fatal when official evidence proves recovery	The failure of the arrest and seizure witnesses to corroborate the prosecution did not by itself defeat the case. The Court accepted the investigating officers' proof of the arrest and seizure, including recovery of a .315-bore country-made pistol and a live round from Jhabbu, while also relying on the trustworthy eyewitness evidence of the shooting.	259
Police testimony where independent seizure witnesses turn hostile	Prosecution witnesses cannot be disbelieved merely because they are police personnel. The hostility of independent seizure witnesses does not, by itself, require rejection of the police evidence. The Court sustained the concurrent findings after considering the seized material and the forensic report.	261
Assessment of police testimony	Police testimony cannot be discarded merely because the witness belongs to the investigating or prosecuting agency. It must be strictly scrutinised and, as far as possible, corroboration on material particulars should be sought. There is no prohibition against acting on reliable evidence from a police officer.	275
Hostile independent seizure witness — proof through police personnel	An independent seizure witness turning hostile does not by itself prevent the prosecution from proving seizure through police personnel. The Court accepted that the police witness's evidence about no recovery at formal arrest was consistent with the documentary record of an earlier seizure.	312
Hostile independent witnesses and proof through police testimony	Police testimony cannot be rejected solely because the witnesses are police officers or independent witnesses have turned hostile. Reliable official evidence may support conviction without mandatory independent corroboration, subject to careful scrutiny. Applying Yakub Abdul Razak Memon, Govindaraju, Rohitash Kumar, Mukesh Singh and Tahir, the Court rejected the categorical objection to police evidence. It found the seizure from the bag proved, with the FSL report identifying ganja. The rule requires an assessment of reliability and does not make every official account acceptable.	327
Hostile Seizure Witnesses:	The evidence of a witness treated as hostile is not erased from the record.	360

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Dependable Evidence May Be Used	Admissible portions found dependable on careful scrutiny may be used by either the prosecution or the defence. In accepting the firearm recovery, the Court considered the attesting witnesses' admission of their signatures and failure to explain them, together with the officer's evidence and the armorer's report.
Police Testimony: Absence of Independent Corroboration	Police testimony cannot be rejected merely because the witness investigated the case or independent witnesses do not corroborate him. It must be scrutinised in the same manner as other testimony, with corroboration on material particulars sought where possible. There is no inflexible requirement of independent corroboration before such evidence can be accepted.	360
Police Evidence of Seizure When Independent Witnesses Turn Hostile	An investigating officer's evidence cannot be rejected merely because the officer belongs to the police or independent seizure witnesses have turned hostile. It requires careful scrutiny, and corroboration on material particulars should be sought where possible. Where the officer's account remained acceptable and no reason for unreliability was shown, the firearms seizure could be proved through that evidence.	379
Villagers accompanying a missing-child search and the pocket-witness allegation	Residents who accompanied police to several places while searching for a missing child did not become police pocket witnesses merely because they attested the successive search memoranda. The accusation was unsupported by evidence of their participation as police witnesses in other cases, and neither witness had been questioned on that point. Their conduct was assessed in the context of the joint search.	397
Proof of firearm seizure despite a non-supporting seizure witness	Although the seizure witness did not support the seizure of firearms and the motorcycle from Indal, the investigating officer proved the seizure memo and described the licensed double-barrel gun, ammunition and motorcycle recovered from the specified house. The Court relied on that testimony with the accepted eyewitness and medical evidence in sustaining the prosecution case. The non-supporting seizure witness did not, on this record, invalidate the recovery evidence.	399
Recovery proved by official witnesses despite hostile seizure witnesses	A firearm recovery may be accepted despite two seizure witnesses turning hostile where the investigating and police witnesses credibly prove the recovery and the hostile witnesses admit signing the seizure memorandum. On the evidence examined here, the hostile stance did not provide a basis to reject the otherwise supported seizure.	433
Presence of a police relative during investigative proceedings	The presence during investigative proceedings of a police officer related to the deceased or prosecution witnesses does not, by itself, vitiate the investigation or cast doubt on the prosecution case. The allegation of improper influence must be assessed against the evidence about who conducted the proceedings and whether the witnesses were acting at that officer's direction.	433
Police recovery witnesses: credibility and independent corroboration	An investigating officer's evidence of recovery cannot be rejected merely because he is a police officer or independent seizure witnesses have turned hostile. Independent attestation of the recovery record is not invariably required, and corroboration of police evidence is a matter of prudence rather than an inflexible rule. Police records are not presumed untrustworthy at the outset; the accused may expose unreliability through cross-examination or other material. Greater care is required where independent support is absent, and reasons to doubt the record remain relevant. A panch witness's relationship to a police employee does not by itself disqualify him. These principles permitted scrutiny of the officer's account here, but did not cure his failure to prove the disclosure leading to recovery.	552
Reliance on police seizure witnesses despite hostile	Police testimony is not unworthy of acceptance merely because the witness belongs to the police force or participated in the investigation. Independent corroboration is not invariably required. The evidence must be carefully	574

independent witnesses	scrutinised for truthfulness and trustworthiness, and reliable police evidence may support conviction even when independent seizure witnesses turn hostile.
Police witnesses and absence of independent corroboration of seizure	Police testimony is not unreliable merely because the witnesses are officials involved in the investigation or seek its success. Their evidence requires careful scrutiny and independent appraisal for truthfulness and trustworthiness; independent corroboration is not an inflexible legal requirement. The independent seizure witness's hostility therefore did not prevent conviction on the accepted police evidence of the search and recovery.	587
Police recovery witnesses — independent corroboration is not invariably required	Police personnel involved in recovery are to be assessed like other witnesses. The Karamjit Singh passage reproduced through Goverdhan rejects a rule that their testimony cannot be relied upon without independent corroboration. Police status alone is not a ground for distrust; reliability depends on the facts and circumstances. Applying the quoted reasoning, the Court rejected the contention that the hostility of seizure witnesses necessarily meant that seizure could not be proved, while separately holding that failure to link the actual weapon was not fatal to the otherwise proved case.	675
Unexplained alterations to arrest and seizure records — prosecution must remove doubt	The Court found material inconsistency between testimony that police arrived and arrested the appellant at about 8 a.m. and the altered times recorded in the arrest, disclosure and seizure documents. The seizure memo also contained overwritten timing without the investigating officer’s initials. Read with the testimony that police left within two hours, these defects supported the finding that the documents were prepared at the police station rather than the scene. Although the officer had not been confronted with the obvious overwriting, the prosecution still had to remove the doubts and prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	677
Police testimony — reliability and independent corroboration	Evidence cannot be rejected merely because the witness is a police officer or is interested in the investigation’s success. It requires careful scrutiny for truthfulness and reliability, but independent corroboration is not an invariable legal requirement. Trustworthy police testimony can support conviction; the officer’s official status alone does not impair credibility.	682
Recovery evidence — hostile seizure witnesses and reliable police testimony	The hostility of independent seizure witnesses does not by itself require rejection of the investigating officer’s evidence. Police testimony must be assessed on its own merits, without an initial presumption of distrust merely because of official status. Where independent support is absent, greater care and corroboration may be appropriate as a matter of prudence, but reliable police evidence may be accepted without it. Here the admitted signatures, the accused’s admission of tenancy, the recovery from his rented room and identification of the laptops by serial numbers supported the recovery.	905
Proof of seizure through trustworthy police witnesses	Police employment alone is no reason to reject a witness or demand independent corroboration. Police testimony must be assessed for truthfulness and trustworthiness, with careful scrutiny where required. Applying Girja Prasad, the Court accepted the officers’ in-court identification of the chain and Rudraksh mala they had seized, although the civilian seizure witnesses had not been asked to identify those objects in court. This proved the seizures; whether the articles belonged to the deceased required separate proof.	934
Credibility of Raksha Samiti members and police seizure witnesses	Membership of a Raksha Samiti, frequent visits to the police station and receipt of an honorarium did not by themselves make its member a police pocket witness or establish an interest in conviction. Her statutory duties included crime prevention and assistance to the police. Police testimony likewise cannot be rejected solely because of official status or absence of independent corroboration. It may support conviction when careful scrutiny establishes reliability and trustworthiness; demonstrated overzealousness leading to implication of innocent persons would undermine credibility.	935

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Close scrutiny of a sole police searching witness	A police witness is not disqualified by official status, and the quality of evidence matters more than the number of witnesses. Here both independent search witnesses turned hostile, while no other member of the raiding party was examined. The searching officer's account required close scrutiny in light of the admitted weak vision, uncertain house and plot linkage and the Patwari's contrary evidence. On this record, corroboration from other raiding members was necessary, and the officer's uncorroborated account was found unreliable.	939
	Sub-Chapter no. 20.5 Hostile Witnesses and Use of Partly Supportive Evidence
Hostile witness — reliance on a supported part of the account	A witness's hostile stance does not prevent reliance on the part of the testimony that supports the prosecution and is found reliable. Although the injured witness did not support the full case, the Court used his admission that the principal accused came out with the gun and fired shots, while assessing the remaining evidence independently.	12
Reliance on the dependable part of a hostile witness's evidence	A prosecution witness's evidence is not erased from the record merely because the witness is treated as hostile and cross-examined by the prosecution. After careful scrutiny, the Court may rely on the part found dependable and supportive of the prosecution. Here, the witness's admission that the jeep was stopped at the barrier remained usable for that limited purpose.	32
Complainant's failure to support the prosecution: proof through other evidence	The complainant's failure to support the prosecution did not by itself defeat the case where other reliable evidence established the charge. The Court relied on the last-seen witnesses, supporting accounts and corroborating police and medical evidence, and found the circumstantial chain proved beyond reasonable doubt despite the complainant's stance.	45
Hostile prosecutrix — possibility of conviction on independent evidence	A prosecutrix turning hostile does not necessarily make conviction impossible. Applying Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi, the Court held that scientific and other circumstantial evidence may still establish the offence. The prediction that settlement would cause the prosecutrix not to support the case therefore did not establish that continuation of the trial would be futile.	58
Witness retracting a last-seen account in cross-examination — effect of failure to declare the witness hostile	Where prosecution witnesses withdrew their last-seen accounts in cross-examination, one saying that she had not seen the appellant and another expressly accepting that her earlier account was false, the Court held that their evidence did not establish that circumstance. It observed that the prosecutor should have declared them hostile but had not done so.	70
Acceptance of the reliable part of a witness's evidence	A witness's evidence may be accepted in part and rejected in part. The principle that falsity in one part makes the whole testimony false has no general application. Here, failure to prove the rape allegation did not require rejection of the child's consistent account of neck compression, which was also recorded in the FIR and sustained the conviction for hurt.	91
Reliance on dependable portions of a hostile witness's evidence	A witness's evidence is not erased merely because the prosecution treats the witness as hostile and cross-examines the witness. After close scrutiny, admissible and dependable portions supported by the other evidence may be used by either the prosecution or the defence. The Court relied on the supported portion of the hostile witness's account concerning the husband's absence.	122
Hostile independent witnesses do not necessarily defeat otherwise reliable proof	Some independent witnesses turning hostile did not defeat the prosecution where the injured witnesses gave reliable accounts and the defence evidence itself supported the occurrence. The Court assessed the remaining evidence as a whole and found guilt proved beyond reasonable doubt.	206
Reliance on the supported part of a hostile witness's	The Court relied on the hostile vendor's evidence to the extent that it supported the sale transaction and delivery of the mutation application to the Patwari. It did not accept his loan-transaction account merely because he described it in	252

testimony	court; that account had not been given to the police, and the alleged loan remained unproved on the evidence as a whole.
Reliance on the supporting part of partly hostile testimony	The Court relied on the part of a partly hostile witness's testimony confirming that the deceased and eyewitnesses travelled together and left the tractor shortly before the occurrence. His denial of witnessing the assault did not prevent reliance on that supporting part alongside the accepted eyewitness accounts.	274
Hostile seizure witness's admission supporting recovery	A seizure witness who initially denied recovery admitted during the prosecutor's cross-examination that the accused's pant and T-shirt had been seized and that the memorandum was recorded. The Court considered that admission with the other seizure witness and investigating officer and held the recovery proved despite the witness's initial hostility.	278
Reliance on a supported part of a hostile witness's evidence	The Court relied on the child witness's statement that the accused and deceased were together and quarreling on the roof, although she was declared hostile after saying the deceased jumped. That part of her evidence was considered with the neighbour's account and medical evidence; her hostile status did not prevent reliance on the supported account of presence and quarrel.	294
Supported testimony of a witness hostile on an alleged confession	A witness's failure to support an alleged extra-judicial confession does not erase a separately supported part of the witness's evidence. Although Manju Bai was declared hostile on the confession, she repeatedly confirmed that the appellant was at home with the infant when she left. Her contemporaneous report supported that account. The Court relied on the evidence of the child's company with the appellant without treating the unproved confession as established.	297
Hostile witness — use of credible portions of testimony	Declaring a witness hostile does not erase the testimony from the record. Credible portions supporting the prosecution may be relied upon when corroborated by other reliable evidence, including answers given during cross-examination permitted under Section 154 of the Evidence Act. The quality of the evidence, rather than the number of witnesses, governs its value.	313
Hostile prosecutrix — Conviction may rest on independent scientific and circumstantial evidence	A prosecutrix turning hostile does not by itself make conviction impossible. Reliable scientific and other circumstantial evidence may still establish the offence and connect the accused with it. The prospect that marriage would lead the prosecutrix to withdraw support therefore did not justify quashing on the assumption that a trial could never end in conviction. Samples had been sent for DNA testing in this case, but the judgment recorded no result proving parentage or guilt.	354
Reliance on Dependable Portions of a Hostile Witness's Evidence	A witness's testimony is not erased merely because the prosecution treats the witness as hostile. The evidence must be considered as a whole and scrutinised cautiously; admissible portions found dependable may support either the prosecution or the defence, with corroboration ordinarily sought. The companion's account of the journey, finding the injured person and taking him to hospital remained usable although he did not support the assault account.	378
Hostile Witnesses and Absence of Independent Corroboration	The failure of several witnesses to support the prosecution did not displace material testimony that remained reliable and was corroborated by medical evidence. The injured informant also did not support the case fully, so his entire account was not treated as uniformly consistent. Applying Guru Dutt Pathak, the Court held that the quality of the evidence, rather than the number of witnesses, governed; failure to examine an independent witness or an additional injured witness was not fatal on the evidence accepted here.	383
Section 154 Leave During Cross-Examination or Re-Examination	The discretion under Section 154 Evidence Act is not confined to examination-in-chief; it may be exercised when adverse answers emerge in cross-examination or at re-examination. Where the party is permitted to challenge its own witness later, the accused must have an opportunity to cross-examine on	389

	the new answers. In this case the prosecution did not seek such leave on the seizure witness's favourable admission, and the Court declined its request to disregard that answer merely because he had not witnessed the asserted earlier seizure.
Unfavourable Truthful Evidence Is Not by Itself Hostility	Leave to cross-examine one's own witness requires a judicial exercise of discretion. A truthful answer unfavourable to the calling party does not by itself justify treating the witness as hostile; the court must consider indications such as hostility, untruthfulness or a material departure from the earlier account. The R.K. Dey passage reproduced and applied by the Court requires that distinction, rather than permission being granted simply because the evidence assists the accused.	389
Reliance on corroborated portions of a hostile complainant's evidence	A witness's hostility does not erase the testimony. Admissible portions supporting either side may be relied on after close scrutiny and corroboration by reliable evidence; hostility alone does not create reasonable doubt. The Court accepted the complainant's voluntary signatures on the complaints, transcript, trap records and sealed articles, and his admitted visits and participation, as corroborated by panch and trap witnesses. It rejected the unidentified intermediary explanation in light of the contradictions and the evidence as a whole.	441
Separating trustworthy evidence from falsehood without reconstructing the prosecution case	A court should separate credible evidence from exaggeration or falsehood where they are separable. It cannot use that approach if doing so would require reconstructing a new prosecution case by removing essential details from their context. Minor discrepancies that do not affect the basic prosecution version need not lead to rejection of otherwise trustworthy testimony. The Court adopted these cautions when retaining the corroborated portions of the hostile complainant's evidence.	441
Hostility of Other Witnesses and Sufficiency of Credible Eyewitness Evidence	The failure of five witnesses to support the prosecution did not defeat the conviction where two other eyewitnesses gave clear and trustworthy evidence corroborated by the medical evidence. The Court assessed the quality of the evidence that supported the charge rather than the numerical balance between supportive and hostile witnesses.	450
Hostile cross-examination after delay — assessment of earlier identification	A witness's later retreat from identification must be assessed with the whole evidence rather than accepted mechanically. Applying Khujji, the Court considered that the complainant identified the appellant in examination-in-chief but denied knowing him when cross-examined four months later after a defence-requested deferment. The Court tested identity against another witness's prior acquaintance with the appellant, the prompt FIR, the dying declaration and medical corroboration. It rejected the later denial as an attempt to withdraw the earlier account and accepted the supported evidence. The delay formed part of that assessment; it did not alone establish identity.	499
Adverse evidence of a prosecution witness not declared hostile	Where the prosecution witness did not support its version but was not declared hostile, the Court applied the rule that the prosecution was bound by that witness's evidence. It considered the chowkidar's testimony on that basis rather than treating the unsupported prosecution account as proved.	576
Recantation after deferred cross-examination and evidence of influence	Later recantation does not automatically displace a witness's earlier reliable evidence. Applying Khujji, the Court rejected reversals where the record indicated that witnesses had been won over, including admissions concerning compromise or contact with the accused and an untenable claim of prosecutorial tutoring. The conclusion rested on those circumstances, not merely on the interval before cross-examination.	577
Other eyewitnesses may prove an assault when the injured	An injured person's failure to support the prosecution does not prevent the court from relying on other credible eyewitnesses to prove the assault on that person. The Court accepted those witnesses' accounts together with medical evidence	577

witness turns hostile	in sustaining the hurt convictions.
Reliance on a proved dying declaration when other material witnesses turn hostile	The failure of the material witnesses to support the prosecution did not prevent reliance on the victim's admissible and reliably proved account of the fatal transaction. After assessing the recording officer's evidence, the medical record and the victim's capacity to speak, the Court accepted the Dehati Nalishi and found guilt proved beyond reasonable doubt.	582
Reliance on a corroborated part of a hostile witness's testimony	Permission to cross-examine a prosecution witness does not erase the testimony or make every part unreliable. After considering the evidence as a whole with caution, the court may accept a creditworthy part supported by other reliable evidence. Yuvraj's testimony proved the manner of the shooting despite his denial of the assailants' identity. His failure to support another eyewitness's presence was not by itself a reason to reject that other witness's evidence.	583
Hostile witnesses — dependable portions remain usable for prosecution or defence after careful scrutiny	Declaring a witness hostile does not erase the testimony. The court must read it as a whole, examine it cautiously and rely only on portions found dependable and admissible, whether they support prosecution or defence. Corroboration should ordinarily be sought. Hostile eyewitnesses' accounts of the shooting, place of occurrence and immediate transport to hospital could therefore support those parts of the prosecution case despite their failure to identify the assailant.	638
Hostile witnesses and assessment of surviving prosecution evidence	The fact that several prosecution witnesses turn hostile does not by itself justify discarding the entire prosecution case. The court must assess the quality of the available evidence rather than the number of witnesses. Despite the hostility of several witnesses, the Court found the reliable evidence sufficient to sustain the murder conviction.	644
Dependable part of a hostile witness's testimony	A prosecution witness's evidence is not erased merely because the witness turns hostile or is cross-examined by the prosecution. The dependable part may be accepted after careful scrutiny. Applying Khujji, the Court upheld reliance on Sonu's earlier support for the last-seen account despite his later denial, noting that his cross-examination had been delayed by the appellants' tactics.	648
Hostile relative's account and independent dying-declaration evidence	The husband's hostile turn did not prevent the Court from accepting the part of his testimony confirming the burns and transport to hospital or from relying on the independently recorded dying declarations. His assertion that the appellant had been elsewhere was assessed against those declarations and the absence of reliable alibi support.	649
Hostile Prosecutrix Does Not by Itself Require Acquittal	A sexual-assault prosecution does not necessarily fail merely because the complainant turns hostile. Applying the narrated Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi reasoning, the Court recognised that scientific, medical and other incriminating evidence may still establish the prosecution case. The inquiry depends on the evidence available in the particular case and must balance the presumption of innocence with the rights of the victim and the societal interest in a fair search for truth. This principle supported obtaining DNA evidence after the complainant turned hostile.	659
Hostile witness — limited facts supported by the testimony remained usable	Although a witness did not support identification of the offender and was declared hostile, the Court relied on his evidence to the limited extent that the deceased, appellant and other visitors had stayed at the same house and that the deceased’s body was found there. The witness’s testimony did not establish who caused the death. The Court used the facts he actually supported without converting his uncertainty about the killing into affirmative evidence against the appellant.	677
Hostile attesting witness does not automatically discredit a reliable declaration recorder	An attesting witness’s refusal to support the prosecution does not by itself make the evidence of the doctor who recorded a dying declaration untrustworthy. The Court assessed the doctor’s evidence independently and found it reliable. The other witness’s hostility therefore did not require rejection of the declaration or	678

	the prosecution case. The ruling rests on the demonstrated reliability of the recorder rather than an assumption that a medical officer's account is immune from scrutiny.
Non-supporting relatives and a reliable dying declaration	The relatives' failure to support the prosecution did not defeat the case where a trustworthy dying declaration clearly implicated the appellants and was supported by the deceased's Dehati Nalishi and the Executive Magistrate's and doctor's evidence. On that combined record, the Court sustained the murder convictions.	712
Resiled eyewitness accounts and their remaining corroborative evidence	The neighbours' withdrawal of their earlier claim to have witnessed the assault did not displace the child's reliable direct account. They still described his crying report at about 4 a.m., their discovery of the deceased's body inside the home and the appellant's absence. The Court considered those supported circumstances together with the child's natural presence and immediate conduct.	718
Unchallenged supportive testimony of a partly hostile witness	The Court relied on the portion of a partly hostile witness's testimony that remained unchallenged: the wife was with the husband, a fight was occurring, the witness attempted to intervene, and the husband told him it was a personal matter. The defence asked only about the husband's separate residence from his brothers and did not challenge those material assertions. Partial hostility did not prevent reliance on that unchallenged account when considered with the proved homicidal death in the home.	774
Corroboration from partly hostile witnesses who observed the complainant's injuries promptly	Although officers were declared hostile for not narrating all allegations in examination-in-chief, their evidence confirmed the prompt communication of the incident and the complainant's injured condition when they reached the spot. The Court considered that evidence with the medical findings and the defence witness's admission of the dispute in sustaining the conviction. Their corroborative value rested on what they observed or were promptly told; the Court did not treat them as eyewitnesses to the assault.	852
Hostile witnesses: cautious use of credible portions of testimony	A witness's evidence is not rejected in its entirety merely because the witness turns hostile. After scrutinising the testimony closely and considering it as a whole against the other evidence, the court may accept and act on the portions it finds credible, whether supporting the prosecution or the defence.	868
Hostile testimony: dependable portions may support either side	Declaring a prosecution witness hostile does not erase the whole testimony. After close and cautious scrutiny, legally admissible portions found dependable and supported by other evidence may be used by the prosecution or defence. The Court assessed the complainant's admissions about his application, signatures, participation in trap proceedings, offer of money and payment to the intermediary with the surrounding documentary and witness evidence. It accepted the portions supporting the prosecution despite his denial of the demand and alternative explanation for payment.	879
Possible hostile testimony does not make conviction in a rape case impossible	The possibility that the prosecutrix may turn hostile does not establish that conviction is impossible, because scientific and other circumstantial evidence may still support conviction. The Court relied on this principle from Arif Khan while refusing compromise-based quashing of the sexual-offence prosecution.	933
Hostile independent witnesses do not displace otherwise credible proof	The failure of independent witnesses to support the prosecution does not by itself require rejection of an injured witness or a related eyewitness. Their evidence must be assessed on its own quality and against the remaining record. Here the material accounts of the injured person and his brother were consistent, were not effectively shaken, and were corroborated by medical evidence of multiple injuries and fractures. The independent witnesses' hostility therefore did not render those accounts unreliable.	947 remaining direct evidence	corroboration, and the Court did not rely on the Kotwar's materially improved account of an alleged oral dying declaration. It instead assessed the injured eyewitness's account, the separately accepted corroborating eyewitness and the medical evidence. The failure of other witnesses to support the prosecution did not displace that accepted proof or require acquittal in these circumstances.

Partly supportive testimony despite prosecution witnesses not supporting the whole case	Although most prosecution witnesses did not support the full prosecution account, the Court relied on the father's surviving statement that the deceased left with the accused. That last-seen circumstance remained unrebutted in cross-examination and was considered with the medical evidence. The conviction rested on those accepted circumstances rather than treating the father as an eyewitness to the killing.	979
Use of the evidence of a partly hostile witness	The evidence of a witness who turns partly hostile is not erased. The Court must consider the evidence that remains, test its credibility and assess it with the rest of the record. Here the partly hostile witness's claimed sighting was considered but found insufficiently reliable to establish guilt.	988
Prosecutor's questioning does not itself establish withdrawal of the complainant's allegations	The complainant's treatment as hostile for the purpose of questioning by the Public Prosecutor did not establish that she had abandoned the prosecution allegations. On examining the testimony supplied, the Court found that she had forgotten certain matters in examination-in-chief but narrated the allegations against the applicants when questioned by the prosecutor. It therefore rejected the asserted retraction as a ground for quashing. The conclusion concerned the contents of her testimony in this case, rather than a final assessment of its truth.	995
	Sub-Chapter no. 20.6 Sole Witness and Conviction on Single Witness Testimony
Non-examination of witnesses — quality, necessity and adverse inference	The prosecution must prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt through reliable evidence, but need not examine every witness or multiply testimony on the same point. A truthful, consistent and convincing solitary eyewitness may suffice. Withholding a witness may justify adverse inference where that witness is shown to be material to unfolding the occurrence; omission of every additional or minor-point witness does not automatically justify such an inference. Non-examination of other injured persons did not undermine the reliable witnesses examined on the surviving charges.	12
Absence of documentary evidence where oral evidence supports the allegation	A prosecution may establish its case through oral evidence, documentary evidence or both. The absence of a document linking an accused to the alleged act does not by itself require the Court to disregard a witness's specific statement. At the quashing stage, the householder's Section 161 CrPC statement attributing storage of the sand to the applicant could not be ignored merely because no supporting document had been collected. The statement's truth remained to be proved at trial.	35
Sole reliance on a sterling witness — tests of reliability	A sterling witness's account must be truthful, natural and consistent from the initial statement through testimony and cross-examination. Social status is immaterial. The core account of the occurrence, participants and sequence must remain intact and correspond in material particulars with the supporting oral, documentary, physical, scientific and expert evidence. Only an account meeting those standards may be accepted without corroboration.	65
Quality of testimony and non-examination of other eyewitnesses	Section 134 of the Evidence Act does not require a particular number of witnesses for conviction. A court may rely on a solitary witness when the evidence merits full reliance, since its value, weight and quality control the assessment. Where the examined eyewitnesses give convincing evidence, failure to examine other eyewitnesses or independent witnesses does not by itself defeat the prosecution case.	90 independent witnesses or the person who transported the victim	produce an independent witness named in the FIR does not by itself discredit credible related testimony. The Court also rejected an objection based on non-examination of the person who transported the victim to hospital because he had not witnessed the attack, and declined to treat the absence of local bystanders as fatal in the circumstances.

Conviction on a trustworthy sole eyewitness account	Section 134 of the Evidence Act requires no particular number of witnesses to prove a fact. A conviction may rest on a sole eyewitness, including a relative of the deceased, if the account is found wholly reliable. The wife's evidence was accepted because her presence was natural and supported by contemporaneous information and the prompt FIR, while medical and ballistic evidence corroborated the shooting.	275
Corroboration according to the reliability of a sole eyewitness	Where a sole eyewitness is wholly reliable, corroboration is unnecessary unless the law requires it. Where the account is not wholly reliable, independent corroboration in material particulars may be required before conviction. If the witness is wholly unreliable, corroboration cannot cure that defect.	275
Non-examination of a witness where the remaining evidence is reliable	The prosecution is not required to examine a fixed number of witnesses. The court must assess whether the evidence produced is cogent, credible and trustworthy, and may convict on an entirely reliable single witness. The failure to examine the person who reportedly supplied the abductors' names did not defeat this case, because the Court accepted the examined evidence; it also noted that the defence could have called him.	279
Non-examination of an eyewitness: quality rather than number	The prosecution need not examine every person said to have witnessed the occurrence or multiply witnesses unnecessarily. The Court assesses the quality of the evidence produced. Non-examination of another named eyewitness did not undermine the prosecution where the witnesses examined were found credible.	280
Sole related eyewitness: material contradictions and unexplained exculpation of a co-accused	Conviction may rest on a sole related eyewitness whose testimony is coherent, consistent and reliable. Relationship alone does not disqualify a witness; quality matters more than number. Ordinary errors of perception or memory differ from discrepancies that affect truthfulness and make the prosecution case doubtful, when prudence requires corroboration. Applying Shivaji Sahabrao Bobade, Karunakaran and Jagdish Prasad, the Court found material inconsistencies about the witness's presence and her mother's presence, no injury supporting her account of being kicked and falling, and unexplained exculpation of a co-accused previously named by her. Her mother's changed account from hearsay witness to eyewitness supplied no reliable corroboration. With no dependable independent corroboration, the sole account could not sustain the murder conviction.	422
Quality of eyewitness evidence and non-examination of other named witnesses	The prosecution must prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt, but no fixed number of witnesses is required. Credible, consistent evidence, even from one witness, may sustain conviction; evidence is weighed for quality rather than counted. The omission to examine two other persons named in the FIR did not justify rejecting the two eyewitnesses actually examined, whose accounts the Court found trustworthy and supported by the prompt FIR and ballistic evidence. The ruling rests on the adequacy of the evidence produced.	445
Quality of testimony and conviction on a solitary witness	The prosecution must prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt through reliable evidence; no particular number of witnesses is required. A competent court may convict on one trustworthy witness and may acquit despite several witnesses if their evidence lacks quality. The assessment concerns the truthfulness, cogency and reliability of the testimony, rather than its numerical strength.	580
Conviction on one reliable eyewitness despite other	The law requires reliable evidence rather than any particular number of witnesses. Other material witnesses' failure to support the prosecution did not require acquittal where the wife's direct account of the assault remained	584

witnesses turning hostile	unshaken in cross-examination and was corroborated by the deceased's FIR, treated as a dying declaration, and the medical evidence.
Non-examination of independent bystanders	A prosecution case that is otherwise true and acceptable should not be rejected merely because independent bystanders were not examined. Applying Ambika Prasad and its reproduced reference to Anil Singh, the Court recognised public reluctance to assist investigation or testify. That omission did not invalidate the eyewitness evidence the Court had already found reliable; it did not dispense with proof of guilt.	605
Sole identifying eyewitness — hostile witnesses' denial of presence does not itself discredit a reliable account	An eyewitness cannot be rejected merely because hostile witnesses deny that witness's presence. Reliability must be assessed from the account, natural presence, opportunity to identify the known assailant, prompt report, conduct and corroborating circumstances. The hotel proprietor's presence and account were supported by the prompt Dehati Nalishi, the investigating officer, surrounding records and dependable parts of the other witnesses' testimony. Meal preparation inside the hotel and the absence of support for a power outage also supported adequate light for identification. His identification remained reliable despite the hostile denial.	638
Non-examination of independent witnesses — trustworthy eyewitness evidence may suffice despite public reluctance	A prosecution case cannot be rejected solely because independent bystanders have not been examined where the eyewitness evidence is trustworthy. Public reluctance to give statements may prevent the investigating officer from securing such witnesses. The officer's evidence that independent persons would not come forward, coupled with the reliable identifying account, answered the objection based on the incident's occurrence in a busy market.	638
Sole eyewitness — quality of evidence and absence of independent corroboration	Conviction may rest on a sole witness whose evidence is credible after careful scrutiny. The quality of evidence, rather than the number of witnesses, determines whether it merits acceptance. Non-production of an independent witness named in the FIR does not by itself discredit a reliable related witness or the prosecution case. Other independent witnesses turning hostile is likewise no automatic ground to reject otherwise cogent interested-witness evidence.	700
Sole eyewitness — quality of evidence and absence of independent corroboration	Conviction may rest on a sole witness whose evidence is credible after careful scrutiny. The quality of evidence, rather than the number of witnesses, determines whether it merits acceptance. Non-production of an independent witness named in the FIR does not by itself discredit a reliable related witness or the prosecution case. Other independent witnesses turning hostile is likewise no automatic ground to reject otherwise cogent interested-witness evidence.	701
Non-examination of an abducted person who never returned	The objection that the abducted person had not been examined was rejected because the prosecution did not claim that he had returned, and the defence had not even suggested that he was still alive. Rather, its suggestion to the complainant was that his anger over his brother’s failure to return had prompted false testimony. The Court assessed the available direct eyewitness evidence and upheld the conviction. The ruling concerns an unavailable abducted person on this record; it does not dispense generally with the prosecution’s obligation to establish its case through reliable evidence.	731
Sole injured witness — medical corroboration supports conviction despite a hostile witness	The conviction rested on the injured complainant’s testimony, corroborated by the medical examination report, although the other prosecution witness to the incident turned hostile. The doctor accepted that some injuries could result from a fall but specifically ruled out a fall as the cause of three others. The complainant’s admission that a counter FIR had been lodged did not displace this evidence: that FIR was not produced, and there was no record showing whether a charge-sheet had followed or its outcome. On this evidence, the Court found that the appellants were the aggressors and affirmed their convictions under Sections 324/34 and 323/34 IPC.	744
Non-examination of	The quality of the evidence, rather than the number of witnesses, governs proof.	949

a witness: materiality and quality of the remaining proof	The ambulance driver was not a necessary or material witness merely because he transported the injured to hospital. Their medical examination at that hospital was undisputed. In those circumstances, failure to examine the driver was not fatal to the prosecution.
Quality of evidence and production of eyewitnesses	The quality of evidence governs credibility, rather than the number of witnesses examined. The prosecution need not call every person said to have witnessed the occurrence or multiply witnesses unnecessarily; it must produce the material witnesses needed to present its case. Lack of independent witnesses did not displace the reliable injured-witness and medical evidence accepted here.	987
	Sub-Chapter no. 20.7 Delayed Witness Disclosure and Examination — Credibility and Explanation
Delay in recording witness statements: explanation and risk of embellishment	Delay in recording statements is not by itself a reason to discard the prosecution case. The Court must examine whether the explanation is satisfactory and whether the delay creates a possibility of embellishment. Unexplained delay with that risk may be fatal; satisfactorily explained delay is not. Relying on Gian Chand and Tara Chand, the Court accepted that necessary police formalities preceded the statements and held that the delay of about seventeen days did not defeat this prosecution.	45
Delayed eyewitness disclosure — Plausible explanation and close scrutiny	Delay in recording an eyewitness's statement does not automatically make the testimony unreliable, but requires careful scrutiny of the explanation and possible investigative unfairness. The Court accepted fear after threats, reluctance to become involved and absence for labour work as explanations for several months of silence. It also noted that effective investigation began when the new officer received the diary and that he was not questioned about the recording delay. On those circumstances the witnesses were found reliable.	118
Persuading a reluctant eyewitness to speak — Tutoring not established by persuasion alone	Persuasion by the deceased's family to make an otherwise reluctant eyewitness disclose the incident did not, by itself, amount to tutoring or fabrication of a witness. The Court assessed the reluctance, fear and delayed-disclosure explanation with the evidence and accepted the witnesses as reliable. Their eventual willingness to speak after persuasion was not treated as a sufficient reason to reject their accounts.	118
Unexplained delay and absence of an earlier account of an eyewitness's presence	A witness's claim to have seen the assault was unsafe to accept where his police statement was recorded about seventeen days later without explanation, the prompt FIR did not mention his presence, and the complainant's police statement did not place him among those reaching the scene. The delay was assessed with those surrounding contradictions, rather than treated as an automatic rule of exclusion.	123
Nonmention of a witness in the FIR does not by itself discredit the witness	An FIR need not name every witness. The neighbouring eyewitness’s omission from the FIR and other witnesses’ accounts did not make him unreliable where his nearby house explained his opportunity to see the shooting and his evidence was otherwise trustworthy. The complainant was not expected to identify everyone watching while shots were being fired.	253
Delayed police statement: explanation and reliability must be assessed	Delay in recording a witness's police statement does not invariably make the testimony unreliable. The Court must scrutinise it carefully and assess whether the explanation is plausible and the witness otherwise natural and credible. Treatment, death and the performance of last rites adequately explained recording the daughter's statement several days after the occurrence in this case.	288
Delay in Recording Witness Statements: Trauma and Treatment	The significance of delay in recording a witness's police statement depends on its explanation and the surrounding circumstances. The Court accepted trauma after the killing of close family members and continuing treatment away from the village after a gunshot injury as explanations that did not undermine the witnesses' credibility in this case.	360

20.7 : Delayed Witness Disclosure and Examination — Credibility and Explanation

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Delay in recording a witness's police statement	Delay in examination does not by itself make a witness's evidence suspicious or fabricated. Its explanation must be assessed in the circumstances, and the investigating officer and witness should be questioned about it. Here, no question seeking an explanation was put to the investigating officer, whose work was also affected by public agitation requiring immediate police attention; the delay did not justify rejecting the last-seen witness.	391
Delay in recording a police statement	Delayed recording does not by itself make a witness's statement suspicious or concocted. An explanation should be sought from the witness and investigating officer, and any explanation assessed for plausibility and credibility in the circumstances of the investigation. The Court adopted these principles in addressing the delay objection.	393
Delayed recording of an available abductee's statement	The unexplained failure to examine a released abductee promptly, coupled with investigative inactivity while two others allegedly remained captive, seriously undermined the prosecution. The defence's failure to ask the investigating officer why the statement was delayed did not remove that infirmity in these circumstances.	410
Delayed Witness Statements at the Stage of Charge Framing	A witness statement cannot be rejected at charge framing solely because it was recorded belatedly. The prosecution must have an opportunity to explain the delay, and credibility remains open to examination at trial. The objection that two Section 161 CrPC statements had been recorded after 38 days therefore did not by itself require quashing of the charges.	536
Delay in recording an injured and bereaved witness's police statement	Delay in recording a Section 161 CrPC statement is not by itself fatal. It must be assessed in context, including the witness's own injuries, the treatment and death of her husband, treatment of other injured relatives and a prompt initial report. On those circumstances, the delayed statement did not establish that the accusation was the result of deliberation.	577
Delay in recording a witness's statement under Section 161 CrPC	Delay in recording a witness's police statement does not automatically make the testimony unreliable. Its significance depends on the circumstances, the witness's availability, the investigating officer's knowledge and any indication of fabrication or unfair investigation. The witness and investigating officer should be asked specifically to explain the delay. The Court declined to reject Umesh's statement recorded nine days later where neither was questioned on the delay and his evidence disclosed that he had immediately travelled to bring relatives back.	583
Delayed Section 161 CrPC statements — prosecution must have an opportunity to explain the delay	Mere delay in recording a witness's statement under Section 161 CrPC is insufficient to discard the evidence outright. The prosecution must have an opportunity to explain the delay, and if the explanation is accepted the evidence cannot be rejected on that ground. The delay objection therefore did not itself warrant quashing before that assessment.	636
Chance witness — presence and subsequent non-disclosure require close scrutiny	Applying Jarnail Singh v. State of Punjab, the Court explained that testimony cannot be discarded merely because the witness happened to be present. His presence must nevertheless be adequately explained and his evidence closely and cautiously scrutinised; doubtful presence warrants rejection. Subsequent conduct, including whether he told others of the incident, is relevant. Gajraj claimed to have seen the appellant fleeing while checking his cow, but admitted darkness and did not disclose the sighting to the persons at the scene or family members. He remained silent until police examined him two days later. The Court found his evidence untrustworthy in light of that conduct and the surrounding identification difficulties.	747
Delay in recording an injured witness's statement explained by treatment	A delay in recording an injured witness's police statement must be assessed with its explanation and the other evidence. The Court accepted the approximately one-month delay where the witness had been referred in a serious condition for treatment and had been advised by the doctor not to speak. That explanation,	873

	together with his materially consistent account and the medical corroboration, prevented the delay from undermining his testimony.
Explained delay in recording injured witnesses' police statements	Delay in recording a witness's police statement does not by itself justify discarding the evidence where the witness or investigating officer gives a plausible explanation. In assessing the timing here, the Court considered that four persons had died and injured witnesses were receiving treatment. That explanation did not cure the separate material omissions in the prompt first account or the later inconsistent attribution of a firearm role.	916
Delay in recording the statement of a witness named in the FIR	The delay in recording the eyewitness's Section 161 CrPC statement did not undermine his presence where he had already been named in the promptly lodged FIR. His account specifically implicated the appellant in the armed abduction, and cross-examination disclosed nothing material making that account unreliable.	934
Delayed police statements: explanation and circumstances govern credibility	Delay in examining a witness does not automatically undermine the prosecution. Its significance depends on the circumstances, the availability of information enabling the investigating officer to reach the witness, and the explanation offered. The officer should be asked specifically about the delay and its reasons. An unexplained failure to examine a known material witness calls for close scrutiny. Here delays of about four months and about five months, without explanation and coupled with material improvements, rendered the accounts unreliable.	942
Delay in recording injured witnesses' Section 161 statements	Delay in recording statements under Section 161 CrPC did not require rejection of the injured witnesses on this record. The Court found no resulting prejudice to the accused and ample supporting evidence, including direct testimony corroborated by medical findings. The delay was assessed in that evidentiary context.	987
Failure to disclose assailants and an alleged confession at the earliest opportunity	The failure to name the assailants or disclose the alleged confession when informing close relatives, coupled with failure to report it promptly despite access to a phone and transport, undermined the claimed prior knowledge of the killing. The police had initially received only a missing-person report. The Court assessed those omissions with the other inconsistencies in rejecting the witnesses' account.	988
Delay in recording eyewitness statements — absence for the deceased's last rites	A four-day interval before recording eyewitness statements did not undermine their evidence where the witnesses had gone to immerse the deceased's ashes and were examined on returning. The Court accepted that explanation as reasonable, taking account of the wife's bereavement and mental condition. It rejected the contention that the interval, in those circumstances, made the witnesses unreliable.	993
	Sub-Chapter no. 20.8 Chance Witnesses — Presence and Credibility Assessment
Presence and Credibility of Chance Witnesses	A witness is not disbelieved merely because the witness happened to be present at the place of occurrence. The explanation for that presence must nevertheless be credible, and the account requires close scrutiny in its circumstances. Applying Baby, Harbeer Singh and Jarnail Singh as reproduced, the Court found the railway witnesses' claimed presence and observations unreliable. Their status as chance witnesses was a reason for careful assessment rather than a mechanical exclusion.	389
Natural presence and scrutiny of a chance witness	A witness's testimony cannot be rejected merely by describing the witness as a chance witness. Presence at the scene must be adequately explained, and the testimony requires close and cautious scrutiny; doubtful presence warrants rejection, and subsequent conduct may also be relevant. Ordinary activities such as supplying milk or visiting a shop may explain presence. Here prompt naming	693

	in the FIR, timely police examination, corroboration and absence of shown enmity supported the witnesses' natural presence and reliability.
A chance witness must reasonably explain presence at the scene	A witness's chance presence does not automatically disqualify the testimony, but the claimed presence must be reasonably explained and the evidence carefully examined. Applying the standard discussed in Mahavir Singh, the Court found no satisfactory reason for Shailesh's presence during the commission proceedings. His interest in the litigation and conduct in standing close to the witness box during another witness's evidence reinforced the Court's conclusion that he was a created witness who had not seen the incident. The finding concerned his evidence and did not require rejection of the reliable eyewitnesses.	951
	Sub-Chapter no. 20.9 Power-of-Attorney Testimony, Spousal Competency and Personal Knowledge
Power-of-attorney holder — testimony about own acts rather than in place of the principal	A power of attorney authorising a person to act for the principal does not delegate the principal's role in the witness box. Applying Janki Vashdeo Bhojwani, the Court distinguished testimony in the holder's own capacity from testimony for and in the capacity of the principal. It set aside the orders permitting the complainant's wife to depose on his behalf and confined her evidence to acts she had performed as the power-of-attorney holder. The earlier permission, even though limited to matters said to be within her personal knowledge, could not authorise her to substitute for the complainant.	999
Section 120 Evidence Act — complainant's spouse cannot testify in the complainant's place	Section 120 distinguishes civil proceedings, where parties and their spouses are competent witnesses, from criminal proceedings against a person, where the spouse of that person is competent. The Court held that the criminal limb did not refer to the complainant and did not permit his wife to replace him in the witness box. In reaching that conclusion, it stressed that the prosecution must prove the charge beyond reasonable doubt and cannot substitute hearsay, unsupported by direct evidence, for the necessary proof. The wife's evidence remained confined by the final order to her own acts as power-of-attorney holder.	999
	Chapter no. 21 Medical, Forensic, Scientific and Expert Evidence
	Sub-Chapter no. 21.1 Medical Evidence, Forensic Proof and Ocular Contradictions
Knife assault — absence of a forensic report and corroborative evidence	The absence of a forensic report concerning the recovered knife did not undermine the prosecution where the knife was discovered from its concealed location on the accused's memorandum, incriminating articles were collected from the scene, and the eyewitness account of the knife assault was supported by medical evidence. The medical findings established sharp-weapon injuries to the injured witness and multiple fatal incised and penetrating injuries to the deceased, consistent with the ocular account.	8
Rape — victim's account corroborated by medical findings	The Court found the sexual assault established where the child's account was supported by examination findings of bleeding, a ruptured hymen and a torn vaginal wall, together with the medical opinion of recent sexual assault. It assessed those findings with the child's evidence and the other reliable witnesses when concluding that the charged rape was proved beyond reasonable doubt.	9
Medical and ocular evidence — credible eyewitness account and conflicting expert opinion	Medical evidence ordinarily corroborates an eyewitness account. Credible ocular evidence is not displaced by a medical opinion suggesting another possibility unless the medical evidence completely excludes the eyewitness version. The Court may test an expert opinion for logic, objectivity and	12

	consistency with other medical evidence. Here, the disputed doctor's account of widespread blackening and relative heights lacked reliable support and conflicted with other doctors' reports; after rejecting those parts, the Court found no medical contradiction requiring rejection of the eyewitnesses.
Injuries to accused — same transaction, seriousness and prosecution explanation	An accused's injury does not invariably establish that the complainant party was the aggressor or require rejection of the prosecution case. Before imposing a burden to explain the injury, it must be shown to be serious and sustained in the same transaction. Here, the Court found the son's gunshot injury was inflicted later by the principal accused to create a defence; it was therefore neither an unexplained injury in the same transaction nor proof that the prosecution had concealed the incident's origin.	12
Discrepancy between an initial injury report and post-mortem findings	A casually prepared initial medico-legal report describing injuries as simple did not displace a detailed post-mortem report corroborated by CT findings, treatment records and credible eyewitness testimony. The initial report omitted injury locations and appropriate investigation despite bleeding from the ear and nose and immediate referral for further treatment. Its deficiencies explained the apparent medical discrepancy and did not undermine proof of the fatal assault.	21
Food found in the stomach and the eyewitness's account of a meal	The presence of partly digested roti did not falsify testimony that puri, sweets and halwa had been served at a gathering. Several dishes may be served at such a meal, and each guest need not eat every item. The suggested difference in food therefore did not undermine the witness's account of having attended the meal with the deceased.	23
Medical corroboration of the weapons and manner of assault	Medical findings corroborated the eyewitness account where the penetrating wound corresponded to a ballam assault, the extensive neck injury corresponded to pressure from a lathi held by two assailants, and the incised wounds corresponded to axe blows. The Court assessed the injuries together with the specific manner of assault described by the witness.	23
Upward bullet direction and a challenge to the ocular account	An upward bullet track did not by itself disprove the eyewitness account of firing where the doctors were not questioned about possible change of direction after entry. The Court noted that a bullet may change direction on striking a bone, and relied on the entry wound and retained projectile as proof of gunshot injury. It did not find that such deflection had in fact occurred in this case.	34
Uncertain medical timing and doubtful forensic evidence	A partially ruptured hymen and a medical opinion that sexual assault was possible did not establish rape by the appellant where the doctor could not link the injury to the alleged incident and accepted that it could have occurred the following day. The doctor's evidence that no blood was present on the vaginal slide conflicted with the forensic finding of blood. Together with the contradictory evidence about clothing and the trial court's rejection of the forensic report, these defects made the conviction unsafe.	91
Omission of further blows and alleged conflict with medical evidence	An eyewitness's failure to mention every blow did not make his account inconsistent with the medical evidence where he was examined seven years after the incident, another eyewitness described the multiple axe blows and that account was medically corroborated. The omission was assessed in the context of the lapse of time and the evidence as a whole.	98
Compatibility of mixed injuries with assault by a sabbal	Incised, punctured and blunt-force wounds did not contradict the eyewitness account of assault by a sabbal. The Court explained that a solid iron rod with a pointed edge could cause blunt injuries with its blunt side, punctured wounds by piercing, and incised wounds when its edge was used like a sword. Two sabbals were recovered at the scene. The different wound types therefore did not establish the defence suggestion of multiple assailants, and the medical evidence corroborated the ocular account.	103
Ocular and medical evidence —	Credible ocular evidence generally takes priority over medical opinion unless	115

21.1 : Medical Evidence, Forensic Proof and Ocular Contradictions

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Laceration despite a stated sword blow	the medical evidence completely rules out its truth. Medical improbability remains relevant in assessing the evidence. A lacerated wound did not necessarily contradict the account of a sword blow: the Court considered that a blunt edge or the blunt part of the weapon could have struck the victim. It therefore found no irreconcilable conflict requiring rejection of the eyewitness account.
Preference for ocular evidence depends on its trustworthiness	In examining a conflict between ocular and medical evidence, the Court accepted that the ocular account should ordinarily receive preference, but first tested whether that account was trustworthy. An unreliable eyewitness version could not resolve the uncertainty created by the inconsistent medical opinion about the nature of death.	123
Unresolved ligature evidence in a disputed strangulation prosecution	Where strangulation by a noose was alleged, the unexplained disappearance of the noose, the absence of a recorded knot or loop in the seized rope, and the failure to send it to the post-mortem doctor for comparison left material gaps in the investigation. Those gaps reinforced the uncertainty in the medical evidence and were considered with the defects in the eyewitness accounts.	123
Medical opinion inconsistent with the recorded basis of the post-mortem	The doctor's later opinion that a sword could not have caused the cut wounds was rejected where the post-mortem recorded wound dimensions but no shapes, the weapon had not been sent to him, and the recorded long, narrow dimensions did not support his exclusion of a sword. An unsupported recollection of wound shape almost a year later did not displace the accepted eyewitness account in those circumstances.	145
Medical inconsistency and a sword assault	Reliable ocular evidence has primacy unless the medical evidence completely excludes its truth; medical improbability remains relevant to the overall assessment. Lacerated head wounds did not rule out the alleged sword assault because a blunt edge or blunt portion could have made contact. The medical and eyewitness accounts were therefore reconcilable on the record.	166
Tractor-seat position and a brief FIR	An injured informant is not expected to narrate every movement in an FIR. The omission that the victim stood up on the tractor did not make the eyewitness explanation a false improvement merely because a high seat-back was said to obstruct the shot. The occurrence could not be reconstructed on the rigid assumption that the victim remained seated and motionless.	167
Forensic findings inconsistent with the defence of accidental burning	In assessing the defence of accidental burning while cooking, the Court considered the kerosene in the deceased's scalp hair, the extensive burns and the child's eyewitness account together. An electric heater did not use kerosene. These findings supported deliberate pouring of fuel and contradicted the accidental-burning version attributed to the deceased by the doctor, whose account was not accepted.	173
Unexhibited medical records in the trial file	Medical records do not become readable evidence merely because they are contained in the trial Court's file. The injured witness's bed-head ticket and related treatment records could not be read because they had remained unexhibited.	194
Severe burns do not by themselves establish inability to make a dying declaration	The percentage of burns alone does not determine whether a declarant could speak or make a reliable statement; fitness must be assessed from the medical and other evidence. The sedation objection failed because the declaration was medically certified and the record showed that no medication had been given after the morning request for its recording.	202
Rigor mortis and an unchallenged estimate of time since death	The onset of rigor mortis depends on weather conditions and did not establish an earlier death contrary to the doctor's unchallenged estimate. The post-mortem took place about four hours after the incident, within the recorded three-to-twelve-hour range. In those circumstances the claimed inconsistency in the time of death was rejected.	227

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Abrasion compatible with the alleged lathi assault	An abrasion medically attributed to a hard and blunt object was compatible with the alleged lathi blow. The doctor was not asked whether that injury could not have been caused in that way. In the circumstances, the eyewitness account of the accused's lathi role was not contradicted by the medical evidence.	227
Burn injuries on the accused did not establish the claimed rescue	The accused's burns from wrist to elbow did not establish his claim that he had been injured while saving his wife. The Court assessed the claimed act of pushing the burning victim against the reliable declarations and surrounding evidence and rejected that explanation. The burn injuries were not treated as conclusive proof of an accident.	229
Medical evidence must completely negate reliable ocular evidence to displace it	Medical evidence is ordinarily corroborative. A discrepancy that makes an eyewitness account improbable must be weighed, but reliable ocular evidence is not displaced unless the medical evidence completely rules it out. The scalp wound's description as incised did not exclude assault with a blunt weapon, since such a wound may resemble an incised injury.	253
Medical findings and an exaggerated account of prolonged beating	The Court tested the account of continuous beating for fifteen or thirty minutes against the victims' limited medical injuries and found the duration alleged unreliable on these facts. This discrepancy formed part of its assessment that the prosecution account was not trustworthy. It was not treated as a general rule that minor injuries alone negate an assault or robbery.	287
Medical opinion and an apparent discrepancy in firing distance	Medical opinion assists the Court but is not binding; it must be assessed with the other evidence. An apparent conflict can be significant if it makes the eyewitness account untenable, but does not automatically require rejection of credible ocular evidence. The Court considered the extensive skull damage and the evidence as a whole, and declined to discard the eyewitness account merely because the doctor noted blackening while one witness estimated a greater firing distance. The other eyewitnesses had not been questioned about firing distance.	291
Rigor mortis and estimation of the time of death	Development of rigor mortis is affected by prevailing conditions and cannot be assigned a uniform timetable in every case. A challenge based on its development should be put specifically to the autopsy surgeon. Here no such question was asked, the stated six-to-twelve-hour interval was compatible with the reported occurrence, and the doctor's evidence about digestion also supported the prosecution chronology. Rigor mortis did not establish an earlier killing by unknown persons.	291
Medical and forensic proof of sexual assault on a child	The child's genital injuries, ruptured hymen and associated bite and bodily injuries supported the finding of sexual assault. The suggested accidental fall did not explain the full pattern of injuries. Human semen and sperm on the vaginal swab and slide provided further support for rape. Identification of the perpetrator rested on the accompanying circumstantial evidence, rather than a claimed laboratory match to the appellant.	298
Absence of penile injury and assessment of rape evidence	Absence of injury on an accused's penis does not invariably discredit otherwise reliable proof of rape. The inference depends on the circumstances. Here the appellant was arrested sixteen days after the incident, leaving time for an injury to heal; the Court rejected the absence of such injury as a sufficient reason to disbelieve the prosecution case.	298
Negative viscera report — assessment with other evidence of abnormal death	Failure to detect poison in the viscera did not, by itself, establish natural death or require other convincing evidence to be discarded. The Court observed that some poisons may escape chemical detection and assessed the medical and chemical reports with the false hanging account, absence of a ligature mark and unexplained ante-mortem injuries. Although the autopsy report's author had died and the attending co-signer acknowledged that no poison symptoms were recorded, the Court found death otherwise than under normal circumstances for Section 304-B IPC.	302

21.1 : Medical Evidence, Forensic Proof and Ocular Contradictions

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Firearm assault — medical corroboration of eyewitness evidence	The eyewitness account attributing a firearm injury to the appellant was supported by the medical evidence of gunshot wounds, damaged internal organs and severe bleeding. Differences concerning the second shot and firing distances did not displace the consistent central account of the appellant's shot and the resulting fatal injury. On the combined eyewitness and medical evidence, the Court sustained the Section 302 IPC conviction.	307
Medical corroboration of a sharp-weapon assault	The postmortem evidence of a deep incised neck wound severing major vessels and the trachea, with multiple other injuries and death from shock and haemorrhage, corroborated the accepted ocular account of assault with cutting weapons. The Court relied on that medical support in finding the prosecution case proved beyond reasonable doubt.	315
Ocular and medical evidence — discrepancy versus complete exclusion	Reliable ocular evidence ordinarily has primacy over corroborative medical opinion. A discrepancy does not justify rejection unless the medical evidence completely rules out the manner of injury described by the eyewitnesses. The Court found that the medical findings did not exclude the account of the group assault.	319
Sword assault and a lacerated wound — no inevitable medical contradiction	A lacerated wound does not necessarily exclude an assault with a sword. The blade may be blunt or the blunt part may strike the victim. Applying the narrated authorities, the Court held that the laceration did not create a medical contradiction completely excluding the eyewitness account of the sword assault.	319
Gunshot evidence — medical proof distinguished from proof of weapon and firing distance	Medical evidence established that the complainant suffered a gunshot injury, but the doctor's rejection of the stated firing distance, the discrepancy between the weapon described and the weapon seized, and the seizure witness's denial cast doubt on the prosecution account. Those defects were assessed with the other evidence; they did not prevent the Court from finding that a shot had been fired in private defence.	331
Rape — inconclusive clinical opinion considered with other evidence	The doctor's inability to examine the crying child's hymen or give a definite clinical opinion of rape did not prevent proof of the offence on the evidence as a whole. The recorded inflammation and blood, the ocular account and the DNA report together supported the conviction under Section 376 IPC.	332
Lacerated Wounds and an Eyewitness Account of Assault with a Baka	Credible ocular evidence ordinarily has primacy over medical opinion. Medical evidence that makes the account improbable is relevant to its assessment, but rejection is warranted where it completely rules out the account. Lacerated head wounds did not exclude assault with a Baka, since its blade could have become blunt or its blunt part could have struck the head. Those possibilities reconciled the evidence without determining which side actually made contact.	378
Injury on the accused and skin in the victim's nail clippings	Insufficient skin material for further testing did not make its presence in the child's nail clippings irrelevant. Read with a nail-caused abrasion on the accused's nose, the medical rejection of the suggested self-infliction and the independent DNA links, it supported the inference that the child caused the abrasion while resisting him. The attribution rested on the combined evidence, rather than a laboratory identification of the skin's source.	391
Absence of genital injury on an accused in a child-rape case	Injury to the accused's genital organ is not necessary in every case of forcible intercourse with a child, and its absence does not by itself negate rape. The Court also considered that examination occurred about 48 hours after the incident, allowing for the possibility that minor injuries had healed.	391
Proof of a police request for examination under Section 53A CrPC	The absence of an exhibited requisition did not establish that the accused's medical examination lacked a police request. The escorting witness accepted the defence suggestion that he had acted on senior officers' instructions, and the doctor was not challenged on the absence of a requisition. On that evidence, the Court found the examination had been conducted at the investigating	391

	officer's request.
Medical examination of a recovered minor alleging voluntary sexual relations	A recovered minor's assertion that she went voluntarily did not excuse the police failure to arrange medical examination when the material disclosed sexual relations. The Court treated the omission as a serious investigative failure requiring action against the officers concerned.	431
Unrecorded medical history attributing the assault to an unknown person	The defence doctor's assertion that the injured had identified the assailant as unknown was not accepted where the MLC did not record that the injured supplied such a history and the assertion was not put to the injured in cross-examination. On that record, the unsupported attribution could not displace the prosecution identification evidence.	439
Medical Possibility of Accidental Injury Without Supporting Circumstances	The doctor's acknowledgment that a fall on broken glass could cause injuries did not establish that explanation in this case, as no circumstance indicating such a fall was identified. The medical examination, X-ray and surgeon's evidence established multiple stab wounds, finger amputation and a life-endangering abdominal injury. The Court accepted those findings as corroborating the admissible eyewitness account.	451
Medical Evidence Inconsistent With the Alleged Heavy-Stone Assault	The Court found that the medical evidence ruled out the eyewitness account of the alleged assault with the seized heavy stone. The treatment record did not explain the stitched wounds, the autopsy surgeon had neither opened the stitches nor measured the injury depth, and the injuries lacked the crushing character the Court expected from the stone described. This conclusion rested on the particular injury, treatment and recovery evidence before it.	455
Ocular and medical evidence — Complete inconsistency and separable exaggeration	Credible eyewitness testimony ordinarily receives preference over corroborative medical opinion. Medical improbability must be considered, and medical evidence completely excluding the eyewitness version may justify rejection of that version. Here, the absence of firearm injuries contradicted the alleged indiscriminate firing by five appellants. In contrast, one entry and one exit wound in each deceased did not exclude the reliable single-shot account against Rajesh merely because some witnesses later exaggerated the number of shots. A downward bullet track did not by itself establish firing from an elevated position.	474
Non-recovery of the weapon — Effect on otherwise reliable prosecution evidence	Recovery of the actual weapon is not indispensable to conviction where unimpeachable eyewitness testimony, supported by medical evidence, proves the offence. Non-recovery does not by itself discredit reliable witnesses. The cited Rakesh passage also treats recovery of a firearm that does not match the bullet as non-recovery of the actual weapon, rather than an automatic ground for acquittal. The Court applied the non-recovery rule to Rajesh's proved shooting.	474
Medical injury evidence — Penetration distinguished from proof of sexual assault	Internal injury, a torn hymen and perineal laceration established penetration by a hard object, but its sexual or accidental cause had to be decided from the remaining evidence. The Court rejected the proposed fall and accidental wood-insertion explanations after considering the medical pattern, absence of expected external injuries, the eyewitness evidence and the failure to put the wood-insertion account to the mother. Absence of labial laceration did not itself exclude penetration in a child of that age.	477
Ocular and medical evidence — laceration despite an alleged sword blow	Medical evidence is generally opinion evidence and must be assessed as a whole alongside credible eyewitness testimony. An apparent discrepancy in the injury mechanism is relevant to credibility, but ocular evidence may be rejected on this ground when the medical evidence completely excludes its possibility. A lacerated head wound did not necessarily contradict the account of a sword assault because a blunt portion or blunted blade could have caused it. The Court applied the principles reproduced from Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy, Bhajan Singh, Ramanand Yadav and Shamsher Singh, and accepted the injured	491

	witnesses' account, which was otherwise corroborated by the medical findings. It did not establish the precise contact surface as a separate fact.
Medical corroboration — proof of the incident remains distinct from proof of the assailant's identity	The medical evidence of injuries established that the assault incident had occurred, but the Court separately examined whether each appellant was an assailant. For Purshottam, the complainant's prompt naming and accepted in-court identification were supported by the medical findings, establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt. The same injury evidence did not cure the absence of identification and other connecting evidence against the two acquitted appellants.	548
Medical and physical discrepancies indicating suppression of the occurrence	Proof that death was homicidal did not resolve who caused it. The alleged knife injury to the nose was not an incised wound; other injuries and temporal ecchymosis remained unexplained. The downward, vertical course of the chest wound was difficult to reconcile with an assault while the deceased lay on a cot. The garment removed at autopsy had no corresponding cut, whereas the torn bloodstained garments seized at the scene were withheld from court and the forensic report did not answer the request to examine them for cuts. Unexplained wiping of blood from the scene added to these discrepancies. Taken together, these circumstances supported the finding that the prosecution had suppressed the genesis of the incident.	550
Unexplained lacerated injuries in a prosecution alleging only knife blows	Where the prosecution attributed the assault solely to knife blows, the presence of multiple lacerated wounds called for an explanation. The prosecution’s failure to explain those injuries was one reason the Court found the investigation unsatisfactory and, on the total evidence, held that guilt had not been proved beyond reasonable doubt.	553
Lacerated wound caused by an axe blow	A lacerated head wound did not exclude the eyewitness account of an axe assault where the axe blade could have been blunt or its blunt part could have struck the victim. Since the medical evidence did not completely rule out the assault described, the Court preferred the accepted ocular account.	561
Conflict between medical and ocular evidence	Accepted ocular evidence ordinarily has primacy over medical opinion. Medical evidence making the eyewitness account improbable is relevant to its evaluation; where it completely rules out the possibility of that account being true, the ocular version may be rejected. The medical opinion must be considered as a whole with the other evidence.	561
Medical evidence of fatal head injury considered with direct evidence of assault	The medical findings of skull fracture, depressed bone and brain laceration established the fatal head injury and were considered with the wife's consistent account and the deceased's report of the axe assault. The post-mortem doctor stated that the mode of injury depended on the surrounding evidence. The Court accepted the prosecution evidence as a whole and upheld conviction despite the alternative account of an accidental fall.	584
Conflict between the recovered weapon and medical and oral evidence	The recovered luhangi did not resolve the material conflict in the prosecution evidence. The asserted eyewitness described a lathi blow and specifically denied use of a luhangi, while the doctor attributed both fatal head injuries to a lathi. No lathi was recovered from the appellant. The Court treated this discrepancy with the FIR naming other persons and the unreliable attribution evidence as creating decisive doubt. Proof that the deaths were homicidal did not identify the appellant as the assailant.	599
Difference between FIR and medical-history wording at the charge stage	The FIR’s reference to hot meat and the medical history’s reference to hot curry did not, by that difference alone, justify discarding the FIR at the stage of framing charges. Burning in both eyes had been recorded. The Court upheld the charges within its limited review, leaving the trial court to decide the case on the evidence without being influenced by those preliminary observations.	603 recovery of the actual weapon	may be treated as non-recovery of the actual weapon, rather than as destruction of an otherwise proved prosecution case. Applying Rakesh, Gulab and Krishna Gope, the Court held that recovery of the weapon was not indispensable to conviction. Here, the missing percussion caps prevented a match, but the accepted eyewitness and medical evidence established the firearm killings.

Medical inconsistency and ocular evidence at the Section 319 stage	Eyewitness testimony must be assessed independently for credibility. A medical opinion suggesting another possibility does not by itself displace a trustworthy account, though medical improbability is relevant and a complete exclusion of the ocular version may justify disbelief. At the Section 319 stage, the High Court declined to decide the alleged contradiction conclusively before the trial court tested the evidence. Without a finding of complete inconsistency, that objection did not justify setting aside the summoning order.	611
Medical findings and contemporaneous records as corroboration	Firearm wounds and the medical findings of fatal haemorrhage established homicidal deaths. Blackening and tattooing supported the finding of close-range firing. The injured person's contemporaneous MLC naming an eyewitness as attendant, read with the nearby location of his shop, corroborated that witness's presence and prompt removal of the injured to hospital.	622
Farsa blow, lacerated scalp wound and alleged improvement	The injured witness's specification in court that the blunt side of a Farsa was used did not require rejection of his evidence under Section 319 CrPC merely because the FIR referred generally to a Farsa blow and the injury was lacerated. The Court considered the possible condition or use of the blade, scalp-wound appearance, and Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy. The injured witness was not the FIR's maker, and the ultimate effect of the discrepancy remained for trial.	645
Paralytic stroke and proof of inability to use a weapon	A history of paralytic stroke does not establish that a person was incapable of using a Farsa. The effect depends on the affected body part and resulting restriction. Because the applicant did not identify the affected part or establish incapacity, this assertion did not defeat the Section 319 summons.	645
Ocular and medical evidence — absence of a particular external injury	Credible ocular testimony ordinarily takes precedence over medical opinion, but a medical finding that makes the account improbable must be weighed; complete medical exclusion may justify disbelieving it. Applying Bhajan Singh and the passages reproduced through CBI v. Mohd. Parvez Abdul Kayuum, the Court found that absence of an external back injury did not invalidate the eyewitnesses' account of a joint assault. The deceased had multiple injuries, and witnesses to several persons attacking could not be expected to track every movement or the exact landing of every blow. The medical evidence did not completely exclude their account.	675
Unproved recovery of the weapon does not defeat reliable direct evidence	Recovery of the weapon used in the offence is not indispensable where trustworthy direct evidence establishes the assault. The seized lathi had no recorded bloodstain and no FSL report was produced, so the Court treated the prosecution as having failed to establish recovery of the actual weapon. Applying Goverdhan, including its reproduced Rakesh v. State of U.P. reasoning, it held that this failure did not undermine the reliable eyewitness account supported by the injuries. The recovery objection therefore did not defeat the independently established prosecution case.	675
Medical–ocular variance — assess the nature of the inconsistency	Credible eyewitness evidence must be assessed independently rather than rejected because a medical witness suggests another possibility. Applying Krishnan and Thaman Kumar, the Court distinguished absence of injuries normally produced by the alleged weapon from differences in injury dimensions or location, which require examination of the manner of assault, the victim's position and the witnesses' opportunity to observe. It rejected the contention that the allegation of dragging made the FIR medically inconsistent, noting also that the injured had been thrown to the ground. Minor variance did not displace the reliable evidence of the assault.	678

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Absent blood on a belatedly seized weapon — reliable direct evidence remains	The absence of blood on the seized farsa did not displace the reliable direct evidence of the attack. The Court noted that arrest and seizure followed a substantial interval, during which the weapon could have been cleaned. Applying Nankaunoo, it further held that even if recovery of the actual weapon were disregarded, the credible oral evidence, supported by the medical findings, remained sufficient. The conclusion concerned a case independently established by reliable evidence; it did not make every defective recovery immaterial.	678
Blood-group evidence as a corroborating circumstantial link	Unchallenged forensic findings of human blood on recovered clothing and material from the truck supported the circumstantial chain. Group O blood on a recovered pant, a truck seat cover and foam linked those articles evidentially, while group B blood on two other seat covers supported the presence of blood from another person. The Court assessed these findings with recovery, possession of the truck and identification of the deceased.	682
Conflicting medical estimates of injury timing	An oral statement that injuries were more than three hours old did not undermine the prosecution chronology where it conflicted with the post-mortem report and the doctor's other evidence that death occurred within three hours of examination. Reading the medical evidence together with the evidence of immediate death, the Court rejected the proposed earlier injury time and accepted homicidal death.	691
Assessment of conflicting medical opinions on firearm entry and exit wounds	The Court must assess medical evidence with the recorded injury features and the other credible evidence; it is not bound by a prosecution doctor's opinion merely because the doctor was not declared hostile. In this case, both doctors recorded protruding intestines at the abdominal wound. The Court accepted the treating doctor's identification of that wound as the exit wound, rejected the contrary post-mortem characterisation, and found the back-to-abdomen trajectory consistent with the eyewitness account. It therefore rejected the alleged contradiction between medical and ocular evidence.	693
Medical evidence alleged to contradict credible eyewitness testimony	Credible ocular evidence must be assessed independently and is not displaced merely by a medical opinion suggesting an alternative possibility. Medical improbability is relevant to evaluation; medical evidence completely excluding the eyewitness version may justify disbelief. In this case the incised and blunt injuries supported the weapon accounts. The Court found that the absence of penetrating head wounds did not contradict the described Ballam and Barchhi blows to the head and forehead.	698
Failure to obtain a doctor's opinion on recovered weapons	Failure to send the recovered weapons to the doctor for an opinion does not by itself require rejection of direct evidence. Where the described axe and lathi assaults were corroborated by the incised and blunt injuries, and the alleged conflict about pointed weapons was rejected, that investigative omission did not undermine the eyewitness account accepted by the Court.	698

Here, the firearm injuries and fractures sustained by the eyewitness supported her account of the shooting, while the ante-mortem firearm injuries and death from excessive haemorrhage supported the finding of homicidal death.
Medical corroboration of an injured eyewitness and proof of homicidal death	An injured eyewitness's account may be accepted where her injuries support her presence and the medical findings corroborate the occurrence she describes. Here, the firearm injuries and fractures sustained by the eyewitness supported her account of the shooting, while the ante-mortem firearm injuries and death from excessive haemorrhage supported the finding of homicidal death.	701
Post-mortem omission tested against contemporaneous injury records	The Court was not bound to accept the post-mortem report's silence about a hand injury when the inquest recorded blood and a wound between the thumb and finger, and the medical requisition also referred to that injury. Assessing those documents and the police witnesses together, the Court held the earlier assault proved despite the doctor's negligent or incomplete examination.	713
Primacy of credible ocular evidence and complete medical exclusion	Credible ocular evidence ordinarily has primacy over medical opinion, which is corroborative. Medical evidence making the eyewitness account improbable is relevant to its assessment; if it completely rules out that account, the ocular evidence may be disbelieved. An expert's alternative possibility or unsupported opinion is not conclusive. Here the location and extent of the wounds supported the attributed sharp-weapon assaults, and the doctor's single-blow opinion did not displace the accepted direct evidence.	713
Medical injuries did not establish the alleged assault by the accused	The injuries on two witnesses did not prove that Vijay assaulted them when the underlying abduction account was unreliable and the doctor accepted that the injuries could result from a fall from a bullock cart. The claimed assault on two other abductees had no medical support. On that combined record, the Court found the Section 323 charge unproved.	716
Medical corroboration of the eyewitness account despite weapon-description discrepancies	The Court compared Gorabai (PW1), Ram Singh (PW2), Kamta Prasad (PW5) and Poonam (PW3) with Dr. Ajay Gupta’s post-mortem opinion. The defence pointed to non-mention of Poonam and Rajat in the FIR, kinship of eyewitnesses, differences between lathi and iron-tipped luhangi, and the initial doctor’s observations. The Court found the eyewitness core of Laxmi Narayan’s head strike supported by the post-mortem finding of fresh ante-mortem blunt injuries, fatal head injury, shock and haemorrhage. The seized stick was described as having no iron cover; that difference affected precise weapon description but not attribution of the fatal head blow. It accepted homicidal death and his responsibility, while limiting the other two men’s individual acts to simple hurt. The Court did not derive a universal rule that all related testimony or all medical discrepancies are immaterial.	733
Ocular account of axe blow sustained where scalp laceration did not exclude it	Roop Singh had an 8 cm occipital laceration, dangerous to life, while eyewitnesses identified Brajesh’s axe blow. Applying Latesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2018) 3 SCC 66, and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, the Court required medical evidence to completely rule out the oral version before displacement. Scalp hair and hard skull could affect wound appearance, and no axe had been recovered to establish its edge; the doctor’s blunt-object classification did not on this record render the direct, corroborated account impossible. This did not dispense with scrutiny of medical contradictions in a different case.	735
Failure to recover weapons did not displace credible injured eyewitness account	Nankaunoo v. State of U.P., (2016) 3 SCC 317, and Mritunjoy Biswas v. Pranab, (2013) 12 SCC 796, were applied: non-recovery of a weapon is not invariably fatal where reliable direct evidence, especially with medical support, proves the occurrence; Mritunjoy cites Lakshmi, Lakhan Sao and Arjun Singh in that setting. No assault weapon was recovered in this case, but the four injured witnesses’ accounts and MLCs were accepted. The ruling did not deem	735

	recovery irrelevant in every evidentiary configuration.
Non-recovery of weapon where reliable injured-witness evidence is medically corroborated	Non-recovery of the weapon does not discredit direct evidence that is otherwise reliable and trustworthy. Applying Gulab v. State of Uttar Pradesh and Rakesh v. State of U.P., the Court sustained the Section 324 IPC conviction because the injured witness's account was supported by the medico-legal report. The reproduced authorities distinguish non-recovery from an unexplained failure to obtain available ballistic evidence; they do not impose an inflexible requirement of ballistic examination despite convincing direct evidence.	752
Medical evidence used to test specific acts attributed to individual accused	The single firearm wound to the deceased and the incised and lacerated wounds to the injured witnesses supported the account of one accused's fatal shot and the proved axe or lathi assaults. Neither injured witness had a gunshot wound. Considering those findings, the lack of other corroboration and prior enmity, the Court rejected the wider allegation that the remaining alleged gunmen repeatedly fired at the deceased and injured witnesses. The medical findings supported an assessment of each alleged act in the circumstances of this case.	754
Failure to explain injuries on an accused is not invariably fatal	The effect of unexplained injuries on an accused depends on the circumstances and whether the omission creates reasonable doubt about the prosecution case. There is no universal duty to explain every injury, and where injury questions are not put to prosecution witnesses, no occasion to explain may arise. Here the accused had simple abrasions which the doctor said could result from running or falling. Their non-explanation did not defeat the otherwise accepted assault evidence.	766
Medical probability and eyewitness accounts of a brief firearm assault	Expert evidence indicates probability and is not conclusive proof of every detail of an assault. Although the doctor considered that the back-entry gunshot wounds were inflicted while the deceased was standing, the witnesses also described him running away when shots were fired. The Court assessed that opinion with the eyewitness sequence of a fall and further firing. The entry and exit wounds, blackening and charring, and the buttock wound without an exit supported the firearm assault and homicidal death. On the record, the medical evidence supported rather than displaced the eyewitness account.	772
Exhibited postmortem report and the accidental-fall explanation	The postmortem report recorded widespread ante-mortem blunt injuries, fractures and an occipital fracture with subdural haematoma, and classified the death as homicidal. It was exhibited without reservation, and the defence did not challenge the omitted injury findings in cross-examination. The doctor's incomplete oral recital therefore did not displace the report's proved findings. His general concession that a fall could cause injuries did not explain the combined number and pattern of injuries. The Court rejected accidental death from a fall from the single-storey house.	774
Absence of hair on an axe despite head injuries	In assessing multiple axe wounds, the absence of hair on the recovered axe did not undermine the medical finding of homicidal deaths. The order of the blows was uncertain, and the Court reasoned that a later blow on another part of the body and the resulting blood could have removed hair traces. This objection therefore did not displace the post-mortem evidence in the case.	817
Medical proof of drowning — Separate question of homicidal causation	The unchallenged post-mortem opinion established death by drowning although the diatom test could not be performed because the bone sample was broken. Proof of drowning left a separate question whether the death was homicidal or accidental, which required examination of the other evidence.	827
An unproved ossification report cannot be used against the accused	The prosecution cannot rely adversely on an ossification report that it has not proved. The Court therefore excluded the unproved report suggesting an age above 12 and below 14 years from consideration against the appellant. It determined minority on the other proved age evidence.	876
Inconclusive medical trajectory evidence	The autopsy evidence established homicidal death by gunshot but could not	919

assessed with other scene circumstances	conclusively determine the relative positions of shooter and victim. The doctor accepted alternative explanations for a downward bullet track, including deflection after striking bone, and had not established the track by probing. The Court therefore assessed position and the probable place of shooting through the remaining scene evidence. It treated the roof account as probable on that combined assessment, rather than as a medically certain reconstruction.
Non-explanation of serious injuries sustained by the accused	Failure to explain injuries on the accused does not invariably require rejection of the prosecution case. Their seriousness, occurrence in the same transaction, the quality of the prosecution evidence and the probability of the defence version must be considered together. Clear, cogent and credible evidence may remain reliable despite non-explanation. Here, the accused suffered multiple serious injuries, including head injuries, and were admitted to hospital by the police. Prosecution witnesses denied those injuries despite facing trial for causing them. In the setting of the possession dispute and a probable defence version, the omission supported an inference that the origin of the incident had been suppressed and created reasonable doubt.	923
Medical corroboration of eyewitness accounts of a group assault	The medical findings supported the eyewitness accounts of the different weapons and injuries. Badal's three firearm entry wounds and corresponding injuries established homicidal death from firearm injuries. Ajay's incised head wounds, skull fractures and internal bleeding supported death from the head assault. The contemporaneous injuries of Vinod and Shiv Kumar also supported their presence and the accounts of lathi and gun-handle blows. The Court assessed these findings with the ocular evidence in accepting the prosecution account.	936
Medical evidence and the suggested accidental fall	The doctor's acceptance that a forceful fall onto a sharp object could cause an injury did not establish that the deceased had suffered such a fall. The defence witnesses lacked direct knowledge of the alleged occurrence, and the investigating officer's plan recorded a drain but no culvert. The Court accepted homicidal death from the brain injury and found the prosecution account of an axe assault supported by the medical and overall evidence despite witness discrepancies. The decision does not establish a definitive scientific match between the recovered axe and the deceased.	948
Ocular and medical evidence: material conflict and hypothetical alternatives	Credible ocular evidence must be independently assessed with the whole record. Minor medical variations or hypothetical alternative causes do not conclusively displace it. Medical evidence making the account improbable is relevant; evidence completely excluding the possibility of the injuries occurring as described may justify rejecting the account. Here the injured witness's condition could explain failure to observe every blow to his wife, and the weapons and the doctor's explanation permitted the blunt penetrating injuries. The Court found no material variance between his account and the medical evidence.	949
Medical corroboration of fatal assault and alleged inadequate treatment	Medical evidence of penetrating injuries to vital organs and death from shock corroborated the accepted eyewitness account of the knife assault and established homicidal death. The records showed prompt initial treatment and referral, followed by death on the way to hospital; the suggestion that inadequate treatment displaced the assault as the cause of death was rejected on that evidence.	971
Medical and forensic evidence rebutting an alternative cause of injury	The doctor's concession that a corn stalk could cause the injury did not displace the prosecution evidence of rape. The Court considered the bleeding vaginal-wall injury, ruptured hymen and human sperm detected on the vaginal slide and swab together with the prosecutrix's account, and rejected the suggested accidental cause. The supporting witnesses had not witnessed the assault itself.	980
Absence of blood on	The absence of blood on the recovered weapons, and the failure to obtain the	987 recovered weapons and corroborated eyewitness evidence	expert examination mentioned in the judgment, did not undermine the conviction on this record. Recovery at the accused's instance, scene material, credible injured-witness testimony and corresponding medical findings supported the use of the weapons in the assault.

	Sub-Chapter no. 21.2 Serology, Blood Stains, Fingerprints, Ballistics and Toxicology
Damaged firearm — condition at recovery does not necessarily disprove earlier use	A firearm's inability to fire when recovered does not disprove its earlier use where the evidence shows subsequent damage intended to make it unworkable. The seized gun was dismantled and concealed, its firing pins were cut, and nitrate and gunpowder were found in its barrels. Those circumstances defeated the argument that its condition at recovery contradicted the evidence of the shooting.	12
Forensic linkage of a recovered firearm and the cartridge	A forensic finding that a cartridge was fired from the firearm recovered at the accused's instance may connect that recovery to the shooting. Here, the Court accepted the proved FSL report linking the cartridge to the recovered firearm and considered it with the other incriminating circumstances in upholding the conviction.	36
Serologist's report — expert opinion and formal proof in the relied-upon decision	In Gadhvi, relied upon to reject the assumption that a hostile prosecutrix made conviction impossible, the serologist's report was treated as expert opinion under Section 45 of the Evidence Act and admissible without formal exhibition or proof by oral evidence. The report was assessed with medical and other evidence connecting the accused to the assault. That evidentiary assessment concerned the material in the cited case.	58
Recovery of articles — proved seizure without the alleged blood stains supplied no incriminating link	Proof that articles were seized from the accused does not by itself establish their connection with the offence. Although the seizure witnesses and investigating officer proved recovery of the tangi, clothes, socks and shoes, the FSL found no blood on any of them. In the circumstances of this case, the recoveries therefore supplied no incriminating link connecting the appellant with the homicide.	70
Forensic corroboration of the recovered firearm	The forensic report corroborating use of the recovered firearm in the incident supported the prosecution case alongside the reliable eyewitness account, medical evidence and prompt FIR naming the accused. The Court relied on these circumstances together in finding the charge proved beyond reasonable doubt.	90
Recovered firearm without proof of ballistic linkage	Recovery of the .315-bore rifle, which had already been seized in another case and was formally obtained from that police station, did not establish that it was used in these killings. In the absence of a ballistic expert's report linking it to the offence, the Court did not accept the recovery as an incriminating circumstance against the appellant.	99
Human blood on a recovered weapon despite an undetermined blood group	Failure to determine the blood group does not make proved human blood on a recovered weapon irrelevant. Its value depends on the surrounding evidence. Here, recovery of the axe from the accused, the proved sighting of him fleeing with it and his failure to explain its human bloodstains supplied corroborating circumstances. Applying Khujji and the other reproduced authorities, the Court rejected the claim that absence of a blood-group match deprived the recovery of all evidentiary value.	132
Human blood on a proved recovered weapon as corroboration	Human blood detected on the sword recovered from the appellant corroborated the accepted ocular account where both the seizure witness and the seizing officer proved the recovery and cross-examination disclosed no material infirmity in their testimony. The forensic result was used as supporting evidence rather than as an independent identification of the assailant.	145

corroboration despite absence of visible injury	victim's account of the sexual act. Human sperm was detected on the victim's anal slides, swabs and undergarments and on the accused's slide and undergarments; blood was also detected on the victim's samples and the accused's undergarments. The FSL report was not challenged by seeking cross-examination of the Chemical Examiner. Read with the eyewitness accounts, it corroborated the prosecution case.
Non-exclusive ballistic opinion and eyewitness proof	An opinion that recovered pellets could have been fired from one 12-bore gun did not exclude the other 12-bore weapons attributed to the shooters. On the forensic material in this case, the pellets could not be tied exclusively to a particular gun. That inconclusive opinion, disputed recovery and discovery of only one distant empty cartridge did not displace consistent eyewitness accounts corroborated by the prompt FIR and post-mortem findings.	165
Unexhibited FSL findings not put to the accused	The Court could not use the alleged blood and human-blood findings on seized weapons where the FSL report had not been exhibited and the circumstances had not been put to the appellants in their Section 313 CrPC examinations. It assessed guilt on the remaining evidence.	166
Missing specimen-seal impression on seizure memos	Absence of the specimen-seal impression on a seizure memo did not by itself invalidate the recoveries. The cartridge memo recorded sealing at the spot, witnesses supported seizure without challenge on that point, and the FSL recorded sealed receipt. The armorer and FSL also received the recovered gun sealed. That evidence established the recoveries despite the missing impressions.	167
Fingerprint evidence contradicted by seizure and sealing chronology	The alleged fingerprint match did not establish an incriminating link where the vessel was recorded as seized and sealed at 10:15 a.m., but the expert claimed to find it open and lift prints at about 12:05 p.m. The contemporaneous records contradicted the claimed joint inspection. The failure to obtain the victim's comparison prints or explain the second print further weakened the claimed link.	219
Blood-group correspondence as a solitary circumstance	The victim's articles and the appellant's T-shirt bore human blood of group A, but the appellant's own blood group was unknown and his clothes were seized 21 days after the incident. The Court accepted that the stain might be the victim's while holding that this solitary circumstance could not establish murder after the other links failed.	219
Reliable eyewitness evidence despite failure to link the recovered firearm	Failure to connect the seized firearms with the shooting through the ballistic report did not displace the reliable eyewitness account. Recovery of the actual weapon used is not essential to conviction where the offence is otherwise proved by trustworthy direct evidence. The Court applied that principle to reject the objection based on the inconclusive firearm linkage.	253
Missing spent cartridges do not necessarily contradict the number of shots	The Court rejected the argument that recovery of only two spent .12-bore cartridges disproved firing by four gunmen. The weapons were not alleged to be automatic, and a spent cartridge could remain in a gun that was not reloaded. Failure to find a cartridge for every alleged shot therefore did not undermine the proved firing in this case.	253
Nonproduction of seized weapon alone does not compel acquittal when seizure is proved	Nonproduction of a seized article does not, by itself, establish failure to prove seizure or require acquittal. Applying State of Rajasthan v. Sahi Ram, the Court noted that the earlier acquittals also involved defects in proof of seizure or linkage to the tested substance. In this Arms Act prosecution, the seizure witness had identified the country-made pistol and two cartridges as material exhibits A1 and A2, so the objection also failed on the record.	257
Failure to recover or link the weapon and reliable ocular evidence	Failure to recover the weapon of offence, or to establish that a seized weapon was the one used, does not by itself discredit otherwise reliable eyewitness evidence. The prosecution case must be assessed independently of that	274

	investigative omission, especially where the ocular account is supported by medical evidence.
Matching blood groups on the accused's clothes and a scene weapon	Human blood of group B was found on the accused's pant and one stone seized at the scene. The Court inferred that the blood was that of at least one deceased, considering the absence of injury on the accused and his failure to explain the stains. It treated the proved recovery and serology as an incriminating circumstance together with the last-seen evidence, rather than as a standalone substitute for the complete chain.	278
Human blood on recovered articles despite an undetermined blood group	Failure to determine the blood group does not make proved human blood on a recovered weapon or the accused's clothing irrelevant. Such evidence may provide a corroborative link when assessed with the other proved circumstances, though it need not conclusively identify the victim's blood. The unexplained human blood on the pickaxe and the accused's shirt was treated as an incriminating circumstance here.	294
Human blood on recovered articles without a matching blood group	An undetermined blood group does not make proved human blood on a recovered weapon or the accused's clothing irrelevant. Although it does not conclusively identify the stains as the victim's blood, it may corroborate other reliable evidence. The Court treated human blood on the recovered sickle and clothing as a link alongside the short last-seen interval and the unexplained separation, rather than as sufficient proof of murder by itself.	297
Unexplained human blood on the accused's clothing — corroborative circumstance	Human blood detected by the admissible FSL report on the accused's vest and trousers, for which he offered no explanation, was an incriminating circumstance considered with the reliable child eyewitness evidence and proved recovery. The finding formed part of the prosecution's combined proof of guilt.	341
Medical and Ballistic Evidence: Reconciling Shooter Attributions	Where eyewitnesses attribute a victim's injuries to different gunmen, medical and ballistic evidence may explain whether more than one weapon was used and identify the fatal injury. The recovery of both a .315 bullet fragment and a pellet from Mamta, read with the eyewitness evidence about the weapons, supported the finding that both gunmen fired at her and that the bullet injury caused her death. The Court also corrected an attribution inconsistent with the pellet injuries found on another deceased.	360
Human Blood on a Recovered Weapon Without a Reliable Link to the Assault	Recovery of an axe bearing human blood lost its significance where the blood group was not established and the injured witness attributed the axe blows to another accused, alleging only that the appellant held his collar. In the face of the unreliable identification evidence, the bloodstained recoveries did not establish the appellant's guilt.	372
Human Blood on a Weapon When Its Blood Group Is Undetermined	Failure to determine the blood group does not make the finding of human blood on a recovered weapon worthless. It can be an incriminating circumstance corroborating reliable direct evidence, particularly where the accused gives no explanation for its presence. Its value depends on the other proved links; the court must assess reasonable doubt objectively rather than rely on imaginative alternatives.	378
Absence of blood on a weapon allegedly seized immediately after the assault	The absence of blood on the seized spear assumed significance because, on the prosecution account, it was recovered immediately after the assaults and the accused had no time to wash it. The failure to seize his clothes also weakened that account. These circumstances were assessed with the unreliable eyewitness evidence and defective arrest and seizure records in concluding that the prosecution had failed to prove that the accused caused the fatal injuries.	390
Absence of Blood on Recovered Weapons and Non-Recovery of the Actual Weapon	Absence of blood on weapons recovered after an interval did not displace otherwise reliable proof of the assault. The Court considered the opportunity to clean weapons or produce different ones and held that even non-recovery of the actual weapon would not, by itself, falsify the prosecution case.	409

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Ballistic matching of the seized pistol, cartridge and recovered bullet	The investigating officer and seizure witness proved recovery of a .315-bore country-made pistol, a fired cartridge and a live cartridge from the appellant's house after his arrest. The FSL report linked both the fired cartridge and the bullet recovered from the deceased's body to that pistol. The Court treated this match as additional corroboration of the two eyewitness accounts and sustained the convictions under Section 302 IPC and Sections 25 and 27 Arms Act on the combined evidence.	445
Alcohol Detection Did Not Corroborate the Alleged Mixing in Food	The later production of a bottle and detection of ethyl alcohol did not establish that the appellant had mixed a substance in the deceased’s food. The prosecution witnesses themselves acknowledged his drinking. In those circumstances, the Court attributed the bottle to the deceased and rejected the alleged mixing as a concocted account.	455
Preservation of vomit as material evidence in suspected poisoning	Non-preservation of vomit after the asserted administration of a solution to empty the stomach materially weakened the account of treatment and poisoning on this record. The later finding of poison in the viscera did not answer the omission: when treatment was given, survival remained possible and the vomit was material for identifying the substance consumed. The omission formed part of the cumulative evidentiary doubt.	467
Ungrouped human blood on a disputed weapon: evidentiary link to the deceased	In this case, the finding of human blood on the knife did not positively connect it with the deceased because the blood group could not be ascertained. The Court applied the passage from Kansa Behra concerning the absence of blood-group evidence linking stains to the victim. This was an additional evidentiary deficiency alongside doubtful recovery and exclusion of the blood finding for failure to question the appellant under Section 313 CrPC.	550
Human blood without an identified group and absence of reliable connecting evidence	Failure to identify the blood group does not invariably deprive a finding of human blood of evidentiary value. It assumed significance here because the injured eyewitness had been disbelieved and no credible evidence connected the seized articles to the deceased. The ungrouped stains therefore did not establish that the blood was the deceased's.	573
Non-recovery of the firearm and proof of guilt	Recovery of the weapon used in the offence is not an indispensable condition for conviction. Non-recovery does not by itself discredit otherwise reliable proof of a firearm attack. Applying Rakesh, Gulab and Krishna Gope, the Court found no adverse effect from failure to recover the appellant’s weapon, particularly as he was arrested about five years after the occurrence.	622
Unproved weapon recovery and ballistic mismatch — credible direct evidence may still establish murder	Recovery of the actual weapon is not indispensable to a murder conviction; a recovered firearm not matching the crime material may be treated as no recovery. Ballistic expertise is not an inflexible requirement where unimpeachable direct evidence and the injuries clearly agree. Its importance depends on the circumstances, particularly where both firearm and crime cartridge are recovered or an apparent inconsistency requires explanation. Here, failure to prove the offence weapon did not defeat the credible eyewitness and medical evidence supporting murder.	638
Missing upper-garment gunshot marks — wound location and lower-garment forensic marks explained the absence	Absence of shot marks on the shirt and vest did not contradict the firearm injury where the entry wound was in the lower abdomen and travelled downward towards the thigh. Corresponding shot marks with lead on the trousers, and lead and nitrate around the underwear perforation, supported the medical account of the lower-body shot.	638
Forensic report dependent on proof of the underlying seizure	Where the seizure of the allegedly bloodstained clothing was not proved, the forensic report concerning that clothing lost its evidentiary effect. The conviction was assessed on the other circumstances rather than that unproved recovery.	683

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Failure to link a recovered gun with the shooting	Where damage to the fired cartridge's percussion cap prevents ballistic comparison, a functional gun and evidence of recent firing do not establish that the recovered gun was used in the offence. Suspicion about who damaged the cap does not justify an adverse inference against the accused. Failure to establish the actual weapon's recovery does not, however, displace credible eyewitness evidence corroborated by the injuries. Ballistic expert evidence is not indispensable in every firearm case; its necessity depends on the reliability of the direct evidence and any apparent inconsistency requiring expert explanation.	693
Conclusive cartridge comparison and limited bullet comparison	The FSL report established that the fired cartridge recovered at the scene had been discharged from Kunjilal's seized pistol. The recovered bullet had blood and barrel marks, but insufficient marks for a conclusive comparison, and its match was described only approximately. The Court relied on the definite cartridge-to-pistol link, together with the other evidence of firing; the weaker bullet comparison was not a conclusive weapon match.	761
Human blood on recovered articles as corroborative forensic evidence	After finding that the prosecution had established the spouses' company and the wife's homicidal death in the home, the Court also relied on the forensic report showing human blood on the knife, danda and towel. This was an additional circumstance supporting the prosecution case. The finding was confined to human blood on those articles.	774
Toxicology and prior recovery as corroborating circumstances	The Court treated recovery of a partly used strip of pills described as Trika 0.5 mg, followed by the viscera report recording lorazepam as a tranquilliser, as corroborating administration of a sedative before strangulation. It considered that the disclosure and seizure preceded receipt of the toxicology report and evaluated this inference with the other proved links in the circumstantial chain.	815
Unchallenged human-blood finding on a recovered weapon	The Court relied on the consistent seizure evidence and the forensic report identifying human blood on the axe recovered from the appellant. The investigating officer was not cross-examined about the forwarding document or forensic report, leaving that evidentiary link unchallenged. It was considered with the credible ocular and medical evidence when affirming the convictions.	817
Negative forensic finding on a sword alleged to bear blood stains	Although the seizure and forwarding documents described the recovered sword as blood-stained, the FSL report found no blood on it. On that evidence, recovery of the sword was not accepted as recovery of the murder weapon. The Court nevertheless assessed the independently proved abduction and last-seen circumstances in deciding the appellant's liability.	934
Absence of blood on the recovered weapon: effect of reliable ocular evidence	The absence of bloodstains on the seized knife did not undermine the conviction where reliable eyewitness evidence, corroborated by the medical findings, established the appellant's knife assault. The forensic report was negative for blood on the knife; it supplied no positive forensic link to the deceased.	971
Ungrouped human blood where other circumstantial links fail	Where the other incriminating circumstances were not proved, human blood on recovered weapons and clothes did not establish guilt without a link to the deceased. The deceased's articles indicated group A, while grouping on the accused's articles was inconclusive. In that evidentiary setting, the Court regarded the missing group connection as crucial and held the recoveries insufficient.	988

Homicidal Death — Medical Corroboration of Assault

Medical findings and ocular evidence establishing homicidal death	The number, nature and location of ante-mortem injuries may be assessed together with eyewitness evidence to determine whether death was homicidal. Here, injuries caused by sharp and blunt objects, medical evidence of haemorrhagic shock and the ocular account of assault together established the homicidal nature of death.	32

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Proof of homicidal death from firearm injuries	Homicidal death was established by the nature and location of the firearm injuries, their sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and the absence of evidence of self-infliction or accident. The doctor's omission to describe the death expressly as homicidal did not displace that conclusion. The postmortem evidence established excessive bleeding and shock from the firearm injuries.	90
Rigor mortis and an unchallenged medical estimate of time of death	The onset of rigor mortis varies with weather conditions and did not establish an earlier death contrary to the unchallenged medical estimate. The post-mortem, conducted about four hours after the alleged assault, placed death within the preceding three to twelve hours. No question challenging that interval was put to the doctor. The Court therefore rejected the claim that death must have occurred before the alleged incident. The sharp-weapon injuries and fatal shock and haemorrhage supported homicidal death; the doctor rejected the suggested collision with a steel board.	106
Medical evidence distinguishing homicidal strangulation from later burning of the body	Ante-mortem blunt-force injuries, airway obstruction from compression of the trachea and burns without inflammatory margins supported the finding that the victim died from strangulation before her body was burned. The Court accepted the medical evidence as establishing homicidal death and subsequent burning, and considered the other circumstances separately in determining the accused's responsibility.	138
Medical corroboration of a fatal firearm assault	Medical evidence of fatal firearm injuries to the head and chest corroborated the accepted eyewitness account of the armed attack and the two deaths. The Court assessed the medical findings with the surrounding evidence in sustaining the murder convictions.	160
Medical proof distinguishing homicidal head injuries from a fall	Where the medical evidence established fatal brain injury with multiple cranial fractures and the doctor excluded a fall as the cause of the fatal wounds, the Court found the death homicidal. The possibility that some lesser injuries could arise from a hard-surface fall did not explain the fatal head injuries.	248
Medical cause of death and proof that a death was homicidal	The doctor's inability to classify a gunshot death as homicidal or suicidal did not conclude that question. After finding the medical cause of death established, the Court considered the occurrence evidence and held the death homicidal because the accepted eyewitness account proved that the accused shot the deceased from close range.	274
Homicidal burning: combined eyewitness, forensic and scene evidence	The manner of a burn death was assessed from the evidence as a whole rather than the medical burns finding alone. Kerosene residues on the victim's hair and clothes corroborated the child's account. The missing kerosene container, considered with evidence that the husband had held one, also weighed against the suggested suicide. These combined circumstances supported homicidal burning on the particular record.	288
Medical evidence excluding an alleged accidental fall	The doctor’s evidence that the multiple penetrating injuries could not have resulted from a fall on building material supported the finding of homicidal death. The Court also considered that the adjoining plot contained a stack of bricks rather than the alleged iron rods or other material. The suggested fall did not explain the proved injuries on this record.	294
Fatal internal injury without an external wound	Absence of an external wound did not exclude fatal assault. The medical evidence showed death from internal bleeding caused by a lacerated cirrhotic liver and explained both the possibility of injury by a fall and why the seized heavy hammer would ordinarily leave external or rib injury. Fist blows could leave no external injury. After considering those limits with the deceased’s unchallenged report, the Court found that the beating caused the liver injury.	295
Medical evidence establishing homicidal death and	The medical and postmortem evidence established homicidal death from a head injury sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. The recorded	313

corroborating a dying declaration	incised injuries to the head and waist also corroborated the dying declaration's account of axe blows to those parts of the body.
Medical proof of homicidal death from a firearm head injury	The postmortem evidence of a firearm entry and exit wound, skull and brain damage, and death from shock and haemorrhage due to the head injury established homicidal death. The medical opinion that the firearm head injury was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature supported that conclusion.	319
Medical Evidence Establishing Homicidal Death and Corroborating Assault	The autopsy attributed death to a head injury resulting in coma, supporting the finding of homicidal death. Medical examination also recorded the complainant's injuries and the injuries to the later victims. Read with their testimony, those reports corroborated the assaults on the identified victims. The Court used that evidence in its separate assessment of the initial fatal attack and the later hurt offences.	388
Medical Findings Supported Homicidal Death and Postmortem Disposal in Water	The postmortem evidence attributed death to smothering and recorded internal injuries consistent with the alleged sexual assault. The diatom evidence showed diatoms in the water sample but none in the examined bone sample. Reading that evidence together, the Court accepted that the child had died before the body was put into the well and that the death was homicidal. This medical finding did not establish either the child’s claimed identity or the accused’s involvement, which required separate proof.	389
Medical findings establishing homicidal death by firearm injuries	The Court accepted the postmortem findings that the victims died from shock and haemorrhage caused by ante-mortem firearm injuries to vital organs, the heart in Kailashi’s case and the brain in Garsingh’s case. Those findings established homicidal deaths and, assessed with the accepted eyewitness accounts, supported the murder convictions despite the defence challenge to medical corroboration.	399
Fatal splenic injury —medical and ocular proof of homicidal death	The medical evidence of splenic injury and hypovolemic shock, read with the repeated blunt-force injuries and ocular evidence, established homicidal death. The suggestion that no blow was shown directly over the spleen did not justify reducing the offence in those circumstances.	412
Medical findings proving homicidal death from a close-range firearm injury	The entry wound to the chest, rupture of the heart and liver, vertebral injury and bullet lodged within the body supported the medical opinion that death resulted from the firearm injury. The doctor described close-range firing and recovered and sealed the bullet for further examination, while acknowledging that he could not identify the firearm as a ballistic expert. The Court accepted this evidence as establishing homicidal death.	445
Homicidal strangulation — Medical findings and eyewitness support	A request for further expert examination did not require rejection of the death's homicidal character when the medical and eyewitness evidence, read together, supported the assault. The doctor described ante-mortem neck abrasions, a forehead injury and homicidal death; that testimony remained unchallenged in cross-examination. The daughter's account of strangulation with a scarf was supported by two other witnesses. The Court accepted the combined evidence and upheld the murder conviction, rather than treating the referral for further opinion as conclusive of a nonhomicidal cause.	478
Fatal firearm injury to the thighs: medical corroboration of homicide	The Court relied on ante-mortem pellet injuries with blackening and charring, ruptured thigh arteries and extensive haemorrhage to establish homicidal death and corroborate the assault. The doctor considered the injuries sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Their surface location away from the chest or head did not prevent the Court from finding fatal sufficiency on this medical evidence.	555
Circumstantial proof of homicidal death despite an	Although examination of the skeletal remains did not establish a medical cause of death, the Court assessed the surrounding evidence and inferred that the	575

inconclusive skeletal postmortem	abductee had been killed and his body concealed. It rejected the proposed animal-attack explanation because the remains were hidden beneath stones and the bones bore no bite marks. The conclusion rested on those circumstances together with the proved abduction and ransom evidence.
Medical proof of homicidal firearm death despite omission of the label	Failure expressly to write that death was homicidal in a medical report did not prevent that conclusion from the proved injuries and the medical evidence as a whole. The Court found the clinical and post-mortem injuries consistent for one deceased and accepted the explanation that firearm injuries to vital parts established homicidal death for the other. The conclusion rested on the medical findings, rather than the presence of a particular label.	605
Homicidal firearm death — wound characteristics and post-mortem findings established the nature of death	A lower-abdominal gunshot wound with inverted margins, surrounding blackening, damage to muscles and major blood vessels, and recovery of a wad and pellets along the wound track established homicidal death. The absence of a .315-bore bullet did not displace the medical finding based on the pellet wound.	638
Homicidal death — multiple ante-mortem penetrating wounds	Medical evidence that multiple ante-mortem wounds from a sharp and penetrating object caused haemorrhage and shock established the homicidal nature of death, notwithstanding decomposition of the body.	682
Homicidal death — ante-mortem wounds and haemorrhagic shock	Unchallenged medical evidence of multiple ante-mortem injuries caused by blunt and sharp weapons, resulting in haemorrhage and shock, established that the deceased's death was homicidal.	683
Homicidal death from complications of firearm injuries	The Court found homicidal death proved by reading the eyewitness evidence and dying declaration with the medical and postmortem evidence. Death was attributed to intestinal injuries and the resulting septicaemia, notwithstanding the postmortem doctor's inability to describe the original wounds after surgical treatment.	720
Medical proof of strangulation despite absence of a posterior ligature mark	The Court accepted the post-mortem evidence of an ante-mortem ligature mark, underlying tissue changes and asphyxia as establishing homicidal strangulation. The medical witness explained that strangulation does not necessarily leave a ligature mark at the back of the neck and distinguished it from throttling. The absence of a posterior mark therefore did not undermine the accepted medical conclusion in this case.	815
Strangulation finding supported by neck and facial injuries despite post-mortem qualification referring to surrounding evidence	An autopsy opinion identified asphyxia from strangulation and homicidal mode, with multiple ante-mortem neck and facial injuries indicating struggle. The doctor's caveat that final assessment depended on circumstances and evidence did not retract the stated medical cause; the Court combined it with the injury pattern to establish homicidal death.	898
Medical evidence of homicidal death supporting the circumstantial case	The Court accepted the medical evidence that death resulted from haemorrhagic shock and injury to vital organs, with hard and blunt impact to the head and face. That finding of homicidal death supported the last-seen inference against the accused. The medical evidence established the nature and cause of death; his involvement was inferred from the combined circumstances.	979
Homicidal death — multiple blunt-force injuries and fatal internal damage	The post-mortem evidence of numerous fresh ante-mortem blunt-force and rail-pattern injuries, fractures and fatal damage to the liver, lungs and brain established homicidal death. The doctor maintained that the injuries were not explained by the suggested motorcycle fall, and cross-examination did not displace the medical account. The Court relied on that evidence to determine the homicidal nature of death before separately examining who inflicted the injuries.	993

	Sub-Chapter no. 21.4 Forensic Evidence, DNA Profiling and Expert Witness Examination
Negative or absent forensic testing and the remaining evidence	The absence of sperm in the vaginal slide did not by itself displace the prosecution case where the examination followed reporting about seventeen days after the incident. Relying on Sunil v. State of M.P., the Court also recognised that failure to conduct or prove DNA profiling, or a negative result, does not automatically require acquittal: the other evidence must still be weighed. The significance of the forensic result depends on the full record.	38
Admissibility of the FSL report under Section 293 CrPC	The Court treated the FSL report as admissible under Section 293 CrPC. Its admissibility did not permit reliance on an incriminating finding without first allowing the accused to explain that finding under Section 313 CrPC.	103
Reading an unexhibited FSL report under Section 293 CrPC	The FSL report could be read in evidence even though the trial court had not marked it as an exhibit. The Court relied on its admissibility under Section 293 CrPC together with the fact that the accused had been asked a specific question about it under Section 313 CrPC. The report accordingly established the nature of the seized contraband.	105
Scientific evidence despite a hostile prosecutrix	A prosecutrix turning hostile does not by itself preclude conviction supported by scientific or forensic evidence. Relying on Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi, the Court recognised that a DNA report could remain a crucial circumstance bearing on guilt despite hostile testimony. It did not determine the accused's guilt in the bail proceeding.	182
State responsibility for uninterrupted DNA-testing supplies	In this sexual-offence case, the Court treated DNA testing under Section 53-A CrPC as compulsory and held the State primarily responsible for ensuring the laboratory could conduct it. A shortage of consumables and standard kits had halted testing. The Director General of Police was directed to ensure uninterrupted supplies to RFSL, Sagar so that testing could be completed promptly.	182
Semen evidence without a scientific link to the accused	On this record, semen and sperm on the victim's clothes and vaginal slide did not establish that the appellant had attempted rape. The doctor's tentative suggestion of an attempt was unsupported by reasons in the postmortem findings, and the Court considered DNA testing necessary to determine whether the biological material was linked to the appellant. Semen on his own trousers did not supply that missing connection.	219
Handwriting comparison corroborated by independent evidence	The conviction did not rest solely on the handwriting expert’s report. Independent evidence that the accused procured the drafts, introduced the impostor to the purchaser and signed as a witness established his active role; signature comparison corroborated that evidence. The challenge based on expert evidence alone therefore failed on the actual evidentiary record.	234
Admissibility and use of the FSL report under Section 293 CrPC	The FSL report was treated as admissible under Section 293 CrPC. Its findings on the working condition of the seized pistol and comparison with the bullet recovered from the deceased were used to corroborate the prosecution case.	275
DNA evidence — paternity of a minor victim’s fetus	A DNA finding that the accused fathered his minor daughter’s fetus answered a different question from the natural genetic relationship between a father and daughter. The Court therefore rejected the argument that the match merely reflected that relationship and relied on fetal paternity, exclusion of the alternative suspect and the other proved circumstances to establish sexual intercourse. In discussing Ravi v. State of Maharashtra, it recognised the corroborative value of reliable DNA analysis while retaining the qualification that Y-STR profiling cannot distinguish males of the same paternal lineage. The forensic evidence was assessed with the surrounding circumstances.	301
Handwriting opinion	A handwriting expert's opinion is not conclusive and is not the only mode of	326

and other modes of proof at the quashing stage	proving handwriting. Applying Manorama Naik, the Court noted the available proof and comparison methods under Sections 45, 47 and 73 of the Evidence Act. The examiner excluded the writer of samples S5–S19 as the writer of Q1, but also reported a similarity in the letter 'La' between Q1 and writing marked A–A in the register. The Court described the overall report as inconclusive and declined to quash. Its conclusion called A–A the applicant's admitted writing, whereas the reproduced report itself described A–A only as another writing in the register.
DNA evidence — prior sealing of victim's clothes and allegation of contamination	The victim's underwear and clothes carried a Y-chromosome STR profile reported as matching the accused. Because the doctor had sealed the clothes before the accused was arrested, the Court rejected the possibility that the police had smeared the already sealed underwear with his semen after arrest. The DNA result was considered with the ocular and medical evidence in affirming the conviction.	332
Section 293 CrPC — use of an unexhibited government FSL report	The original State FSL report signed by its Joint Director could be read under Section 293 CrPC despite not being marked as an exhibit. A copy had been supplied to the accused, specific questions about its findings were put under Section 313 CrPC, and he had not requested cross-examination of the scientific officer. Section 293 permits reports of the specified government scientific experts to be used without routine examination of their authors. Trial courts should nevertheless ensure that such admissible reports are exhibited.	341
Admitted cheque signature and delivery — handwriting reference for remaining entries unnecessary	Where the accused in a Section 138 NI Act trial expressly admitted in his Section 313 CrPC answers that he signed and delivered the disputed cheque, the Court found no error in refusing his later request for handwriting-expert examination. The remaining contents need not be in the signatory's handwriting, and identifying their writer would not answer the statutory effect of admitted signature and delivery. The application had followed completion of the complainant's evidence and the accused's examination. The separate repayment defence remained for the trial court.	349
DNA Comparison: Available Forensic Material Despite Elapsed Time	Where human sperm was found on the preserved anal slide, the Court held that DNA could be extracted and compared with the accused's profile. Passage of time did not, on that record, make the proposed test futile. A differing profile could also produce evidence favourable to the accused, so the comparison could assist in testing the allegation in either direction.	364
Section 53-A CrPC: DNA Examination in the Alleged Unnatural-Act Case	The Court upheld the investigating officer's Section 53-A CrPC notice for medical examination in this case, while expressly recognising that the provision deals with rape. Its conclusion rested on the alleged unnatural sexual act, the human sperm found on the anal slide and the Supreme Court's direction requiring the petitioner's cooperation with investigation.	364
DNA Testing: Privacy Objection and the Needs of Justice	The privacy objection did not invalidate the DNA comparison on the facts before the Court. Relying on Dipanwita Roy's discussion of fact-dependent testing and preservation of privacy so far as compatible with justice, the Court found that the available sample and the need to test the wife's allegation justified the proposed examination.	364
DNA Match Rejected Where the Tested Clothing Had Unreliable Provenance	The accused's DNA profile on the black slacks did not establish the alleged offence on this record. The Court found the asserted seizure date untrustworthy, the slacks remained open and unsealed until their later dispatch, the biological source of the profile was unexplained, and the expected connection with the child was not established. Those circumstances gave an opportunity for manipulation and made this particular DNA circumstance unreliable.	389
Medical Supervision and Proof of Blood-Sample Collection	The mere fact that another person drew the blood did not make the collection procedure unacceptable where the doctor testified that it occurred in his presence and that he sealed the vials himself. The defence had not confronted	389

	him with the medical-text guideline on which it relied. Nevertheless, the Court found the overall collection circumstance unproved beyond reasonable doubt because the asserted presence of outside witnesses inside the jail lacked supporting permission or testimony.
Typographical sample-code error in a DNA report	A typographical sample-code discrepancy did not undermine the DNA report where the other article bearing that code had been returned unopened, the expert identified the accused's blood as the source of his DNA profile, and that evidence was not challenged in cross-examination. The reciprocal finding of the deceased's DNA on the accused's clothes further supported the report. A discrepancy not affecting the root of the evidence should be put to the witness for explanation before being relied upon to discredit it.	391
Challenge to preservation and dispatch of a blood sample	The Court rejected the suggestion that the blood sample had deteriorated where no preservation challenge was put to the doctors or investigator, no scientific material supported the suggested loss of usable DNA, and the laboratory received the container with its seal intact. Collection on 29 July, dispatch on 31 July and receipt on 2 August also did not establish the alleged delay.	391
Button and thread comparison as corroborative evidence	The Court accepted the expert's comparison linking a recovered button to the accused's shirt. The matching material, colour, design, holes and engraving, together with matching broken threads and a missing shirt button, supported that conclusion. The difference in measurements did not displace it, particularly when the expert was not questioned about that difference. The finding was assessed with the other forensic evidence.	391
DNA findings corroborating last-seen and medical evidence	The expert's accepted analysis found matching profiles in the child's anal swab and nail material, corresponding components in mixed profiles from the accused's pubic-hair and clothing exhibits, and the child's profile on the recovered stone. The Court assessed those findings together with the accepted last-seen testimony and medical evidence and relied on their convergence to connect the accused to the sexual assault and killing.	393
Categorical objection to DNA analysis of cut pubic hair	The Court rejected the proposition that cutting pubic hair necessarily makes DNA analysis of that exhibit worthless. It distinguished the amount and type of DNA obtainable from different parts of hair and considered the laboratory's actual profiling methods and cross-exhibit findings. Its acceptance of the report formed part of the combined forensic and last-seen assessment.	393
Corroborative value and limitation of Y-STR profiling	The reproduced and relied-upon Ravi decision recognised Y-STR analysis as useful corroborative evidence in sexual-assault cases, while acknowledging that it cannot distinguish males of the same paternal lineage. Its weight depends on the match, the reliability of the analysis and the other circumstances. The Court considered Y-STR findings together with autosomal profiles and the other evidence in this case.	393
Matching DNA findings assessed with medical and circumstantial evidence	The accepted laboratory report found a common Y-STR profile linking the accused's blood sample to the child's clothing, vaginal slides and swabs, nail clippings and recovered hair. No Y-STR profile was obtained from the seized grass. The Court considered the sealed specimen evidence, medical findings and documented injuries together with the last-seen and discovery evidence, and relied on the combined proof to establish the accused's involvement.	397
Ballistic and Physical-Match Evidence Corroborating Eyewitnesses	Forensic matching may corroborate an eyewitness account by linking a seized firearm to physical traces at the scene. Here a handle fragment fitted Teerath's gun and a recovered cartridge was found to have been fired from it. Nitrate in the seized barrels and the reported compatibility of recovered pellets provided further support for firearm use; these findings were considered with the ocular evidence.	409
Recurring uninterpretable	Noting repeated reports of very low, uninterpretable Y-chromosome results and	413

DNA results—DGP corrective oversight	earlier concerns about the Sagar DNA laboratory, the Court invited the DGP's attention to remedy the recurring problem. It left the possible causes for examination rather than finding that a particular kit defect or deliberate testing failure was proved in this case.
Weight of a positive human-blood FSL report where custody and seal integrity are unproved	Disproportionate weight cannot be given to an FSL report without proof of the chain of custody and intact seal. Although the appellant's recovered jeans and jacket tested positive for human blood, the investigating officer did not testify about dispatch, laboratory receipt or the forensic report. The documents were marked after prosecution evidence had closed, leaving no opportunity to cross-examine him about safe custody and sealed transfer. The positive result therefore did not provide reliable support sufficient to sustain conviction alongside the defective eyewitness account and unproved motive.	422
Missing FSL report — Independent proof and qualified corroboration rule	A missing FSL report did not defeat the independently reliable eyewitness, surrounding and medical evidence accepted in this case. The Court also reasoned that partial penetration need not involve discharge. The narrated Sham Singh rule permits reliance on a prosecutrix's trustworthy testimony without routine corroboration, while allowing assurance where confidence is lacking and requiring protection against false implication. That rule is not a presumption of universal truth. Here, the infant did not testify, and the finding rested on the adult witnesses and medical evidence; no positive forensic result was inferred.	477
Rape prosecution — absence of DNA evidence where other proof is conclusive	Failure to prove a DNA report does not by itself require acquittal where the remaining evidence conclusively establishes the offence and the accused's involvement. Applying Sunil, the Court relied on the medical evidence, eyewitness proof of abduction, prompt named FIR and recoveries on the appellant's information. It also noted that the appellant had never requested production of a DNA report said to assist his defence. The conviction rested on the sufficiency of the other evidence.	482
DNA evidence: doubtful seizure and identity of the hair sample	A DNA result did not establish the prosecution's case where the recovery of the tested hair from the deceased's hand was itself doubtful. The scene scientist described removing two small hairs before 3:30 a.m., whereas the later seizure account described eight to ten hairs taken by the investigating officer at 6:10 a.m. The officer changed his account of collection, and neither the seizure record nor the laboratory forwarding memo specified the number of hairs. Unexplained differences in the time, collector, quantity and size of the material undermined the foundational seizure on which the DNA inference depended.	553
Recovered knife without a forensic link to the assault	Recovery of the knife did not advance the prosecution case where the forensic laboratory could not compare clothing cuts with it because it was rusted and blunt, and the blood found on it was insufficient for testing. In the absence of those connecting results, this recovery did not supply the missing corroboration in the case.	553
DNA identification of recovered skeletal remains	DNA comparison of the recovered skull and humerus with the parents' blood samples established that the remains were those of their missing son. The Court used the DNA result to determine identity; whether the death was homicidal was assessed separately from the surrounding circumstances.	575
DNA Comparison After Closure of Defence Evidence in a Rape Trial	Where the FSL report established human sperm and semen on the complainant's undergarments, the Court held DNA comparison with the accused to be essential under Section 53-A CrPC for a just decision. Applying the narrated Krishan Kumar Malik and Siva Vallabhaneni principles, and the relevant direction in Raja Burman, the Court held that medical examination and DNA testing may be directed at a later stage, including after defence evidence has closed and the case is fixed for final arguments. Any benefit claimed from delay in medical examination may be urged at trial; delay does not itself bar the	658 direction.

DNA Testing During a POCSO Trial Despite Omission During Investigation	The prosecution's failure to obtain DNA testing during investigation does not deprive the trial court of power to permit it during trial when the evidence is necessary for a just decision. In the sexual-offence prosecution before the POCSO Special Court, the Court invoked Section 53-A CrPC and the narrated Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi v. State of Gujarat principles, described DNA testing as imperative, and upheld permission to conduct it after the complainant turned hostile. The earlier investigative omission therefore did not establish the jurisdictional error alleged against the trial court.	659
DNA paternity evidence and the separate inquiry whether rape occurred	The Court accepted the DNA report as establishing that the petitioner and complainant were the child's biological parents and had had a physical relationship. It then separately examined whether that relationship amounted to rape under Sections 375 and 90 IPC. The finding of parentage supplied proof of the relationship for that inquiry.	669
Absence of blood on the alleged weapon and other evidence of assault	Absence of blood on the brick was insufficient to discard the prosecution case where the child's body was found at the scene with severe laceration of the head, multiple skull fractures and exposed brain matter, and the surrounding evidence connected the accused with the fatal assault. The forensic omission was assessed against the medical and other evidence as a whole.	691
Failure to obtain advised DNA evidence of paternity	Where the accusation attributed pregnancy and childbirth to the appellant's repeated forcible intercourse, the unexplained failure to obtain DNA evidence of paternity, despite the examining doctor's advice, was treated as a serious gap in the prosecution case. The omission was assessed with the other deficiencies and doubts about the testimony. The judgment also recognised that sufficiently trustworthy testimony of the prosecutrix alone can sustain a rape conviction.	694
Scientific evidence despite a hostile prosecutrix	A prosecutrix turning hostile does not necessarily prevent conviction where scientific evidence supports the prosecution. Applying that principle at the bail stage, the Court treated the FSL finding of human sperm on the prosecutrix's slide and swab as material against granting bail merely on the ground of her hostility.	727
Unexhibited FSL report — no usable forensic proof linking seized articles to the offence	The Court stated that an FSL report produced before the trial court had not been exhibited under Section 293 CrPC and therefore could not be read against the appellant or for the prosecution. In its recovery discussion, it described the FSL report as unavailable on the record and found no evidence that blood, much less human blood, was present on the farsa or the appellant's clothes. Although the investigating officer said that the articles had been sent to the laboratory, the alleged bloodstained recovery was not proved as an incriminating circumstance. The Court consequently rejected that second link in the circumstantial case.	747
Handwriting expert opinion as one mode of proof at the charge stage	An expert's handwriting opinion is not the only mode of proving handwriting or a signature; proof may also be given through the methods recognised by Sections 45, 47 and 73 of the Evidence Act. Applying Manorama Naik, the Court declined to treat the opinion relied on by the applicant as decisive against framing charges. The report was not before the trial court when charges were framed, and sufficient material otherwise required the applicant to stand trial. His lawful defences remained open at trial.	758
Forensic evidence contradicting a prosecutrix's denial at the charge stage	Scientific or forensic evidence may sustain a prosecution, and even a conviction on adequate proof, despite the prosecutrix turning hostile. Applying the principle stated in Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi, the Court held that the prosecutrix's denial of physical relations appeared false in light of the reported DNA match with the co-accused on clothing seized before his arrest. The match concerned the co-accused, not the applicant. It supported refusal to interfere with the charges; it was not a final determination of the applicant's rape or abetment liability.	768

Section 293 CrPC — Government scientific reports and examination of the expert	Section 293(1) CrPC permits a report of a specified Government scientific expert on material duly submitted for examination or analysis in criminal proceedings to be used as evidence. The Court may summon and examine the expert. If the expert cannot attend, a responsible officer conversant with the case may attend on his behalf unless personal attendance was expressly directed. The Court read the FSL report in evidence where its maker had not testified and the appellant had not applied to cross-examine him. The report recorded human sperm and semen stains on the victim's anal slide, swab and underwear and on the appellant's underwear.	886
Y-DNA evidence assessed with sample collection, custody and transfer	The Y-DNA profile obtained from the victim's vaginal slide and swab matched the profile derived from the accused's blood sample. The allegation of misuse of the collected blood was unsupported by significant evidence of collection error, compromised custody or unsafe transfer to the FSL, and the report's authenticity was not challenged. The Court treated the match, together with last-seen evidence, CCTV and subsequent conduct, as establishing the circumstantial chain. Its assessment depended on the sample and custody record before it.	915
Reasoned adjudication of objections to a DNA report under Section 293 CrPC	Where a DNA report is to be relied on against an accused, the court must identify the objections raised and decide them with reasons. Merely describing them as ineffective is insufficient when life and liberty are at stake. The report's marking under Section 293 CrPC did not remove the duty to address the defence objections fairly. The Court directed fresh exhibition after deciding the objections or examining the scientific officer, leaving any request for cross-examination to be decided according to law and expressing no final view on the report's reliability.	917
DNA comparison establishing the identity of a decomposed body	Identification of the decomposed body by the deceased's father was confirmed by DNA comparison with samples taken from both parents. The DNA report and the testing expert's evidence established their biological parentage of the recovered remains. The Court accepted this evidence as establishing the deceased's identity.	934
Negative DNA result: assessment of the prosecutrix's testimony	A DNA report provides corroborative evidence. A negative result, or a result that does not support the prosecutrix, does not by itself justify discarding her testimony; its reliability and credibility must be assessed on the prosecution evidence. A result adverse to the accused may supply an additional link connecting the accused with the offence. In refusing to postpone judgment pending a late-requested test, the Court did not decide the accused's guilt or the credibility of the prosecutrix on an actual DNA result.	946
Handwriting opinion: caution, reasons and corroboration	A handwriting expert's opinion is relevant but is not conclusive and must be examined cautiously with its reasons and the other evidence. Prudence may require independent corroboration, but there is no inflexible rule requiring it in every case or permitting rejection of an opinion supported by unchallenged reasons solely for want of corroboration. A favourable opinion therefore does not automatically establish innocence.	973

Identification Evidence and Test Identification Parade

Sub-Chapter no. 22.1
Test Identification Parade and Dock Identification

Frightened child — failed test parade and reliable identification in court	A young child's failure to identify the accused at a test identification parade must be assessed in light of recorded fear and the surrounding circumstances. Where the magistrate recorded that the six-year-old victim was too frightened to look at the suspect, and the trial judge observed similar reluctance followed by immediate and repeated identification after persuasion, the Court did not	9

	treat the failed parade as discrediting her identification. Her account was assessed with the other witnesses' reliable identifications and the medical evidence.
Identification evidence — substantive court testimony and corroborative test parade	Identification in court is substantive evidence; a test identification parade belongs to investigation and ordinarily tests and corroborates that evidence. The CrPC neither makes a parade compulsory in every case nor gives the accused a right to demand one. Failure to hold a parade does not make identification in court inadmissible, though the Court must decide its weight in the particular circumstances.	9
First identification in court — caution where the accused was a stranger	Identification of a previously unknown accused for the first time at trial is ordinarily weak evidence, so prior test identification is generally sought as a safeguard. The need and weight of corroboration depend on the witness's opportunity to observe, familiarity, the time elapsed and surrounding circumstances. A parade is particularly desirable after only a brief encounter with a stranger; the Court may nevertheless accept an exceptionally reliable identifying witness without such corroboration.	9
Test identification parade — promptness, explained delay and exposure	A test identification parade should ordinarily be held as soon as practicable to reduce mistakes. Delay must be assessed with its explanation, and safeguards are needed to prevent the accused being exposed to witnesses in a way that may influence identification. There is no invariable time limit applicable to every parade; reliability is decided from the circumstances and evidence.	9
Identification — no fixed minimum number of identifying witnesses	No invariable number of identifying witnesses is required to sustain conviction. An offence such as rape may be witnessed only by the victim, and a truthful and reliable victim's identification is not insufficient merely because no second identifying witness is available. The Court must assess the identification on the whole record.	9
Identification — guilt may be established by reliable circumstantial evidence	Identification in a test parade or in court is not indispensable in every prosecution if the accused's guilt is otherwise established by the circumstances. The absence or failure of identification must therefore be considered with the remaining evidence, rather than treated as an automatic ground for acquittal.	9
Test identification parade — corroboration and substantive connecting evidence	The Iqbal principle reproduced through Gadhvi treats test-identification-parade evidence as corroborative rather than substantive evidence on which conviction can rest alone. The prosecution must produce substantive incriminating evidence connecting the accused with the crime. In the relied-upon Gadhvi decision, medical and serological material was considered with identification evidence despite the prosecutrix's later failure to identify the accused in court.	58
Absence of a test identification parade in assessing bail	Failure to hold a test identification parade supported bail where the applicant was linked to an alleged escape from an intercepted vehicle only through a co-accused’s inadmissible police confession, with no other substantive evidence identifying him. The conclusion depended on the combined evidentiary deficiencies in that case.	146
Corroborative value of a test identification parade	Identification during investigation is corroborative rather than substantive evidence. Although the officer conducting the parade said that the witness had identified the appellant, the witness gave no such evidence in Court and claimed already to know him. The parade could therefore not establish guilt or cure the unreliable evidence of his presence. The Court did not find it necessary to decide the reliability of the parade on the separate ground that it took place in a police station.	157
Identification without proof of participation or shared common	Identification of an accused does not by itself establish participation in the charged offences. Where the abductees assigned no role to the identified woman, no recovery connected her to the crime, and neither gang membership	183

object	nor a shared common object was proved, her identification in the parade and in court was insufficient for conviction. Her presence in the forest, even if accepted, did not fill those gaps.
Test identification parade without a proved mixed line-up	A test identification parade loses reliability where the prosecution fails to establish that other persons were mixed with the accused, leaving no genuine exercise of the witness's memory. Here, the parade memo omitted that safeguard, and the conducting officer could neither identify the other participants nor explain how they were arranged. His oral assertion did not establish a proper mixed line-up, and the Court rejected the parade.	183
Reliability of a parade assessed separately for each identifying witness	A parade rejected for a witness's prior exposure to the accused was not automatically unreliable for another witness who had no such opportunity. The second abductee's absence from Gwalior before the jail parade, the conducting officer's evidence of mixed participants and his denial of prior display supported the identifications of Kamal Kishore and Ramvilas. A general objection that covered faces were not proved did not displace that evidence. His failure to identify Deependra remained material to Deependra's case.	183
Dock identification and the corroborative role of a test parade	Identification in court is substantive evidence; a test identification parade is an investigative safeguard used to test and corroborate that evidence. A parade is not a mandatory right of the accused, and its absence does not make dock identification inadmissible. Identification of a stranger for the first time at trial ordinarily calls for caution and corroboration, but a court may accept it without such corroboration where the witness and circumstances make it safe to do so. Photo identification likewise does not itself become substantive proof.	183
Prior exposure of the accused before test identification	A parade cannot provide reliable corroboration when the identifying witness has already been shown or has seen the suspects before it. Repeating the parade does not remove the effect of that exposure. Applying Gireesan Nair, the Court rejected one abductee's identifications because he had seen the suspects in the Crime Branch office before the first parade and again at that parade before the second. The Court also declined to rely on his dock identification in those circumstances.	183
Timing of identification and number of identifying witnesses	A test identification parade should be held without avoidable or unreasonable delay to protect against prior exposure and fading memory. There is no fixed universal time limit or required number of identifying witnesses. Delay beyond the prosecution's control is not necessarily fatal, but its reasons and all surrounding circumstances must be considered when deciding the weight of identification.	183
Identification at close range in poor evening light	Identification cannot be rejected merely because the incident occurred in poor evening light. The witnesses' familiarity with rural lighting conditions, proximity to the assailants and the actual available sources of light must be considered. Close-range observation and the tractor and car lights supplied a sufficient basis for identification in this case.	248
Names given during investigation and absence of a TIP	The Court rejected the objection that absence of a test identification parade necessarily defeated the prosecution, because the abductee had named the miscreants in his police statement. It treated dock identification as substantive evidence and assessed its weight in the circumstances, including the other prosecution evidence. It did not treat absence of a TIP after arrest, or the abductee's failure to identify in the dock by itself, as decisive against the prosecution.	279
Substantive identification evidence and the role of a TIP	Identification in court is substantive evidence. A test identification parade is an investigative means of checking identity and corroborating later testimony; it is not substantive evidence or a procedure the accused can demand as of right. Its absence does not make identification in court inadmissible, and the weight of that identification depends on the facts.	279

22.1 : Test Identification Parade and Dock Identification

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
First-time identification of an unfamiliar accused	First-time dock identification of a stranger is ordinarily weak and generally requires prior identification or other corroborative evidence. A TIP is desirable for a complete stranger unless the witness had sufficient opportunity to observe the person. The rule is one of prudence, and exceptionally reliable testimony may be accepted without that corroboration.	279
No fixed period or witness count for a TIP	There is no invariable time limit for holding a test identification parade or fixed number of identifying witnesses necessary to sustain a conviction. The court must assess the delay, opportunity for identification and the other circumstances on the evidence of the particular case.	279
Proof of identity by circumstances despite failed identification	Identification at a TIP or in court is not indispensable in every case if the accused's guilt is otherwise established by the circumstances. Failure of identification is therefore not automatically fatal, but the remaining evidence must independently justify the conclusion.	279
Prior exposure and defective identification safeguards	Identification must be assessed for reliability in the circumstances of the case. Prior courthouse exposure, failure to protect the accused's identity, an uncorroborated dock identification and defects in proving the identification parade together made the alleged captors' identification unsafe here. The Court's rejection rested on these combined defects and the absence of other reliable corroboration, rather than an invariable requirement to hold a parade.	284
Dock identification and test identification parade: evidentiary roles	Identification in court is substantive evidence; a test identification parade during investigation ordinarily tests and corroborates its reliability. A parade is not a statutory right of the accused, and its absence does not make dock identification inadmissible. Identification of a stranger for the first time at trial ordinarily calls for caution and corroboration, although reliable identification may be accepted without a parade in appropriate circumstances.	284
Identification parade: no fixed time limit or required number of identifiers	No invariable period for holding a test identification parade, or fixed number of witnesses who must identify the accused, determines whether identification can sustain conviction. The court must assess all the circumstances and the reliability of the evidence. Delay or a single identifying witness cannot be judged by a mechanical rule.	284
Visual identification when a witness learned the accused’s name from another person	Learning the accused’s name from another witness did not negate a witness’s own identification of the person seen fleeing. The Court assessed the witnesses’ dock identification with their accounts of seeing the appellant at the scene and the corroborating witness evidence. On that record, uncertainty about who supplied the name did not defeat proof of identity.	298
Dock Identification Supported by a Prior Test Identification Parade	The injured witness’s identification of the accused in court was accepted where it had been preceded by identification in a test identification parade and no substantial reason to doubt either identification or to infer false implication emerged from cross-examination.	378
Identification After Prolonged Captivity and Reasonably Prompt Parades	Captivity lasting more than thirty days gave the abductees adequate opportunity to remember the accused’s faces and physical appearance. Their identification in parades held within a reasonable time after arrest, followed by reliable court identification, established identity. Each accused’s identification was assessed separately rather than treating every witness’s success or failure as conclusive for all accused.	379
Substantive Court Identification and Corroborative Test Identification	Identification in court is substantive evidence; a test identification parade is an investigative step providing corroboration and testing its reliability. A parade is not a statutory right of the accused, and its absence does not make court identification inadmissible. First-time identification of a stranger at trial is ordinarily weak and generally calls for corroboration, though a court may rely on an exceptionally trustworthy witness without it. Identification is not indispensable where guilt is otherwise established by circumstances.	379

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Failure of Court Identification After a Long Lapse Following a Successful Parade	A witness's failure to identify an accused in court years after the incident does not necessarily destroy the evidence where the witness correctly identified the accused in an earlier parade. Fading memory and the interval before testimony must be considered with the reliable earlier identification and the remaining evidence.	379
No Fixed Period or Minimum Number of Witnesses for Test Identification	No invariable period for holding a test identification parade, or minimum number of identifying witnesses, governs every case. The court must assess timing, opportunity to observe and reliability in the particular circumstances. A truthful and reliable single identifying witness can suffice; delay in arrest does not by itself set a fixed deadline that defeats identification.	379
Unexhibited Arrest Memo Considered for the Accused's Benefit in Assessing Parade Delay	An unexhibited prosecution document may be examined where it favours the accused. The court accordingly looked at the unexhibited arrest memoranda to assess whether the identification parades had been delayed, rather than treating non-exhibition as a reason to deny that favourable inquiry.	379
Weight of First-Time Dock Identification Without a Test Identification Parade	Identification in court is substantive evidence, while a test identification parade ordinarily tests and corroborates a witness's ability to identify an unfamiliar person. Absence of a parade does not make dock identification inadmissible or inevitably defeat a prosecution, but the reliability of the witness's opportunity and capacity to identify must be carefully examined. Applying Prakash and Malkhansingh, the Court declined to rely on the auto-driver's identification because the circumstances indicated tutoring and did not furnish trustworthy prior recognition.	389
Recognition of a familiar villager in poor light	Identification of a person already known to a rural witness cannot be rejected merely because the light was poor or the witness saw the person from behind. Familiarity, walking style, body build and the witness's accustomed visual conditions are relevant. On that basis, the Court accepted the witness's recognition of the accused at about 4 a.m.	391
Recognition of a known villager in darkness	A rural witness's recognition of a familiar co-villager cannot be rejected merely because the light was poor. The Court considered the witness's familiarity, initial recognition from walking style, and his subsequent approach and conversation with the accused. Those circumstances supported his identification of the accused and child together.	397
Prior Exposure and the Reliability of Dock Identification	A complainant's prior exposure to an accused outside a proper identification procedure may undermine later dock identification. Where the complainant had seen Insaf in jail before identifying him at trial and no incriminating recovery independently linked him to the robbery, the identification was doubtful and guilt was not established beyond reasonable doubt.	405
Dock Identification without a Prior Test Identification Parade	Identification in court on oath is substantive evidence; a test identification parade is an investigative means of testing and corroborating it. Failure to hold a parade does not make dock identification inadmissible or automatically require acquittal. First-time identification of a stranger is ordinarily weak and prudence generally calls for corroboration, but the Court may rely on it where the witness and surrounding circumstances make the identification trustworthy.	405
Recognition of a familiar assailant in a partly open market at night	A familiar person's identification is not rejected merely because the incident occurred at night or in limited light. The Court considered the witnesses' prior knowledge of the appellant, their close vantage, the narrow road with shops on both sides and evidence that some shops remained open. No load shedding was suggested. Applying the narrated familiar-person recognition authorities to those conditions, it rejected the contention that insufficient light prevented identification.	445
Test identification and substantive	A police test identification parade is corroborative and is not substantive evidence; identification in court is substantive evidence. In this case, the	508

identity evidence after an express concession	complainant had identified the appellants in the prior parade, and defence counsel expressly did not dispute identity when seeking their exemption from personal attendance at his examination. On that combination, the Court treated identity as reliably proved and described the in-court identification as substantive evidence supported by the earlier parade. Its conclusion depended on the recorded dispensation and concession, rather than treating the police parade as substantive proof by itself.
Reliably proved identification despite lack of incriminating recovery from one accused	The absence of incriminating recovery from a particular appellant did not defeat his robbery conviction on the record before the Court. Although the cash recovered from Laxman could not be linked to the stolen money, the complainant's identification of him had been established through the prior parade and the express concession on identity at trial. The Court relied on that proved identity and the relevance of identification under Section 9 of the Evidence Act and Section 54-A CrPC in affirming his conviction.	508
Failed test identification — weight of reliable dock identification of a known accused	Identification in court is substantive evidence; a test identification parade is an investigative aid providing corroboration and is neither mandatory nor an accused's statutory right. First-time identification of a stranger in court is ordinarily weak, so earlier identification or other corroboration is generally prudent, subject to exceptions where the witness is reliably believed. The assessment remains fact-specific. The Court accepted identification of Purshottam, who was known to the complainant, promptly named in the FIR and identified in court at close range. Her poor eyesight was treated as a possible explanation for failure at the parade. The two other appellants were neither named in the FIR nor identified at the parade or in court.	548
Identification of familiar neighbours in poor evening light	Identification of well-known neighbours cannot be rejected solely because the incident occurred in poor evening light. Familiarity, rural conditions and the opportunity to observe the accused at close range must be considered. The Court relied on the accused's proximity as neighbours and the witness's observation of the incident beginning at her own house.	577
Reliability of dock identification without a prior identification parade	Identity may be proved by dock identification even without a prior test identification parade, but the witness’s opportunity to observe and consistency remain material. Here, one injured witness did not identify the attackers, another admitted losing consciousness before seeing them, and the remaining witness’s account contained major omissions and contradictions about identification and the light source. The Court found the dock identification insufficient to establish the appellants’ participation beyond reasonable doubt.	604
Identification of known assailants in limited evening light	Identification of a known assailant cannot be rejected merely because evening light was limited. The Court considered the burning gas lantern, the shop setting, close-range firing and the parties’ familiarity. Applying Ramesh, it also recognised that rural witnesses’ visual capacity may be accustomed to poorer light than that of urban residents. On the actual conditions proved, the witnesses had sufficient light and opportunity to identify the accused.	605
Failure to conduct identification parade after production of accused	Where the applicant was produced from another jail on a warrant, further investigation into his identification remained necessary. The first bail order had noted the absence of a test identification parade. At the second hearing, despite police knowledge of his whereabouts and production, the parade had still not been held and the request to the Tahsildar had been made only the previous day. The Court treated that inaction as an investigative failure contributing to the absence of substantive admissible evidence; it did not decide the reliability of any later identification.	674
Identification of known villagers in poor evening light	Identification of an already known assailant is not to be rejected merely because the incident occurred in evening light or poor illumination. The witness’s familiarity and actual opportunity to identify must be assessed. Here the	698

Identification of known villagers in poor evening light	Identification of an already known assailant is not to be rejected merely because the incident occurred in evening light or poor illumination. The witness's familiarity and actual opportunity to identify must be assessed. Here the assailants were fellow villagers known to the injured witnesses, the assault continued in the village, and the defence itself elicited that it was a full-moon night. Those circumstances supported rejection of the insufficient-light objection.	699
Dock identification contradicted by the witness's admission	The abductee's identification of the appellant in court could not safely establish identity when the same witness admitted that he had never seen the appellant during confinement and did not know who had abducted him. The Court held that the trial court had erred in relying on that contradictory identification evidence.	711
Dock identification, TIP corroboration and proof of the offence	Identification in court is substantive evidence of identity under Section 9 of the Evidence Act; a test identification parade is corroborative and assists investigation. The Court may require an accused to submit to identification under Section 54A CrPC. Even reliable identification does not itself prove guilt: the prosecution must establish the alleged criminal acts through direct or circumstantial evidence.	716
Absence of TIP or failure of identification is not invariably fatal	An accused has no absolute right to a test identification parade, and its absence does not make in-court identification inadmissible. First-time identification of a stranger in court is ordinarily weak and prudence calls for corroboration, subject to reliable exceptions. Failure of dock identification does not invariably exclude an earlier TIP when other corroborative evidence exists; guilt may also be established by reliable circumstantial evidence even without identification.	716
Prompt TIP and protection against prior exposure of the suspect	Where the suspect was not previously known to the witness, a prompt identification parade tests the witness's memory of the first impression and reduces the risk of prior exposure to the suspect. A delay caused by circumstances beyond control is not by itself fatal. The parade remains an investigative and corroborative test rather than substantive proof of guilt.	716
Dock identification and explained irregularity in the test identification memo	The Court observed that — identification in court is substantive evidence; a test identification parade is corroborative, so a plausible explained date correction in its memo, without evidence of prior exposure, did not destroy the unchallenged dock identification. The complainant had been detained with the armed abductors and conversed with them at close range before the victim was taken away around 7 p.m.; the FIR did not state that he first saw them at 7 p.m. Applying Ramesh v. State, (2010) 15 SCC 49, the Court rejected a mechanical inference that evening or limited light made a rural eyewitness unable to recognise a nearby person. It accepted the Naib Tahsildar's account that an unused earlier parade proforma required alteration of the date, and found no evidentiary basis that the witness saw the appellant between arrest and parade. A separate witness's ransom-call version was excluded as hearsay and unproved attribution, yet the complainant's direct evidence of taking, demand and threat supported the conviction under Section 364A IPC and Sections 11/13 MPDVPK Act. The inference depends on opportunity, credibility and the record; it is not a rule that dock identification always cures a tainted parade.	731
Identification of unknown abductors — unreliable dock identification and absence of a parade	The Court found identification unreliable on the evidence in each separate trial. The abductee had not previously known the miscreants or supplied their names in the FIR narrative, and no test identification parade was conducted. He attributed the names to co-accused Surendra, but the prosecution did not explain	743

	their earlier appearance in the accused-details column. In Punjab Singh's case, the Court linked the claimed later disclosure to Surendra's formal arrest on 23 June 2003, after the FIR. In Avtar Singh's trial, the abductee identified him in court but admitted that the abductors had covered their faces and had not been known or seen earlier; no conversation with Surendra during captivity was established. These deficiencies, considered with the remaining evidence, prevented proof of the appellants' participation beyond reasonable doubt.
Prior police exposure affects the reliability of the exposed witness's identification	Showing an arrested suspect to a witness before a test identification parade defeats the parade's purpose and undermines that witness's identification. Munni Devi's admission of prior exposure deprived her identification of effect. The Court separately accepted Dataram's parade and dock identification because his prior exposure was not established, he consistently denied it, and his account assigned specific acts supported by his injuries.	761
Test identification parade as investigative corroboration	A test identification parade tests memory and helps determine whether investigation is proceeding correctly. It is investigation-stage corroboration, while identification in court is substantive evidence. No statutory provision compels a parade or gives an accused an absolute right to demand one. Its absence does not automatically make court identification inadmissible; its weight depends on the circumstances.	761
Prudential safeguards and exceptions for first-time dock identification	Identification of a stranger for the first time in court is ordinarily weak and should generally have support from an earlier parade or other evidence. This is a rule of prudence. A court may safely rely on an exceptionally trustworthy witness, including one with a particular reason to remember the accused or an opportunity to observe distinctive features. The Court accepted Dataram's reliable identification and also noted corroboration from the recovered firearm.	761
Misaligned endorsements in an identification memo	A misaligned endorsement on a parade memo prepared on blank paper does not necessarily negate identification. The Court considered the tick marks, the parade officer's testimony, the witness's specific dock identification and medical corroboration together. In that setting, misplaced wording and the absence of a written identification endorsement against one name did not invalidate the proved identification.	761
Assessment of identification in limited light	Identification should be assessed in light of the witness's actual opportunity to observe, including distance, available light and familiarity with low-light conditions. The spot map recorded a light and the witness confirmed it was on; the injured witnesses had encountered the assailants at close range. Applying Ramesh's observation about rural witnesses' visual capacity, the Court rejected the challenge based on inadequate lighting.	761
Dock identification where witnesses did not previously know the assailants	Dock identification was necessary on this record because the prosecutrix did not know the assailants before the incident and her asserted source for their names was not corroborated. She said a relative supplied names after hearing their physical description, but that relative did not support having received the description or seen the assailants. The other injured witness named no assailant and said he could identify them on seeing them. Their examination in the appellant's absence prevented dock identification and left his identity as an assailant unresolved.	835
Missing identification and investigative links in an abduction prosecution	Where the abductees first saw the alleged offenders during the incident, the absence of a test identification parade was a material weakness alongside the other gaps in proving identity and participation. The prosecution did not prove the surviving appellants' arrest dates, places or memoranda, examine arrest witnesses, or establish any incriminating seizure or Section 27 Evidence Act disclosure. Considered with delayed disclosure and contradictory release and ransom accounts, those deficiencies made the convictions unsafe despite the claimed identification in court.	836

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Dock identification after the police show previously unknown accused to witnesses	Identification in court is substantive evidence. A test identification parade provides investigative assurance and corroboration; its absence does not by itself make identification in court inadmissible, and the weight of that identification remains for the court to assess. Here, however, the witness admitted that the appellants had been shown to him at the police station and that he learnt their names there. His accounts of hearing names and code words were also inconsistent. Applying Krishna Kumar Malik after considering the principles reproduced from Mukesh, the Court held that the subsequent dock identification could not be relied upon.	950
Identification of familiar assailants after sunset	The Court rejected the darkness objection after considering that the witnesses already knew the accused and that the evidence supported sufficient light at the time of the assault. Identification was assessed on those circumstances; the fact that the incident occurred after sunset did not by itself make recognition impossible.	987
Identification in darkness and the opportunity to observe	Prior familiarity did not overcome the witnesses' admission that nothing was visible. Their account placed them behind persons carrying a body, and they admitted not approaching the body. On those facts, the Court found identification of the accused and of the body unreliable despite the claimed torchlight, especially when the surrounding sequence was materially contradicted.	988
	Sub-Chapter no. 22.2 Identification of Property and Material Objects
Colour discrepancy in identifying a recovered article	The witnesses' description of a red strangling cloth did not discredit recovery of a green scarf where they had viewed the incident from about one hundred feet in twilight, with one referring to torchlight. The Court considered a colour-identification error possible in those conditions and accepted the proved recovery of the concealed scarf at the appellant's instance.	118
Identification of property when its recovery is unproved	Identification of the purse and belt could not supply a link to the appellant when their alleged recovery from him was unproved. The identification took place at a police station, the police brought and opened the articles, their presence could not be ruled out, and only the belt identification memo was proved. The Court considered reliance on this identification unsafe without supporting corroboration and, in any event, immaterial once the underlying recovery failed.	157
Currency identification after unopposed release on Supurdgi	The Court accepted investigation-stage identification of recovered currency although the notes were not produced for identification at trial. The notes had distinctive bank slips and signatures, seizure and identification were proved, the accused had not objected to their release on Supurdgi, and Kamal Kishore neither claimed title nor disputed their identity at that stage. The acceptance rested on those circumstances.	183
Unproduced gold articles and the distinction between recovery and identification	Recovery of the gold chain and ring was proved, but their identification was not established by substantive evidence because the articles were not produced in court despite the Supurdgi condition requiring production. The Court distinguished those findings. It nevertheless treated the recovered articles as belonging to the abductees in the circumstances, including the absence of any ownership claim by Kamal Kishore; it did not hold that the articles had been duly identified in court.	183
Substantive identification of the seized material at trial	Identification of the material before the trial court is substantive evidence of what was seized. The alleged ganja was not produced for identification by any witness, including the investigating officer, and was not marked as a material article. In that evidentiary setting, the prosecution failed to establish that the alleged quantity of ganja had been recovered from the appellant.	186
Failure to prove	The vessel could not be treated as the one carried by the victim when the	219

identification of a recovered object	supposed identifying witness gave no evidence identifying it and the person named as conducting the identification denied doing so. Admission of signatures on the memorandum did not establish that the stated identification had occurred. The Court rejected the trial court's treatment of the object's identity as undisputed.
Identification of seized ganja despite a change in its appearance	The seized substance's dry, dark appearance when produced in court did not, on the evidence considered, disprove the recovery of ganja described as wet in the seizure memos. The Court compared the produced material with the seizure memos and the forensic description of seeds, leaves and flowering tops, and found the recovery established.	261
Identification of stolen property — conflicting evidence about place and procedure	The identification witness's claim that proceedings took place at a school without police was undermined by his admission that the police brought the articles and wrote the record, and by an owner's statement that identification occurred inside the police station. Her later attempted correction did not remove the doubt. These conflicts weakened the reliability of the identification relied upon to connect the accused with the stolen articles.	335
Prior Police Display Undermined the Later Identification of Clothing	The alleged mother had already been shown the clothing at the police station before its formal identification before the executive officer. The Court rejected the probative value of that later exercise because the identifying witness had previously seen the very articles. It applied the caution against identification influenced by prior police exposure, drawing on N.J. Suraj and Krishan Kumar Malik.	389
Changed Denominations and Unexplained Possession of Recovered Robbery Proceeds	Recovered cash was not excluded as robbery proceeds merely because its denominations differed from those described by the complainant. Money may be spent or exchanged after a robbery. On the recovery and identification evidence in this case, and the accused's failure to explain his ownership or possession, the Court treated the recovered ₹4,376 as part of the looted money.	405
Linking recovered currency and articles to the robbery property	Recovery of cash did not establish that it was the robbed money when the notes had no specific identifying marks. Likewise, although a pair of shoes was recovered from one appellant, it had not been identified by the complainant in court. The Court distinguished those unestablished property links from the proved recovery of the complainant's motorcycle and its broken number plate when assessing the evidence against the individual appellants.	508
Recovered jewellery — proof of seizure does not establish identification as the stolen property	Proof of disclosure and recovery does not by itself establish that the recovered object belonged to the complainant or was the stolen property. The complainant admitted that police showed her the articles at the outpost; the supposed property-identification witness stated that police handed them to her and prepared the identification memorandum there. The Court found that identification of the recovered jewellery was not proved. With no other evidence against Ghanshyam and Preetam, they were acquitted; the gold tops recovered from Purshottam also lost evidentiary importance, although other reliable evidence sustained his conviction.	548
Unreliable identification of recovered ornaments	The recovered ornaments were not reliably connected to the victims where no other ornaments were mixed, contrary to the identification memo, police officers were present, and the articles had already been shown to an identifying witness. The person conducting the identification was also not examined. On these combined deficiencies, the Court rejected the property-identification evidence. Together with the failure to identify the accused, this left guilt unproved beyond reasonable doubt.	604
Rope and lock discrepancies assessed with medical proof and	The Court rejected the asserted rope discrepancy in view of the doctor's evidence of death by rope strangulation. It also held that differing accounts about breaking or opening the lock were not material where the body was	648

concealed-body recovery	recovered from inside a compartment sealed with bricks and cement. These objections did not displace the recovery and medical evidence accepted in the circumstantial case.
Absence of substantive identification of recovered jewellery	Proof of recovery does not by itself establish that the seized object was the stolen property. The recovered mangalsutra was never produced and identified in court. Its investigation-stage identification was also unreliable. In the absence of substantive identification by its owner, the Court held that the recovery lost its force as an incriminating link.	761
Comparable articles and proof of a property identification parade	A property identification exercise requires scrutiny of whether comparable objects were mixed with the seized article. The witness said only one mangalsutra was displayed, contrary to the memo, and the parade officer was not examined. Applying Ashish Batham's caution about distinctive objects without similar comparators, the Court found that a fair comparison exercise had not been proved.	761
Police identification of articles and Section 162 CrPC	Identification of an article is relevant under Section 9 of the Evidence Act. An identification statement made to police during investigation is subject to Section 162 CrPC and cannot serve as corroborative identification evidence. The Court did not regard police display as itself illegal, but prior display made the later parade untrustworthy. Identification before a non-police person or officer is not subject to that police-statement bar merely on that account.	761
Recovered article — Proof that it belonged to the deceased	Recovery of an old sandal on the accused's disclosure did not establish recovery of the deceased's property when no test identification was conducted and no witness identified the sandal in court. Without proof linking the article to the deceased, the alleged recovery failed as an incriminating circumstance.	827
Effect of non-production of seized articles at trial	Non-production of a seized article does not, by itself, require the seizure to be discarded or the accused to be acquitted. Applying State of Rajasthan v. Sahi Ram, the Court treated non-production in the context of the other evidence. The reproduced discussion distinguished cases in which additional failures, including lack of proof of recovery or of the link between the seized substance and the forensic report, supported acquittal.	843
In-court identification of seized property and the corroborative role of an identification parade	Identification in court is substantive evidence, while an identification parade during investigation is corroborative. Applying the distinction stated in Malkhan Singh, the Court found ownership of the seized chain and Rudraksh mala unproved because the deceased's father, who identified them during investigation, was not asked to identify them in court. The officers' recognition established seizure of the objects, but did not establish that they belonged to the deceased.	934

General Principles of Proof, Appreciation of Evidence and Circumstantial Evidence

Sub-Chapter no. 23.1
Burden of Proof, Proof Beyond Reasonable Doubt and Benefit of Doubt

Alibi — same-city court appearance must exclude presence at the material time	An accused asserting alibi must give cogent proof excluding presence at the crime scene when the offence occurred. The Court required proof beyond reasonable doubt that the appellants remained at court at the relevant time. A bail order without a recorded time and testimony failing to establish when they left court did not prove absence from a reachable scene in the same city when the burning occurred at about 3 p.m. Their alibi failed; guilt was separately assessed on the prosecution evidence.	19
Proof of relatives' involvement in dowry offences	The fault of the husband does not by itself establish the involvement of his relatives in a dowry offence. As explained in the passage from Kans Raj relied upon by the Court, overt acts attributed to relatives other than the husband must	40

	be proved beyond reasonable doubt; guilt cannot rest on conjecture or mere implications arising from the relationship. This trial standard is distinct from the face-value scrutiny required on a quashing application.
Presumption of correctness of the Court's recorded proceedings	A Court's order-sheet is presumed correct unless the contrary is established. An attempt in argument to dispute the remand Magistrate's record of an admission was rejected because the writ petition did not plead that the recorded observation was factually incorrect. Accepting that record did not decide whether oral communication met the independent requirement of written arrest grounds.	41
Dowry accusations against relatives — proof of individual overt acts	The Kans Raj principle relied upon distinguishes the husband's alleged fault from the criminal responsibility of other relatives. At the stage of determining guilt in a dowry-death case, overt acts attributed to those other persons must be proved beyond reasonable doubt; kinship, conjecture or implication cannot substitute for proof of involvement.	56
Proof of last-seen circumstances — hearsay cannot replace the evidence of the person who saw the deceased	A witness's account that another person saw the accused with the deceased does not prove the asserted last-seen circumstance when that person is not examined. The Court rejected the reported sightings because the persons with direct knowledge were not examined and their substantive evidence was absent.	70
Private transaction diary — absence of the accused's signature does not necessarily eliminate evidentiary value	The Court could not take judicial notice of the private transaction diary as a public document. It further held that entries signed by subordinate persons on the applicants' instructions would not, for that reason alone, have no probative value against the applicants. Their reliance on the absence of their own signatures therefore did not establish that production of the diary was crucial to the charge decision.	75
Reasonable doubt in proof of rape	The prosecution must prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused retains the presumption of innocence. The doubt must be that of a prudent and reasonable person. Proof need not reach absolute certainty, but must carry a high degree of probability. Here, the child's unconsciousness and medical evidence of possible sexual assault did not establish rape by the appellant, given the material contradictions and uncertainty about when the injuries occurred.	91
Suppression of the origin of the incident and unexplained injuries to the accused	Where the prosecution suppresses the origin of the incident and fails to explain injuries sustained by the accused, an adverse inference may justify benefit of doubt. Here, the complainant and his wife admitted injuries to the defence party and the pending cross-case, yet the prosecution did not explain those injuries or establish beyond reasonable doubt that the appellants were the aggressors. The Court therefore found the conviction unsafe. The relied-upon precedent distinguishes a free fight where a witness may not reasonably be expected to see and explain injuries received at different places.	95
Reasonable doubt from unreliable eyewitnesses and uncertain medical evidence	Conviction could not stand where the purported eyewitness accounts contained material falsehoods and improvements, lacked independent corroboration, and were accompanied by medical uncertainty about whether death resulted from strangulation or hanging. The cumulative deficiencies required acquittal; they did not establish that the death was necessarily suicidal.	123
Reasonable doubt is assessed by the standard of a prudent person	The prosecution bears the burden of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused remains entitled to the benefit of such doubt. The standard concerns an objective doubt that a prudent person would entertain, rather than absolute certainty or an imagined possibility. Applying Bhagwan Jagannath Markad, the Court assessed the proved circumstances together in reaching its finding of guilt.	132
Proof of alibi and its consideration at the	An alibi must be established by cogent positive evidence sufficient to exclude the accused’s presence at the occurrence. The prosecution must first establish	141

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 319 stage	presence and participation, and failure of the alibi does not relieve it of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt. If defence evidence raises a reasonable doubt about presence, the accused is entitled to its benefit. A contested alibi requiring trial evidence cannot itself defeat otherwise justified summoning under Section 319 CrPC.
Proof of homicidal death without proof of the accused's involvement	Proof that the victim died a homicidal death did not establish the appellant's participation. The prosecution failed to prove his involvement in the abduction, recovery of incriminating articles from him, or a last-seen link with the deceased. His convictions under Sections 120B, 364 and 302 IPC were therefore set aside and he was acquitted.	157
Hearsay witnesses and independent direct evidence	The presence of hearsay witnesses did not invalidate the prosecution case where the remaining witnesses supplied an accepted account of the armed assembly and shootings, corroborated by medical evidence. The hearsay objection therefore did not justify rejecting that independent evidence.	160
Quality and number of eyewitnesses	The prosecution need not examine every eyewitness. The number of witnesses is not decisive where several injured eyewitnesses provide reliable evidence. Non-examination of two persons who accompanied the informant to the police station did not undermine that evidence merely because they were named in the FIR; one was not identified there as an eyewitness at all.	165
Reasonable doubt and speculative possibilities	Benefit of doubt requires a reasonable doubt arising from the prosecution evidence. Surmises and possibilities alone do not justify rejecting the prosecution case or its documents. The Court rejected the suggested ante-timing where prompt reporting and immediate medical steps supported the FIR.	165
Civil findings and proof in criminal proceedings	Civil cases are decided on a preponderance of probabilities; criminal guilt requires proof beyond reasonable doubt. Findings in one proceeding are not automatically binding in the other, which must be decided on the evidence adduced in it. A previous judgment may nevertheless be relevant under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, with conclusiveness where Section 41 so provides; its relevance and effect must be assessed in the particular case.	170
Proof of alibi and the prosecution's continuing burden	An alibi is a rule of relevant evidence under Section 11 of the Evidence Act. The prosecution must first establish the accused's presence and participation; raising an alibi does not lessen that burden. Once that burden is discharged, the accused must establish the alibi by positive evidence with absolute certainty so as to exclude the possibility of presence at the occurrence. Evidence raising a reasonable doubt about presence entitles the accused to that doubt, and failure to establish the alibi does not itself prove the prosecution case.	189
Prosecution burden and falsity of the defence	The accused is presumed innocent, and the prosecution must prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt through its own evidence. Falsity of the defence does not discharge that burden, and guilt cannot be recorded unless the prosecution has proved its case.	199
Alibi burden and the prosecution's duty to prove presence	Alibi is a rule of evidence under Section 11 Evidence Act, and the accused bears the burden of establishing it under Section 103. The plea should be raised at the earliest opportunity. Its failure does not itself prove presence at the scene: the prosecution must establish presence by positive evidence. The Court rejected the employment-based alibi in light of the child's eyewitness account, the other witnesses' immediate observations and the appellant's subsequent conduct.	214
Proof of a relative’s individual role in dowry offences	Kinship and conjecture do not establish guilt for a dowry offence. The Kans Raj reasoning adopted by the Court requires the overt acts attributed to relatives other than the husband to be proved beyond reasonable doubt; at the threshold, the absence of clear and specific allegations supported quashing against the relatives concerned.	235
Insufficient	An attendance register completed only at the end of the working day, without	274

attendance and oral evidence to establish alibi	daily employee signatures or arrival times, did not establish the accused's presence at the clinic when the offence occurred. Another accused's alibi failed where a telephone witness merely repeated his assertion and a shopkeeper's account lacked reliable support. Those defences did not displace the independently accepted eyewitness evidence.
False defence cannot repair an incomplete prosecution chain	The prosecution bears the burden of proving a complete chain of incriminating circumstances. A false defence or plea by the accused cannot cure a gap or infirmity in that chain.	278
Ransom letters: marking exhibits does not establish authorship and receipt	The investigating officer's evidence that alleged ransom letters were seized and marked as exhibits did not establish that they were the letters written by the abductee or received by the named recipients. The letters were not put to the alleged author, no handwriting evidence established authorship, and the recipients were not examined. Absence of a defence objection when the exhibits were marked did not cure these gaps in substantive proof.	284
Unexplained injuries to the accused: seriousness, timing and overall credibility	Non-explanation of injuries does not automatically defeat the prosecution or establish that the complainant was the aggressor. The injuries must be serious and arise in the same occurrence; their omission has greater significance with partisan testimony or a competing probable defence. Clear, cogent evidence may still be accepted. Here, the accused's multiple injuries and the co-accused's fatal beating were unexplained, and the other material inconsistencies supported a finding that the prosecution had suppressed the incident's true origin.	287
Contradictory reporting chronology and reliability of the prosecution account	An unexplained conflict between the recorded place and time of the first report and the complainant's account may undermine the prosecution narrative. Here, the claim of reaching the police station by 2:30 p.m. conflicted with a Dehati Nalishi said to have been recorded at the scene at 2:40 p.m., as well as the stated duration of events and walking distance. These discrepancies contributed to the Court's reasonable doubt.	287
Prosecution burden — weakness of defence or false explanation	The prosecution must establish its case on its own evidence. Weakness of the defence does not supply an incriminating circumstance in the prosecution's favour, and a merely false explanation cannot by itself become the basis of conviction.	319
Unexplained injuries to accused — doubt about the genesis of the incident	Failure to explain injuries sustained by the accused in the same occurrence may cast doubt on whether the prosecution has disclosed the true genesis of the incident. Here, the proved injury records, the admitted cross-case and the complainant’s failure to address those injuries supported the plea of private defence when assessed with the evidence as a whole.	331
Unexhibited prosecution document — use in favour of the accused	An unexhibited prosecution document ordinarily cannot be read against the accused, but may be considered in the accused's favour. The Court separately applied the statutory admissibility of a government scientific expert's report under Section 293 CrPC to the FSL report before it.	341
Exhibit marking — identification does not establish proof or admissibility	Marking a document as an exhibit serves to identify it. It does not by itself prove the document or decide its legal admissibility. Conversely, the question whether a document is proved is distinct from the endorsement of an exhibit number.	341
Plea of alibi — Accused’s evidentiary burden and continuing prosecution burden	An accused who raises an alibi must establish it by positive, cogent evidence with certainty sufficient to exclude the possibility of presence at the relevant place and time. Failure to establish the alibi does not itself prove guilt: the prosecution must independently prove its case beyond reasonable doubt. Because the applicant’s assertion that he was elsewhere was a disputed factual defence, the Court declined to adjudicate it in the Section 482 proceeding.	358
Plea of Alibi: Proof Excluding Presence	An accused relying on alibi must produce cogent evidence establishing the plea with certainty so as to exclude presence at the place of occurrence. A claim of	360

at the Occurrence	residence or employment elsewhere does not suffice when it fails to establish the accused's whereabouts at the relevant time and does not make presence at the scene physically impossible. The Court rejected the alibis after examining the defence evidence against those requirements.
Alibi: Strict Proof and the Continuing Prosecution Burden	The prosecution must first prove the accused's presence and participation. An alibi does not reduce that burden. Once presence is satisfactorily established, the accused must prove the alibi by cogent positive evidence excluding presence at the occurrence, rather than by a mere preponderance of probabilities. The adopted precedent also preserves the accused's entitlement to reasonable doubt where the defence evidence raises such doubt about presence.	361
Unsupported Alibi Affidavits and Summoning Under Section 319 CrPC	An alibi accepted by the police solely on witness affidavits, without supporting hospital documents or other reliable evidence, did not justify rejecting the Section 319 CrPC application where the proposed accused were named in the FIR and specific overt acts were attributed to them. The defence of absence from the scene required cogent proof.	374
Failure to Link the Vehicle to the Offence and the Charge Under Section 201 IPC	Where the prosecution failed to establish that the identified Bolero was involved in the fatal collision or that the accused committed the incident, the alleged denting and painting of that vehicle did not establish the charged disappearance of evidence under Section 201 IPC. The acquittal on that charge was therefore sustainable.	375
Proof of One Assault Does Not Establish a Separate Unwitnessed Assault	The witnesses had not seen the initial assault on the informant, who died before he could testify. That assault could not be proved merely through their accounts of what he had told them, and the appellants could not be held guilty of injuring him on that material. This failure did not defeat the separately proved assaults on the two injured eyewitnesses, supported by their testimony and medical evidence.	381
Unproved Identity of the Recovered Body as the Missing Child	The prosecution did not establish that the recovered body was that of the alleged mother’s daughter. The medical age estimate materially differed from the age asserted by her, yet no dental or ossification examination resolved the discrepancy. Her delayed photographic identification and other evidence were unreliable, and the preserved blood was not used to establish a familial DNA connection. The Court treated identity as an unproved foundational link.	389
Unexhibited documents in the trial record	An unexhibited document cannot be read in favour of the prosecution merely because it is present in the trial court’s file. The Court therefore did not rely on the unexhibited requisition for the accused’s medical examination; it assessed the request through the evidence actually proved.	391
Strict Proof of Alibi and the Continuing Prosecution Burden	An alibi does not reduce the prosecution’s burden to establish the accused’s presence and participation beyond reasonable doubt. Once that burden is satisfactorily discharged, the accused must establish the alibi by positive and strict proof excluding presence at the scene; mere preponderance is insufficient. Evidence creating reasonable doubt about presence nevertheless entitles the accused to that doubt, and failure of the alibi does not itself prove the prosecution case.	409
Unexplained injuries on an accused—effect on prosecution proof	Non-explanation of an accused’s injuries is important but does not invariably defeat the prosecution. Its significance depends on the circumstances, including whether the injuries are minor or superficial or whether sufficiently clear, cogent and credible evidence outweighs the omission. The accused’s injuries do not automatically raise a presumption of private defence.	412
Alibi: strict proof and the continuing prosecution burden	Alibi is a rule of relevance under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than a penal exception. The prosecution must first establish the accused’s presence and participation; pleading alibi does not lessen that burden. The accused must then establish being elsewhere by cogent, positive and strict proof excluding	436

	presence at the occurrence, rather than mere preponderance of probabilities. Evidence creating a reasonable doubt about presence nevertheless entitles the accused to that benefit. Failure to prove alibi does not establish guilt: the prosecution must independently prove its case beyond reasonable doubt.
Photographic alibi and strict proof of absence	Photographs said to place an accused away from the occurrence do not, merely on inspection in a quashing petition, establish an alibi. Alibi is relevant under Section 11 of the Evidence Act and requires cogent, positive and strict proof excluding presence at the occurrence after the prosecution has established presence and participation. Evidence creating reasonable doubt about presence benefits the accused. Failure of the alibi does not relieve the prosecution of proving its case independently beyond reasonable doubt.	438
Prosecution burden unaffected by failure to seek a document under Section 91 CrPC	The initial burden of proving the accused's guilt rests on the prosecution. Its failure to produce the official requisition for recording the dying declaration could not be excused by saying that the accused should have applied for it under Section 91 CrPC. The accused could not be held guilty for failing to make that application.	467
Reasonable doubt — Physical record, conflicting accounts and countercomplaint	Guilt must be assessed from the whole record, including physical exhibits and defence evidence. The limited damage to two internal pages of a hardbound register did not fit the varying accounts of its tearing. Contradictions about presence and the scuffle, the unexplained participation of nonmembers, the appellant's injuries and contemporaneously recorded countercomplaint, and the defence testimony undermined proof of assault and caste abuse. The prosecution failed to establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt, so the convictions under Sections 294 and 323 IPC and former Section 3(1)(x) of the SC/ST Act were set aside.	479
Defence testimony — Same standard of appraisal as prosecution testimony	Evidence cannot be placed on a lower footing merely because the witness was called by the defence. Defence witnesses must be considered in the same manner as prosecution witnesses and assessed on their merits. The Court applied this principle when weighing the defence account of the Panchayat dispute alongside the countercomplaint, injuries and physical register.	479
Loan repayment — unproved diary and withholding of available sale evidence	A transaction diary that was neither proved nor shown to concern the disputed loan did not establish repayment. Its production by the deceased's son did not suffice when the diary was not exhibited and the son was not examined. The prosecution also withheld the sale deed and purchaser's evidence despite alleging that land was sold to fund an additional payment. The Court drew an adverse inference from withholding available best evidence and, after scrutinising the interested witnesses, found repayment and further unlawful demands unproved.	480
Quality of evidence and non-examination of material witnesses	Section 134 of the Evidence Act prescribes no minimum number of witnesses: reliable testimony from one witness may support conviction, while several unreliable witnesses may not. Non-examination of independent or additional witnesses does not by itself defeat the prosecution. An adverse inference depends on whether an available witness essential to explaining the occurrence or filling a material evidentiary gap was withheld. No such inference is required merely because further testimony would duplicate credible evidence already produced. The prosecution retains the burden of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	481
Plea of alibi — reliable proof required to answer trial evidence supporting additional summons	An accused advancing an alibi must establish it by cogent and reliable evidence. In reviewing additional summons under Section 319 CrPC, the Court examined the police material relied on for the alibi against PW-1's specific trial testimony. An ATM withdrawal did not establish the cardholder's presence when the user could not be identified. Disputed home CCTV timing and identity, an office roster without proof of actual attendance, and the absence of toll corroboration	490

	did not sufficiently establish the applicant's presence elsewhere. The closure report therefore did not displace the trial evidence supporting the summons. These observations were confined to the summoning question and were not findings of fact binding the trial court.
Plea of alibi — positive proof and the continuing prosecution burden	An alibi requires cogent positive evidence excluding the accused's presence at the occurrence. The prosecution must first satisfactorily establish presence and participation; raising an alibi does not reduce that burden, and failure of the alibi does not prove guilt. The adopted Mukesh and Binay Kumar Singh passage also preserves the benefit of reasonable doubt where defence evidence sufficiently casts doubt on presence. Here, a death certificate issued ten years later, without family evidence connecting the deceased woman to the appellant or establishing his attendance at her thirteenth-day ceremony, did not prove the claimed absence. The Court independently relied on the accepted declaration, eyewitnesses and medical evidence.	499
Hearsay Informant and Failure to Examine the Source of the Assault Allegation	An informant’s independent status does not make his second-hand account direct proof of the assailants’ identities. The Kotwar had learned of the alleged assault from another person, whom the prosecution did not examine. The Court rejected the Kotwar’s hearsay account and found that the Dehati Nalishi and FIR based on that untested source had lost evidentiary value in this case, contributing to reasonable doubt about the appellants’ involvement.	522
Homicidal Death and Weapon Recovery Do Not Establish the Assailants’ Identities	Medical proof of fatal blunt-force head injuries established homicidal death but did not identify the assailants. The unreliable eyewitness accounts, conflicting descriptions of where the body lay, absence of blood or drag marks on the alleged route, and recovery of a lathi from each accused despite the account that only one used it left the assault narrative doubtful. The prosecution therefore failed to prove the appellants’ guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and their convictions under Sections 302 and 302/34 IPC were set aside.	522
Proof of homicidal death and proof of the accused's participation	Medical proof that death was homicidal does not by itself establish that the accused caused it. Where material contradictions make the sole eyewitness unreliable and the recovery does not connect the accused to the assault, the prosecution has not proved guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	571
Conjecture cannot replace proof of the accused's participation	A conviction for dacoity with murder cannot rest on conjecture about the ownership of recovered property or the accused's involvement. Proof of homicidal death did not establish participation where the identification evidence was unreliable, hearsay supplied no substantive link and neither the bloodstains nor the recovered articles were connected to the deceased.	573
Cremation after informing relatives and the charge of concealing evidence	In assessing the Section 201 read with Section 34 IPC charge, the Court considered that the accused had informed the neighbours and parents of the death and waited for the mother before cremation. The alleged insistence on a postmortem and the claim that the father had lodged a report were not established. Those circumstances, taken with the deficient prosecution evidence, did not prove the charge beyond reasonable doubt.	576
Proof beyond reasonable doubt of an allegation resting on oral dying declarations	A conviction under Section 354 IPC could not stand where the prosecution failed to prove the alleged oral dying declarations reliably and failed to establish that the deceased had committed suicide because the accused had outraged her modesty. The Court assessed the missing evidence of mental fitness, defects in the witnesses' accounts and the evidence rejected in the rape acquittal together. Its conclusion depended on the totality of this evidence, rather than treating the subsequent burns as sufficient proof of molestation.	580
Use of an unexhibited prosecution document in favour	An unexhibited prosecution document favourable to the accused may be read in the accused's favour, but an unexhibited prosecution document cannot be read against the accused. The unexhibited photocopies of the deceased's hospital record therefore could not be used to support the prosecution against	580

of or against the accused	the appellant.
Overall assessment of prosecution evidence where a witness was not declared hostile	A court must assess the prosecution evidence as a whole and is not bound to accept a witness's statement merely because the prosecution did not have the witness declared hostile. The doctor's assertion that the victim could not speak was considered alongside his own MLC recording consciousness and the recording officer's evidence before the Court determined the victim's ability to make the declaration.	582
Evidence in a separate trial of co-accused cannot be imported into the present trial	Evidence given in a separate sessions trial against other co-accused could not be read in the respondent's trial. An explanation offered there for failure to identify the respondent could not cure the absence of that explanation in the evidence of the present case. Each appeal had to be decided on the evidence lawfully available in the trial under review.	583
Non-recovery of the weapon and otherwise reliable direct evidence	Recovery of the weapon is not an indispensable condition for conviction where reliable ocular evidence establishes the offence. Non-recovery did not undermine the direct evidence here, particularly where the respondent was arrested more than twenty-two months after the shooting. The Court also rejected reliance on a failure of recovery attributable to an accused's withholding or concealment of the weapon.	583
Limited use of res ipsa loquitur in a criminal medical-negligence charge	Res ipsa loquitur is an evidentiary rule principally used in civil negligence cases to address the burden of proof. It cannot by itself determine criminal negligence; its application in a criminal-negligence trial is, at most, limited. The required gross negligence must be established rather than inferred merely from the adverse result.	588
Second-hand information does not prove the assailant's identity	A witness who did not see the assault could not establish the assailants' identity merely by repeating what others had told him. After examining the informant brother's cross-examination, the Court treated that account as hearsay and inadmissible. The distinction between his observations after arrival and the second-hand account of who committed the killings was material to proof of participation.	599
Continuing prosecution burden and presumption of innocence in rape cases	The prosecution must affirmatively prove every ingredient of rape beyond reasonable doubt. That burden does not shift, and the accused need not explain why the witnesses might have falsely implicated him. The prosecution cannot rely on weakness in the defence, suspicion or moral conviction in place of legal proof. The accused retains the presumption of innocence and the benefit of every reasonable doubt.	618
Identification of known assailants in limited evening light	Identification of familiar assailants cannot be rejected merely because the incident occurred in limited evening light. Visibility must be assessed from the actual conditions, distance, prior acquaintance and the witnesses' adaptation to local lighting. Here, the shop setting, burning gas lantern, close-range firing and prior familiarity gave the witnesses sufficient opportunity to identify the assailants.	622
Non-examination of the first person to reach the scene	Non-examination of Banwari, who was said to have first reached the scene and extinguished the fire, was not fatal where three independently recorded dying declarations were found reliable. The Court preserved the prosecution's burden to prove guilt and stated that weakness of the defence could not itself establish the charge, while finding the available proof sufficient despite that witness being given up.	649
Alibi — strict proof after prosecution establishes presence and participation	An alibi is relevant under Section 11 of the Evidence Act and does not reduce the prosecution's burden to prove presence and participation. The authorities reproduced by the Court require strict proof excluding the possibility of presence once the prosecution has discharged that burden. They also preserve benefit of reasonable doubt where the defence evidence creates such doubt. The	678 witness claiming that four appellants were working elsewhere did not identify the employer or worksite and advanced an accidental-injury account inconsistent with the postmortem. Against the reliable prosecution evidence, the Court found the alibi unproved.

Burden of proving the insanity exception and reasonable doubt about mens rea	Under Section 105 of the Evidence Act, the accused must establish the circumstances of the Section 84 IPC exception on a preponderance of probabilities, rather than beyond reasonable doubt. Oral, documentary or circumstantial material, including prosecution evidence, may discharge that burden. The prosecution nevertheless retains throughout the trial the burden of proving the offence and requisite mens rea beyond reasonable doubt. Even if the insanity exception is not established, the evidence may create reasonable doubt about an essential ingredient of the offence, requiring acquittal because the prosecution has not discharged its general burden.	691
Unproved document filed with the charge sheet	The prosecution cannot rely on an unproved document merely because it was filed with the charge sheet. The Court declined to give the prosecution the benefit of the time recorded in an unproved merg intimation, and examined the sequence through other proved material.	693
Defence reliance on a favourable prosecution document not formally proved	An accused may rely on a favourable document filed by the prosecution with the charge sheet to substantiate the defence, even though the prosecution has not proved or exhibited it through a witness. After rejecting the unproved school certificate, the Court considered the government hospital's ossification report already filed with the charge sheet, notwithstanding the prosecution's failure to examine a witness to prove that report.	694
Accused's use of an unexhibited prosecution document	An accused may take advantage of an unexhibited prosecution document in presenting the defence. When disputing the identity of the earth article tested for blood, the appellants could have referred to the prosecution's forwarding document even though it had not been proved, but did not do so.	698
Alibi and claimed inability to participate in the evening assault	A photograph showing presence elsewhere earlier in the day does not establish absence from the scene at the time of the offence where return was possible and continued presence elsewhere is unproved. The Court rejected daytime photographs and unsupported assertions of an overnight stay as proof of the alibis. Doubt about when photographs were taken, including absence of supporting development or printing evidence in the circumstances, further weakened that defence. The later medical examination also failed to establish the claimed earlier cycle injury or that another appellant was resting at home when the assault occurred.	699
Accused's use of an unexhibited prosecution document	An accused may take advantage of an unexhibited prosecution document in presenting the defence. When disputing the identity of the earth article tested for blood, the appellants could have referred to the prosecution's forwarding document even though it had not been proved, but did not do so.	699
Failure to prove alibi — prosecution must still prove presence by positive evidence	Alibi is a rule of relevance under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than a general or special penal exception. Under Section 103, the accused bears the burden of proving the asserted fact of being elsewhere. Failure to establish alibi does not assist the prosecution, prove presence at the scene, or permit an inference of presence from that failure alone. The prosecution must establish presence by positive evidence.	700

Failure to establish alibi does not assist the prosecution, prove presence at the scene, or permit an inference of presence from that failure alone. The prosecution must establish presence by positive evidence.	701

23.1 : Burden of Proof, Proof Beyond Reasonable Doubt and Benefit of Doubt

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Civil and criminal findings — independent evidence and different standards of proof	Civil proceedings are decided on the preponderance of probabilities, whereas the prosecution in a criminal case must prove the charge beyond reasonable doubt. Each proceeding must be decided on the evidence adduced in it. Findings in one are not automatically final or binding in the other merely because the parties and subject matter overlap, subject to the statutory rules governing the relevance and effect of previous judgments. The broad proposition that civil findings invariably bind the criminal court is not the correct rule.	705
Failure to prove the appellant's participation in the abduction	Proof that the victim was abducted and confined did not establish the appellant's participation. The abductee's contradictory evidence did not reliably identify him, the other two witnesses did not support the prosecution and no further witness was examined. On that record, the Court found no evidence sustaining the charge and set aside the conviction under Section 364A IPC read with Section 13 MPDVPK Act.	711
Proof of disputed documents and their contents	A photocopy denied by the witness could not be exhibited without proof of its execution. The defence also failed to prove its claim that buses were operating by producing conductor sheets through a supervisor who had not prepared them, while the available conductors and owner were not examined. Merely producing those documents did not establish the disputed defence facts.	713
Cumulative doubt from delayed implication, absent injury and inconclusive blood evidence	The Court acquitted Halkai because his name was absent from the FIR and appeared in next-day statements, the alleged lathi blow on the head had no corresponding injury, and blood on the seized lathi was not established to be human. Considered together, those deficiencies left his participation unproved, notwithstanding the Court's criticism of the post-mortem examination elsewhere in the case.	713
Alibi after prosecution proof of presence — strict defence proof without shifting prosecution burden	Vijay Pal v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2015) 4 SCC 749, Sk. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, (2010) 8 SCC 430, and Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1997) 1 SCC 283, were applied: alibi under Section 11 Evidence Act becomes material after prosecution establishes presence; the Court required strict positive proof excluding presence and rejected proof merely by a preponderance of probabilities, but a credible defence can create reasonable doubt and failed alibi does not itself prove guilt. Horilal’s society-meeting witness could not substantiate the society’s registration or office-bearers and gave weak meeting particulars; the Court rejected alibi against accepted eyewitness proof.	735
Unexplained minor injuries of accused did not suppress proved genesis of assault	Mano Dutt v. State of U.P., (2012) 4 SCC 79, and Gurwinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 525, require attention to whether accused injuries were serious and arose in the same occurrence; non-explanation is not invariably fatal, especially with clear credible prosecution evidence. Krishnegowda v. State of Karnataka, (2017) 13 SCC 98, and Kumar v. State, (2018) 7 SCC 536, addressed material investigative suppression and injuries in their settings. Ramjilal’s three small contusions were minor, and his own tractor driver confirmed that Ramjilal initiated stone throwing, so the alleged suppressed genesis and automatic-acquittal argument failed.	735
Identity of assailant — derivative hearsay account supplies no evidentiary support	The Court found that the prosecution gained no assistance from Mishrilal’s account attributing the assault to the appellant. Mishrilal said that Murarilal had informed him both of Pappu’s suicide and the appellant’s assault on Jaswant. Murarilal was himself a hearsay witness and denied giving the asserted information about the appellant; he said that he had only reported the suicide. The derivative account therefore did not support identification of the appellant as the assailant. This deficiency was considered with the unreliable alleged sightings and the failed recovery link when the Court concluded that the prosecution had not proved guilt.	747
Defence explanation	The accused's burden to establish a defence is lighter than the prosecution's	774

assessed on preponderance of probabilities	burden to prove its case. The Court assessed the claimed accidental fall on a preponderance of probabilities. The roof had no shown toilet or washroom, no witness was asked to establish one, and the husband's conduct after the death did not support the explanation. The defence was rejected on that standard.
Unexhibited prosecution document favourable to the accused	A prosecution document that remains unexhibited may be looked at in favour of the accused. The Court accordingly considered the missing-person report filed with the charge-sheet. It corroborated that the husband had earlier reported his wife missing and expressed suspicion about another person. The report was considered in assessing provocation, but the remote earlier departure did not establish grave and sudden provocation at the time of the killing.	774
Unproved prosecution document favouring the accused in age assessment	A prosecution document accompanying the charge-sheet may be considered in favour of the accused even though it remains unproved and unexhibited. The Court accordingly accepted the trial court's use of the school marksheet recording birth on 2 April 1990. It placed the prosecutrix above sixteen but below eighteen on 20 July 2006, requiring the rape and guardianship offences to be assessed under their distinct applicable age thresholds.	776
Unchallenged identification of the driver corroborated by a prompt report	Two eyewitnesses specifically identified the applicant as the driver, and neither was cross-examined on that identification. The Court considered their unchallenged testimony with the Dehati Nalishi, lodged within thirty minutes of the accident and naming the applicant as the driver, and held that his identity as the driver was established.	777
Alibi, the burden of proof and reasonable doubt	Alibi is relevant inconsistent evidence under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than a penal exception. The prosecution must first satisfactorily establish the accused's presence and participation; raising alibi does not lessen that burden. The accused must then establish absence by strict, positive proof excluding presence at the scene. Defence evidence creating reasonable doubt about presence entitles the accused to its benefit. Failure to prove alibi does not itself establish guilt: the prosecution must independently prove its case beyond reasonable doubt.	785
Proof of fatal injury without proof of the accused's responsibility	Medical evidence that heavy pressure, consistent with a bullock's leg falling on the body, caused fatal injuries did not establish who drove the animal. The prosecution's own witness attributed that act to the appellant's brother, while the other claimed eyewitness materially contradicted his account of being present. The evidence therefore failed to establish the appellant's guilt under Section 304-A IPC beyond reasonable doubt, and he was acquitted.	834
Non-examination of an inquiry-committee chairman and the quality of evidence	The omission to examine the inquiry-committee chairman did not by itself defeat the prosecution. In assessing that objection alongside the documentary and other evidence, the Court emphasised that the quality of evidence, rather than the number of witnesses, is decisive.	914
Deliberate and substantial relocation of the occurrence affecting prosecution proof	A change in the asserted place of occurrence matters where the defence establishes that it was deliberate and substantial enough to affect the whole prosecution account. Applying Bhagwati Prasad, the Court considered blood on and flowing from a dilapidated roof, a shoe found nearby, the unexplained shifting of the body to a distant garden and the missing pistol attributed to the deceased. These circumstances undermined the alleged street shooting, the witnesses' claimed vantage and the portrayal of the accused party as aggressors. The medical evidence did not conclusively identify the shooter's position, but the combined record made the defence account probable and the altered prosecution account unreliable.	919
Unexplained serious injuries in the same occurrence and their conditional effect	Failure to explain injuries on the accused side does not invariably discredit the prosecution. The injuries must be serious and connected with the occurrence; interested testimony, a comparably probable defence and the strength of	919

	independent prosecution evidence bear on the result. The omission may support private defence, create reasonable doubt or have no material effect. Applying Takhaji Hiraji, Lakshmi Singh and the related passages, the Court found the unexplained four deaths and two gunshot injuries on the accused side, together with suppression of the incident's origin and relocation of the scene, fatal to the reliability of this prosecution version. It did not thereby find that Ramant had fired in private defence.
Documentary record and non-expert witness opinion	The Court must assess the documentary record independently rather than accept a non-expert witness's conclusion that the procedure was regular. The measurement book reproduced the estimate and contained a completion stamp, but no actual measurements or description establishing the work. A witness's assertion that measurements were recorded could not override the document itself. The trial court's reliance on such opinions, instead of the material on record, contributed to the finding that its acquittal was perverse.	920
Benefit of doubt from suppressed origin of a land-dispute assault	The prosecution had to prove the charged offences beyond reasonable doubt despite the complainant party's recorded interests in the land. Their claim of restored possession lacked the asserted Collector order, while the evidence and defence judgments supported the appellant's actual cultivation. Combined with the unexplained serious injuries to the accused and the probable private-defence case, these circumstances left the prosecution version, including the alleged firing and forcible dispossession, unproved. The surviving appellants were therefore entitled to acquittal of the respective charges under challenge.	923
Independent proof in parallel civil and criminal proceedings	Civil cases are decided on a preponderance of probabilities, whereas the prosecution must prove a criminal case beyond reasonable doubt. Each proceeding must be decided on the evidence adduced in it. Findings in one proceeding do not automatically bind or supersede findings in the other, subject to the statutory rules governing previous judgments. A civil court may consider evidence led in criminal proceedings, but this does not make the criminal court's findings binding on it.	940
Probable defence may emerge from prosecution evidence	An accused may rely on a probable defence emerging from the prosecution evidence even without separately presenting that defence through defence witnesses. A hypothetical possibility must nevertheless have support in the record. The suggested drunken fall was rejected because the medical record noted no smell of alcohol, the examining doctor was not questioned on that point, and no evidence established stones or a fall from height. The doctors' acceptance that such a fall could cause injuries did not establish that it occurred.	947
Separate assessment of reasonable doubt for each accused	Where different acts are attributed to different accused, the evidence must be assessed separately for each. Material contradictions about Khemraj's presence and firing, considered with the site evidence and the independent commissioner's account, left his participation unproved beyond reasonable doubt. The Court therefore acquitted him of murder with common intention, attempted murder and the Arms Act charge. Those deficiencies did not resolve Pawan's case, for which the consistent account of his fatal shot and the supporting evidence required an independent assessment.	951
Reliable evidence may be accepted despite false additions concerning other accused	The maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus does not apply in India. A court must carefully separate reliable evidence from false additions where that can be done without reconstructing a new prosecution story. If truth and falsehood are inseparable and no reliable evidence remains, the whole account may have to be rejected. Applying Achhar Singh, Kameshwar Singh, Swaran Singh and Bhagwan Jagannath Markad, the Court held that disbelieving the witnesses about Banti and Khemraj did not require rejection of their consistent account of Pawan's firing. His attributed role remained unchanged from the FIR through the police statements and testimony, and was supported by the chest injury and	951 recovered bullet fragments.

Plea of alibi: burden of proof and continuing prosecution burden	Alibi is an evidentiary plea under section 11 of the Evidence Act. The prosecution must first prove the accused's presence and participation; taking an alibi does not lessen that burden. Once presence is satisfactorily established, the accused must prove absence by positive and strict evidence excluding presence at the scene. Credible defence evidence creating a reasonable doubt entitles the accused to its benefit. Failure to establish an alibi does not itself prove the prosecution case.	970
Plea of alibi: positive proof excluding presence at the scene	An accused who raises an alibi must establish it by cogent, positive evidence with sufficient certainty to exclude presence at the scene at the relevant time; a mere preponderance of probabilities does not establish the plea. The disputed claim of being at home required evidentiary proof and was not finally determined in the section 482 proceedings.	972
Reasonable doubt in circumstantial evidence	Reasonable doubt must be a fair doubt arising from the evidence and grounded in reason and common sense. The prosecution is not required to disprove every imaginary, trivial or merely possible hypothesis advanced by the accused. The Court relied on this standard in finding the accepted circumstantial chain sufficient to prove the offence.	986
Suspicion and the gravity of an offence cannot replace proof	However grave the suspicion or heinous the offence, conviction requires credible evidence proving guilt. A court cannot allow the seriousness of the crime to supply an evidentiary gap or treat a merely possible conclusion of guilt as an established one.	988
	Sub-Chapter no. 23.2 Delay in FIR and Its Evidentiary Effect
Delayed FIR and investigation — prompt reliable dying declaration remains material	A year's delay in registering the FIR and recording witness statements did not require rejection of this prosecution where the Executive Magistrate had recorded the victim's declaration promptly and the remaining reliable evidence established guilt beyond reasonable doubt. The pending merg inquiry and movement of the case diary explained the chronology, but the Court criticised the police for unjustifiably prolonging the inquiry. Following Ambika Prasad, it assessed the reliable evidence independently of official omissions, while recognising the judge's duties to the accused, victim and society.	19
Time taken to report an assault involving several injured persons	Whether an FIR was delayed must be assessed in its circumstances. A report made two hours and ten minutes after an evening assault was not substantially delayed where four persons were injured, one seriously, and they had to reach a police station four kilometres away.	21
Delayed FIR dispatch under Section 157 CrPC and alleged ante-timing	Delay in sending an FIR to the Magistrate does not by itself invalidate a prosecution where prompt registration and investigation are established. Extraordinary unexplained delay may support suspicion of later fabrication, but a police omission does not vitiate trial without prejudice to the accused. Next-day dispatch was not fatal where investigation began promptly, three accused were arrested that day and the officer returned late at night. Overwriting in the receipt register did not establish ante-timing when neither the recipient nor the Magistrate's record was produced to resolve it.	23
Fear of the assailants as an explanation for reporting after sunrise	A witness's failure to leave the scene immediately must be assessed against the danger he reasonably perceived. Hiding until sunrise was natural where the witness had seen his brother killed and the route to his village crossed the assailants' field. In the absence of evidence or a suggestion establishing an alternative route, the court did not expect him to risk a longer journey in the night. His report promptly after sunrise was consistent with that explanation.	23
Delay in a matrimonial FIR —	A wife's efforts to obtain a settlement and resume married life can explain why she did not immediately complain of cruelty. Her patience in the hope that the	76

attempts to preserve the marriage do not justify an adverse inference by themselves	relationship and the in-laws' conduct would improve cannot by itself be used to discredit her. Lodging the FIR after reconciliation efforts fail and divorce proceedings are instituted does not, for that reason alone, justify an adverse inference or quashing.
Delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty as a ground for quashing	Delay in lodging an FIR does not, by itself, justify quashing it. In a matrimonial-cruelty case, the absence of an immediate complaint also does not by itself establish that the allegations are false, since the complainant may first attempt to preserve the marriage. The Court rejected the inference of falsity sought merely from the passage of about sixteen years since marriage and the absence of an earlier police complaint.	80
Prompt FIR, next-day Magistrate receipt and absence of FIR number on inquest documents	Under Section 157 CrPC, prompt forwarding keeps the Magistrate informed and provides a check against ante-dating or manipulation. Reasonable dispatch depends on the circumstances; no universal time limit or explanation for every hour is required. Delayed receipt alone does not invalidate a promptly recorded FIR and investigation, particularly without demonstrated prejudice. Applying the narrated authorities, the Court accepted next-day receipt amid disturbance at the police station, the FIR having been lodged within about twenty-five minutes. Omission of its number from the Section 175 notice, inquest and post-mortem requisition did not prove ante-timing because those forms had no column for it.	106
Sexual-offence FIR — Explained next-day reporting	Delay in reporting a sexual offence must be assessed in context and does not discredit an otherwise reliable account when satisfactorily explained. The Court accepted the evidence that heavy rain and flooding prevented the family from reaching the police station until the next day. That delay did not undermine the child's testimony or the prosecution case.	116
Identical times in the FIR and death intimation	The time recorded for receipt of information in an FIR and a marg intimation may be identical when police learn of the offence and death together. It does not establish that the documents were physically written simultaneously or that the FIR was prepared later after deliberation. Reporting within one hour and forty minutes, after taking injured persons twenty-five kilometres to the police station, was treated as prompt.	165
Delayed receipt of a promptly recorded FIR by the Magistrate	Delay in forwarding or receiving an FIR does not by itself establish fabrication or invalidate the prosecution where the FIR was promptly recorded, investigation began on it and prejudice is not shown. Section 157 CrPC requires reasonably prompt dispatch in the circumstances, with no universal time limit. On the proved dispatch and next-day receipt here, the police-station disturbance also explained the interval.	227
Omission of FIR number from forms having no column for it	Absence of the FIR number from the inquest notice, inquest report and post-mortem requisition did not show that the FIR was ante-dated or ante-timed where the forms contained no column requiring that number. The Court assessed the omission with the prompt FIR and the other surrounding evidence.	227
Delay while awaiting matrimonial reconciliation	Delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty does not by itself warrant quashing and may be explained by plausible circumstances. Waiting in the hope that the marital relationship will improve can explain the interval; the Court treated that explanation together with continuing mental cruelty as sufficient to reject the delay objection here.	235
Urgent medical treatment as an explanation for delay in reporting	Where a seriously injured victim needed immediate treatment and referral to another hospital, the relatives' priority was to obtain medical assistance. Their failure to stop at nearby or intervening police stations did not, in those circumstances, justify an inference that the later FIR was the product of deliberation.	248
Prompt FIR as	Prompt registration of the FIR may support the eyewitness account and exclude	274

support for eyewitness presence and reliability	the opportunity for tutoring or over-implication in the circumstances proved. Here, immediate telephone information, the police response and registration within thirty minutes supported the witnesses' presence with the deceased and the reliability of their account.
Prompt FIR as support against alleged deliberation and false implication	Prompt reporting with material particulars can support the truthfulness of an eyewitness account by reducing the opportunity for deliberation and false implication. In this case the FIR named the assailants within thirty minutes, following two deaths and an injury; the Court treated that timing and detail as assurance of their participation.	291
Delayed matrimonial FIR during attempts at reconciliation	The passage from Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi applied by the Court rejects an adverse inference merely from delay in lodging a matrimonial FIR where the wife and her family had been trying to restore the relationship and avoid prejudicing settlement. The later FIR followed failure of those efforts and a divorce petition. These were the circumstances of the cited case; the High Court used the principle in rejecting the applicants' counterblast argument, without independently finding such reconciliation efforts in the present record.	325
Failure to Prove FIR Dispatch Under Section 157 CrPC	Failure to prove prompt dispatch of the FIR to the Magistrate does not by itself vitiate investigation or trial or require acquittal. Dispatch is an external safeguard against manipulation; delay, any explanation and resulting prejudice must be assessed with the reliability of the record. Here the proved Dehati Nalishi and surrounding chronology left no doubt about its timing, so the failure to establish compliance with Section 157 CrPC was not fatal.	381
Next-Day Signature Date Does Not Necessarily Establish an Antedated Report	A date entered beneath the recording officer's signature on the following day did not establish that the Dehati Nalishi was antedated. The information was recorded at 11.30 p.m., and the station diary showed its delivery at 1 a.m.; the Court accepted that midnight had passed before the dispatch endorsement was signed. The officer had not been asked to explain the date in cross-examination. The reporting chronology as a whole defeated the allegation of fabrication.	381
Delayed forwarding of the FIR to the Magistrate under Section 157 CrPC	Prompt forwarding of the FIR to the Magistrate provides an external check on police investigation. Delay alone does not make the prosecution case doubtful, and a reasonable explanation prevents an adverse inference. The prosecution must explain the delay; the accused need not seek that explanation. An unexplained delay requires close scrutiny of the prosecution version for deliberation or false implication. Here, the unexplained next-day dispatch was considered with the other defects in the evidence.	390
Prompt FIR as Assurance against Deliberation	A promptly lodged FIR may support the prosecution by reducing the opportunity for deliberation and false implication. On the circumstances of this attack and the witnesses' return with the dead and injured, the Court treated the report made within about half an hour as supporting the reliability of the accusation.	409
Prompt FIR as corroboration of an eyewitness shooting account	Prompt first reporting provides a check against later deliberation and fabrication and may corroborate the informant's account. Here, the incident occurred at about 11:15 p.m. and the FIR was lodged at 11:25 p.m. at a police station about one furlong away. The Court treated the ten-minute interval and the reported details as supporting the brother's eyewitness account and excluding the suggested opportunity to concoct it. That assessment formed part of the combined appraisal of oral, medical and ballistic evidence.	445
Explained Delay in Lodging the FIR	Delay in lodging the FIR does not by itself justify discarding the prosecution case. The court must examine the explanation and the possibility of embellishment; unexplained delay accompanied by that possibility may be fatal. Here, fear following the assault, the witnesses' initial search for safety and reporting after the deceased's father arrived satisfactorily explained the interval of about three hours.	450

23.2 : Delay in FIR and Its Evidentiary Effect

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Delay while seeking matrimonial reconciliation and quashing of prosecution	Delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty does not by itself justify quashing where the wife may have remained silent in an effort to preserve the marriage. Her explanation for the interval is a matter for the trial court and cross-examination. On the alleged history, the Court held that approximately two years' silence after leaving the matrimonial home did not warrant quashing the prosecution.	469
Sexual-offence FIR — Reporting interval and later receipt by Magistrate	An FIR lodged within about two hours was not treated as delayed on this record. Later receipt of its counter-copy by the Magistrate did not alone establish antedating or antetiming, particularly when the responsible officer was not asked to explain the transit. Applying Gurmit Singh, the Court also recognised that hesitation arising from the personal and family consequences of a sexual-offence allegation may naturally explain some reporting delay. The interval and surrounding circumstances must be assessed, rather than treating every lapse of time as fabrication.	477
FIR Delay Explained by Flight to Safety with Minor Children	Delay in lodging an FIR does not displace the prosecution case when satisfactorily explained. After witnessing the fatal assault, the complainant returned to her village with her two minor children, informed relatives, waited for their arrival and then went with them to the scene and police station. The Court accepted concern for her own and her children's safety as natural and held the resulting five-hour delay satisfactorily explained.	524
Explanation for delay in reporting rape of a minor	The three-day delay in reporting the rape of a fifteen-year-old girl was accepted in light of the parents' concern for her future and family reputation. The father's evidence that he had deliberated with his wife supported that explanation. In these circumstances, the delay did not undermine the prosecution case.	560
Travel difficulty explaining the interval before an FIR	The Court accepted the interval before the FIR where the police station was about twenty-five kilometres away and conveyance was unavailable. The prompt naming of the appellant and the accepted eyewitness evidence supported the finding that he joined in dragging out and beating the deceased.	563
Unexplained FIR timing and contradictory medical chronology	Unexplained delay in lodging an FIR may reinforce doubt where the eyewitness's account, the short journey to the police station and the timing of medical examination do not fit together. Here, the contradictory hospital sequence, absence of an explanation for the time gap and delayed preparation of the site plan formed part of the cumulative reasons for doubting the report.	571
Delay in lodging the FIR assessed in the circumstances of the case	Delay in reporting is not by itself fatal to the prosecution. Its significance depends on the surrounding circumstances, including the need for medical aid, fear or threats, the time of occurrence, distance to the police station and available transport. The Court rejected the delay objection in assessing a report made the next morning after a night-time assault, with the police station twenty kilometres away.	584
Delayed disclosure of matrimonial abuse while attempting reconciliation	When assessing allegations of matrimonial abuse at the bail stage, a wife's delay in approaching the police must be considered in its surrounding circumstances. Her attempt to preserve the marriage and allow time for improvement cannot by itself be treated as weakness or fabrication. Here the FIR also alleged that she had disclosed the unnatural sexual act to her parents-in-law. The lower court's adverse treatment of the delay, without considering this context, was unwarranted.	590
Missing report and the objection of delayed FIR	The Court rejected the alleged FIR delay because a missing report had initially been lodged and registration and investigation followed as the case developed. On its assessment of that reporting sequence, delay did not undermine the prosecution case.	648
Settlement efforts can explain delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty	In the Pratibha passage relied upon by the Court, delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty did not justify an adverse inference where the wife and her family were trying to secure her return to the matrimonial home. Lodging a complaint during	671

	those efforts could have jeopardised reconciliation, and the complaint was made after the efforts failed. That explanation had to be considered before treating the delay as a reason to quash the FIR. The proposition depends on the circumstances explaining the delay; it does not dispense with their assessment.
FIR delay explained by lack of transport	A delay of about five hours in lodging the FIR was plausibly explained by the absence of conveyance in the village and the twelve-kilometre distance to the police station. The witnesses consistently explained that they could leave only after arranging a tractor and trolley. The appellant was named among the assailants in that FIR. The Court accepted the explanation when assessing the reliability of the eyewitness account; it did not treat elapsed time alone as grounds to reject the prosecution.	675
FIR at the territorial police station after emergency treatment elsewhere	Failure to lodge a zero FIR at the police station where the injured was declared dead does not by itself establish that a later FIR at the police station having territorial jurisdiction is an afterthought or that the named witnesses did not see the occurrence. The Court considered the sequence of initial treatment, referral to another city, declaration of death and mortuary formalities when evaluating the timing and place of reporting.	693
Effect of an unexplained delay in reporting alleged rape	Delay in lodging an FIR does not necessarily defeat a rape prosecution, but it is relevant to the assessment of credibility and must be considered with the explanation and the other evidence. The explanation for approximately one year's delay was rejected here because the parents' alleged prolonged absence for treatment was not substantiated and material circumstances remained unexplained. The father's occasional visits and the failure to examine the mother concerning disclosure were also considered when the Court found it unsafe to convict on the prosecutrix's sole testimony.	694
Delayed forwarding of the FIR does not by itself establish antedating	Section 157 CrPC requires prompt forwarding of the FIR to the Magistrate, and the time of dispatch and receipt is an external check against manipulation. Delay alone, however, does not establish an antedated FIR where it was promptly recorded and investigation began on that basis. The circumstances, explanation and any prejudice must be assessed. Applying the authorities reproduced in paragraphs 84–88, the Court found that same-day scene inspection, seizures, inquest and post-mortem supported the recorded FIR date. It also considered the intervening Sunday and immediate investigative work in rejecting the challenge based on the Magistrate's receipt two days later.	951
Delay in FIR: explanation and effect cannot be decided by a mini-trial	Delay in lodging an FIR is not invariably fatal if the prosecution plausibly explains it. Whether the delay was explained and what adverse effect it had on the prosecution required trial evidence. The overnight interval in this case did not by itself justify quashing under section 482 CrPC.	976
Delay in reporting sexual offences as a ground for quashing	Delay alone does not justify quashing sexual-offence proceedings; the prosecution may explain the interval, including reluctance connected with the victim's reputation and family circumstances. Where repeated non-consensual acts were alleged during the period between the first act and the FIR, the Court found no delay warranting interference. The first alleged act could not be considered in isolation from the continuing allegations.	982
	Sub-Chapter no. 23.3 Adverse Inference and Evidentiary Conduct in Criminal Proceedings
Omission of assailants' names and overt acts from an inquest report	An inquest determines the apparent cause and nature of death and need not set out the assailants' names, eyewitnesses or individual overt acts. A witness's signature on an inquest report omitting those details did not discredit his eyewitness account, particularly when his detailed FIR and police statement preceded the post-mortem and corresponded with the medical findings.	23
Refusal to cooperate	In reviewing interim maintenance, the Court treated the husband's allegations	131

with testing of photographs and marital-status allegations	of a prior marriage as apparently false where he relied on photographs but refused their forensic examination and did not cooperate with the medical examination to which the wife had agreed. It accepted the trial court's adverse inference from his changed position. The assessment arose from his conduct recorded in the trial court's order sheets.
A discrepancy about who lodged the FIR did not establish suppression of an earlier report	An adverse inference for suppression of an earlier FIR was unwarranted merely because one witness attributed the report to another person. The informant and accompanying witness identified the report actually lodged, and the recording officer was not confronted with the suggested earlier report.	207
Unexplained consideration when an accused elects to testify	Where the accused elected to testify about the disputed transaction, the Court required him to explain the adverse circumstances concerning the alleged consideration. His failure to say when payment was made, together with the absence of payment witnesses or a bank record, was considered against the claim that the complainant had received the sale price.	273
Uncollected CCTV footage — alleged suppression and quashing	Failure to collect CCTV footage did not justify quashing on the allegation of deliberate suppression in this case. Given the interval between the alleged access to the record, the complaint and the inquiry statement mentioning cameras, the Court considered it probable that limited storage and automatic overwriting had erased the earlier footage. This was an inference, not a finding based on a verified retention period for that system. The applicant remained free to cross-examine the witness and raise the omission at trial.	326
Non-Examination of Witnesses: Quality of Evidence and Material Gaps	The prosecution need not multiply witnesses to the same point. Non-examination of other eyewitnesses does not undermine trustworthy evidence already establishing the occurrence. An adverse inference may nevertheless arise where an available material witness is withheld and that witness could explain the genesis, supply an essential missing part or cure a material gap in the prosecution case. The Court must first assess the evidence actually produced and the circumstances of the omission.	360
Avoiding Attendance When Court Identification Is to Occur	Where an accused knew that identifying witnesses would be examined and remained absent despite a specific direction to attend, the court could draw an adverse inference. In that setting, the witnesses' stated recognition of an accused known to them, supported by earlier parade identification, was accepted as substantive identification despite his chosen absence from the dock.	379
Non-examination of additional or material witnesses	Evidence is weighed for quality rather than counted. Non-examination of every available witness does not discredit trustworthy evidence already proving the relevant facts. An adverse inference may arise where an available material witness is withheld and the missing testimony is needed to explain an essential part of the case or cure a gap. Here, the other reliable evidence established the child's departure and the recovery of her body, so non-examination of the grandmother, first discoverer and additional villagers was not fatal.	391
Best available evidence and the court's own witness power	The Court cannot compel a party to call a particular witness as its own witness. It may take account of the withholding of the best available evidence and, where evidence is essential, use its own Section 311 power to examine the material witness so that a party's omission does not cause a failure of justice.	414
Suppression of material police and hospital records in assessing the prosecution case	The withholding of the counter-complaint, related inquiry records, contemporaneous hospital documents and records of the deceased's movements, together with the failure to examine officers who took him to hospital, materially undermined the prosecution narrative. The investigating officer's denial of a complaint was inconsistent with his own inquiry into it. On the cumulative evidence, the Court found suppression and concluded that the prosecution had not proved guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	467
Suppression of first	Suppression of the earliest information, combined with admissions that	474

information — Later naming after deliberation	additional accused were named after deliberation and medical evidence contradicting their alleged firing, undermined proof of their presence and participation. The earliest informant nevertheless admitted that he had named Rajesh and Kallu as the shooters. The evidentiary defect therefore supported acquittal of the five later-named appellants without requiring rejection of the independently reliable case against Rajesh.
Adverse Inference from Withholding Available Salary Evidence in Maintenance Proceedings	Where the father admitted employment and possessed his salary slip, it was unreasonable to place the burden of proving his income entirely on the mother. Suppression of the best available evidence permitted an adverse inference against him. Both parties had withheld material information about their earnings, but the maintenance claim had to be decided on evidence and law rather than the Court's displeasure at their conduct. The mother's non-disclosure did not justify rejecting the child's maintenance claim.	534
Withholding a material witness to avoid inconsistencies in the prosecution case	Giving up a cited witness assumed significance where her account bore directly on disputed circumstances and the Court found that the prosecution had concealed her presence and avoided inconsistencies between her account and the eyewitness's version. In those circumstances, her non-examination reinforced the Court's doubts about the prosecution account.	550
Suppression of a diary relevant to the deceased's money-lending dealings	The Court found suppression of material evidence where a witness said that a diary had been recovered at the scene, but the police neither recorded its seizure nor produced it. Evidence that the deceased recorded loans in that diary made it material to identifying persons with whom he had financial dealings. Its withholding formed part of the deficiencies considered in assessing whether guilt was proved.	553
Non-examination of witnesses and adverse inference for withholding essential evidence	Failure to examine another witness does not automatically discredit otherwise reliable evidence. The court must assess whether the available testimony proves the case and whether the omitted witness would merely repeat it. Where an available material witness could explain an essential part of the case or fill a significant evidentiary gap and is withheld, an adverse inference may follow. Absence of independent witnesses alone does not defeat trustworthy testimony.	580
Possible Adverse Inference From Avoiding DNA Examination	While upholding the direction for DNA examination, the Court observed that the accused appeared to be avoiding the test and that this conduct could lead to an adverse inference. The observation identifies a possible consequence of avoidance; the Court did not draw a final adverse inference or determine guilt in the proceedings challenging permission for testing.	659
Unchallenged identification and recovery testimony	Where the witnesses identifying the deceased were not cross-examined, their identification remained unchallenged. Similarly, failure to question the investigating officer about recovery of blood from the truck left that recovery unchallenged. The Court accepted those proved circumstances when assessing the cumulative prosecution case.	682
Non-examination of independent or additional witnesses	Non-examination of other available witnesses does not automatically defeat trustworthy prosecution evidence. Courts must first assess the evidence actually adduced and consider whether omitted evidence would merely duplicate it. If an available material witness could explain the genesis of the occurrence or fill an essential gap not otherwise established, withholding that witness may justify an adverse inference. Independent villagers' reluctance in a faction-ridden setting was considered here, and the reliable injured and other eyewitnesses were accepted.	698
Non-examination of independent or additional witnesses	Non-examination of other available witnesses does not automatically defeat trustworthy prosecution evidence. Courts must first assess the evidence actually adduced and consider whether omitted evidence would merely duplicate it. Accused as voluntary defence witness — his account tested against his own witness	An accused who elects under Section 315 CrPC to testify as a defence witness is subject to examination as a witness. Relying on Rakesh Garg v. State of M.P., Cr.A. No. 6426/2017, decided on 10 May 2019, the Court stated that he cannot refuse to answer questions on the immunity asserted as an accused and may face leading questions tending to implicate him in cross-examination, in the Section 132 Evidence Act context discussed in that passage. Ramjilal (DW6) asserted that he was dragged from a tractor and beaten, and that Roop Singh fell on a spade. His own tractor driver, Tole Sharma (DW7), did not corroborate those details and instead confirmed Ramjilal's initial stone throwing. The Court rejected the defence narrative on that comparison. The ruling arose from his voluntary election to testify and the assessment of his testimony.	735
Defence suggestion recognising an eyewitness's presence	While disputing one witness's presence, the defence suggested that only the other eyewitness was accompanying the victims. The Court treated that suggestion as recognising the other eyewitness's presence near the incident and considered it together with the consistent testimony and absence of a demonstrated material discrepancy. The conclusion arose from the particular suggestion and the supporting evidence.	817
	Sub-Chapter no. 23.4 Circumstantial Evidence and Complete Chain Requirement
Cumulative circumstantial evidence in a firearm-murder prosecution	The Court upheld the conviction on the combined circumstances of the deceased being last seen travelling with the accused husband shortly before the shooting, his failure to explain that situation, the post-occurrence conduct relied upon by the Court, recovery of a firearm on his disclosure and the forensic link between that firearm and the cartridge. The medical evidence established a fatal gunshot injury. This was a conclusion on the connected evidence as a whole, rather than a finding that last-seen evidence alone established guilt.	36
Circumstantial evidence: a complete chain beyond reasonable doubt	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved, conclusive and consistent only with guilt. Taken together, the circumstances must exclude reasonable hypotheses of innocence and leave no reasonable gap in the chain; suspicion, however strong, is insufficient. Applying the reproduced authorities, the Court considered the quality and cumulative effect of the evidence. PW7 described the five accused entering the fort with the deceased at about 4–5 pm and leaving without him after a sound was heard; the body was found there later that night. Other witness accounts, medical evidence of homicide and weapon recoveries supplied corroboration. The Court found the chain complete despite the complainant's failure to support the case and the delay and credibility objections addressed separately. No eyewitness account of the killing was treated as necessary on that proved chain.	45
Circumstantial prosecution: a false defence cannot cure gaps in proof	The prosecution bears the burden of proving a complete circumstantial chain. As explained in the Sunil Clifford Daniel passage adopted by the Court, the falsity or untenability of the defence cannot excuse a serious defect or missing link in the prosecution evidence. The rejection of the defence witness's account did not replace the Court's separate finding that clear, cogent prosecution evidence established guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	45
Circumstantial evidence — proof of homicide does not establish an accused's guilt without a complete	In a case based on circumstantial evidence, every incriminating circumstance must be firmly established, and the circumstances together must form a complete chain consistent only with the accused's guilt and excluding a reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Proof that the death was homicidal did not establish the appellant's responsibility where the last-seen evidence was unreliable and the recovered articles provided no incriminating forensic link.	70

chain	The incomplete chain could not sustain convictions under Sections 302 and 201 IPC.
Unproduced letters of unproved authorship as an alleged incriminating circumstance	Seizure memos did not establish the alleged incriminating letters where the prosecution did not produce the letters, their authorship was unknown and the witnesses did not prove either their seizure or the asserted contents naming the appellant. The Court therefore rejected the letters as a circumstance connecting him with the murders.	99
Proof by circumstances despite absence of reliable identification	Identification of the accused at a parade or in court is not indispensable in every prosecution if guilt is otherwise established by the circumstances. The absence or failure of identification must therefore be considered with the other evidence. Here, Deependra's case failed because both his identification and the alleged recovery connecting him to the ransom were unproved.	183
Complete circumstantial chain and exclusion of reasonable innocence	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved, and the circumstances together must form a conclusive chain excluding a reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Suspicion cannot replace proof, and a false defence cannot cure a gap in the prosecution case. Here, last-seen evidence and other material links failed. The solitary possibility that blood on the appellant's T-shirt was the victim's did not establish guilt, and the Court acquitted him.	219
Physical circumstances corroborating a declaration of kerosene burning	In this case, the extensive distribution of burns and recovery of a container containing kerosene supported the deceased’s account that kerosene had been poured on her before ignition. Those medical and physical circumstances corroborated the accepted dying declarations and the finding of homicidal burning.	229
Complete chain required for conviction on circumstantial evidence	Every incriminating circumstance must be fully established by reliable evidence and be conclusive in nature. Taken together, the circumstances must be consistent only with guilt, exclude a reasonable hypothesis of innocence and form a complete chain showing that the accused committed the act. Grave suspicion or a conclusion that the accused may be guilty cannot replace proof beyond reasonable doubt.	278
Complete chain required for conviction on circumstantial evidence	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved, conclusive and consistent only with guilt. Taken together, the circumstances must exclude a reasonable hypothesis of innocence; suspicion cannot replace proof, and a false defence cannot cure a missing prosecution link. The Court found that the proved quarrel and presence on the roof, homicidal injuries, scene blood, recovered bloodstained articles and false explanation formed a complete chain establishing murder.	294
Complete chain of circumstances required for a murder conviction	A conviction on circumstantial evidence requires each material circumstance to be firmly proved, conclusive and consistent only with guilt. Together the circumstances must exclude a reasonable hypothesis of innocence; conjecture or moral conviction is insufficient. Here the child’s homicidal death, the proved short period in the appellant’s company, recovery of the bloodstained sickle and clothing, and human blood on those articles were considered together with his failure to explain separation from the infant. The Court found the chain complete.	297
Flight from an isolated scene and corroborative proof of identity	Seeing the accused flee the place where an injured child is immediately found can be a significant circumstance when supported by other reliable evidence. Here three cattle-grazing witnesses identified the appellant as fleeing an isolated spot without ordinary public movement. They found the child unconscious and bleeding, and the prompt FIR and medical evidence supported their account. Although the very young child could not give intelligible testimony, the combined circumstances established the appellant’s guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	298

23.4 : Circumstantial Evidence and Complete Chain Requirement

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Circumstantial evidence — proof of a complete chain	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved, conclusive in tendency and consistent only with the accused's guilt. Taken together, the circumstances must exclude reasonable hypotheses of innocence and form a complete chain establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Grave suspicion and emotional considerations cannot replace proof. Applying these principles, the Court considered fetal paternity, the domestic setting, the medical and other evidence, and the exclusion of the alternative suspect sufficient to sustain the convictions under Sections 376, 302 and 201 IPC.	301
False defence — no substitute for proof of the prosecution case	In a case based on circumstantial evidence, the prosecution bears the burden of proving a complete chain. The falsity or untenability of the defence does not justify overlooking a serious infirmity or gap in the prosecution evidence. The Court adopted this qualification from Sunil Clifford Daniel while testing whether the circumstances established guilt.	301
Circumstantial evidence — complete chain excluding reasonable innocence	Every incriminating circumstance must be firmly established by reliable evidence, and the circumstances taken together must form a complete chain pointing only to the accused's guilt and excluding a reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Suspicion, however grave, cannot replace proof. The doubtful motorcycle link, unsupported recovery and unreliable property identification failed to establish the required chain connecting the appellant to the night house-breaking and fatal assault; he was therefore acquitted under Section 460 IPC.	335
Alleged getaway motorcycle — missing records and ownership proof	A constable's account of seeing three unidentified riders on a motorcycle near the locality did not securely link the accused to the crime where the alleged report of its registration number had no station-diary entry or other documentary support. The seized motorcycle lacked a key and ownership documents, and fingerprints taken during investigation were not examined. These evidentiary gaps contributed to the failure of the circumstantial chain.	335
Failure of the Circumstantial Chain in a Child Rape and Murder Reference	The medical evidence established a homicidal death, but the prosecution did not reliably connect the accused to the child, the alleged journey, the crime scene or the recovered clothing. The body's claimed identity, last-seen accounts, recoveries, sample handling and alleged telephone confession were unproved or unreliable. Considering the evidence cumulatively, the Court found that evidence had been fabricated instead of properly collected. It allowed the appeal, set aside the convictions and acquitted the accused of every charge; the gravity of the allegations did not supply the missing links.	389
Proof of a complete chain of circumstantial evidence	Each incriminating circumstance must be fully established, conclusive in tendency and consistent only with guilt. Together, the circumstances must exclude other reasonable hypotheses and form a chain leaving no reasonable ground consistent with innocence; moral conviction cannot replace proof. The Court found that the last-seen evidence, forensic links, medical evidence and other proved circumstances met that standard.	391
Complete chain required for conviction on circumstantial evidence	Each incriminating circumstance must be cogently established and, taken with the others, form an unbroken chain pointing only to guilt and excluding a reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Grave suspicion cannot replace proof, and a missing link entitles the accused to the benefit of doubt. In its final assessment, the Court found that the accepted last-seen testimony, medical findings and forensic links established the offences beyond reasonable doubt.	393
Proof of every link in a circumstantial case	The circumstances relied on must be fully established, conclusive in tendency and consistent only with guilt. Together they must exclude other reasonable hypotheses and leave no reasonable ground consistent with innocence; a possibility of guilt is insufficient. The Court found the accepted last-seen, discovery, conduct, medical and forensic evidence formed that complete chain.	397
Proof linking an	In a circumstantial poisoning case, the evidence must be carefully examined for	467 accused to homicidal administration of poison	a clear motive, death from the relevant poison, possession of that poison by the accused and opportunity to administer it. Detection of aluminium phosphide in the viscera alone did not establish that the appellants administered it. Missing evidence about possession, purchase and mixing of the poison, together with the rejected dying declaration and suppressed records, left the required connection unproved.

Complete and exclusive chain of circumstantial evidence	Every circumstance relied on for guilt must be fully established, conclusive and consistent only with the accused's guilt. The combined chain must exclude other reasonable hypotheses and leave no reasonable ground consistent with innocence, showing that in all human probability the accused committed the act. Conjecture that the accused may be guilty cannot replace proof that the accused must be guilty. The incomplete chain here required acquittal.	467
Complete chain of circumstances proving guilt	Each circumstance relied on must be fully established, conclusive and consistent with guilt, and the combined chain must exclude a reasonable conclusion of innocence. The Court found that the disappearance, ransom communications, proved handwriting, disclosure of concealed remains, DNA identification and identification of the deceased's belongings together established guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	575
Complete chain required for conviction on circumstantial evidence	Every incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved by reliable evidence, be conclusive in tendency, and form a cumulative chain consistent only with guilt and excluding a reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Applying Sharad Birdhichand Sarda and the other cited circumstantial-evidence authorities, the Court held that grave suspicion cannot replace proof and found the prosecution's chain established beyond reasonable doubt.	644
False defence cannot cure gaps in circumstantial proof	The prosecution bears the burden of proving a complete circumstantial chain. The falsity or untenability of the accused's defence cannot justify overlooking a serious infirmity or missing link in the prosecution case. The Court adopted this safeguard from Sunil Clifford Daniel's reproduction of Sharad Birdhichand Sarda before finding the prosecution proof sufficient.	644
Absence of an eyewitness to an incident unlikely to be observed	A conviction does not require eyewitness corroboration merely because no one directly observed the incident, particularly where its time or place made another eyewitness unlikely. The Court assessed the quality of the circumstantial and confession evidence and rejected absence of an eyewitness as a ground for acquittal on this record.	644
Cumulative circumstantial proof of abduction, killing and concealment	The Court found a complete circumstantial chain against the two appellants from last-seen testimony, ransom evidence, homicidal strangulation, discovery of the concealed body and memorandum-led recoveries considered together with the scientific evidence. It held that the objections concerning omitted witnesses, minor discrepancies and recovery details did not break that chain, and affirmed their convictions.	648
Non-examination of a witness where the remaining circumstances complete the chain	Non-examination of particular witnesses is assessed against the quality and sufficiency of the remaining evidence. The Court rejected the objection concerning omitted independent witnesses and held that failure to examine the recipient of the ransom call was not fatal where the body recovery, last-seen evidence, recoveries and scientific material completed the circumstantial chain.	648
Circumstantial murder case — homicide and suspicion did not establish authorship	Proof that the deceased died from homicidal injuries did not establish that the appellant killed him. No witness saw the killing, the main incriminating witness was unreliable, the alleged discovery of the axe was unproved and the investigating officer's suggested motive lacked evidentiary support. The appellant's remaining at the scene also weighed in his favour on this record. Assessing these circumstances with the investigative omissions, the Court found guilt unproved beyond reasonable doubt, set aside the murder conviction and directed release unless the appellant was required in another case.	677

23.4 : Circumstantial Evidence and Complete Chain Requirement

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Circumstantial evidence — complete chain excluding innocence	Every incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved by reliable evidence, be conclusive in tendency and, taken together, form a complete chain consistent only with the accused's guilt. The chain must exclude every reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Suspicion, however strong, cannot replace proof, and loss of an essential link prevents the remaining circumstances from establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	682
A false defence cannot cure a gap in the prosecution chain	The prosecution bears the burden of proving a complete chain of circumstances. A false defence or plea cannot cure an infirmity or missing link in that proof.	682
Circumstantial evidence — proof of every link and exclusion of innocence	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly established by reliable evidence. Taken cumulatively, the circumstances must form a complete chain consistent only with guilt and excluding a reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Suspicion cannot substitute for proof; if an essential link fails, the remaining circumstances cannot establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	683
False defence cannot cure an incomplete prosecution chain	The prosecution must prove that the circumstantial chain is complete. A false defence or plea cannot cure a defect or missing link in the prosecution's evidence.	683
Circumstantial proof — failure of identification and recovery links requires acquittal	The medical examination and post-mortem established that Jaswant's death was homicidal, but the prosecution still had to prove that the appellant committed the offence. Its case rested on two circumstances: his alleged flight from the scene and recovery of a supposedly bloodstained farsa and clothing. The family witnesses' identification failed when their accounts were read together, the chance witness was unreliable, and the recovery evidence did not establish the alleged blood link. No other circumstance was available against the appellant. The Court therefore held that guilt was not proved, set aside the conviction and sentence, and acquitted him under Sections 452 and 302 IPC.	747
Complete chain of circumstances and proof beyond reasonable doubt	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved by reliable evidence, be conclusive and consistent only with guilt, and form a complete chain excluding a reasonable hypothesis of innocence. Grave suspicion and moral certainty cannot replace legal proof. Loss of a material link breaks the chain. The Court applied these safeguards when assessing recovery, identification and forensic evidence, while also considering direct eyewitness identification.	761
False defence cannot supply a missing prosecution link	In a case based on circumstantial evidence, the prosecution must prove a complete chain pointing to guilt. A false defence or plea cannot cure a gap or infirmity in that proof.	761
Circumstantial evidence—complete chain excluding innocence	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly established by reliable evidence, be conclusive in tendency and be consistent only with guilt. Taken together, the circumstances must exclude a reasonable hypothesis of innocence and form a complete chain. Grave suspicion cannot replace proof, an important missing link cannot be supplied by the remaining circumstances, and a false defence cannot cure a gap in the prosecution case. Applying these principles to the proved last-seen, body-recovery, belongings-recovery, medical and toxicology links, the Court upheld the convictions under Sections 302 and 201 IPC.	815
Proof of body recovery—unchallenged testimony and the defence suggestion	The objection that no documentary evidence showed recovery of the body from the appellant's house did not defeat proof of that recovery. Several witnesses testified to that recovery without a material challenge, and the defence itself suggested that someone else had buried the body in his house. On that combined evidentiary basis, the Court treated the place of recovery and the appellant's digging out of the body as proved beyond reasonable doubt.	815
Broken circumstantial chain	A solitary circumstance cannot sustain conviction where it does not form a complete chain incompatible with innocence. Once last-seen evidence and	827

— Weak motive and accidental-death explanation	identification of the recovered sandal failed, the weak quarrel-related motive did not establish murder. The unprotected well at ground level supported the Court's conclusion that the child's drowning was accidental, and the Section 302 IPC conviction was set aside.
Circumstantial evidence — Conditions for a complete chain	Every incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved by reliable evidence. The proved facts must be conclusive, consistent only with guilt and inconsistent with any other hypothesis. Taken together, they must form a complete chain leaving no reasonable ground consistent with innocence and showing that, in all human probability, the accused committed the act. Grave suspicion cannot substitute for proof, and a missing important link cannot be repaired by the remaining circumstances.	827
False defence — No cure for gaps in prosecution proof	In a circumstantial case, the prosecution bears the burden of proving a complete chain. A false defence or plea cannot cure a gap or infirmity in the prosecution case.	827
Circumstantial evidence — fully proved circumstances forming a chain consistent only with guilt	The circumstances relied on must be fully established, and their cumulative effect must exclude a reasonable conclusion consistent with innocence and prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt. The Court considered the homicidal strangulation, the spouses' presence together in the home, their strained relationship, the absence of a credible explanation, the appellant's disappearance and his false account together. It found the chain complete and affirmed the murder conviction.	898
Complete circumstantial chain in a child rape-and-murder prosecution	Circumstantial evidence must form a chain that leaves no reasonable hypothesis consistent with innocence. Accepting the Sharad Birdichand Sarda principle, the Court assessed last-seen testimony, the accused's account to the child's father, authenticated CCTV movement towards the recovery area, matching Y-DNA profiles and subsequent abscondence together. Those independently proved links established guilt cumulatively. Admissions under Section 313 CrPC reinforced the prosecution case only after its evidence had been assessed, rather than replacing proof of the chain.	915
Complete chain of proof in a case based on circumstantial evidence	Each incriminating circumstance must be firmly proved, conclusive in tendency and consistent only with guilt. Taken together, the circumstances must exclude reasonable hypotheses of innocence and form a complete chain establishing that the accused committed the crime. Suspicion, emotional considerations or moral conviction cannot replace legal proof. The prosecution retains the burden of completing the chain, and a false defence cannot cure a gap in its evidence. If the proved circumstances reasonably support two inferences, the inference favouring the accused must be accepted.	934
Circumstantial evidence: complete chain and proof of the offender's identity	Every incriminating circumstance must be fully proved, conclusive and consistent only with guilt. Taken together, the circumstances must exclude a reasonable hypothesis of innocence and form a complete chain. Proof that the death was homicidal did not establish who caused it. The prosecution failed to prove that the deceased was with the appellants at the relevant time, that they administered poison or strangled him, or that the recovered articles connected them with the killing. The missing links precluded conviction under Sections 302/34 IPC.	942
Explained presence of a body in the accused's house	The presence of a dead body in the accused's house was not an incriminating circumstance where prosecution witnesses themselves said that they had brought it there after death. That explanation prevented its location from supplying a missing link connecting the accused with the killing.	942
Recovery of a commonly used pesticide without an incriminating link	Recovery of a pesticide bottle from an agriculturist's courtyard was not incriminating in the circumstances: the pesticide was commonly used and readily available, and witnesses had brought the body to the premises, leaving open the possibility that another person had placed the bottle there. The	942 recovery did not establish the appellants' participation in the poisoning.

Circumstantial proof of murder without an eyewitness	The absence of an eyewitness did not defeat the murder charge where the accepted circumstances formed a complete chain: the accused was seen taking the child towards the forest, the body and associated articles were recovered at his instance, and medical evidence established death from multiple injuries. The Court considered these circumstances together with the unexplained matters put to the accused and found the offence proved beyond reasonable doubt.	986
Failure to explain incriminating circumstances under Section 313 CrPC	Where incriminating circumstances established by the prosecution are put to the accused under Section 313 CrPC, failure to explain them, or a false answer, may provide a further link in the circumstantial chain. Here the accused did not explain the circumstances of taking the child away, the knife purchase put to him, or his knowledge of the body's location. The Court considered that failure with the other accepted evidence.	986
Complete proof of a circumstantial chain	Every circumstance relied upon must be fully established by cogent evidence, conclusive in nature and consistent only with guilt. Together the circumstances must exclude other hypotheses and leave no reasonable conclusion consistent with innocence. Although homicidal death was proved, the deficient motive, confession, sighting and forensic links did not establish the appellants' guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Their convictions under Sections 302 and 201 IPC were set aside.	988
Circumstantial evidence — complete chain identifying the accused as the sole offender	Conviction on circumstantial evidence requires a complete chain pointing to the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt. In the child's rape and murder case, the Court assessed the last-seen accounts, the accused's return alone, testimony concerning his admission, medical evidence and recovery of the body together. It found the circumstances complete and identifying the appellant alone as the perpetrator, and upheld the convictions under Sections 302, 376(1)(f) and 201 IPC. The conclusion rested on the combined evidence accepted by the Court.	1002

Conduct of Accused and Incriminating Circumstances

Presence at the scene and flight — corroborative incriminating circumstance	A witness need not have seen the actual infliction of the fatal injury for the witness's account to have corroborative value. The relied-upon authority treats seeing the accused at the place of occurrence and running away immediately afterwards as an incriminating circumstance, even though that witness did not see the attack itself. Such evidence is assessed with the eyewitness account and the surrounding record.	8
Abscondence — significance depends on the surrounding circumstances	Flight immediately after an incident may support an inference of guilt when considered with the surrounding evidence, but does not invariably establish guilt: an innocent person may flee through mistaken apprehension. Here, prolonged abscondence, the admitted firing and the concealment and damage of the gun supported the prosecution account rather than the claimed private defence.	12
Post-occurrence conduct under Section 8 of the Evidence Act	The accused's conduct after the death may be relevant under Section 8 of the Evidence Act. The Court relied on its findings that the husband was absent from the inquest and postmortem formalities, did not receive his wife's body and did not attend her cremation. It considered that conduct together with the last-seen and firearm evidence in affirming guilt; the decision does not create an automatic presumption from absence at those formalities.	36
Earlier similar offences — Limited use of the witnesses' accounts	The accounts given by the parents of an earlier child victim were treated as relevant only to the appellant's conduct. The Court based proof of the present assault on the current victim's account and its supporting evidence, and separately considered the proved earlier conviction when assessing sentence. A further alleged incident unsupported by evidence was not treated as established.	116

23 : General Principles of Proof, Appreciation of Evidence and Circumstantial Evidence

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Abscondence as a supporting circumstance rather than proof of guilt by itself	Abscondence alone does not establish a guilty mind. It is a relevant circumstance whose weight depends on the facts and which must be considered with the other evidence. The husband's disappearance and failure to accompany his burnt wife to hospital were considered together with the accepted dying declaration and the surrounding circumstances.	122
Flight with the weapon as relevant conduct under Section 8 of the Evidence Act	Flight from the scene must be assessed in context, since a person may flee through unfounded apprehension. Where a close relative left the injured victim instead of helping him and fled carrying an axe later found stained with human blood, the Court treated that conduct as incriminating under Section 8 of the Evidence Act. Together with the proved recovery and unexplained human bloodstains, it established the appellant's responsibility for the assault.	132
Absconding is an incriminating circumstance only when assessed with the remaining evidence	Absconding after an incident is not invariably proof of guilt, since fear of false implication may also cause flight. Where the remaining proved circumstances indicate guilty consciousness, absconding may add an incriminating circumstance. The Court applied that contextual assessment to the appellants' flight after the homicidal death inside their household.	138
Abscondence alone cannot establish guilt	Abscondence is a weak circumstance whose value depends on the surrounding evidence. Even an innocent person may evade arrest through fear of being wrongly implicated. Applying Matru and Bipin Kumar Mondal, the Court held that abscondence alone cannot establish guilt or provide the decisive missing link in a chain of circumstances; it requires support from substantive evidence.	157
Flight from the scene as relevant subsequent conduct	Absconding after an alleged offence is relevant subsequent conduct under Section 8, illustration (i), Evidence Act. The Court treated the appellant's immediate escape from the house and continued absence as incriminating circumstances alongside the child's eyewitness account, the witnesses' observations of the aftermath and medical evidence. It relied on the combined evidence in affirming the murder conviction.	214
Abscondence gains relevance when supported by other incriminating evidence	Absconding after an occurrence is not by itself proof of guilt, since even an innocent person may flee out of fear. Where convincing and reliable evidence otherwise connects the accused with the offence, unexplained abscondence may be considered as an additional relevant circumstance. The Court applied that qualified principle to the shooter’s post-incident conduct.	253
Alteration of the recovered firearm as incriminating conduct	The gun recovered after the shooter’s delayed arrest had a cut firing pin and nitrate in its barrel. The Court considered the unexplained cutting, together with the available opportunity and other evidence, an attempt to present the weapon as inoperative and an incriminating circumstance. The weapon’s condition on recovery did not by itself negate the proved shooting.	253
False explanation under Section 313 CrPC in a circumstantial case	A false answer concerning an established incriminating circumstance put to the accused under Section 313 CrPC may support an adverse inference when considered with the prosecution evidence. Here the claim of being at the market was contradicted by evidence of the accused’s presence on the roof. That false explanation supported the proved circumstances; it did not replace the prosecution’s burden to prove guilt or cure a gap in its case.	294
Abscondence: Assessment with Immediate and Subsequent Conduct	Abscondence alone does not establish a guilty mind, since an innocent person may flee from fear of false implication. Conduct must be assessed in context. The Court attached significance to the witness remaining with the bodies, lodging the report and assisting the investigation, and declined to treat his later absence as establishing guilt in the cross-case.	360
Misleading conduct under Section 8 of the Evidence Act	The accused’s successive false directions that led police to search for a fictitious recipient of the child were relevant as conduct accompanying those acts. Previous or subsequent conduct influencing, or influenced by, facts in issue may be considered under Section 8. Such conduct cannot by itself sustain	397

	conviction, but may be weighed with the other circumstances proved against the accused.
Abscondence after the occurrence — Additional incriminating conduct	The Court treated the appellant's immediate flight from the house and continued absence until arrest as an additional incriminating circumstance. It considered that conduct alongside the accepted eyewitness accounts and medical evidence in affirming the murder conviction. The decision rests on that combined record, rather than proof of flight alone.	478
Presence after an alarm does not by itself connect a person to the offence	When villagers gathered after an alarm, the appearance of persons living nearby was not by itself unusual conduct connecting them with the earlier assault. Evidence that those persons separately injured the witness on his return home did not establish their involvement in the assault on the deceased.	573
Accused's injury documented six days later — failure to establish suppression of the incident's genesis	An injury documented when the accused was arrested six days after the incident did not establish that he had suffered it in the same occurrence. There was no contemporaneous report, medical examination or record of intervening treatment, and his absence from the police remained unexplained. Since an intervening cause of the fracture could not be ruled out, the plea that the prosecution had suppressed the incident's genesis was rejected.	633
Abscondence as a minor circumstance in the evidentiary assessment	Abscondence does not by itself establish guilt or a guilty mind; even an innocent person may evade arrest through fear. Its value depends on surrounding circumstances and it is ordinarily only a minor item of evidence, not a determining link completing an otherwise deficient chain. Applying Sujit Biswas, the Court treated the appellant's absence after the burning as supporting the accepted dying declarations and other circumstances.	649
Physical circumstances bearing on a suicide defence	In rejecting suicide, the Court considered that the kerosene container was absent when the scene was inspected and was later recovered with a matchbox on the appellant's disclosure. It reasoned that a person who had set herself alight would not then hide or remove that container. This circumstance supported the accepted dying declarations identifying the appellant.	649
Section 8 Evidence Act — pointing out articles as relevant conduct	An accused’s act of pointing out the location of incriminating articles may be admissible as conduct under Section 8 Evidence Act independently of whether an accompanying statement falls within Section 27. The conduct must have a close connection with a fact in issue or relevant fact. Bare statements are not conduct unless they accompany and explain acts other than statements. The Court applied this distinction to the accused’s knowledge and disclosure of the recovery site and his conduct concerning the truck.	682
Section 8 Evidence Act — conduct distinguished from bare statements	Conduct of the accused is relevant under Section 8 Evidence Act when it has a close connection with a fact in issue or relevant fact. Bare statements do not constitute conduct unless they accompany and explain acts other than statements. The act of pointing out a place connected with the crime may be proved as conduct independently of the admissibility of an accompanying statement under Section 27.	683
Unexplained possession of the truck and cargo as an incriminating circumstance	The accused’s unexplained presence at the closed factory and possession of the truck and its cloth cargo were treated as incriminating circumstances after the prosecution proved his apprehension while the cargo was being unloaded and the connection of the truck with its deceased driver. The Court assessed the lack of explanation with the other established circumstances.	683
Contextual significance of flight after a killing at home	Abscondence does not invariably show guilt, because an innocent person may flee from fear of false implication. Here the appellant left immediately after his wife's homicidal death in their shared home and failed to explain it, while the reliable child eyewitness implicated him. Even his absence for a few hours before arrest on the same day assumed incriminating significance in those circumstances.	718

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Absconding after the incident as a corroborative circumstance	Absconding alone is not conclusive proof of guilt, since an innocent person may flee through fear of false implication or arrest. Read with other proved circumstances, however, it may provide an additional incriminating link. Applying Kundula Bala Subrahmanyam, the Court relied on the husband's absence during the neighbours' and police proceedings, his failure to obtain treatment or report the death, and his arrest the following day. His immediate absence corroborated the other evidence after the accidental-fall explanation was rejected.	774
Disowning notice contradicted by admitted continued cohabitation	A prior police intimation purporting to disown the son did not establish the parents-in-law's claimed separation where the addresses and a later complaint showed that the son still lived with them. In the circumstances, the Court regarded the intimation as a planned false defence and its preparation as indicative of a guilty mind. That assessment supported the finding of a prima facie case warranting prosecution.	846
Abscondence after the incident — relevant conduct but insufficient by itself to prove guilt	Abscondence may be considered as conduct under Section 8 of the Evidence Act along with other evidence. It does not by itself establish guilt. The appellant’s immediate disappearance and arrest eight days later were treated as an additional incriminating circumstance when considered with the other facts already proved.	898
Abscondence as contextual evidence and a limited credibility circumstance	Abscondence alone does not establish a guilty mind: an innocent person may flee from fear of wrongful arrest. Its value depends on the other proved circumstances and ordinarily cannot supply the decisive missing link in a circumstantial case. Applying Matru, Kundula Bala Subrahmanyam and the narrated Animireddy Venkata Ramana passage, the Court considered the witnesses' absence from immediate police proceedings alongside their cross-case position, inconsistent accounts and suppression of material facts. Their flight was an additional credibility circumstance, not proof by itself that they committed a crime.	919
	Sub-Chapter no. 23.6 Last-Seen Theory, Motive and Corroborative Circumstances
Enmity as a possible motive for crime and false implication	Enmity may explain either false implication or commission of the offence; its effect must be determined from reliable evidence and the surrounding circumstances. Where the eyewitness account was independently found credible and the land-access dispute was established, the Court treated that dispute as the motive for the assault rather than a basis for rejecting the prosecution.	23
Prior enmity as motive for the offence or false implication	Prior enmity may supply a reason to commit the offence as well as a reason for false implication; it is not by itself a ground to reject prosecution evidence. The Court must assess the suggested false implication against the evidence. Here, the injured witness had not participated in the earlier assault or threatened the accused, and the Court rejected the claim that he deliberately accepted a gunshot injury to implicate them.	34
Last seen and Section 106 Evidence Act: explanation as an additional link	Last-seen evidence alone does not establish guilt; the prosecution must prove a complete circumstantial chain. Where the accused were with the deceased shortly before death and the interval left no opportunity for another person's intervention, facts about how they parted company were within their special knowledge. Applying Kashi Ram, the Court treated failure to give a probable and satisfactory explanation as an additional link after the prosecution's foundational proof. Section 106 does not transfer the prosecution's general burden to the accused. Here, the group's entry with the deceased and exit without him were considered with the money-lending motive and medical and recovery evidence in finding the chain complete.	45

23.6 : Last-Seen Theory, Motive and Corroborative Circumstances

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Last-seen evidence — close temporal proximity and corroborating circumstances required to establish guilt	Last-seen evidence must be trustworthy, with a time gap sufficiently short to exclude intervention by another person. The circumstance does not by itself complete the chain of proof: other evidence must connect the accused with the crime. Here, the surviving account lacked reliable corroboration, also placed another person with the deceased, and did not establish the appellant's presence near the place of occurrence. It could not safely sustain conviction.	70
Absence of motive where trustworthy direct evidence proves the offence	Failure to prove the motive or its origin does not justify discarding trustworthy direct evidence of the commission of an offence. Where reliable eyewitness testimony establishes the crime, absence of a proved motive loses significance.	90
Time proximity and corroboration in last-seen evidence	The last-seen inference operates where the interval between the accused and deceased being seen together and discovery of death is so short that intervention by another person becomes impossible. Corroboration should still be sought. A long interval leaving room for others to intervene makes a finding of guilt hazardous without other positive evidence. In this case, the Court treated the witnesses' observation of the accused holding and stabbing the deceased as establishing the circumstance.	93
Motive inferred from the act and surrounding circumstances	Absence of proved previous enmity did not establish absence of motive. The Court considered the stabbing on vital parts, the deceased's Scheduled Caste status and the abusive language used during the attack in concluding that motive was established on the evidence.	93
Enmity as both motive and a possible source of false implication	Enmity may supply a motive for the offence as well as a reason for false implication or exaggeration. The testimony must therefore be carefully examined for confidence, consistency and the possibility of falsely involving an accused. Convincing eyewitness evidence cannot be rejected merely because of hostility. Here, the deceased's earlier killing of the appellant's father was found to establish motive, while the witnesses' account remained reliable.	98
Failure to establish the last-seen link in a circumstantial prosecution	The prosecution failed to prove its sole last-seen circumstance after the witnesses' material omissions and the hearsay basis of one account were exposed. The alleged letters were not proved and the recovered rifle was not linked to the shooting. With no other circumstance connecting the appellant to the killings, proof that the deaths were homicidal did not establish his participation, and the convictions were set aside.	99
Last-seen evidence — Short interval and corroborating circumstances	Last-seen evidence gains significance where the interval before death is sufficiently short to exclude an intervening act by another person. A long interval and a realistic possibility of intervention make reliance hazardous without other positive evidence. Here, the deceased left with the appellant for the river, her body was recovered the next day, and the medical estimate placed death within twenty-four hours. The Court accepted the short interval together with the eyewitness account and concealed-scarf recovery; last seen was not treated as conclusive by itself.	118
Time gap and corroboration in the last-seen inference	The last-seen circumstance is significant where the interval between the accused and deceased being seen together and discovery of death is so short that another person's intervention is excluded. A long gap with a realistic possibility of intervention makes a guilt inference unsafe. Here, the Court accepted the short interval together with the blood and other surrounding circumstances; last-seen evidence alone was not treated as conclusive.	278
Last-seen evidence: short interval and additional corroboration	Last-seen evidence gains significance when the interval between the deceased being seen with the accused and being found dead is so short that reasonable intervention by another person is excluded. It does not alone justify conviction; other proved circumstances must complete the chain. The mother consistently stated that she left her infant with the appellant and returned about thirty minutes later to find the child killed and him absent. The Court assessed that	297

	evidence with the bloodstained recoveries.
Last-seen evidence — temporal proximity and corroboration	Last-seen evidence supports an inference of guilt where the interval between the accused and deceased being seen together alive and the discovery of death is so short that intervention by another offender is excluded. Even then, corroboration should be sought; a long interval and the possibility of others intervening make reliance on this circumstance hazardous. Following Ramreddy Rajeshkhanna Reddy, Hatti Singh and State of U.P. v. Satish, the Court assessed the victim's residence with the appellant together with the DNA and other evidence as part of the complete circumstantial chain.	301
Enmity: Motive for the Offence and for False Implication	Prior enmity may supply a motive to commit an offence as well as a motive for false implication. Its existence therefore does not by itself establish that the prosecution account is false. The Court must assess the asserted false implication against the evidence and the circumstances, including whether there was a reason to spare the suggested real offender.	360
Absence of Motive: Trustworthy Direct Evidence	Failure to establish motive does not undermine a prosecution case otherwise proved by trustworthy direct evidence. Reliable eyewitness testimony cannot be discarded merely because the witnesses cannot explain why the accused committed the offence.	360
Motive Cannot Supply Missing Proof of the Accused's Involvement	Even assuming that the alleged motive was proved, it could not establish murder where the prosecution failed to connect the accused and the specified vehicle with the fatal collision. The assumed motive did not cure the failure of identification and other linking evidence.	375
Absence of Motive Where Direct Evidence Establishes the Assault	Failure to establish the precise motive does not defeat a prosecution supported by trustworthy direct evidence. Motive concerns the accused's internal mental state and may be difficult to prove. Though proof of motive can provide a link in circumstantial evidence, its absence is not by itself a ground to reject an otherwise proved case.	378
Last-seen evidence, temporal proximity and explanation of separation	Last-seen evidence is not conclusive by itself. Its significance depends on a time gap sufficiently small to exclude an intervening offender and on the other proved circumstances. After accepting that the child was last seen with the accused, the close temporal connection and the supporting circumstances, the Court required him to explain when he parted company with her under Section 106 of the Evidence Act. He gave no such explanation.	391
Temporal proximity and corroboration of last-seen evidence	The last-seen theory requires a gap sufficiently small to exclude the possibility of another person being the offender. Even then, the court should look for corroboration. A long gap allowing intervention by others makes an inference of guilt hazardous without further positive evidence. Here, the Court accepted the child's sister's account and relied on the medical and forensic evidence as corroborating links.	393
Absence of a proved motive where the chain is otherwise established	Failure to determine a definite motive is not necessarily fatal to the prosecution. Where reliable last-seen evidence was corroborated by the accepted DNA findings and established guilt, the Court held that the absence of a definite explanation of motive did not require acquittal.	393
Temporal proximity and the limits of last-seen evidence	Last-seen evidence alone does not complete the chain required for conviction; there must be further evidence connecting the accused to the offence. The prosecution must establish sufficient temporal proximity to exclude an intervening offender. Here, the Court accepted the last-seen account, the recovery about twenty-four hours later and the compatible medical estimate of death, and assessed them with the disclosure and forensic links.	397
Enmity as a Possible Motive for Assault and False	Enmity may supply a motive for false implication, but it may equally supply a motive for committing the offence. It therefore calls for careful and meticulous appraisal of the evidence rather than an automatic rejection of the prosecution.	409

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Implication	The prior family killing and retaliatory manner of the attack supported the finding of a revenge motive here.
Evidentiary Significance of Proved or Unproved Motive	A proved motive lends additional support to an otherwise established finding of guilt. Its absence does not necessarily make reliable evidence of the offence untrustworthy, because the perpetrator alone may know what prompted the act. A high degree of established animosity may support the finding that a motive existed.	409
Vague allegations of earlier eve-teasing as proof of motive for murder	The allegation of recurring eve-teasing, without details of the alleged incidents, did not establish a motive for murder on this record. Even if the allegation were accepted, that circumstance alone did not supply the alleged motive. The Court therefore found no supporting case against the appellant on the strength of motive.	422
Last-seen evidence and recovery — explanation under Section 106 Evidence Act	Where eyewitnesses proved that the appellant took the child, a named FIR followed within two hours, and the injured child and her undergarment were recovered on his information about nineteen hours later, the combined circumstances called for an explanation of when and in what condition he parted company with her. Applying last-seen and recovery principles, the Court considered his silence on those facts within his knowledge along with the proved abduction, sexual injuries and recoveries. The inference rested on that combined evidence, including the investigating officer’s unshaken testimony.	482
Prior enmity — motive for the offence and for false implication	Prior enmity may supply a motive both for committing an offence and for falsely implicating the accused. It therefore calls for careful assessment of whether reliable and cogent evidence proves guilt beyond reasonable doubt, rather than automatic acceptance or rejection of the accusation. Applying Moti Ram, the Court accepted the prompt FIR, reliable dying declaration, supported eyewitness account and medical corroboration despite the parties' animosity.	499
Absence of motive where reliable direct evidence establishes the offence	Failure to prove motive does not justify discarding trustworthy direct evidence of an offence. Where reliable eyewitness testimony establishes the crime, motive loses significance. The Court applied this principle while accepting the eyewitness and medical evidence of the fatal assault.	555
Motive in the cumulative assessment of doubtful identification	The Court found no proved motive for the appellant and noted a property-possession dispute and earlier quarrel involving the two men named in the FIR. That rival motive reinforced the weaknesses in the evidence attributing the killings to the appellant. The conclusion formed part of the cumulative assessment; it did not make motive indispensable in every direct-evidence case or finally determine the other men’s guilt.	599
Prior enmity as motive for crime and possible false implication	Prior enmity may supply both a motive to commit the offence and a motive to implicate someone falsely. It therefore calls for careful scrutiny, including the possibility of exaggerating roles or adding innocent persons. Applying the reproduced authorities, the Court held that enmity alone could not displace otherwise consistent and convincing eyewitness evidence. The proved pressure to compromise a pending case supported the motive for the attack.	605
Prior enmity as motive and a possible source of false implication	Enmity may supply a motive for the offence as well as for false implication or exaggeration. Testimony of inimical witnesses therefore requires careful scrutiny on the facts. A convincing and consistent eyewitness account cannot be discarded merely because the parties were hostile, particularly where that hostility also explains the crime.	622
Motive — relevant in all criminal cases, but its absence does not defeat trustworthy direct evidence	Motive is relevant in cases based on direct as well as circumstantial evidence. Its proof may strengthen the case, but failure to establish the precise motive or intensity of the accused's resentment does not, by itself, discredit otherwise trustworthy direct evidence. Where earlier confrontations and a threat supplied some motive and the eyewitness account was reliable, inability to explain the	638

	accused's full mental process did not weaken the murder case.
Temporal proximity and corroboration of last-seen evidence	Last-seen evidence requires careful assessment of the interval between the deceased being seen with the accused and being found dead, and of the possibility of another person's intervention. Even a close interval calls for corroboration; a long interval makes an inference of guilt hazardous without other positive evidence. Applying Ramreddy Rajeshkhanna Reddy, Hatti Singh, Satish and Bodhraj, the Court accepted the last-seen testimony together with the other circumstances completing its case.	648
Motive must be proved — investigating officer cannot supply an unsupported theory	A motive must be established by evidence; the investigating officer cannot create one through an unsupported explanation. The trial court had accepted that the appellant was angry because the deceased wanted treatment by an exorcist. The relevant witness had not said so, no other witness proved it, and the officer had not investigated whether the suggested exorcist existed. The High Court therefore rejected that motive theory as an evidentiary basis for the murder conviction.	677
Absence of proved motive loses force where direct, credible evidence establishes the assault	The Court adopted Bikau Pandey v. State of Bihar and Saddik v. State of Gujarat for the limited proposition that failure to establish a particular motive does not defeat a prosecution otherwise supported by trustworthy direct evidence. The alleged earlier compromise and the trial acquittal of three persons to whom the initial threatening demand was attributed did not dispose of the proof of the remaining appellants' actual conduct. The Court relied on Lakhan's statements, the accepted eyewitnesses and injuries. Motive was not used to replace proof of identity or participation.	678
Last-seen evidence and a short interval before death	Last-seen evidence gains significance when the interval between the deceased being seen alive with the accused and the death is so short that intervention by another person is excluded. It is not conclusive proof by itself and must be considered with the surrounding circumstances. Here the interval of a few minutes, the hospital evidence and the accused’s immediate capture at the scene supported the finding that he caused the fatal injuries, despite the absence of reliable direct evidence of the precise manner of the assault.	691
Prior enmity as a motive for assault or false implication	Prior enmity may supply a motive both for committing an offence and for falsely implicating an accused. The evidence must be weighed carefully, and a plea of false implication requires a factual foundation. Enmity does not justify rejecting otherwise trustworthy testimony. On the proved earlier dispute and the circumstances of the armed attack, the Court found a retaliatory motive rather than accepting the pending earlier case as a reason to reject the prosecution evidence.	698
Prior enmity as a motive for assault or false implication	Prior enmity may supply a motive both for committing an offence and for falsely implicating an accused. The evidence must be weighed carefully, and a plea of false implication requires a factual foundation. Enmity does not justify rejecting otherwise trustworthy testimony. On the proved earlier dispute and the circumstances of the armed attack, the Court found a retaliatory motive rather than accepting the pending earlier case as a reason to reject the prosecution evidence.	699
Prior enmity as motive and possible ground of false implication	Prior enmity may supply a motive for the crime as well as a reason for false implication. It must be assessed with the evidence. Here both sides had reported an earlier clash, and the specific allegations against Atmaram supported the conclusion that animosity led to the occurrence rather than establishing his false implication.	713
Prior enmity may persist despite compromise of earlier cases	A compromise in earlier cases does not necessarily extinguish the underlying enmity. The Court found that hostility arising from earlier murders remained between the parties despite compromises in those trials and treated that surviving enmity as supporting the motive for the later shooting. The finding	772

	was considered with the accepted eyewitness and medical evidence of the assault.
Last-seen evidence—time gap and corroborating circumstances	Last-seen evidence must be assessed against the interval between the deceased being seen alive with the accused and the probable time of death, including the possibility of intervention by another person. It is not conclusive by itself. Applying the cited authorities, the Court considered the deceased's presence at the appellant's house, recovery of his buried body there the next day, the medical interval and the appellant's admitted meeting with him. These circumstances established the last-seen link in the complete chain; the assertion that the deceased later went to another witness's house was not put to that witness.	815
Last-seen evidence — Prosecution burden, time gap and corroboration	The prosecution must first prove that the deceased was last seen alive with the accused. The interval between that sighting and death must be sufficiently short to exclude another person’s intervention. Last-seen evidence alone does not establish guilt; further evidence must connect the accused with the crime. The accused’s failure to explain the death cannot, by itself, supply proof of guilt.	827
Last-seen testimony — Nondisclosure, physical setting and witness conduct	The Court rejected the alleged last-seen accounts after examining the witnesses’ conduct and the objective setting. One witness failed to disclose the sighting to the missing child’s father despite meeting him and described a boundary wall and tree inconsistent with the scene record. The other claimed a rear-view sighting and behaved unexpectedly after learning of his close relative’s death. On the combined assessment, last-seen was not proved beyond reasonable doubt.	827
Last-seen evidence and the explanatory burden under Section 106 Evidence Act	Where the accused was last seen with the deceased so close to the death that another person's intervention was excluded, the Court treated the absence of a probable and satisfactory explanation of their parting as an additional link in the proved circumstances. Section 106 does not transfer the prosecution's ultimate burden of proving guilt. Here, the accepted evidence of the child's movements with the accused, the subsequent recovery of his body at their instance and the medical evidence of homicidal strangulation were considered together in sustaining the conviction.	850
Absence of motive where direct evidence is trustworthy	Absence of a proved motive does not justify discarding trustworthy direct evidence establishing the commission of an offence. Adopting the passage from Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, the Court reiterated that motive loses significance where reliable direct testimony establishes the crime.	850
Last-seen evidence: proximity and corroborating links	Last-seen evidence is weak and inconclusive by itself and requires close proximity between the sighting and recovery of the body. The Court accepted the principles narrated from Padman Bihar, Digamber Vaishnav, Arun Shankar and Dinesh Kumar but found that the prosecution relied on a wider chain. The child's brother described the accused taking her for ice cream, the accused acknowledged their company to her father, and CCTV, DNA and later abscondence supported the inference. Non-examination of the ice-cream vendor or other playing children did not defeat these proved links on this record.	915
Last-seen evidence, temporal proximity and the prosecution’s initial burden	Last-seen evidence does not by itself establish guilt, and the accused’s failure to explain cannot alone prove the offence. The prosecution must first establish incriminating circumstances, including a trustworthy sighting and close proximity to the death; Section 106 Evidence Act concerns facts specially known to the accused. The time gap must be assessed for the possibility of intervention by another person. Here, proved abduction, homicidal death and the medical estimate of death six to twelve days before examination established the necessary proximity, although the body was recovered ten days after abduction.	934
Prior enmity as	Enmity may provide both a motive for the offence and a reason for false	936

motive and a possible ground for false implication	implication. The Court must therefore examine inimical testimony carefully for exaggeration or inclusion of innocent persons. Consistent and convincing eyewitness evidence cannot be rejected solely because of prior hostility. Here the pressure to compromise the pending assault case, reliable eyewitness accounts and medical corroboration supported enmity as the motive for the attack.
Last-seen evidence: proof of the meeting and a sufficiently short interval	A last-seen inference requires reliable proof that the accused and deceased were together and a time interval sufficiently short to exclude an intervening person. The sole witness's assertion that the deceased returned to the appellant's house on the fatal night was a material improvement over his police statement, which was recorded after an unexplained delay. His claimed presence nearby was also doubtful. The alleged last meeting was therefore not proved.	942
Unproved allegations of an illicit relationship cannot establish motive	An alleged illicit relationship could not establish motive where the witnesses' accounts were inconsistent or materially improved, and the deceased's wife, who could explain the alleged relationship and her departure from the matrimonial home, was not examined. Occasional visits to the widow of an elder brother did not prove the alleged relationship. The supposed prior kerosene incident was also rejected as an unsupported afterthought intended to attribute motive.	942
Prior enmity: not by itself a ground to disregard the complaint	Prior enmity cuts both ways and cannot be treated only as a reason for false implication. In considering the complaint, the Magistrate could not rely on that circumstance while ignoring the alleged dying declaration and the procedural requirement to obtain and consider the closure report.	975
Proved last-seen company, homicidal death and absence of explanation	The Court accepted unrebutted evidence that the deceased had gone with her husband to offer prayers shortly before she was found dead, together with medical evidence of homicidal blunt-force injuries. On those established circumstances, it required the husband to give a reasonable explanation and treated the absence of one as supporting the inference of guilt. The combined evidence was held sufficient to sustain the murder conviction.	979
Last-seen evidence supported by recovery and medical findings	Evidence that the accused took the child from the house and was seen accompanying him towards the forest was assessed with the subsequent recovery of the body at the accused's instance and the medical findings. These accepted circumstances supported the inference of guilt collectively; the Court's conclusion was not based on the last-seen circumstance alone.	986
Doubtful last-seen evidence in a circumstantial case	The claimed sighting of the deceased with one accused did not complete the circumstantial chain. Its timing conflicted with the alleged earlier confession of death, and the witness had not previously disclosed the sighting to villagers as she claimed at trial. With the other incriminating circumstances unproved, the evidence created suspicion but did not prove guilt.	988
Failure to establish an alleged compromise motive	The alleged demand for money to settle a pending criminal case was not proved where the accounts of the supposed compromise talks materially differed and essential assertions were missing from, or disowned against, earlier statements. The Court consequently rejected the claimed motive and the asserted taking of the deceased for those talks as links in this circumstantial case.	988
Last-seen evidence — close time proximity and corroboration	The last-seen theory applies where the interval between the accused and deceased being seen together alive and the deceased being found dead is so small that the possibility of another person committing the offence is excluded. Even then, courts should look for corroboration. Where there is a long interval and an opportunity for others to intervene, an inference of guilt based on last-seen evidence without other positive evidence is hazardous. Applying Ramreddy Rajeshkhanna Reddy, Hatti Singh and State of U.P. v. Satish, the Court considered the witnesses' accounts together with the corroborating circumstances rather than treating last-seen evidence as sufficient by itself.	1002

	Sub-Chapter no. 23.7 Section 106 Evidence Act — Foundational Prosecution Proof and Facts in Accused's Special Knowledge
Section 106 Evidence Act — prosecution must prove foundational facts before the accused must explain special knowledge	Section 106 does not relieve the prosecution of its burden to prove guilt. It addresses facts especially within the accused's knowledge that the prosecution cannot, or can only with disproportionate difficulty, establish. Where the prosecution has not proved the basic incriminating circumstances, the burden cannot be shifted to the accused, and the absence of an explanation cannot repair an incomplete chain of circumstantial evidence.	70
Section 106 Evidence Act — Foundational proof before an explanation is required	The prosecution must first prove the circumstances beyond reasonable doubt; a burden concerning facts specially within the accused's knowledge arises only after the necessary foundational facts are established. Once cohabitation, departure together for fishing, the short last-seen interval and homicidal death were proved, the Court required the appellant to explain how the deceased died. His failure to explain, considered with the other proved circumstances, supported an adverse inference. Last-seen evidence alone was not conclusive proof of guilt.	118
Section 106 Evidence Act requires foundational prosecution proof before an explanation from the accused	Section 106 does not relieve the prosecution of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt and cannot by itself sustain conviction. Once the prosecution proves circumstances supporting a reasonable inference, an accused may be required to explain facts especially within his knowledge. Where homicidal death and subsequent burning occurred inside the accused household, the failure to explain those events was considered with the other proved circumstances. The Court relied on Babu alias Balsubramaniam, Tulshiram Sahadu Suryawanshi and Trimukh Maroti Kirkan in affirming the convictions.	138
Section 106 burden concerning facts especially within the accused's knowledge	Where the prosecution proves facts supporting an incriminating inference and the explanation concerns facts especially within the accused's knowledge, Section 106 of the Evidence Act requires a probable and satisfactory explanation. Failure to give one may supply an additional link in the proved circumstances; it does not relieve the prosecution of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt. The husband's admitted presence, together with the eyewitness and forensic evidence, called for an explanation of the burns, and his accidental-heater account was rejected.	173
Last-seen evidence and facts within the accused's special knowledge	The prosecution must first establish circumstances pointing towards guilt. Once the relevant last-seen circumstances are proved, Section 106 of the Evidence Act requires an explanation of facts especially within the accused's knowledge. Non-explanation may add weight when considered with other incriminating circumstances, but last-seen evidence is not by itself conclusive proof of guilt.	278
Section 106 Evidence Act: explanation of a wife's homicidal death at home	Where the prosecution proves circumstances supporting an inference of homicidal death in the matrimonial home and the husband's presence, he must explain facts especially within his knowledge. Failure to give a reasonable explanation may supply an additional link; Section 106 does not relieve the prosecution of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Here, the husband's account of attending to his wife in hospital was disbelieved, and the absence of a satisfactory explanation reinforced the eyewitness and forensic evidence.	288
Section 106 explanation after proof of the accused's company with the deceased	The prosecution must first establish incriminating facts pointing to guilt. Where a proved last-seen circumstance places facts about the death or separation especially within the accused's knowledge, Section 106 of the Evidence Act may require an explanation, but last-seen evidence remains inconclusive by itself. Here the appellant's statement that he had gone towards the river was unsupported by the witnesses and did not explain when or how he parted from his infant daughter. That failure was considered with the other proved links.	297
Foundational Last-	The prosecution must first reliably establish that the accused and victim were	389

Seen Proof Before Invoking Section 106	last seen together before expecting an explanation of facts said to be within the accused's special knowledge. Last-seen evidence alone does not complete a circumstantial case; proximity of time and other connecting circumstances remain material, and silence cannot repair an unproved foundation. Applying Ashok and Digamber Vaishnav, the Court rejected the last-seen circumstance because the supporting witnesses were not trustworthy.
Explanation of facts specially known after proved last-seen circumstances	Section 106 of the Evidence Act does not transfer the prosecution's continuing burden to prove guilt. After the relevant last-seen and surrounding circumstances are established, the accused must give a probable and satisfactory explanation of facts specially within his knowledge, including how and when he parted company with the deceased. Failure to do so may supply an additional link in the proved circumstantial chain; non-explanation alone does not prove guilt.	397
Explanation of the wife's death after prosecution proof was accepted	After finding that the prosecution had established its case beyond reasonable doubt, the Court relied also on the appellant's failure to explain how, by whom and why his wife had been murdered. It rejected his sister's contrary account as false evidence intended to save him. This assessment followed the Court's finding that the prosecution had discharged its burden.	644
Section 106 Evidence Act in a last-seen case	The prosecution must first bring sufficient evidence pointing to the accused's guilt. Where last-seen circumstances are established, Section 106 of the Evidence Act concerns the incident within the accused's special knowledge. Non-explanation of the death may support an inference of guilt when considered with the other surrounding circumstances. Last-seen evidence and the absence of an explanation do not themselves constitute conclusive proof of guilt.	691
Section 106 explanation for homicidal death in the shared home	Section 106 of the Evidence Act does not relieve the prosecution of proving guilt. Where proved circumstances concern a homicidal death in the home shared by the accused and deceased, the accused must explain facts especially within his knowledge that the prosecution cannot readily establish. Here the child gave direct evidence, the fatal neck wounds and shared residence were proved, and the appellant offered no explanation for his wife's death. The Court treated that failure as an additional incriminating circumstance with the other evidence.	718
Section 106: special knowledge after proof of foundational homicide facts	Section 106 of the Evidence Act does not relieve the prosecution of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt. It applies when proved facts permit a reasonable inference about further facts within the accused's special knowledge. Here, homicidal death in the matrimonial home and the spouses' company and fight were established by medical evidence and an unchallenged witness account. The husband then had to explain the circumstances of death. Failure to give a reasonable explanation may add a link to an established circumstantial chain, but it cannot cure an incomplete prosecution chain or make a false defence sufficient for conviction.	774
Section 106 Evidence Act — alleged locked-room circumstances	An adverse inference cannot rest on a claimed circumstance absent from the material relied upon. The inquest statement did not say that the room had been locked from inside before the deceased and respondent went to sleep. Both had consumed ganja, and the respondent's failure to wake when the deceased was killed did not by itself justify an adverse presumption against him.	805
Section 106 Evidence Act following proof of last seen	The initial burden remains on the prosecution to produce sufficient evidence pointing to guilt. Once a proved last-seen sequence places relevant events within the accused's special knowledge, the absence of an explanation may be considered with the other established circumstances under Section 106 Evidence Act. It does not make last-seen evidence conclusive on its own. The Court applied Ashok while assessing the appellant's admission that the deceased	815 visited his house and the unsupported claim that the deceased thereafter left.

Section 106 Evidence Act — Special knowledge after prosecution proof	The initial burden remains on the prosecution to produce evidence pointing towards guilt. Where last-seen circumstances are established, the accused's special knowledge under Section 106 may require an explanation of the incident. Non-explanation can be considered with other connecting circumstances, but last-seen evidence and silence alone do not prove guilt.	827
Death inside shared home — Section 106 explanation arises only after foundational prosecution circumstances are proved	The prosecution first proved the wife's homicidal strangulation in the matrimonial home, the couple's presence together and strained relationship. Only then was the husband's special knowledge of events relevant; his inconsistent account could add a link but Section 106 did not substitute for proof beyond reasonable doubt or make co-residence alone conclusive.	898
	Sub-Chapter no. 23.8 Formal Admission of Trial Documents — Counsel Concession and Accused Endorsement
Late objection to photocopied medical records admitted without objection	An objection raised only during final arguments to the photocopied CT report and treatment records, including non-examination of the CT report's author, was rejected because those documents had been admitted at trial without objection. The treatment sheets showed that the medical team had relied on the CT report, and those records corroborated the post-mortem findings.	21
Accused-endorsed admission of medical documents cannot be disowned on appeal	Where counsel admitted medical and fracture reports in the accused persons' presence, the accused signed the trial order sheet without objection and countersigned their acceptance on the reports, they could not later deny that counsel had instructions. Permitting withdrawal of that admission after trial would deprive the prosecution of the opportunity it had forgone to prove the documents through doctors.	226
Timely objection to the manner of exhibiting a document	An objection to the manner in which a document is exhibited must be raised when it is marked; if no such objection is taken then, it cannot be raised later. The Court applied this rule to the photocopy of a school admission register that had been compared with the original produced before the trial court.	616
	Sub-Chapter no. 23.9 Plea of Alibi — Positive Proof and Continuing Prosecution Burden
Alibi — unsupported assertion of employment at another place	The Court rejected the asserted alibi where the defence employer's claim that the accused was at his shop was unsupported by any employment or attendance record, and the witness admitted that no documentary record or register was maintained. On this evidence, the witness's assertion did not establish the accused's presence at the shop when the offence occurred.	9
Alibi witnesses — equal evidentiary treatment with prosecution witnesses	Defence witnesses offered in support of an alibi are entitled to the same fair evidentiary treatment as prosecution witnesses. Their testimony must not be rejected through an instinctive distrust of defence evidence. That equal treatment does not dispense with cogent proof excluding the accused's presence at the relevant scene and time.	19
Residence documents without a link to the date of the alleged offence	The defence claim that the appellants had shifted elsewhere before the offence was not proved by Aadhaar cards that disclosed no date of issuance. The asserted voter-list entries and documents of their claimed house were not produced. Against that evidence, a prosecution witness stated that they shifted only after the incident, and their prolonged abscondence supported his account. The Court therefore rejected the claimed prior relocation.	106
Alibi as a rule of relevance under Section 11 of the	An alibi is a rule of evidence under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than a general or special exception under the Penal Code. Evidence that the accused was elsewhere is relevant because it is inconsistent with presence at the scene;	141

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Evidence Act	adopting that defence does not reduce the prosecution's burden to prove presence and participation.
Burden of proving an alibi	The accused bears a heavy burden to establish a plea of alibi by cogent and reliable evidence.	190
Nature and strict proof of a plea of alibi	Alibi is a rule of relevance under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than a general or special exception under the Penal Code. Once the prosecution satisfactorily establishes the accused's presence and participation, the accused must support the plea of being elsewhere by positive evidence that excludes presence at the scene; a mere preponderance of probabilities is insufficient.	230
Prosecution burden despite failure of an alibi	Raising or failing to establish an alibi does not reduce the prosecution's independent burden to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Even where strict proof of the alibi is lacking, defence evidence that creates a reasonable doubt about the accused's presence at the scene entitles the accused to that benefit.	230
Disputed alibi must be proved by the accused at trial	An alibi intended to exclude the accused's presence at the scene must be proved by cogent evidence at trial; it is not established through a disputed assertion in a quashing petition. Following the reproduced Prashant Kumar Nimgani ruling, the Court treated the plea as requiring proof beyond reasonable doubt. Attendance at a nearby office did not itself rule out presence at the place of occurrence.	264
Proof of alibi and the prosecution's continuing burden	An alibi is a rule of relevant evidence under Section 11 Evidence Act, rather than a penal exception. The prosecution must first prove the accused's presence and participation; raising an alibi does not reduce that burden. Once presence is satisfactorily established, the accused must support the alibi by positive, cogent evidence excluding presence at the scene. The reproduced authorities require strict proof, while preserving the benefit of a reasonable doubt created by defence evidence. Failure to establish an alibi does not itself prove guilt: the prosecution must independently prove its case beyond reasonable doubt.	266
Alibi, strict proof and the continuing prosecution burden	An alibi is a relevant evidentiary plea under Section 11 of the Evidence Act. The prosecution must first prove the accused's presence and participation; raising an alibi does not reduce that burden. The accused must then establish being elsewhere by positive, cogent evidence excluding presence at the scene. Evidence creating a reasonable doubt still benefits the accused, and failure of the alibi does not itself prove guilt.	274
Wedding alibi: assessment against the evidence of presence	The Court assessed the defence witnesses' claim that the accused was attending wedding ceremonies elsewhere against the prompt named FIR and the supporting eyewitness testimony. The defence accounts, including a discrepancy about the ceremony date, did not inspire confidence on the evidence as a whole. The alibi therefore did not displace the prosecution's proof of his participation.	285
Plea of alibi — strict proof and the prosecution's continuing burden	Alibi is a rule of relevance under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than an exception under the Penal Code. The prosecution must first establish the accused's presence and participation. An accused asserting alibi must then lead cogent positive evidence excluding presence at the scene; a mere preponderance of probabilities is insufficient. Evidence creating reasonable doubt about presence can nevertheless benefit the accused, and failure to establish alibi does not relieve the prosecution of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	311
Defence Witnesses: Equal Treatment in Assessing Alibi	Defence witnesses are entitled to the same treatment as prosecution witnesses. Their evidence supporting an alibi must be assessed on its merits, without an instinctive assumption that defence witnesses are untruthful. The Court adopted this approach from Jumni while examining whether the evidence established the asserted absence.	360
False Alibi:	Failure to prove an alibi, or the giving of false defence evidence, is insufficient	360

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Additional Circumstance After Prosecution Proof	by itself to establish guilt. A false alibi may be considered as an additional circumstance only after the prosecution has otherwise proved the circumstances establishing guilt.
Alibi: Rule of Relevance under Section 11 of the Evidence Act	Alibi is an evidentiary plea recognised by Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than a general or special exception under the Penal Code. Evidence that the accused was elsewhere at the relevant time is relevant because it may exclude participation in the alleged occurrence.	361
Failure of Alibi: No Substitute for Proof of Guilt	Failure to establish an alibi does not by itself establish the prosecution case. The prosecution must independently prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt despite the rejection of that defence.	361
Alibi as a Rule of Relevance Under Section 11 of the Evidence Act	An alibi is a rule of evidence under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, which makes facts inconsistent with a fact in issue relevant. It asserts that the accused was elsewhere when the offence occurred; it is not a general or special exception under the Penal Code.	374
Proof of Alibi and the Continuing Burden on the Prosecution	The prosecution must first establish the accused's presence and participation by reliable evidence; an alibi does not lessen that burden. Once that burden is discharged, the accused must establish the alibi by positive evidence with sufficient certainty to exclude presence at the scene. Evidence that creates reasonable doubt about that presence entitles the accused to its benefit. Failure to prove an alibi does not itself establish guilt, which the prosecution must independently prove beyond reasonable doubt.	374
Alibi and the prosecution's continuing burden	A plea of alibi does not lessen the prosecution's burden to prove the accused's presence and participation. Once the prosecution satisfactorily discharges that burden, the accused must establish the alibi with certainty excluding his presence at the occurrence. Defence evidence creating a reasonable doubt about that presence nevertheless entitles him to its benefit. The contradictory defence testimony here failed to establish the plea against the accepted prosecution and scientific evidence.	391
Timing and Authentication of School Records Offered to Prove Alibi	School-presence evidence must reliably cover the time of the offence and be properly proved. A witness arriving after the occurrence could not establish earlier presence, while certificates and attendance records unsupported by their makers or identifiable authorised attestation did not exclude presence at the scene. The Court also considered the short distance between the school and the occurrence.	409
Alibi as proof of inability to be present at the place of occurrence	An alibi concerns whether the accused could have reached the place where the incident allegedly occurred. The Court stated that the accused must prove it beyond reasonable doubt, rather than merely on a preponderance of probabilities. A contested alibi requires cogent and reliable evidence and cannot be finally established through disputed assertions in quashing proceedings.	469
Plea of alibi as a ground for quashing an FIR	An accused's plea that he was elsewhere at the relevant time must be proved at trial and does not, merely on its assertion, justify quashing the prosecution. In rejecting the claim that the applicants were at the police station for interrogation, the Court stated that their alibi required proof beyond reasonable doubt at trial.	513
Alibi: Positive Proof After the Prosecution Establishes Presence	Alibi is an evidentiary plea under Section 11 of the Evidence Act and does not reduce the prosecution's burden to prove presence and participation. Once reliable evidence establishes presence, the accused must produce cogent evidence excluding the possibility of being at the scene; defence evidence creating reasonable doubt can still benefit him. Work attendance did not prove alibi where the register lacked the supervisor's signature, his status was unsupported, and the nearby open worksite allowed the accused to leave and reach the scene.	524

23 : General Principles of Proof, Appreciation of Evidence and Circumstantial Evidence

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Alibi Based on a Claimed Stay at a Relative's House	The appellant's claim that he stayed at his aunt's house did not establish alibi where he admitted arrival at Morena on the relevant date, produced no supporting travel or residence document and did not examine the aunt, whom the Court regarded as the best witness to that stay. Considering the reliable prosecutrix evidence and forensic support, the Court rejected the alibi.	529
Proof of Alibi and the Continuing Prosecution Burden	An alibi is a rule of evidence under Section 11 of the Evidence Act, rather than an exception under the IPC. The prosecution must first satisfactorily establish the accused's presence and participation; pleading alibi does not reduce that burden. The accused must then establish absence by positive, strict evidence excluding the possibility of presence at the scene. Defence evidence creating a reasonable doubt about presence entitles the accused to its benefit. Failure to establish alibi does not itself prove the prosecution case, which must independently be proved beyond reasonable doubt. The applicant's disputed claim that he was elsewhere required cogent evidence and did not justify quashing on the parallel inquiry report.	539
Failure of an unsupported plea of alibi	A plea of alibi unsupported by substantial defence evidence does not displace categorical prosecution testimony placing the accused at the scene when that testimony is accepted as reliable. The Court rejected the plea on that basis after assessing the eyewitness evidence.	570
Burden and proof of an alibi	An alibi is a defence that the accused must establish through cogent and reliable evidence. Unproved documents cannot be elevated to conclusive proof before their reliability is tested. In applying that principle, the Court found that a COVID-related prescription from the preceding month did not establish that the accused remained unable to leave home on the incident date; supporting proof of continued confinement to bed was absent.	606
Prosecution burden and proof of alibi	The prosecution must first establish the accused's presence and participation through reliable and cogent evidence. Once that burden is discharged, an accused relying on alibi must prove it with certainty sufficient to exclude presence at the scene. The Court found the prosecution case established beyond reasonable doubt and rejected the contrary defence evidence on the record.	644
Unsubstantiated medical alibi at the Section 319 stage	Police statements that the applicant was receiving treatment elsewhere did not establish his alibi where no prescription, hospital admission register, discharge ticket or comparable medical record had been collected and the witnesses' accounts remained untested. Brijendra Singh was distinguished because it involved affirmative duty and medical records locating the proposed accused away from the scene. The applicant remained free to prove alibi by cogent and reliable trial evidence, uninfluenced by the High Court's preliminary observations.	645
Proof of alibi and the prosecution's continuing burden	Alibi is a rule of evidence under Section 11 of the Evidence Act. The prosecution must first prove presence and participation; the accused then asserting absence must support it by positive, cogent evidence sufficient to exclude presence at the scene. Defence evidence creating reasonable doubt remains effective, and failure of alibi does not itself prove guilt. The Court rejected the claimed absence because, beyond the hostile brother's assertion, no reliable supporting evidence, including the available employer's testimony, was produced.	649
Alibi evidence must cover the time of the offence	A photograph showing presence elsewhere earlier in the day does not establish absence from the scene at the time of the offence where return was possible and continued presence elsewhere is unproved. The Court rejected daytime photographs and unsupported assertions of an overnight stay as proof of the alibis. Doubt about when photographs were taken, including absence of supporting development or printing evidence in the circumstances, further weakened that defence.	698

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Plea of alibi — assertion at the earliest opportunity	A plea that the accused was elsewhere at the time of the occurrence should be raised at the earliest opportunity and proved to the Court's satisfaction. The Court identified the initial stages, including framing of charge or preliminary hearing, as appropriate occasions, and relied on Lakhan Singh in disapproving an unexplained plea first raised at the defence-evidence stage. This requirement does not displace the prosecution's continuing duty to prove presence by positive evidence.	700
Plea of alibi — assertion at the earliest opportunity	A plea that the accused was elsewhere at the time of the occurrence should be raised at the earliest opportunity and proved to the Court's satisfaction. The Court identified the initial stages, including framing of charge or preliminary hearing, as appropriate occasions, and relied on Lakhan Singh in disapproving an unexplained plea first raised at the defence-evidence stage. This requirement does not displace the prosecution's continuing duty to prove presence by positive evidence.	701
Ceremony invitation without proof of attendance does not establish alibi	An invitation to a thirteenth-day ceremony did not establish Rambabu's alibi when the defence witness did not say that Rambabu attended it. In the absence of evidence placing him at the ceremony, the Court rejected the plea.	713
Plea of alibi — positive proof and the prosecution's continuing burden	Alibi is an evidentiary plea of being elsewhere, relevant under Section 11 of the Evidence Act. The prosecution must first establish the accused's presence and participation; the plea does not reduce that burden. The accused must then establish alibi by positive evidence with strict proof excluding presence at the scene, while evidence raising reasonable doubt about presence entitles him to its benefit. Failure to prove alibi does not establish guilt: the prosecution must independently prove its case beyond reasonable doubt. The claimed CCTV alibi raised a disputed factual issue requiring cogent evidence.	807
Plea of alibi—proof by cogent evidence	A plea that the accused was elsewhere when the offence occurred is a defence that must be established through cogent evidence. Supplying documents in support of that plea does not itself require the police to accept the defence or investigate from that viewpoint. The Court left the applicants to prove their alibi through evidence rather than deciding it in the Section 482 proceedings.	814
Proof of an alibi and its consideration at trial	An assertion that the accused was elsewhere when the offence occurred is a plea of alibi, which the Court stated must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. The applicant's assertion that he was in his office during the alleged incident could not be decided in these Section 482 CrPC proceedings. He remained free to establish that defence before the trial court, which had to decide the case without being influenced by the refusal to quash.	837
Proof of alibi before the trial court	A plea of alibi is a defence that the suspected accused must prove by leading cogent and reliable evidence before the trial court. An assertion of absence from the scene did not entitle the petitioner to directions controlling the pending investigation.	840
Proof of a hospital-based plea of alibi	The prosecution must first prove the accused’s presence and participation; raising an alibi does not lessen that burden. Once that burden is discharged, an alibi requires positive, strict proof excluding presence at the scene, while credible defence evidence raising reasonable doubt still benefits the accused. The hospital documents did not establish the alibi where the defence doctor was not posted there at the relevant time and could not identify the signatures of their makers.	936

The Court nevertheless assessed the oral evidence, prior cruelty proceedings and the signed reconciliation agreement and independently upheld the convictions for cruelty and abetment of suicide. The judgment contains no separate dowry-death charge or analysis establishing a distinct Section 113-B issue.

Sub-Chapter no. 23.11
Site Plan and Scene Record — Direct Observation versus Investigative Statement

Scene reconstruction based on hearsay and unproved working notes	The Court declined to rely on the scientific officer's scene reconstruction because it was based on information from an investigating officer who had not witnessed the occurrence, rather than information from an eyewitness. The short notes from which the later report was prepared were also not produced or proved. The report therefore did not establish the asserted firing position and distance against the direct account.	253
Site-plan observations and information supplied during investigation	A site plan may prove features personally seen by its maker as direct evidence. Markings based on statements made by eyewitnesses to the investigating officer are subject to Section 162 CrPC and cannot be used as substantive proof or ordinary corroboration of those statements. The officer's personal observation of brain matter scattered at the scene was therefore admissible, rather than information merely supplied to him by a witness.	291
Site plan — entry based on the investigating officer's own observation	The investigating officer's site-plan entry showing where the deceased's body lay was admissible because it recorded the position he personally observed on reaching the scene. The variation between that plan and the other spot map did not displace the prosecution case in the circumstances considered.	307
Omitted light pole in site plan — eyewitness identification	Omission of an electric pole from the site plan did not by itself negate illumination or identification. The Court considered the witnesses' close vantage points, familiarity with the local accused, their testimony about light, and other light sources in the open market. A site-plan omission attributable to defective investigation did not require rejection of otherwise credible evidence.	319
Site Plan: Personal Observations and Witness-Supplied Information	A site plan may prove physical facts personally observed by the investigating officer, such as the location of blood, footwear and cartridges. Notes recounting an occurrence the officer did not witness cannot be treated as his direct evidence. Investigative statements remain subject to Section 162 CrPC and the applicable rules for contradiction or corroboration. Applying Jagdish Narain and Rameshwar Dayal, the Court relied on the officer's observed scene together with the witnesses' testimony.	360
Site-Plan Observations Distinguished From Witness Information	A site plan is admissible to the extent that it records what its maker personally observed. Marks or descriptions based on statements given during police investigation are subject to Section 162 CrPC and cannot serve as substantive proof of those statements; their permitted use is for contradiction in accordance with law. The Court rejected reliance on location information supplied by the deceased informant and repeated through police officers to another map-maker, while considering independently observed physical evidence.	381
Limited evidentiary value of a belated spot map based on non-eyewitness instructions	The spot map was prepared about eight days after the incident without an adequate explanation for the delay and on the instructions of persons not shown to have witnessed the alleged administration of poison. In those circumstances, it could not reliably establish that occurrence, and the Court attached no importance to it. Its formal preparation did not repair the missing evidence of the incident.	467
Site-plan observations and witness-supplied	A site plan may be used for what the investigating officer personally observed at the scene. Details entered from witnesses' statements during investigation are governed by Section 162 CrPC and cannot be used as substantive proof; their	583

information under Section 162 CrPC	use is confined to the purposes allowed by that provision, including contradiction. The source of each relevant part of the plan must therefore be distinguished. The same distinction applies to observational and statement-based parts of inquest and seizure documents.
Omission of blood from the spot map	Omission to mark blood in the spot map did not establish that the assault occurred elsewhere where the map identified the scene, a seizure memo recorded bloodstained earth from that place, and the forensic report detected blood in the earth article. The Court also considered the absence of a question to the investigating officer challenging the article's identity and the absence of a suggestion that witnesses had shifted the scene.	698
Omission of blood from the spot map	Omission to mark blood in the spot map did not establish that the assault occurred elsewhere where the map identified the scene, a seizure memo recorded bloodstained earth from that place, and the forensic report detected blood in the earth article. The Court also considered the absence of a question to the investigating officer challenging the article's identity and the absence of a suggestion that witnesses had shifted the scene.	699
Site-plan inconsistency in an accident defence and the separate proof of identity	The defence that the witnesses were injured in a minor motorcycle accident was rejected because the site plan showed no road at the alleged scene. Rejection of that explanation did not answer the separate question whether this appellant was an assailant. The Court proceeded to examine identification evidence and found dock identification necessary in the circumstances.	835

Civil and Criminal Judgment Findings — Independent Proof and Evidence Act Relevance

Parallel civil and criminal proceedings — simultaneous progress and stay	Civil and criminal proceedings may proceed simultaneously. A stay depends on the circumstances; it does not follow merely from the risk of conflicting findings. The relied-upon authorities treat the likelihood of embarrassment from parallel proceedings as relevant and generally favour precedence for criminal proceedings because criminal justice should not await a prolonged civil suit. This is not an inflexible rule: special circumstances, including a proceeding being close to completion, may justify a different course.	2
Independent findings in civil and criminal proceedings	Findings recorded by a criminal court are not binding on the civil court, and civil-court findings are not binding on the criminal court. In applying that principle, the Court treated the matrimonial civil litigation and the criminal complaint as independent proceedings; the existence of the divorce case did not decide the criminal accusation.	39
Matrimonial civil and criminal proceedings — independent adjudication	In rejecting the reliance on an earlier divorce petition to quash a cruelty FIR, the Court applied the principle that civil and criminal proceedings remain independent even when they arise from the same facts. Findings in one do not bind the other in this setting, and pendency of the divorce proceedings does not itself end the criminal case.	53
Civil and criminal proceedings — independent findings and different standards of proof	Civil and criminal proceedings are independent and employ different standards of proof: probabilities govern civil adjudication, while criminal guilt requires proof beyond reasonable doubt. A civil finding does not bind the criminal court merely because the proceedings arise from the same facts. The pendency of a civil action, even before a superior court, is not by itself a ground to quash the criminal proceedings.	76
Evidence recorded in a co-accused's trial during abscondence	Evidence led in a co-accused's trial in the absence of an absconding accused cannot be read either for or against that absent accused. His case must be determined on the evidence led in his own proceedings.	231
Independent adjudication of	Pendency of a civil divorce proceeding does not terminate criminal proceedings arising from the same matrimonial facts. In rejecting quashing on that ground,	236

divorce and criminal cruelty proceedings	the Court required the civil and criminal cases to be decided on their own merits rather than treating findings in one as binding on the other.
Civil and criminal findings are independently assessed, subject to statutory relevance of judgments	Civil cases apply the preponderance-of-probabilities standard, while a criminal conviction requires proof beyond reasonable doubt. A finding in one proceeding is not automatically binding in the other, and each is decided on its evidence. A previous judgment may nevertheless be relevant under Sections 40 –43 of the Evidence Act; the specific conclusiveness provided by Section 41 must be preserved.	258
Independent Civil and Criminal Findings and Statutory Relevance of Earlier Judgments	Civil and criminal proceedings ordinarily depend on the evidence led in each case and apply different standards of proof: preponderance of probabilities in civil cases and proof beyond reasonable doubt in criminal cases. Findings in one do not automatically bind the other. The relevance and effect of a previous judgment must nevertheless be examined under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, including the conclusiveness provided by Section 41.	401
Civil matrimonial proceedings and independent criminal adjudication	Civil and criminal proceedings remain independent even when they arise from the same facts. Findings of the civil court do not bind the criminal court, which must decide the case on the material before it and the applicable standard of proof; the divorce proceeding did not terminate the criminal prosecution.	411
Independent civil and criminal findings and relevance of previous judgments under Sections 40–43 Evidence Act	Civil cases are decided on a preponderance of probabilities, while criminal guilt requires proof beyond reasonable doubt. Each proceeding must ordinarily be decided on its own evidence; a finding in one does not automatically bind the other merely because the parties and subject matter overlap. Applying Kishan Singh, Syed Askari, Prem Raj and Vishnu Dutt Sharma, the Court rejected the civil suit as a bar to criminal investigation. A previous judgment may nevertheless be relevant under Sections 40–43 Evidence Act, and its effect must be assessed under the applicable provision, including Section 41's specified conclusiveness.	424
Different Standards of Proof in Civil and Criminal Proceedings	Civil liability may be decided on probabilities, whereas criminal guilt requires proof beyond reasonable doubt. Because the proceedings have distinct scope and standards, the pendency of a civil action does not itself bar the criminal case or justify its quashing. The Court relied on this distinction when rejecting the matrimonial-proceedings objection.	458
Civil and criminal proceedings — independent findings and standards of proof	Civil and criminal proceedings remain independent even when they arise from the same facts. Filing a divorce petition does not bring the criminal case to an end. The Court stated that findings of the civil court are not binding on the criminal court and that the standards of proof differ; the criminal case must proceed on its own allegations and proof. It applied that distinction when rejecting the argument that the later matrimonial FIR was necessarily a counterblast.	495
Independent findings and standards of proof in civil and criminal proceedings	Civil and criminal proceedings arising from the same facts must be decided on the evidence adduced in each proceeding. Civil liability is assessed on a preponderance of probabilities, whereas the prosecution must establish criminal guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Findings in one proceeding are not automatically binding in the other. The pendency of a divorce proceeding therefore does not itself justify ending the criminal proceeding, subject to the statutory relevance and effect of previous judgments under the Evidence Act.	500
Independent Proof and Different Standards in Civil and Criminal Proceedings	Criminal allegations must be proved independently even where a civil court adjudicates the same transaction. Criminal proceedings cannot be made dependent on the civil court first deciding whether disputed documents are genuine or forged. A criminal charge requires proof beyond reasonable doubt, whereas civil proceedings may be decided on probabilities. Failure to prove the criminal allegations may lead to discharge or acquittal; the pendency of a civil	531

	suit alone does not justify quashing.
Effect of civil findings in a criminal proceeding concerning the same document	Civil findings do not automatically bind the criminal court, or vice versa. Each proceeding ordinarily depends on its own evidence and standard of proof: preponderance of probabilities in civil proceedings and proof beyond reasonable doubt in a criminal case. A previous judgment's relevance and any binding or conclusive effect must be assessed under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, including the specified conclusive effect under Section 41. Absence of a civil finding that the affidavit was forged did not conclusively defeat the criminal allegation.	586
Independent adjudication of civil and criminal proceedings	Civil and criminal proceedings are separate and must be decided on the allegations and proof in each. Civil findings do not bind the criminal court, and the standards of proof differ. Accordingly, an earlier matrimonial case does not terminate a criminal proceeding arising from the same circumstances or, by itself, justify quashing it under Section 482 CrPC.	597
Divorce and criminal proceedings — independent adjudication	Civil and criminal proceedings remain independent even when they arise from the same facts. Filing or pendency of a divorce petition does not bring a criminal prosecution to an end, and findings of the civil court do not bind the criminal court or vice versa.	687
Previous civil judgment in criminal proceedings — relevance and conclusiveness under the Evidence Act	A previous final judgment may be relied on only to the extent permitted by Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act or another applicable provision. For civil and criminal proceedings arising from the same cause, relevance must first be established and the judgment's effect then assessed. It is not automatically conclusive; Section 41 provides the specified conclusiveness. Judgments outside Sections 40–42 are ordinarily irrelevant under Section 43 unless their existence is itself in issue or relevant under another provision. A judgment may be relevant only for a limited purpose, depending on the case.	705
Independent civil and criminal proceedings and standards of proof	Civil and criminal proceedings are separate even when they arise from the same facts. Civil cases turn on probabilities, while criminal guilt requires proof beyond reasonable doubt. Pendency of a civil or divorce proceeding does not itself justify quashing the criminal case, and civil findings do not determine the criminal case merely because of the overlap.	793
Independent proof and different standards in civil and criminal proceedings	Civil cases are decided on a preponderance of probabilities, while the prosecution in a criminal case must prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Findings in one proceeding are not automatically final or binding in the other; each proceeding must be decided on the evidence before it, subject to the statutory relevance and effect of previous judgments. The reproduced Prem Raj discussion also recognises that a civil court may consider evidence led in criminal proceedings.	844
Effect of civil or revenue findings on criminal proceedings	Civil and criminal proceedings ordinarily require independent findings on the evidence produced in each, applying their different standards of proof. A prior civil judgment is not automatically conclusive in a criminal case. Its relevance and effect depend on Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act; Section 41 provides the specified category of conclusive judgments. Applying the reproduced authorities, the Court held that the Additional Collector's findings concerning the sale deeds did not bind the criminal proceedings.	871
Civil divorce findings do not determine criminal liability for cruelty	Civil proceedings are decided on probabilities, while a criminal prosecution requires proof beyond reasonable doubt on its own evidence. The civil court's findings therefore did not bind the criminal court or justify ending the cruelty prosecution. The husband's divorce decree was also under appeal and had not attained finality, with an interim restraint on remarriage. The Court declined to use that decree or its finding about the wife's alleged relationship to terminate the criminal case.	872

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Civil and criminal findings — independent proof subject to rules on previous judgments	Civil and criminal cases ordinarily depend on the evidence led in each, and findings in one do not automatically bind the other. Civil proof rests on a preponderance of probabilities, while the prosecution must prove criminal guilt beyond reasonable doubt. This independence is subject to the Evidence Act rules on previous judgments: relevance and any binding or conclusive effect must be assessed under Sections 40–43, including the conclusiveness specified in Section 41. A relevant previous judgment is not invariably conclusive.	896
Independent civil and criminal findings and the statutory relevance of previous judgments	Civil and criminal proceedings are decided on the evidence produced in each and under different standards: preponderance of probabilities in civil litigation and proof beyond reasonable doubt in a criminal prosecution. Findings in one are not automatically binding in the other merely because the parties and subject matter are the same. Applying Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam and Kishan Singh, the Court also preserved the statutory enquiry under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act: a previous judgment's relevance and effect must be assessed, with conclusiveness available as provided by Section 41. The reproduced authorities explain that Karam Chand's broad binding-effect statement failed to account for the Constitution Bench decision in M.S. Sheriff, and that V.M. Shah was not approved in K.G. Premshanker.	958
Civil matrimonial findings — criminal proceedings must be decided on their own allegations	The Court stated that findings of a civil court are not binding on the criminal court and that the criminal case must be decided on the allegations made in those proceedings. This formed part of its rejection of the claim that a wife's FIR became a counterblast because the husband had first instituted restitution proceedings. The existence of the civil matrimonial proceedings did not determine the criminal allegations or justify quashing them.	1005

Section 174 CrPC Inquest — Apparent Cause and Limits on Accused Identification

Merg inquiry — injured victim still alive when scene articles are seized	Absence of a registered merg inquiry when the police seized the kerosene bottle, burnt clothes and other scene articles did not show a missing death inquiry at that stage: the victim was still alive. The Court expressly distinguished the same-day collection of scene evidence from the later inquiry after her death.	19
Scope of a marg intimation	A marg intimation need state sufficient facts concerning the death; it need not contain the full description of the crime required in an FIR. The absence of detailed offence particulars in the contemporaneous marg intimation did not establish that the fuller FIR was prepared later.	165
Names of assailants and the limited purpose of an inquest	An inquest concerns the apparent cause of death and the manner or instrument by which injuries appear to have been caused. It need not record every overt act or the names of accused persons and eyewitnesses. Omission of assailants' names from the inquest reports did not make the complainant's testimony unreliable.	291
Injuries found at autopsy but not noted during inquest	The omission of an injury from the inquest record did not contradict the autopsy where the head injury was internal without a corresponding visible external injury and the genital area had not been clearly visible at inquest. The more detailed autopsy examination explained the additional findings. The presence of a woman among the inquest witnesses did not require a separate notation that she alone had inspected the genital area.	391
Section 174 CrPC inquest — omission of assailant names	An inquest under Section 174 CrPC concerns the apparent cause of an unnatural or suspicious death and the injuries observed. It does not require a detailed reconstruction of the assault or identification of every assailant. Applying Brahm Swaroop, the Court held that omission of accused or eyewitness names and individual overt acts from an inquest report does not by itself discredit reliable eyewitness evidence or establish that the FIR was ante-timed. The prosecution evidence must still be assessed on the complete record.	499

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Inquest report — evidentiary use and opportunity to explain discrepancies	An inquest report is not substantive evidence, though it may be used to contradict an inquest witness. Under the Brahm Swaroop passage adopted by the Court, an alleged discrepancy, omission, overwriting or contradiction must be put to the author so that an explanation can be given. Even an admitted omission through lack of diligence does not necessarily require rejection of reliable and clinching eyewitness evidence. The omission must be evaluated within the report's limited statutory purpose and the other proof.	499
Inquest opinion does not determine the medical cause of death	An inquest panchnama records the panchas' opinion and does not by itself establish the actual cause of death. The Court rejected a casual suggestion of death from an animal attack where it lacked a reasoned basis and conflicted with deliberate concealment of the skeleton and the medical findings; the medical and surrounding evidence had to be assessed.	575
Section 174 CrPC inquest — omission of accused names does not itself establish an ante-timed FIR	An inquest records the apparent cause of death, injuries and apparent means of infliction; it need not identify the assailants or detail their overt acts. It is not substantive evidence, but may test or contradict inquest witnesses. Omission of an accused's name therefore does not itself show that the FIR was ante-dated or ante-timed or that the eyewitness did not disclose the assailant. A discrepancy, omission or overwriting relied upon must be put to the report's author for an opportunity to explain it in evidence.	638

Evidence Obtained Through Procedural Illegality — Admissibility and Careful Scrutiny

Effect of invalid constitution of an inquiry committee on collected evidence	Setting aside a Bar Association resolution because the inquiry committee was unlawfully constituted did not, by itself, erase the evidence collected by that committee. The Court considered the recorded statements and the surrounding conduct when closely scrutinising the criminal complaint, without deciding the validity of the Bar Council appellate order.	20
Illegally collected evidence — no automatic rejection, but careful scrutiny	Evidence does not automatically lose its evidentiary effect merely because it was collected contrary to law. Relying on Radha Kishan, the Court stated that evidence obtained through an illegal search should be carefully examined rather than rejected for that reason alone. It also rejected the factual premise of an undisclosed recording: the transcript showed that the applicant knew of the recording and voiced no objection. The asserted illegality in obtaining the conversation therefore did not justify its automatic exclusion or quashing of the proceedings.	1009

Statements, Confessions, Admissions, Discovery and Dying Declarations

Sub-Chapter no. 24.1
Dying Declaration and Statements Relating to Cause of Death

Dying declaration — burn percentage and fitness at the time of recording	Burns over ninety to one hundred per cent of the body do not by themselves establish inability to make a dying declaration. The nature and depth of burns, their effect on the person's faculties and the evidence of fitness at the recording time must be assessed. The Executive Magistrate recorded coherent answers after medical fitness certification in the doctor's presence. The doctor's qualified evidence and the defence witnesses' limited presence did not show incapacity at that time. The Court accepted the recorded declaration and the independently proved oral declaration.	19
Section 32(1) Evidence Act — death-related statement and expectation of death	A deceased person's statement about the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is relevant when that person's cause of death is in question. Relevance under Section 32(1) does not depend on whether the maker expected to die when speaking. The statutory exception admits the statement despite the absence of oath and cross-examination, but its weight still	19

	requires close scrutiny.
Dying declaration — sole basis for conviction and need for corroboration	A true, voluntary and reliable dying declaration may by itself support conviction if it inspires confidence after careful scrutiny. Corroboration is not an inflexible legal requirement. Suspicion, impaired capacity, an untrue material part or another serious infirmity may require corroboration or make reliance unsafe. The Court must be satisfied about personal knowledge, opportunity to identify the assailants and absence of tutoring, prompting or imagination.	19
Dying declaration — medical certificate is a safeguard, fitness remains essential	The essential requirement is that the maker was fit to understand and communicate the statement and that the person recording it was satisfied of that fitness. A doctor's certificate is an important safeguard rather than an indispensable requirement in every case. The recorder's credible testimony and other evidence may establish fitness, subject to the court's final satisfaction that the declaration was voluntary and truthful; impaired capacity cannot be overlooked merely because the statement is labelled a dying declaration.	19
Dying declaration — recorder, form and method of communication	A dying declaration need not be made only to a Magistrate and has no compulsory statutory form. It may be oral, written or communicated by positive and definite signs or another adequate method. A Magistrate's recording or attestation by persons present may strengthen authenticity, but reliability and the maker's fitness govern the evidentiary value in the circumstances of each case.	19
Multiple dying declarations — independent scrutiny of discrepancies	Each dying declaration must be assessed on its own merits and with the other evidence. Minor or reconcilable variations do not automatically invalidate an otherwise reliable declaration. Where versions are materially opposed, the court must examine their nature and the surrounding evidence rather than decide reliability merely by counting statements or mechanically rejecting a later declaration. Consistency alone does not cure infirmity in each account.	19
Dying declaration — brevity, omitted detail and identification	A declaration is not unreliable merely because it is brief or omits minute details of the occurrence. The court must nevertheless be satisfied that the maker could observe and identify the persons implicated and spoke from personal knowledge. An uncertainty about identity, a material untrue assertion or a statement beyond the maker's knowledge may require corroboration or make the declaration unsafe; absence of detail is therefore assessed in context, not treated as invariably harmless.	19
Burn victim's thumb impression — actual condition of the thumb is factual	Extensive burns over the body do not necessarily make a thumb impression impossible. Whether the thumb's skin and ridges remained sufficiently intact is a question of fact that must be checked against the medical and other evidence. Unexplained conflict between a clear impression and proved destruction of both thumbs may create doubt, while an intact thumb is compatible with severe burns elsewhere.	19
Oral dying declaration — statement to the deceased's husband	An oral dying declaration to the victim's husband may be relied upon when his account of the statement is found credible after scrutiny. In each trial the husband described the victim naming those who burned her, and cross-examination disclosed no substantial reason to reject that account. The Court separately found the oral declaration proved, alongside the recorded declaration.	19
Extensive burns and capacity to make a dying declaration	The percentage of burns does not, by itself, determine whether a person could make a reliable dying declaration. The nature and degree of the burns, the parts affected, their effect on the person's mental faculties, and the evidence of consciousness and fitness must be considered. Extensive or even 100% burns do not automatically establish incapacity.	122
Conviction on a reliable dying	A truthful and voluntary dying declaration may alone sustain conviction if it	122

24.1 : Dying Declaration and Statements Relating to Cause of Death

declaration without independent corroboration	inspires the Court's confidence after careful scrutiny. The declarant must have been mentally fit, able to observe and identify the assailant, and free from tutoring, prompting or imagination. Here, the declaration implicating the husband was accepted alongside scene evidence inconsistent with the suggested cooking accident.
Medical fitness certificate as a precaution in recording a dying declaration	A separate medical certificate of mental fitness is a rule of caution rather than an indispensable condition in every case. The person recording the declaration must be satisfied that the declarant is fit and capable of making it, and the Court must ultimately find it voluntary and truthful. Reliable testimony establishing that condition can support the declaration despite the absence of a formal endorsement.	122
Doctor recording a dying declaration without waiting for a Magistrate	A dying declaration need not invariably be recorded by a Magistrate. Where the patient's condition is rapidly deteriorating and delay may lose the statement, the treating doctor should record it rather than wait for a Magistrate. The recorder's satisfaction about the patient's fitness and the statement's truth and voluntariness remain essential.	122
Form and method of communicating a dying declaration	There is no mandatory statutory form for recording a dying declaration. It may be oral or written, or communicated through positive and definite signs or another adequate method. No oath is required. Its evidentiary weight depends on the circumstances, including the declarant's fitness and the authenticity and reliability of the statement.	122
Dying declaration as an exception to hearsay and expectation of death	A deceased person's statement about the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is relevant under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act when the cause of death is in question. Relevance does not depend on whether the maker expected death. The statutory exception permits consideration of the statement despite the absence of oath and cross-examination, while requiring careful scrutiny of its reliability.	122
Corroboration of a suspicious or materially unreliable dying declaration	A dying declaration that is suspicious or suffers from a material infirmity should not be relied on without corroborative evidence. Where a material and integral part is untrue, the Court may find it unsafe to convict on the declaration alone. The rule dispensing with corroboration applies only after the declaration has been found trustworthy.	122
Thumb impression on a dying declaration in a burns case	Whether a burns victim could leave a thumb impression is a question of fact concerning the actual condition of the thumb and the survival of its skin and ridges. Extensive burns elsewhere do not alone invalidate the impression. Conversely, an unexplained clear impression where the medical evidence shows both thumbs were completely burnt may cast doubt on the declaration.	122
Brevity or absence of exhaustive detail in a dying declaration	A dying declaration is not to be rejected merely because it is brief or does not describe every detail of the occurrence. Its acceptability depends on whether careful scrutiny establishes that it is truthful, voluntary, coherent and consistent.	122
Declarant's personal knowledge and mental capacity	The Court must be satisfied that the declarant could observe and identify the assailant and had personal knowledge of the matters stated. Evidence that the deceased was unconscious and could not have made the statement requires rejection of the asserted declaration. Matters shown to be outside the declarant's knowledge may undermine its reliability.	122
Extensive burns and reliability of a conscious victim's dying declaration	Extensive burns do not, by themselves, establish that the victim could not speak or make a reliable dying declaration. The decisive consideration is the evidence of the declarant's fit and conscious state. Despite about 90% burns and poor recorded vital signs, the doctor and Naib-Tahsildar testified that the victim was conscious and oriented when her statement was recorded. The Court accepted that testimony and found the declaration trustworthy.	127
Dehati Nalishi	A Dehati Nalishi recorded on an injured person's instructions may be treated as	127

explaining the victim's death as a dying declaration	a dying declaration under Section 32 of the Evidence Act when it explains the cause of that person's subsequent death. The officer's evidence established that the victim instructed the report and was able to speak. The Court relied on that proved report together with the later declaration recorded by the Naib-Tahsildar.
Superficial tongue burns do not necessarily prevent a dying declaration	A first-degree burn of the tongue signifies a superficial injury and does not establish that the tongue was completely charred or that the victim was incapable of speech. The Court rejected that objection in light of the medical evidence and testimony that the victim actually spoke when the declaration was recorded.	127
Conviction on a trustworthy dying declaration without corroboration	A dying declaration may be the sole basis of conviction if careful scrutiny establishes that it is truthful, voluntary, coherent and consistent. The Court must be satisfied about mental fitness, the opportunity to observe and identify the assailant, and freedom from tutoring, prompting or imagination. Corroboration is not an invariable legal requirement for a declaration satisfying those conditions.	127
Corroboration where a dying declaration is suspicious or materially defective	A suspicious dying declaration or one suffering from a material infirmity should not be acted on without corroborative evidence. If a material and integral part is untrue, or the declarant's mental fitness is doubtful, the Court may find it unsafe to convict on the declaration alone. The absence of cross-examination requires particularly careful scrutiny.	127
Medical certificate and independent proof of fitness for a dying declaration	A medical certificate of mental fitness is a precaution and is not indispensable in every case. The recorder must be satisfied that the person is fit and capable of making the statement, and the Court must find the declaration voluntary and truthful. Testimony establishing a fit and conscious state may support acceptance even without a formal medical endorsement.	127
No mandatory recorder or prescribed form for a dying declaration	A dying declaration need not invariably be made to a Magistrate or recorded in a prescribed form. It may be oral, written, or communicated by positive and definite signs, and no oath is necessary. Requesting an available Magistrate or obtaining attestation may help establish authenticity, but acceptance ultimately depends on the declarant's fitness and the statement's voluntariness and truth.	127
Thumb impressions on dying declarations by burns victims	Whether a burns victim could leave a thumb impression depends on the actual condition of the thumb and whether its skin and ridges remained intact. The percentage of burns elsewhere is not decisive. An unexplained clear thumb impression may undermine reliability where the medical evidence establishes that both thumbs were completely burnt.	127
Section 32(1) relevance without an expectation of death	A deceased person's statement about the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is relevant when that person's cause of death is in issue. Under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act, the maker need not have expected death when speaking. The Court must still scrutinise the statement's truth and reliability.	127
Dying declaration containing matters outside the declarant's knowledge	A statement attributed to a deceased person may become unsafe to rely on if it narrates material facts that could not have been within the person's knowledge or observation. The Court must test the contents against the declarant's actual opportunity to observe and identify those implicated.	127
Recorder need not repeat a dying declaration verbatim	A recorder need not repeat in oral evidence the exact words of a properly recorded dying declaration. Its contents, the maker’s fitness and the connection with the cause or circumstances of death must still be proved. An FIR later becoming a dying declaration by operation of law must be proved as the FIR; its admissibility does not depend on the scribe retelling every allegation in court.	167
Reliability and corroboration of a	A truthful and voluntary dying declaration made in a fit state of mind, free from tutoring, prompting or imagination, may alone support conviction. The court	167

24.1 : Dying Declaration and Statements Relating to Cause of Death

dying declaration	must scrutinise the opportunity to observe and identify the assailant, fitness and consistency. A suspicious declaration requires corroboration, and a statement the unconscious maker could not have made must be rejected. A medical fitness certificate is a rule of caution rather than an indispensable formality where other reliable evidence establishes fitness.
Form and confirmation of a dying declaration	A dying declaration need not invariably be made to a Magistrate. For a declaration specially recorded by police, the narrated authority requires the court to be satisfied that no alternative was available and the reliability safeguards were met. Question-and-answer recording is ordinarily preferable, but a short narrative in the maker's words is not defective merely for its form. For a recorded declaration, the prosecution must establish that it was read to the maker and accepted as correct. The FIR scribe's evidence established read-back and acceptance in this case.	167
Reliable dying declaration may sustain conviction without corroboration	A dying declaration may be the sole basis of conviction if the Court, after careful scrutiny, finds it voluntary, truthful and made while the declarant was mentally fit. Independent corroboration is not an invariable requirement. The medically certified declaration identifying those who poured kerosene and set the deceased on fire was accepted as trustworthy.	202
Expectation of death is unnecessary for relevance under Section 32(1)	A statement concerning the cause of the maker's death or the circumstances resulting in it is relevant under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act when the cause of that death is in question. Its relevance under Indian law does not depend on the maker having expected death when making the statement.	202
Multiple dying declarations require scrutiny of reliability and material inconsistencies	Where more than one dying declaration exists, the Court must examine each declaration's reliability, the circumstances in which it was made and whether inconsistencies are material. A later incriminating declaration is not necessarily untrue because an earlier one differs; acceptance requires scrutiny of fitness, voluntariness, freedom from influence and supporting circumstances.	202
Medical fitness certificate is a safeguard rather than an absolute requirement	The person recording a dying declaration must be satisfied that the declarant is mentally fit. A doctor's certificate is a rule of caution, and its absence does not automatically invalidate the declaration where reliable testimony and other material establish fitness and the Court finds the statement voluntary and truthful.	202
Dying declaration requires no prescribed form, oath or compulsory Magistrate recording	A dying declaration may be oral, written or communicated by definite signs. It need not be made to a Magistrate or on oath, and no statutory form is prescribed for its recording. Its evidentiary weight depends on the circumstances and proof of the declarant's fitness, voluntariness and truthfulness.	202
Recording conditions must protect freedom from tutoring or pressure	The recorder must assess the declarant's mental condition and provide conditions in which the truth can be stated freely, excluding persons who may directly or indirectly influence the statement. Before relying on the declaration, the Court must be satisfied that it was not the product of tutoring, prompting or pressure.	202
Brevity or absence of detailed narration does not alone invalidate a dying declaration	A dying declaration is not to be rejected merely because it is brief or does not describe every detail of the occurrence. Its reliability must be judged through the governing tests of truthfulness, voluntariness and the declarant's fitness.	202
Extensive burns do not by themselves exclude capacity to make a dying declaration	The percentage of burns alone does not determine whether a person can make a reliable dying declaration. The nature, degree and location of the burns and their effect on the ability to think and communicate must be assessed. Here the doctor certified fitness, and cross-examination did not establish impaired faculties, inability to speak or sedative influence that displaced the accepted declarations.	229

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Conviction on a trustworthy dying declaration without independent corroboration	A dying declaration may alone sustain conviction if careful scrutiny establishes that it is truthful, voluntary, coherent and reliable, made in a fit state of mind with an opportunity to identify the assailant and free from tutoring, prompting or imagination. Corroboration is not invariably required; a suspicious declaration or one carrying material infirmities cannot safely be acted upon without supporting evidence.	229
Recording by a doctor without waiting for an Executive Magistrate	A written dying declaration is not inadmissible merely because an Executive Magistrate did not record it. Where the patient's condition is rapidly deteriorating and delay may lose the statement, a doctor satisfied about the patient's fitness may record it without waiting for the Magistrate. Independence and reliability of the recorder and the statement remain relevant.	229
Medical fitness certificate as a safeguard rather than an absolute requirement	The recorder must be satisfied that the declarant is fit to make the statement, and the court must ultimately find it voluntary and truthful. A doctor's certificate is a rule of caution, rather than an indispensable formality in every case. Fitness may be established by other reliable evidence; absence of a particular endorsement alone does not exclude the declaration.	229
Form and method of communicating a dying declaration	A dying declaration may be oral or written, or communicated by words, signs or another adequate method, provided the indication is positive and definite. No oath or prescribed statutory recording format is required. The evidentiary weight depends on the circumstances and proof that the declarant could communicate a voluntary, truthful account.	229
Thumb impression on a declaration despite extensive burns	Extensive burns do not automatically make a thumb impression impossible. Whether the skin and identifying ridges of the particular thumb remained sufficiently intact is a question of fact. The impression must be assessed with the medical and other evidence, rather than rejected solely by reference to the overall percentage of burns.	229
Expectation of death is unnecessary under Section 32(1)	A deceased person's statement about the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is relevant when the cause of that person's death is in question. The declarant need not have expected death when making the statement. That requirement does not depend on the civil or criminal nature of the proceeding.	229
Assessment of multiple dying declarations	Where there are several dying declarations, their consistency and reliability must be examined together. Differences in detail may be reconcilable and must be assessed against the other evidence. A plurality of declarations may be accepted where they are trustworthy; here the oral accounts, admission history, written declaration and Dehati Nalishi consistently identified the husband.	229
Hospital history must be traced to the deceased before treating it as her statement	An accidental-burning history in a medical record could not be attributed to the deceased where the doctor admitted that he had not spoken with her and the history came from family members. It therefore did not establish a competing dying declaration by the deceased. The account she personally gave at admission was considered separately.	229
Reliability of a dying declaration recorded by the treating doctor	The recorder must be satisfied that the declarant is mentally fit and makes a conscious, voluntary statement with an understanding of what is being said. The Court accepted the treating doctor's declaration where his evidence showed that the deceased remained conscious and oriented throughout and was not under the influence of medicines. Her severe burns and the absence of an Executive Magistrate did not, on the evidence accepted, invalidate the declaration.	268
Formalities and medical certification of a dying declaration	A dying declaration need not be recorded by a Magistrate, on oath or in a prescribed form. It may be oral, written or communicated by positive and definite signs. A doctor's certificate of mental fitness is a safeguard of caution, rather than an indispensable requirement in every case. Fitness and the declaration's voluntary, truthful character may be established through other	268 reliable evidence, subject to the court's ultimate satisfaction.

Severe burns do not alone determine capacity to make a dying declaration	The percentage of burns is not, by itself, decisive of the ability to make a reliable dying declaration. The assessment depends on the nature and location of the burns and their effect on the person's capacity to think and communicate. Reliable medical evidence of fitness cannot be displaced merely by assuming that extensive burns necessarily caused incapacity.	268
Dying declaration as sole basis of conviction and need for corroboration	A truthful and voluntary dying declaration that inspires full confidence can sustain conviction without corroboration. The court must scrutinise mental fitness, opportunity to perceive the events, consistency and freedom from tutoring, prompting or imagination. If the declaration is suspicious or there is grave doubt about the maker's capacity, corroborative evidence is needed before safely relying on it; an infirm declaration cannot by itself support conviction.	268
Relevance of statements concerning the cause or circumstances of death	Section 32(1) Evidence Act makes relevant a deceased person's statement about the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death. It operates as an exception to the ordinary requirement of direct oral evidence. Its admissibility does not dispense with careful scrutiny of the statement's reliability.	268
Fitness to make a dying declaration despite extensive burns	The percentage of burns does not by itself establish that a victim was incapable of making a dying declaration. The decisive question is whether the evidence establishes a fit and conscious state of mind. A declaration by a victim with 98% burns was accepted where the doctor certified fitness before and after recording, the recorder confirmed her capacity, and medical and forensic evidence supported the account. The Court also found no opportunity for tutoring by the parents, who arrived after her death.	272
Reliable dying declaration as the sole basis of conviction	A dying declaration may be the sole basis of conviction without corroboration if, after careful scrutiny, it inspires the court's full confidence. The court must be satisfied that the maker was mentally fit, could observe and identify the assailant, and made a truthful, voluntary and coherent statement free from tutoring, prompting or imagination.	272
Corroboration of a suspicious or materially unreliable dying declaration	A suspicious dying declaration, or one affected by an infirmity such as doubtful mental fitness, should not be acted upon without corroboration. Where a material and integral part of the account is untrue, it may be unsafe to convict on the declaration alone. Corroboration is a rule of prudence rather than an absolute requirement for every declaration.	272
Doctor's certificate of fitness is a rule of caution	A doctor's certification is a safeguard, not an indispensable requirement in every case. A declaration can be accepted without it where the recorder's evidence establishes the maker's fitness and the court is satisfied that the statement was voluntary and truthful. The person recording it must be satisfied that the maker can make the statement.	272
Form and recording of a dying declaration	A dying declaration may be oral, written or communicated by definite words or signs. No oath or prescribed statutory form is required, and recording by a Magistrate is not indispensable. For authenticity, a Magistrate should be requested if available, or attestation obtained from persons present, while the recorder must be satisfied about the maker's fitness.	272
Evidence of actual incapacity and medical opinion on fitness	Where an eyewitness affirmatively establishes that the deceased was not in a fit and conscious state to make a statement, medical opinion cannot prevail over that evidence. The court must assess the evidence of the maker's actual condition when the declaration was made.	272
Brevity or omission of details in a dying declaration	A dying declaration is not to be rejected merely because it is brief or does not give all details of the occurrence. Its reliability, coherence and freedom from improper influence must still be assessed.	272

Expectation of death is unnecessary under Section 32(1) Evidence Act	A deceased person's statement about the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is relevant under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act when that person's cause of death is in question. Relevance does not depend on the maker having expected death when making the statement.	272
Credibility of an alleged oral dying declaration	An alleged oral dying declaration depends on the reliability of the witness who reports it. The Court rejected the widow's account where her conduct and the absence of support from those said to have brought the injured person made that account doubtful. Her claim could not be accepted merely because she attributed an accusation to the deceased.	295
Reliable dying declaration as the sole basis of conviction	A voluntary and reliable dying declaration, made in a fit state of mind and based on personal knowledge with an opportunity to identify the assailants, can sustain conviction without independent corroboration. Material eyewitnesses turning hostile does not prevent reliance on a declaration proved by the witnesses connected with its recording. The declaration must undergo careful scrutiny for truthfulness and freedom from influence.	313
Dying declaration — later claim of unclear speech by its recorder	The recorder's later assertion that the declarant named the assailants in an unclear voice did not undermine the declaration where no such difficulty was noted contemporaneously or reported, and the recorder acknowledged hearing the names. The Court tested that later account against the recorded statement and the doctor's evidence and rejected it as misleading.	313
Dying declaration — mental fitness and capacity to communicate	Physical injuries alone do not determine whether a declarant was mentally fit to make a statement. The Court accepted fitness where the doctor was present, had certified the injured person's condition and testified that the person was speaking and well oriented. The medical evidence supported the capacity to make the declaration.	313
Dying declaration — person recording it and the value of a Magistrate's record	A dying declaration is not inadmissible merely because it was made to a police officer, public servant, doctor or private person rather than a Magistrate. The relied-upon precedent places a declaration recorded by a competent Magistrate without animus on a higher footing, subject to contrary circumstances. The recording officer's status does not dispense with scrutiny of reliability.	313
Dying declaration — discrepancy in one reference to an assailant's name	The reference to 'Ratanlal' did not displace identification of Lakhanlal when the declaration later stated that 'Lakhan' assaulted the deceased, the FIR named Lakhanlal and the defence did not suggest the existence of another person named Ratanlal. The Court assessed the disputed name in the context of the statement as a whole and found participation proved.	313
Surviving Maker: Statement Recorded as a Dying Declaration	A statement recorded as a dying declaration does not become admissible under Section 32 of the Evidence Act when its maker survives. The Court considered the surviving injured witness's explanation for naming a different assailant in that statement, the non-examination of the doctor who recorded it and the supporting evidence. It accepted her court testimony after assessing those matters.	360
Statement Recorded as a Dying Declaration When the Maker Survives	A statement recorded as a dying declaration cannot be admitted in that character where the injured maker survives, though it may be considered as the injured person's first statement. Where the maker disowns having named any assailant in that statement, the prosecution cannot rely on it to establish the accused's identity.	372
Unrelated Later Death Does Not Convert an FIR Into a Dying Declaration	The informant was killed before trial examination, but his death did not result from the injuries involved in the reported occurrence. The Court therefore refused to treat his Dehati Nalishi as a dying declaration under Section 32 of the Evidence Act. The later death alone did not make the earlier account admissible on that basis.	381
Treatment of a	Because the complainant survived, the Court treated her statement recorded as	463

purported dying declaration when its maker survives	a dying declaration as a statement under Section 164 CrPC. It considered the allegations in that statement in assessing the prima facie case. The ruling concerned the statement's treatment in these proceedings and did not treat it as conclusive proof of the allegations.
Doubtful fitness and chronology undermining a recorded dying declaration	A dying declaration must be tested against its recording and surrounding circumstances. Here, the patient's initial unconsciousness, deteriorating condition, absence of reliable proof of regained consciousness, conflicting recording times, missing requisition and omission of material answers prevented confidence in the declaration. The Court rejected it as unreliable and apparently concocted. The conclusion arose from the cumulative defects rather than from any single formal omission.	467
Reliable dying declaration as the sole basis of conviction	A dying declaration may alone sustain conviction when the court is satisfied that it is true, voluntary and reliable, made while the declarant was physically and mentally fit and free from tutoring, prompting, duress or other extraneous influence. Corroboration is a rule of prudence rather than an invariable legal requirement. Because the maker cannot be cross-examined, the statement must inspire full confidence; a doubtful declaration cannot obtain reliability merely from its official recording.	467
Faithful recording of a dying declaration in the maker's words	A dying declaration properly recorded by a competent Magistrate, in questions and answers and as far as practicable in the maker's own words, stands on a higher footing than a later oral account vulnerable to memory. Material answers should not be omitted or replaced by the recorder's subsequent improvements. The Tahsildar's admissions that answers were omitted and his later additions to the narrative were factors undermining this declaration.	467
Admissibility of a statement relating to the maker's death under Section 32	Where the maker's cause of death comes into question, a statement about that cause or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is relevant under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act. Admissibility does not depend on the maker having expected death when speaking or on whether the proceeding is civil or criminal. Admissibility remains distinct from whether the particular statement is sufficiently trustworthy to support conviction.	467
Dying declaration — fitness to make the statement and medical evidence	The person recording a dying declaration must be satisfied that the maker is mentally and physically fit to give it. Medical certification is a rule of caution rather than an indispensable formality, but reliable evidence of fitness remains necessary. Here, the contemporaneous doctor's endorsement, the MLC recording responsiveness and the recorder's testimony established fitness despite the injured's poor general condition. A later doctor's general view about possible unconsciousness after a serious head injury did not establish actual incapacity. Prompt recording and corresponding eye and leg injuries supported the Court's acceptance of the declaration.	499
Dying declaration — sole basis of conviction and safeguards of reliability	A statement concerning the cause of the maker's death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is admissible under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act. A truthful, voluntary and reliable dying declaration may alone sustain conviction; corroboration is not invariably required. The Court must carefully assess fitness, opportunity to observe and identify the assailant, and absence of tutoring, prompting or imagination. A suspicious declaration requires corroborative support, and an infirm declaration or one attributed to a person who could not have spoken cannot sustain conviction. The Court accepted this declaration on its own reliability assessment, with medical and ocular corroboration also available.	499
Dying declaration — brevity, omitted details and recording formalities	A dying declaration is not to be rejected merely because it is brief or does not meticulously recount every detail of the occurrence. A victim suffering multiple serious injuries cannot be expected to give a parrot-like account. The Court adopted a substantive assessment of trustworthiness rather than a	499 hypertechnical approach to recording, while retaining the need for a voluntary, reliable statement by a fit maker. Missing details or formal endorsements therefore require assessment in context rather than automatic exclusion.

Oral dying declaration where the declarant's ability to speak and mental fitness remain unproved	Where an oral dying declaration was attributed to a woman with extensive third-degree burns who died shortly afterwards, her ability to speak and mental fitness required proof. The prosecution neither produced the original hospital record nor examined the treating doctor who recorded the history. The unexhibited photocopy could not be used against the accused, leaving the declarant's fitness unproved on the evidence in this case.	580
Proof of fitness to make a dying declaration despite conflicting medical testimony	Fitness to make a dying declaration must be assessed from the evidence as a whole; the absence of a separate medical certificate is not by itself fatal. Although the treating doctor said that the injured could not speak, the contemporaneous MLC recorded that he was conscious, and the officer testified to speaking with him while taking him to hospital. The officer was not questioned on his mental fitness. Read together, the evidence established that the victim was conscious and speaking when the Dehati Nalishi was recorded after first aid.	582
Conviction on a truthful and voluntary dying declaration	A dying declaration found truthful and voluntary may sustain conviction without corroboration. There is no inflexible rule of law or prudence requiring independent corroboration in every case. Applying the narrated authorities under Section 32 of the Evidence Act, the Court accepted the deceased's statement as voluntary and trustworthy. It also assessed the Dehati Nalishi, eyewitness accounts and medical evidence; the absence of a mandatory corroboration rule did not prevent consideration of that supporting material.	593
Extensive burns and capacity to make a dying declaration	A high percentage of burns does not by itself show that a person cannot make a reliable dying declaration. Capacity to communicate and the statement's trustworthiness must be assessed from the evidence. The Court relied on the narrated burn-injury authorities, including Dal Singh's requirement of confidence and freedom from tutoring, and found the deceased conscious and able to speak despite extensive second- and third-degree burns. It did not presume fitness from the percentage of burns alone.	593
Form and recording of a dying declaration	A dying declaration may be oral, written, or conveyed by signs or another adequate method, provided the communication is positive and definite. No oath or prescribed statutory recording form is essential, and a declaration need not be made to a Magistrate. Calling an available Magistrate is a usual safeguard for authenticity. The evidentiary weight remains dependent on the circumstances, including fitness, truth and voluntariness.	593
Brevity of a dying declaration	A dying declaration cannot be discarded merely because it is brief. The Court adopted the narrated principle in Surajdeo Oza that a short statement may support its truthfulness; brevity remains part of the assessment of the declaration's reliability rather than a substitute for finding it truthful and voluntary.	593
Mental fitness and voluntariness of a dying declaration	The recorder must satisfy himself that the declarant is mentally fit to make the statement. Medical opinion ordinarily assists that assessment, but the declaration is not invalid solely because a doctor has not certified fitness if the recorder is otherwise satisfied. Here, the recorder's testimony, medical assessments before and after recording, and exclusion of relatives from the ward established fitness and voluntariness; no material indicated tutoring.	610
Sealed custody and corroboration of a written dying declaration	The recorder's evidence that he sent the dying declaration to the Chief Judicial Magistrate in a sealed cover, together with the investigating officer's evidence of receiving it sealed and depositing it before the trial Magistrate, established proper custody. The deceased's oral statements to his wife and parents identifying the appellant were found reliable and corroborated the written	610 declaration.

Dying declaration as the sole basis of conviction	A true, voluntary and reliable dying declaration may alone sustain conviction. Because the accused cannot cross-examine the maker, the Court must scrutinise mental fitness, opportunity to identify the assailant, consistency, and possible tutoring or prompting. A suspicious declaration requires corroborative evidence, and an infirm declaration cannot sustain conviction. Section 32(1) also embraces statements about the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death, whether or not the maker expected death; no fixed interval between declaration and death governs its acceptance.	610
Brevity and absence of detail in a dying declaration	A dying declaration is not liable to rejection merely because it is brief or omits details of the occurrence. Its reliability must be assessed with the other safeguards governing dying declarations.	610
Multiple dying declarations and consistency with the prosecution case	Where several dying declarations are available, the earliest ordinarily receives preference, while multiple declarations found trustworthy and reliable may be accepted. A declaration that conflicts with the prosecution version cannot be acted upon. Here, the reliable oral declarations corroborated the written declaration.	610
Mental and physical fitness to make a dying declaration	The recorder must be satisfied that the declarant is mentally and physically fit to give the statement. A doctor's fitness certificate is a safeguard of caution rather than an invariably mandatory condition. Applying Laxman, Govindappa and Jagbir Singh, the Court accepted the treating doctor's examination and the Naib-Tahsildar's satisfaction with Sonkali's responses. Her burns and treatment did not establish inability to speak, and no sedative administration affecting her faculties was shown.	649
Consistent dying declarations and omission of an unasked motive	All three dying declarations consistently identified the appellant as the person who poured kerosene and set Sonkali on fire. The absence of a motive or cause of quarrel in the Naib-Tahsildar's declaration was not a material inconsistency because he had asked no question about it. The Court accepted the consistent account of the act after examining the declarations' reliability.	649
Reliable dying declaration as the sole basis of conviction	A true and voluntary dying declaration may sustain conviction without compulsory corroboration if the court is satisfied of the declarant's fitness, opportunity to observe and identify, and freedom from tutoring or prompting. A suspicious declaration requires corroborative support, and a materially infirm declaration cannot sustain conviction. Applying Ravikumar, Laltu Ghosh and Kalawati, the Court found the three declarations reliable and accepted them in sustaining the murder conviction.	649
Initial complaint later used as a dying declaration	An initial complaint made by an injured person may be assessed as a dying declaration after that person's death. An officer receiving first information before investigation does not record it in the capacity of investigating officer merely because he later investigates. The Court applied Munnu Raja and Jai Prakash in accepting the hospital Dehati Nalishi; its initial recording as a complaint did not require a separate Magistrate-recorded declaration or a contemporaneous doctor's attestation as an automatic condition of later use.	649
Crime number on a police statement and alleged ante-timing	The crime number appearing on Sonkali's police statement did not establish ante-timing on this record. The Court accepted the officer's explanation that he could have learnt the number, noted that the recording time itself had been retained, and considered the presence of two other dying declarations. It therefore declined to discard the statement on that discrepancy.	649
Minor timing discrepancy between successive dying declarations	Near-simultaneous times noted for the police statement and the Naib-Tahsildar's declaration did not make either unreliable where the statements were recorded in quick succession and different watches could explain a 10–15 minute difference. The Court accepted that explanation and found the timing	649

	discrepancy did not go to the root of the case.
Alleged tutoring or fabrication of a dying declaration	A dying declaration must be scrutinised for tutoring, prompting and fabrication, but such defects cannot be assumed without supporting circumstances. The Court found no circumstance indicating tutoring and relied on the treating doctor and Naib-Tahsildar as independent witnesses. It adopted Laltu Ghosh's warning against unsupported allegations that public officers fabricated a victim's statement.	649
Dying declaration — actual mental fitness matters more than a formal certificate	A formal medical fitness certificate is a safeguard rather than an inflexible condition for accepting a dying declaration. Applying Laxman and Surendra Bangali, the Court required satisfaction that the declarant was fit, and that the statement was voluntary and truthful. The doctor who recorded the declaration testified that the injured was conscious and answering questions. The medical evidence did not exclude his ability to speak, and the police recorder also confirmed coherent speech when the FIR was lodged. The smaller post-recording fitness endorsement was explained by limited space and did not make the declaration unreliable.	678
Multiple dying declarations — reconcile differences through context and other evidence	Differences between dying declarations require assessment of their significance, context and consistency with the other evidence. Applying Jagbir Singh, the Court compared the detailed FIR naming nine assailants with the doctor-recorded declaration naming four. The doctor had not asked whether other persons were involved, and the injured was in severe pain while urgent treatment was the primary concern. The difference did not require rejection of either statement when assessed with the trustworthy eyewitness evidence. The Court ultimately found no material contradiction between the declarations. It did not treat every discrepancy between multiple declarations as harmless.	678
Urgent dying declaration may be recorded by a doctor without waiting for a Magistrate	A dying declaration is not unreliable merely because a doctor records it instead of an Executive Magistrate. Where a severely injured person is sinking and there is insufficient time to wait, the doctor may record the statement. Applying the Laxman principle and the urgent circumstances of the head injury and amputated leg, the Court rejected suspicion founded only on the investigating officer’s request to the doctor rather than to a Magistrate. The declaration still required proof of mental fitness, voluntariness and truthfulness.	678
Dying declaration without a read-over endorsement — recorder not questioned	The absence of an endorsement that the doctor-recorded declaration was read over did not establish unreliability on this record, where no question on that matter had been put to the doctor. The Court also noted that the injured person’s earlier detailed FIR expressly recorded that it was read over and accepted as correct. The objection was assessed with the evidence establishing the declarations’ voluntary and conscious making. The decision does not dispense generally with examining whether a written statement accurately records the declarant’s words.	678
Capacity to make a dying declaration despite extensive burns	The percentage of burns, even 100%, does not by itself establish incapacity to make a dying declaration. The decisive consideration is reliable evidence that the declarant was fit, conscious and capable of communicating the account; the degree and nature of burns must also be considered. The Court accepted the declarations on medical and recording-witness evidence of consciousness and orientation, including fitness certificates before and after the formal recording. Extensive burns did not alone displace that evidence.	695
Conviction on a trustworthy dying declaration despite hostile witnesses	A voluntary and truthful dying declaration, made in a fit state of mind and inspiring the Court’s confidence, may be the sole basis of conviction without corroboration. It must be carefully scrutinised for tutoring, prompting, imagination and other infirmities because the maker cannot be cross-examined. A suspicious or infirm declaration should not be acted upon without corroboration. Other witnesses turning hostile does not require rejection of	695 dying declarations independently found reliable and trustworthy.

Thumb impressions on dying declarations in burn cases	Whether a burn victim could give a thumb impression is a question of fact. Some thumb skin and its ridges may remain intact despite extensive burns elsewhere. A thumb mark must therefore be assessed against the actual evidence about the thumb's condition and the recording, rather than rejected solely on the overall burn percentage. In this case, the recording witnesses supported the impressions; the police officer explained the divided appearance as uneven ink, and the post-mortem doctor could not say whether the thumb skin was burnt.	695
Medical certification of fitness to make a dying declaration	A doctor's fitness certificate is a safeguard and a rule of caution, rather than an indispensable legal condition in every case. The recorder must be satisfied that the declarant is fit to make the statement, and the Court must ultimately find it voluntary and truthful. Reliable testimony establishing fitness can permit reliance even without a certificate. Here the doctor in fact certified fitness before and after recording and supported the declarant's conscious condition.	695
Recorder, form and communication of a dying declaration	A dying declaration need not be recorded by a Magistrate, and no statutory form is prescribed. It may be oral or written, or communicated through definite and positive words or signs; no oath is necessary. A Magistrate's assistance, where available, helps assure authenticity, but the essential requirements are the recorder's satisfaction about fitness and the Court's assessment of truthfulness and voluntariness. Brevity or omission of every detail of the occurrence does not alone require rejection.	695
Consistency of multiple dying declarations	Where there are several dying declarations, the Court must assess any inconsistencies for materiality in the surrounding circumstances. Consistent, coherent and voluntary declarations may support conviction. The Court accepted the medical history, Dehati Nalishi, police statement and formal declaration as reliable accounts of the husband's act of setting the deceased on fire, supported by evidence of her orientation and fitness.	695
Statements about the cause of death without expectation of death	Under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act, a deceased person's statement about the cause of death or circumstances of the transaction resulting in death is relevant when that cause is in question, whether or not the maker expected death when speaking. The Court treated the initial oral history, Dehati Nalishi, police statement and formal declaration as dying declarations although the victim survived for about ten days after the incident.	695
Conviction on a truthful and voluntary dying declaration	A dying declaration may alone sustain conviction if careful scrutiny satisfies the Court that it is true, voluntary, coherent and consistent and inspires full confidence. The maker must have been mentally fit, and the statement must be free from tutoring, prompting or imagination. Corroboration is a rule of prudence, not an absolute legal requirement for every dying declaration.	712
Proof of consciousness and reliability of a burn victim's dying declaration	The Court accepted the burn victim's dying declaration where the Executive Magistrate recorded clear accusations against the appellants, the doctor certified consciousness during recording, and the supporting testimony withstood cross-examination. Finding the declaration consistent and trustworthy, and supported by the deceased's own Dehati Nalishi, the Court relied on it to sustain the murder convictions.	712
Suspicious or infirm dying declarations	A suspicious dying declaration should not be acted upon without corroborative evidence. A declaration suffering from a fundamental infirmity, such as the maker being unconscious and incapable of making a statement, cannot sustain conviction. The Court adopted these safeguards from Atbir when testing the declaration's reliability.	712
Brevity or omission of details in a dying declaration	A dying declaration is not liable to rejection merely because it is brief or does not contain every detail of the occurrence. Its reliability must still satisfy the	712 safeguards governing dying declarations.

Eyewitness evidence of unfitness and medical opinion	When an eyewitness affirms that the deceased was not fit and conscious enough to make a dying declaration, medical opinion cannot prevail over that evidence. The Court included this rule among the Atbir safeguards governing assessment of the maker's capacity.	712
Police-recorded dying declaration supported by medical evidence of fitness	A dying declaration recorded by a police officer was accepted where an Executive Magistrate could not be arranged, the attending doctor examined the injured person and certified his fitness to make a statement, and the doctor remained present during recording. Despite the seriousness of the injuries, the evidence established fitness at the time of recording. The declaration was considered with the eyewitness and medical evidence.	720
Failure to record a dying declaration despite survival after injury	There is no mandatory requirement to record a dying declaration from every injured victim who later dies. The investigating agency must assess whether recording one would assist in establishing the case, having regard to the available evidence. The Court rejected the objection to its absence where the planned firearm assault was established by direct injured-eyewitness evidence supported by medical and other material.	873
Reliability and independent evidentiary value of a dying declaration	A dying declaration may sustain conviction without independent corroboration if strict scrutiny shows that the maker was mentally fit, spoke voluntarily from personal knowledge, could identify the assailant and was not influenced by others. Its admissibility does not depend on the recipient’s official status, although disinterested recording by a competent Magistrate is a weighty circumstance. Ajay’s declaration identified Sunny as the sword assailant and was recorded by the Naib Tahsildar with medical fitness certificates before and after recording. The Court found it reliable and treated the minor discrepancies as immaterial.	936
Alleged oral dying declaration omitted from the earlier police statement	The Kotwar’s claim at trial that the injured victim named her assailants could not be relied on as an oral dying declaration where that assertion was absent from his police statement and he could not explain the omission. The Court treated the omission of this central incriminating assertion as a major contradiction, rather than accepting the later account as corroborative proof.	949
Oral dying declaration — injured victim’s capacity to speak and supporting testimony	The Court accepted evidence that the injured victim remained conscious and identified his assailants before death, rejecting the defence contention that he could not speak. His oral statements to his wife and her brother supported their eyewitness accounts; Deendayal’s evidence also supported the earlier trial. Because Deendayal did not support the prosecution in the separately tried accused’s case, the Court relied there on the wife’s and her brother’s depositions. The oral declaration was assessed with the eyewitness and medical evidence in affirming the respective murder convictions.	993
	Sub-Chapter no. 24.2 Police-Recorded Statement of Deceased — Section 32 Evidence Act and Section 162(2) CrPC
Section 161 CrPC statement as a dying declaration	A police-recorded statement under Section 161 CrPC is admissible under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act when, after the maker's death, it concerns the cause of that death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in it, and the cause of death is in question. Section 162(2) CrPC expressly preserves this exception. Expectation of death when the statement was made is unnecessary. The maker's later death alone does not make every police statement a dying declaration.	32
Unexhibited police statement of the deceased not usable against the accused	The deceased's Section 161 CrPC statement could not be used against the appellants merely because it had been filed with the charge-sheet and remained in the trial court record. The prosecutor had not exhibited that statement. The Court excluded it from consideration while separately relying on the proved	127

	Dehati Nalishi and the recorded dying declaration.
Injured informant's FIR as a dying declaration	An FIR describing the injuries that later caused its maker's death is relevant under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act, even if initially recorded as an ordinary FIR and without expectation of death. The prosecution must establish the maker's fitness and consciousness. The scribe's account of dictation and read-back, and the medical examination shortly afterwards, supported acceptance here; assistance in walking and use of a thumb impression despite literacy did not establish incapacity.	167
Dehati Nalishi by an injured person as a dying declaration after death	An injured person's own report to police may be admitted as a dying declaration after the maker dies if it relates to the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction resulting in death and satisfies Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act. Its initial recording as a Dehati Nalishi or first information report does not prevent that use.	229
Reliance on the deceased's own police report of the fatal assault	After the other asserted eyewitness and oral-declaration accounts were rejected, the Court relied on the report lodged by the deceased himself. The recording officer was not questioned about its substance or the injured person's mental condition. Read with the medical evidence, the report proved the quarrel and that the appellant threw the deceased down and struck him with fists and blows. Its acceptance rested on this evidentiary record, rather than a rule that every police-recorded account of a deceased person is automatically conclusive.	295
Deceased's Dehati Nalishi and police statement as dying declarations	A deceased victim's Dehati Nalishi and Section 161 CrPC statement are admissible under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act when they concern the cause of death or the transaction resulting in death. Section 162(2) CrPC preserves that admissibility. The maker need not have expected death when making the statement.	412
Dehati Nalishi by a deceased informant as a dying declaration under Section 32(1)	A report dictated by an injured person may be admitted as a dying declaration after death when it concerns the cause of death or circumstances of the transaction resulting in death. Its use to register an FIR does not prevent admission under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act. The declarant need not have expected death when making the statement. The Court applied this rule to the victim's Dehati Nalishi, recorded after first aid, read over to him and bearing his thumb impression.	582
FIR lodged by the injured person and later treated as a dying declaration	The FIR recorded from the injured person's own statement about the fatal assault was treated as his dying declaration after he died from those injuries. The recording officer proved that he wrote the report according to the injured person's account and obtained his signature. The Court relied on that account to corroborate the wife's eyewitness testimony.	584
Police-recorded dying declaration and proof of mental fitness	A dying declaration is not inadmissible merely because police reduced the oral statement to writing, no Magistrate was present, or no doctor certified mental fitness. The recorder must be satisfied that the maker was fit, and the Court must ultimately find the statement truthful and voluntary. Medical certification is a precaution rather than an indispensable formality where fitness is otherwise proved. Applying Laxman and the narrated fitness principle, the Court accepted the police-recorded statement on this evidence.	593
Deceased's Section 161 statement at the bail stage	For considering bail, the Court treated the deceased's statement recorded under Section 161 CrPC, specifically identifying the applicant's participation, as a dying declaration. The eyewitnesses' having turned hostile did not remove that incriminating material from the bail assessment.	615
Deceased victim's police statement as a dying declaration	A statement recorded under Section 161 CrPC concerning the cause or circumstances of the maker's death may be admitted under Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act after the maker dies. Applying Pradeep Bisoi, the Court treated Sonkali's police statement as one of the three dying declarations whose	649 reliability it examined and accepted.

Injured informant's FIR may become a dying declaration after death	A complaint recorded from an injured person as an FIR may acquire the character of a dying declaration when the informant later dies from the injuries described. The officer was recording an FIR, so absence of a contemporaneous doctor's attestation or fitness endorsement did not itself invalidate the document. Applying Jai Prakash, the Court rejected the objection based on treating the original recording as if it had necessarily been a formal dying declaration. The FIR's later evidentiary use also did not make a subsequent declaration recorded by the doctor unnecessary.	678
Police statement as dying declaration: mental fitness must be proved	A victim's Section 161 CrPC statement may become relevant under Section 32 of the Evidence Act after death from the injuries, but the maker's fitness to give it must be established. A doctor's fitness certificate is not invariably required, particularly where the officer does not anticipate death and is satisfied that the maker is fit. Here the doctor described the victim as semi-unconscious, in poor condition and unable to make a statement at essentially the relevant time. That evidence displaced the officer's contrary impression. A small difference between their watches did not itself disprove recording, but fitness remained unproved; the statement could not be relied on as a dying declaration.	949
	Sub-Chapter no. 24.3 Discovery and Recovery Under Section 27 Evidence Act
Section 27 Evidence Act: police custody without formal arrest	For Section 27 of the Evidence Act, custody is not confined to formal arrest. The passage from Perumal Raja relied upon by the Court explains that police surveillance, restriction or restraint may amount to custody, and that the bar under Sections 25–26 and the exception under Section 27 may apply even before a formal arrest. The Court used this explanation to distinguish the wider concept of custody from formal arrest.	41
Discovery of concealed articles in premises accessible to others	Access by others to a place does not by itself invalidate recovery of an article concealed there. Applying the narrated recovery authorities, the Court treated the accused's knowledge of the hidden location and production of his clothes from among tent-house goods as material. The clothes were concealed rather than lying openly visible. The Court nevertheless excluded the FSL finding that they carried human blood because that circumstance had not been put to the accused under Section 313 CrPC.	103
Section 27 Evidence Act — Concealed recovery from a place accessible to others	Accessibility of a place to others does not by itself invalidate discovery under Section 27 of the Evidence Act. The relevant distinction is whether the article was ordinarily visible or remained concealed until recovered through the accused's disclosure. A scarf buried in a pit, whose hidden location was disclosed by the appellant, was accepted as a proved recovery. Its concealed state was material even though the surrounding place could be accessible to others.	118
Unreliable proof of alleged recovery of ordinary articles	An alleged disclosure and recovery did not link the appellant to the crime where the witnesses had not reliably seen the source from which the purse and belt were produced and gave conflicting accounts of the house and persons present. The articles were ordinary goods available in the market, and the asserted visiting card was not seized. On the cumulative deficiencies, the prosecution failed to prove recovery from the appellant's house.	157
Recovery from a place accessible to others	Section 27 of the Evidence Act does not exclude recovery merely because others can access the place. The relevant distinction is whether the article was concealed from ordinary view and its location was known to the disclosing accused. A doorless shed did not invalidate discovery of the hidden gun at the appellant's instance.	167
Disclosure-led	The Court accepted recovery of buried ransom money following the accused's	183

recovery corroborating involvement in a ransom offence	disclosure when the disclosure, seizure and identified currency were proved through reliable evidence. Distinctive bank slips, signatures placed on notes before the ransom was paid and identification by the persons who handled the money connected the recovery to the offence. The accused offered no explanation of the recovered funds. These circumstances corroborated his involvement in the ransom demand.
Public access and concealed articles under Section 27 Evidence Act	Public access to the place of recovery does not by itself invalidate discovery under Section 27 Evidence Act. The material question is whether the article was hidden from ordinary view and its location was within the accused's exclusive knowledge until disclosure. Applying the reproduced Supreme Court authorities, the Court distinguished a concealed article from the pistol recovered without proof of concealment in the open drain.	216
Recovery on memorandum — open place and unsupported proceedings	The alleged recovery of stolen articles did not reliably connect the accused with the offence where the place of recovery was open, the memorandum witnesses did not support the prosecution, and the supporting witness said that the proceedings and documents were completed at the police station. These defects were assessed with the other missing links in the circumstantial case.	335
Discovery of a Concealed Weapon at a Place Accessible to Others	Recovery under Section 27 of the Evidence Act is not deprived of value merely because the place is open or accessible to others. The material question is whether the concealed article was ordinarily visible and whether the accused disclosed knowledge of its hidden location. A Baka hidden in bushes and recovered on the accused’s information retained discovery value; no seizure witness had been questioned to show that it was visible to others.	378
Weapon Recovery Corroborating Ocular and Medical Evidence	The Court rejected the challenge to weapon recovery because discovery followed the accused persons' memoranda at the places where the weapons had been kept. Bloodstained and other incriminating articles were collected from the scene, and the eyewitness account was supported by the medical evidence. Those combined circumstances supported the finding that weapons were used in the common-object assault; the recovery was corroborative rather than a substitute for proof of the attack.	383
Recovery From an Open Place Assessed in Its Actual Circumstances	Recovery is not inherently unreliable solely because the place is open or accessible to others. Its probative value depends on the actual circumstances, including visibility, prior searches and the credibility of the asserted discovery. Here the slacks were said to be found at an exposed place already visited by police, and the video, witness admissions and seizure chronology undermined the alleged recovery. Applying Anter Singh, the Court rejected this recovery on its particular evidential defects, not on a categorical rule against open-place recoveries.	389
Discovery of a concealed body and explanation of knowledge	The Court accepted the proved disclosure and recovery of the child’s concealed body as an incriminating link. Where the accused points out concealed material, he may explain that his knowledge came from seeing another person conceal it or being told of it. The relied-upon Suresh principle permits an inference that he concealed it himself when he offers no such alternative explanation. The discovery was assessed with the other proved circumstances.	397
Concealed recovery from a place accessible to others	Recovery under Section 27 of the Evidence Act is not defeated merely because the place is open or accessible to others. The material question is whether the concealed object was ordinarily visible and its location known to the accused. The body here was covered by dry grass in a crop-surrounded field away from the main road; its discovery on the accused’s disclosure was accepted despite the open location.	397
Section 27 Discovery of a Concealed Article in an Open	Recovery is not excluded under Section 27 of the Evidence Act merely because the location is open or accessible to others. The material question is whether the article was ordinarily visible or remained concealed at a place known to the	409

or Accessible Place	accused. The severed head wrapped in plastic in a hill forest was not shown to be readily visible to passers-by, so the open-place objection did not defeat the discovery.
Separate Disclosures Followed by a Joint Recovery under Section 27	Disclosures by more than one accused are not inadmissible merely because they lead to a joint recovery. Separately recorded information given in quick succession before discovery, followed by pointing out the concealed material, may be proved against each informant to the extent it distinctly relates to the discovered fact. Credibility remains a matter of evidentiary evaluation; a later statement after completed discovery is distinguishable.	409
Section 27 discovery of a concealed article in an open field	The fact that an article is recovered from an open field does not defeat a discovery where it was concealed and could not readily have been found without information identifying its exact location. The motorcycle's broken number plate lay in standing mustard crop and was not visible even to the field owner. The Court therefore accepted recovery at the accused's instance as incriminating, rejecting the objection that the field was an open place.	508
Section 27 recovery — concealed object in a public place known to the accused	An object was not excluded from a proved recovery merely because the place was public where it was hidden, not visible and its location was known to the accused. The Court accepted the recovery of the buried silver ornament on the disclosure proved by the seizure witness and investigating officer. That conclusion established recovery, while identification of the object as the complainant's property remained a separate requirement.	548
Recovery evidence undermined by admitted tutoring and lack of knowledge of the recovery place	The Court doubted the recovery of the knife where the seizure witness admitted that an advocate had tutored his testimony and could not describe basic features of the house from which recovery was claimed. The investigating officer’s inability to identify the nature of its entrance added to the doubt. These deficiencies undermined proof of the asserted recovery in this case.	550
Section 27 Evidence Act: direct proof of the disclosure leading to discovery	Only the part of an accused’s information that distinctly relates to the fact discovered is admissible under Section 27 of the Evidence Act; the remaining confession is inadmissible. The officer proving the disclosure must give direct evidence of the accused’s relevant words and the sequence leading to discovery, consistently with Section 60. Where several accused are involved, the information must be connected to the person who supplied it. Merely exhibiting the memorandum does not prove its contents. The narrated procedure separates recording the discovery information from documenting the ensuing recovery. Here, the officer only stated that he had recorded the appellant’s statement as an exhibit, without narrating the information leading to seizure of the motorcycle. With the seizure witnesses hostile and the complainant not identifying the appellant as the robber, the charged robbery and the alleged recovery were not proved.	552
Recovery inconsistent with the weapon attributed to the accused	A weapon recovery may fail to strengthen the prosecution when the recovered weapon differs from the weapon attributed to the accused, the seizure witness materially contradicts the recorded seizure time, and the forensic finding does not establish human blood. Those defects, assessed with the unreliable eyewitness evidence, deprived the axe recovery of incriminating value in this case.	571
Identification of recovered articles as property taken in the offence	Proof of seizure alone does not establish that the articles were property taken from the deceased. Identification in court is substantive evidence. Where the articles were neither produced nor identified in court by witnesses able to recognise the deceased's belongings, and no identification parade was held, the finding that they were looted property rested on conjecture.	573
Discovery of a concealed body and the accused's special	A discovery under Section 27 of the Evidence Act includes the place where an object is found and the accused's knowledge of it. An open location does not	575

knowledge	invalidate the discovery when the object is concealed from ordinary view. Recovery of the skeleton hidden beneath stones in an isolated hill area, on the accused's disclosure and without a convincing explanation of that special knowledge, was a strong incriminating circumstance considered with the other proved evidence.
Conflicting seizure accounts — matching blood group cannot cure unproved recovery	Where the investigating officer described recovery of an axe from a concealed stone closet but the seizure witness described it as lying openly nearby in a place accessible to the public, the alleged discovery on the accused's information was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The Court therefore declined to use the matching blood group on the axe and the deceased's clothes as an incriminating circumstance. The forensic result did not establish the missing reliable link between the accused and the recovered article. The finding depended on the conflicting accounts of this recovery.	677
Section 27 Evidence Act — conditions and extent of admissible discovery	A relevant fact must be discovered in consequence of information received from an accused in police custody, and the resulting discovery must be proved. Only the part of the information distinctly relating to that fact is admissible. The fact discovered includes the object, its location and the accused's knowledge of it; its connection with the crime must independently be established. Discovery ordinarily supplies one link in the chain of proof.	682
Recovery from an open place — accused's knowledge of the location	A recovery is not rendered irrelevant merely because the place is open or accessible to others. Knowledge of the particular location where an article is concealed may remain exclusive to the accused despite others' access to the area. The Court accepted the accused's disclosure leading to bloodstained articles in Amola Ghati and treated his knowledge of their location as significant.	682
Discovery recovery of the axe as corroboration of direct evidence	The Court accepted the investigating officer's account that an axe was recovered on the appellant's disclosure and considered that recovery with the child's direct account, the fatal incised neck wounds and the appellant's conduct. The recovery was an additional circumstance in the combined proof of murder.	718
Section 27 Evidence Act—recovery from a place accessible to others	Recovery is not vitiated merely because the place is open and accessible to other people. Following State of H.P. v. Jai Chand, the Court relied on the appellant's specific disclosure of the different locations, his pointing out and personally producing the articles, and the widow's identification of them. Public accessibility did not displace his demonstrated knowledge of where the deceased's belongings had been thrown.	815
Recovery of the deceased's body at the accused's instance as corroborative evidence	The recovery of the child's body from a forest pit, following memoranda recorded under Section 27 Evidence Act and at the instance of the accused, corroborated the accepted evidence that the child had been in their company. The recovery and seizure were supported by the prosecution witnesses, and the medical evidence established homicidal strangulation. The Court relied on these circumstances together in finding guilt proved beyond reasonable doubt.	850
Discovery under Section 27 Evidence Act from an open or accessible place	Recovery from a place open or accessible to others is not inadmissible for that reason alone. The material question is whether the concealed object was ordinarily visible and whether the accused disclosed knowledge of its location. Discovery embraces the location and that knowledge, as well as the object. Applying Jeet Singh and Yakub Razak Memon, the Court accepted recovery of the body from bushes at a forest location not easily accessible to the public on a co-accused's disclosure.	934
Accused-led recovery supported by credible witnesses and medical evidence	The Court accepted the accused-led recovery of the child's body and nearby articles on the consistent evidence of the investigating officer and supporting witnesses. His knowledge of the body's location remained unexplained, and the doctor's opinion that the injuries could have been caused by the recovered knife supported the evidentiary chain.	986

	Sub-Chapter no. 24.4 Confession to Police and Admissibility Restrictions
Co-accused's police confession and Sections 25–26 of the Evidence Act	A co-accused's confession to the police, identifying the applicant as the person who escaped, supplied no admissible substantive evidence against the applicant under Sections 25 and 26 of the Evidence Act. Where the State could show no admissible basis for that statement and no other substantive link had been collected, sole reliance on it supported release on bail without a final decision on the prosecution's merits.	146
Accused's confessional FIR and the discovery exception	Where an accused's FIR to police amounts to a confession, Section 25 of the Evidence Act excludes both the admission of the offence and the related incriminating admissions forming part of that confession. Only the information admissible within Section 27 may be proved. The accused's self-inculpatory account of killing his wife was therefore excluded, subject to the admissible information concerning discovery of the pickaxe.	294
Police confession cannot supply substantive proof of receipt of ransom	The accused's confessional statement to police could not supply substantive proof of his receipt of ransom money because Sections 25 and 26 of the Evidence Act barred that confession. The alleged recovery still required proof connecting the money to the offence; its mere description as a Section 27 disclosure did not establish that connection.	410
NDPS Confessions: Section 67 and the Application of Tofan Singh at Bail	Officers invested with Section 53 NDPS Act powers are police officers for Section 25 of the Evidence Act, and a statement under Section 67 cannot be used as a confession at an NDPS trial. Applying Tofan Singh in this bail application, the Court rejected reliance against the applicant on the co-accused's confession, whether described as under Section 67 or Section 27 of the Evidence Act. The applicant was apprehended at a dhaba rather than in the truck carrying the contraband.	521
Co-accused's naming statement — absence of substantive evidence at bail stage	A co-accused's confessional statement naming the applicant did not supply substantive admissible evidence against him on the record considered in the second bail application. The investigating officer accepted its inadmissibility, and nothing had been recovered from the applicant. With the identification investigation also incomplete, the Court found no substantive admissible material supporting continued detention and granted bail without commenting on the trial merits. The decision was a bail-stage assessment of the evidence then available.	674
Departmental enquiry statement — limits of Sections 25 and 26 of the Evidence Act	Section 25 excludes a confession made to a police officer; Section 26 excludes one made in police custody unless made in a Magistrate's immediate presence. Those provisions did not bar consideration of the co-accused's statement for the limited purpose of the departmental enquiry report, because the enquiry officer was not a police officer and the speaker was not in police custody. The report could be considered at charge framing, but did not itself prove its findings; the prosecution remained required to prove them at trial.	758
Accused's non-confessional FIR: admissible conduct and limits of proof	An FIR is not substantive evidence. If the informant testifies, it may be used for corroboration or contradiction under Sections 157 and 145 of the Evidence Act. An accused's act of reporting may be relevant conduct under Section 8, and a non-confessional statement may be relevant as an admission under Section 21; a confession to police is barred by Section 25. The appellant's non-inculpatory report was not barred by Sections 25 and 26 and supplied investigative leads. Nevertheless, the Court declined to accept its unproved narrative as substantive proof, particularly where the prosecution evidence differed and the police had not investigated the account.	942

	Sub-Chapter no. 24.5 Extra-Judicial Confession and Caution in Reliance
Omission of an alleged confession from the earlier police statement	The Court rejected the alleged extra-judicial confession where the witness claimed in court that the accused had admitted the killings, but his police statement contained no such account. That material omission rendered the witness unreliable on the confession, which was not used as a circumstance proving guilt.	278
Attribution of an Alleged Telephone Extra-Judicial Confession	The alleged speakerphone confession was not proved. The person to whom the call was said to have been made did not support it; the other witnesses did not establish familiarity with the accused's voice; and the prosecution did not prove that the call reached a number belonging to the accused. Despite police arranging the call, it was not recorded. The combined deficiencies defeated attribution and reliability in this case.	389
Credibility and corroboration of an extra-judicial confession	An extra-judicial confession is ordinarily weak evidence and must inspire confidence, but corroboration is not an inflexible requirement in every case. Here the Court accepted Raju's account that the appellant admitted murdering his wife, considered the surrounding circumstances and medical evidence of fatal neck injuries, and found adequate corroboration for reliance on the confession.	644
Co-accused's confession: independent evidence must provide the foundation	A co-accused's extra-judicial confession is not substantive evidence against another accused. Under Section 30 of the Evidence Act, where persons are jointly tried for the same offence, a proved confession affecting its maker and another accused may be considered for assurance after the other evidence is assessed; it cannot be the starting point for proving the other accused's guilt. Here the alleged confession attributed to the juvenile co-accused was inconsistently reported and materially omitted from an earlier statement. Without substantive and corroborative evidence against the appellants, it could not sustain their conviction.	942
Extra-judicial confession: voluntariness, truth and reliable proof	An extra-judicial confession is weak evidence requiring careful scrutiny. It must be proved in accordance with law, made voluntarily in a fit state of mind, be truthful, clear and unambiguous, and inspire confidence. Cogent surrounding circumstances and corroborative prosecution evidence increase its reliability. Material discrepancies or inherent improbabilities may justify excluding it. The conflicting accounts of the alleged disclosure and the material omission from the witness's earlier statement failed these safeguards.	942
Reliability of an extra-judicial confession	An extra-judicial confession must be voluntary, truthful, clear and credible, and proved according to law. Its reliability depends on its circumstances, timing, recipient and freedom from material discrepancies or inherent improbability. Corroboration strengthens it, but a voluntary and truthful confession may by itself sustain conviction. Here inconsistent timing, doubtful witness conduct and the later addition of another alleged confessor made the claimed confessions unreliable.	988
Confession of a co-accused under Section 30 Evidence Act	A co-accused's confession is not substantive evidence against another accused within Section 3 of the Evidence Act. Section 30 permits the Court to consider it for assurance after examining independent evidence that appears sufficient to sustain the charge. The Court cannot begin with the confession as the foundation of the case against the other accused.	988

	Chapter no. 25 Electronic, Digital and Technological Evidence
	Sub-Chapter no. 25.1 Courtroom Playback and Judicial Appreciation of CCTV Material
Judicial appraisal of undisputed police-station CCTV footage	Police-station footage supplied under the Right to Information Act and not disputed by the respondents was accepted as authentic and examined through selected clips played in open court in counsel's presence. The recorded sequence, screams, subsequent physical incapacity and conversations about altering the complaint established custodial assault and fabricated allegations. A road video relied on by the police was likewise accepted and used against the officer whose conduct it depicted.	22
CCTV Showing a Vehicle Without Identifying Its Registration or Driver	CCTV footage of a white Bolero travelling in the wrong direction did not establish the accused's involvement where neither the registration number nor the driver was identifiable, several similar vehicles used the highway, and the alleged vehicle's owner was not asked to identify the recorded jeep. The footage therefore failed to connect the specified vehicle and driver to the offence.	375
Appellate playback of CCTV footage to resolve an identification objection	Where DVR-derived pen drives were supported by Section 65B certificates and their authenticity was not materially challenged, the appellate Bench played the disputed footage in chambers with counsel for both sides present to assess a clarity objection. It found the man's face visible beside the child. The father's identification of the accused and victim and his evidence about the location and recording time had not been challenged in cross-examination and were supported by other witnesses. An uncertain answer by the grandfather did not undermine that coherent record. Direct judicial inspection resolved this visibility dispute without dispensing with electronic-evidence authentication.	915
	Sub-Chapter no. 25.2 CCTV Coverage, Storage and Oversight in Police Stations
Audio-video CCTV coverage of every police-station room and space	Police-station CCTV coverage must leave no unmonitored room or space capable of being used for custodial abuse. The prescribed coverage of washrooms and toilets is outside, not inside. Applying the surveillance safeguards in Paramvir Singh Saini, the Court directed the DGP to obtain district reports identifying blind spots within one month and ensure audio-equipped CCTV coverage throughout police stations within the following two months. A statewide compliance report was required by 18 February 2025.	22
Police-station CCTV recording quality and preservation period	The CCTV safeguards applied by the Court require night vision and clear audio-video recording, with necessary electricity and internet support. Recording systems are to preserve footage for eighteen months. Where available equipment cannot achieve that period, the maximum available storage must be purchased, never less than one year, with review for upgrading to eighteen-month capacity as it becomes commercially available.	22
State and district oversight of police-station CCTV systems	State and district oversight committees must supervise installation, upkeep and functioning of police-station CCTV systems. District committees must interact with Station House Officers, send monthly functioning reports to the State committee and review stored footage for unreported human-rights violations. The State committee must arrange resources, inspections and prompt correction of faults reported from districts.	22
Station House Officer's responsibility for CCTV failures and data	The Station House Officer is responsible for CCTV working condition, maintenance, recording, data backup and fault rectification. Any malfunction must be reported immediately to the district oversight committee. During a failure, the officer must report arrests and interrogations conducted at the station and forward their record, so that oversight continues while repair or	22

	replacement is arranged.
Securing CCTV evidence of serious custodial injury or death	Complaints of police force resulting in serious injury or custodial death may be taken to the State Human Rights Commission or a Human Rights Court. The Commission or Court may immediately summon the relevant CCTV footage for safekeeping and make it available to the investigating agency. Police premises must display information about CCTV coverage, complaint rights and the victim's right to secure footage.	22
Police-station CCTV — functioning cameras and coverage of relevant areas	Police-station CCTV is an Article 21 safeguard against custodial abuse. Applying the reproduced directions in Paramvir Singh Saini, the Court directed immediate implementation and required functioning cameras covering every room of police stations within the Superintendent's jurisdiction. The quoted scheme covers entry and exit points, lock-ups, corridors, officers' rooms and other station areas, with cameras outside rather than inside toilets. The SHO is responsible for working condition, maintenance, recording, backup and prompt reporting of faults so that repair can be arranged.	546
Police-station CCTV — audio, night vision and minimum recording storage	The Paramvir Singh Saini directions applied by the Court require night vision and both audio and video recording. Recording systems should preserve footage for eighteen months. Where equipment with that capacity is unavailable, the maximum available storage must be purchased and must not fall below one year, with later upgrading to eighteen months when commercially available. States and Union Territories must also provide the electricity and connectivity needed for clear recordings.	546
Police-station CCTV — State and District Oversight Committees and repair accountability	Under the directions ordered to be implemented, State and District Oversight Committees must oversee CCTV installation, maintenance and compliance. The State committee includes Home, Finance and senior police representatives and the State Women's Commission chairperson or member; the district committee includes the divisional commissioner, District Magistrate, Superintendent of Police and the municipal or rural local-body head. District committees report monthly, inspect operation and review footage for unreported human-rights violations. Faults reported by the SHO require prompt escalation and repair, and arrest or interrogation records during a breakdown must be sent to the district committee.	546
Custodial abuse complaints — securing CCTV footage and notice of redress rights	The CCTV safeguards applied by the Court permit complaints about serious police-station injury or custodial death to the State Human Rights Commission and Human Rights Courts. The Commission or Court may immediately summon relevant footage for safekeeping and later investigation. Notices at police premises must explain CCTV coverage, available complaint authorities and the victim's right to have footage secured; the reproduced notice direction refers to a preservation period of at least six months.	546
	Sub-Chapter no. 25.3 Electronic Evidence Authentication, Certificate and Source Integrity
FIR quashing on alibi — CCTV with a manually entered date and time	The applicant's reliance on CCTV footage did not justify quashing the FIR on alibi where counsel conceded that the recording's date and time were manually entered and could be manipulated. The Court declined interference on that material at this stage.	311
Adverse inference from refusal to provide a voice sample	The Court drew an adverse inference from the appellant's written refusal to provide the requested voice sample and considered it with the signed transcript and trap evidence. It relied on Ritesh Sinha's recognition of a Judicial Magistrate's power to order an investigative voice sample pending express CrPC legislation. The inference formed part of the cumulative proof of demand; the judgment records no playback in court or scientific voice match and does not establish authentication merely from refusal. The Section 65-B certificate	441

	and CDs appear in the preparation narrative rather than a separate admissibility ruling.
CCTV alibi — source authenticity and forensic exhibit integrity at the summoning stage	At the Section 319 stage, a closure report based on CCTV material must be assessed for reliability against the trial evidence. Here, the home DVR was obtained without a Section 65-B certificate from the wife who supplied it; the technician's certificate addressed extraction. The timing could have been altered before seizure, and the comparison photographs lacked independent authentication. The laboratory also received a mobile instead of the pen drive listed in the forwarding memorandum. Those defects, together with the inability to identify the ATM user, undermined the claimed alibi. These were preliminary reasons for rejecting the closure report as a sufficient answer to the trial testimony, without a final finding of manipulation or guilt.	490
CCTV source integrity — prompt seizure and scrutiny of manually set recording times	Where allegations concerned a person controlling the premises and CCTV system, the police should have promptly secured the DVR instead of allowing that person to supply selected recordings at his convenience. The Court found that a delay of about one and a half months created an opportunity to manipulate the record. Because DVR dates and times can be set manually, the displayed timestamp did not by itself establish that the supplied image was an original, unaltered record of the alleged event.	546
Reliability of private-house CCTV timestamps offered as an alibi	Private-house CCTV cannot be accepted as conclusive proof of an alibi without examining its reliability. The Court noted that DVR date and time settings may be entered manually and that scenes can be recreated with altered timestamps. The footage and supporting statements relied on here were insufficient to establish that the two persons were absent from the scene. This was a finding of insufficient proof, rather than a finding that a specific alteration had been established.	606
Anticipatory bail— Reliability of an unauthenticated defence audio recording	At the anticipatory-bail stage, a defence audio recording was not relied upon where the speaker’s identity was unverified, possible doctoring had not been excluded and no laboratory testing had been carried out. The conversation also did not establish the alleged demand for settlement money. On that material, the recording did not substantiate the plea of false implication.	665
Disputed video authenticity — open-court playback followed by counsel’s concession	The accused opposed the bail-cancellation application by alleging that the accompanying CD had been forged or tampered with. The Court played it in open court in the presence of counsel for both sides. After viewing it, counsel for the accused did not dispute its contents and could identify no basis for calling it doctored. Counsel also admitted the large welcoming crowd, garlanding, slogans and procession in an open jeep. The Court then considered the videos when assessing misuse of bail liberty. Its assessment proceeded on the playback and the subsequent concessions concerning the material relied upon.	746
Refusal of a voice sample and objection to absence of scientific comparison	The Patwari refused in writing to provide a voice sample. The Court rejected her subsequent reliance on the resulting absence of scientific comparison as a reason to disown the recorded bribe conversation, holding that she could not take advantage of that refusal. Its assessment of the recording formed part of the wider evidence of demand and coordinated conduct.	879
Proof that an official order was uploaded before the alleged fabrication	The assertion that a rejection order had already been uploaded did not prove its contemporaneous existence. The relevant operator was not examined, no uploaded copy was produced and the computer record establishing the date and time was not furnished. Those omissions, with contradictory dates and other documentary defects, prevented the alleged website publication from supporting the defence's claim that the order predated the trap.	879
Recorded conversation relied	A privately recorded conversation could not be relied upon unless it was proved to be unaltered and to contain the voices of the prosecutrix and her husband.	893

on for quashing — authenticity and identification of voices	The High Court declined to accept the applicant's recording as a basis for quashing without that proof.
CCTV timestamp and proof of an alibi	CCTV footage does not by itself conclusively establish an alibi without proof in accordance with law. A DVR's date and time can be entered manually, so the displayed timestamp alone cannot establish when the recording was made. The Court's observation addressed the need for proof and did not establish that the applicant had fabricated the footage.	972
	Sub-Chapter no. 25.4 CDR, Mobile Location, IPDR and Telecom Records
Mobile-phone recovery without evidence linking the device to the offence	Recovery of ordinary used mobile phones did not by itself incriminate the accused where the prosecution did not show that the devices were used in the offence. No call-detail evidence connected Ramvilas with the other accused or established his location, and no specific criminal role was proved. The recovered phones therefore did not supply the missing link needed for his conviction.	183
Unproved alleged ransom call and missing corroborating material	The Court rejected the alleged ransom call on the combined evidentiary deficiencies: the recipient was not named or examined, no call-detail records were collected, the other abductees did not support the call, and there was no contemporaneous report or evidence of any family response to the demand. Those omissions were assessed together with the material inconsistencies in the abductees' testimony.	188
Mobile-tower location — distinction between the handset and its owner	A mobile phone's tower location does not by itself establish that its owner was physically present at the same place. Since another person may carry the handset, the applicant's asserted phone location elsewhere did not establish an alibi warranting quashing of the FIR.	311
Tower-Location Analysis Omitting the Time of the Incident	A tower-location analysis that omitted the interval covering the alleged collision did not supply the missing link between the accused and the incident. That evidentiary gap was considered with the unreliable eyewitness account and inconclusive vehicle footage in finding involvement unproved.	375
Mobile-device location does not conclusively locate its holder	The location recorded for a mobile phone does not, by itself, conclusively establish that its holder was also at that place. The device could be carried by another person. The Court therefore declined to treat the applicant's mobile location away from the scene as conclusive proof of his claimed absence.	645
Proof linking seized phones and SIM cards to alleged telephone contacts	The officers' claim that a phone and three SIM cards were recovered from Mukesh was not accepted where no seizure memorandum was prepared and the omission was unexplained. The prosecution also failed to prove the subscribers of the relevant numbers. Calls allegedly made by the other appellants to those numbers therefore did not establish contact with Mukesh and could not supply the asserted telephone link in the conspiracy case.	934

	Sub-Chapter no. 26.1 Statutory Presumptions and Foundational Facts
Section 139 NI Act presumption and alleged alteration of a postdated cheque	The presumption under Section 139 of the Negotiable Instruments Act is rebuttable. Where a complaint alleges that the holder advanced the date of a postdated security cheque and instituted Section 138 proceedings before the original date, that presumption does not by itself justify quashing the complaint alleging forgery and related offences. On the complaint's allegations, the liability associated with the cheque had not accrued when those proceedings	30 were instituted. This conclusion concerns the challenge to cognizance and does not establish that the alleged alteration was proved.

Section 114 Evidence Act — factual inference from proved circumstances and ordinary human conduct	A court may infer a fact from other proved facts by considering the ordinary course of natural events, human conduct and the circumstances of the case under Section 114 of the Evidence Act. The Tulshiram Sahadu Suryawanshi passage relied upon by the Court explains that this process can operate with Section 106 where special knowledge is involved, while preserving the prosecution's burden to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt.	138
Presumption attached to revenue entries until correction	In assessing the alleged purpose of interpolation, the Court recognised that a revenue entry carries a presumption until corrected. The applicant was a practising advocate aware of the importance of those entries. That evidentiary significance supported rejection of the argument that inserting 'Quilla' in the temple's entry could yield no advantage in the dispute with his father. The observation did not finally establish authorship of the insertion or the accused's guilt.	326
Section 20 NI Act — prima facie authority to complete an inchoate stamped instrument	Where a person signs and delivers a duly stamped paper that is blank or contains an incomplete negotiable instrument, Section 20 gives the holder prima facie authority to complete it for an amount within the stamp's coverage. The signatory is liable in that capacity to a holder in due course, while another holder cannot recover more than the amount intended to be paid. The Court applied this reasoning to the accused's admitted signature and delivery when refusing handwriting examination of the remaining cheque entries. It did not finally determine the alleged debt or reject the repayment defence.	349
Long Cohabitation: Rebuttable Presumption of Marriage	Continuous cohabitation and treatment as husband and wife for a long period may support a presumption of marriage under the Evidence Act. The presumption is rebuttable, with a heavy burden on the person disputing the relationship's legal origin. Courts must consider circumstances that weaken or displace it. The Court applied these principles to the alleged cohabitation, child and family recognition before it.	366
	Sub-Chapter no. 26.2 Reverse Burden and Accused's Rebuttal
Plea of insanity — preponderance of probabilities for the exception, continuing prosecution burden on mens rea	Under Section 105 Evidence Act, the accused must rebut the presumption that the circumstances of the Section 84 IPC exception were absent. That burden is discharged on a preponderance of probabilities through relevant oral, documentary, medical or circumstantial material, including prosecution evidence. The prosecution throughout must prove the offence and its requisite mens rea beyond reasonable doubt. Even where the exception is not fully established, the evidence may create reasonable doubt about an essential ingredient and require acquittal because the prosecution's general burden remains unmet.	77
	Sub-Chapter no. 26.3 Previous Judgments — Relevance, Conclusiveness and Civil–Criminal Interaction
Previous civil judgments — statutory relevance and conclusiveness	Where civil and criminal proceedings concern the same cause, the earlier civil judgment is relevant in the criminal case only if the requirements of Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act or another applicable evidentiary provision are satisfied. Relevance does not by itself make the judgment conclusive; the Court must determine its permissible purpose and effect, including the conclusiveness provided by Section 41. Under Section 43, other judgments are ordinarily irrelevant unless their existence is a fact in issue or is relevant under another provision.	2 criminal adjudication	by the civil court are not binding on the criminal court. The pendency of matrimonial civil proceedings did not dispose of the criminal allegations.

Independent verdicts in separate criminal trials	An acquittal in a separate trial to which the accused was not a party does not conclusively determine the merits of his case; each trial turns on its own evidence. The Court distinguished the problem of conflicting findings where, in the same trial, one person is convicted under Section 34 IPC solely for acting jointly with persons acquitted of that joint act.	231
Reopening the settled public character of a lane	A party against whom the lane's public character was finally determined in its own civil suit could not reopen that finding in the later nuisance proceedings without claiming that a different lane was involved or that ownership had subsequently been acquired through a lease or sale deed. Neither basis was asserted here.	237
Relevance and conclusiveness of a previous civil judgment in a criminal case	A previous final judgment may be relied upon in a criminal proceeding to the extent permitted by Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, 1872. Its relevance and its binding or conclusive effect must be examined separately in the particular case. A civil judgment is not generally conclusive in the criminal case merely because both concern the same cause; Section 41 governs the judgments made conclusive by that provision. Other judgments remain subject to Section 43 and any other applicable rule of relevance.	500
Relevance and conclusiveness of previous judgments under Sections 40–43 Evidence Act	A previous judgment may be relied upon only to the extent permitted by Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act or another applicable provision. A civil judgment concerning the same cause is relevant in criminal proceedings only when the statutory conditions are met and is not necessarily conclusive; Section 41 specifies judgments having conclusive effect. Judgments outside Sections 40–42 are generally irrelevant under Section 43 unless their existence is itself in issue or is otherwise relevant. The court must determine both relevance and the extent of binding or conclusive effect in the particular case.	844
Civil and criminal findings: independent proof and statutory relevance of earlier judgments	Civil proceedings turn on a preponderance of probabilities, while the prosecution must prove a criminal charge beyond reasonable doubt. Each proceeding is decided on its own evidence, and findings in one do not automatically bind the other. A previous judgment may nevertheless be relevant under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, and its binding or conclusive effect must be assessed under the applicable provision, including the conclusiveness specified in Section 41.	861
Previous judgments — Relevance and effect under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act	Where civil and criminal proceedings concern the same cause, a previous civil judgment may be relevant if the conditions of Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act are satisfied. Relevance and conclusive effect must be assessed separately. Section 41 specifies the judgments and matters having conclusive effect. In other cases, the permissible effect depends on the applicable provision and the circumstances, and may be limited to a purpose such as motive or a fact in issue. Under Section 43, judgments outside Sections 40–42 are irrelevant unless their existence is itself a fact in issue or is relevant under another provision of the Act.	940
Civil and criminal findings — absence of reciprocal binding effect	Findings recorded by a civil court do not bind the criminal court, and findings of the criminal court do not bind the civil court. In rejecting the attempt to quash the matrimonial FIR on the strength of pending divorce proceedings, the Court expressly reaffirmed the independence of the two adjudications.	991

Sexual Offences, Cruelty and Matrimonial Offence Families

Sub-Chapter no. 27.1
Cruelty, Dowry Demand and Matrimonial Harassment

Section 498A IPC — continuing mental cruelty after dowry-linked expulsion	Compelling a married woman to remain at her parental home because a dowry demand has not been met amounts to mental cruelty. The mental trauma and psychological distress caused by expulsion from the matrimonial home may continue at the parental home even though no further physical assault occurs there. On the allegations before it, the Court treated the cruelty as continuing when refusing to quash the FIR.	2
Section 498A IPC — statutory forms of cruelty	Cruelty under Section 498A IPC includes wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. It also includes harassment intended to coerce her or a person related to her to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment because that demand has not been met.	2
Matrimonial cruelty — specific allegations against a sister-in-law	The requirement of specific and clear allegations against a husband's relatives applies to a sister-in-law. Where the FIR attributes to her an identified incident of abusive conduct and assault on the complainant in the presence of visiting family members, those allegations cannot be dismissed as merely vague or omnibus because of her relationship to the husband. The Court found a prima facie case warranting her prosecution.	6
Husband's relatives — individual involvement required in matrimonial accusations	A husband's relationship with an accused does not by itself establish that relative's involvement in dowry demand or harassment. Omnibus naming must be assessed for specific acts, roles and supporting material. Allegations against relatives living elsewhere and rarely or never visiting the matrimonial home require careful scrutiny. Merely reciting offence provisions or their language does not supply the particulars of each accused's alleged conduct.	14
Cruelty and dowry prosecution — specific allegations against each in-law	A plea of omnibus implication must be tested against the conduct attributed to each relative. The account alleged demands for flat-purchase money and abuse by one brother-in-law, deliberate exposure and insults by the other, compelled withdrawal of ₹3 lakh by the father-in-law, and taunts, demands and burning of the wife's hand by the mother-in-law. These specific roles disclosed triable allegations under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The caution against indiscriminate implication of relatives did not justify quashing on this record; truth and guilt remained matters for trial.	18
Section 498-A IPC — alleged deliberate exposure before the wife as cruelty	The allegation that a brother-in-law habitually removed his clothes in front of the complainant was a specific allegation of conduct capable of amounting to cruelty. At the quashing stage, the Court rejected the contention that the accusation against him was merely vague or based only on his relationship with the husband.	18
Household disagreements and the statutory threshold of cruelty	Section 498-A IPC requires wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health, or harassment to coerce an unlawful demand for property or valuable security or because such a demand was not met. General objections by a mother-in-law to household work did not meet that threshold on the allegations before the Court. The FIR did not attribute dowry demands or harassment for their fulfilment to her.	24
Mother-in-law's non-intervention in	A mother-in-law's decision to stay away from the personal disputes of the husband and wife did not amount to cruelty on the facts. The allegation that she	24

the couple's personal disputes	failed to persuade her son when his conduct was reported to her, coupled with general taunts, did not allege dowry-related harassment or establish the statutory cruelty complained of.
Bare allegation of deprivation of a mother-in-law's love and affection	A bare allegation that the complainant was deprived of her mother-in-law's love and affection did not constitute cruelty in the circumstances. Such deprivation may become significant when considered with other circumstances, but the assertion in this case did not meet the statutory requirement.	24
Threatened remarriage during a subsisting marriage as mental cruelty	The legal invalidity of a second marriage during the first marriage's subsistence did not remove its potential mental impact on the first wife, who had allegedly been expelled from the matrimonial home for dowry-related cruelty. The allegation that the husband intended to remarry formed part of the prima facie cruelty case under Section 498-A IPC. His denial of that intention was a defence requiring evidence and could not be resolved on the quashing application.	29
Failure to seek restitution or divorce does not establish acceptance of separation	A wife's failure to institute restitution-of-conjugal-rights or divorce proceedings did not show that she was content to remain at her parental home. Silence in the hope that relations would improve could reflect an effort to preserve the marriage. Delay in making a criminal complaint while reconciliation was being attempted did not, by itself, justify an adverse inference against her.	29
Continuing mental cruelty after exclusion from the matrimonial home	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC may be mental as well as physical. After a wife is ousted, physical cruelty may cease while mental cruelty continues. Disowning her on account of an unfulfilled dowry demand, or refusing her return with threats, may disclose such cruelty. The allegations and the applicants' own messages supported continuation of the prosecution here; the Court did not finally determine guilt.	39
General allegations against a sister-in-law in a matrimonial prosecution	A sister-in-law cannot be required to face a matrimonial prosecution merely because she is named with other family members in general allegations of scolding. Clear allegations of her own role are necessary. Applying the principles reproduced from Taramani Parakh, Kans Raj, Monju Roy and Chandralekha, and the principles invoked from Geeta Mehrotra and Preeti Gupta, the Court found no specific allegation against the sister-in-law beyond collective scolding and quashed the FIR and prosecution against her. The specific allegations against the husband and parents-in-law remained triable.	40
Cruelty by a mother-in-law towards her daughter-in-law	In assessing allegations of matrimonial cruelty, the Court applied Meera to emphasise that a mother-in-law is expected to protect her daughter-in-law. Cruelty inflicted by a woman on her daughter-in-law was treated as especially serious and deserving of no leniency. This principle supported refusal to quash the specific allegations against the mother-in-law; it did not determine her guilt before trial.	40
Specific dowry demand, beatings and ouster — plea of omnibus allegations	Allegations of a specified additional dowry demand, beatings for its non-fulfilment, and ouster from the matrimonial home with return made conditional on payment are specific allegations rather than merely general or omnibus accusations. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court declined to quash the proceedings against the husband and mother-in-law under Section 85 BNS and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Whether the alleged harassment actually occurred remained a matter for trial.	53
Taunts about inadequate dowry — prima facie matrimonial cruelty	Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court treated taunts for bringing insufficient dowry as sufficient prima facie to warrant prosecution for cruelty under Section 498A IPC. In the Section 85 BNS proceedings before it, the allegations went further and included a specified demand, beatings and exclusion from the matrimonial home. The assessment concerned whether prosecution could continue, not whether cruelty had been proved.	53
Married relatives — unspecified mental	An allegation that married relatives living in other cities mentally harassed the	56

harassment during occasional visits	wife over dowry during occasional visits was too general to require them to face trial when neither the manner nor the timing of the alleged cruelty was stated. Applying the cited Supreme Court principles requiring specific involvement of relatives, the Court found the allegations against these applicants insufficient to sustain their prosecution.
Relatives living elsewhere — scrutiny of alleged involvement in matrimonial cruelty	The Supreme Court principles relied upon require particular care when allegations concern the husband's relatives who live in different cities and never or rarely visit the matrimonial home. Omnibus accusations against relatives do not establish their individual involvement. Specific roles or instances supported by material are required; a casual reference to a family member's name, without an allegation of active involvement, does not justify taking cognizance against that person.	56
Married sister-in-law — sufficiency of the alleged role in dowry harassment	On this FIR and the Section 161 CrPC statement, the Court found the allegation against the married sister-in-law insufficient for prosecution under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Her attributed role was a telephone endorsement of the husband's demands, with a threat not to allow the wife to live with him, and no further act of interference or harassment was alleged. Applying the requirement of specific and direct allegations against relatives, the Court quashed the proceedings against her.	69
Section 498-A IPC — dowry-linked expulsion and continuing mental suffering at the parental home constitute cruelty	Compelling a married woman to live at her parental home because a dowry demand remains unmet amounts to cruelty. Section 498-A IPC encompasses mental as well as physical suffering: trauma caused by abuse or expulsion from the matrimonial home may continue where the wife takes shelter, even without further physical assaults there. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court declined to quash the FIR containing specific allegations against the applicants.	76
Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC independent of a dowry demand	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC is not confined to harassment for non-fulfilment of a dowry demand. It also includes wilful conduct of a nature likely to drive the woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or physical or mental health. A dowry demand is therefore not essential to every form of statutory cruelty. In any event, the FIR also contained specific allegations of dowry demands, so the Court rejected the contention that the offence's ingredients were absent.	84
Cruelty complaint after divorce proceedings and attempts at reconciliation	A cruelty complaint cannot be treated as a counterblast merely because it follows the husband's divorce proceedings. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, the Court held that efforts to preserve the marriage and seek reconciliation may explain the wife's delay in complaining. Filing a civil divorce petition does not terminate independent criminal proceedings arising from the same facts. The specific cruelty and dowry allegations were therefore left for trial, without determining their truth at the charge stage.	101
Section 498A IPC — Cruelty without a dowry demand	A dowry demand is not essential to cruelty under Section 498A IPC. Explanation (a) covers wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health; Explanation (b) separately covers harassment connected with an unlawful demand for property or valuable security. Specific allegations of unwanted unnatural sexual acts, followed by assault and physical cruelty when the wife resisted, made out an offence under Section 498A at the quashing stage even without an alleged dowry demand.	113
Alleged falsity of a cruelty complaint — Determination in the underlying trial	Whether the wife's cruelty and dowry allegations were true was for the trial court to determine after recording evidence. The accused in that prosecution could cross-examine the complainant and her witnesses to challenge her account. The husband's belief that he had been falsely implicated did not by itself turn the wife's resort to a lawful complaint into abetment of his suicide.	114
Section 498A IPC —	Section 498A IPC covers both wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide	119

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Cruelty does not require a dowry demand in every case	or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health, and harassment connected with an unlawful property demand. A dowry demand is therefore not essential in every cruelty case. The allegations of beating, confinement, degrading treatment, abandonment at a public place and continued exclusion from the matrimonial home disclosed a prima facie case under the non-dowry branch.
Continued mental cruelty after ouster — Objection to delay in the FIR	Applying Rupali Devi, the Court distinguished the end of physical cruelty after ouster from continuing mental cruelty caused by compelling the wife to remain at her parental home without reasonable cause. It treated the alleged failure to take her back for three years as giving a fresh cause each day. On that basis it rejected both the delay objection and the contention that the allegations disclosed no Section 498A offence.	119
Separation of mother and minor child in the prima facie cruelty assessment	In assessing the cruelty allegations, the Court noted that the wife had been expelled while the applicants retained her minor child without an order from a competent custody court. It treated this as forcible separation of the child from her mother, whom it described as a natural guardian. The husband's refusal to continue reconciliation was also considered with the allegations when finding a prima facie case requiring trial.	119
Distant relatives in matrimonial prosecutions — Specific role and supporting material	The Taramani Parakh passage applied by the Court cautions against summoning distant relatives merely because they are named in a matrimonial complaint. A specific role and tangible supporting material are required; remote relationship alone does not justify involvement. That safeguard differs from a complaint containing triable allegations against the husband and close family members, whose truth must be examined at trial.	119
Continuing cruelty through dowry-related exclusion from the matrimonial home	Compelling a married woman to remain at her parental home because a dowry demand is unfulfilled amounts to cruelty. Mental distress caused by physical cruelty or abusive and humiliating conduct may persist there even after overt acts at the matrimonial home cease. On the allegations of continuing harassment and dowry-related exclusion, the Court rejected delay calculated merely from the date of marriage.	121
Proof of cruelty through motorcycle demands and related harassment	Evidence that the husband and father-in-law demanded a motorcycle and harassed the wife for non-fulfilment supported their conviction under Section 498-A IPC. The Court accepted the consistent core of the demand evidence, including the father's direct account of a demand made to him, despite minor omissions in the witnesses' accounts.	122
Distinct offences of cruelty and dowry death	Sections 498-A and 304-B IPC create distinct offences despite sharing cruelty as an element. Cruelty itself is punishable under Section 498-A, whereas Section 304-B punishes dowry death and requires death within seven years of marriage. Section 498-A has no corresponding seven-year limit. Where both offences are established, conviction under both is permissible.	122
Section 498-A cruelty is not confined to dowry-related harassment	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC is not limited to harassment connected with an unlawful property demand. Explanation (a) separately covers wilful conduct of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. Absence of a dowry demand by the particular relative therefore does not, by itself, defeat a case falling within that limb.	125
Character accusations and threats as prima facie matrimonial cruelty	Specific accusations that a woman was pregnant through her own brother, accompanied by alleged assault, repeated threats to kill her and her daughter, and demands for a DNA test, disclosed a prima facie case of cruelty under Section 498-A IPC. In that setting, the Court treated attacks on her character as cruelty rather than requiring a separate dowry demand by the sister-in-law.	125
Specific dowry-cruelty allegations	Brief residence in the matrimonial home did not make the accusations against	148

against close relatives despite brief cohabitation	the husband, mother-in-law, younger brother-in-law and unmarried sister-in-law non-specific. The allegations described harassment over a ₹2,00,000 demand and inadequate dowry articles, with a particular assault and threat by the husband. Read with the witness statements and Section 498A IPC, those accusations could not be quashed as mere general naming of relatives.
Section 498A IPC: wilful harmful conduct and unlawful-demand harassment	Cruelty under Section 498A IPC includes wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. It also includes harassment intended to coerce her or a related person to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment because that demand has not been met.	148
Distant relatives in dowry cases: specific role and supporting material	Mere naming of a distant relative, without a specific role and tangible supporting material, is insufficient to justify summoning that person in a dowry case. Courts must guard against indiscriminate implication of relatives. Where specific allegations disclose a triable cruelty case, however, their truth must be tested at trial rather than rejected at the threshold.	148
Continuing mental cruelty after separation	Physical cruelty may cease after a wife leaves the matrimonial home, while the mental trauma caused by that cruelty continues at her parental home. Compelling her to remain there because of cruelty can constitute continuing mental cruelty. Applying Rupali Devi and Amar Singh, the Court treated the alleged continuing exclusion and trauma as defeating the objection that the FIR was delayed.	163
Inability to conceive and cruelty by in-laws	A married woman’s inability to conceive does not entitle her in-laws to subject her to cruelty. The specific allegations of cruelty against the applicants required the prosecution to continue rather than be quashed.	163
Specific allegations required to prosecute the husband's relatives for cruelty	The risk of false implication of the husband's relatives requires scrutiny of whether the allegations are specific rather than vague or omnibus; it does not create an absolute bar to their prosecution under Section 498A IPC. Specific allegations of joint cruelty, assault and expulsion from the matrimonial home justified continuation of the investigation against the cousin brother-in-law. The trial must be decided on its evidence without prejudice from the quashing order.	171
Separate residence and a relative's ability to interfere in matrimonial affairs	A separate house nearby does not necessarily establish that a relative could not interfere in the complainant's day-to-day family affairs. The Court assessed separate living by reference to that practical ability and held that residence 30 kilometres away did not make the specific accusations impossible. Whether the applicant visited the household was a disputed defence that could not be decided under Section 482 CrPC.	171
Specific dowry demands despite absence on another alleged occasion	Relatives’ absence abroad on an alleged occasion did not justify quashing where the FIR separately attributed dowry demands to them during identified periods when they were in India. The allegations of pressure for ₹10 lakh and a car during those later periods were sufficiently specific to require trial.	192
Specific allegations against the husband’s relatives	The husband’s relatives should not be required to face trial on vague and omnibus allegations alone. The complaint must identify their role in the alleged offence. Allegations against relatives living elsewhere require careful scrutiny, and merely naming distant relatives without specific supporting material is insufficient.	192
Dowry demand is not indispensable to every form of Section 498-A cruelty	A dowry demand is not indispensable to a prima facie offence under Section 498-A IPC where the alleged cruelty by the husband or his relatives is of a nature likely to drive the woman to suicide or endanger her body.	193
Different descriptions of dowry demands in	A discrepancy between the vehicle allegedly demanded in a divorce petition and the vehicle described in the FIR did not justify quashing where specific allegations independently disclosed cruelty under Section 498-A IPC. Dowry	193

divorce pleadings and the FIR	demand was not essential to the form of cruelty considered by the Court.
Omission of accusations from a mutual-consent divorce petition	A mutual-consent divorce petition may omit accusations because the parties have chosen not to make allegations against each other. That omission does not by itself establish that cruelty allegations subsequently made in an FIR are false.	193
Specific cruelty allegations against the husband and mother-in-law	Specific allegations of physical and mental harassment over the wife's inability to conceive after her children's deaths, a demand of ₹50,000 and expulsion for non-payment disclosed a prima facie case against the husband and mother-in-law. The husband had no right to subject his wife to cruelty because she could not conceive; whether the alleged harassment occurred was for trial.	235
Continuing mental cruelty after expulsion for dowry	Driving a married woman from the matrimonial home for non-fulfilment of dowry demands and compelling her to remain at her parental home amounts to continuing cruelty under Section 498-A IPC. The resulting mental trauma may persist there even when no further physical assault occurs at that place.	235
Wilful conduct endangering a woman's mental or physical health	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC includes wilful conduct of such a nature as is likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or health, whether mental or physical. The Court assessed the pleaded harassment concerning inability to conceive within that statutory conception of cruelty.	235
Specific dowry demands and cruelty allegations at the quashing stage	Allegations that the husband and relatives demanded an additional ₹5 lakh and a car, abused the wife and subjected her to physical and mental cruelty were held clear and specific enough to sustain prosecution. The Court declined to quash the FIR under Section 482 CrPC; its assessment was prima facie and did not determine guilt.	236
Specific cruelty allegations against husband and parents-in-law	Where the allegations attribute specific acts of cruelty to the husband and parents-in-law, their truth must be tested at trial rather than resolved by comparing rival versions in a quashing petition. Allegations of dowry demands, assault, forced administration of pills, confinement and delay in obtaining treatment provided a basis for continuing prosecution in this case. They were not treated as a final finding of guilt.	249
Statutory forms of cruelty under Section 498-A IPC	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC includes wilful conduct of a nature likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. It also includes harassment intended to coerce her or a related person to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment because such a demand has not been met. The provision is therefore not confined to physical injury or to a completed suicide.	249
Section 498A IPC: mental cruelty after forced departure from the matrimonial home	Cruelty may include the continuing mental trauma caused when a wife is driven from the matrimonial home and compelled to take shelter with her parents. Physical abuse need not continue at the parental home for its psychological effects to persist. Allegations of dowry demands, assault, deprivation and coercive exclusion were sufficient to resist quashing on their face; their truth remained for determination in the proceedings.	286
Section 498A IPC: unlawful demand for a fixed deposit in the child's name	Cruelty under Explanation (b) to Section 498A IPC includes harassment to coerce a woman or her relatives to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or because they fail to meet it. It is not confined to a demand technically constituting dowry. The alleged coercion to obtain a ₹5 lakh fixed deposit in the baby daughter's name, coupled with harassment and exclusion from the matrimonial home, disclosed a prima facie Section 498A case.	289
Earlier apprehension of a false FIR and specific cruelty	An earlier application to police expressing apprehension of false implication does not, by itself, prima facie falsify a later FIR containing specific allegations of cruelty. The Court rejected that basis for quashing where the complaint alleged dowry-related cruelty and expulsion from the matrimonial home. The	323 allegations	applicant's defences required proof during trial.

Mother-in-law's protective role and cruelty to a daughter-in-law	Relying on Meera v. State, the Court observed that a mother-in-law is expected to protect her daughter-in-law and that cruelty by one woman towards another in that relationship is a serious matter calling for no leniency. The observation supported refusal to quash specific allegations of cruelty. It did not amount to a finding of guilt or a sentencing decision against the applicant.	323
Section 498-A IPC — continuing mental cruelty at the parental home	Mental cruelty may persist after a wife leaves the matrimonial home because of physical cruelty or abusive and humiliating treatment. The resulting trauma and distress may continue at her parental home even without a fresh physical act there. Applying Rupali Devi, and referring to Amar Singh on compelling a married woman to live with her parents, the Court found the allegations of dowry demands, harassment and expulsion sufficient for the case to proceed. It did not decide their truth or a separate territorial-jurisdiction dispute.	325
Written reconciliation assurances as evidence of earlier cruelty	The husband's written undertaking to provide proper treatment, food, clothing and freedom to visit family, considered with the relatives' testimony, supported the finding of earlier cruelty and the circumstances in which the wife returned to the matrimonial home. The agreement did not expressly recite the alleged dowry demand or every act of cruelty, and the Court did not treat it as a direct admission of each allegation. His Section 313 response about execution was evasive, but he did not dispute his signature. The Court found that the mistreatment continued despite the assurances.	328
Section 498A IPC — Denial of food and exclusion from the matrimonial home for dowry	Withholding food and water from a married woman because a dowry demand remains unmet amounts to physical and mental harassment. Compelling her to remain at her parents' home for that reason also amounts to mental harassment within Section 498A IPC. The FIR alleged concealment of food, keeping the wife hungry and thirsty, and excluding her from the matrimonial home for failure to bring an air-conditioned car. Taken at face value, those allegations disclosed a case requiring trial; their truth was not determined in the quashing proceeding.	355
Matrimonial cruelty — False allegation of adultery	An allegation of adultery against the wife, if found to be false, itself amounts to cruelty. The Court stated this conditionally in considering the strained relationship; it did not find in the quashing proceeding that the accusation was false.	355
Section 498-A IPC: Continuing Mental Cruelty at the Parental Home	Cruelty is not confined to physical acts at the matrimonial home. Where a wife is driven out by cruelty and cannot return for fear of further ill-treatment, the resulting mental trauma and psychological distress may continue while she shelters at her parental home. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court treated the alleged compelled residence as continuing cruelty despite the absence of fresh physical acts there.	363
Section 498-A IPC: Relationship by Marriage Inferred from Cohabitation	For the purpose of refusing quashing, the Court treated the applicant as related by marriage to the deceased's husband. It relied on his alleged long cohabitation with the husband's divorced sister, their two-year-old child, residence in the family home and the family's acceptance of the relationship. Those circumstances supported the marriage inference applied to the relationship requirement.	366
Section 498-A IPC: Dowry Demand Is Not Essential to Wilful Cruelty	A dowry demand is not essential to cruelty falling within Explanation (a) to Section 498-A IPC. Wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health may constitute cruelty independently of such a demand. The Court found the alleged assaults and deliberate harassment through disruption of basic amenities sufficient to allow prosecution.	366
Section 498-A IPC: Meaning of Relative	Section 498-A IPC applies to the husband or his relative. As a penal provision,	366

of the Husband	the expression must be construed strictly in its ordinary sense and encompasses relationships by blood, marriage or adoption. The Court therefore examined whether the applicant, who was not a blood relative, could be regarded as related by marriage.
Continuing Mental Cruelty at the Parental Home under Section 498-A IPC	Section 498-A IPC encompasses mental as well as physical cruelty. When dowry-related cruelty drives a wife from the matrimonial home, the resulting trauma may continue at her parental home although physical ill-treatment there has ceased. On her allegation that she resided at Kareli, the continuing mental cruelty supported local investigative jurisdiction; the recorded transfer of money from Kareli supplied an additional territorial connection.	401
Dowry-Related Ouster and Continuing Mental Cruelty at the Parental Home	Compelling a married woman to remain at her parental home because a dowry demand has not been met amounts to cruelty. Section 498-A IPC includes mental cruelty: trauma from physical abuse, humiliating exchanges and exclusion from the matrimonial home may persist at the parental home even without a fresh overt act of physical violence there.	404
Instantaneous and Irrevocable Effect Governs the Statutory Meaning of Talaq	Section 2(c) of the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Marriage) Act, 2019 covers talaq-e-biddat and any similar form having the effect of an instantaneous and irrevocable divorce pronounced by a Muslim husband. Calling a notice talaq-e-bain does not remove it from that definition where its asserted character is instantaneous and irrevocable. On the notice and allegations before it, the Court refused quashing at the threshold.	407
Recurring Cruelty Allegations after Earlier Reconciliation and Compromise	Earlier complaints and a compromise entered into in an effort to preserve the marriage did not defeat later, detailed allegations of continuing matrimonial cruelty. Where the wife specified renewed harassment and assaults after reconciliation, the Court declined to resolve their truth through a mini-trial or to quash the prosecution on the basis of the earlier settlement.	407
Continuing mental cruelty after dowry-related separation	Compelling a wife to live separately because a dowry demand remains unmet can amount to cruelty. The mental trauma of cruelty that drove her from the matrimonial home may continue at her parental home even without fresh physical violence there. On the allegations in this FIR, cruelty was continuing and delay did not justify quashing.	411
Absence of individual dates in allegations covering a short marital period	The absence of individual dates did not make the cruelty allegations vague or omnibus where the alleged conduct occurred within an identified period of approximately three and a half months and specific acts were attributed to the applicants.	411
Specific allegations of dowry demand and assault require trial against husband and mother-in-law	Where specific allegations of dowry-related harassment disclose a triable case, their truth cannot be decided in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court refused to quash proceedings against the mother-in-law, who was specifically accused of beating and dowry-related taunts. Prosecution also continued against the husband on allegations that he demanded ₹10 lakh, assaulted and harassed his wife, and ousted her from the matrimonial home.	420
Continuing mental cruelty after dowry-related ouster and limitation	Compelling a wife to remain at her parental home after ousting her from the matrimonial home for insufficient dowry can amount to continuing mental cruelty under Section 498-A IPC, although physical assaults have ceased. Applying Rupali Devi and Amar Singh, the Court held that the resulting mental trauma continued at the parental home and gave a fresh cause of action each day. On those allegations, it rejected the limitation ground for quashing the FIR.	420
Specific Dowry-Demand and Assault Allegations Against a Mother-in-Law	Caution against vague and omnibus accusations against matrimonial relatives does not justify quashing where specific acts disclose a triable case. The allegations attributed demands for a car, physical assault and ill-treatment for non-fulfilment to the mother-in-law herself. Applying Taramani Parakh, the	456

	Court held that these allegations warranted trial and refused to quash the FIR.
Continuing Mental Cruelty After Dowry-Linked Expulsion	Compelling a married woman to remain at her parental home because a dowry demand is unfulfilled can amount to continuing cruelty. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court recognised that mental trauma and distress resulting from expulsion may persist even where physical abuse does not recur at the parental home. It treated the alleged cruelty as continuing for the purpose of the quashing application.	458
Specific allegations of dowry demands and cruelty against the mother-in-law	Specific allegations that the mother-in-law demanded a car or two bigha of land, restricted the wife's contact with her parents and participated in abuse, assaults and threats disclosed a prima facie case for prosecution. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court refused to quash the FIR under Section 498-A and the associated provisions. The assessment concerned the sufficiency of the allegations, without determining their truth at trial.	460
Continuing mental cruelty after separation from the matrimonial home	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC may be physical or mental. When dowry demands compel a wife to remain in her parental home, the mental trauma of the earlier abuse and exclusion may continue despite the cessation of physical assaults. Applying Rupali Devi and the narrated Amar Singh principle, the Court found that allegations of continuing harassment and imputations maintained a prima facie case of mental cruelty notwithstanding a year of separation.	463
Triable allegations of dowry cruelty against the husband and his parents	Matrimonial allegations against relatives require caution where they are merely omnibus, particularly if the relatives are not generally concerned with the couple's affairs. That caution creates no inflexible exemption from prosecution. Here, allegations of joint dowry demands, abuse, assault and a renewed demand at the parental home disclosed a triable case against the husband and his parents. Their truth and the accused's participation were matters for trial.	469
Matrimonial relatives — Specific cruelty allegations versus omnibus accusations	Courts must be cautious about vague or omnibus matrimonial allegations against relatives unconnected with the couple's affairs. That caution does not warrant quashing where specific allegations disclose a triable case. Alleged repeated dowry taunts, demands for money and a car, harassment, threats and expulsion were treated as specific accusations against these applicants. The Court also relied on Meera's observation that cruelty by a mother-in-law towards her daughter-in-law is more serious and deserves no leniency. These were threshold observations; guilt and punishment were not adjudicated.	476
Section 498-A IPC — brief residence does not discredit proved dowry cruelty	A wife is not legally required to remain in the matrimonial home despite ill-treatment. Her departure after a total stay of 30–35 days did not by itself make her evidence of repeated dowry demands and cruelty unreliable. The Court accepted her account of ill-treatment on each visit, supported by her brother and father, and noted that the defence had not suggested any effort to bring her back or obtain restitution of conjugal rights. Those omissions formed part of the credibility assessment on this record.	487
Cruelty allegations against relatives — specific and clear accusations	Near relatives of the husband cannot be required to face trial merely on vague allegations; the accusations must be specific and clear. Applying the authorities discussed in the judgment, including Taramani Parakh, the Court found specific allegations that applicants 1 and 2 took ₹10 lakh from the complainant's parents as a loan and subjected her to cruelty when repayment was sought, together with particular allegations of dowry harassment against applicants 2–4 and exclusion from the matrimonial home. These allegations disclosed a prima facie case. Whether the alleged harassment actually occurred was a matter for trial.	495
Section 498-A IPC — continuing mental cruelty after leaving the matrimonial	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC includes mental suffering caused by physical abuse or humiliating verbal conduct that forces a wife to leave the matrimonial home. Applying the passage from Rupali Devi, the Court recognised that the resulting trauma and fear of returning may persist at the parental home even	495

home	without a fresh act of physical cruelty there. It also relied on Amar Singh for the proposition that compelling a married woman to live in her parental home amounts to cruelty. These principles were applied to the allegations of exclusion and harassment at the quashing stage, without a final finding that those allegations were proved.
Compelled residence with parents following an unmet dowry demand	Compelling a married woman to live in her parental home because a dowry demand has not been met amounts to mental cruelty. Specific allegations that the applicants demanded a Fortuner and twenty tolas of gold and forcibly expelled her from the matrimonial home disclosed an offence at the quashing stage. The Court refused interference without determining the truth of the allegations or the applicants' guilt.	500
Wife's ownership of stridhan when leaving the matrimonial home	Stridhan belongs to the wife. Her taking it with her when leaving the matrimonial home cannot by itself furnish a ground of complaint against her or defeat her allegation of matrimonial cruelty. The Court rejected the applicants' reliance on her removal of stridhan as a reason to quash the FIR.	500
Section 482 review — specific dowry-harassment allegations against the husband's close relatives	A husband's close relatives may be prosecuted where clear and specific allegations identify their involvement. The Court found specific allegations against the parents-in-law of an additional demand of ₹25 lakh, harassment for non-fulfilment and expulsion from the matrimonial home. Relying on Taramani Parakh in the context of the alleged dowry-demand taunts and maltreatment, it declined to quash the FIR under Sections 498A, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act.	549
Insufficient proof of matrimonial cruelty and dowry harassment	General allegations of a demand for money and gold did not establish cruelty beyond reasonable doubt where the witnesses failed to identify reliably when the demands or maltreatment occurred and the surrounding evidence did not inspire confidence. The Court independently examined cruelty after rejecting the dowry-death charge and found the Section 498A IPC charge unproved.	576
Wife's alleged illness as a ground for cruelty or expulsion from the matrimonial home	A married woman's illness, even if incurable, does not justify subjecting her to cruelty or expelling her from the matrimonial home. The allegation that psoriasis had been concealed before marriage did not warrant quashing the FIR alleging dowry demand, assault and expulsion. The Court's assessment concerned whether the proceedings should continue, rather than final proof of the allegations.	589
Continuing mental cruelty after dowry-related expulsion to the parental home	Mental trauma and psychological distress caused by physical cruelty or humiliating treatment may persist after the wife takes shelter at her parental home, even if no further physical act occurs there. The Court adopted the reproduced Rupali Devi passage and its earlier ruling that compelling a woman to live with her parents because of a dowry demand is itself cruelty. The alleged assault, dowry-related expulsion and resulting separation were therefore relevant to assessing the cruelty allegation.	589
Statutory forms of cruelty under Section 498-A IPC	Cruelty includes wilful conduct of such a nature as is likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. It also includes harassment intended to coerce her or a related person to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment because that demand has not been met. The Court assessed the alleged demand, beating and expulsion against these statutory forms.	589
Cruelty from compelled residence in the parental home	Compelling a married woman to remain in her parental home because a dowry demand has not been fulfilled also amounts to cruelty. The High Court applied the principle narrated from Rupali Devi while considering the allegations of dowry harassment in its review of anticipatory bail.	590

protect the husband	Sharma as expressly confined to those relatives and their position. The husband faced clear and specific allegations of dowry demands and physical and mental harassment, which were prima facie sufficient to permit prosecution under Sections 498-A/34 IPC and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act.
Specific allegations required to prosecute relatives for matrimonial cruelty	Near relatives of a husband should not be compelled to face a matrimonial-cruelty trial on ambiguous and general allegations. The allegations against them must be clear and specific. In distinguishing the husband's case, the Court applied this requirement to explain why the Supreme Court had assessed the relatives' position separately and why its quashing order did not govern the husband's specific alleged conduct.	601
Omnibus cruelty allegations against separately residing relatives	Relatives of the husband cannot be compelled to face trial for matrimonial cruelty on vague and omnibus allegations without specific instances of their involvement. The complaint must identify the alleged acts and role of each accused; merely naming relatives or repeating statutory language is insufficient. Applying these principles, the Court discharged the elder brother-in-law and four other relatives residing separately, finding no specific allegations against them. The alleged publication of false news was attributed to the husband, and the Court found no motive for these relatives to demand the complainant's salary.	619
Separate-residence plea in a dowry-cruelty anticipatory-bail application	Documents issued before the deceased's marriage did not establish the mother-in-law's separate residence during the alleged harassment. The Panchayat certificate required proof at trial. Her husband's account placed her in the matrimonial home when the death was discovered, and the deceased's earlier written complaint specifically accused her of harassment. The separate-residence plea was therefore not accepted for anticipatory bail.	665
Specific accusations and a plea of indiscriminate implication of relatives	The Court rejected the plea of indiscriminate implication where the allegations of dowry harassment and beating were directed against the mother-in-law and husband, while the mother-in-law's husband and other children were not accused. The specific lifetime complaint was material to that assessment. The Court also relied on Taramani Parakh's recognition that alleged torture by in-law taunts cannot simply be treated as disclosing no case.	665
Specific allegations of exclusion, infertility taunts and threats — cruelty FIR not quashed	In an application under Section 528 BNSS, specific allegations that the parents-in-law excluded the complainant from her matrimonial home, abused her for inability to conceive, threatened their son's remarriage and threatened to burn her justified refusal to quash the FIR. The Court applied Rupali Devi v. State of U.P. for the mental cruelty suffered when a woman is compelled to leave her matrimonial home because of dowry demands or cruelty. It assessed whether the allegations warranted interference at the threshold; it did not determine their truth at trial.	671
Seeking restitution of conjugal rights does not make cruelty allegations inherently false	A married woman may wish to preserve her marriage and seek restitution of conjugal rights despite alleging cruelty. Her unwillingness to divorce and her application under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act do not, by themselves, establish that the allegations in her FIR are false. The Court rejected the proposed inference from the restitution application and considered the specific allegations of abuse, exclusion and threats when deciding whether to quash the criminal case.	671
Dowry-related expulsion and continuing mental cruelty at the parental home	Mental trauma from dowry-related physical cruelty, humiliation and expulsion from the matrimonial home may continue after the wife takes shelter with her parents, even though physical assaults do not occur there. Compelling her to remain at the parental home until a dowry demand is fulfilled amounts to a continuing act of cruelty. The Court applied that principle to the specific allegations of demands, ouster and refusal to permit her return.	687 specific role and supporting material	matrimonial prosecution without a specific attributed role and tangible supporting material. Courts must guard against indiscriminate implication of relatives, while allowing prosecution where clear and specific allegations disclose their participation.

Prima facie matrimonial cruelty from the full prosecution material	The immediate quarrel described in the dying declaration had to be considered with the brother's account of continuing matrimonial harassment. Allegations included abandonment without money, demands for household articles, denial of food, forced work and beatings despite Panchayat interventions. On that prosecution material, taken at face value at the charge stage, the Court found sufficient grounds to maintain the charges under Sections 498A and 306 IPC against the applicants.	715
Nearby separate residence did not exclude alleged participation at the charge stage	The married sister-in-law's Dholpur address did not warrant excluding her at the charge stage because Dholpur adjoins Morena and frequent visits to the parental home could not be ruled out. Read with the allegations in the prosecution material, that address did not defeat the prima facie case. The Court maintained the charges without finally determining her participation.	715
Section 498A cruelty beyond dowry demands and direct police reporting	Cruelty under Section 498A IPC is not confined to demands for property or dowry. Wilful conduct likely to drive the wife to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or health also falls within its scope. Where a police complaint discloses such cruelty, the police must register the Section 498A offence along with any other disclosed offences. The wife need not first make other police complaints before directly reporting that offence.	783
Specificity of cruelty allegations during a short matrimonial stay	Where otherwise specific cruelty allegations concern a matrimonial stay of only twenty-five days, omission of separate dates of the alleged acts does not by itself make them vague or general. The short, defined period provides the necessary context. The Court distinguished allegations spread over several years, for which disclosure of dates would be required.	783
Specific role and supporting material against distant matrimonial relatives	The passage in Taramani Parakh relied upon by the Court requires caution before summoning distant relatives in a matrimonial prosecution. Merely naming them is insufficient without a specific attributed role and material supporting that role. Allegations against such relatives require tangible support; indiscriminate implication may weaken the prosecution even against the actual offenders.	783
Effect of a notarised separation agreement on matrimonial prosecution	For the spouses before the Court, mutual-consent divorce required approaching the Court; a notary could not dissolve their marriage by attesting a private separation agreement. The agreement had no legal effect as a divorce and could not defeat the Section 498A IPC FIR on the ground that the marital relationship had already ended.	784
Specific dowry-cruelty allegations and the threshold for quashing	Specific allegations of dowry demands, assault and repeated harassment attributed to the husband and parents-in-law raised triable issues and defeated the plea that the FIR was wholly general. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court distinguished mere naming of distant relatives without a specific role and supporting material. Rival versions are not tested for truth on quashing, although proceedings that are abusive on their face may be quashed.	784
FIR after divorce for cruelty committed before divorce	Even if a divorce has taken place, an FIR under Section 498A IPC may be lodged for cruelty committed before the divorce. A later divorce does not extinguish that liability. The Court stated this alternative ground while finding that no divorce had occurred on the private agreement relied upon in this case.	784
Specific involvement of relatives in matrimonial cruelty	A husband's relatives cannot be prosecuted merely because of their relationship to him. Specific involvement must be alleged, rather than vague or omnibus accusations. On the FIR as pleaded, the aunt's isolated statement outside the Family Court, without any attributed dowry demand or related harassment, did	793 not disclose cruelty under Section 498-A IPC.

Employment elsewhere and allegations of dowry harassment	Employment or posting in another place does not by itself defeat specific allegations of dowry demand and harassment. In assessing such allegations, continuous physical presence of every accused is not required; a posting elsewhere cannot alone supply a conclusive defence at the quashing stage.	793
Section 498A IPC — isolated taunt by a sister-in-law	A husband's close relative cannot be required to face trial without specific allegations of cruelty. Where the FIR and Section 161 CrPC statement attributed to a resident sister-in-law only an initial taunt about the small silver coins and insufficient money given at the marriage, with no other specific act of cruelty alleged, the Court found no prima facie case and quashed the FIR and charge-sheet against her.	800
Section 498A IPC — specific allegations against a separately residing relative	Separate residence of a married sister-in-law does not justify quashing where the FIR and police statements specifically attribute dowry demands, harassment and threats to her. The allegations of a direct demand for ₹10 lakh, threats of death and being made to live as a servant, and residence close to the matrimonial home supplied prima facie material for trial. The Court therefore refused to quash the prosecution against her.	800
Matrimonial cruelty — vague allegations of instigation by relatives	A vague allegation that a husband's relative instigated him to demand more dowry requires specific instances of instigation before that relative can be compelled to face trial. The Court distinguished the cited case concerning such allegations because the case before it also contained specific allegations of direct dowry demands, cruelty, harassment and threats against the relative.	800
Dowry offences — individual responsibility of the husband's relatives	The husband's wrongdoing does not by itself establish the involvement of his relatives in dowry demands. For conviction on such accusations, the overt acts attributed to relatives other than the husband must be proved beyond reasonable doubt; conjecture and implication are insufficient. The relied-upon authorities also require care before summoning distant relatives without a specific role and material supporting it.	801
Section 498A IPC — Cruelty without a dowry demand	A dowry demand is not essential to an offence under Section 498A IPC. A married woman must have been subjected by her husband or his relative to cruelty within the statutory explanation. Clause (a) independently covers wilful conduct likely to drive her to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or physical or mental health. Clause (b) covers harassment to coerce an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment for failure to meet it.	824
Matrimonial cruelty — Absence of earlier complaints	A woman may refrain from reporting domestic violence to preserve her marriage until the cruelty exceeds her tolerance. The absence of earlier complaints does not by itself establish that a later FIR is false and is insufficient, by itself, to justify quashing it.	824
Specific matrimonial-cruelty allegations against parents-in-law at the quashing stage	Specific allegations of harassment, dowry taunts and breaking the wife's mobile phone disclosed a prima facie case against the parents-in-law. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court held that whether cruelty actually occurred was a matter for trial and refused to quash the FIR and charge-sheet. The allegations were not treated as an unsupported attempt merely to implicate relatives because of their relationship with the husband.	846
Specific material required to summon distant matrimonial relatives	The Taramani Parakh passage relied upon by the Court cautions against summoning distant relatives merely because they are named in a matrimonial complaint. A specific role and tangible supporting material are required. This safeguard does not warrant quashing where the complaint assigns concrete harassment to the husband or parents-in-law and raises issues requiring trial.	846

parental home for non-fulfilment of dowry demands amounts to cruelty	U.P., the Court applied this principle while refusing to quash the prosecution, where separate residence was admitted and the complaint alleged dowry-related harassment and expulsion. The finding arose in the quashing proceeding while trial evidence was being recorded.
Dowry-linked expulsion and continuing mental cruelty at the parental home	Mental trauma caused by physical or verbal matrimonial cruelty may continue at the parental home after the wife has been driven out, even without further physical assault there. Applying Rupali Devi and Amar Singh, the Court treated the alleged exclusion for non-fulfilment of dowry demands as continuing cruelty. The absence of dates for every earlier incident did not defeat the complaint: a person who does not maintain a diary cannot necessarily recall each date, and the complaint specified the date of expulsion. These matters were assessed for the sufficiency of the prosecution at the quashing stage.	856
Section 498-A IPC: cruelty by assault over non-performance of a family ritual	Cruelty under Explanation (a) to Section 498-A includes wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. It is distinct from harassment to enforce an unlawful property demand under Explanation (b). Specific allegations that the husband and his relatives assaulted the wife over failure to organise the Hath Dhulai ritual disclosed cruelty at the quashing stage, even though they disputed that the ritual involved dowry.	861
Section 498-A IPC: cruelty need not arise from a dowry demand	A dowry demand is not essential to cruelty under Explanation (a) to Section 498-A. Wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health falls within that clause independently of unlawful-demand harassment. Specific allegations of physical and mental harassment, assault, humiliation over children's fees and expulsion from the home justified continuation of the prosecution against the husband and parents-in-law. The mother-in-law and her family were expected to care for the daughter-in-law rather than subject her to cruelty over jewels or other matters.	862
Section 125 CrPC findings do not by themselves govern a Section 498-A trial	An asserted rejection of the wife's maintenance claim on the grounds that she lived separately without sufficient reason and had not suffered cruelty did not, without an explanation of its legal effect, establish a ground for quashing the sister-in-law's prosecution under Section 498-A. The Court instead assessed the specificity of the criminal allegations against that accused.	862
Expulsion for unmet dowry demand — mental cruelty continuing at the parental home	Driving a married woman out of her matrimonial home because a dowry demand is not met amounts to mental cruelty. The resulting trauma and distress may continue at her parental home even without a further overt act of physical cruelty there. Applying Rupali Devi and the narrated Amar Singh principle, the Court found the allegations of dowry demand and compelled residence away from the matrimonial home sufficient to resist quashing.	896
Matrimonial settlement — omission of a detailed account of alleged cruelty	When parties attempt an amicable settlement, the settlement document is not expected to record every alleged act of cruelty. Its omission of such details therefore did not displace the allegations of expulsion for an unmet dowry demand or justify quashing the FIR and charge-sheet in this case.	896
Continuing mental cruelty after dowry-related expulsion from the matrimonial home	Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC may be physical or mental. Where dowry demands and cruelty force a married woman to leave her matrimonial home, the resulting mental trauma and distress may continue while she takes shelter with her parents, even without further physical cruelty there. Compelling her to remain at her parental home because the dowry demand has not been fulfilled is also cruelty. This reasoning answered the objection based on her residence with her parents and the timing of the FIR, without deciding guilt at trial.	925
Cruelty by a mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law	In considering the specific allegations against the mother-in-law, the Court emphasised her duty to protect her daughter-in-law and treated her alleged participation in cruelty as serious. It relied on Meera for the principle that	925 cruelty inflicted by a woman on her daughter-in-law deserves no leniency. The refusal to quash rested on the pleaded acts of instigation, assault and expulsion; guilt was left for trial.

Continuing mental cruelty following dowry-related expulsion	Section 498-A IPC includes physical and mental cruelty. Where a wife is ousted from the matrimonial home for non-fulfilment of a dowry demand and is compelled to live with her parents, the resulting trauma may continue there even without further physical assault. On the allegations in this case, the Court treated that enforced separation as continuing cruelty, giving rise to a fresh cause of action each day. It did not determine the truth of the allegations at trial.	926
Continuing mental cruelty after dowry-related expulsion from the matrimonial home	Compelling a married woman to live with her parents because a dowry demand remains unfulfilled amounts to cruelty. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court recognised that the mental trauma caused by physical cruelty or abusive and humiliating exchanges can continue at the parental home even without a fresh act of physical cruelty there. This supported refusal to quash the FIR containing specific allegations against the applicants.	930
Specific dowry demands and cruelty allegations at the quashing stage	Allegations of continuing physical and mental harassment, a demand for ₹10 lakh or a four-wheeler, attempted expulsion from the matrimonial home and repetition of the demand in a Panchayat could not be rejected as vague and omnibus. The wife was cited as a prosecution witness, and statements of her mother, father, brother and another relative had been recorded about the alleged harassment. Applying the passage reproduced from Taramani Parakh, the Court held that whether the alleged cruelty had actually occurred was a matter for trial and refused to quash the proceedings under Section 482 CrPC.	953
Specific dowry-cruelty allegations against parents-in-law	Specific allegations of repeated dowry demands, ill-treatment, threats of remarriage and rebukes or abuse when the wife complained about her husband supplied material for prosecuting the parents-in-law. The Court distinguished the general allegation in Kahkashan Kausar and applied Taramani Parakh with Geeta Mehrotra. It declined to quash against the father-in-law and mother-in-law because the FIR attributed particular conduct to them, leaving the truth of those allegations for trial.	967
Omnibus allegations against a sister-in-law without an individual role	Relationship to the husband does not by itself justify prosecution. Allegations against his relatives must identify specific conduct rather than merely name them collectively. Applying Kans Raj, Monju Roy and Chandralekha, the Court found no specific individual act attributed to the unmarried sister-in-law and quashed the FIR and further proceedings against her under Sections 498-A, 294, 323, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Relief rested on the vague, general allegations; her unmarried status did not supply a general immunity.	967
Matrimonial cruelty: specific allegations against the husband and his relative	Courts must scrutinise omnibus allegations against relatives who are not generally involved in a couple's affairs, but relationship alone does not confer immunity. Specific allegations of dowry demand and conduct by the husband and elder brother-in-law disclosed a triable case here. Their truth and credibility could not be tested while deciding quashing under section 482 CrPC.	977
Specific dowry-harassment allegations against the husband and parents — triable cruelty	Allegations of a quarrel over insufficient dowry at the marriage, an identified assault and threats, and taunts by the parents-in-law about inferior articles and deficient cash were specific rather than general or omnibus. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court distinguished triable allegations against the husband and his parents from mere naming of distant relatives without a specific role or supporting material. Whether the allegations of cruelty were true was a matter for trial and could not be decided in the quashing proceedings under Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS.	995

continuing at the parental home	even if no further physical violence occurs there. Applying the reproduced passage from Rupali Devi, the Court considered the continuing distress and fear of returning to an unsafe matrimonial home part of the cruelty assessment. It also relied on Amar Singh for the proposition that compelling a married woman to live at her parental home amounts to cruelty. This reasoning supported refusal to quash the specific cruelty allegations.
Dowry-related expulsion to parental home — continuing mental cruelty	Compelling a married woman to live in her parental home because a dowry demand remains unmet amounts to cruelty. Her separate residence must be assessed in light of her allegations of physical and mental harassment. Applying Rupali Devi and Amar Singh, the Court recognised that the mental trauma and psychological distress caused by cruelty that forced her to leave the matrimonial home can persist at the parental home even when no further physical cruelty occurs there. The alleged harassment and compelled separation could not be dismissed merely by asserting that she lived apart without justification.	1001
Parents-in-law's taunts over insufficient dowry — sufficient allegations of cruelty	Taunting a daughter-in-law for bringing insufficient dowry can itself amount to cruelty. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court held that allegations specifically attributing such taunts to the parents-in-law, together with their refusal to allow her return to the matrimonial home, supplied sufficient material for prosecution. The absence of separately specified instances of cruelty in the FIR or Section 161 CrPC statement did not require quashing in those circumstances. Their application under Section 482 CrPC was therefore rejected.	1005
Dowry-related exclusion from the matrimonial home — continuing cruelty and the delay objection	Mental trauma caused by physical or verbal cruelty in the matrimonial home may persist after the wife takes shelter at her parental home, even without a further physical assault there. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court treated the husband's and parents-in-law's failure to bring the wife back, inferred in the circumstances to be connected with the unmet dowry demand, as continuing cruelty. In rejecting the delay objection, it also noted that the limitation period for taking cognizance of an offence carrying a maximum three-year sentence is three years. Specific allegations of the husband's physical and mental harassment and assault supported continuation of his prosecution.	1005

Sexual Offences — Rape, Marital Exception and Unnatural Sexual Acts

Rape charge — examination of consent under Section 90 IPC	Before framing the repeated-rape charge under Section 376(2)(n) IPC, the trial court had to examine whether the prosecutrix's consent was free or affected by misconception of fact under Section 90 IPC. Merely stating that the accused won her confidence before sexual relations was insufficient. The Court required consideration of the alleged continuing relationship and her efforts to conceal the accused's presence from her husband, and remanded the charge question for fresh assessment without deciding whether consent was valid.	63
Unproved marriage claim and the claimed marital exception to rape	A notarised marriage deed and affidavit did not establish the asserted Hindu marriage where no evidence proved performance of the claimed Hindu rites and customs. The Court rejected reliance on the marital exception in this child-victim case, referring to Independent Thought and also finding the claimed marriage unproved. It upheld the sexual-offence convictions on the evidence concerning a prosecutrix whose age was established as fifteen years and twenty-one days.	89
Claimed marriage to a minor and refusal to quash sexual-offence allegations	In rejecting the claimed marriage as a basis for quashing, the Court relied on Independent Thought for the proposition that sexual intercourse with a wife below 18 is an offence under Section 376 IPC. The marriage affidavit had been executed while the girl was below 17, and the Court found prima facie material warranting prosecution.	94
Consent of a girl under sixteen under	For the offence committed on 18.09.2006, Section 375 Sixthly IPC treated	102

Section 375 Sixthly as applicable in 2006	intercourse with a girl under sixteen as rape irrespective of consent. The proved birth date made the prosecutrix fifteen years and two months old on that date, so the plea that she consented was immaterial. Her testimony that the appellant raped her, together with her recovery from his house, supported affirmation of the convictions under Sections 363, 366 and 376(1) IPC.
Section 377 IPC — Quashing under the Court's marital-exception reasoning	Following Manish Sahu, the Court read the amended definition of rape in Section 375 IPC with the marital exception and held that the allegation of an unnatural sexual act by a husband with his wife during a subsisting marriage and cohabitation did not sustain the Section 377 charge. It separately reproduced Independent Thought, which reads the marital exception as excluding wives below eighteen years. On that reasoning, it quashed the Section 377 component of the FIR while preserving the allegations of cruelty and hurt.	113
Section 377 IPC — Consent between adults	In the Manish Sahu reasoning adopted by the Court, consensual unnatural sexual conduct between adults, whether of the same or different genders, falls outside Section 377 IPC. That reasoning refers to Navtej Singh Johar's declaration that criminalising consensual sexual conduct between adults of the same sex violates constitutional liberty and equality. Mutual consent is the condition stated for this exclusion.	113
Section 375 IPC marital exception — Wife below eighteen years	The Independent Thought ruling reproduced by the Court reads Exception 2 to Section 375 IPC so that the marital exception does not protect sexual intercourse or sexual acts with a wife below eighteen years. The reproduced ruling gives this reading prospective effect and states that cognizance concerning rape of a wife below eighteen must comply with Section 198(6) CrPC.	113
Consent immaterial where the prosecutrix was below sixteen	Having found the prosecutrix below sixteen on the date of the offence, the Court held her alleged consent immaterial and declined to decide whether she had in fact consented. It maintained the convictions under Section 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO Act on that basis.	124
Notarised affidavits cannot solemnise or dissolve marriage	A Hindu marriage cannot be solemnised merely by executing an affidavit; it requires the applicable marriage ceremonies or custom, or compliance with a statutory mode of solemnisation. Likewise, divorce requires a decree of a competent Court or the applicable custom. A notary is not, by virtue of that office, a Marriage Officer. The Court held that notarising marriage and divorce affidavits falls outside the functions conferred by Section 8 of the Notaries Act. These principles formed the basis of the Court's assessment of the documents in the rape-related bail application.	156
Minor prosecutrix's alleged consent is immaterial to the rape charge	Once the prosecutrix was found to be a minor on the date of the offence, her alleged consent did not provide a defence to the rape charge. The Court assessed the sexual assault on her evidence and the supporting forensic material, rather than treating her apparent willingness to travel with the accused as legally effective consent.	179
Consent to each sexual act during a live-in relationship	Past consent during a live-in relationship does not establish consent to every later sexual act. Each act requires the woman’s consent. The specific allegation of forced intercourse after she had refused to continue sexual relations supplied prima facie grounds for prosecution despite the parties’ earlier relationship.	191
False promise of marriage and consent under misconception of fact	A promise of marriage vitiates consent when, at the time of making it, the accused intends not to fulfil it and uses it to induce sexual relations. A genuine promise, not made solely to induce sexual relations, does not make those relations rape merely because the promise remains unfulfilled.	191
Affidavit-induced belief in lawful marriage was	At the bail stage, the Court treated the joint marriage affidavit as material because it had induced the prosecutrix to believe that she was the appellant’s legally wedded wife. That earlier assessment under Section 375 fourthly IPC	208

material to bail under Section 375 fourthly	remained relevant to the renewed bail request; it was not a final finding of guilt.
Consent of a prosecutrix below eighteen years	Where the prosecutrix was proved to be below eighteen years of age on the date of the offence, her alleged consent was immaterial to the rape and penetrative-sexual-assault charges. The Court therefore declined to undertake a further inquiry into the consent defence.	246
Reliance on Independent Thought in a bail plea involving alleged marriage to a minor	The Court maintained the earlier bail refusal based on Independent Thought where the prosecution case and school record indicated that the prosecutrix was below eighteen at the incident. The plea invoking customs permitting marriage to a minor did not lead the Court to take a contrary bail view.	263
Section 15 HMA — pending divorce appeal and a false-promise allegation at bail stage	In a fifth bail application concerning an alleged false promise of marriage, the Court rejected the argument that the prosecutrix's pending divorce appeal necessarily prevented a legally effective remarriage and therefore defeated the allegation. Applying Anurag Mittal, it held that breach of the Section 15 waiting restriction does not, by itself, render a second marriage void. It also reproduced Krishnaveni Rai's discussion of non-automatic nullity under Sections 5(ii) and 5(iii). With the prosecutrix said to have supported the prosecution and earlier bail refusals on merits, the Court declined a different view. It did not finally decide whether a marriage took place, a promise was false or consent was vitiated.	329
Prosecutrix's age at bail stage — statutory documents take priority over ossification	Under Section 94(2) of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015, medical age assessment is considered only if the documents specified in clauses (i) and (ii) are unavailable. The same method applies to assessing a victim's age. Where the prosecutrix's school record was available, an ossification report suggesting majority could not be treated as competing age evidence requiring the version favourable to the accused to be accepted. This determination answered the bail plea; sufficiency of evidence for conviction remained for trial.	344
Section 375 IPC — marriage does not exclude rape of a wife below eighteen	Following Independent Thought v. Union of India, Exception 2 to Section 375 IPC does not exempt sexual intercourse with a wife below eighteen years from the offence of rape. The applicant's asserted marriage to the prosecutrix therefore did not provide a basis for accepting that objection to the rape allegation at the bail stage. Ultimate guilt remained for the trial court.	344
Minor prosecutrix — Consent and later marriage in rape proceedings	For the alleged sexual acts with a girl below eighteen considered here, her purported consent was immaterial under the rule in Section 375 Sixthly IPC and the POCSO framework. Consent that was legally immaterial at the time of the act could not become a basis for compromise because the accused later claimed to have married her. The Court relied on the school record showing that she was still a minor when the FIR was lodged. It did not decide the legal validity of the subsequent marriage.	354
Section 377 IPC: Prima Facie Allegation Against the Husband	The wife's allegation of unnatural intercourse in her Section 164 CrPC statement prima facie disclosed an offence under Section 377 IPC. The Court therefore refused to quash those proceedings against the husband. Earlier relief to his siblings for want of specific allegations did not determine the distinct accusation against him.	362
Minor's consent to sexual intercourse under Section 375 IPC	For the minor girl involved in the investigation, consent to sexual intercourse was immaterial under Section 375 IPC. Her description of the relationship as voluntary therefore did not justify police inaction on the information concerning sexual relations.	431
Marital exception as applied to the Section 377	The Court construed amended Section 375 IPC and Exception 2, as reproduced in this decision, to exclude sexual acts by a husband with his legally wedded	437

allegation	wife living with him during a subsisting marriage, where the wife was not below fifteen years of age under the text reproduced and applied. On that interpretation, the wife's alleged lack of consent did not make the acts an offence under Section 377 IPC. The Court distinguished Section 376B concerning spouses living separately because of judicial separation or otherwise.
Consensual adult sexual conduct and Section 377 IPC	Relying on Navtej Singh Johar's ruling against criminalisation of consensual sexual conduct between adults of the same sex, the Court stated that consensual acts between adults of either the same or different genders fall outside Section 377 IPC. Consent of both parties is ordinarily necessary for that exclusion. Its separate conclusion concerning alleged nonconsensual acts within cohabiting marriage rested on its own interpretation of Section 375 and the marital exception, rather than on a Navtej ruling deciding marital nonconsent.	437
Expansion of sexual acts covered by amended Section 375 IPC	The 2013 amendment expanded Section 375 IPC beyond the earlier description of sexual intercourse. Its specified acts include penile penetration, to any extent, of the vagina, mouth, urethra or anus, other prescribed penetrative acts and specified oral acts, subject to the statutory circumstances and exceptions. The Court relied on this inclusion of acts described as unnatural in analysing the relationship between Sections 375 and 377.	437
Specific knowledge and instigation before attributing the husband's alleged sexual act to in-laws	To make parents-in-law prima facie responsible for the husband's alleged act under Section 377 IPC, there must be a specific allegation that the act occurred with their knowledge and instigation. In the absence of such material, their later response telling the wife to accept her husband's wishes did not establish that link for the bail assessment. This was a prima facie examination, without deciding criminal liability at trial.	461
Rape of an infant — Partial penetration and proof from the whole record	Even partial penetration is sufficient to constitute rape. Applying the then-applicable Section 376(2)(f) IPC, the Court found the offence proved beyond reasonable doubt from the eyewitness account, the mother's observation of the taking and return of the child, immediate bleeding and the medical findings, after rejecting the accidental-injury defence. The father's account of the taking and act was hearsay and was treated only as corroborative. The conclusion rested on the combined evidence, not genital injury alone.	477
Consent in a rape prosecution — alleged coercion through an advocate-client relationship	At the quashing stage, allegations that an advocate exploited a client's pending divorce proceedings to obtain sexual relations by pressure and threats could not be treated as free consent. The FIR alleged that he made favourable conduct of the case conditional on compliance with his demands and threatened an adverse outcome and public defamation. The Court considered the misuse of the alleged professional dependency sufficient to refuse quashing of the Section 376(2)(n) IPC prosecution. The subsequent divorce decree and compromise-based acquittal in the matrimonial case confirmed the litigation context; they did not establish the alleged sexual acts. The refusal to quash was not a final finding of guilt.	496
Sexual consent induced by a false promise of reemployment under Section 90 IPC	Consent given under fear of injury or misconception of fact is vitiated under Section 90 IPC where the person doing the act knows, or has reason to believe, that it was given because of that fear or misconception. At the quashing stage, the allegation that a hospital director secured sexual consent by falsely assuring a former employee that she would be reemployed was capable of constituting consent under misconception of fact. Continued sexual relations in the hope of regaining employment did not establish free consent on those allegations.	516
Absence of a complaint and an employer's capacity to dominate an employee's wishes	The employee's failure to complain about the alleged sexual acts did not establish that she participated voluntarily where the accused was her employer and was in a position to dominate her wishes. The Court treated the employment relationship as material to the consent issue when refusing quashing, without	516

	making a final finding of guilt.
Disputed Consent Where Accompaniment Is Alleged to Have Been Compelled by Threats	Where the prosecutrix alleged that she went to the specified place because the accused threatened her and her brother, her movement to that place did not establish voluntary consent at the quashing stage. Consent remained a disputed question of fact for trial; the Court refused to quash the rape proceedings on the accused's contrary account.	520
Pre-Amendment Section 375 Sixthly: Consent of a Girl Below Sixteen	For the November 2007 offence, Section 375 Sixthly IPC treated intercourse with a girl below sixteen as rape with or without her consent. Once that age and intercourse were proved, her admission of willingness did not defeat Section 376 liability. Applying the narrated Supreme Court authorities, the Court also treated such purported consent as incapable by itself of mitigating the offence.	529
Sexual history, dignity and assessment of the prosecutrix's evidence	Previous sexual experience does not justify an inference of consent to the alleged act or deprive a woman of her right to refuse sexual intercourse and protect her dignity. Her evidence cannot be discarded merely on that ground. The Court adopted the reproduced principle that character is not relevant unless itself in issue, referring to Sections 53 and 54 of the Evidence Act, while assessing the prosecutrix's evidence for reliability.	618
Absence of injuries and consent in a rape prosecution	Absence of injuries on the victim's private parts cannot by itself be treated as proof of consent. The evidence must be assessed as a whole. Here, despite the absence of external injury and the medical report's inability to give a definite opinion, the Court found the prosecutrix's account reliable and the offence proved beyond reasonable doubt.	618
Section 375 sixthly IPC: consent and the eighteen-year threshold	The Court corrected the trial court's reliance on sixteen as the relevant age for consent under Section 375 sixthly IPC, observing that the 2013 amendment had raised the threshold to eighteen. The victim's proved age of fourteen therefore made consent immaterial to the rape charge.	623
Promise of marriage —False promise from the outset and later breach	An insincere promise made from the beginning to obtain sexual relations differs from a genuine promise later frustrated by unforeseen circumstances or matters beyond the maker's control. Every failure to marry cannot be treated as a false promise amounting to rape. Whether the promise caused consent through misconception must be assessed from the facts; a voluntary relationship arising from affection rather than the alleged deception is treated differently.	669
Subsisting marriage and alleged misconception from a marriage promise	In this quashing decision, the Court found that the complainant knew a second marriage was not possible while her marriage to the petitioner's brother subsisted. It considered the continued physical relationship, birth of a child and the complaint made more than a year after the birth, and concluded on that record that the promise of marriage had not caused consent under a misconception of fact. The FIR and consequential proceedings were quashed.	669
Section 90 IPC— Fear, misconception and the accused's knowledge	Consent is ineffective under Section 90 IPC where it is given under fear of injury or a misconception of fact and the person doing the act knows or has reason to believe that the consent results from that fear or misconception. This inquiry must be read with the circumstances specified in Section 375. Here, the alleged threats followed the demand for marriage, and no threat before the physical relationship was alleged; the Court therefore examined the marriage-promise theory of misconception.	669
Consent under Section 375— Voluntary agreement to the specific act	Consent under Section 375 IPC means an unequivocal voluntary agreement, communicated through words, gestures or other verbal or non-verbal conduct, to participate in the specific sexual act. Absence of physical resistance, by itself, does not establish consent.	669
Proof of a prosecutrix's age through school	For determining the prosecutrix's age, the Court applied Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007: matriculation or equivalent certificate, then the	694

records	date-of-birth certificate from the first school attended, then a municipal, corporation or panchayat birth certificate, with medical opinion from a duly constituted Medical Board in their absence. A school certificate must be proved through evidence establishing the underlying birth-date entry and its source. Production by the prosecutrix and collection by the investigating officer were insufficient where no school witness proved the entry and the father did not say that he supplied the recorded date.
Section 375 Sixthly as applicable in 2004: consent below sixteen was immaterial	For the March 2004 conduct, Section 375 sixthly IPC as then applicable made intercourse with a girl below 16 rape irrespective of purported consent. Satish Kumar Jayanti Lal Dabgar v. State of Gujarat, (2015) 7 SCC 359, and Kailash v. State of M.P., (2013) 14 SCC 340, were applied: travel, living with an adult and a child's birth do not legalise intercourse or mitigate it by alleged consent once age is established. The prosecutrix's evidence of repeated compelled intercourse, a year of movement and coercion, and the age findings sustained Ramkishan's Section 376 conviction and ten-year term; the case applied the historical threshold, not a present-day statutory age rule.	738
Rape age threshold applicable to the 2006 occurrence: prosecutrix over sixteen	For a July 2006 occurrence, the prosecutrix's recorded birth date placed her above the then Section 375 sixthly threshold of sixteen. On the evidence and circumstances as assessed in this appeal, the Court found voluntary participation and set aside the Section 376 conviction; her remaining minority did not itself establish statutory rape under the applicable provision.	776
Consent under Section 375: voluntary choice assessed from all relevant circumstances	Consent for Section 375 requires voluntary participation after understanding the significance of the act and exercising a choice between resistance and assent. It involves an active decision, not merely the absence of opposition. Applying the Kaini Rajan passage reproduced in the judgment, the Court assessed all relevant circumstances and the prosecutrix's admissions concerning their association, travel, stay and voluntary accompaniment. Its finding of consent was an assessment of this record under the law applicable to the incident.	776
Sexual intercourse with a wife below eighteen — marital exception	As explained in Independent Thought, Exception 2 to Section 375 IPC does not exempt sexual intercourse with a wife below eighteen years of age. A claimed marriage therefore did not exclude a Section 376 charge where the school record showed that the girl was a minor. The Court treated the Section 161 account of physical relations and Section 164 denial of forced intercourse together as prima facie material, leaving the charge to trial.	808
Sexual intercourse with a minor wife — Section 375 Exception 2	A claimed marriage does not exempt sexual intercourse with a wife below eighteen from prosecution under Section 376 IPC. The Court relied on the earlier order applying Independent Thought's reading down of Exception 2 to Section 375, under which sexual relations with a minor wife below eighteen also constitute an offence.	809
False promise of marriage distinguished from subsequent breach	A promise of marriage vitiates consent by misconception of fact when it was made in bad faith, with no intention to honour it from the outset, and directly induced the woman's decision to engage in the sexual act. A later breach of a promise made in good faith is different. The reproduced Deepak Gulati, Pramod Suryabhan Pawar and Dhruvaram Sonar reasoning distinguishes relations arising from love and voluntary choice, or inability to marry because of unforeseen circumstances, from inception-stage deception.	847
Misconception of fact and the accused's knowledge under Section 90 IPC	The Uday passage relied upon by the Court requires two conditions for Section 90 IPC: consent must have been given under a misconception of fact, and the person obtaining consent must have known or had reason to believe that it was given because of that misconception. In promise-of-marriage cases, the causal connection between the promise and consent cannot be assumed merely from a later failure to marry.	847

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Assessment of consent and burden of proving its absence	Consent involves active, reasoned deliberation about the proposed act. There is no fixed formula for deciding whether it was voluntary or induced by misconception: the evidence and surrounding circumstances of each case must be considered. The reproduced Uday reasoning places on the prosecution the burden of proving every ingredient of the offence, including absence of consent.	847
Disputed rape allegations concerning consent under misconception require trial assessment	Where the FIR specifically alleges rape and consent obtained under a misconception of fact, the High Court cannot decide the correctness of those allegations by a mini-trial under Section 482 CrPC. Whether the alleged offence is established must be determined by the trial court on evidence. The Court accordingly refused to quash on the applicant's assertion that the allegations were false.	855
Claimed marriage-promise misconception where the complainant's first marriage subsisted	On the complainant's own account, her first marriage remained undissolved, she knew a marriage to the petitioner was legally unavailable while it subsisted, and she voluntarily continued the physical relationship without alleging coercion in its development. Applying the cited consent authorities to those circumstances, the Court held that her consent did not arise from a misconception under Section 90 IPC and that Section 376 was not made out. The adopted authorities distinguish a promise dishonestly made from the outset to induce intercourse from an honestly intended promise later broken or frustrated by circumstances; the false promise must have induced the consent.	859
Two conditions for excluding consent under Section 90 IPC	The adopted Uday passage requires both that consent was given under a misconception of fact and that the person obtaining it knew or had reason to believe that it resulted from that misconception. The prosecution must establish the ingredients of the alleged offence, including absence of valid consent. Whether a marriage promise caused the consent and whether the accused had the required awareness must be assessed from the evidence and circumstances of the particular case.	859
Voluntary consent requires an informed choice and assessment of the surrounding circumstances	The adopted Uday passage, quoting Mango Ram, treats consent under Section 375 IPC as voluntary participation after understanding the nature of the act and exercising a choice between resistance and assent. Submission under fear is not voluntary consent. No rigid formula determines consent or misconception: the Court must consider the evidence and surrounding circumstances in each case.	859
Consent is immaterial where the prosecutrix is proved to be a minor	Once the prosecutrix was found to be a minor, whether she had consented was immaterial to the rape offence considered by the Court. The Court accepted the evidence of the occurrence and recovery from the appellant's company, and rejected the asserted false-implication defence. The convictions for kidnapping and abduction remained intact while the rape conviction was modified to Section 376(1) IPC.	876
False promise of marriage — initial bad faith and causal connection with consent	A promise of marriage vitiates consent under Sections 90 and 375 IPC when it was made in bad faith, without an intention to fulfil it when given, and bears an immediate or direct connection with the woman’s decision to engage in the sexual act. A promise made in good faith but later unfulfilled is distinguishable. Section 90 also requires that the person obtaining consent knows or has reason to believe that it was given because of the misconception. The Court acknowledged that the first physical relationship after the proposed marriage was settled may have been consensual, but separately examined the alleged later demands, violence and pressure when assessing subsequent acts at the quashing stage.	882
Successive sexual acts — independent consent required for each act	Each act of sexual intercourse requires independent and separate consent. An initially consensual relationship does not determine whether consent existed for later acts after the circumstances changed. In refusing to quash the FIR, the Court considered allegations of salary demands, pressure to leave employment, beatings, circulation of joint photographs and threats of defamation and suicide	882

	after the complainant sought to end the relationship. In those particular circumstances, it prima facie treated consent to the later physical relationship as affected by misconception of fact under Section 90 IPC.
Consent under Section 375 IPC — voluntary agreement to the specific sexual act	Consent under Section 375 IPC requires an unequivocal, voluntary agreement to the particular sexual act, communicated through words, gestures or other verbal or non-verbal conduct. It involves active understanding and reasoned choice concerning the circumstances and consequences of the act. The absence of physical resistance to penetration does not, by itself, establish consent. Consent arising from fear of injury or misconception of fact is ineffective under Section 90 when the person doing the act knows or has reason to believe that it arose from that fear or misconception.	882
Section 376D IPC — gang rape charge without personal commission of rape by every accused	For a charge under Section 376D IPC, it is not necessary that every accused personally commit rape. Sharing the common intention or doing an act with the requisite mens rea may suffice. On the allegation that the applicant restrained the prosecutrix while another man raped her, his claim that he had not himself committed rape did not justify quashing.	893
False promise of marriage during a subsisting marriage and consent	Section 90 IPC excludes consent given under a misconception of fact where the person doing the act knows or has reason to believe that the consent results from that misconception. On allegations of intercourse induced by a promise of marriage, the petitioner's admitted subsisting marriage and knowledge that he could not lawfully marry the prosecutrix supported a prima facie finding of misrepresentation. Her adulthood did not justify quashing the proceedings.	982
Repeated acts of intercourse without consent	Each individual act of sexual intercourse without the prosecutrix's consent amounts to rape. In considering the plea of delay, the Court took account of allegations of repeated forcible intercourse during the interval before the FIR, rather than measuring the complaint solely from the first alleged act.	982
Claimed marriage — no defence to earlier rape or intercourse with a wife below eighteen	A claim of marriage did not answer the prosecutrix’s allegation that she had been raped before being compelled to sign marriage papers. The Court further applied Independent Thought v. Union of India, which read down Exception 2 to Section 375 IPC: sexual intercourse with a wife below eighteen years is not protected by the marital exception. On the prosecution case that the girl was a minor, the claimed marriage therefore did not supply a ground for anticipatory bail.	1007
	Sub-Chapter no. 27.3 Outraging Modesty, Sexual Harassment and Criminal Force
Coercive demands for intimate images — consideration of sexual-offence charges	When considering charges, the trial court must examine the FIR's allegations of persistent pressure to send intimate photographs and videos, separately from its allegations of sexual intercourse. The Court found that the alleged demands and resulting mental distress had been overlooked and required fresh consideration of whether the conduct prima facie attracted Sections 354-A, 354-C or 354-D IPC. It left that determination to the trial court.	63
Sexual-offence FIR: face-value allegations and disputed factual defences	In the challenge to an FIR alleging unwanted sexual contact and threats against a minor, the Court applied the test whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed a cognizable offence. It declined to determine their correctness through the accused’s rival account and refused quashing. The accused remained entitled to lead his defence at trial; the order did not conclusively determine the offence or guilt.	149
Section 354 IPC — indecent conduct and assault sufficient to sustain charge	Allegations that a woman was subjected to indecent comments, that the accused advanced towards her when she complained, and that she was assaulted during the ensuing confrontation, taken together at face value, furnished prima facie material for a charge under Section 354 IPC. The finding was confined to framing charge and did not determine guilt at trial.	330

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Specific Sexual-Touching Allegations at the Quashing Threshold	Where the FIR alleged repeated intimate touching with an evil intention and a threat to compel an illicit relationship, the Court declined to quash the prosecution by deciding the allegations' truth or the complainant's credibility. Its refusal concerned the prima facie case and the limited scope of inherent review, leaving proof of the alleged acts and intention to trial.	406
	Sub-Chapter no. 27.4 Dowry Death and Presumption-Based Liability
Dowry-death liability of relatives — proof of individual overt acts	In a dowry-death prosecution, the husband's fault does not by itself establish the guilt of his relatives. Overt acts attributed to persons other than the husband must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. Relationship, conjecture or implication alone cannot establish their liability.	69
Dowry death — proof of abnormal death and dowry-linked cruelty	For the Section 304-B IPC charge in this case, the Court found death otherwise than under normal circumstances within seven years of marriage and proved demands for money and a vehicle followed by continuing cruelty. The absence of a ligature mark contradicted the reported hanging, and the unexplained ante-mortem injuries supported the finding of abnormal death. The Court sustained the husband's conviction without determining the precise manner of death; no Section 302 charge had been framed, and the relatives' acquittals were outside the unchallenged scope of the appeal.	302
Proof that death occurred within seven years of marriage	The prosecution must prove that the woman's death occurred within seven years of her marriage to invoke Section 304B IPC and the corresponding presumption under Section 113B of the Evidence Act. Conflicting estimates by the mother and maternal uncle, without specific evidence fixing the marriage within that period, failed to establish this foundational requirement.	576
Foundational proof before the mandatory presumption of dowry death	The Section 113B Evidence Act presumption arises only after the prosecution proves the essential facts of dowry death, including death otherwise than in normal circumstances within seven years of marriage and dowry-related cruelty or harassment by the accused soon before death. Once the statutory essentials are proved the presumption is mandatory; it cannot be used to fill a failure to prove those facts. A remote and stale allegation of cruelty does not establish the required proximity.	576
Dowry-death presumption requires proof of dowry-linked cruelty	For the presumption under Section 113-B of the Evidence Act, the prosecution must establish that the particular accused subjected the woman to cruelty or harassment for, or in connection with, a dowry demand soon before her death. Mere demand of dowry is insufficient for liability under Section 304-B IPC; the required cruelty or harassment must be established.	724
	Sub-Chapter no. 27.5 Section 354C IPC Voyeurism — Private Images, Consent and Dissemination
Unauthorised dissemination and the Section 354C charge	Section 354C IPC concerns watching, capturing or disseminating images of a woman's private act in circumstances of expected privacy. Under Explanation 2, consent to capture does not authorise dissemination to third persons without consent. On the allegations of threats to make the prosecutrix's photographs viral and her Section 164 CrPC statement that photographs had been sent to her father, the Court found the voyeurism charge prima facie sustainable.	568
	Chapter no. 28 General Penal Liability, Common Intention and Common Object
	Sub-Chapter no. 28.1 Unlawful Assembly, Rioting and Section 149 Constructive Liability
Section 149 IPC — shared object	Section 149 IPC requires proof of an unlawful assembly of at least five persons and an offence committed in prosecution of its common object, or one its	12

established by exhortation and supply of cartridges	members knew was likely in prosecution of that object. A separate overt act by every member is unnecessary. Conduct, language, weapons and surrounding circumstances must establish the particular member's participation and shared object; presence or kinship alone is insufficient. Consistent evidence of continuous exhortation to kill and the supply of cartridges during repeated firing established the unarmed exhorters' and supplier's shared lethal object.
Common object — formation on the spot and protection of innocent bystanders	A common object need not follow prior deliberation and may form on the spot. Membership and sharing of the object at the relevant stages must still be established through conduct, words, weapons and circumstances. Constructive liability must not extend to a person merely drawn to the scene by curiosity or remaining as an innocent onlooker; silence may be innocent or may accompany a shared unlawful object, depending on the evidence.	12
Section 149 IPC — constructive liability without a personal injury-causing act	Section 149 declares vicarious liability rather than requiring every member personally to inflict an injury. Once membership of an unlawful assembly and the statutory common-object or knowledge connection are proved, the absence of a personal blow or an unused weapon does not by itself absolve a member. The prosecution must establish those ingredients; liability does not arise for every offence committed by any member irrespective of the assembly's object.	12
Presence at a road protest and membership of an unlawful assembly	A person who went to a road blockade to secure release of his employer's vehicles was not treated as a member of the protesting assembly merely because he was present there. On the video before the Court, no other person joined his confrontation with the officer or attacked the officer, so a collective threat from an unlawful assembly did not justify the officer's use of force.	22
Section 149 IPC: shared common object and constructive liability	Section 149 IPC requires an unlawful assembly of at least five persons and proof that the accused shared its common object. The object may develop at the scene without prior concert and may be inferred from conduct, motive, weapons and surrounding circumstances. A member who shares the object may be liable for an offence committed in its prosecution even without personally inflicting the fatal injury; the prosecution must establish the relevant awareness of offences likely to be committed to achieve that object. Mere presence without sharing the object is insufficient. The armed interception, collective assault and burning of the vehicle established the shared object here; death of some assailants during trial did not remove the remaining members' liability.	32
Section 149 IPC: proof of membership, common object and the connected offence	Liability under Section 149 IPC requires proof that the accused was a member of an unlawful assembly of at least five persons and that the offence was committed in pursuit of its common object or was one the members knew was likely in pursuing that object. Every member's identity and an individual overt act need not be proved, but mere presence without the shared unlawful object is insufficient. The object must be identified from the circumstances and collective conduct, not only individual acts. Applying Dani Singh and Kuldip Yadav, the Court relied on the money-dispute call, the five accused entering the fort with the deceased, their departure without him, and the injury and recovery evidence to uphold the Section 302/149 convictions. Personal participation was not indispensable once the required membership and connection to the common object were proved.	45
Common object of an unlawful assembly: formation, alteration and differing liability	A common object must be shared and understood by the members of the unlawful assembly, but a prior express agreement is unnecessary. As explained in Dani Singh and adopted in the Section 149 analysis, it may form during events, be joined by other members, and later be modified or abandoned. Members may share the object only up to a particular stage, and their knowledge of what is likely to be committed may differ. Liability must therefore be tied to the common object and the relevant membership and knowledge, rather than inferred as identical for everyone merely present.	45

28.1 : Unlawful Assembly, Rioting and Section 149 Constructive Liability

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Prima facie common object in a bail application involving a fatal group assault	For deciding bail, the Court found prima facie membership of an unlawful assembly and a shared common object where the appellant arrived with the other accused after a co-accused threatened to call his son to deal with the complainant's side and the ensuing attack caused death, injuries to other victims and the burning of the complainant's house. His presence was specifically stated in the FIR and witness statements. The Court distinguished him from another accused of the same name and assessed his own alleged participation.	107
Section 149 IPC — Unarmed member's exhortation and shared common object	Section 149 IPC makes a member of an unlawful assembly liable for an offence committed in pursuit of its common object or known to be likely in pursuit of that object. The assembly must consist of at least five persons, and membership and the relevant common object or knowledge must be proved. A separate injury or overt act by every member is unnecessary. Common object may be inferred from the gathering's time, place, weapons and collective conduct. The appellant's joint arrival, exhortation to kill and continued participation after the first victim was attacked supported liability for the murders and hurt despite her being unarmed.	115
Common object and liability under Section 149 IPC	Section 149 IPC requires proof of an unlawful assembly of at least five persons, though every member need not be individually identified, and an unlawful common object within Section 141. Liability attaches where the offence was committed to pursue that object or was known to be likely in its pursuit. Mere presence is insufficient, but an overt assault by every member is unnecessary. The common object may be inferred from the assembly’s conduct, time and place. Prior threats, an armed return, surrounding the victims, exhortation and gunfire supported the finding of a common object to murder.	160
Formation and change of common object	A common object need not arise from prior agreement. It may form during the incident and be adopted by persons joining the assembly. It can change or be abandoned. Liability under Section 149 IPC must reflect the object shared and the knowledge possessed by the particular member at the relevant stage; these may differ among members.	160
Common object to cause hurt and liability for murder	An unlawful assembly’s proved object of causing hurt with guns and other weapons did not establish that every participant shared the two shooters’ sudden intention to kill the deceased or knew that murder would be committed in pursuit of that object. The Court set aside the other proved participants’ Section 302/149 convictions while maintaining constructive liability for the hurt offences within the established common object.	165
Mere presence and disputed assembly membership	Mere presence did not prove membership of the unlawful assembly or shared intention where the alleged participation itself was unproved. Contradictory exhortation accounts and unsupported stone-throwing allegations, together with weapon-blow accounts not borne out by medical evidence, left four appellants’ participation doubtful. They could not be convicted directly, constructively under Sections 34 or 149, or for rioting on that record.	165
Common object proved by coordinated armed conduct	Section 149 IPC imposes liability for an offence committed in pursuit of the assembly’s common object or known by its members to be likely in pursuing that object. The court must identify the common object and supporting evidence. Individual injury-causing is not indispensable. Arrival together armed after the earlier dispute, the fatal attack and continued participation in the second assault established the shared object on which the two murder convictions rested.	166
Knowing continuation in an unlawful assembly	Under Section 142 IPC, a person is a member of an unlawful assembly if, knowing the facts that make it unlawful, that person intentionally joins or continues in it. Continued participation after the first fatal assault, followed by the attack on the intervening victim, supported the inference of shared membership and object in this case.	166

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Mere presence and proof of common object	Section 149 IPC requires reliable proof of membership of an unlawful assembly and the offence's connection with its common object or the members' knowledge of its likelihood. Once those conditions are proved, an individual overt act is unnecessary. Here, naming six villagers without reliable evidence of weapons, participation or shared object left innocent presence a real possibility; the Court therefore acquitted them of the constructive-liability and rioting charges.	167
Proof and inference of an unlawful assembly's common object	Section 149 IPC requires membership of an unlawful assembly of at least five persons sharing an unlawful object under Section 141. A clear finding on that object is necessary. It is inferred from the gathering's time, place, weapons and collective conduct, not merely individual overt acts. An overt act by every member need not be proved, but mere presence without sharing the common object is insufficient. The coordinated armed attack on the victims and their rescuers established the common object and participation here.	215
Changing common object and differences in members' knowledge	A common object need not arise from a prior express agreement. It may form during an assembly, be adopted by joining members, and later change or be abandoned. Liability under Section 149 IPC depends on the offence's connection with the common object or the member's knowledge of what was likely in its prosecution. Because participation in the object and knowledge may differ, the section's effect can differ between members.	215
Joint liability for a concerted armed assault	The Court sustained conviction under Sections 302/149 and 148 IPC where the accepted eyewitness evidence established a collective interception and assault by the appellants with weapons, and the medical evidence established fatal head injuries. The witnesses' inability to specify the weapon or particular injury attributable to each assailant did not defeat the prosecution case on the evidence accepted in this appeal.	248
Section 149 liability depends on the common object at each stage of the incident	Common object may develop during an incident and must be assessed from the members' conduct, weapons and surrounding circumstances at the relevant stage. The lathi-bearing group's participation in the initial assault did not establish that they shared the later shootings' homicidal object after the assembly dispersed to different places. Their murder and attempt-to-murder liability was set aside. The other gunmen's firing after the fatal shot supported the finding that they shared the common object of murder and attempted murder.	253
Overt act is unnecessary once Section 149 requirements are proved	A member sharing an unlawful assembly's common object, or the requisite knowledge of the likely offence, may incur Section 149 liability without personally inflicting injury or using a weapon. Membership and the relevant shared object must nevertheless be proved at the crucial stage; mere presence as a passive onlooker does not suffice. Constructive liability cannot replace proof connecting the accused to that object.	253
Section 149 liability for an armed group sharing a common object	Section 149 IPC applies when an offence is committed by a member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of its common object, or is one the members knew was likely in prosecution of that object. Once membership and the necessary common object are proved, a separate overt act by every member is unnecessary. Common object may arise on the spot and is inferred from conduct, weapons and surrounding circumstances. Here the armed arrival, coordinated assault, injuries and prompt naming of the appellants established shared participation; mere presence as an innocent bystander would not suffice.	291
Absence of a separate injury attributable to each assembly member	The absence of an injury attributable to a particular weapon does not necessarily prove that its alleged bearer was absent from an unlawful assembly. It remains a relevant circumstance and must be assessed with identification, earlier statements, conduct and other evidence of common object. Prompt naming and the proved blunt injury, viewed with the armed group's conduct, supported the	291 participation of the lathi-carrying appellants here.

Section 149 IPC — liability without injury by every assembly member	Section 149 attaches liability where an offence is committed by an unlawful-assembly member in prosecution of its common object, or is one the members knew likely to be committed in prosecution of that object. A separate injury by each member is unnecessary. Once reliable evidence established Lalla's and Chimppi's membership, presence and participation, whether their shots struck the deceased was immaterial to their constructive liability.	319
Formation and Change of the Assembly's Common Object	Common object under Section 149 differs from common intention and need not arise from advance agreement. It may form at the scene, be adopted by other members, or be altered or abandoned. Liability must reflect the object shared and the knowledge possessed by the particular member at the relevant stage. Mere presence, without participation in the unlawful common object or the requisite awareness, does not establish constructive liability.	383
Successive Assaults Do Not Necessarily Form One Unlawful Assembly	Sections 141 and 149 IPC require at least five persons sharing the relevant unlawful common object; presence alone is insufficient. Common object may arise at the scene and must be inferred from conduct and circumstances. Here four armed assailants attacked the deceased and one injured man, departed, and were followed by three others who attacked different victims. The evidence established separate phases and objects, rather than one seven-person unlawful assembly. The Court therefore removed the Section 149 basis and determined each group's proved liability under Section 34.	388
Concerted pursuit and shooting establishing common intention in double murder	The accepted eyewitness evidence showed an armed attack on Kailashi followed by the accused jointly chasing and surrounding Garsingh, with Indal and Subodh firing at him. On the whole record, the Court found a shared intention to kill both victims and affirmed the surviving appellants' murder convictions and life sentences, with Section 34 applying to the co-accused's joint liability. Once the joint criminal act and common intention were proved, it was unnecessary to identify a separate fatal shot by every participant.	399
Inferring Common Object from a Coordinated Armed Attack	The common object of an unlawful assembly is inferred from the gathering, weapons, conduct and surrounding circumstances, rather than solely from each member's individual act. The coordinated shootings, cutting assaults, surrounding and pursuit of the victims supported the finding that the appellants shared the murderous object and incurred liability under Section 149 IPC, despite differences in the acts attributed to them.	409
Minimum Membership and Common Object of an Unlawful Assembly	An unlawful assembly requires at least five persons sharing one of the objects specified in Section 141 IPC, including commission of an offence. Membership and the requisite object must be proved, although identification of every one of the five persons is not essential. Mere assembly with the prohibited common object may constitute the assembly offence without a further overt act.	409
The Two Bases of Vicarious Liability under Section 149 IPC	Section 149 IPC applies where a member commits an offence in prosecution of the assembly's common object, or where the members knew that the offence was likely to be committed in prosecution of that object. It creates vicarious liability and does not require proof that every member personally inflicted the fatal injury or performed the offence.	409
Passive Presence Distinguished from Membership Sharing the Common Object	An individual overt assault is not essential to liability as a proved member of an unlawful assembly. The Court must, however, distinguish persons who share the common object or requisite knowledge from passive spectators present out of curiosity. Presence alone, without the relevant membership and object, does not justify vicarious guilt.	409
Common Object Does Not Require Prior Concert	Common object under Section 149 IPC is distinct from common intention and does not require a prearranged agreement or prior meeting of minds. It is enough that five or more persons act as an assembly with the same prohibited	409 object, inferred from their conduct and the surrounding circumstances.

Common object of an armed assembly —collective assault liability	The coordinated interception of two witnesses by eight men armed with lathis, followed by repeated injuries, established a shared unlawful object. Liability under Section 149 IPC did not depend on assigning a particular injury to each assailant once membership, the shared object and commission of the offences in its prosecution were established.	412
Section 149 IPC— membership and shared object	Section 149 requires an unlawful assembly of at least five persons with a common object of the kind specified in Section 141. Mere presence is insufficient unless the person shares that object. Once the conditions for constructive liability are proved, participation in the particular criminal act is unnecessary.	412
Common object may arise at the scene	Common object differs from common intention and need not be preceded by a prior agreement or meeting of minds. It may develop after persons assemble, provided the required members share the unlawful object before the offence is committed and act to achieve it.	412
Section 149 IPC— offence in common object or known likely consequence	Section 149 covers both an offence committed in prosecution of the assembly's common object and an offence the members knew was likely in prosecuting that object. Common object and the relevant knowledge are inferred from the circumstances, including the weapons carried and members' conduct before and at the occurrence.	412
Rioting cognizance and the later possible application of Section 34 IPC	Section 141 IPC requires five or more persons with a statutorily specified common object. Under Section 146, force or violence by the unlawful assembly or a member in pursuit of that object constitutes rioting, punishable under Section 147. On the allegation against five persons, the Court sustained rioting cognizance and considered separate invocation of Section 34 unnecessary at that stage. It nevertheless observed that, if evidence later excluded some accused, Section 34 could support liability of the remaining accused on the facts proved.	428
Section 149: Proof of Unlawful Assembly and Common Object	Liability under Section 149 requires membership, at the relevant time, of an unlawful assembly of at least five persons and an offence committed in prosecution of its common object or known by the member to be likely in its prosecution. A clear finding of the unlawful common object is necessary. The object is inferred from the assembly's conduct and surrounding circumstances, rather than individual overt acts alone. The joint removal and armed assault of the victim established the common object of murder in this case.	450
Common Object May Form or Change During the Assembly	A common object need not arise from a prior express agreement. Members may form it at a later stage or join and adopt it, and it may subsequently change or be abandoned. Liability depends on the object and knowledge attributable to the particular member at the relevant stage, so Section 149 may operate differently for members of the same assembly.	450
Bail during investigation — Possible common-object liability under Section 149 IPC	The absence of Sections 34 or 149 IPC from the registered case did not establish entitlement to bail while investigation was incomplete. The Court reasoned that, if consenting participation in the alleged flesh trade and a common object with the hotel owner were proved, liability under Section 149 could arise. Whether the charge-sheet would invoke Sections 147–149 remained unknown. The observation was conditional and made at the bail stage. Bail was refused in that setting, also noting the earlier rejection of two co-accused persons' bail applications.	473
Section 149 IPC — Membership must be proved despite absence of an injury requirement	Personal infliction of an injury is not necessary to establish membership of an unlawful assembly or action in furtherance of its common object. Nevertheless, where presence and participation are disputed, materially false allegations of overt acts may undermine the membership case. Medical evidence negated the	474

	alleged firearm injuries, witnesses materially improved their accounts, and five appellants were named only after deliberation. Their membership and participation were not proved, so they were acquitted of all charges.
Section 149 IPC: Common Object Inferred from a Coordinated Lathi Assault	Where members of an unlawful assembly act in prosecution of their shared common object, a separate attribution of every injury to each accused is unnecessary. The Court inferred common object from the armed group waylaying and assaulting the complainant, then attacking relatives who intervened. The consistent injured-witness accounts and medical evidence supported that combined assault, making differences in individual blows immaterial to the established constructive liability.	527
Killing beyond the assembly's common object	The appellants formed an unlawful assembly to enter the house, drag out the deceased and beat him with fists. They were unarmed, and the Court found that the co-accused's strangulation with the deceased's shirt was an independent act which the appellants neither shared as an object nor knew was likely. Their liability for rioting, house-trespass and hurt remained, but their convictions under Section 302/149 IPC were set aside.	563
Two grounds for constructive liability under Section 149 IPC	A member of an unlawful assembly is liable for an offence committed by another member when it is committed in prosecution of the assembly's common object, or when the members knew that such an offence was likely in prosecution of that object. Constructive liability extends only to offences satisfying one of those grounds.	563
Formation and alteration of an unlawful assembly's common object	An unlawful assembly requires at least five persons sharing an object within Section 141 IPC. Unlike common intention, common object does not require prior concert; it may arise on the spot, be adopted by joining members, and later change or be abandoned. Its scope at the relevant stage is inferred from the members' acts, words, conduct before, during and after the occurrence, weapons, motive and surrounding circumstances.	563
Overt acts and passive presence under Section 149 IPC	Once membership and the requisite shared common object are proved, a separate overt act by each member is unnecessary for Section 149 liability. Mere passive presence or a general allegation against a crowd does not suffice. Direct or indirect circumstances must support the finding that the accused shared the common object at the crucial stages of the occurrence.	563
Proof of a joint armed assault supporting Section 149 IPC convictions	The Court upheld the Section 149 IPC convictions where reliable eyewitness evidence established the armed group's participation in the assault and medical evidence established the fatal and other injuries. Hostility of some injured witnesses did not defeat the accepted evidence concerning those injuries. The finding sustained the murder, grievous-hurt and simple-hurt convictions in the circumstances proved.	577
Section 302/149 IPC liability of an identified participant in a concerted armed attack	Credible identification of the respondent as an armed participant firing with the group in the coordinated attack supported conviction under Section 302/149 IPC for the three resulting murders and under Sections 147 and 148 IPC. The Court assessed his participation through Umesh's direct evidence, supported by the other accepted evidence of the occurrence; non-recovery of the weapon did not displace that ocular proof.	583
Section 149 IPC liability for an armed group's double murder	Participation in an armed unlawful assembly that went to press a compromise, followed by one member shooting the intended victim and the appellant shooting the son who intervened, supported the appellant's liability for both murders under Section 302 read with Section 149 IPC. The conviction under Section 148 IPC was also upheld on the proved group participation.	622
Unlawful assembly and common object under Section 149	Section 149 IPC requires proof that the person belonged to an unlawful assembly of at least five and that the assembly shared an unlawful common object within Section 141. The nature and unlawful character of the object must	648

	be clearly found from the evidence. The Court adopted Dani Singh and Kuldip Yadav in stating these requirements; mere presence without the shared object does not establish constructive liability.
Inference and development of an unlawful common object	An unlawful common object may be inferred from the time and place of the gathering and the assembly's conduct; an overt act by every member is unnecessary. The object must be shared, though it may arise at a later stage and may change or be abandoned. The Court adopted Dani Singh's qualification that the extent of shared object and knowledge can differ between members and stages.	648
Section 149 IPC—Proof of unlawful assembly and common object	Liability under Section 149 requires membership of an unlawful assembly of at least five persons and an offence committed in prosecution of its common object, or an offence the members knew was likely to be committed in prosecution of that object. The Court must identify the common object and find that it was unlawful. Proof of every member's identity is unnecessary if the assembly's requisite strength is proved.	660
Free-fight plea and proof of common object	A clash in which both armed groups attack and counterattack without acting in prosecution of the alleged common object must be distinguished from an assault by an unlawful assembly. Injuries to both sides do not by themselves defeat Section 149 liability. In the connected appeals, the Court considered the reciprocal injuries but found that the assaults were committed in furtherance of common object.	660
Inference of common object and absence of an individual overt act	Common object is inferred from the circumstances of the gathering, including its time, place and collective conduct. It cannot be assessed solely through separate overt acts of individual members. An overt act by every accused is unnecessary, but mere presence does not establish liability without proof that the accused knowingly shared the unlawful common object.	660
Successive arrivals and formation of common object	A common object may form at any stage and may be adopted by members who join later; express prior agreement is unnecessary. Under Section 142 IPC, a person who knows the facts making an assembly unlawful and intentionally joins or continues in it is a member. Arrival at the scene one by one does not preclude Section 149 liability where the shared unlawful object is proved.	660
Changing common object and the extent of Section 149 liability	The common object may change or be abandoned during the occurrence. Members may share it only up to a particular stage, and their knowledge of offences likely to be committed may differ. Section 149 liability must therefore be related to the object and knowledge attributable to the member at the relevant stage.	660
Separate charges under Sections 143 and 147 when Section 149 is invoked	When an offence such as murder is charged with the aid of Section 149 IPC, separate charges under Sections 143 and 147 are unnecessary unless separate convictions under those provisions are sought. The prosecution must nevertheless prove the ingredients of unlawful assembly and the applicable common-object liability.	660
Section 149 IPC — coordinated restraint and attack establish shared object	Common-object liability requires proof of membership of an unlawful assembly and the offence's connection with its common object; mere presence is insufficient. Applying Charan Singh, the Court relied on the appellants' arrival together and the acts of four members in restraining, throwing down and dragging the injured while the armed assailants attacked him. Those acts showed participation rather than innocent presence and supported the finding of a shared common object. Liability did not depend on each member personally inflicting a fatal injury. The finding sustained the convictions of the appellants whose appeals remained for decision.	678
Common object may develop during the occurrence without	For an assembly of at least five persons, a shared unlawful object need not result from prior concert or a meeting of minds before the attack. The Charan Singh	678

prior concert	passage applied by the Court explains that an initially lawful assembly may become unlawful during the incident, and its object may be adopted, altered or abandoned at different stages. The object is inferred from conduct, language, weapons and surrounding circumstances. A separate overt act by every member is not invariably necessary, but membership and the shared object must be established.
Section 149 IPC — common-object offence and positive knowledge of likely offence	The two bases of Section 149 liability must be distinguished. One concerns an offence committed to accomplish the unlawful assembly's common object and immediately connected with it. The other concerns an offence the members knew was likely to be committed in pursuing that object. In the Charan Singh passage relied upon by the Court, "knew" requires positive knowledge, not merely something that might have been known. Members' participation and knowledge may differ at different stages, so the provision's effect must be assessed for the individual members.	678
Proof of participation in an armed group assault	Where numerous armed assailants attack several victims, witnesses cannot be expected to assign every injury to a particular assailant. Here the witnesses specified the sharp-weapon assaults and identified the lathi-bearing participants, while blunt injuries supported their participation. The Court rejected the absence-of-specific-role objection and upheld the respective direct and Section 149 convictions on that evidence. A mechanically precise, rehearsed account of every blow in such an incident may suggest tutoring rather than greater reliability.	698

Section 149 IPC — unlawful common object and liability without an individual overt act	Liability under Section 149 IPC requires an unlawful assembly of at least five persons, membership of the accused, and an offence committed in prosecution of its common object or known by its members to be likely in its prosecution. The assembly must be proved to comprise at least five members even if the identity of every member is not established. The prosecution must establish a common object falling within Section 141, and the Court must give a clear finding of its unlawful nature on the evidence. Mere presence or numerical strength is insufficient, but proof of a separate overt act by every member is not invariably necessary. Common object is inferred from the circumstances, including the time and place of assembly and the group's conduct, rather than solely from individual overt acts. The armed arrival and coordinated assault in this case supported the finding of a common object to commit murder.	700
Sections 143, 147, 148 and 149 IPC — when separate rioting charges are unnecessary	The ingredients of Section 143 IPC are included in Section 147 and those of Section 147 are included in Section 148. A separate charge under Section 147 is therefore unnecessary when the charge is under Section 148. Where murder is charged with the aid of Section 149, the ingredients of the assembly and rioting offences must be present, but separate charges under Sections 143 and 147 need not be framed unless separate convictions under them are sought.	700
Common object — formation, change and differences between members	A common object need not result from prior express agreement. It may arise at any stage and be adopted by members who join the assembly. It can subsequently change or be abandoned. The offence must be immediately connected with attaining that object, or fall within the members' knowledge of what is likely in its prosecution. Members may share an object only up to a	700 particular stage, and their knowledge may differ; Section 149 IPC may consequently affect different members differently.

Section 149 IPC — unlawful common object and liability without an individual overt act	Liability under Section 149 IPC requires an unlawful assembly of at least five persons, membership of the accused, and an offence committed in prosecution of its common object or known by its members to be likely in its prosecution. The assembly must be proved to comprise at least five members even if the identity of every member is not established. The prosecution must establish a common object falling within Section 141, and the Court must give a clear finding of its unlawful nature on the evidence. Mere presence or numerical strength is insufficient, but proof of a separate overt act by every member is not invariably necessary. Common object is inferred from the circumstances, including the time and place of assembly and the group's conduct, rather than solely from individual overt acts. The armed arrival and coordinated assault in this case supported the finding of a common object to commit murder.	701
Sections 143, 147, 148 and 149 IPC — when separate rioting charges are unnecessary	The ingredients of Section 143 IPC are included in Section 147 and those of Section 147 are included in Section 148. A separate charge under Section 147 is therefore unnecessary when the charge is under Section 148. Where murder is charged with the aid of Section 149, the ingredients of the assembly and rioting offences must be present, but separate charges under Sections 143 and 147 need not be framed unless separate convictions under them are sought.	701
Common object — formation, change and differences between members	A common object need not result from prior express agreement. It may arise at any stage and be adopted by members who join the assembly. It can subsequently change or be abandoned. The offence must be immediately connected with attaining that object, or fall within the members' knowledge of what is likely in its prosecution. Members may share an object only up to a particular stage, and their knowledge may differ; Section 149 IPC may consequently affect different members differently.	701
Innocent family presence and unproved common object	Relationship with the assailants and presence at the scene did not establish membership of an unlawful assembly sharing its common object. The seven appellants were returning with family members from a medical examination, and the allegation that they assaulted the deceased with fists and blows was not proved, including because no supporting contusions were found. On the surrounding circumstances, their presence was held innocent and their constructive liability unproved.	713
Section 149 liability without an individual overt act	Section 149 imposes constructive liability for an offence committed by a member in prosecution of the assembly's common object, or one that members knew was likely in its prosecution. Once membership and the requisite common object or knowledge are proved, every member need not have inflicted an injury or used a weapon. That rule does not permit conviction of mere passive onlookers whose participation in the common object is unproved.	713
Formation and inference of an unlawful assembly's common object	Common object need not result from prior deliberation and may form on the spot; an initially lawful gathering may later become unlawful. Its existence must be inferred from the members' acts, words, weapons and conduct before, during and after the incident, together with the surrounding circumstances. The Court must assess the assembly's object rather than rely only on each person's individual overt act.	713
Shared common object in arson without personally setting the fire	Ghanshyam's Section 436/149 liability was supported by his identified participation with the group at midnight: abusing the complainant, entering the house, dragging him out and assaulting him while other members burnt the houses. That active conduct in the incident established membership of the unlawful assembly and its shared common object, although he was not shown personally to have lit the fire.	717 inferred from collective armed conduct; the principal blow need not be attributed to every member	Vinubhai Ranchhodbhai Patel v. Rajivbhai Dudabhai Patel, (2018) 7 SCC 743, and Mahendran v. State of T.N., (2019) 5 SCC 67, were used to distinguish the five-member unlawful assembly and rioting offences from Section 149 constructive liability. Common object may arise at the scene and is inferred from group conduct, weapons, language and circumstances, with the alternative limb of knowledge of an offence likely in pursuit of the object; no identical overt act or prior concert is demanded, but mere innocent presence is insufficient. The seven appellants participated in the assault on four victims; they were not merely watching Brajesh's head blow.

Unlawful assembly, rioting and armed rioting have distinct requirements	The Vinubhai Ranchhodbhai Patel passage adopted by the Court distinguishes unlawful assembly, rioting and armed rioting. Section 141 requires at least five persons sharing one of its prohibited common objects, including the commission of an offence; the assembly itself may be punishable under Section 143 without an overt act. Rioting under Section 146 requires force or violence by the assembly or a member in prosecution of the common object, even if that object is not achieved. For Section 148, the person charged must additionally be armed with a deadly weapon. These offences are distinct from the vicarious liability created by Section 149 and require proof of membership of the unlawful assembly.	735
Section 149 IPC — proof of common object or knowledge of the likely offence	A common object may form during an incident and must be inferred from the assembly's conduct, weapons and surrounding circumstances. Section 149 IPC requires either an offence committed in prosecution of that object or positive knowledge that the offence was likely; mere possibility is insufficient. Applying Bhargavan and Baladin, the Court found that an object to stop ploughing could not, on the evidence, be extended to a shared object to kill. Mere presence did not establish unlawful-assembly membership. The other appellants' constructive murder liability was therefore set aside, while the proved shooter remained liable under Section 302 IPC.	753
Section 149 IPC — proof of common object or knowledge of the likely offence	A common object need not arise from prior agreement and may develop at the scene; it is inferred from the assembly's conduct, weapons and circumstances. Under Section 149 IPC, the offence must either be committed in prosecution of that object or be one the members positively knew was likely. Mere possibility is insufficient. Applying Bhargavan and Baladin, the Court declined to extend the proved object of stopping cultivation into a common object to kill. Mere presence did not establish unlawful-assembly membership, and the fatal shot proved against one accused could not automatically be imputed to the others.	754
Common object and participation before and during a later shooting	Participation in bursting crackers before an unanticipated shooting did not by itself establish membership of an unlawful assembly sharing an object to commit murder or attempted murder. Proven stone throwing during gunfire could support an inference of joining that assembly, but the alleged later conduct had to be established. Here the first account omitted surrounding the house and stone throwing during firing, the site plans showed no stones, none were seized, and witnesses gave vague or inconsistent versions. The prosecution therefore failed to establish the respondents' participation or shared common object or intention in the lethal phase of the incident.	916
Common object and constructive liability under Section 149 IPC	Section 149 requires an unlawful assembly of at least five and an offence committed in prosecution of its common object, or known by its members to be likely in prosecution of that object. Common object may arise without prior agreement and can be inferred from weapons, motive and conduct before, during and after the attack. A separate overt act by every member is unnecessary, but membership with the requisite object or knowledge at the crucial stages must be proved; passive bystanders are not liable merely for being present. The armed group's concerted attack on unarmed persons established the common object. The Court also rejected the sudden-incident plea, noting	936

	the armed preparations, prior pressure to compromise and absence of aggression or injury on the accused side.
Common-object liability and individual overt acts	Section 149 IPC requires membership of an unlawful assembly of at least five persons sharing an object within Section 141, though every member need not be individually identified. The offence must be committed in prosecution of that object or be known to be likely in its prosecution. Mere presence is insufficient, but an individual overt act is not invariably necessary. A finding on the unlawful common object must rest on the evidence and the group's conduct. The armed return and joint attack established that basis here.	987
Formation and alteration of an unlawful assembly's common object	A common object need not arise from a prior express agreement. Members may form it at any stage and others may join and adopt it; it may later be altered or abandoned. Liability under Section 149 must correspond to the common object, or the member's knowledge of likely offences, at the relevant stage; membership does not make every member's liability identical regardless of those limits.	987

General Exceptions, Private Defence and Limits of Force

Private defence — fabricated attack and later injury cannot justify retaliatory firing	Private defence cannot rest merely on registration of a cross-FIR. On the evidence in this case, the asserted house attack and roof-firing account were inconsistent with the physical circumstances and reliable testimony; the son's close-range injury was inflicted later by the principal accused to create a false defence. The counter-complaint's rejection and closure proceedings had also attained finality before the High Court. The Court rejected the claimed defensive necessity, considered the shooter's flight and concealment of the damaged gun, and held that cruel or excessive firing could not secure complete protection as private defence.	12
Private defence does not extend to excessive force or retaliation	The right of private defence protects against a reasonable apprehension of injury; it does not authorise revenge or an assault after that apprehension has ended. Even allowing for normal reactions in an emergency, excessive or retaliatory force may make the defender an aggressor. An officer's continued beating, throwing down and kicking the head of a person who had pushed him was prima facie beyond private defence and lawful policing, where nobody in the surrounding crowd attacked the officer.	22
Section 99 IPC limits on private defence against official action	Under Section 99 IPC, action by a public servant acting in good faith under colour of office, or under such a servant's direction, does not give a right of private defence if it does not reasonably cause apprehension of death or grievous hurt, even if not strictly justified by law. The protection depends on knowledge or reason to believe the actor's official status or authority, including production of written authority if demanded where applicable. Private defence is also unavailable where there is time to seek public protection, and cannot extend beyond necessary harm. In addressing the collateral directions, the Court found no basis in that trial to treat the officials' demolition action as lacking good faith; it reserved the acquittal appeal's merits.	37
Section 84 IPC — legal insanity requires cognitive incapacity when the act is committed	Medical illness, abnormal behaviour or absence of motive does not alone establish the exception under Section 84 IPC. The accused must, by reason of unsoundness of mind when acting, be incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that it is wrong or contrary to law. Proximate conduct before, during and after the event, considered with medical and treatment evidence, may establish that condition. On the combined evidence of the appellant's disorder, treatment and conduct surrounding the shootings, the Court found the statutory incapacity proved and acquitted him under Sections 302 and 307 IPC.	77
Section 84 IPC — a lucid interval	A lucid interval requires restoration of the mental faculties sufficient for the	77

requires restored judgment, not merely cessation of violent symptoms	person to understand and judge the act with reason, memory and judgment. Complete restoration to the person's original condition is unnecessary, but mere cessation of violent symptoms is insufficient. The inquiry remains directed to cognitive capacity at the time of the offence, assessed with proximate conduct and medical evidence.
Acquittal under Section 84 IPC — continued treatment at State expense for persisting unsoundness of mind	After finding the appellant entitled to Section 84 IPC and acquitting him of the murder and attempt-to-murder charges, the Court noted that he remained of unsound mind and had spent more than ten years in custody. It directed that his further treatment be provided at State expense and sent the order to the Chief Secretary for compliance.	77
Section 99 IPC — limits on private defence against official acts and collateral review of a demolition order	Section 99 restricts private defence against acts of a public servant, or acts done by the servant's direction, in good faith under colour of office where there is no reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt, even if the act is not strictly lawful. The restriction is subject to the person's knowledge or reason to believe in that official capacity or direction, including disclosure of authority where required. The right is unavailable where public protection can be sought in time and never permits more harm than necessary. In this murder trial, the unchallenged demolition order and official action could not be collaterally condemned to support prosecution directions against the officials; the acquittal's merits were expressly left open.	78
Private defence may be considered even when counsel has not expressly raised it	The Court may consider private defence where it emerges from the material on record even though the accused has not formally pleaded it or counsel has not argued it. Here, prosecution evidence showed that the deceased tried to snatch money, pursued the fleeing appellant and was struck during that pursuit. The Court examined the defence despite counsel's limited request to substitute a grievous-hurt conviction.	129
Complete private defence against pursuit to seize money	The appellant first tried to avoid the deceased's attempt to snatch money by running away but was pursued. In those circumstances, throwing stones twice to protect himself and his money was found not disproportionate. The Court held that he had not exceeded the right under Sections 96 and 97 IPC and set aside the Section 304 Part II conviction, granting acquittal rather than substituting a lesser offence.	129
Burden and sources of proof of private defence	Under Section 105 of the Evidence Act, the accused must establish circumstances supporting private defence on a preponderance of probabilities, rather than beyond reasonable doubt. Those circumstances may emerge from the prosecution evidence or its cross-examination; the accused need not necessarily call defence witnesses. The plea cannot be presumed true without supporting material.	129
Imminent danger and the opportunity to obtain public protection	Private defence protects a person or property against a present or reasonably apparent danger where immediate aid from the State is not readily available. Whether the right arose depends on the surrounding circumstances, including the threat's imminence, injuries received and inflicted, and the time available to approach public authorities. No abstract test determines every case.	129
Private defence ends with the need to repel danger	The right of private defence is defensive, not a right of aggression, revenge or reprisal. It does not authorise an offensive after the reasonable apprehension of danger has disappeared, or an attack disguised as self-preservation. The necessity to avert an impending danger must be real or apparent and must not be self-created.	129
Practical assessment of force used in private defence	Defensive force must not be unduly disproportionate to the harm reasonably apprehended or exceed the purpose of averting it. The threatened person is not expected to calculate the exact force needed in the excitement and confusion of an imminent attack. Courts must assess the situation practically from the	129

	person's position at the time, rather than through a detached and minute reconstruction after the event.
Private defence of the body extending to causing death	Where the right of private defence of the body exists under Section 97 IPC, Section 100 permits it to extend to causing death when the assault creates a reasonable apprehension that death or grievous hurt will otherwise result. A complete defence to a killing requires both the existence of the right and its lawful extent to the force used.	129
Exceeding an existing right of private defence distinguished from having no such right	Rejection of a complete private-defence plea may mean that no right existed, or that an existing right was exceeded or did not extend to causing death. The latter situation may attract Exception 2 to Section 300 IPC where the offender acted in good faith, without premeditation and without intending more harm than necessary for defence. Those conditions differ from the complete defence found in this appeal.	129
Resistance to unlawful aggression without an obligation to retreat	Within the statutory limits of private defence, a person confronted with a violent attempt against person, habitation or property may resist the attack where it occurs rather than being obliged to retreat. That resistance remains tied to the continuance of the danger and does not authorise retribution after it has ended.	129
Unsupported plea of private defence	The claimed attack by an armed complainant party was rejected where it lacked supporting injuries, medico-legal reports, a counter-FIR or corresponding physical evidence. On that record the defence account was hypothetical, and no right of private defence was established.	165
Private defence requires reasonable apprehension and proportionate force	A right of private defence requires reasonable apprehension of impending danger; causing death requires circumstances giving reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt. The force used must be proportionate to the threatened harm. No such right arose for the armed aggressor where the deceased and the other persons were unarmed and had made no threatening overt act.	207
Private defence may be established on a preponderance of probabilities	An accused need not expressly plead private defence or prove it beyond reasonable doubt. The plea may emerge from the surrounding circumstances, defence evidence or facts elicited from prosecution witnesses, but must be supported on a preponderance of probabilities and cannot rest on speculation.	207
Deceased’s criminal history alone does not create a right of private defence	The deceased’s criminal antecedents alone did not give the accused a reasonable apprehension of injury. Where the deceased and companions were unarmed and made no threatening reaction or overt act, their criminal background could not justify the accused’s unprovoked use of lethal force.	207
Private defence — single defensive gunshot during a serious assault	Where the complainant party was the aggressor, the accused and his brother sustained serious injuries in the same occurrence, and the brother later died, a single gunshot fired by the accused to save himself was held to fall within Section 96 IPC. On the evidence in this case, including the unexplained injuries and lack of support from the other eyewitnesses, the accused had not exceeded the right of private defence, although the shot struck a vital part. His conviction under Section 307 IPC was set aside.	331
Right of private defence — necessity, reasonable apprehension and proportionality	The right of private defence protects against an aggressor where there is reasonable apprehension of an impending danger not created by the defender and immediate State assistance is not readily available. It does not authorise aggression, revenge or malicious retaliation. The force used must serve the defensive purpose and must not be unduly disproportionate to the harm reasonably apprehended. Its extent is assessed in the actual emergency, considering the injuries on both sides, the opportunity for public assistance, the weapons used and, in a firing case, the number of shots, without demanding exact measurement of a threatened person’s response.	331
Common-Object Liability Without an	Section 149 IPC applies when an unlawful assembly's member commits an offence in prosecution of its common object, or an offence the members knew	381

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Individual Fatal Act	was likely in pursuing that object. A separate overt act by every member is unnecessary, but shared object or the requisite knowledge must be proved; passive presence alone is insufficient. Common object may develop at the scene and is inferred from weapons, conduct, language and surrounding circumstances. The group's pursuit of the injured man, transfer and firing of the gun, and continued assault after the killing established participation in the common object under Sections 142 and 149.
Proof of Unlawful Assembly and Common-Object Liability	Liability under Section 149 IPC requires proof of an assembly of at least five persons and an unlawful common object under Section 141, together with the connection of the offence to that object or the members' knowledge of its likelihood. The identity of every member need not be established, but the accused's membership and the unlawful object require a clear finding. Individual overt acts are not indispensable. The coordinated armed assault, supported by medical and recovery evidence, established the appellants' common-object liability for the fatal attacks and the assault on the injured survivor.	383
Legal Incapacity at the Time of the Act Under Section 84 IPC	Section 84 IPC requires unsoundness of mind that, when the act was done, made the accused incapable of knowing its nature or that it was wrong or contrary to law. Mental illness, abnormal behaviour or a later diagnosis alone does not establish that legal incapacity. The Court considered the relatives' accounts, subsequent psychosis and suspended trial, but found insufficient evidence of incapacity at the occurrence. The absence of contemporaneous treatment documents, the observations on arrest and court production, and conduct indicating awareness supported rejection of the defence.	384
Section 105 Burden and the Prosecution's Continuing Duty to Prove Mens Rea	An accused invoking Section 84 IPC must rebut the presumption against the exception on a preponderance of probabilities, using relevant oral, documentary or circumstantial material, including prosecution evidence. The prosecution's burden to prove every ingredient and the required mens rea beyond reasonable doubt never shifts. Even if the accused does not establish the exception, the same material may create a reasonable doubt about an offence ingredient and require acquittal. Here the Court found neither the statutory incapacity nor such a reasonable doubt.	384
Lucid Interval Requires Restoration of the Relevant Cognitive Faculties	For the Section 84 enquiry, a lucid interval requires restoration of reason, memory and judgment sufficient to understand and judge the act. The mere cessation of violent symptoms is not enough, while complete restoration of every mental faculty is unnecessary. The assessment remains whether the accused possessed the legally relevant cognitive capacity when the act was committed.	384
Conduct and Circumstances Relevant to the Insanity Defence	Conduct shortly before, during and after the occurrence may help establish the accused's mental condition at the material time. Preparation, concealment, attempts to avoid detection and explanations after arrest are relevant to awareness, but must be assessed with the other evidence. The unusual or atrocious nature of an offence, absence of an apparent motive, odd behaviour or failure to flee does not alone establish legal insanity. Remote circumstances cannot substitute for proof directed to the time of the act.	384
Cross-case injury does not by itself establish private defence	A gunshot injury to an accused in the same occurrence did not, by itself, establish that the complainant’s party was the aggressor or that the accused acted in private defence. The Court examined the occurrence as a whole and found that the appellants had initiated the armed assault. Private defence could not be used to justify their aggression.	412
Private defence—assessment of threat and surrounding circumstances	Private defence must be assessed on the whole incident in its setting. Relevant considerations include injuries to the accused, imminence of danger, injuries inflicted by the accused and the opportunity to seek protection from public	412

	authorities. The plea cannot rest on conjecture.
Private defence extending to causing death	An accused claiming a right of private defence extending to causing death must show circumstances supporting a reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt. The existence of injuries on the accused does not automatically establish that right; the statutory limits on defensive force remain applicable.	412
Duration of the right of private defence	The right of private defence of the body begins when a reasonable apprehension of danger arises from an attempt or threat, even before the offence is completed. It continues only while that apprehension lasts and ends when the threat has ceased.	412
Age at the alleged act and the under-seven exception in Section 20 BNS	Section 20 BNS, corresponding to Section 82 IPC, provides that an act done by a child under seven years of age is not an offence. The relevant age is the child's age when the alleged act occurred. On the assertion that two applicants were about seven and three, the Court directed the investigating officer to verify their ages and immediately delete from the FIR the name of either applicant found to have been below seven at the time of the alleged offence.	424
Intoxication — Section 85 exception and proof of intention	Section 85 IPC requires intoxication administered without the accused's knowledge or against his will, producing incapacity to know the nature of the act or that it is wrong or contrary to law. Voluntary drinking alone supplies no such exemption. Under Basdev, a voluntarily intoxicated person is attributed the knowledge of a sober person, while actual intention must be assessed from the circumstances with due regard to the degree of intoxication. The record did not establish involuntary administration or the asserted incapacity, and the Court rejected both the exception and reduction to Section 304 Part I.	478
Minor injuries on the accused and the plea of private defence	Injuries on an accused do not automatically establish private defence. Their nature and the circumstances of the entire occurrence must make that defence probable. Non-explanation of minor or superficial injuries does not necessarily weaken a prosecution case established by credible evidence beyond reasonable doubt.	570
Limits on causing death in private defence	Private defence is subject to the restrictions in Section 99 IPC and does not permit more harm than is necessary for protection. On the plea considered, the accused had to show circumstances giving rise to a reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt to justify causing death in defence.	570
Commencement and duration of private defence	The right of private defence begins when a reasonable apprehension of danger arises from an attempt or threat, even before the offence is completed. It lasts only while the relevant danger continues. Once the reasonable apprehension has ended and the threat has been removed or repelled, further force cannot be justified on that basis.	570
Unexplained injuries to accused and the plea of private defence	Failure to explain injuries sustained by the accused in the same incident requires careful scrutiny of the prosecution evidence and may weaken that evidence or support private defence. It does not automatically establish private defence or shift the burden to the prosecution to disprove it. Minor or superficial injuries, or clear and convincing prosecution evidence outweighing the omission, may leave the prosecution case unaffected. The entire incident must be assessed in its setting.	660
Private defence extending to death— Apprehension and defensive limits	A claim of private defence extending to causing death requires circumstances giving reasonable grounds to apprehend death or grievous hurt, and the accused bears the burden of showing that the right extended that far. The right is subject to Section 99 IPC and permits defence against unlawful aggression. It does not permit retaliation or an offensive after the need for defence has ended.	660
Legal insanity at the time of the act under Section 84 IPC	Section 84 IPC requires legal insanity at the time of the act: because of unsoundness of mind, the accused must be incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that it is wrong or contrary to law. Medical illness, aggression,	691

	sleeplessness or abnormal behaviour does not by itself establish that incapacity. Conduct before, during and after the offence, together with medical evidence, is relevant to the mental condition at the material time. Absence of motive alone does not establish the defence. Later evidence of psychosis and abnormal jail conduct did not, in this case, prove legal insanity when the offence was committed.
Limits of private defence against a barehanded group	Private defence permits necessary force to repel unlawful force and must be assessed under Sections 97–106 IPC together. It does not justify revenge after danger has passed or disproportionate deadly force against an ordinary assault. Applying the reproduced Kashi Ram principles, the Court rejected the defence because the complainant party had approached barehanded to stop abusive language, whereas Laxman fired his gun at them.	849
Private defence before an actual blow and in protection of another	The Kashi Ram passage relied upon recognises that a person facing unlawful attack need not wait to be actually struck before defending against it. The right may extend to protecting another person whom the defender is obliged to protect, and to preventing or escaping unlawful detention. It remains confined to necessary, reasonable defensive force and ends when the danger no longer requires it.	849
Section 99 IPC: private defence against acts done under official authority	Section 99 restricts private defence against an act done in good faith by a public servant, or under a public servant's direction, under colour of office where it does not reasonably cause apprehension of death or grievous hurt, even if the act or direction is not strictly lawful. The provision preserves its qualifications concerning knowledge of official status or authority, excludes private defence where public protection can be sought in time, and prohibits more harm than necessary. Here, the shooting trial did not justify treating an unchallenged demolition order as mala fide to found collateral prosecution directions against officials performing their duties.	864
Private defence: necessity and proportionate force against unlawful aggression	The scope of private defence must be assessed by reading Sections 97–106 IPC together. Defensive force may avert unlawful force or detention, but cannot be used for revenge or after the danger has ended. The force used must be reasonable in relation to the threat; an ordinary assault does not justify firearms or other deadly force. Applying the reproduced Kashi Ram discussion, the Court rejected private defence where armed assailants launched a firearm ambush on unarmed cultivators without a preceding altercation.	873
Private defence — reasonable apprehension, necessary force and burden of proof	Private defence protects the body of oneself or another, subject to Section 99 IPC: the harm caused must not exceed what is necessary, and the availability of timely public protection is relevant. Causing death requires circumstances within Section 100, including reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt. The accused may establish a reasonable and probable defence on a preponderance of probabilities from the record. The weapon and threatened injury are relevant; defensive force is not measured with exact precision, and actual injury is unnecessary where serious danger is reasonably apprehended. Here, the claimed attack on Gorelal was not established: Ramesh was eating, no weapon attributed to him was recovered, neither accused had an injury or medical report, and repeated lathi blows caused fatal head trauma. The plea failed.	885
Good faith under Section 52 IPC when an official follows superior instructions	An act or belief lacking due care and attention is not in good faith within Section 52 IPC. An official responsible for comparing amounts could not establish good faith merely by saying that he acted on superior officers' instructions when the file itself disclosed undated documents and a charge for removal of a pump claimed already to have been removed. On those facts, failure to examine visible anomalies defeated the defence; the Court did not hold that superior instructions are irrelevant to every assessment of an official's state of mind.	914

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Unsupported attribution of a shot cannot be justified as private defence	After rejecting the alleged eyewitnesses as unreliable, the trial court could not assume that Ramant fired the fatal shot and justify it as private defence when no other evidence established that he was armed or caused the injury. The High Court found the shooting attribution unproved, so the occasion to decide private defence did not arise. It maintained acquittal but corrected its basis to failure of prosecution proof and described the Section 302 IPC acquittal as honourable. The alternative submission that private defence may arise without express pleading was not decided as a necessary legal issue.	919
Private defence of possession against forcible dispossession	A person in settled possession may defend that possession against an aggressor, even where his title is disputed. The right of private defence must be considered in the circumstances of the threatened invasion of property and person. Witnesses acknowledged the appellant's cultivation, the claimed Collector proceedings restoring possession were not produced, and the defence judgments supported his possession. The Court considered it probable that the complainant party had tried to stop cultivation forcibly and held that private defence was available. It also doubted the allegation that the appellant fired, without deciding whether any particular shot constituted excessive defensive force.	923
Settled possession and the requirement of lawful eviction	Even the rightful owner cannot forcibly dispossess a trespasser whose possession has become settled; recovery must be through due process of law. This protection does not extend to a stray, intermittent or recently committed intrusion that has not matured into settled possession. The rightful owner may resist an intrusion in progress or a merely casual trespass with no more force than necessary.	923
Tests for settled possession in a claim of private defence	Settled possession must be effective, undisturbed and sufficiently continuous, to the owner's knowledge or without concealment, with an intention to possess. The dispossession of the true owner must be complete and acquiesced in. On agricultural land, cultivation of a crop is a usual indicator. Occupation merely as the owner's agent or servant does not amount to such possession. Whether possession is settled depends on the facts, without a rigid duration rule.	923
Standard of proof for the plea of private defence	The accused bears the burden of establishing private defence under Section 105 of the Evidence Act, but may discharge it on a preponderance of probabilities from the material on record. This burden is less onerous than the prosecution's continuing obligation to prove every ingredient of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.	923
Consideration of private defence without an express plea	The Court may consider private defence even where the accused has not expressly pleaded it, if its foundation appears from the evidence. Cross-examination of prosecution witnesses and defence evidence may supply the necessary material. The Court therefore examined the right on the existing record despite the absence of a specific plea.	923
	Sub-Chapter no. 28.3 Common Intention Under Section 34 IPC/BNS Equivalent
Common intention where individual fatal blows cannot be identified	Common intention to inflict injuries sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death may be inferred from concerted armed arrival and conduct during the assault. Where several assailants attacked several injured witnesses, precise attribution of each blow could not reasonably be expected. An appellant's assault on an unarmed son attempting to rescue the deceased, together with his prepared participation in the attack, established his shared intention despite uncertainty about his individual blows to the deceased.	21
Physical disability and participation by instigation	An amputated leg did not by itself establish inability to participate in an assault by instigating a co-accused to fire. The Court assessed the prosecution testimony and rejected disability alone as proof of false implication. Its finding that the firing occurred at the second appellant's instigation supported	34

	conviction of both appellants under Sections 307 and 34 IPC.
Free fight — each participant's own act governs liability if mutual offending is established	If the evidence establishes that both sides committed offences in a free fight, liability is assessed by each participant's own act rather than by applying vicarious liability. The Court stated this conditionally while rejecting the contention that an FIR registered later than the rival FIR must be a counterblast; it did not finally find that a free fight had occurred.	72
Common intention inferred from a coordinated armed attack	Where two armed assailants arrived together and one shot the security guard to clear the way for the other to enter the shop and shoot the intended victim, their coordinated conduct established joint liability under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC. The assailant who entered the shop was also liable for his own acts under Sections 307 and 450 IPC.	220
Joint armed assault supported by motive and medical evidence	Where eyewitnesses consistently attributed participation in a joint armed attack to the accused, the prompt FIR and medical findings corroborated their account. The land dispute supplied supporting motive. On that evidence the Court sustained murder liability under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC; the investigative omissions identified did not displace the proved case.	227
Joint participation and shared intention under Section 34 IPC	Section 34 requires a joint criminal act committed in furtherance of shared intention; mere accompaniment of an offender is insufficient. Common intention may develop at the spur of the moment, but must exist before the criminal act. A participant need not inflict a separate injury. The Court upheld the Section 302/34 convictions on the eyewitness account of the armed group’s coordinated interception and firing in the prior-enmity confrontation.	259
Common intention and acquittal of co-accused on different evidence	Acquittal of some co-accused does not require acquittal of another against whom there is an additional incriminating allegation. The Court inferred common intention from the dying declaration that the wife had procured the burning, her presence as her husband brought kerosene and set the victim alight, and her failure to stop him or extinguish the fire. On those combined circumstances, her conviction under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC was sustained.	272
Common intention inferred from coordinated armed participation	Common intention to commit murder was inferred from the accused waiting armed for the deceased, the principal assailant firing the fatal close-range shot, and the others participating by firing indiscriminately. Eyewitness accounts, supported by two fired cartridges of different bores found at the spot, established their coordinated participation despite failure to prove the weapon seizures.	274
Common intention and participation under Section 34 IPC	Liability under Section 34 IPC requires participation in a criminal act done in furtherance of a shared intention. The common intention must precede the act, although it may develop on the spot. A separate overt act by every accused is unnecessary, but mere accompaniment or participation without the shared intention does not establish joint liability.	280
Section 302/34 IPC: participation proved in connected trials	The Court upheld the murder convictions on evidence of the appellants' armed participation in the shooting. It separately assessed the evidence recorded in the later trial of the previously absconding appellant, where the complainant, the deceased's son and his wife supported his participation despite another witness not supporting the prosecution. The earlier convictions did not replace that examination of the later trial's evidence.	285
Section 34 IPC — common intention without a separate blow by every accused	Common intention must relate to the particular offence and may be inferred from the participants' conduct and surrounding circumstances. A separate or identical assault by every accused is unnecessary where shared intention and participation in the common criminal design are established. Joint arrival armed with axes, concerted abuse and presence facilitating the ensuing assault supported the finding that the accompanying accused shared the assailants'	313 intention and were liable under Sections 302 and 34 IPC.

Section 34 IPC — common intention developing at the scene	A shared plan to commit the particular offence may develop at the scene, but the meeting of minds must precede the act constituting that offence. Prior concert may be inferred from the accused's conduct, unity of purpose, respective roles, injuries inflicted and other relevant circumstances.	313
Section 34 IPC — Joint conduct despite money being received by a co-accused	A person sharing the common intention may be liable under Section 34 IPC even though a co-accused personally receives the money. The alleged joint approach, demand, presence at payment and delivery of the purported company letter provided prima facie grounds to proceed against the applicant. On that account, the absence of his signature on the letter was not decisive at the quashing stage. The Court’s conclusion concerned sufficient material for prosecution, not final proof of common intention or forgery.	358
Common Intention: Formation During the Occurrence	Section 34 IPC imposes joint liability where a criminal act is committed in furtherance of the participants' common intention. The shared intention must be inferred from proved facts and may develop during the occurrence. Acting with the same intention independently is insufficient. The appellants' arrival with firearms and concerted repeated firing, supported by the injuries and cartridges, established their shared intention notwithstanding uncertainty over a particular shot.	360
Common Intention Inferred From a Coordinated Armed Assault	The first four assailants arrived together with a sword, axe, rod and lathi and inflicted repeated injuries on the deceased and the injured complainant. Their conduct, medically corroborated injuries and coordinated arrival established a prior meeting of minds rather than a chance confrontation. Ramesh and Bablu therefore remained liable under Sections 302/34 and 326/34 although the fatal axe injury was attributed to another member. Their Section 149 convictions were altered to the corresponding Section 34 liability.	388
Later Assailants' Liability Confined to Their Separate Common Intention	The later three assailants arrived after the first group had left. The Court found their proved attack concerned grievous hurt to Ramkali and hurt to Munnalal, without proof of sharing the earlier group's intention to murder Ramnath or injure Virendra. Their murder and Virendra-related liability was removed, and their convictions were confined to Sections 326/34 and 323/34 for the later victims. The four-year and one-year terms were retained concurrently, with the fines and default terms unchanged.	388
Common Intention Under Section 34 Distinguished From Common Object Under Section 149	In the Virendra Singh and Devi Lal passages adopted by the Court, Section 34 requires a common intention anterior to the act and participation in its furtherance; it does not create a separate offence. Section 149 concerns membership of an assembly of at least five persons sharing an unlawful common object and does not require a separate overt act by each member. A common object may develop at the scene without prior concert. The distinction requires the court to identify the basis actually proved against each accused.	388
Section 34 IPC as constructive liability and the prosecution’s burden	Section 34 creates no distinct substantive offence; it attributes joint responsibility for a criminal act done by several persons in furtherance of their common intention. The prosecution must establish the shared intention and participation by substantial, clear evidence, and the court must assess the entire record carefully before imposing constructive liability. If part of the evidence used to establish that liability is disbelieved, the remaining evidence requires particular caution.	399
Common intention distinguished from independently similar intentions	Section 34 requires a meeting of minds to act in concert toward the relevant criminal result. Several persons may independently harbour the same intention, even to kill, without sharing the common intention necessary for constructive liability. The required consensus must be proved from their conduct, circumstances or other incriminating evidence; simultaneous presence or attack does not dispense with that inquiry.	399

28.3 : Common Intention Under Section 34 IPC/BNS Equivalent

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Formation of common intention on the spot	A common plan need not be elaborate or formed long before the occurrence. It may arise suddenly, including during a fight, provided the meeting of minds precedes the criminal act sought to be attributed jointly. The inference that the accused shared the particular intention, especially an intention to commit an offence graver than originally planned, must rest on clear and cogent evidence.	399
Participation through overt acts, covert assistance or illegal omission	A separate overt assault by every accused is unnecessary under Section 34. Participation in furtherance of the shared criminal intention may consist of a different supporting act, covert assistance, guarding the scene or, in appropriate circumstances, an illegal omission. Some participation connected with the joint criminal act remains necessary: merely retaining a common intention in one's mind is insufficient.	399
Mere presence, non-intervention and withdrawal from a common design	Presence at the offence does not automatically make a person liable for everything done there. The act must advance the proved common intention, and the court must examine the accused's participation and any withdrawal on the evidence. Where prior common intention is proved, standing by without dissociating may be relevant, but non-intervention alone cannot replace proof of concert and participation.	399
Physical presence and diverse acts forming one criminal transaction	Physical presence is ordinarily required where the jointly attributed offence is committed physically, particularly when the alleged contribution is instigation or exhortation. The Court also adopted the qualification that presence is not indispensable in every case: an offence may consist of diverse connected acts performed at different times and places. Liability depends on the proved common intention and participation in the particular criminal transaction.	399
Exhortation immediately before a fatal shot as evidence of participation	An exhortation given immediately before a co-accused fires the fatal shot may establish the exhorting accused's participation and common intention on the evidence, supporting conviction under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC. The Court adopted the Sandeep decision in its analysis and assessed the testimony that Dhaniram exhorted the armed assailants during the pursuit and shooting; liability was based on the proved concerted conduct as a whole.	399
Section 34 IPC: shared intention and prior concert	Section 34 IPC creates constructive liability rather than a separate offence. The prosecution must establish a criminal act done by several persons in furtherance of their shared intention, with participation in the joint criminal action. The common intention must precede the criminal act, but the plan may arise suddenly at the scene and need not be elaborate or longstanding. Similar intentions formed independently do not establish the required meeting of minds. Once the requirements are proved, each participant is liable for the joint act as if he had done it himself, even if the precise author of each component act cannot be identified.	433
Proof of exhortation as participation in a murder	Evidence attributing an exhortation requires clear, cogent and reliable proof. Proved words of instigation, considered with the accused's conduct and surrounding circumstances, may establish shared intention under Section 34 IPC. Where credible eyewitnesses consistently establish that the accused exhorted his co-accused immediately before the latter fired the fatal shot, the exhorter may be convicted under Section 302 read with Section 34 even though he did not fire.	433
Participation under Section 34 without a separate overt assault	Participation in furtherance of the common intention need not consist of a separate overt assault by every accused. It may take the form of a covert act, guarding or other assistance, or an illegal omission that facilitates the crime. Separate or diverse acts forming the criminal action are considered together. Mere intention without connected participation is insufficient; the absence of an individual blow does not exclude joint liability.	433
Proof and inference of common intention	The prosecution must prove common intention by substantial, clear and definite evidence, which may be direct or inferred cumulatively from conduct, words,	433

	surrounding circumstances and participation. Where part of the prosecution evidence supporting Section 34 is disbelieved, the remaining evidence requires particular care. An inference that a graver offence became part of the shared plan during its execution must rest on clear and cogent material.
Physical presence and withdrawal from a common criminal venture	For a physically committed offence, presence is ordinarily required for Section 34 liability, particularly where the attributed role is exhortation. Exceptions may arise where the offence consists of diverse acts at different times and places. Mere distance from the scene does not invariably absolve a participant; actual withdrawal from the common venture and the surrounding evidence must be considered. Continued presence without dissuasion is relevant only where the prior common intention is proved.	433
Individual liability in a free fight	If the incident is a free fight, each participant is answerable for his own independent act. That possibility does not permit the High Court, in quashing proceedings on rival versions of an admitted encounter, to decide the aggressor or extinguish the prosecution without evidence.	438
Section 34 IPC — participation in a criminal act with common intention	Section 34 IPC requires a criminal act by several persons in furtherance of their common intention and participation in the joint transaction. A separate overt injury by each accused is unnecessary, but mere accompaniment or participation without common intention does not establish the joint liability. Prior concert may develop at the spur of the moment, provided the shared intention precedes the criminal act. In this case, the Court relied on the accepted eyewitness account, the armed attack and multiple firearm wounds to find a prior meeting of minds between Murarilal and Ashok. It affirmed Ashok's liability for both murders under Sections 302/34 without treating armed presence alone as a universal test.	497
Section 34 IPC: Joint Participation and Common Intention	Section 34 requires a criminal act by several persons in furtherance of their common intention; each participant then bears liability for the whole act. A separate overt blow by every accused is unnecessary, but participation without common intention, or common intention without any contribution to the joint act, is insufficient. Common intention requires concert, which may develop at the spur of the moment. Mere accompaniment does not establish liability.	522
Section 34 IPC: shared intention and participation in the joint act	Section 34 requires proof that several persons participated in a criminal act in furtherance of their common intention. Common intention must exist before the act, although it may develop on the spur of the moment. Participation need not take the form of an identical assault or a separate overt act by each accused; a contribution may be overt, covert or, in an appropriate situation, an illegal omission. Mere companionship does not establish joint liability, and participation without common intention is insufficient. On the accepted evidence of holding and instigation during the firearm assault, the Court affirmed the Section 302/34 convictions of the participating co-accused.	555
Proof of common intention under Section 34 IPC	Liability under Section 34 IPC requires both shared intention and participation in the criminal act in furtherance of it. The shared intention may arise on the spot but must precede the offence; similar intentions or mere presence are insufficient. It must be inferred safely from the accused persons' acts, conduct and the circumstances as a whole. In the sudden confrontation caused by the renewed discharge of waste water, the Court found common intention unproved and held each appellant responsible for his own act.	561
Common intention inferred from a concerted armed attack	A prior meeting of minds and participation in a concerted attack with deadly weapons may establish common intention under Section 34 IPC. Where the shared intention to murder and the joint attack are proved, each participant may be liable under Section 302 read with Section 34 without proof that each inflicted a fatal injury.	570

prior concert under Section 34 IPC	common intention and participation in the joint act. A separate overt act by every accused is unnecessary, but mere accompaniment or participation without common intention is insufficient. The common intention must precede the act, although it may develop at the scene.
Holding the victim while a co-accused inflicts fatal blows: Section 34 IPC	A person who participates in a criminal act in furtherance of a shared intention is liable for that act as if he committed it himself. The accepted evidence that Hariram held the victim's hands while Veer Singh struck him with an axe supported constructive liability under Section 302/34 IPC, although Hariram did not inflict the blows.	584
Common intention under Section 34 IPC distinguished from independently similar intentions	Section 34 creates constructive liability, not a separate offence. The prosecution must prove a shared intention and participation in action furthering that intention; several people independently having the same intention is insufficient. The shared plan may arise suddenly at the scene, but must precede the criminal act in point of time. It may be inferred from conduct and circumstances after careful assessment of the whole evidence.	584
Participation under Section 34 IPC without a separate overt assault	Each participant need not inflict an injury or perform a separate overt assault. Assistance may consist of an overt or covert act, or an illegal omission, provided it advances the proved common intention and has a connection with the offence. Merely keeping an intention in mind without participating is insufficient. Presence and its significance must be assessed in context; participation does not invariably require physical presence where the offence comprises connected acts at different times or places.	584
Section 34 makes a joint participant liable for a fatal injury inflicted by another in furtherance of their proved common intention	The Court applied Section 34 IPC to the concerted attack after Badu's altercation with Pappu: Rakesh came with a luhangi, Kailash with a lathi, and both assaulted Pappu. The postmortem assigned death to severe head trauma; no witness specifically attributed a fatal head blow to Kailash. Where the criminal act is done in furtherance of the common intention of all, individual infliction of the fatal injury is unnecessary for Section 302/34 liability. The Court inferred shared intention from their arrival and participation, rejected Kailash's proposed limitation to his own alleged back blow, and affirmed his murder conviction. The finding is tied to proved joint participation, not mere presence or family connection.	675
Murder liability under Section 34 after failure of the Section 149 charge	After acquitting the alleged additional members, the Court held the four proved armed attackers guilty of murder under Sections 302 and 34 IPC. Fewer than five persons remained proved to have participated, but the accepted evidence of their joint attack supported common-intention liability. They were acquitted under Section 148, while the life sentence for murder was maintained.	713
Common intention inferred from a concerted armed assault	Common intention was established where armed assailants jointly confronted and surrounded the victim and one of them fired the fatal shot. On the evidence of their concerted conduct, the Court upheld the liability of the accompanying assailant under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC.	720
Common intention to murder requires proof beyond participation in an abrupt assault	The Court observed that — Section 34 IPC requires a criminal act by several persons in furtherance of their common intention, with some participation in the joint action; the shared plan may be inferred from conduct and can develop at the scene, but mere association or accompaniment is insufficient. It discussed Suresh Sankharam Nangare, Shyamal Ghosh, Mrinal Das, Ramashish Yadav, Hem Raj, Dashrathlal and other authorities on prior concert, participation and the limits of vicarious liability. Ramji and Govind Das were described as kicking, striking with fists and exhorting Laxmi Narayan, but they carried no weapon, and the Court found a sudden altercation without a proved meeting of minds to cause the fatal head injury. It therefore set aside their Section 302/34 convictions, while holding them responsible for simple hurt under Section 323 and sentencing them to custody already undergone. The order does not state	733 that exhortation can never prove common intention; it evaluates this record and the differing roles.

Section 34 participation may consist of a covert act or intentional illegal omission	Liability under Section 34 IPC requires participation in the joint criminal act in furtherance of the shared intention. Participation need not consist of a separate overt injury inflicted by every accused. The Court explained that an act may be overt or covert and, in an appropriate situation, an intentional illegal omission may further the common design. Common intention without any such participation is insufficient, just as participation without the requisite shared intention does not attract Section 34. The distinction informed the Court's separate assessment of the principal assailant and the two companions; the latter's established acts of simple hurt did not, on this record, establish a common intention to cause the fatal injury.	733
Common intention and participation in a joint assault	Section 34 IPC imposes constructive liability for a criminal act done by several persons in furtherance of their common intention; it creates no separate offence. The prosecution must prove both the shared intention and participation advancing it. On the accepted evidence of the concerted axe, lathi and spade assault on the two deceased and the intervenors, the Court upheld two convictions under Sections 302/34 and four under Sections 323/34 IPC.	766
Shared intention differs from independent similar intentions	Section 34 requires a meeting of minds to bring about the criminal result, not merely several people independently having the same intention. The shared plan may form suddenly or during the incident, but must precede the criminal act to which liability attaches. Common intention is also distinct from an individual's mens rea. The inference of concert, especially for a graver result, requires clear evidence from conduct and circumstances.	766
Participation without a separate overt blow under Section 34	A separate overt assault by every participant need not be proved. Participation may be covert, consist of guarding the scene or an illegal omission, or form one of a series of acts advancing the common design. It must nevertheless have a nexus with the offence and further the shared intention. A common intention kept only in the mind, without participation in the criminal action, is insufficient.	766
Physical presence and withdrawal in common-intention liability	Presence is ordinarily required for a physically committed offence, particularly where the alleged role is instigation or exhortation, but exceptions may arise where the criminal action comprises diverse acts at different times and places. Mere distance from the immediate scene does not itself absolve a participant. Actual withdrawal from a shared design is a factual matter to assess; presence alone, without proved common intention and participation, does not create liability.	766
Proving common intention by cumulative and cautious assessment	The prosecution bears the burden of proving common intention through substantial, definite and clear evidence. Direct proof of a joint plan is not essential; the inference may arise from the entire conduct and circumstances. Because liability extends to another's criminal act, remaining evidence must be assessed with particular care where part of the prosecution evidence has been disbelieved. A graver shared design cannot be assumed from association alone.	766
Later arrival after a co-accused's call does not conclusively negate shared intention at charge stage	The FIR alleged that Sanu telephoned Ubesh during the attack and that Ubesh came with an iron rod and assaulted both injured brothers. The Court declined to infer merely from his arrival after the confrontation began that he could not share the intention required for Section 34 IPC. His alleged active participation made the issue triable on evidence, rather than finally decidable in a Sections 397/401 CrPC revision against the charge. The Court made no finding that common intention had been proved and directed a separate reconsideration of the appropriate collective-liability charge.	819
Proof of joint participation in	The accepted last-seen evidence, recovery of the child's body at the accused's instance, medical proof of homicidal strangulation and failure to explain the	850

murder through cumulative circumstances	incriminating circumstances together established the appellant's guilt beyond reasonable doubt. On that cumulative evidence, the Court affirmed the conviction and life sentence under Sections 302/34 IPC read with Section 13 of the MPDVPK Act, although the trial court had acquitted the accused of kidnapping for ransom.
Section 34 IPC: participation in a criminal act with common intention	Section 34 imposes joint liability where several persons participate in a criminal act in furtherance of their common intention. Each is liable for the combined act without proof that each inflicted the fatal injury. The prosecution must establish participation and a prior meeting of minds, which may develop at the scene before the act. Mere accompaniment is insufficient, and participation without common intention does not attract the section. On the accepted evidence, the armed assailants jointly carried out the planned firearm attack, establishing common intention and participation against the surviving appellants.	873
Section 34 IPC — common intention and participation in the joint criminal act	Section 34 IPC requires proof of common intention and participation in the joint criminal act. Each participant need not inflict an identical injury or a separately visible blow. Participation may include intentional assistance from a distance or an illegal omission contributing to the common design; common intention alone, without participation, is insufficient. The meeting of minds may develop at the scene, but mere accompaniment does not establish liability. Gorelal’s alleged shoe blow was treated as occurring after death, with no corresponding injury; the evidence did not establish his participation in a shared murderous plan. His lack of a weapon, weeping beside the body and presence and signature at the inquest were considered cumulatively. His conviction was set aside while Shivcharan’s individual conviction remained.	885
Section 34 IPC: attributable participation beyond mere association	Liability under Section 34 IPC requires participation in a joint criminal act committed in furtherance of common intention. Every accused need not inflict a separate injury: participation may take the form of overt or covert conduct, including a culpable omission in the circumstances described by the Court. Merely accompanying other accused does not establish liability, and common intention without proved participation was insufficient on this record. In the State's appeal, the evidence did not establish Ram Outar's or Subhash's participation in the joint crime, so their acquittal was affirmed. The decision does not impose a universal requirement that every participant personally assault the victim.	918
Section 34 IPC: prosecution proof of common intention and prior concert	The prosecution must establish that the joint criminal act was committed pursuant to shared intention and prior concert; participation alone without common intention does not attract Section 34 IPC. The Court's narrated authorities explain that the meeting of minds must precede the relevant criminal act, while the common intention may develop on the spur of the moment. Common intention does not make each person liable for an entirely different act outside the shared design. These requirements formed part of the Court's assessment of the insufficient evidence against the acquitted respondents.	918
Separate trial acquittal and liability under Section 34 IPC	An acquittal in another person’s separate trial does not bind the court determining the present accused’s guilt on a different evidentiary record. Where the evidence in the present trial warrants it, liability under Section 34 IPC may be assessed on participation with a person acquitted in that other trial. This differs from conflicting findings in the same trial that acquit the other specified participants yet convict one accused of acting jointly with them. Each separate case must turn on its own evidence.	944
Calling relatives before a quarrel does not by itself establish common	Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC could not be applied to Banti merely because, at his father’s instruction, he went to call his brothers before any fight had begun. The initial accounts did not show that anyone was then armed, that	951 intention to murder	Banti knew his brothers would bring firearms, or that he returned and participated in the shooting. The later allegations of procuring weapons and exhorting the killing were material, unexplained improvements. In those circumstances, the Court found no proved common intention to kill and acquitted Banti. The decision concerning the surviving appellants followed the earlier abatement of Suresh Chandra's appeal on his death.

	Sub-Chapter no. 28.4 Preparation, Attempt, Abetment and Criminal Conspiracy
Abetment of suicide: instigation inferred from continuing coercive conduct	Instigation under Section 107 IPC may be direct or indirect and may be inferred from a continuing course of conduct that creates circumstances leaving the deceased no option except suicide. Express words directing suicide are not essential, but an intention and a reasonably certain connection with the consequence must emerge. At the FIR-quashing stage, continued harassment and pressure by a married man with children to marry him, despite her parents' requests to stop, disclosed a prima facie case under Section 306. The Court treated the proposed second marriage during the first marriage's subsistence as legally void and refused to quash.	27
Conspiracy inferred from coordinated acts facilitating rape	The Court inferred a common plan from the coordinated acts of one accused dragging the victim into his house and locking her in a room where the other accused was already waiting and committed rape. Their awareness of her regular route and timing supported that inference. Those proved circumstances established conspiracy in this case and justified the second accused's liability under Section 120-B read with the rape provision.	38
Lawful cruelty complaint — No abetment of suicide merely from prosecution	Where the sole allegation was that the husband committed suicide because his wife had lodged a cruelty and dowry complaint which he considered false, the complaint and the ensuing charge sheet did not establish abetment under Sections 306 and 107 IPC. Taking the legal remedy of reporting an alleged offence, without any further act of instigation or intentional assistance to suicide, did not amount to abetment by the wife or her parents. The truth of the underlying allegations remained for the trial court to determine on evidence.	114
Section 107 IPC — Conspiracy and intentional aid as forms of abetment	Abetment may consist of instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission in pursuance of it, or intentional assistance by an act or illegal omission. Under Explanation 2 to Section 107 IPC, an act done before or at the time of the principal act must be intended to facilitate it and must in fact facilitate its commission to constitute aiding. An allegation that the deceased reacted to a lawful complaint does not by itself establish any of these forms of abetment.	114
Criminal conspiracy may be inferred from the parties' conduct	Criminal conspiracy requires an agreement between two or more persons to commit an illegal act or a lawful act by illegal means. As conspiracies are not ordinarily formed openly, the agreement may be inferred from conduct. Advance fee acceptance before seats were said to become vacant supported a prima facie inference of an understanding between the college management and the candidates.	204
Mere presence does not establish participation in a murder conspiracy	A person's presence with the assailant at the scene does not by itself establish a conspiracy to murder. Where the alleged participation was not reliably proved and no evidence linked the other accused to a conspiracy with the shooter, their acquittal under Sections 302/120-B IPC was upheld.	207
Knowing attestation and participation in preparing forged documents	The appellants knowingly identified an impostor as the owner and signed the fabricated sale deeds as witnesses; one also signed under another person's name and arranged the drafts. Their active role in preparing the false documents distinguished Sheila Sebastian and supported convictions under Sections 420/120-B, 467/120-B and 471/120-B IPC.	234

28.4 : Preparation, Attempt, Abetment and Criminal Conspiracy

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Conspiracy and absence of proved personal benefit	Conspiracy is ordinarily arranged in secrecy. Where knowing collaboration in an impersonated sale and the preparation of forged deeds is established by the evidence, uncertainty about the precise inducement or personal benefit received by an attesting participant does not erase his proved participation. The Court rejected the plea of non-beneficiary status on that basis.	234
Supplying kerosene and matches while exhorting suicide	The conduct went beyond merely telling the deceased to die: the accused also supplied kerosene and a matchbox, thereby facilitating and provoking the suicide. Applying the reasoning reproduced from Babloo alias Devanand, the Court held that these combined acts established abetment under Section 306 IPC beyond reasonable doubt.	268
Intention and circumstantial inference in abetment by instigation	Instigation involves provoking, inciting, urging or encouraging another to act, with the necessary intention. Express words directing the precise consequence are not indispensable if that intention can reasonably be inferred from acts, omissions or a course of conduct. Angry or emotional words without an intention that the consequence follow do not, by themselves, amount to instigation. Whether the circumstances establish instigation must be assessed in the particular case.	268
Intentional assistance that facilitates the act under Section 107 IPC	Abetment under Section 107 IPC includes intentional aid by an act or illegal omission. A person aids an act where, before or at its commission, the person intentionally does something to facilitate it and thereby actually facilitates it. The Court applied this principle to the supply of kerosene and matches in the circumstances of the suicide.	268
Participation in a conspiracy to execute a forged land transfer	Participation in the conspiracy was inferred from the accused's proved roles in the forged transaction. The attesting accused signed both the forged power of attorney and the sale deed; the purchaser attended registration and put her thumb impression on a deed falsely recording payment of consideration. Those circumstances supported their conspiracy liability.	273
Sections 107 and 306 IPC — sustained cruelty creating a situation leading to suicide	The Court treated sustained conduct creating a situation in which the deceased felt left with no option but to end her life as abetment under Section 107 IPC. It found that the husband resumed cruelty after securing her return through an apology and written assurances, destroying her hope of improvement and leading to suicide. On that evidence it upheld Section 306 along with Section 498-A. The finding rests on the established course of conduct and its connection with the suicide; it does not equate every matrimonial disagreement with abetment.	328
Attempt to promote enmity — an overt act beyond preparation is necessary	An attempt requires an overt act beyond intention or mere preparation, reasonably proximate to the intended offence. It need not be the final act before completion. In hate-speech cases there must be actual expression or another overt act constituting the content; thought alone is not punishable. Whether an attempt to publish has occurred depends on the facts and intent. Intervening circumstances preventing actual disorder do not by themselves rule out a punishable attempt.	348
Section 306 IPC: Prima Facie Assessment of Specific Cruelty Allegations	On the specific allegations of harassment against the applicant and the other in-laws, including threats, assaults and deliberate disruption of the deceased's living conditions, the Court found sufficient prima facie material to permit prosecution for abetment of suicide. It accordingly refused quashing under Section 482 CrPC.	366
Repayment Demand After a Failed Job Assurance and Abetment of Suicide	On the allegations considered, the applicants had paid money for promised government appointments and sought its return when no appointment followed. The Court held that their repayment demand and assertion of membership of an association that was not prohibited did not establish abetment of suicide under Sections 306 and 107 IPC. Its conclusion concerned the applicants' transaction and conduct as assessed in the judgment.	453

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Sections 107 and 306 IPC — demand for repayment without proved instigation	Abetment requires instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission in pursuance of it, or intentional aid. Instigation involves intentional encouragement or incitement and may be inferred from a continued course of conduct creating circumstances in which the victim sees no alternative to suicide. Mere harassment or words spoken in anger without the necessary intention are insufficient; the prosecution must establish the requisite mental element and direct or indirect incitement connected with the suicide. Courts must also distinguish proved incitement from a hypersensitive reaction to ordinary discord. Since unlawful additional demands were not proved and the appellant was seeking repayment of his loan, the Court found no abetment and set aside the conviction.	480
Prima Facie Instigation to Suicide from Continued Harassment and Coercive Conduct	Abetment of suicide under Sections 306 and 107 IPC requires culpable intent and instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid. Mere harassment without a positive act of incitement or intentional aid proximate to the suicide is insufficient. Instigation may be inferred from conduct and circumstances showing intentional incitement; an angry remark without the intended consequence is insufficient. Ordinary discord and a merely hypersensitive reaction require careful assessment. At charge framing, allegations of repeated harassment, holding the deceased's hands, insisting that she accompany the accused and challenging her to die when she refused, followed immediately by her jumping into a well, could support a tentative inference of instigation. The final words could not be isolated from that course of conduct and treated as a mere angry outburst.	536
Abetment of suicide — mens rea and positive instigation or aid	Section 306 IPC requires abetment within Section 107, by instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission in pursuance of it, or intentional aid. A conviction requires clear mens rea and a positive, active or direct act of the accused intended to push the deceased into a position in which suicide appears to be the only option. Suicide or distress by itself does not establish the offence.	684
Coercive demands after repayment — prima facie instigation to suicide	Allegations that lenders continued to demand excessive payment after full repayment, subjected the borrower to a false case and prevented him from attending duty could not be treated as mere recovery of legitimate dues. Read with the witness accounts and the suicide note as described by the Court, that continuing pressure disclosed a prima facie overt act capable of supporting prosecution under Sections 306 and 34 IPC.	684
Intentional aid — conduct which actually facilitates the act	For abetment by intentional aid, the accused must intentionally do an act or make an illegal omission to assist the act in question. Conduct before or at the time of the act amounts to aid where it is done to facilitate that act and actually facilitates it.	684
Intentional instigation and its inference from continued conduct	Abetment of suicide requires intentional instigation or aid with a causal connection to the suicide. Mere harassment without a connected positive act is insufficient for conviction. Instigation may nevertheless be inferred from acts, omissions or a sustained course of conduct creating circumstances in which the deceased is left with no other option. Direct words of incitement are not indispensable, but the intent to incite must be discernible. The Court found the prosecution material sufficient for a charge, without finally determining guilt.	715
Section 306 suicide abetment — intentional instigation or aid beyond harassment and hurt	Under Section 107 IPC, abetment may be by instigation, conspiracy followed by an act or illegal omission in pursuance of the conspiracy and in order to its object, or intentional aid. Chitresh Kumar Chopra, Praveen Pradhan, Sanju, Gangula Mohan Reddy, M. Mohan, Kishori Lal, Amalendu Pal and Ramesh Kumar were considered on mens rea, a positive direct or indirect act, the possibility of inference from a sustained course leaving no other option, proximity, and the insufficiency of anger or ordinary discord alone. Orilal	736

	Jaiswal cautions against attributing a hypersensitive response to ordinary differences. Even crediting property damage, repeated abuse, and assaults alleged here, the Court found no act or intended course amounting to instigation of Neeraj Singh's suicide; the temporal closeness of the last assault did not by itself supply that ingredient.
Refusal of a property share without conduct abetting suicide	Refusal by a father to give his son a claimed share in property does not, by itself, amount to abetment of suicide. On the allegations accepted at face value, strained relations with the father and stepmother and the property and belongings dispute disclosed no prima facie act of instigation or intentional aid. The Court also found no allegation of cruel upbringing or neglect merely because the father had remarried. It therefore found no prima facie abetment by the father.	764
Statutory forms of abetment under Section 107 IPC	Abetment may consist of instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission in pursuance of the conspiracy and for the act's commission, or intentional aid by an act or illegal omission. Aid includes conduct before or at the time of the act that is intended to facilitate it and actually does so. For liability under Section 306 IPC, the prosecution must establish abetment of the suicide through the applicable statutory mode.	764
Conspiracy between revenue officials proved by their coordinated conduct	The Revenue Inspector directed the complainant to contact the Patwari and pay what she demanded. Her recorded negotiations, continued contact, their joint presence and the instruction to pay the intermediary established coordinated action for the bribe. On that combined evidence, the Court found the conspiracy between the two officers proved beyond reasonable doubt.	879
Sections 107 and 306 IPC — instigation inferred from intentional continuing conduct	Abetment under Section 107 IPC consists of instigation, conspiracy followed by an act or illegal omission in pursuance of it, or intentional aid. Instigation involves provoking, urging or encouraging the act; an express command to commit suicide is unnecessary if a reasonably certain inciting consequence can be inferred. Intentional acts, omissions or a continuing course of conduct that creates circumstances leaving the deceased with no other option may support that inference. It depends on the abettor's intention and the circumstances, and cannot be reduced to a fixed formula. Words spoken in anger or emotion without intending the consequence do not suffice. These principles informed the Court's prima facie assessment of the alleged recurrent threats and taunts.	884
Section 306 IPC — repeated threats of false rape prosecution and humiliation	Continuous, calculated intimidation and humiliation that destroys self-esteem and drives a person to the limit of endurance may amount to instigation, rather than mere teasing or an isolated insult. The suicide note and witness accounts alleged repeated threats to implicate the deceased falsely in rape and eve-teasing cases and send him to jail unless his family sold its house and left the colony. The Court considered the effect on his career, studies and social standing, together with daily taunts that he had not died despite the criminal cases, sufficient to disclose a prima facie case under Section 306 IPC. Although the note did not specifically attribute the rape threat to applicant 2, witness statements supported her alleged participation and common intention.	884
Section 306 IPC — harassment, intent and proximity of the alleged incitement	Conviction for abetment of suicide requires a clear mental element and an active or direct act of instigation or intentional assistance linked to the suicide. Mere harassment, without positive action proximate to the occurrence that led or compelled the deceased to end his life, is insufficient. Courts must distinguish such incitement from hypersensitivity to ordinary petulance, discord or differences that would not ordinarily induce a similarly situated person to commit suicide. In the present quashing proceeding, the Court considered the alleged sustained false rape-case threats and humiliation affecting the deceased's career and self-esteem sufficient to permit prosecution, subject to proof at trial.	884

Abetment of suicide — angry words without intention to instigate suicide	Sections 306 and 107 IPC require instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission, or intentional aid in committing suicide. The requisite intention and a positive act of incitement or assistance must be shown. Even accepting the allegations, the accused's statement that an absconding adversary should die rather than keep fleeing, without any further overt act or intention to induce suicide, did not constitute abetment.	900
Abetment of suicide — isolated threat without an intention to induce suicide	An isolated threat to kill the deceased, without an alleged background, earlier threats, enmity or material showing an intention to induce suicide, did not disclose abetment under Sections 306 and 107 IPC. Even accepting the prosecution allegations, the threatening words in the circumstances considered did not justify a trial for abetment of suicide.	902
Attempt under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act despite stopped payment	False work records, bypassed technical scrutiny, a bill submitted two days after the work order, non-installation of the hand pump and advancement of the file towards payment were assessed together as a concerted attempt to obtain money for work not done. Cheques had been prepared, but a complaint stopped payment. Absence of actual disbursement therefore did not prevent conviction of the municipal official under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act read with Section 120B IPC. This was an application to the proved transaction, rather than a general statement of every ingredient of corruption or conspiracy.	914
Attempted corruption and conspiracy despite non-release of payment	In assessing the Executive Engineer's participation in the offence under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act read with Section 120-B IPC, his role had to be considered throughout the transaction. He approved an estimate inconsistent with the claim that the pump had already been removed, accepted quotations processed without the required technical scrutiny and issued the work order. A bill was then submitted for work that the spot record showed had not been done. The false completion record and absence of measurements supported the finding of participation. Stoppage of payment after the complaint did not defeat the finding of an attempt on these facts.	920
Family relationship and telephone contact as proof of criminal conspiracy	Telephone contact between close relatives, without other incriminating evidence, did not conclusively establish an agreement to abduct and kill the deceased. Sunil and Deepak were not proved to have participated in the abduction, been last seen with the deceased or possessed incriminating articles. The alleged recipient phone numbers were also not linked to Mukesh. The conspiracy evidence was therefore insufficient to sustain their convictions, which were set aside on separate assessment of their roles.	934
Fraudulently created debt — prima facie abetment of suicide	Allegations that the accused fraudulently created a KCC facility and withdrew ₹5.75 lakh, leaving the deceased and his brother liable for about ₹7 lakh with interest, disclosed sufficient material to proceed under Section 306 IPC. In assessing the alleged instigation, the Court considered the burden of repayment, possible loss of mortgaged property and the effect on the deceased's future. The impact of a debt depends on the person's circumstances; the Court rejected a universal rule that a suicide following fraudulent withdrawal can never involve abetment. Applying the requirement of intentional instigation and its possible inference from conduct, it refused quashing at the prima facie stage. V.P. Singh and Netai Dutta were distinguished because their allegations were materially different.	992
Section 306 IPC — intentional abetment and connection with the suicide	Abetment of suicide requires instigation, a conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission, or intentional aid within Section 107 IPC. The accused must have the requisite mental element, and the conduct must bear a sufficient connection to the suicide. Mere harassment or a grievance, without proximate positive conduct amounting to incitement or aid, is insufficient. Express words are not always necessary: instigation may be inferred from an intentional course of conduct creating circumstances in which the deceased feels no alternative	994 remains. Ordinary family discord and a deceased person's particular sensitivity cannot by themselves establish criminal abetment. Applying the reproduced Supreme Court principles, the Court found no prima facie abetment in the unmet expectations of family financial support.

	Sub-Chapter no. 28.5 Mens Rea, Intention, Knowledge and Causation
Explanation 2 to Section 299 IPC — preventable death and causation	Where bodily injury causes death, the person inflicting that injury is deemed to have caused the death even though proper remedies and skilful treatment might have prevented it. The possibility of medical survival therefore does not by itself sever causation. The Court applied this rule to fatal burns and ensuing complications; classification as murder still depended on the proved injury and required mental element.	19
Inferring homicidal intention from the whole circumstances	Intention is a question of fact to be inferred from the circumstances, including the weapon, whether it was carried or obtained at the scene, the body part targeted, force used, planning or suddenness, prior enmity or provocation, heat of passion, unfair advantage and the number of blows. The location of the injury alone does not determine the offence. The listed circumstances are relevant considerations, not an exhaustive or mechanical formula.	36
Inferring homicidal intent — weapon, injury, force and surrounding circumstances must be considered together	Intention or knowledge is inferred from the circumstances, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part targeted, the force and number of blows, prior enmity, premeditation, sudden quarrel or provocation, heat of passion, and undue advantage or cruelty. No fixed rule reduces every single-blow case to Section 304 IPC. The nature of the offence depends on the proved circumstances and the relevant statutory ingredients, not the number of injuries alone.	77
Mental element required for culpable homicide	Causing death alone does not establish culpable homicide under Section 299 IPC. The act must be accompanied by an intention to cause death, an intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that the act is likely to cause death. The required mental element is assessed from the act and the surrounding facts and circumstances.	93
Inference of intention from the circumstances of the assault	Intention must be gathered from the combined circumstances of the case. Relevant considerations include the weapon, whether it was carried or picked up at the scene, the body part targeted, force used, the number of blows, premeditation or a chance encounter, prior enmity, provocation, sudden quarrel or fight, heat of passion, and any undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The list is not exhaustive. Neither the location of the injury nor the number of blows alone determines the offence.	93
Knowledge distinguished from intention in homicide	Knowledge concerns awareness of the relevant circumstances, while intention concerns the consequence desired. Either may exist without the other. For Section 300 Secondly IPC, knowledge that the intended injury is likely to cause the particular victim's death requires a degree of certainty rather than mere probability.	93
Causal connection between the act and death	An act may cause death directly or through consequences that naturally or necessarily flow from it and can reasonably be contemplated as its result. The required mental element under Section 299 IPC must also be present before the death amounts to culpable homicide.	93
Abetment of suicide — Intention and a positive act linked to suicide	Liability under Section 306 IPC requires a clear intention to instigate or intentionally assist suicide and an active or direct act intended to place the deceased in a position where suicide appears the only option. Mere harassment, without a positive act proximate to the suicide, is insufficient for conviction. Words spoken in anger or emotion without intending the consequence are not instigation. The deceased's distress over the prosecution did not establish the	114 applicants' intentional involvement in his suicide.

Voluntary causing of hurt under Section 39 IPC	Persons who came armed and assaulted the victims without established private defence or grave and sudden provocation were treated as knowing the consequences of their chosen weapons. Their resulting hurt was voluntarily caused within Section 39 IPC. Refusal to accompany an accused to purchase a transformer did not supply grave and sudden provocation for the armed assault.	165
Overloading and causation of a wrong-side collision	The presence of three adults and a child on the victims' motorcycle did not displace the accused's responsibility for the collision where the evidence and spot map showed that he approached from the wrong side and struck the motorcycle on its proper extreme left side. The Court found the accused solely negligent and affirmed the convictions under Sections 279, 338 and 304-A IPC.	194
Intention distinguished from motive and knowledge	Intention differs from motive. Knowledge that harmful consequences may follow is awareness of those consequences and does not by itself establish an intention that they should occur. Intention involves purposeful action to achieve the relevant end. These states of mind must be inferred from the weapon, force of the attack, injuries and surrounding circumstances.	223
Inferring homicidal intention from the circumstances of the assault	Intention is a factual inference from the whole occurrence, rather than the injury's location alone. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the targeted body part and force, premeditation or a sudden encounter, prior enmity or provocation, heat of passion, undue advantage or cruelty, and the number of blows. The factors must be considered together and are not exhaustive.	259
Good faith under Section 52 IPC and a disputed claim of ignorance	Good faith under Section 52 IPC requires due care and attention. In seeking quashing, the Collector could not establish good faith merely by asserting that he did not know of the agreement, when it assigned duties to his office and a copy had been endorsed to the Collector. Whether he had acted with due care and attention was left for him to establish at trial.	290
Homicidal intention — inference from the whole circumstances	The intention accompanying a fatal assault is a question of fact inferred from the circumstances as a whole. The weapon used, whether it was carried or picked up, the part of the body targeted, the force and injuries, premeditation, provocation, the course of the confrontation and the number of blows may be relevant. The location of the injury alone does not determine the offence.	335
Inferring Intention From the Circumstances of an Assault	Intention is inferred from the combined circumstances, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part targeted, the force used, premeditation, prior enmity, provocation, heat of passion, undue advantage and the manner and number of blows. These factors are illustrative rather than exhaustive. Injury location is relevant but does not by itself determine the offence; the necessary statutory mental element must still be established.	383
Knowledge that death is likely— probability rather than possibility	For the relevant culpable-homicide assessment, "likely" refers to probability rather than a mere possibility. The Court must consider the accused's situation in deciding whether the accused knew that the act was likely to cause death.	412
Homicidal intention — inference from the combined circumstances	Intention is a question of fact inferred from the combined circumstances rather than the location of the injury alone. The Court adopted consideration of the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part targeted, force used, prior enmity or premeditation, chance encounter, provocation, sudden fight and heat of passion, undue advantage or cruelty, and the number of blows. The list is not exhaustive. The Court applied the weapon, vital-part injuries and coordinated conduct in finding an intentional fatal attack.	497
Inferring Homicidal Intention from the Whole Circumstances	Intention is a question of fact to be inferred from the act and the surrounding circumstances, rather than from the location of an injury alone. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the part targeted, force, number of blows, prior enmity or chance encounter, premeditation,	522 provocation, sudden fight, heat of passion and any undue advantage or cruel manner of attack. These factors require a combined assessment and are not exhaustive.

Inferring intention from the weapon, injury and surrounding circumstances	Intention is a question of fact assessed from the whole circumstances. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the part of the body targeted, the force and manner of attack, the number of blows, prior enmity or preparation, sudden quarrel, provocation, heat of passion and any unfair advantage or cruelty. The location of the injury alone does not determine the offence.	584
Knowledge distinguished from intention in homicide	Knowledge and intention are distinct mental states, although they often coincide. Intention concerns the consequence sought; knowledge concerns awareness of the relevant circumstance or consequence even where it is not desired. In the discussion of Section 300 Secondly, the narrated authorities describe knowledge in terms of certainty or virtual certainty, rather than mere probability. The Court's homicide analysis therefore required assessment of the particular mental state specified by the applicable clause.	599
Direct and proximate causation in negligent death	For an offence under Section 304-A IPC, the rash or negligent act must be the direct, immediate and proximate cause of death. The immediate cause depends on the particular facts and must be distinguished from a mere background condition. Applying that principle to the quashing request, the Court found that failure to place safety signs led the motorcyclist into the culvert ditch and caused his death, bringing the case within the safety-breach reasoning in Sushil Ansal.	617
Inferring homicidal intention from surrounding circumstances	Intention is a question of fact to be gathered from the act and all surrounding circumstances. The location of injury alone does not determine the offence. The Court considered the nature of the weapon, body part chosen, force and injury, and the circumstances of the assault as relevant to determining the mental state required by Sections 299 and 300 IPC.	648
Knowledge under Section 300 Secondly requires more than mere probability	In examining Section 300 Secondly IPC, the Court treated knowledge that an intended bodily injury was likely to cause the particular victim's death as involving certainty of the relevant circumstances, rather than mere probability. It distinguished knowledge from a desire to bring about a consequence: the two mental states may coincide, but need not do so. The Court did not apply clause Secondly on the facts and proceeded to clause Thirdly, under which the intention to inflict the particular injury and its objective sufficiency to cause death are separate inquiries. The knowledge discussion therefore does not add a requirement of knowledge of fatality to clause Thirdly.	733
Knowledge under Section 300 Secondly and its distinction from intention	The knowledge contemplated by Section 300 Secondly involves awareness of the relevant circumstances with certainty rather than mere probability. Intention concerns the result desired, while knowledge concerns awareness of a consequence; the two often coexist but are not identical. The Court distinguished this enquiry from Section 300 Thirdly, where the intended particular injury and its objective fatal sufficiency are decisive.	766
Inferring homicidal intention from the whole assault	Intention must be inferred from the proved circumstances as a whole. Relevant considerations include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part targeted, force, number and manner of blows, premeditation, prior enmity, provocation, sudden fight, heat of passion and any cruel or unfair advantage. No single circumstance mechanically determines the offence. The Court treated the fatal head injuries together with the assault evidence as supporting murder liability.	766
Inferring homicidal intention from the circumstances of the	Intention must be inferred from the combined circumstances, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the bodily part targeted, the force used, the number of blows, premeditation or chance encounter, prior	772 assault	enmity, provocation, heat of passion, and any undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. No single circumstance or injury count decides the issue, and the factors are not exhaustive. The Court adopted Pulicherla Nagaraju and Sangapagu Anjaiah in explaining the careful assessment required to distinguish murder from lesser homicide.

Section 304-A IPC: proof of the accused's rash or negligent act causing death	A Section 304-A IPC conviction requires proof that death resulted from the accused's own rash or negligent act. Although the deceased was fatally trampled by a bullock belonging to the appellant, the prosecution witness specifically attributed the act of driving the bullocks from behind to the appellant's brother. The appellant's insistence that his cattle be attended to first did not establish that he caused them to rush. In the absence of proof connecting the appellant's rash or negligent act to the fatal trampling, the conviction could not stand.	834
Distinction between intention and knowledge in homicide	Intention and knowledge are distinct mental states: a consequence may be desired without being foreknown as certain, or known to follow without being desired. The reproduced Arun Nivalaji More reasoning explains knowledge as awareness without substantial doubt, including virtual certainty, and treats the accused's knowledge as material to Section 300 Secondly. The mental state required by the applicable homicide provision must be proved rather than inferred merely from the occurrence of death.	849
Section 52 IPC: good-faith purchase requires due care and attention	An act or belief is not in good faith under Section 52 IPC if it lacks due care and attention. A purchaser's assertion of an honest belief in the seller's ownership is insufficient without explaining the checks made on the earlier title records. Where those records showed government forest land and there was no governmental release or title document authorising the sellers to alienate it, the Court rejected the subsequent purchasers' claim of a bona fide transaction for the purpose of their quashing applications.	871
Inferring intention from the combined circumstances of a fatal assault	Homicidal intention is a question of fact inferred from the combined circumstances. Relevant considerations include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part targeted, force, number of blows, premeditation or chance encounter, prior enmity, provocation, heat of passion and undue advantage or cruel conduct. The list is not exhaustive. The Court adopted Pulicherla Nagaraju and Sangapagu Anjaiah and found intention in the prepared firearm attack on the unarmed victims.	873
Death from complications caused by the original injuries	Complications developing from injuries caused by the accused do not, for that reason alone, break the causal connection with the assault. Applying Bablu @ Virendra Kumar, the Court held the later death attributable to the inflicted injuries. Repeated sword blows to the head, a vital part, established the intention and knowledge to cause murder; the injuries were found sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.	936
Inferring homicidal intention from the whole circumstances	Intention must be inferred from the combined circumstances rather than the injury’s location alone. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up at the spot, the target and force of the blow, sudden quarrel or fight, chance encounter or premeditation, prior enmity, provocation and heat of passion, undue advantage or cruel conduct, and the number of blows. The list is not exhaustive. The Court applied the weapon, serious fatal head injury and overall record when rejecting the requested alteration to Section 304 IPC.	948
Inferring homicidal intention from surrounding circumstances	Intention is a factual inference drawn from the circumstances as a whole, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part aimed at, force used, prior enmity, provocation, premeditation, heat of passion and whether undue advantage was taken. Neither the location of injury nor the number of blows alone determines the mental element.	987

	Sub-Chapter no. 28.6 Criminal Medical Negligence — Grossness Threshold and Independent Expert Opinion
Gross negligence required for criminal liability of a medical professional	Criminal medical negligence requires the element of mens rea and negligence that is gross or of a very high degree. A simple lack of care, error of judgment, accident or unsuccessful treatment does not by itself establish criminal liability. The conduct must involve an act or omission that no ordinarily prudent medical professional would have committed in the circumstances, exposing the patient to injury that was most likely imminent. Negligence sufficient for a civil claim does not necessarily justify criminal prosecution.	181
Expert report before prosecution for medical negligence	The Court held that prosecution for medical negligence should not proceed without the report of the expert committee contemplated by the Supreme Court's directions. As the complainant had not approached the committee, the FIR and proceedings under Sections 336 and 338 IPC were quashed. The complainant remained free to obtain expert assessment and, if negligence was found, file a fresh complaint in accordance with law accompanied by the report.	181
Credible medical opinion supporting a private criminal complaint	Under the directions in Jacob Mathew, a private complaint alleging criminal rashness or negligence against a doctor should not be entertained unless it is supported by prima facie evidence in the form of a credible opinion from another competent doctor. The opinion must support the alleged professional rashness or negligence.	181
Independent specialist opinion before investigating a doctor for negligence	Before proceeding against a doctor accused of a rash or negligent act or omission, the investigating officer should obtain an independent and competent medical opinion. The preferred expert is a government doctor qualified in the relevant branch who can give an impartial opinion applying the Bolam test to the facts collected during investigation.	181
Arrest safeguards in allegations of medical negligence	An allegation of rashness or negligence does not justify routine arrest of a doctor. Under the directions in Jacob Mathew, arrest may be withheld unless needed to advance the investigation or collect evidence, or unless the investigating officer is satisfied that the doctor would otherwise fail to remain available for prosecution.	181
Limits of res ipsa loquitur in criminal medical negligence	Res ipsa loquitur cannot itself determine criminal liability for medical negligence. It is principally an evidentiary rule used in civil negligence to address the burden of proof and has, at most, limited application in a criminal-negligence trial. The requisite gross negligence must still be established.	181
Prosecution of doctors — expert support for alleged failure to check plasma	The refusal to add the treating doctors as accused under Section 193 CrPC was upheld because no Medical Board or committee report supported the allegation of criminal medical negligence. Asking for additional plasma as part of the then treatment protocol, and stopping transfusion when a reaction appeared, did not establish negligence. Whether the emergency conditions allowed time for laboratory re-examination and cross-matching required medical assessment, which the Court would not undertake without the expert report. The rejection was affirmed on these grounds rather than the trial court’s reliance on Section 319 CrPC.	339
Expert Screening before Criminal Proceedings against Doctors	A direction to register an FIR against doctors for alleged medical negligence was refused until a committee of experts reported on that negligence. The Court required independent, competent medical assessment before proceeding against the doctors; the patient’s death after surgery and the complainant’s allegations did not themselves supply that expert foundation.	408
Duty, gross breach and proximate causation in criminal medical negligence causing death	Criminal liability under Section 304-A IPC requires proof of death caused by a rash or negligent act not amounting to culpable homicide. In a medical case, the prosecution must establish a duty, a breach causing death and negligence of a gross degree. The cause of death must be direct or proximate; a treatment failure	588 or adverse outcome alone does not establish that causal and culpable breach.

Chapter no. 29
Kidnapping, Abduction, Wrongful Restraint and Confinement

Sub-Chapter no. 29.1
Kidnapping and Abduction — Age, Consent and Guardianship

Kidnapping — minor's willing departure and the accused's alleged enticement	A minor's willing departure from guardianship does not by itself defeat a kidnapping allegation where the accused's enticement remains prima facie established. The distinction in Anversinh concerns a minor who understands the full import of the act and independently abandons guardianship without the accused's assistance or inducement. On the school-record age and the statements about meeting the petitioner at night and travelling with him on the prospect of marriage, the Court found a prima facie enticement case despite the claim of voluntary accompaniment. Its observations did not bind the trial court's independent decision.	15
Voluntary departure and inducement in kidnapping of a minor	The distinction between taking and enticement must be examined before relying on a minor's voluntary departure to exclude kidnapping. The principle in S. Varadarajan requires the minor's knowledge and capacity to understand her actions, voluntary abandonment of guardianship, and absence of assistance or inducement by the accused. Whether the girl left without inducement was disputed here, and her travel with the accused did not establish absence of enticement at the quashing stage.	94
Proof of a kidnapped girl's age through school records and corroborating evidence	The Court accepted the school admission registers and mark sheet recording the girl's date of birth, proved through the principal, together with the parents' evidence and the radiological age assessment. The father explained that he had supplied the birth date at admission from the hospital birth certificate. These materials established that the girl was fifteen years and two months old at the incident. The radiological range corroborated the documentary and parental evidence.	102
Parental permission limited to a particular place and taking a minor elsewhere	A mother's permission for her minor daughter to accompany the accused to a nearby market did not authorise taking her to another town or elsewhere. By exceeding that permission, the accused took the child away without the parents' consent. The Court therefore rejected the plea that the limited permission defeated the kidnapping and abduction convictions.	124
Enticement defeats the defence that a minor voluntarily left guardianship	A minor's apparent willingness to leave home does not negate kidnapping where the accused induced her departure. The distinction drawn in S. Varadarajan, as explained in Anversinh, requires that the minor understood the full import of her actions, voluntarily abandoned her guardian's care, and received no assistance or inducement from the accused. On the finding of enticement, the Court rejected voluntary departure as a defence and sustained the kidnapping and procuration convictions.	179
Enticement of a minor who leaves her home	Applying Anversinh at the bail stage, the Court held that a minor girl’s leaving her home on the accused’s enticement can still make out offences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC. Her departure on that basis did not provide a ground for taking a contrary bail view where the prosecution alleged that she was below eighteen.	263
Kidnapping — voluntary departure requires capacity and absence of assistance or inducement	A minor's willingness to accompany the accused does not by itself negate kidnapping. To rely on the voluntary-departure principle discussed in S. Varadarajan, it must be established that the minor understood the full import of her actions, voluntarily left her guardian's care, and received no assistance or inducement from the accused. The distinction between taking and enticement remains material. Applying Anversinh, the Court rejected the categorical voluntary-departure plea for bail while leaving the sufficiency of evidence for	344

	conviction to trial.
Enticing a minor and her stated willingness to leave home	Where an accused entices a minor and she consequently leaves home, offences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC may be disclosed. Her initial statement that she left voluntarily does not justify ending investigation when the material indicates enticement. This principle was applied in reviewing police inaction after recovery of the minor.	431
Minor's assent does not negate active taking or enticement	A girl below eighteen cannot substitute her own consent for that of the lawful guardian for the purposes of kidnapping under Section 361 IPC. Although she initially requested marriage, the arrangements made by one applicant and the other's role in taking her away without the claimed permission of her in-laws supported a prima facie inference of active assistance or enticement. Her initiative therefore did not defeat the kidnapping charge at this stage.	468
Voluntary departure without assistance or inducement: limited distinction from kidnapping	The reproduced Anversinh passage distinguishes the limited situation considered in S. Varadarajan: a minor with the knowledge and capacity to understand her actions voluntarily abandons the guardian's care without assistance or inducement by the accused. That distinction cannot assist an accused shown to have actively arranged or facilitated her departure. The Court found such active involvement prima facie in the present case.	468
Victim's Age: Proved School Records and the Rule 12(3) Hierarchy	Rule 12(3) of the 2007 Juvenile Justice Rules applies to a child victim's age determination: matriculation or equivalent certificate takes priority, followed in its absence by the first-school birth record, then a municipal or panchayat birth certificate; medical opinion is reached only if these documents are absent. A school certificate is admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, but its weight depends on proof in the particular case. Here the issuing headmaster brought the original school record, and that evidence together with the family testimony established age below sixteen.	529
Ossification Margin: No Automatic Two-Year Benefit to the Accused	Medical age estimation does not create a universal rule adding two years in the accused's favour. The margin must be considered with all the surrounding evidence. The Court preferred the proved school record and family evidence and found that the radiology and dental estimates did not displace minority. It also noted Rule 12(3)(b)'s provision for a reasoned lower-side benefit of up to one year to the child when medical assessment is required, rather than an automatic upward adjustment for the accused.	529
Minor's Willing Departure Following Enticement: Sections 363 and 366 IPC	Kidnapping from lawful guardianship requires taking or enticing the minor, not merely later recovery from the accused. Enticement may arise from subtle prior inducement; apparent willingness does not establish independent departure without assistance or inducement. Section 366 additionally requires the relevant intention or knowledge concerning compelled marriage or forced or induced illicit intercourse. The Court found prior enticement proved despite the girl's admitted willingness and upheld both convictions, recording in its conclusion an intention to compel marriage.	529
Victim's age at taking — contemporaneous school record with later ossification range	Mukarrab v. State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210, and Ramdeo Chauhan v. State of Assam, (2001) 5 SCC 714, were followed: ossification supplies a useful but nonconclusive range, considered with other evidence. Arjun Singh v. State of H.P. recognised a school entry's Section 35 Evidence Act value without making it conclusive; Ram Suresh Singh v. Prabhat Singh, (2009) 6 SCC 681, and Jaya Mala v. Govt. of J&K, (1982) 2 SCC 538, addressed fact-sensitive use of a radiological margin, not an automatic two-year increase favourable to an accused. A 2002 primary-school marksheet stated birth on 2 January 1991; the examination in April 2005 estimated over 16 but under 18, more than a year after taking in March 2004. Together they supported an age below 16 then, and necessarily below 18 for guardian-related charges.	738

without guardian consent with intent to compel marriage	examination, and neither he nor the girl said he had permitted Ramkishan to take her. Her account of a threat to her and her brother, movement among cities, being kept and beaten, and the appellant's presentation of her as his wife supported the trial finding that he took a girl under 18 from lawful guardianship with intent to compel her to marry, supporting the convictions under Sections 363 and 366 IPC. Her prolonged stay and childbirth did not replace guardian consent or negate the charged taking; co-accused Kamlesh's unchallenged acquittal was left undisturbed.
Minor's voluntary departure where assistance or inducement is alleged	A minor's willingness to accompany the accused does not defeat a kidnapping charge where assistance or enticement is alleged. Anversinh distinguishes the narrow Varadarajan situation: a minor with capacity to understand the full import of her action voluntarily leaves guardianship without assistance or inducement by the accused. Here the prosecutrix was a minor and the applicant was alleged to have assisted the co-accused in taking her away. The Court therefore rejected voluntary accompaniment as a ground to interfere with charge framing.	768
Taking or enticing a girl under eighteen from lawful guardianship	Under Sections 361 and 363 IPC, the willingness of a girl under eighteen to accompany the accused does not replace the lawful guardian's consent. The Court distinguished persuasion from forcible taking and found that the appellant's request that the prosecutrix run away with him amounted to persuasion. As the guardian had not consented, the Court sustained the convictions under Sections 363 and 366-A even though it set aside the rape conviction on its assessment of consent under the law applicable to the 2006 incident.	776
Minor's voluntary departure — inducement and lawful guardianship	A minor girl's consent or affection does not by itself defeat a kidnapping allegation where the accused induced her departure from lawful guardianship. The relied-upon distinction in S. Varadarajan requires capacity to understand her actions, independent voluntary abandonment of guardianship, and absence of the accused's assistance or inducement. The school record showed minority, and the claimed marital relationship supplied prima facie material of inducement. Execution of a marriage affidavit did not itself establish solemnisation of a marriage.	808
Minor prosecutrix — Telephone call and alleged consent	A minor girl's acquaintance with the accused or telephone call asking him to meet does not establish that she insisted on being taken away for marriage or consented to sexual relations. Having found her to be a minor for the bail assessment, the Court treated her consent as immaterial and rejected the suggested consent as a ground for release.	823
Section 364-A IPC: proof of abduction, coercive threat and ransom purpose	Section 364-A IPC requires proof of kidnapping, abduction or consequent detention, a threat of death or hurt, conduct giving rise to a reasonable apprehension of it or actual hurt or death, and the prescribed coercive purpose, including payment of ransom. A ransom demand is a communicated request for money for release of the captive. Here the claim of release after payment conflicted with an undocumented police-encounter account; the alleged transfer to another gang, unidentified payment recipient, unexamined payer and unexplained source and place of payment left the prosecution version unproved. With the other defects, the evidence failed to establish the surviving appellants' guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and both the Section 364-A and linked Sections 11/13 M.P.D.V.P.K. Act convictions were set aside.	836
Abduction by force or deceit and its continuing character	Abduction under Section 362 IPC involves compelling a person by force, or inducing him through deceitful means, to go from a place. Deceit turns on the intention to mislead; fulfilment of a promise does not by itself establish that the inducement was bona fide. The adopted explanation treats abduction as a continuing offence in the context of detention for ransom.	836

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Induced departure of a minor and refusal to quash a kidnapping allegation despite a later adult marriage	Relying on Anversinh, the Court stated that a minor's departure from home on the accused's inducement attracts Sections 363 and 366 IPC. The petitioners' birth certificate and report showed that the girl had first left and married while below eighteen, was brought back by police, and married again after attaining majority. The Court rejected the claim that the earlier missing report was false because her parents had merely kept her captive, and refused to quash the FIR on the writ material before it.	858
Section 362 IPC — forcible removal and alleged voluntary release at the bail stage	Abduction under Section 362 IPC includes compelling a person by force, or inducing a person by deceitful means, to go from any place. Forcing the complainant into a car and taking him away against his will satisfied that description on the allegations considered in the anticipatory-bail application. Release was not treated as voluntary where the FIR and witness statements indicated that the complainant's father and companions intercepted the car and intervened while he was being beaten. The Court treated the alleged conduct as serious when declining anticipatory bail.	883

Sub-Chapter no. 29.2
Kidnapping for Ransom — Demand, Threat, Participation and Section 364A Liability

Ransom-call admission assessed with corroborating recovery	The accused's admission under Section 313 CrPC that he made the ransom call established his connection with the demand when assessed with the proved recovery of a substantial amount of identified ransom money. The Court rejected his explanation that he had been forced to make the call in light of that recovery. The absence of independent voice identification did not defeat the demand evidence on this record, and his conviction under Section 364-A IPC read with Section 13 of the MPDVPK Act was affirmed.	183
Abduction alone insufficient for conviction under Section 364-A IPC	Section 364-A requires proof of kidnapping, abduction or subsequent detention together with the additional statutory condition of a threat of death or hurt, conduct creating reasonable apprehension of such harm, or actual hurt or death in order to compel the Government, a foreign State, an international intergovernmental organisation or another person to act, abstain from acting or pay ransom. Applying Sk. Ahmed, the Court held that proof of abduction without the required additional condition could not sustain the conviction. The inconsistent evidence did not establish that condition in this case.	188
Alteration from Section 364-A to Section 365 IPC	After finding the additional ingredients of Section 364-A unproved, the Court retained the unchallenged finding of abduction and substituted conviction under Section 365 IPC read with Sections 11 and 13 of the MPDVPK Act. The alteration reflected the proved abduction and wrongful-confinement offence rather than acquittal of all criminal liability.	188
Ransom received by one participant in a proved abduction	The Court accepted evidence of armed abduction, continued captivity and a ransom demand, supported by the abductee, his relatives and the recovery evidence. Where the ransom payment was proved to have been made to one member of the abducting group, the other proved participants could not obtain exoneration merely because they had not personally received the money.	279
Kidnapping for ransom: proof must connect each accused to the offence	Proof that an abduction occurred does not dispense with reliable evidence identifying the persons responsible. The Court separately examined the evidence against each appellant and found the identifications unsafe and the alleged ransom letters unproved. The resulting doubt about their participation required acquittal under Section 364A IPC read with Sections 11/13 of the MPDVPK Act.	284
Ransom Demand Without Proof of Actual Payment	Actual payment of ransom is not an essential requirement for the ransom purpose considered under Section 364-A IPC. The demand was proved through the released captives sent to communicate it and the corroborating accounts, despite the absence of evidence establishing when and where the alleged	379 payment was made. The court relied on the proved abduction, detention and ransom purpose.

Kidnapping to Compel Abstention from an Act Under Section 364-A IPC	Section 364-A IPC extends to kidnapping, abduction or continued detention accompanied by the specified threat, apprehension of death or hurt, or actual hurt or death, to compel another person to do or abstain from an act, as well as to pay ransom. The court rejected the proposed reduction to Section 365 on an election-suppression explanation: ransom was independently established, and compelling abstention from the election process also fell within the stated alternative purpose.	379
Ransom Demand Proved Orally Despite Non-Seizure of a Written Demand	Failure to seize a letter said to contain a ransom demand did not displace reliable evidence that two released captives were sent to convey the demand to villagers and the victims' families. The court treated the oral communication and its corroboration as sufficient proof of the demand despite the missing letter.	379
Kidnapping for ransom—belated demand and payment allegations	The prosecution failed to prove kidnapping for ransom where the demand and payment allegations first emerged more than 45 days after the abductees returned, the demand channel, source of funds and place of payment were unproved, and earlier statements described escape. The omission of the appellants' names from the first reported identification further undermined their involvement.	410
Handwriting and prior seizure of a ransom letter as proof of participation	A ransom letter stating that the abductee was in the writers' custody and demanding Rs.6 lakh was proved by expert comparison to be in the appellant's handwriting. Its seizure before his arrest defeated the specific claim that police fabricated it after arrest. The Court treated the letter as a strong circumstance linking him to the ransom demand.	575
Communication of a ransom demand to the abducted person	A ransom demand must be communicated. As explained in Malleshi within the relied-upon Shaik Ahmed passage, a demand made to the abducted person does not cease to have legal effect merely because the accused is arrested before it can be conveyed to another person. Malleshi addressed the ransom-demand issue and did not dispense with the other ingredients of Section 364A IPC.	711
A relayed ransom demand requires substantive proof and attribution to the accused	A witness who merely repeated what the recipient of a telephone call told him could not supply substantive proof that the appellant demanded ransom or threatened the abducted person. The recipient, Latoo Yadav, was not examined, and there was no proof that the appellant made the call. The Court therefore rejected Shiv Singh Yadav's account of that demand and threat. This evidentiary failure concerned the alleged telephone call; it did not displace the complainant's direct account of the abduction, demand and threat, on which the conviction was sustained.	731
	Sub-Chapter no. 29.3 Section 364A IPC — Kidnapping or Abduction for Ransom and Coercive Threat or Harm
Essential components of kidnapping for ransom under Section 364A	Section 364A IPC requires kidnapping, abduction or detention after it, together with the statutory threat of death or hurt, conduct creating reasonable apprehension of such harm, or actual hurt or death, used to coerce action, forbearance or payment of ransom. The Court adopted Shaik Ahmed and its reproduction of Vikram Singh, preserving the conjunction between the initial requirement and the threat component and the alternative forms of harm. It upheld the convictions on the cumulative evidence of abduction, ransom demand, homicidal death, concealment and recoveries.	648
No automatic threat presumption from a child victim's age	Kidnapping a child of tender age for ransom does not dispense with proof of the threat, apprehension or harm component required by Section 364A IPC. The Shaik Ahmed passage adopted by the Court explains that Arvind Singh's observation about an inherent threat arose from its particular facts and creates no legal presumption relieving the prosecution of that requirement.	648

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Ransom demand communicated to the abducted person	The Malleshi discussion reproduced through Shaik Ahmed explains that a ransom demand originally made to the abducted person does not lose its effect merely because the accused are arrested before it can be conveyed to another person. That proposition concerns communication of the demand and does not dispense with the other requirements of Section 364A IPC.	648
Failure to prove abduction, identity and ransom demand under Section 364A IPC	A conviction under Section 364A IPC read with Section 13 of the MPDVPK Act could not stand where the evidence did not reliably establish the alleged abduction, the appellants' identity or a ransom demand. The alleged abductee spoke of ₹10 lakh, while other accounts referred to ₹1 lakh. The person said to have negotiated the ransom was not examined, the alleged ransom letter was not produced, and communication of the demand to the family was unexplained. The conflicting accounts of escape and police recovery, unsupported naming of the accused and unreliable identification further undermined the prosecution. On the evidence as a whole, the Court found even the alleged abduction unproved and acquitted the appellants.	950

Kidnapping for Ransom — Ingredients and Threat or Harm Requirement

Essential ingredients of kidnapping for ransom under Section 364A IPC	Section 364A requires proof of kidnapping, abduction or subsequent detention; a threat of death or hurt, conduct creating reasonable apprehension of death or hurt, or actual hurt or death; and the statutory coercive or ransom purpose. Following Shaik Ahmed, the Court emphasised that the conjunction joining the initial act and the threat requirement cannot be ignored. The applicable threat, apprehension or harm alternative must be established in addition to kidnapping or detention for the specified purpose.	711
No automatic presumption of threat from the victim's tender age	The victim's tender age does not by itself create a legal presumption satisfying Section 364A's threat or apprehension requirement. The Court relied on Shaik Ahmed's explanation that Arvind Singh's observations about an inherent threat in kidnapping an eight-year-old for ransom must be read in their factual context. The required threat, apprehension or harm must be established on the evidence in each case.	711
Identification did not cure failure to prove the ransom-kidnapping account	Despite identification of Vijay, the prosecution failed to prove the alleged abduction and ransom account beyond reasonable doubt. Material contradictions concerned communication of the demand, the payers' route to the captors, the source and amount of money, release timing and the police patrol. The doubtful reporting account and delayed FIR forwarding added to the deficiencies. Identification alone could not supply proof of those contested acts, and strong suspicion could not replace proof.	716

Kidnapping for Ransom — Section 364A IPC and Proof of Demand or Threat

Sub-Chapter no. 29.6
Wrongful Restraint, Wrongful Confinement and Criminal Force

Failure to prove secret wrongful confinement under Section 346 IPC	The conviction under Section 346 IPC could not survive the failure to prove that the alleged victim had been abducted and confined by the appellants. The Court considered the conflicting accounts of his escape and police recovery, the absence of a site plan for the alleged place of confinement, the unsupported sources identifying the alleged abductors and the unreliable dock identification after police-station exposure. These defects formed part of its conclusion that the prosecution had failed to prove the alleged abduction itself or the appellants' guilt beyond reasonable doubt. It therefore set aside the wrongful-confinement conviction together with the ransom-abduction conviction.	950

	Sub-Chapter no. 30.1 Murder, Culpable Homicide and Alteration of Conviction
Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intended injury sufficient to cause death	For Section 300 Thirdly, the prosecution must prove a bodily injury, its nature, intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and that the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last inquiry is objective. Once those elements are proved, a separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal sufficiency is unnecessary. The burden remains on the prosecution throughout.	12
Fatal burns — later septicaemia and alleged inadequate treatment	Later septicaemia or the possibility of better treatment does not automatically reduce murder to Section 304 Part I IPC. The Court found that deliberately pouring kerosene on the victim and setting her alight caused burns sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, with the necessary intention and knowledge. Her death from burns and complications five days later remained attributable to that attack. Applying Explanation 2 to Section 299 IPC, the Court rejected the treatment-based argument and affirmed murder; the different sudden-fight facts discussed in Khokan did not establish a universal reduction rule.	19
Murder — Section 300 clause must be established despite absence of an exception	The prosecution must bring the proved conduct within a clause of Section 300 IPC to sustain murder even when no statutory exception is pleaded or prima facie established. In the relied-upon reasoning, the intended bodily injury's sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course was assessed objectively with the medical evidence. Septicaemia following that fatal injury did not itself displace the murder finding.	19
Repeated fatal head blows: murder or a lesser offence	The number, nature and location of injuries, the force used and the weapon may establish an intention to inflict bodily injuries sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Repeated forceful lathi blows on the head of an unarmed victim, causing a depressed fracture and haemorrhage, supported murder rather than grievous hurt under Section 325 IPC. The proved cause of death, continuous treatment and arrival with weapons also distinguished cases involving uncertain medical causation or a single blow with an object picked up at the scene.	21
Unproved abusive words and grave and sudden provocation	Exception 1 to Section 300 IPC could not be invoked merely because the accused believed that words spoken by the deceased were directed at them. Where the actual words were not proved, the court could not assume that they caused such grave and sudden provocation that the accused lost self-control and inflicted fatal injuries.	21
Section 300 Thirdly: intended injury and objective fatal sufficiency	For murder under Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove the existence and nature of the bodily injury, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last question is objective. Once these elements are established, a separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary. The prosecution retains the burden of proving the required elements.	36
Culpable homicide, murder and the distinction between intention and knowledge	Culpable homicide requires causing death with the intention to cause death, the intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that the act is likely to cause death. It amounts to murder when Section 300 IPC applies and no statutory exception takes the case outside murder. Where the offence remains culpable homicide not amounting to murder, intention governs Section 304 Part I, while knowledge without the relevant intention governs Part II. Causing death alone does not establish the required mental element.	36

30.1 : Murder, Culpable Homicide and Alteration of Conviction

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
A single fatal injury and classification of the offence	There is no fixed rule that a single blow or single injury excludes murder or necessarily reduces the offence to Section 304 Part II IPC. The nature of the injury, weapon, body part, manner of assault and other circumstances must determine the required intention or knowledge and the offence made out. A single intentionally inflicted injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death may satisfy Section 300 Thirdly.	36
Section 300 Thirdly IPC: intended bodily injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	Under the Virsa Singh test adopted by the Court, the prosecution must establish the presence and nature of the bodily injury, an intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The final assessment of sufficiency is objective. Once those requirements are proved, a separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary for Section 300 Thirdly. The Court considered the firearm and penetrating injuries and the medical opinion that they were individually and cumulatively sufficient to cause death, while separately requiring proof connecting the appellants to the murder.	45
Sections 299–304 IPC: intention, knowledge and the classification of culpable homicide	Culpable homicide under Section 299 IPC requires causing death with an intention to cause death, an intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that the act is likely to cause death. It becomes murder when a Section 300 clause is satisfied and no applicable exception removes it from that category. Otherwise, intention-based culpable homicide falls under Section 304 Part I, while knowledge without the relevant intention falls under Part II. The Court adopted the distinction explained in Arun Nivalaji More and emphasised that intention is inferred from the act and all surrounding circumstances, rather than the location of an injury alone.	45
Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intended bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death	The prosecution must prove the existence and nature of the bodily injury, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and that the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The first two matters and the injury's sufficiency are objective inquiries; intention to inflict the particular injury is a separate factual question. Once those elements are established, a separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary. An accidental injury, or an injury materially different from the one intended, does not satisfy that intent requirement.	77
Murder and culpable homicide — intention, knowledge and statutory exceptions determine the applicable offence	The inquiry first asks whether causing death satisfies Section 299 IPC, and then whether the case falls within a clause of Section 300 and outside its exceptions. Culpable homicide outside murder may attract Section 304 Part I where there is intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death; Part II applies where there is the requisite knowledge of likely death without either intention. Causing death alone does not establish culpable homicide without the required mental element.	77
Proof of murder through corroborated eyewitness evidence	The murder charge under Section 302 IPC was proved beyond reasonable doubt by trustworthy eyewitness testimony identifying the accused as the shooter, corroborated by medical evidence, recovery of the firearm, the forensic report and a prompt FIR naming him. On that evidentiary assessment, the Court affirmed the conviction.	90
Intended injury sufficient to cause death under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	For Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove the existence and nature of the bodily injury, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its objective sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The burden remains on the prosecution throughout. Once these elements are proved, a separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal consequences is unnecessary. Applying that approach to the deliberate knife attack, corroborated by the medical and other evidence, the Court sustained the murder conviction.	93

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Sequence for distinguishing culpable homicide from murder	The court must first determine whether the act amounts to culpable homicide under Section 299 IPC, then whether it satisfies any clause of Section 300, and finally whether an exception to Section 300 applies. An act satisfying a murder clause remains culpable homicide not amounting to murder if a statutory exception covers it. Where culpable homicide falls outside Section 300, intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death attracts Section 304 Part I, while knowledge of likely death without either intention attracts Part II.	93
Intentional throttling — Refusal to alter murder conviction to Section 304 Part I	On the accepted evidence of deliberate throttling or strangulation causing death, the Court inferred both intention and knowledge that death would result. It therefore refused to reduce the conviction from Section 302 to Section 304 Part I IPC. The proved eyewitness account, last-seen circumstances and recovery supported the finding beyond reasonable doubt. The life sentence was affirmed because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment for the murder offence.	118
Section 299 IPC, Explanation 2 — death following prolonged coma and septic shock	Where bodily injuries cause death, the assailant remains causally responsible although proper remedies and skilful treatment might have prevented death. Applying Explanation 2 to Section 299 IPC, the Court rejected the treatment-based defence where head injuries had left the victim continuously comatose and medical evidence linked his later death from septic shock to those injuries. The possibility of better treatment did not break that causal connection.	132
Proof of a Section 300 clause is necessary to sustain a murder charge	Even where none of the five exceptions to Section 300 IPC is pleaded or prima facie established, the prosecution must bring the case within one of that section's four clauses to sustain a charge of murder. The Jagtar Singh passage relied upon by the Court explains that the nature of the intended injury and the medical evidence must be assessed for that purpose.	132
Murder under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	The prosecution must prove the bodily injury and its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and that the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last inquiry is objective. Once these elements are proved, a separate intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's fatal character is unnecessary. The prosecution bears the burden throughout.	160
Culpable homicide, murder and Section 304 IPC	The Court must first determine whether the act amounts to culpable homicide under Section 299 IPC, then whether it falls within a clause of Section 300 and whether an exception applies. Where culpable homicide does not amount to murder, intention to cause death or an injury likely to cause death attracts Section 304 Part I; knowledge of likely death without either intention attracts Part II.	160
Single injury and inference of intention	A single injury does not automatically reduce murder to an offence under Section 304 IPC. Intention or knowledge must be assessed from the circumstances, including the weapon, whether it was carried or picked up, the part of the body targeted, force, prior hostility, premeditation, provocation and manner of assault. The number of injuries is one relevant factor, not a conclusive test.	160
Intention to murder from repeated aimed firing	Deliberately firing at the victim's chest, followed by a second shot when he tried to rise, established intention to kill. The eyewitness accounts were corroborated by pellet injuries damaging the heart, lungs, liver and brain. Both shooters caused fatal injuries, and the absence of proved prior enmity did not prevent their direct conviction under Section 302 IPC.	165
Motive and proof of murder	Motive can strengthen a circumstantial chain but is not an essential ingredient of murder. The inability to prove prior enmity or ascertain the offender's motive does not defeat reliable direct evidence establishing the fatal act and intention to kill.	165

30.1 : Murder, Culpable Homicide and Alteration of Conviction

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Direct liability after failure of constructive charges	On this record, acquittal of the other alleged assembly members removed the basis for the remaining appellant's convictions under Section 148 and the Section 149 combinations. It did not displace the independently proved gunfire. The Court convicted the appellant in Criminal Appeal No. 616/2003 directly under Sections 302 and 324 IPC, imposing life imprisonment for murder and one year for firearm hurt, concurrently.	167
Subsequent attempt to extinguish fire does not by itself negate murderous intent	The accused's subsequent attempt to extinguish a fire does not by itself show that he lacked the intention to kill when he deliberately poured kerosene on the victim and set her ablaze. Conscious ignition of a person soaked in kerosene is imminently dangerous and may constitute murder under Section 300 Fourthly. Intention and knowledge must be assessed from the act and its circumstances; the later rescue attempt does not automatically reduce the offence.	173
Inference of intention from attacks on vital parts	A witness's suggestion that the appellants did not intend to commit a grave offence was rejected in view of their acts. The Court relied on the axe attacks to the victims' neck and head and the attacks on the injured witnesses, supported by the medical findings, to affirm the convictions under Sections 302 and 307 IPC despite the sudden quarrel preceding the assault.	199
Intended bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death may constitute murder	An intention to inflict a bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death may establish murder even if the accused did not separately intend death. The distinction between culpable homicide and murder must be applied to the injury intended and the circumstances of the act.	207
Intentional bodily injury under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	For Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove the injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. A separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's precise seriousness is unnecessary. Applying Virsa Singh and the related authorities, the Court upheld the murder conviction for the intentional gunshot to the head, supported by eyewitness evidence and medical proof of a fatal brain injury.	214
Distinguishing culpable homicide, murder and Section 304 liability	The Court must first determine whether causing death satisfies Section 299 IPC, then whether a clause of Section 300 makes the homicide murder, and whether an exception applies. Where culpable homicide is not murder, Section 304 Part I addresses the specified intention to cause death or a bodily injury likely to cause death, while Part II addresses knowledge of likely death without that intention. The mental element must be established from the evidence, not inferred from death alone.	214
Single injury and inference of homicidal intention	A single injury does not automatically reduce murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. Intention is assessed from the weapon, the body part targeted, force, manner of assault and surrounding circumstances, including premeditation, provocation and any sudden fight. The number of blows is one relevant circumstance. The Court applied that contextual approach to the fatal firearm injury to the head.	214
Cumulative conditions for the sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight, an act in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and no undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone are insufficient. Whether a fight was sudden depends on the proved circumstances; all the exception's requirements must be satisfied.	214
Proof required under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	The prosecution must establish the bodily injury, the accused's intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Intention to cause the particular injury and the objective sufficiency of that injury are separate inquiries. Death having occurred does not, by itself, establish the required sufficiency in every case.	223
Stages for	The inquiry begins with whether the accused's act caused death, proceeds to	223

distinguishing murder from culpable homicide	whether the act falls within Section 299 IPC, and then considers the clauses and exceptions of Section 300. Where the proved act constitutes culpable homicide but not murder, the applicable part of Section 304 depends on the established mental element.
Section 300 Thirdly: intentional injury sufficient to cause death	Under the Virsa Singh test, the prosecution must prove the bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. A separate intention to cause death is unnecessary. Applying that distinction between intended injury and objective fatal sufficiency, the Court treated the intentional fatal firearm injuries as murder under Section 300 Thirdly.	259
A single injury does not automatically reduce murder to a lesser offence	There is no fixed rule that a single blow excludes Section 302 IPC or necessarily attracts Section 304 Part II. The offence depends on the intended injury, its nature and location, the weapon, the manner of assault and the surrounding circumstances. A single intentionally inflicted injury may constitute murder where the Section 300 requirements are established.	259
Murder under Section 300 Thirdly: intention to inflict the particular injury	Section 300 Thirdly IPC requires proof of the bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Intention to cause death need not be separately proved. Applying this test to the intentional gunshot injuries, the Court upheld the murder convictions.	280
Culpable homicide and murder: intention and knowledge	A death amounts to culpable homicide under Section 299 IPC only when accompanied by one of its prescribed forms of intention or knowledge. Whether it amounts to murder depends on the additional requirements of Section 300 and its exceptions. Where the offence is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, intention distinguishes Section 304 Part I from the knowledge-based liability under Part II.	280
Single injury: no automatic exclusion of murder	A single injury does not automatically reduce murder to an offence under Section 304 IPC. The offence depends on the injury, the weapon, the part of the body struck and the surrounding circumstances showing the required intention or knowledge.	280
Inferring intention from the circumstances of the assault	Intention is a question of fact to be inferred from the circumstances as a whole. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried to the scene, the body part targeted, the force used, prior enmity, provocation, premeditation, the course of the quarrel and the manner and number of blows. No single factor is conclusive in every case.	280
Sudden fight exception: all statutory conditions must coexist	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires an act committed without premeditation, in a sudden fight and in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone are insufficient; the remaining conditions must also be satisfied.	280
Victim's special frailty and the assailant's knowledge under Section 300 secondly	Section 300 secondly IPC may apply where an assailant intentionally causes an injury knowing that the particular victim's disease or frailty makes it likely to be fatal. If that special condition is unknown, and there is neither an intention to kill nor an intended injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, the resulting death does not for that reason amount to murder. Here knowledge of the deceased's enlarged, cirrhotic liver was not proved, and the Court convicted the appellant under Section 304 Part II instead of Section 302/34.	295
Injury likely to cause death and injury sufficient in the ordinary course to	The distinction between Section 299(b) and Section 300 thirdly IPC concerns the degree of probability of death from the intended injury. An injury likely to cause death denotes a probable result, while an injury sufficient in the ordinary	295

cause death	course of nature to cause death denotes a higher probability. That distinction must be assessed carefully when classifying culpable homicide; a fatal outcome alone does not establish the murder standard.
Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intentional injury sufficient to cause death	Under Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove the bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. A further intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary once those elements are established. Applying Virsa Singh, the Court found the appellant's firearm injury intentional and medically sufficient to cause death, and upheld the murder conviction.	307
Single injury — inference of intention from the surrounding circumstances	A single blow or injury does not automatically exclude murder or require conviction under Section 304 IPC. The nature of the weapon, the body part targeted, the force used, the resulting injury and the circumstances of the assault must be assessed together to infer the required intention or knowledge. Premeditation, prior enmity, provocation, heat of passion, undue advantage and the manner and number of blows are relevant, non-exhaustive considerations. The Court relied on Mahesh Balmiki, Pulicherla Nagaraju, Sangapagu Anjaiah, Kanhaiyalal and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao in applying this contextual approach to the firearm assault.	307
Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intended injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	For murder under Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove the presence and nature of the bodily injury, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Sufficiency is an objective inquiry; a separate intention to cause death is unnecessary. These principles informed the finding that the fatal head injuries were homicidal, but did not establish that the appellant was the assailant.	335
Culpable homicide and murder — intention, knowledge and Section 304 distinction	Culpable homicide requires death caused with an intention to cause death, an intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that death is likely. Whether it amounts to murder depends on the clauses of Section 300 and its exceptions. Where the offence is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, the intention-based branches attract Section 304 Part I, while knowledge without the required intention attracts Part II. Causing death alone does not establish the necessary mental element.	335
Culpable Homicide, Murder and the Two Parts of Section 304 IPC	Culpable homicide is the broader category and murder its aggravated form. The enquiry first asks whether death was caused with the intention or knowledge required by Section 299, then whether a clause of Section 300 applies and whether an exception removes the case from murder. Where the offence is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, intention to cause death or likely fatal bodily injury attracts Section 304 Part I; knowledge of likely death without either intention attracts Part II.	383
Four Requirements of Section 300 Thirdly	For murder under Section 300 Thirdly, the prosecution must prove the existence of a bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last enquiry is objective. Once those elements are established, a separate intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary. An accidental injury, or proof that a different injury was intended, defeats the required intention to inflict the injury actually found.	383
A Single Blow Does Not Automatically Reduce Murder to Culpable Homicide	There is no fixed rule that a single blow excludes Section 302 IPC or necessarily attracts Section 304 Part II. The offence depends on the proved intention or knowledge, the weapon, the part of the body struck, the injury and the surrounding circumstances. The number of blows alone cannot replace that enquiry; an intentionally inflicted injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death may satisfy Section 300 Thirdly.	383

Intended bodily injury sufficient to cause death under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	Section 300 Thirdly requires proof of the presence and nature of the bodily injury, an intention to inflict that particular injury, and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. Once those elements are proved, a separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's seriousness is unnecessary. An accidental or unintended injury does not satisfy the required intention merely because its consequences are fatal.	393
Distinguishing culpable homicide from murder	Causing death amounts to culpable homicide only when accompanied by the intention or knowledge required by Section 299 IPC. The further inquiry is whether the act falls within a clause of Section 300 and whether an exception applies. Where the act remains culpable homicide but not murder, the distinction between Section 304 Parts I and II depends on whether the relevant mental element is intention or knowledge without the specified intention.	393
Distinguishing culpable homicide, murder and Section 304 liability	A death-causing act amounts to culpable homicide only if accompanied by the intention or knowledge required by Section 299 IPC. The further inquiry is whether a clause of Section 300 applies and whether a statutory exception excludes murder. Where the offence remains culpable homicide not amounting to murder, Section 304 Part I concerns the specified intention, while Part II concerns knowledge of likely death without that intention. Death alone does not establish the necessary mental element.	399
Intended injury and objective sufficiency under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	The prosecution must prove the existence and nature of the bodily injury, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. The last inquiry is objective. Once those elements are established, a separate intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's seriousness is unnecessary. An accidental injury, or an injury different from the one intended, does not satisfy the required intention merely because death follows; the prosecution retains the burden of proof.	399
Murder charge—prosecution must establish Section 300 requirements	Even where no exception to Section 300 IPC is established, the prosecution must prove that the homicide falls within one of its four clauses to sustain murder. Otherwise, the case may fall within culpable homicide under Section 299, depending on the intention or knowledge proved.	412
Section 300 thirdly—intended injury sufficient to cause death	For Section 300 thirdly IPC, the accused must intend the particular bodily injury, and that injury must objectively be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. A single fatal injury does not by itself exclude murder. Intention is inferred from the weapon, body part, force, manner of attack and surrounding circumstances.	412
Section 300 Thirdly: Intention to Inflict the Injury and Its Objective Sufficiency	Section 300 Thirdly requires proof of the bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last inquiry is objective; a separate intention to cause death is unnecessary. Applying this framework and accepting the eyewitness account with medical corroboration, the Court sustained the murder convictions arising from the armed group assault.	450
Distinguishing Murder From Culpable Homicide Under Section 304	The inquiry first addresses whether the act constitutes culpable homicide under Section 299, then whether it falls within a clause of Section 300 and whether a statutory exception applies. Culpable homicide outside murder falls under Section 304: Part I concerns the relevant intention to cause death or likely fatal injury, while Part II concerns knowledge of likely death without either intention. The Court adopted this framework when assessing the murder charge.	450
Sections 302 and 304 IPC — Premeditated attack after an earlier quarrel	The nature of the offence depends on the incident's circumstances, weapon and its source, body part targeted, force used, prior enmity, participation in a sudden fight, provocation, heat of passion, and any undue advantage or cruel conduct. An earlier quarrel did not make the later armed attack a sudden fight: Rajesh went to the victims' house with a gun, without retaliation, provocation or a	474 mutual fight from their side. The attack was premeditated and did not warrant conversion from murder to Section 304 IPC.

Section 300 Thirdly IPC — Intended injury and objective sufficiency	To establish murder under Section 300 Thirdly, the prosecution must prove the presence and nature of the bodily injury, an intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and that the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last inquiry is objective. A separate intention to kill, or knowledge of the injury's precise gravity, is unnecessary once those elements are proved. The prosecution bears the burden throughout. The Court relied on this framework in upholding the murder conviction.	478
Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intention to cause the particular fatal injury	For Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must establish the bodily injury, its nature, an intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Under the Virsa Singh test applied by the Court, the last inquiry is objective; a separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary. The prosecution bears the burden throughout. Applying this distinction to the intentional firearm injuries on vital parts and the medical evidence, the Court held the deaths to be murder and affirmed Ashok's conviction under Sections 302/34 IPC.	497
Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC — classification of culpable homicide	The Court adopted a sequential inquiry: first determine whether the act causing death satisfies Section 299 IPC, then whether it falls within a clause of Section 300, and then whether a statutory exception applies. Murder is a species of culpable homicide; death alone does not establish the requisite intention or knowledge. Where the case is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, Section 304 Part I addresses the relevant intention to cause death or a likely fatal injury, while Part II addresses knowledge of likely death without either such intention.	497
Single injury — no automatic reduction from murder	A single blow or injury does not by itself require conviction under Section 304 instead of Section 302 IPC. The offence depends on the nature and manner of the assault, weapon, injury site, intention or knowledge, and other proved circumstances. The Court adopted the narrated single-injury authorities to explain that Section 300 Thirdly may apply where the particular injury was intended and was objectively sufficient to cause death. The present prosecution concerned multiple gunshot wounds, so the single-injury discussion supplies the legal test rather than a description of these facts.	497
Section 300 Thirdly: Intended Injury and Objective Sufficiency to Cause Death	Section 300 Thirdly requires proof of the bodily injury, its nature, intention to inflict that particular injury and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The prosecution bears the burden throughout. Once these elements are proved, a separate intention to kill or knowledge that death is likely is unnecessary. The intention to inflict the injury and its objective fatal sufficiency are distinct questions.	522
Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC: Intention and Knowledge in Classifying Homicide	The homicide inquiry first asks whether the act causing death satisfies Section 299, then whether it falls within a clause of Section 300 and, if so, an applicable exception. Where culpable homicide does not amount to murder, intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death attracts Section 304 Part I; knowledge of likely death without either intention attracts Part II. Causing death alone is insufficient without the required mental element.	522
Single-Blow Homicide: Number of Injuries Is Not Conclusive	A single blow does not by itself exclude murder or require conviction under Section 304 Part II. Classification depends on the weapon, the body part struck, the nature and force of the injury and the surrounding circumstances bearing on intention or knowledge. An intentionally inflicted injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death may attract Section 300 Thirdly even though only one blow was delivered.	522

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 300 Thirdly IPC: intention to inflict the injury and its fatal sufficiency	The prosecution must prove the bodily injury, its nature and the intention to inflict that particular injury. It must then establish objectively that the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Intention to cause death, knowledge of the injury's fatal quality or an intention to cause an injury of a particular degree of seriousness is unnecessary. The inquiry remains whether the injury actually inflicted was intended, rather than accidental or different from the injury intended. Applying this test, the Court held that the intentional firearm injuries, with arterial rupture and fatal haemorrhage proved medically, fell within Section 300 Thirdly.	555
Single injury and classification of a fatal assault	There is no fixed rule that a single blow or single injury excludes murder or necessarily attracts Section 304 Part II IPC. Intention or knowledge must be assessed from the whole occurrence, including the weapon, whether it was carried or picked up, the target and force, the nature and manner of injury, prior enmity, premeditation, sudden quarrel or fight, provocation, heat of passion, unfair advantage and the number of blows. These factors are illustrative, not exhaustive; the location or number of wounds alone does not determine the offence.	555
Distinguishing culpable homicide from murder	The classification begins with whether death was caused with one of the mental states in Section 299 IPC. If so, the court examines whether a clause of Section 300 is satisfied and whether a statutory exception applies. Culpable homicide becomes murder only when the further requirements of Section 300 are met and no applicable exception removes it from that category. Causing death alone does not establish culpable homicide without the required intention or knowledge.	555
Section 304 Parts I and II IPC: intention and knowledge	Where culpable homicide does not amount to murder, the relevant mental state determines the applicable part of Section 304 IPC. Part I applies where the act causing death is done with the intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death. Part II applies where the act is done with knowledge that death is likely, but without either of those intentions.	555
Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC: sudden fight and absence of unfair advantage	Exception 4 requires an act without premeditation, in a sudden fight, in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. The adopted discussion describes mutual provocation and a fight with the person killed, before passions have cooled. A sudden quarrel and lack of premeditation alone are insufficient; all the conditions must be satisfied. The Court stated this test but ultimately held the proved assault to be murder.	555
Knowledge under Section 300 Secondly IPC	The Court's discussion distinguishes knowledge from mere probability: knowledge involves awareness of the relevant circumstance without substantial doubt, or virtual certainty. Under Section 300 Secondly, the inquiry concerns the offender's knowledge that the bodily injury intended is likely to cause the death of the particular person injured. This subjective inquiry is distinct from the objective sufficiency of injury under Section 300 Thirdly, on which the conviction was affirmed.	555
Murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder: Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC	The court must first determine whether the act causing death satisfies Section 299 IPC, then whether it falls within a clause of Section 300 and, if so, whether an exception applies. Where culpable homicide is not murder, intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death attracts Section 304 Part I; knowledge that death is likely, without either such intention, attracts Part II. Death alone is insufficient without the required mental element.	584
Section 300 Thirdly IPC: intended bodily injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	The prosecution must prove the existence and nature of the injury, an intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last inquiry is objective. Once these elements are proved, an intention to cause death or an awareness of the injury's fatal	584 seriousness is unnecessary. If the injury actually caused was accidental or materially different from the injury intended, the required intention is not established.

Single-blow cases and classification of the offence	There is no fixed rule that a single blow excludes murder or necessarily limits liability to Section 304 Part II IPC. Classification depends on the injury, the weapon, the body part targeted and the circumstances showing intention or knowledge. A single intentionally inflicted injury may satisfy Section 300 Thirdly where it is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.	584
Section 300 Thirdly: intention to inflict the proved injury	Under Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove a bodily injury, its nature, an intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Intention to cause the injury is a factual inquiry distinct from the objective assessment of its fatal sufficiency. A separate intention to kill or awareness of the injury's lethal seriousness is unnecessary once the required elements are proved. Applying the narrated Virsa Singh principle, the Court distinguished proof of fatal homicidal injuries from proof that this appellant inflicted them; the latter failed on the combined evidence.	599
Culpable homicide, murder and the two parts of Section 304	The Court first asks whether death was caused with one of the mental states in Section 299 IPC: intention to cause death, intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that death was likely. Murder requires the additional conditions of Section 300 and absence of an applicable exception. Where culpable homicide does not amount to murder, intention of the specified kind attracts Section 304 Part I, while knowledge without that intention attracts Part II. Causing death alone does not establish the required mental state.	599
Direct murder liability and liability under Section 149 IPC	The Court distinguished the appellant's own shooting of one victim from the second victim's shooting by another member of the armed unlawful assembly. It upheld his conviction under Section 302 IPC for the first killing and Section 302 read with Section 149 IPC for the second, when that victim intervened. The finding rested on the appellant's proved participation in the assembly and the accepted evidence; it did not attribute the second shot physically to him.	605
Septicaemia and preventable death following fatal injuries	Where inflicted injuries cause death, Explanation 2 to Section 299 IPC attributes that death to the person causing the injuries even if proper remedies and skilful treatment might have prevented it. The deceased's septicaemic shock resulted from ante-mortem burns that were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. In view of the deliberate burning and the resulting injuries, the suggestion of improper medical treatment did not justify altering the conviction under Section 302 IPC.	610
Intended injury and objective sufficiency under Section 300 Thirdly	For Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove the presence and nature of the bodily injury, an intention to inflict that particular injury, and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. A separate intention to kill is unnecessary once those elements are proved. The Court adopted the Virsa Singh analysis in considering the homicide charge and affirmed the murder convictions in the proved circumstantial case.	648
Mental state and classification of culpable homicide	Culpable homicide under Section 299 IPC requires intention to cause death, intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that death is likely. Murder is the aggravated form governed by Section 300, subject to its exceptions. The Court adopted Arun Nivalaji More in distinguishing murder from Section 304 Part I, where the relevant intention is present, and Part II, where knowledge without that intention governs.	648
Murder under Section 300 Thirdly—Intended injury sufficient to cause death	Section 300 Thirdly IPC requires proof of the bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last requirement is objective. Once these elements are proved, a separate intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's fatal character is unnecessary.	660

Multiple head injuries and extensive fractures supported murder liability	The multiplicity and severity of the head injuries, including extensive underlying skull fractures, supported the finding of an intentional lethal assault. The Court found both intention to cause death and knowledge of the imminently dangerous nature of the act, with injuries sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The medical witnesses rejected the suggested accidental bicycle fall. Read with the proved common intention, these findings sustained the surviving appellant's conviction under Sections 302 and 34 IPC despite the absence of proof that he personally inflicted the fatal head injury.	675
Psychosis short of legal insanity and alteration of murder conviction	Failure to establish legal insanity under Section 84 IPC does not preclude consideration of proved mental illness when determining the grade of homicide. On the particular evidence of psychosis and abnormal conduct, absence of animosity or proved motive, and uncertainty about the precise manner of killing after the eyewitnesses turned hostile, the Court substituted conviction under Section 304 Part I IPC for Section 302 IPC. The conclusion rested on those combined circumstances, although the accused was found to have caused the death and was not entitled to complete exoneration under Section 84.	691
Intended bodily injury and knowledge of probable death under Section 300 IPC	For Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the particular bodily injury must have been intended and must be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. An additional intention to cause death is unnecessary if those requirements are established. Section 300 Fourthly addresses an imminently dangerous act done without excuse for incurring the risk, with knowledge of death approximating practical certainty. These distinctions between culpable homicide and murder guide assessment of the proved circumstances rather than operating as rigid formulas.	691
Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intended bodily injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	The prosecution must establish the existence and nature of the bodily injury, intention to inflict the particular injury found, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The first two matters and the final sufficiency inquiry are objective; intention to inflict the particular injury must be proved separately. Once these requirements are established, an intention to cause death, awareness of the injury's seriousness, or an intention to produce its fatal consequences is unnecessary. If the evidence shows that the actual injury was accidental or different from the injury intended, the requisite intention is not established. The burden remains on the prosecution throughout.	700
Inferring intention to cause death from the circumstances of assault	Intention must be inferred from the circumstances considered together. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up at the scene, the body part targeted, force used, prior enmity, premeditation or a chance encounter, provocation, heat of passion, a sudden quarrel or fight, unfair advantage or cruelty, and the number of blows. The factors are not exhaustive. No single circumstance substitutes for the assessment needed to distinguish murder from the two parts of Section 304 IPC.	700
Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intended bodily injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	The prosecution must establish the existence and nature of the bodily injury, intention to inflict the particular injury found, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Murder and culpable homicide — statutory classification by intention, knowledge	The inquiry first asks whether the act causing death falls within Section 299 IPC and then whether it satisfies any clause of Section 300. If it falls within Section 300, it is murder unless a statutory exception applies. Culpable homicide outside Section 300 attracts Section 304 Part I where the act is	701

and exceptions	accompanied by intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death, and Part II where there is knowledge of likely death without either such intention. Intention is a question of fact inferred from all the circumstances; the location of the injury alone does not determine the offence.
Inferring intention to cause death from the circumstances of assault	Intention must be inferred from the circumstances considered together. The factors are not exhaustive. No single circumstance substitutes for the assessment needed to distinguish murder from the two parts of Section 304 IPC.	701
Section 300 Thirdly: intentional injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	The Court applied Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465: Section 300 Thirdly requires proof of the injury and its nature, an intention to inflict that very injury, and its objective sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death; an additional intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's fatal degree is not required. Anda, Mahesh Balmiki, Bavisetti Kameswara Rao and the single-blow authorities quoted through Kanhaiyalal reject an automatic Section 304 reduction merely because one blow caused death. Dr. Ajay Gupta's post-mortem opinion identified a fresh blunt head injury sufficient to cause death, with death from shock and haemorrhage. Eyewitnesses attributed the intentional head strike to Laxmi Narayan. The Court retained his murder liability under Section 302 IPC, without treating the absence of a pre-planned group attack or the lathi/luhangi nomenclature difference as displacing his individual intentional fatal act.	733
Intended bodily injury sufficient to cause death under Section 300 Thirdly	Section 300 Thirdly requires proof of a bodily injury, its nature, an intention to inflict that particular injury, and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. A separate intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary once those elements are proved. The prosecution bears the burden throughout. Applying Virsa Singh, the Court found the fatal head injuries sufficient in the ordinary course and upheld the murder convictions.	766
Classification of culpable homicide under Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC	Death amounts to culpable homicide only when the act carries the intention or knowledge required by Section 299. The Court must then examine Section 300, including its exceptions, to decide whether the homicide is murder. Where the culpable homicide is not murder, Section 304 Part I applies when intention to cause death or likely fatal injury is present; Part II applies where there is knowledge of likely death without either form of intention.	766
A single blow does not automatically exclude murder	There is no rule that one blow necessarily reduces an offence from Section 302 IPC to Section 304. Depending on the injury, weapon, vital part targeted and surrounding circumstances, a single blow may constitute murder, lesser culpable homicide or hurt. Its legal character must be decided on the evidence, including the Section 300 Thirdly test where applicable.	766
Section 300 Thirdly: intended injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	For murder under Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove a bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The burden remains on the prosecution throughout. Once these elements are established, a separate intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary. Intention to inflict the injury is a question of fact; its sufficiency to cause death is assessed objectively. The Court adopted this test from Virsa Singh and the explanation in Anda that sufficiency denotes a high probability of death in the ordinary course of nature.	772
A single injury does not automatically	There is no fixed rule that a single blow excludes Section 302 IPC or requires reduction to Section 304. Classification depends on the injury, weapon, bodily	772 reduce murder to culpable homicide	part, manner of assault and surrounding circumstances establishing the required intention or knowledge. Intention to inflict the particular injury must be distinguished from awareness of its seriousness. The Court adopted the reproduced single-injury authorities, including Mahesh Balmiki, Kanhaiyalal and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao, as part of the legal framework applied to the evidence. A routine tool does not become innocuous merely because it is ordinarily used in the accused's work.

Murder under Section 300 Thirdly without a separate intention to cause death	Section 300 Thirdly requires proof of a bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury and its objective sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. A separate intention to kill, or knowledge of the injury's ultimate seriousness, is unnecessary once those elements are proved; the burden remains on the prosecution. Applying the reproduced Virsa Singh principles to the accepted eyewitness and medical evidence of fatal firearm injuries, the Court sustained the two murder convictions under Section 302 IPC.	849
Classification under Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC	The court must first determine whether the act causing death satisfies one of the intention or knowledge requirements of Section 299 IPC. It must then examine whether a clause of Section 300 applies and whether an exception excludes murder. Culpable homicide outside murder attracts Section 304 Part I where the relevant intention is present, or Part II where there is knowledge that death is likely without the intention specified in that provision. Causing death alone does not establish culpable homicide without the requisite mental element.	849
Circumstances relevant to inferring intention in homicide	Intention is a question of fact to be inferred from the circumstances as a whole. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part targeted, force used, premeditation, sudden quarrel or fight, prior enmity, provocation, heat of passion, undue advantage or cruelty, and the number of blows. The list is not exhaustive; neither the injury's location nor the absence of a usual motive alone determines whether the offence is murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder.	849
Single injury and the applicability of Section 302 IPC	There is no rule that a single blow excludes murder or necessarily attracts Section 304 Part II IPC. Depending on the evidence, a single injury may support Section 302, Section 304 or another appropriate offence. Its nature, the weapon, the body part chosen and the surrounding circumstances determine the required intention or knowledge; where the Section 300 requirements are proved, the number of blows is not decisive.	849
Section 300 Thirdly: intended injury sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death	The prosecution must prove the existence and nature of the bodily injury, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its objective sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The burden remains on the prosecution throughout. Once those elements are established, a separate intention to kill or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary. Applying Virsa Singh and Anda with the medical evidence, the Court sustained the murder conviction for the intentional fatal firearm assault.	873
Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC: intention and knowledge in homicide classification	Death caused by a criminal act amounts to culpable homicide only if one of the mental states in Section 299 is established: intention to cause death, intention to cause injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that death is likely. If a Section 300 clause is satisfied and no exception applies, the offence is murder. Culpable homicide outside murder falls under Section 304 Part I where the requisite intention exists, or Part II where knowledge of likely death exists without that intention.	873
A single injury does not mechanically exclude Section 302 IPC	There is no rule that a single blow necessarily reduces murder to culpable homicide or another lesser offence. Classification depends on the injury, weapon, bodily part, manner of assault and surrounding circumstances showing intention or knowledge. A tool ordinarily used in the accused's work is not	873 thereby innocuous when used to inflict injury. The Court adopted the reproduced single-injury authorities as part of the legal framework for assessing homicidal intention and injury sufficiency.

Section 300 Thirdly IPC — intended injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	For Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must prove a bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and its sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. The last inquiry is objective; an intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is not indispensable. The intended injury must carry a high probability of death in the ordinary course. Sections 299 and 300 distinguish culpable homicide from murder; where the case is not murder, intention-based liability falls under Section 304 Part I and knowledge without the specified intention under Part II. The repeated lathi blows, parietal fractures and fatal skull and brain injuries supported confirmation of Shivcharan's murder conviction.	885
Sections 299, 300 and 304: sequence of homicide classification	The Court must first determine whether death was caused with one of the mental states required by Section 299 IPC, then whether a clause of Section 300 makes the culpable homicide murder, and whether an exception applies. If the offence is culpable homicide without the characteristics of murder, Section 304 Part I applies where the requisite intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death is proved. Part II concerns knowledge that death is likely, without either of those intentions. Causing death alone does not establish culpable homicide without the required mental element.	948
Murder under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	The prosecution must prove the existence and nature of the bodily injury, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last inquiry is objective. Once these elements are proved, a separate intention to cause death is unnecessary. The Court applied this framework in affirming the murder conviction arising from the collective armed assault and fatal head injuries.	987
Distinguishing culpable homicide from murder	The Court must first determine whether the act falls within Section 299 IPC, then whether it satisfies a clause of Section 300 and whether a statutory exception applies. For culpable homicide not amounting to murder, Section 304 Part I applies where there is intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death; Part II applies where there is knowledge of likely death without either such intention.	987
Single blow and classification of a homicide	There is no fixed rule that a single blow excludes murder or necessarily brings the offence within Section 304 IPC. Classification depends on the injury, weapon, body part struck, manner of assault and surrounding circumstances establishing the requisite intention or knowledge. The number of blows is one relevant circumstance.	987
	Sub-Chapter no. 30.2 Attempt to Murder and Grievous Assault
Section 307 IPC: intention or knowledge and the nature of injury	Section 307 IPC applies to an act done with the intention or knowledge and in circumstances that would make the act murder if death resulted. Serious injury is not indispensable: an attempt without injury falls under the first punishment limb, while causing hurt attracts the second. The weapon used and the part of the body targeted are relevant to intention or knowledge. In this case, firing a firearm near the upper left chest, at the co-accused's instigation, supported conviction under Sections 307 and 34 IPC; the conclusion was based on the proved circumstances, not the location of the wound alone.	34
Reduction of attempted-murder counts to firearm hurt	For the surviving injured victims, the prosecution did not establish fatal or grievous injury through the medical, surgical or specialist evidence. The Court considered the simple injuries and the assailants' conduct, including the	165 absence of repeated firing in the assault on Raghuveer, and found intention to kill unproved. It reduced the Section 307/149 counts to Section 324/149 IPC.

Attempt to murder depends on intention or knowledge and an overt act	Section 307 IPC does not require a fatal, grievous or life-threatening injury. The decisive question is whether the act was done with the required intention or knowledge; that state of mind may be inferred from the weapon, force, body part targeted and surrounding circumstances. The injuries remain relevant evidence but their lesser severity, or the absence of repeated blows, does not by itself exclude attempted murder.	206
Intention and knowledge under Section 307 IPC	For an offence under Section 307 IPC, the decisive mental elements are intention and knowledge, rather than the nature of the injury alone. Although the evidence described a blow aimed at a vital part, differing accounts of its target and how the hand was injured left the acquittal a possible view that could not be displaced without perversity.	226
Attempt to murder despite simple injuries or an uninjured target	Section 307 IPC requires an act done with the intention or knowledge, and in circumstances, that would make the resulting death murder. A fatal, grievous or even actual injury is not essential. The weapon, blows, body part targeted and surrounding conduct help establish that mental element. Repeated farsa blows to Ajab Singh's head and ear supported the charge despite clinically simple injuries; firing at Bhanupratap supported the charge although he escaped unhurt.	291
Attempt to Murder: Intention or Knowledge in a Firearm Assault	For the firearm assault proved against Nathu Singh, the Court found the intention and knowledge necessary for Section 307 IPC because, had the injured victim died from that act, he would have been guilty of murder. It therefore upheld direct attempt-to-murder liability for the proved shot, while the victim's survival did not prevent that conviction.	360
Intention or Knowledge and an Overt Act Under Section 307 IPC	Section 307 IPC requires the intention or knowledge described in that provision coupled with an act towards the offence. Neither an injury nor grievous or life-threatening hurt is indispensable; the act and its result are distinct. Intention or knowledge may be inferred from the weapon, the body part targeted, the number and severity of blows, words used and surrounding circumstances. The Baka assault to different parts of the head, with skull fractures and contusions, supported that mental element.	378
Overt Act for Attempt to Murder Need Not Be the Penultimate Act	A criminal attempt under Section 307 IPC need not be the last act before completion of the offence. The required intent coupled with an overt act in its execution can suffice even though the assault produces no injury or only simple hurt; the court must examine the intention or knowledge and the circumstances specified by the provision.	378
Section 307 IPC: intention or knowledge and an overt act	Section 307 IPC turns on the requisite intention or knowledge coupled with an overt act in execution, rather than the seriousness of the resulting wound alone. The attempt need not be the penultimate act, and fatal, grievous, life-threatening or vital-organ injury is not indispensable. Intention may be inferred from the weapon, words, motive, targeted body part, severity of blows, actual injuries and surrounding circumstances; simple injury does not itself exclude the offence. This legal discussion did not alter the appellant's Section 307 acquittal: no State appeal had been filed, and after about nineteen years the Court declined to issue notice to reconsider it.	439
Section 307: Murderous Intention or Knowledge and an Overt Act	An attempt to murder requires the intention or knowledge necessary for murder together with an act in execution of that purpose. The act must go beyond preliminary preparation. Actual injury, or an injury sufficient to cause death, is unnecessary. The required mental state is inferred from the surrounding circumstances, including the weapon, its use, the part of the body targeted, the force and the nature of any injury.	450

30.2 : Attempt to Murder and Grievous Assault

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Intent to Kill Inferred From Multiple Knife Wounds to Vital Parts	The Court inferred an intention to cause death from repeated stab and incised wounds to vital parts, including the neck and abdomen, with a dangerous abdominal injury and amputation of a finger. The injured woman's account and the admissible eyewitness evidence, corroborated by the medical evidence, proved the knife assault. The conviction under Section 307 IPC was therefore sustained.	451
Attempt to murder — abandonment of a severely injured infant	Intent to cause death was inferred from the appellant's abandonment of a two-year-old child in distant roadside bushes at night after rape and serious injuries, exposing her to grave danger. Her age, wounded condition and deliberate abandonment supported the Section 307 IPC conviction. The taking of the child despite pursuit, concealment of her whereabouts and subsequent sexual injuries also supported the finding that she had been kidnapped for sexual assault. The Court sustained the convictions under Sections 366, 376(2)(i) and (m), and 307 IPC on the combined evidence.	482
Section 307 IPC: Intention or Knowledge and Injuries to a Vital Part	For Section 307, the decisive inquiry is whether the act was done with such intention or knowledge and in such circumstances that death caused by it would amount to murder; the nature of the resulting injury alone is not decisive. The lathi assault targeted the head, a vital part, and caused a frontal-bone fracture. From these circumstances the Court inferred the required intention and knowledge and upheld the attempted-murder conviction with Section 149 liability.	527
Intention, overt act and injury under Section 307 IPC	Section 307 IPC requires an act done with the intention or knowledge and in circumstances that would make the resulting death murder. Intention alone is insufficient; an act in execution of it is required. A fatal, life-threatening or grievous injury is not essential, and the mental element may be inferred from the weapon, the manner of attack, the target area and the surrounding circumstances.	570
Intention and overt act under Section 307 IPC	Section 307 IPC does not require a fatal, grievous or life-threatening injury. The prosecution must establish the requisite intention or knowledge and an overt act in furtherance of it. The mental element may be inferred from the weapon, words, motive, body part targeted, nature of the injury, force of the blows and other circumstances; simple hurt alone does not exclude the offence.	572
Section 307 IPC — intention or knowledge and an overt act matter more than injury severity	Section 307 IPC requires the relevant intention or knowledge, coupled with an overt act in its execution. A fatal, grievous, life-threatening or vital-part injury is not indispensable, and simple hurt alone does not exclude the offence. Intention may be inferred from the weapon, words, motive, location and severity of blows and surrounding circumstances; actual wounds are relevant but not decisive. An attempt need not be the penultimate act before completion of the offence.	633
Intention or knowledge under Section 307 IPC in a sudden shooting	Firing a country-made pistol at the victim's chest, a vital part of the body, indicated the intention or knowledge required for Section 307 IPC in the circumstances. The sudden liquor dispute and absence of prior enmity did not justify substituting Section 308 IPC. The accused carried the illegal pistol at night, and a bullet was recovered from the victim's body; the Section 307 conviction was sustained beyond reasonable doubt without reliance on the excluded ballistic report.	782
Section 307 IPC— intent or knowledge and overt act despite absence of grievous injury	Section 307 IPC requires the relevant intention or knowledge coupled with an overt act in execution; a fracture, grievous or life-threatening injury, or a wound on a vital part is not essential. Injury may assist in establishing intent; intent may also be inferred from the weapon, words used, motive, part of the body targeted, nature and severity of blows and other surrounding circumstances. Applying State of M.P. v. Harjeet Singh and the authorities narrated there, the Court held that the alleged armed assault and active roles justified the Section	819

	307/34 charge despite the asserted absence of bony injury. Ultimate proof remained for trial.
Section 307 convictions for firing at interveners	The Court accepted the eyewitness account that Laxman fired at persons intervening during the occurrence and assessed that evidence with the medical record. It sustained his three convictions under Section 307 IPC for injuries to Kailashi Bai, Sultan Singh and Jagdish, together with the seven-year rigorous-imprisonment sentences imposed by the trial court.	849
Section 307 read with Section 34: planned firing causing potentially fatal injuries	A coordinated, preplanned firearm attack on unarmed persons, inflicting injuries with a probability of death, supported attempted-murder liability under Section 307 read with Section 34 IPC. The injured eyewitness accounts were corroborated by the medical evidence, including serious internal injuries and retained projectiles. The Court inferred the intention to kill from the weapons and manner of assault, rejected private defence and sudden provocation, and affirmed the two attempted-murder counts concerning the surviving victims.	873
Section 307 IPC — intention and overt act rather than life-threatening injury	For attempted murder, the prosecution must establish the requisite intention or knowledge and an act in execution of it. A fatal, grievous or life-threatening injury is not essential, and the injury need not fall on a vital part. Intention may be inferred from the weapon, words spoken, motive, part of the body targeted and nature and severity of the blows. The repeated knife attack accompanied by a threat to kill, the nine wounds and frontal-bone fracture supported the conviction under Section 307 IPC.	908
Section 307 IPC: intention or knowledge and an overt act	Section 307 IPC requires an overt act with the intention or knowledge and in circumstances that would make the act murder if death resulted. A fatal, life-threatening or grievous injury is not indispensable, nor must an injury be on a vital part. Intention or knowledge may be inferred from the weapon, words, motive, location and severity of blows, actual injuries and surrounding circumstances. Here repeated forceful iron-pipe blows to the head and another to the leg, causing multiple fractures, established the required mental element. The Court upheld Section 307 and rejected the proposed substitution of Section 326.	947
Section 307 IPC: severe deliberate assault on the surviving victim	The Court upheld the Section 307 IPC conviction on the proved attack in which the appellants used an iron rod and lathi to strike the surviving victim's head and legs, causing injuries and fractures. His account of the appellants' participation was accepted with medical corroboration. The judgment affirmed the conviction on that record without separately formulating an extended Section 307 test. The ten-year sentence for this offence remained concurrent with the life sentence for the murder of his wife.	949
Failure to prove firing at the complainant under Section 307 IPC	The allegation that Khemraj fired twice at the complainant was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The Court assessed the materially changed account of Khemraj's presence, uncertainty about the complainant's position, the site plan and absence of corresponding impact marks, together with the independent commissioner's account of the earlier quarrel and departure. Although it accepted that the complainant was present, it found that he took shelter after Pawan fired and approached his injured father only after the assailants left. It rejected the alleged firing by Khemraj and acquitted him of the Section 307 charge along with the other charges.	951
Intention or knowledge under Section 307 from the manner of attack	Section 307 IPC turns on intention or knowledge and circumstances under which causing death would amount to murder. Grievous or life-threatening injury is not indispensable, though actual injury, the weapon, the body part struck, force and surrounding circumstances may reveal intent. Applying Kanha, the Court inferred intention to kill and knowledge of the risk from repeated forceful metal-spanner blows to the forehead, a vital part, causing a comminuted skull fracture and requiring multiple operations. The ordinary	969

Additional Section 326 conviction for the same attack after Section 307 conviction	Having upheld Section 307 IPC for the assault on the sole injured person, the Court held the additional Section 326 conviction for those injuries unwarranted and set it aside. The trial court had imposed no separate Section 326 sentence. The retained Section 307 sentence was unaffected. The general concluding language affirming the trial judgment and dismissing the appeal must be read with the specific Section 326 modification; the decision concerned the same assault on one victim.	969
Intention or knowledge required for attempt to murder	Section 307 IPC requires an act done with the intention or knowledge and in circumstances that would make the act murder if death resulted. Intention is gathered from the whole attack, including the weapon, its use, force, body part targeted and motive. A fatal or grievous injury is not indispensable: the requisite mental element and an overt act in its execution may suffice even without injury.	987
Hurt and the punishment available under Section 307 IPC	An attempt satisfying Section 307 IPC is punishable even if no injury results. Where hurt is caused, imprisonment for life becomes available; the hurt need not be grievous or of any particular degree. The mental element and the act required by Section 307 must nevertheless be established.	987

Criminal Medical Negligence — Grossness, Professional Standard and Expert Screening

Unauthorised allopathic treatment — gross negligence and expert screening	The Court treated the applicant's prescribing allopathic medicines without the required qualification or legal authority as gross negligence for the purpose of refusing to quash the prosecution. Applying Poonam Verma's treatment of unauthorised cross-system practice, and noting the Chief Medical and Health Officer's opinion that the applicant was not competent to prescribe allopathy, it held that a further independent-doctor or Medical Board opinion was unnecessary on these facts. It distinguished the prosecution safeguards in Jacob Mathew as inapplicable to this unauthorised practice.	68
Ordinary professional skill as the standard of medical care	A medical professional is assessed against an ordinarily competent practitioner exercising ordinary skill in the relevant field, rather than the highest available expertise. Negligence may arise from lacking the skill professed or failing to exercise possessed skill with reasonable competence. The Bolam standard applies when assessing professional care, while criminal liability additionally requires the requisite grossness of negligence.	181
Medical practice assessed by knowledge and resources at the time of treatment	The standard of medical care is assessed in the light of knowledge available when treatment was given, rather than knowledge at the trial. Ordinary precautions found sufficient by experience provide the standard. Failure to adopt an extraordinary precaution or use equipment not generally available at the relevant time does not itself establish negligence.	181
Choice between accepted medical treatments and unsuccessful results	A doctor following an accepted medical practice with reasonable skill and care is not negligent merely because another method was available or a more skilled doctor might have chosen it. A genuine difference of professional opinion, or an honestly chosen higher-risk procedure believed to offer a better chance of success, does not alone establish negligence when treatment fails. A medical professional does not guarantee recovery or a successful operation.	181
Criminal medical negligence — grossness beyond civil negligence or error of judgment	Negligence sufficient for civil liability does not necessarily amount to a criminal offence. Criminal medical negligence requires culpability of a gross or very high degree, with the requisite mental element; a simple lack of care, accident or error of judgment is insufficient. The act or omission must be one which, in the circumstances, no ordinarily prudent medical professional would have committed, involving a hazard making the resulting injury most likely imminent.	339

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Medical professional — requisite skill and reasonable competence	A medical professional may be negligent if he lacks the skill he professes to possess or fails to exercise that skill with reasonable competence. The standard is that of an ordinarily competent practitioner in the relevant field, judged in the particular circumstances. It does not demand the highest available expertise or permit a very low level of care.	339
Medical negligence — knowledge, precautions and equipment available at the time	The medical standard of care is assessed by the knowledge and accepted practice available when treatment was given, rather than by knowledge at the later trial. Ordinary sufficient precautions are required; failure to use special or extraordinary precautions is not itself the standard of negligence. A charge based on failure to use particular equipment cannot succeed where that equipment was not generally available at the relevant time.	339
Choice of treatment — accepted practice, professional differences and unsuccessful results	A doctor who acts with reasonable skill and care in accordance with a medically accepted practice is not negligent merely because another course was available, another doctor disagrees or treatment fails. Nor does an honestly chosen higher-risk procedure, considered to offer a better chance of success in the patient's condition, become negligent solely because the desired result is not achieved. A doctor's assurance is of reasonable professional competence, not guaranteed recovery.	339
