Section 304-A IPC — duty, gross breach and proximate cause of death	Criminal medical negligence under Section 304-A IPC requires death caused by a rash or negligent act not amounting to culpable homicide. The prosecution must establish a duty of care, a breach causing death and gross negligence in that breach. The causal connection must be direct or proximate; proof of an unfavourable medical outcome alone does not establish those elements.	339
Res ipsa loquitur — limited role in criminal medical negligence	The evidentiary rule res ipsa loquitur, used in civil negligence to assist with the burden of proof, cannot by itself establish criminal negligence. Its application, if any, in a criminal-negligence trial is limited and does not dispense with proof of the required criminal culpability.	339
Medical-negligence prosecution — credible and independent expert opinion	Under the guidelines relied upon by the Court, a private complaint alleging criminal rashness or negligence by a doctor requires prima facie support from a credible opinion of another competent doctor. Before proceeding against the doctor, the investigating officer should obtain an independent, competent and unbiased medical opinion, preferably from a government doctor qualified in the relevant branch, applying the professional standard to the collected facts. The reproduced screening direction also provides for reference to a competent specialist doctor or committee before criminal-court notice.	339
Gross Negligence Required for Criminal Medical Liability	Negligence sufficient for civil liability does not necessarily establish a criminal offence. The adopted criminal-law formulation requires mens rea. For criminal medical negligence under Section 304-A IPC, the degree must be gross or very high; an ordinary error of judgment or simple lack of care is insufficient. The adopted test asks whether the act or omission was one that no ordinarily prudent medical professional would have committed in the circumstances, with the resulting injury most likely imminent.	408
Duty, Breach and Causation in Death Alleged to Result from Medical Negligence	A criminal medical-negligence allegation requires an existing duty, its breach and death caused by that breach, with the breach amounting to gross negligence. The cause of death must be direct or proximate, and the rash or negligent act must fall short of culpable homicide. A treatment outcome alone does not establish this causal and culpability chain.	408
Ordinary Competent Professional Skill as the Medical Standard of Care	The governing standard is that of an ordinarily competent practitioner exercising ordinary skill in the relevant field, not the highest available expertise. Professional negligence may arise from lacking the skill professed or failing to exercise possessed skill with reasonable competence. Criminal prosecution additionally requires the higher degree of negligence applicable in criminal law.	408

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Accepted Treatment Choices and Unsuccessful Outcomes	A doctor is not negligent merely because treatment fails, another doctor would have chosen differently, or a better alternative was available. A reasonably competent choice accepted by the medical profession may include a higher-risk procedure honestly chosen for a better prospect of success. The obligation is reasonable professional care, not a guarantee of recovery.	408
Contemporaneous Knowledge, Ordinary Precautions and Available Equipment	The standard of medical care is assessed by the knowledge available when treatment occurred, rather than at trial. Ordinary precautions regarded as sufficient by experience govern the inquiry; failure to take extraordinary precautions is not the standard. An allegation based on failure to use particular equipment cannot succeed on that basis if the equipment was not generally available at the relevant time.	408
Limited Role of Res Ipsa Loquitur in Criminal Negligence	Res ipsa loquitur is a civil evidentiary rule concerning the burden of proof. It cannot by itself determine criminal negligence, and its application, if any, in a criminal-negligence trial is limited.	408
Credible Medical Opinion Supporting a Private Negligence Complaint	Under the adopted safeguards for prosecuting doctors, a private complaint alleging criminal rashness or negligence requires prima facie support from a credible opinion of another competent doctor. Before proceeding against a doctor, the investigating officer should obtain an independent, competent opinion, preferably from a government doctor qualified in the relevant branch, applying the professional standard to the collected facts.	408
Protection against Malicious Criminal Pressure on Medical Professionals	Medical professionals acting with reasonable skill and competence in the patient's interests should be protected from unnecessary criminal harassment. Proceedings used maliciously to pressure doctors or hospitals into paying unwarranted compensation deserve to be discarded; this protection depends on the required standard of professional conduct.	408
Gross negligence required for criminal liability of a doctor	Negligence requires a duty of care, its breach and resulting damage, but negligence sufficient for civil liability does not necessarily constitute a criminal offence. Applying Jacob Mathew and the other narrated authorities, the Court explained that criminal liability requires mens rea and negligence that is gross or of a very high degree. Simple lack of care, an accident or an error of judgment is insufficient. The act or omission must be one that no medical professional exercising ordinary prudence would have committed in those circumstances, with a hazard making the resulting injury most likely imminent. A grave adverse outcome alone does not establish that criminal standard.	509
Independent expert assessment before prosecution for medical negligence	Before proceeding against a doctor for an alleged criminally rash or negligent act, the investigating officer should obtain an independent and competent medical opinion, preferably from a government doctor qualified in the relevant speciality who can apply the Bolam test impartially to the investigation material. Applying the expert-screening requirement, the Court held that this prosecution could not continue without the required expert assessment and set aside the charge-sheet and pending Section 338 IPC proceedings. The complainant remained free to approach the Expert Committee and pursue an available legal remedy if it found medical negligence.	509
Ordinary professional competence and the knowledge available at treatment	A doctor's conduct is assessed against the reasonable skill and care of an ordinarily competent practitioner in the relevant field. The law does not require the highest expertise or extraordinary precautions merely because they might have prevented the injury. The practice must be judged by the medical knowledge available at the time of the incident, rather than at trial; failure to use particular equipment does not establish negligence if it was not generally available then. Liability may arise from lacking the professed requisite skill or failing to exercise possessed skill with reasonable competence, subject to the higher threshold for criminal negligence.	509
Choice between	A genuine difference of medical opinion or a reasonable choice between	509

accepted treatments and an unsuccessful higher-risk procedure	accepted courses of treatment does not by itself establish negligence. A doctor exercising reasonable skill and competence is not negligent merely because another doctor would have chosen differently or a more skilled alternative existed. Nor does failure of a higher-risk procedure necessarily establish negligence where the doctor honestly chose it as offering a greater prospect of success in light of the illness. The chosen course must remain acceptable to the medical profession and directed to the patient's interest.
Limited use of res ipsa loquitur in criminal medical-negligence cases	Res ipsa loquitur is an evidentiary rule primarily operating in civil negligence and affecting the onus of proof. It cannot by itself determine criminal liability for medical negligence and has, at most, limited application in a criminal-negligence trial. The adverse result must therefore be assessed within the applicable criminal-negligence requirements rather than treated as conclusive proof of guilt.	509
Medical opinion supporting a private complaint and criminal-court process	Under the safeguards narrated from Jacob Mathew, a private complaint alleging criminal medical negligence should be supported by prima facie evidence in the form of a credible opinion from another competent doctor. The Court also reproduced Martin F. D'Souza's direction that a criminal court refer the complaint to a competent doctor or a committee specialising in the relevant field before issuing notice, and issue notice only after a report discloses a prima facie case. These safeguards require medical support for the criminal process; they do not themselves determine the doctor's ultimate guilt.	509
Arrest of a doctor accused of criminal medical negligence	A doctor should not be arrested routinely merely because criminal rashness or negligence is alleged. The Jacob Mathew safeguard reproduced by the Court permits withholding arrest unless it is needed to further the investigation, collect evidence, or secure the doctor's availability to face prosecution. The investigating officer must assess those needs rather than treat the accusation alone as sufficient; the Court also narrated Martin F. D'Souza's warning against arrest or harassment outside the Jacob Mathew parameters.	509
Gross negligence and the professional standard for criminal prosecution of a doctor	Criminal medical negligence requires gross or very high negligence; ordinary civil negligence, an unsuccessful outcome or a mere error of judgment is insufficient. The test concerns the skill and reasonable competence of an ordinary practitioner in the relevant field, not the highest expertise. Accepted alternative treatment and genuine professional differences do not by themselves establish negligence. Practice is assessed using knowledge and ordinarily available equipment at the time of treatment. For criminal liability, the conduct must be such that no ordinarily prudent medical professional would have acted that way, with the resulting injury most likely imminent.	588
Independent medical opinion before criminal proceedings for alleged treatment negligence	Under the adopted Jacob Mathew safeguards, a private complaint requires prima facie support from a credible opinion of another competent doctor. Before proceeding against the doctor, the investigator should obtain independent competent opinion, preferably from a government doctor qualified in the relevant branch. A court considering such a negligence complaint should obtain the competent specialist or committee assessment described in the relied-upon authorities before issuing notice. Here, the available CMHO inquiry did not identify a departure from medical protocol, and the allegations did not justify directing FIR registration. Liberty remained to seek expert inquiry and pursue an FIR or complaint if it supported negligence or record manipulation.	588
Alleged fabrication of treatment records and the evidence supporting that allegation	Employment at another private hospital did not establish that a doctor could not have attended the patient or written the prescription. The complainant's belief that the doctor had not treated the patient was insufficient to infer later fabrication. The alleged alteration of the consent time was unsupported by an affidavit from the son who gave consent, and the available inquiry identified no departure from medical protocol. On these materials, the Court found	588 insufficient support for manipulation of records, while preserving expert inquiry into both negligence and interpolation.

Abetment of Suicide — Instigation, Intentional Aid and Causal Nexus

Section 306 IPC: intention and positive incitement beyond mere harassment	Conviction for abetment of suicide requires clear mens rea and a positive act of instigation or intentional aid linked to the suicide. A bare allegation of harassment, without positive action proximate to the occurrence that led or compelled the deceased to take that step, is insufficient. Words spoken in anger or emotion without intending the consequence do not constitute instigation.	27
Abetment of suicide — sustained harassment and threatened disclosure of a relationship may justify a charge	Allegations of continuous harassment despite objections from the deceased and her husband, together with threats to disclose the alleged relationship, were sufficient at the charge stage to make out a prima facie case under Section 306 IPC. Applying the test of instigation under Section 107, the Court held that such conduct could amount to abetment of suicide and upheld the charge. The charge required sufficient grounds to proceed; the likelihood of eventual conviction was not the test.	73
Instigation of suicide — intentional incitement may be inferred from a sustained course of conduct	Instigation requires intentional provocation, encouragement or urging towards the act. Express words directing suicide are unnecessary if the conduct and circumstances permit a reasonably certain inference of incitement, including a continued course of conduct leaving the deceased with no other option. For conviction under Section 306 IPC, harassment alone is insufficient without a positive act of incitement or intentional aid linked and proximate to the suicide. An angry utterance without the intended consequence, or ordinary discord to which the deceased was unusually sensitive, does not by itself satisfy that test. Instigation must be assessed in the circumstances of the particular case.	73
Instigation to suicide — Inference from the whole course of conduct	Instigation need not take the form of express words directing suicide. It may be inferred from acts, omissions or a continued course of conduct creating circumstances in which the deceased sees no other option, provided an intention to incite the consequence can reasonably be identified. The assessment depends on the circumstances of the particular case and admits no fixed formula; absence of direct evidence is not by itself decisive.	114
Suicide following ordinary domestic discord — Hypersensitivity and abetment	Courts must assess carefully whether the accused's conduct induced the suicide. If the deceased was unusually sensitive to ordinary domestic disagreements that would not be expected to drive a similarly situated person in that society to suicide, those disagreements do not by themselves justify a finding of abetment. Applying that caution, the Court did not treat the deceased's reaction to the wife's prosecution as proof that the applicants had abetted his suicide.	114
Abetment of suicide — continuous deprivation of livelihood	Instigation may be inferred from a continued course of culpable conduct that creates circumstances leaving the deceased with no other alternative to suicide; express words inciting suicide are not indispensable. The allegations that some applicants forcibly cultivated the deceased’s land while others prevented him from irrigating it disclosed continuing deprivation of livelihood and prima facie material under Sections 306/34 IPC. The Court held that a claimed right to possession should have been pursued before the civil court rather than through forcible self-help.	306
Abetment of suicide — intention, active conduct and causal proximity	Abetment under Section 107 IPC requires instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission in its pursuance, or intentional aid. For a Section 306 conviction, mere allegations of harassment are insufficient: culpable conduct with the necessary intention and a direct or indirect act of incitement or intentional facilitation linked to the suicide must be proved. The relied-upon authorities require positive action sufficiently proximate to the occurrence; words spoken in anger without the intended consequence do not, by themselves,	306

	constitute instigation.
Abetment of suicide — hypersensitivity to ordinary discord	The court must carefully assess whether the accused's conduct actually induced suicide. The Orilal Jaiswal and Gangula Mohan Reddy passages relied upon caution against conviction where the deceased was hypersensitive to ordinary discord or differences that would not be expected to induce a similarly placed person to take that step. The Court assessed the allegations here as continuing deprivation of livelihood, rather than merely ordinary discord or an isolated incident of harassment.	306
Sections 306 and 107 IPC — Intent and conduct amounting to abetment of suicide	Abetment of suicide requires conduct falling within Section 107 IPC: instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission in furtherance of it, or intentional aid. Instigation involves provoking, urging or encouraging the act with the necessary intent. Express words are unnecessary where acts, omissions or a continuing course of conduct create circumstances from which instigation can reasonably be inferred. Words spoken in anger or emotion without intending the consequence do not suffice. Intentional aid requires conduct that facilitates the act before or at its commission. Mere harassment, without positive conduct sufficiently connected and proximate to the suicide, does not establish abetment.	352
Section 306 IPC — Ordinary domestic discord and discharge at the charge stage	Courts must distinguish intentional incitement to suicide from ordinary domestic disagreements. A deceased person's unusual sensitivity to such disagreements cannot replace the ingredients of abetment. On the allegations before the Court, delayed meals, the husband doing household work, shopping, parental visits, dancing at a family wedding and insisting on returning home did not disclose instigation or intentional aid, even if accepted as true. Those allegations therefore could not sustain the Section 306 charge, and the wife was discharged. The decision applied the statutory ingredients to the alleged conduct; it did not determine guilt after a trial.	352
Section 306: Mens Rea and a Positive Act Linked to Suicide	Abetment of suicide requires the necessary intention and an active act of instigation or intentional aid linked to the suicide. Harassment or the deceased's distress alone is insufficient without the requisite positive conduct and causal connection. The Court applied the requirement of a clear mens rea and a proximate act of incitement or aid when deciding whether the allegations disclosed Section 306 IPC.	453
Instigation May Be Inferred From Conduct and Surrounding Circumstances	Instigation means goading, provoking, urging or encouraging the act. Express words directing suicide are unnecessary if the conduct or continued course of conduct supports an inference of intentional incitement. The inquiry depends on the circumstances of the particular case; words spoken in anger without intending the consequence do not by themselves amount to instigation.	453
Proximity between continuing mental cruelty and a suicide attempt	The absence of physical cruelty during a year of separation did not defeat proximity where mental cruelty was alleged to be continuing. In the circumstances alleged, further news of the husband's proposed remarriage, divorce and a claim for child custody intensified that cruelty and supported a prima facie connection with the wife's suicide attempt. The Court therefore declined to interfere with the charge under Section 306 read with Section 511 IPC, without deciding guilt.	463
Instigation of suicide — continuing coercion may suffice without express words urging suicide	Instigation means goading, provoking, inciting or encouraging an act. Express words directing suicide are unnecessary where the accused's acts, omissions or continued conduct leave the deceased with no other option and a reasonable certainty of inciting that consequence can be inferred. An angry or emotional utterance without an intended consequence does not suffice. Repeated demands for unwanted sexual relations and remarriage, backed by threats of public exposure on refusal, were treated as prima facie instigation in the FIR-quashing proceedings.	636

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 306 IPC — intentional, proximate abetment is required beyond bare harassment or ordinary discord	Conviction under Section 306 IPC requires suicide and a proved active role in instigation or intentional aid, with clear mens rea and direct or indirect incitement connected to the suicide. Bare harassment without positive action proximate to the occurrence is insufficient. Intentional aid includes conduct before or at the act which is intended to facilitate, and does facilitate, its commission. Courts must carefully distinguish cruelty inducing suicide from a hypersensitive response to ordinary domestic discord. The alleged coercion and threats here could not be dismissed as ordinary discord or hypersensitivity at the quashing stage.	636
Instigation inferred from a sustained course of conduct	Instigation means goading, provoking, inciting, urging or encouraging an act. Express words directing suicide are unnecessary if the accused's acts, omissions or continuing conduct permit a reasonably certain inference of intended incitement and create circumstances leaving the deceased with no apparent alternative. Whether that inference arises depends on the particular facts; no fixed formula applies.	684
Angry words without intended consequences are not instigation	Words uttered in anger or emotion, without an intention that their consequences should follow, do not by themselves constitute instigation to suicide. The intention of the alleged abettor remains essential.	684
Ordinary discord and a hypersensitive reaction	Courts must carefully assess whether the alleged conduct actually induced the suicide. Where ordinary discord or differences common to the relevant social setting would not be expected to induce a similarly situated person to take that step, the victim's hypersensitive reaction does not by itself justify a finding of abetment. Individual responses differ, so the circumstances require careful assessment.	684
Harassment and proximity of a positive act to suicide	A general allegation of harassment, without direct or indirect incitement or positive action proximate to the occurrence that led or compelled the deceased to commit suicide, cannot sustain conviction under Section 306 IPC. The prosecution must establish an active role by instigation or intentional facilitation.	684
Angry words without intended consequences and instigation	Words uttered in a fit of anger or emotion, without an intention that the harmful consequence should follow, do not by themselves amount to instigation. The assessment depends on the accused's intention and the circumstances, rather than solely on the deceased's subsequent act.	715
Hypersensitive reaction to ordinary domestic discord	A finding of abetment cannot rest merely on a hypersensitive reaction to ordinary domestic petulance or differences that would not ordinarily induce a similarly situated person to commit suicide. The Court must carefully examine whether the alleged cruelty actually induced the suicide. The Court did not accept the applicants' characterisation of the present prosecution material as only ordinary domestic discord at the charge stage.	715
Intentional incitement and the circumstances supporting suicide abetment	Instigation means provoking, inciting, encouraging or urging a person to act. Express words are unnecessary if the accused's acts, omissions or continued conduct support an inference, with reasonable certainty, of intended incitement leaving the victim no option but suicide. Clear mens rea and a positive, active or direct act with the necessary nexus are required; mere harassment without proximate positive action is insufficient. Words spoken in anger or emotion without intending the consequence are not instigation.	764
Ordinary domestic discord and hypersensitivity to suicide	A suicide following ordinary domestic discord does not alone establish abetment. Courts must carefully assess whether the alleged conduct induced suicide. Where the reaction reflects hypersensitivity to ordinary differences common in that social setting, and those differences would not be expected to induce a similarly situated person to take their life, guilt cannot be founded on that discord alone.	764

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Abetment of suicide — instigation inferred from conduct and surrounding circumstances	Instigation need not be expressed in words expressly directing suicide. It may be inferred where the accused's acts, omissions or continued conduct create circumstances leaving the deceased with no other option, and the intention to incite the consequence can reasonably be discerned. The circumstances must be assessed in each case; words spoken in anger or emotion without intending the consequence do not amount to instigation.	900
Abetment of suicide — culpable intention and participation	Abetment under Section 107 IPC requires instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission in its pursuance, or intentional aid by an act or illegal omission. Liability under Section 306 requires culpable participation in the suicide and the requisite intention. A mere allegation of harassment, without a positive act of incitement or assistance proximate to the suicide, is insufficient.	902
Instigation — inference from circumstances and continued conduct	Instigation may be inferred from the accused's acts, omissions or continued conduct where they create circumstances leaving the deceased with no other option and an intention to incite suicide can reasonably be inferred. Direct words directing suicide are unnecessary. The inference depends on the circumstances of the case; angry or emotional words spoken without intending the consequence do not by themselves establish instigation.	902
Abetment of suicide — intentional instigation inferred from conduct	Instigation under Sections 107 and 306 IPC requires intentional incitement or aid with a sufficient connection to the suicide. Express words directing suicide are not indispensable: acts, omissions or a continuing course of conduct may permit an inference where they create circumstances leaving the deceased with no perceived alternative. The requisite intention and a reasonable certainty of inciting the consequence must still emerge from the circumstances. Words spoken in anger or emotion without intending that consequence do not by themselves constitute instigation. At the quashing or charge stage, the assessment remains tentative; it is not a final determination that the offence has been proved.	992

Section 302 to Section 304 IPC — Intention, Knowledge and Exception 4 Analysis

Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC — indiscriminate firing after a land quarrel	A quarrel over a small piece of land does not by itself reduce murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The manner of attack and whether the offenders acted cruelly or took undue advantage remain material. Indiscriminate repeated firing that killed three people and injured others, coupled with rejection of private defence and the finding that the appellants were aggressors, did not attract Exception 4 or justify alteration from Section 302 to Section 304 Part I IPC.	12
Sudden-fight exception: mutual combat and absence of cruel retaliation	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. Mutual combat must be established. Repeated fatal lathi blows on an unarmed victim, without proved injuries to the appellants and after their arrival with weapons, did not satisfy those conditions.	21
Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC — sudden quarrel alone is insufficient without all statutory conditions	Exception 4 requires an act without premeditation, in a sudden fight, in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. The fight must involve the person killed, and all conditions must be satisfied. A sudden fight involves mutual provocation; absence of premeditation or proof of a quarrel alone is insufficient. Whether the fight was sudden depends on the proved circumstances, including whether there was time for passions to cool.	77
Single injury does not determine whether the offence is murder	There is no fixed rule that a single blow excludes Section 302 IPC or necessarily attracts Section 304 Part II. The nature of the offence depends on the intention or knowledge proved through the weapon, injury, body part targeted and other	93

	attendant circumstances. An intentionally inflicted injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death can attract Section 300 Thirdly even when there is only one blow.
Requirements of the sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires an act without premeditation, in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel and fight with the person killed, without undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone are insufficient. A fight involves mutual provocation and combat, and whether it was sudden depends on the proved facts. All the requirements must be satisfied.	93
Septicaemia and delayed death do not automatically reduce murder to culpable homicide	Death from septicaemia or after an interval following the assault does not by itself require alteration of a murder conviction to Section 304 IPC. Relying on the reproduced authorities, including Khokan, Arjun Singh, Antram and Jagtar Singh, the Court examined the injuries and their medical connection with death. The victim's prolonged coma and septic shock remained attributable to the head injuries, and the Section 302 conviction was affirmed.	132
Sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires an act without premeditation, committed in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone are insufficient. The fight must be with the person killed, and all the conditions must be satisfied.	160
Sudden quarrel alone does not attract Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC	Exception 4 requires an act without premeditation, in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without undue advantage or a cruel or unusual manner of acting. Every condition must be satisfied. Deliberately pouring kerosene on an unarmed wife and pushing her towards a heater showed intention or knowledge, cruelty and unfair advantage. Absence of premeditation therefore did not justify reducing the murder conviction to Section 304 IPC.	173
A single gunshot does not by itself reduce murder to culpable homicide	There is no universal rule that firing a single shot excludes Section 302 IPC. The weapon, body part targeted, injury and surrounding circumstances determine the offence. An unprovoked close-range shot to the chest, causing fatal injury to the heart and lung, remained murder where no applicable exception to Section 300 was established.	207
Sudden quarrel alone does not establish the sudden-fight exception	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC is not attracted merely because a quarrel arose suddenly. A fight involves a bilateral exchange, and the offender must not take undue advantage. The exception was unavailable where the unarmed deceased merely objected to abuse and the accused fired without retaliation or any threatening act from the other side.	207
Intent to inflict the fatal injury under Section 300 Thirdly IPC	Section 300 Thirdly IPC requires proof of the injury and its nature, intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The last requirement is objective; a separate intention to cause death is unnecessary. The Court relied on that framework and the medical evidence of fatal head injuries in affirming liability for murder with Section 149 IPC.	215
Homicide classification and intention or knowledge under Section 304	After finding culpable homicide under Section 299 IPC, the Court must determine whether Section 300 makes it murder and whether an exception applies. Where the homicide does not amount to murder, Section 304 Part I concerns the specified intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death, while Part II concerns knowledge of likely death without that intention. Death alone does not establish the required mental element.	215
Single blow and contextual inference of intention	There is no rule that a single blow excludes murder or necessarily attracts Section 304 Part II IPC. The nature of the weapon, the part of the body targeted, force, manner of assault, premeditation and surrounding circumstances determine intention or knowledge. The number of injuries is one factor and	215

	cannot decide the offence mechanically.
Requirements of the sudden-fight exception	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires an unpremeditated sudden fight, an act in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The fight must concern the person killed, and all requirements must be established. A sudden quarrel and lack of premeditation alone do not suffice.	215
Sudden lathi assault and alteration of murder conviction to Section 304 Part I	In assessing a sudden, unpremeditated lathi assault, the Court considered the reason for the incident, the single fatal head injury, the non-fatal injuries and the dragging of the deceased. In those circumstances it altered the conviction from murder to Section 304 Part I IPC. The finding that at least five blows were delivered and the deceased was dragged supported liability under Part I.	223
Circumstances relevant to intention in a fatal assault	Intention must be assessed from the circumstances as a whole, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the part of the body targeted, force used, number of blows, prior enmity, premeditation, sudden quarrel or fight, provocation, heat of passion and any undue advantage or cruel conduct. The circumstances listed are not exhaustive.	223
A single blow does not automatically exclude murder	There is no fixed rule that a single blow prevents conviction for murder. The weapon, the vital part targeted and the force and nature of the injury may establish the requisite intention. Once that intention is proved, the mere fact that only one blow was delivered does not determine the offence.	223
Conditions for Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC	Exception 4 requires a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without premeditation, undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A sudden fight involves mutual provocation and combat. All conditions must be satisfied. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone are insufficient, and whether the fight was sudden depends on the proved circumstances.	223
Cruel burning after a sudden quarrel does not justify reduction from murder	A sudden quarrel did not justify altering murder to culpable homicide where the accused poured kerosene on his wife and set her alight. Burning a person alive was cruel conduct involving undue advantage, defeating the plea for reduction to Section 304 IPC on the ground that the incident occurred suddenly.	229
Factors in distinguishing murder from culpable homicide after a sudden incident	Classification depends on the circumstances of the occurrence, the weapon and its source, the part of the body targeted and force used, participation in a sudden fight, previous enmity, provocation, heat of passion, undue advantage and cruel or unusual conduct. In deciding the sudden-quarrel plea, the Court treated the cruelty and undue advantage involved in burning the victim as decisive against reduction.	229
Distinguishing murder from culpable homicide under Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC	The inquiry first asks whether causing death satisfies any of Section 299's intention or knowledge conditions. It then asks whether a Section 300 clause makes the act murder and whether an exception removes it from that category. Where the act is culpable homicide but not murder, intention to cause death or likely-fatal injury attracts Section 304 Part I, while knowledge of likely death without such intention attracts Part II.	259
Cumulative conditions for the sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight, an act in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and no undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A sudden quarrel and lack of planning alone are insufficient. The fight involves mutual provocation or combat with the person killed, and the circumstances must leave no time for passions to cool.	259
Cruel and repeated stone blows defeating reduction to Section 304 IPC	Absence of prior enmity or an assertion that the incident was sudden did not justify reducing the offence to Section 304 IPC where the assault was cruel or unusual or involved undue advantage. The repeated forceful stone blows that crushed both victims' faces and fractured their skulls demonstrated the brutality of the attack. The Court therefore retained both murder convictions.	278

30.5 : Section 302 to Section 304 IPC — Intention, Knowledge and Exception 4 Analysis

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Factors for distinguishing murder from culpable homicide	The assessment under Sections 302 and 304 IPC includes the occurrence circumstances, the weapon and whether it was carried or taken from the scene, the body part targeted and force used, participation in a sudden fight, prior enmity or provocation, heat of passion, and whether the assailant took undue advantage or acted cruelly or unusually. The accused seeking the benefit must establish the absence of undue advantage and cruel or unusual conduct.	278
Inferring intention when distinguishing murder from culpable homicide	Whether a fatal assault amounts to murder or culpable homicide must be decided from the circumstances bearing on intention, including the weapon, force, body part targeted, premeditation, enmity and suddenness of the quarrel. Here a dispute over a tumbler arose without proved prior enmity; the appellant used fists and blows, and deliberate abdominal targeting or an intention to cause death or an ordinarily fatal injury was not established. Those circumstances supported alteration to Section 304 Part II IPC.	295
Homicide classification — intention and knowledge under Sections 299–304 IPC	The court must first determine whether the act causing death satisfies Section 299 IPC and then whether it falls within a clause of Section 300, subject to its exceptions. Where culpable homicide does not amount to murder, intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death attracts Section 304 Part I; knowledge that death is likely, without either such intention, attracts Part II. Causing death alone does not supply the required mental element. The Court adopted this framework from Arun Nivalaji More in assessing the murder conviction.	307
Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC — cruel assault and undue advantage prevent reduction	A plea of sudden assault without premeditation does not justify reducing murder to culpable homicide when the accused took undue advantage or acted cruelly or unusually. The assessment considers the circumstances, weapon and whether it was carried or found at the scene, vital parts targeted, force used, participation of the deceased in a sudden fight, previous enmity, provocation, heat of passion, and undue advantage or cruelty. Repeated deep axe wounds on the victim lying in the house, with no other male member inside, established cruelty and undue advantage. The plea for alteration from Section 302 to Section 304 IPC was therefore rejected.	341
Sudden Quarrel and Alteration from Section 302 to Section 304 Part I IPC	Although repeated head blows established the fatal assault, the sudden quarrel over food, absence of premeditation, use of a small wooden pillar lying at the scene, and the accused's guilty plea and remorse supported alteration of the conviction from Section 302 to Section 304 Part I IPC. The guilty plea was considered with those circumstances even though the trial court had required the prosecution to prove its case.	377
Factors Distinguishing Murder from Culpable Homicide Not Amounting to Murder	The distinction between Sections 302 and 304 IPC requires consideration of the circumstances of the incident, the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up at the scene, the body part targeted, the force used, the deceased's participation in a sudden fight, previous enmity, sudden provocation, heat of passion, and any undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. In applying those factors, the court stated that the accused must establish the absence of undue advantage or cruel conduct.	377
Conditions for the Sudden-Fight Exception to Murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 requires a sudden fight without premeditation, in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and without the offender taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. A sudden quarrel and absence of planning alone are insufficient. The fight must be with the person killed and involve mutual provocation and combat. All the requirements must be established; 'undue advantage' means unfair advantage.	383
Inferring murderous intention and the effect of a single blow	The nature of the offence cannot be determined mechanically from the number of blows. Intention or knowledge must be inferred from the weapon, force, part of the body targeted, nature of injury and surrounding circumstances, including premeditation, provocation and the manner of assault. A single blow may	393 amount to murder when the proved circumstances establish the required mental element.

Inferring intention from the weapon, injury and surrounding circumstances	Intention must be inferred from the proved circumstances together, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the part of the body targeted, force, injuries, prior hostility, premeditation, provocation, sudden fight, heat of passion and any undue advantage or cruelty. These factors are not exhaustive. The number of blows alone cannot mechanically determine the offence: even one intended fatal injury may support murder. Here, firearm injuries to the heart and brain formed part of the Court's assessment sustaining the murder convictions.	399
Cumulative requirements of the sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires an act without premeditation, in a sudden fight and in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A fight involves mutual provocation and combat, and the relevant fight must be with the person killed. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone are insufficient; all conditions must be satisfied on the proved facts. The Court reproduced and adopted these limits while rejecting the challenge to the murder convictions.	399
Planned lathi assault —refusal to reduce murder to culpable homicide	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires a sudden fight without premeditation, action in the heat of passion and absence of undue advantage or cruel conduct. Eight armed assailants stopping two men on their way to give evidence and inflicting repeated serious injuries did not establish a sudden, unpremeditated fight. Reduction to Section 304 Part II was refused.	412
Section 304 IPC— intention, knowledge and applicable exceptions	Where culpable homicide is established but murder is not, Part I of Section 304 applies to the requisite intention and Part II to knowledge without that intention. A case within Section 300 may also be reduced by an applicable exception; the appropriate part depends on the mental element proved. Establishing an exception is not essential where the prosecution has not established murder in the first place.	412
Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC — Intention, knowledge and surrounding circumstances	Culpable homicide becomes murder when a clause of Section 300 is established and no exception applies. Where culpable homicide is not murder, an intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death attracts Section 304 Part I; knowledge of likely death without such intention attracts Part II. Intention is inferred from all the circumstances, including the weapon and its source, body part, force, prior enmity, chance or planned encounter, provocation, heat of passion, undue advantage and number of blows. A single injury or asserted absence of intent to kill does not automatically exclude murder. The Court found no basis to reduce this strangulation to Section 304.	478
Section 300 Exception 4 — Cumulative conditions for a sudden fight	Exception 4 requires death caused without premeditation in a sudden fight, in the heat of passion on a sudden quarrel, without undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The fight must involve the person killed, and its suddenness depends on the proved facts. A quarrel and absence of planning alone do not satisfy every condition. The Court found no evidence that a sudden fight or heat-of-passion exchange accounted for the fatal assault and declined reduction to Section 304.	478
Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC — cumulative sudden-fight requirements	Exception 4 requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The discussion adopted from Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak also requires the fight to be with the person killed and explains mutual provocation, absence of time for passions to cool, and the fact-specific character of a sudden quarrel. A sudden quarrel and lack of premeditation alone do not satisfy the exception; all its requirements must be established.	497

Passion: Alteration to Section 304 Part I IPC	advantage or cruelty. The Court altered the conviction to Section 304 Part I where the appellant, apprehensive that his wife was being taken away permanently, suddenly attacked with stones picked up at the spot. It considered the likely three blows, unproved stone weight, compound skull fractures without crushing and heat of passion. The finding rested on this combined assessment despite repeated head injuries.
Single fatal hockey blow in a sudden fight	The fatal hockey blow was inflicted during a sudden, unpremeditated confrontation over waste water. The Court considered the hockey not to be a lethal weapon in this setting, found that there was no repeated head blow, undue advantage or cruel conduct, and altered the assailant's conviction from Section 302 to Section 304 Part I IPC.	561
Factors distinguishing murder from culpable homicide	In deciding between Sections 302 and 304 IPC, relevant factors include the circumstances of the occurrence, the weapon and whether it was carried or obtained at the spot, the body part targeted, the force used, the deceased's participation in the fight, previous enmity, sudden provocation, heat of passion, and whether the assailant took undue advantage or acted cruelly or unusually.	561
Undue advantage and Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC	A sudden quarrel does not attract Exception 4 where the assailant takes undue advantage or acts cruelly or unusually. The relied-upon precedent treated fatal violence against an unarmed, non-threatening person who merely sought to stop a fight as outside the exception, and required the relevant fight to be with the person killed.	561
Conditions for the sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight, an act in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A sudden quarrel alone is insufficient. The exception was unavailable where the evidence did not establish the claimed heat of passion and showed a concerted, cruel assault with deadly weapons.	570
Intentional bodily injury sufficient to cause death under Section 300 Thirdly	For Section 300 Thirdly IPC, the prosecution must establish the bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. A separate intention to cause death or knowledge of the injury's fatal seriousness is unnecessary once those requirements are proved, subject to the statutory exceptions.	570
A single blow does not automatically exclude murder	The number of blows does not alone determine whether an offence is murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder. Even one blow may attract Section 302 IPC. The weapon, the part of the body struck, the nature and manner of the injury, and the surrounding circumstances must establish the required intention or knowledge.	570
Inferring homicidal intention from the surrounding circumstances	Intention must be assessed from the circumstances as a whole, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the part of the body targeted, the force used, prior enmity, premeditation, sudden quarrel or provocation, heat of passion, cruelty or undue advantage, and the number of blows. No single factor invariably determines the offence.	570
Intention and knowledge in culpable homicide	Where culpable homicide does not satisfy Section 300 IPC, or falls within one of its exceptions, the distinction between Parts I and II of Section 304 depends on the mental element. Part I covers intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death; Part II covers knowledge that death is likely without either form of intention.	570
Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC: sudden fight and absence of unfair advantage	Exception 4 requires death in a sudden fight, without premeditation, in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and without the offender taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. A sudden quarrel and absence of preparation alone are insufficient. The fight involves mutual provocation or combat; the exception must be assessed from the proved circumstances and all its conditions must be satisfied.	584

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Single-blow cases and inference of homicidal intention	A single blow does not automatically exclude murder or require reduction to Section 304 IPC. Intention must be assessed from the combined circumstances, including the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the bodily site, force and manner of attack, premeditation, prior enmity, provocation, the nature of any fight, heat of passion, undue advantage and the number of blows. These factors are illustrative, and a single forceful blow on a vital part may support murder. The Court discussed these standards but acquitted this appellant because reliable attribution failed, rather than reducing his conviction under a single-blow rule.	599
Cumulative conditions for Exception 4 to Section 300	Exception 4 requires an act without premeditation, in a sudden fight and in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The narrated Dhirajbhai principle also requires the fight to be with the person killed; a fight involves mutual provocation and conduct, rather than a merely unilateral attack. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation are insufficient by themselves. Whether the circumstances qualify is a question of fact. The Court stated this test without finding the exception established for this appellant.	599
Cruel conduct and sudden-fight reduction of murder	In deciding whether an act falls under Section 302 or Section 304 IPC, relevant circumstances include the weapon, force, part of the body targeted, prior enmity, sudden provocation, heat of passion and any undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The Court treated pouring kerosene on a person and burning him alive as cruel conduct involving undue advantage and refused reduction to Section 304 Part I. The sudden-fight decision in Khokan did not establish that every death from septicaemia falls under Section 304 Part I.	610
Exception 4 to Section 300—Cumulative conditions for a sudden fight	Exception 4 requires a killing without premeditation, in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without the offender taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. The fight must be with the person killed. A sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone do not satisfy the exception.	660
Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC—Sequence of classification	The Court must first determine whether the act amounts to culpable homicide under Section 299, then whether it falls within a clause of Section 300 and whether an exception applies. Where culpable homicide does not amount to murder, an intention to cause death or injury likely to cause death attracts Section 304 Part I; knowledge that death is likely, without either intention, attracts Part II.	660
Inference of intention from the circumstances of the assault	Intention is a question of fact assessed from the circumstances as a whole. Relevant factors include the weapon and whether it was carried or picked up, the body part targeted, force used, number of blows, prior enmity or premeditation, sudden quarrel or provocation, heat of passion, and undue advantage or cruel conduct. The location of the injury alone does not determine the offence.	660
Single injury—No automatic reduction from murder	A single blow or injury does not by itself exclude murder or require conviction under Section 304 Part II. The nature and site of the injury, weapon, manner of assault and surrounding circumstances determine the required intention or knowledge and the offence made out.	660
Sudden fight, undue advantage and Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC	Exception 4 requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight in the heat of passion with the person killed, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. All requirements must be established; suddenness alone is insufficient, and undue advantage means unfair advantage. The Court found the attack revengeful and premeditated and, independently, that repeated armed assaults on five persons causing two deaths involved undue advantage and cruelty. It therefore refused alteration of the murder convictions to Section 304 Part I IPC.	698

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Sudden fight, undue advantage and Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC	Exception 4 requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight in the heat of passion with the person killed, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. All requirements must be established; suddenness alone is insufficient, and undue advantage means unfair advantage. The Court found the attack revengeful and premeditated and, independently, that repeated armed assaults on five persons causing two deaths involved undue advantage and cruelty. It therefore refused alteration of the murder convictions to Section 304 Part I IPC.	699
Murder and culpable homicide — statutory classification by intention, knowledge and exceptions	The inquiry first asks whether the act causing death falls within Section 299 IPC and then whether it satisfies any clause of Section 300. If it falls within Section 300, it is murder unless a statutory exception applies. Culpable homicide outside Section 300 attracts Section 304 Part I where the act is accompanied by intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death, and Part II where there is knowledge of likely death without either such intention. Intention is a question of fact inferred from all the circumstances; the location of the injury alone does not determine the offence.	700
Sudden quarrel alone does not displace liability under Section 300 Thirdly	The Court distinguished Sections 299, 300 and 304 IPC using Arun Nivalaji More and Paul v. State of Kerala, with Rayavarapu Punnayya's sequence of causation, culpable homicide, murder clauses and possible exceptions. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak sets cumulative requirements for Exception 4: no premeditation, sudden fight, heat of passion, and no undue or cruel advantage; Pulicherla Nagaraju, Sangapagu Anjaiah, Kanhaiyalal and Bavisetti require a contextual assessment of weapon, vital part, force, manner and surrounding circumstances rather than counting blows. Though the incident arose abruptly and no prior plan of all three was proved, the Court held Laxmi Narayan's intentional head injury sufficient in ordinary course of nature to cause death. It did not find all Exception 4 conditions established for him, and rejected the requested substitution of Section 304 Part I or II. Absence of common intention for companions is a distinct question from the principal assailant's Section 300 Thirdly liability.	733
Cumulative requirements of the sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 requires an unpremeditated act in a sudden fight, committed in the heat of passion on a sudden quarrel, without undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The fight must be with the person killed and involves mutual provocation; a sudden quarrel and absence of premeditation alone are insufficient. Whether these conditions exist depends on the proved circumstances.	766
Sections 299, 300 and 304: intention, knowledge and the homicide classification	The inquiry begins with whether the act causing death satisfies Section 299 IPC through intention to cause death, intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that death is likely. Death alone does not establish culpable homicide without the required mental state. If a clause of Section 300 applies and no exception intervenes, the offence is murder punishable under Section 302. Culpable homicide outside murder falls under Section 304 Part I where the requisite intention exists, and under Part II where there is knowledge of likely death without the requisite intention. The Court adopted the distinction explained in Arun Nivalaji More before considering the evidence of the fatal shooting.	772
Exception 4 to Section 300: cumulative sudden-fight requirements	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. All requirements must coexist, and the fight must be with the person killed. A sudden fight involves mutual provocation and combat; a sudden quarrel and lack of premeditation alone are insufficient. Whether a quarrel was sudden depends on the proved facts. Undue advantage means unfair advantage. The Court adopted these requirements from the reproduced Dhirajbhai passage and the Kanhaiyalal discussion when setting	772

	out the law governing homicide classification.
Grave and sudden provocation: loss of self-control and cooling-off time	Exception 1 to Section 300 IPC requires grave and sudden provocation by the deceased, a resulting loss of self-control, and the killing during that loss of control. Applying B.D. Khunte, the Court required a close temporal connection and absence of sufficient cooling-off time. The wife's departure about ten months earlier could not establish continuing sudden provocation. Her residence with her parents and the husband's act of bringing her home did not establish it either, and the immediate quarrel's cause was unproved. The earlier conduct had instead become a motive. The plea for reduction from murder on this ground failed.	774
Cruel repeated assault defeats reduction of murder to Section 304 Part II	Apart from failure to prove grave and sudden provocation, the repeated assault causing widespread contusions, fractures, head injury and burns showed cruel conduct and undue advantage. The Court found intention and knowledge of killing, intentional injuries sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and awareness that the repeated blows were imminently dangerous. These findings defeated the request for Section 304 Part II treatment and supported conviction under Section 302 IPC.	774
Requirements of Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC	Exception 4 requires a sudden fight without premeditation, in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without the offender taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. The reproduced Dhirajbhai reasoning also requires the fight to be with the person killed, explains mutual provocation and blows, and requires absence of time for passions to cool. A sudden quarrel and lack of premeditation alone are insufficient; all the conditions must be established. Undue advantage means unfair advantage.	849
Exception 4 to Section 300: cumulative sudden-fight requirements	Exception 4 requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight with the person killed in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. A sudden fight involves mutual provocation and combat; a sudden quarrel and lack of premeditation alone are insufficient. Whether the quarrel was sudden depends on the proved facts, and undue advantage means unfair advantage. The armed, preplanned ambush on unarmed persons without a preceding altercation did not satisfy these conditions.	873
Murder or culpable homicide — injury count and the sudden-fight exception	The number of injuries does not by itself determine whether an offence falls under Section 302 or Section 304 IPC. Intention or knowledge must be assessed from the weapon, vital part targeted, force, manner of assault, prior enmity, planning or chance, provocation, heat of passion and other circumstances. Exception 4 to Section 300 requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct; the fight must be with the person killed. A sudden quarrel alone is insufficient. The fatal repeated lathi blows inflicted while Ramesh was eating at his door, with no proved attack on Gorelal or mutual fight, did not justify interference with the murder conviction.	885
Section 300 Thirdly: intended injury and objective sufficiency to cause death	The prosecution must prove that a bodily injury exists, its nature, and the accused’s intention to inflict the particular injury found. It must then establish objectively that an injury of that kind is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Once these elements are proved, an additional intention to kill or knowledge of the injury’s fatal seriousness is unnecessary. An accidental injury, or proof that a different injury was intended, falls outside that finding of intention. Applying these principles with the proved axe assault and fatal brain injury, the Court retained the conviction under Section 302 IPC.	948
Exception 4 to Section 300: all conditions must be satisfied	Exception 4 requires a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without premeditation, and without the offender taking undue advantage or acting cruelly or unusually. The fight must be with the person killed. Absence	948

	of premeditation or a sudden quarrel alone is insufficient. The Court considered these cumulative requirements but declined to alter the murder conviction on this record, having accepted the axe assault, the serious fatal brain injury and the overall prosecution evidence. It did not make a separate detailed finding on every condition of Exception 4.
A single blow does not automatically exclude murder	There is no fixed rule that a single injury attracts Section 304 rather than Section 302 IPC. Depending on the proved circumstances, a single blow may amount to murder, culpable homicide not amounting to murder, or a hurt offence. The Court must assess the weapon, injury, part of the body, manner of assault and surrounding circumstances to determine intention or knowledge. An intentional injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death is not reduced to a lesser offence merely because only one blow was struck.	948
Cruel assault on unarmed victims: refusal to substitute Section 304 Part I	In deciding between Sections 302 and 304 IPC, the Court considered the circumstances, weapon and its source, target and force of the blows, participation in any sudden fight, enmity, provocation, heat of passion and undue advantage or cruel conduct. Here the appellants came armed to the victims' field, repeatedly attacked their heads and broke both victims' legs. The victims were unarmed and had not instigated them. The Court found that the incident was not sudden and that the assault was cruel. The verbal dispute therefore did not justify replacing the murder conviction with Section 304 Part I.	949
Distinguishing murder from culpable homicide after an earlier quarrel	Whether a homicide falls under Section 302 or Section 304 IPC depends on the intention and knowledge disclosed by the circumstances. Relevant considerations include the weapon and whether it was brought, the part of the body targeted, force and number of blows, premeditation, prior enmity, participation in a sudden fight, provocation, heat of passion and any undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. Applying Lavghanbhai and the principles reproduced through Ajmal, the Court found that the shooting occurred after the commission proceedings had ended and the crowd dispersed. The complainant's side was unarmed and had not provoked the attack; Pawan's firearm shot struck the deceased's chest. It rejected the plea of a killing in the heat of passion, affirmed Section 302 and maintained the life sentence.	951
Requirements of the sudden-fight exception to murder	Exception 4 to Section 300 IPC requires absence of premeditation, a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and no undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct by the offender. All conditions must be satisfied; a sudden quarrel and lack of premeditation alone are insufficient. The fight must concern the person killed.	987
	Sub-Chapter no. 30.6 Hurt, Grievous Hurt and Dangerous Weapons
Manner of using a sharp or pointed weapon	The weapon's description alone does not establish hurt by a cutting or stabbing use. Where a ballam was not shown to have been thrust, or a farsa caused a medically supported blunt injury, simple-hurt liability under Section 323 IPC could follow. Conversely, a proved incised injury could not support conviction of an accused for sharp-weapon hurt without evidence attributing that use to him.	165
Proportionality of sentence for grievous hurt with multiple fractures	The nature and number of fractures and wounds, together with prior enmity, justified refusal to reduce the seven-year sentence under Section 326 read with Section 34 IPC to the period already undergone. The Court considered the severity of the proved injuries and noted that Section 326 permits imprisonment for life.	226
Hurt without visible external injury	Hurt under Section 319 IPC includes bodily pain and does not require an external injury. Accordingly, the absence of injury in the medical examination	244

	did not negate allegations of fist blows under Section 323 IPC. Ocular evidence could not be discarded merely because it lacked documentary corroboration.
Section 323 IPC — hurt proved despite failure of the extortion purpose	Failure to prove the purpose required by Section 327 IPC did not negate the independently proved lathi assault. The victim's account, corroborated by medical evidence of eight contusions, established voluntary hurt beyond reasonable doubt. The Court accordingly substituted a conviction under Section 323 IPC.	316
Section 323/34 IPC — charges for assault on two victims	Specific allegations that the accused assaulted the complainant and her husband during the same confrontation, accepted at face value at the charge stage, furnished prima facie material for two counts under Section 323 read with Section 34 IPC. Their truth and the accused persons' ultimate liability remained matters for trial.	330
Individual liability for simple hurt	After rejecting common-intention liability for the fatal assault, the Court separately considered the proved personal assaults on the other injured witnesses. Their injuries were treated as simple, and the appellants were held liable under Section 323 IPC for the injuries individually attributable to them.	561
Absence of visible injuries after fist blows	The absence of injuries other than the fatal neck injury did not lead the Court to reject the proved fist assault. It observed that fist blows delivered without great force may leave no internal injury, and maintained liability for hurt under Section 323/149 IPC while excluding constructive liability for the independent strangulation.	563
Agricultural axe or lathi — possession distinguished from proved use in causing hurt	Carrying an axe or lathi at an agricultural field did not alone establish that the accused had arrived prepared with deadly weapons. Referring to Jugat Ram and Ram Charan, the Court considered the ordinary agricultural use of those implements. Their actual use in causing incised and lacerated injuries was nevertheless established by consistent injured-witness evidence and medical findings. Three appellants were therefore convicted directly under Section 324 IPC after their collective convictions were set aside; the previously acquitted Homesingh was separately convicted under Section 324 IPC in the State's appeal.	754
Bodily pain and medical material supporting a prima facie hurt charge	Hurt under Section 319 IPC includes bodily pain, disease or infirmity. Medical findings of abrasions, swelling, bruising and tenderness, together with the complaint of chest pain, supported a prima facie offence under Section 323 IPC. The absence of an external chest injury did not remove the recorded complaint of pain from that assessment. The conclusion concerned charge sufficiency and remained subject to the trial evidence.	832
Separate Section 323 liability for a lathi injury	The accepted prosecution evidence attributed a lathi injury to Dinesh to Satish, separately from the firearm acts attributed to Laxman. The Court sustained Satish's conviction under Section 323 IPC and sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment with a fine of ₹500 and the default stipulation. Following dismissal of his appeal, his bail and surety bonds were cancelled and he was directed to surrender to serve the remaining sentence.	849
	Sub-Chapter no. 30.7 Rash or Negligent Driving Causing Death or Hurt — IPC Sections 279, 337, 338 and 304-A
Allowing passengers to travel on an overloaded bus roof: rash and negligent driving	The driver was not entitled to carry passengers beyond the bus's capacity. The Court treated his allowing passengers to sit on its roof as itself a rash and negligent act, together with the witnesses' evidence of rash driving. On the proved circumstances of the overturning, which caused eight deaths and injuries to twenty-six persons, the Court found rash and negligent driving proved beyond reasonable doubt and upheld the relevant IPC convictions.	777
Road accident — overtaking from the	Overtaking a vehicle from its right side was consistent with the traffic rule considered by the Court. A driver turning right was expected to check the side	904 right and precautions before turning	mirror for traffic approaching from behind and take precautions before crossing its path. In this case, whether the motorcycle was using the wrong lane or avoiding the turning car remained for trial; the observations on the car driver's lack of care were not final findings of negligence.

Chapter no. 31
Public Order, Speech, Insult and Offences Affecting Social Harmony

Sub-Chapter no. 31.1
Defamation, Insult and Speech-Based Criminal Liability

Defamation: harm to reputation in the estimation of others	Explanation 4 to Section 499 IPC requires an imputation that directly or indirectly lowers a person's moral or intellectual character, caste or calling, or credit in the estimation of others, or causes the person's body to be regarded as loathsome or disgraceful. Where the supporting witness did not state that the alleged words lowered the complainant's reputation in his estimation, the evidence did not prima facie satisfy this requirement.	20
Section 294 IPC allegations and clarification of annoyance at trial	Where the Section 161 CrPC statements specified the abusive words and the accompanying scuffle, the Court found a prima facie Section 294 IPC case despite the FIR's more general reference to filthy abuse. Whether the words caused annoyance to others could be clarified through examination and cross-examination of the witnesses. The omission of that express detail from the FIR did not require quashing on the material then available.	244
Section 153A IPC — added ideological imagery and the plea of protected satire	At the FIR-quashing stage, the Court treated a cartoon's added dress and cap, admittedly absent from the actual incident, as an attempt to attribute the act to a particular ideological group and provoke disharmony or enmity. The Court recognised an artist's liberty to criticise through satire, but held that this unsupported attribution did not qualify for protection on the alleged facts. Freedom of expression is subject to reasonable restrictions under Article 19(2). The explanation for the additions and the plea of absence of intent were left for trial; the refusal to quash was not a final finding of guilt.	348
Political criticism and hate speech — falsity alone is insufficient	Political speech criticising government policy receives strong protection. Even harsh, deceptive or false criticism does not by itself constitute hate speech. The distinction turns on the substance, intent and purpose of the expression: criticism of policy differs from a message that humiliates or alienates a targeted group and incites hatred or violence. Divergent or extreme views on sensitive subjects are not automatically hate speech. Restrictions must satisfy the public-order and proportionality safeguards discussed by the Court.	348
Section 153A IPC — mens rea and involvement of at least two groups	Intention to promote enmity or hatred, or to cause disorder or incite violence, is an essential element of Section 153A IPC, and the prosecution must prove mens rea. At least two relevant groups or communities must be involved. Merely arousing feelings within one group without reference to another does not satisfy the inter-group requirement. In the present quashing proceeding, the applicant's denial of criminal intent was left for trial.	348
Alleged hate speech — whole-context reading and the reasonable-person standard	The expression must be read as a whole in its publication context. Isolated forceful passages cannot be stitched together to infer a criminal intention. The assessment is objective, from the standpoint of a reasonable, firm-minded person aware of the circumstances. Mere offensiveness or repugnancy is insufficient. The inquiry concerns serious vilification and whether the expression is likely to expose the targeted group to hatred, rather than the disagreeable nature of the idea alone.	348
Section 153A(1)(b) IPC — public tranquillity means public order and	For Section 153A(1)(b), public tranquillity must be understood narrowly as public order and safety, rather than every ordinary law-and-order disturbance or loss of serenity. The act must threaten or be likely to disturb community life or public interest at large. Locally significant conduct can threaten public order;	348

safety	the majority or minority character of a group may be assessed in that local setting.
Section 294 IPC — public place and annoyance to others	For the charged offence under Section 294 IPC, the obscene words must be uttered in or near a public place and cause annoyance to others. The complainant's drawing room was not a public place, and no annoyance to others was alleged. The Court therefore found that the essential ingredients of Section 294 were absent.	685
Section 294 IPC — private telephone abuse and later circulation	Abuse spoken during the telephone conversation did not satisfy Section 294 IPC where the words were not uttered in or near a public place and annoyance to others was not alleged. Subsequent circulation of the recording by the recipient did not establish those missing ingredients. The Court quashed the Section 294 count while permitting investigation under Section 505.	686
Prima facie abusive-language allegation under Section 294 IPC	The specific allegation that the accused abused the complainant in the name of his mother and sister was treated as prima facie material for Section 294 IPC. The accused's contention that the words were abusive or defamatory but not obscene raised a factual issue left for trial. The Court did not determine final criminal liability on the wording alone.	832
Section 294 IPC — obscene words and annoyance must be alleged	Section 294 IPC requires an obscene act in a public place, or obscene words uttered in or near a public place, together with annoyance to others. A general allegation of filthy abuse, without identifying the words or alleging annoyance, did not disclose the offence even when accepted at face value.	900
	Sub-Chapter no. 31.2 Criminal Intimidation, Threat and Coercive Conduct
Alleged threat after the completed assault	In assessing the alleged words of future killing after the group attack had already caused a death, the Court treated them in their setting as an expression of ego rather than criminal intimidation. It therefore set aside the Section 506 IPC convictions.	165
Threats Against an Advocate for Accepting a Brief	Threatening an advocate merely because the advocate has accepted a client's brief interferes with professional duties. Advocates ordinarily represent their clients' causes without a personal interest in the dispute. Reporting alleged threats directed at forcing an advocate to leave a case cannot, on that basis, be characterised as misuse of advocacy. The Court found the allegations sufficient to permit the criminal proceedings to continue.	361
Criminal intimidation: threat and intention under Section 503 IPC	Criminal intimidation requires a threat of injury to a person, reputation or property, or to the person or reputation of someone in whom the person threatened is interested, with intent to cause alarm, make the person do something not legally required, or make the person omit something legally permitted as a means of avoiding the threat. The aunt's assertion that the family would buy the police even if the complainant were killed was not treated as a threat by her to kill the complainant and did not disclose Section 506 IPC on the allegations made.	793
Disputed intention behind a threat in criminal-intimidation quashing proceedings	Where the prosecution alleged threats to kill and the accused characterised them as empty threats, whether he intended to execute the threats was a disputed factual issue for trial. The Court declined to determine that intention under Section 482 CrPC or to quash the Section 506 IPC charge on the accused's assertion alone.	832
Criminal intimidation — intention to cause alarm or compel conduct	A threat of injury to a person, reputation or property constitutes criminal intimidation only when made with the intention to cause alarm, or to compel an act the person is not legally bound to do or an omission of an act the person is legally entitled to do. Mere threatening words are insufficient without material showing that intention. The alleged threats to kill or spoil the deceased's life	900 did not disclose the required intention on the allegations considered.

	Sub-Chapter no. 31.3 Unlawful Assembly and Public-Order Offence Ingredients
Rioting — force by one member may engage the assembly's liability	Once an assembly is proved unlawful, use of force or violence by a member in prosecution of its common object constitutes rioting; every member need not personally use force. Encouragement by words or signs and actual infliction of hurt may be different forms of participation, provided the accused's membership and the common-object connection are established.	12
Rioting and possession of deadly weapons	The Court distinguished participants carrying ordinary sticks, who were convicted under Section 147 IPC, from proved assembly members carrying guns, farsas or ballams, whose Section 148 convictions were maintained. The classification followed the weapons held and participation proved in this occurrence.	165
Unlawful assembly, rioting and armed rioting	An unlawful assembly requires at least five persons sharing an object specified in Section 141 IPC, although each member’s identity need not be proved. Rioting requires force or violence in pursuit of that object, without requiring its achievement. Section 148 further requires the person charged to be armed with a deadly weapon. Those offences are distinct from the constructive liability created by Section 149.	166
Proof of abusive words and annoyance under Section 294 IPC	A general assertion that the accused used abusive language, without identifying the words or proving resulting annoyance, did not justify interference with acquittal under Section 294 IPC. The Court upheld the acquittal on those evidentiary deficiencies.	226
Rioting and Rioting while Armed with a Deadly Weapon	Use of force or violence by an unlawful assembly or a member in pursuit of its common object constitutes rioting; actual achievement of that object is unnecessary. Section 148 IPC additionally requires the person charged to be armed with a deadly weapon. Unlawful assembly, rioting and armed rioting are distinct offences, while Section 149 supplies vicarious liability for another offence.	409
WhatsApp group administrators — FIR-stage inference of common object	Where a member uploaded an admittedly fake religious video allegedly intended to promote enmity, the administrators' shared object required investigation. The Court noted that the applicants had not themselves rebutted or opposed the video by posting a group message. For the limited purpose of FIR registration, it inferred a shared object and refused to quash. Whether the applicants actually shared that object remained for investigation. The decision does not establish final guilt or automatic criminal liability from administrator status alone.	472
Section 505 IPC — making an inciting statement without circulating the recording	Section 505 IPC covers making, publishing or circulating a statement with intent to incite, or likely to incite, a class or community to commit an offence against another class or community. The maker could therefore face investigation even though the recipient, rather than the maker, circulated the audio recording. The Court found a prima facie inciting statement and allowed investigation to continue.	686
Carrying an axe or lathi in an agricultural field — inference of deadly-weapon preparation	The presence of persons carrying axes and lathis in an agricultural field did not, by itself, establish that they had arrived prepared with deadly weapons. The Court considered that an axe may be an agricultural tool unless used as a weapon and that carrying a lathi is common in village agricultural life. It applied that context in setting aside the Section 148 IPC convictions, while separately sustaining liability under Section 324 IPC for the assaults proved by injured-witness and medical evidence.	753

	Chapter no. 32 Property, Economic Deception and Document Offences
	Sub-Chapter no. 32.1 Breach of Contract Versus Cheating — Threshold Distinction
Cheating and breach of contract: dishonest intention at inception	Cheating under Sections 415 and 420 IPC requires deception and dishonest or fraudulent inducement, with the necessary dishonest intention when the promise or representation is made. A later failure to perform a contract does not by itself establish that intention. Subsequent conduct may help assess the original intention, but is not the sole test. Allegations that money was obtained for a promised partnership share, a smaller share was allotted, and the excess was retained despite an assurance of refund disclosed a prima facie case beyond a mere contractual breach. This was an assessment for deciding quashing, not a final determination of guilt.	31
Cheating — accepting a further advance before fulfilling an earlier supply order may disclose dishonest intent from inception	Mere breach of contract does not constitute cheating. However, where a supplier failed to deliver goods against an earlier advance, accepted a further substantial advance despite the unfulfilled obligation, and continued to withhold the goods and money, the Court found a prima facie basis for inferring an intention to cheat from the beginning. Those circumstances justified allowing prosecution under Section 420 IPC to continue rather than quashing it as a purely civil dispute.	71
Cheating requires dishonest intention at the inception of the agreement	For Section 420 IPC, the allegations must prima facie show fraudulent or dishonest intention when the promise was made. Mere breach of contract or subsequent unwillingness to execute a sale deed after receiving an advance does not by itself establish cheating. Where no material indicated dishonest intention from the inception, the dispute remained one for civil redress.	172
Subsequent payment default and dishonest intention at the inception of a transaction	In considering the FIR under Sections 406 and 420 IPC, the Court distinguished a later failure to keep a promise from facts indicating an intention to cheat from the outset. The allegations that the purchaser obtained potatoes from several farmers, sold them in the open market and retained the proceeds without paying the farmers permitted a prima facie inference of that intention. The Court distinguished this from an inability to sell the produce and declined to quash; it did not determine guilt at trial.	514
Breach of an agreement and dishonest intention required for cheating	Cheating under Section 420 IPC requires dishonest intention when the promise is made; a subsequent breach of contract does not by itself establish that intention. In the dispute over the signed flat agreement and return of the complainant's money, the Court found the allegations predominantly civil and quashed the FIR under Sections 420, 406 and 34 IPC, leaving the complainant free to pursue civil relief.	518
Cheating requires dishonest intention when the promise is made	A contractual default or failure to repay money does not by itself establish cheating. Fraudulent or dishonest intention must exist when the promise is made. The FIR and Section 161 statements stated that money was provided to stock the applicants' liquor business, but did not allege a prior assurance of partnership inducing those payments. The later complaint that no partnership was granted did not supply that missing inducement. The Court treated counsel's proposed prior-partnership promise as an afterthought and found the transaction predominantly civil.	778
Initial dishonest intention and subsequent conduct in a cheating charge	Section 420 IPC requires an intention to deceive from the inception; mere breach of contract does not establish cheating. Intention may be inferred from previous or subsequent conduct. Where the drawer learns that his cheque was returned because words and figures differed but still does not tender the amount stated in words, that conduct may support an inference of initial dishonest intention for framing a charge. Whether the discrepancy was deliberate or a	788

	Sub-Chapter no. 32.2 Criminal Breach of Trust, Misappropriation and Entrustment
Entrustment and dishonest dealing in criminal breach of trust	Criminal breach of trust under Section 405 IPC requires entrustment of property or dominion over it, followed by dishonest misappropriation or conversion, or dishonest use or disposal contrary to a direction of law or a contract governing that trust. Wilfully allowing another person to deal with the entrusted property in that prohibited manner is also covered. Non-payment alone does not establish these ingredients.	31
Truck delivered on part payment: allegations of criminal breach of trust at the quashing stage	The complaint alleged that the buyer took the truck after part payment, agreed to pay the financed balance of ₹7.90 lakh, paid neither the financier nor the seller, and continued using the truck without returning it. Reading Sections 405 –406 IPC with the Sale of Goods Act provisions on sale, delivery and unpaid sellers, the Court treated the unpaid seller as retaining a lien and the buyer as holding the vehicle as trustee until payment. On that reasoning, it found allegations of a cognizable criminal breach of trust and refused quashing under Section 482 CrPC. The agreement had not been produced and its other terms were unknown. The ruling concerned the sufficiency of these allegations; guilt and the actual contractual terms were not finally determined.	49
Alleged minority and a void contract: no automatic ground to quash the breach-of-trust FIR	The applicant's assertion that the truck agreement was void under Section 11 of the Contract Act because he was then a minor did not by itself defeat the pleaded Section 406 IPC case. The Court rejected contractual incapacity as an automatic exemption from the criminal liability alleged on these facts and stated that the Sale of Goods Act did not prohibit the transaction. It considered possession after part payment, the unpaid financed balance and continued use of the truck. Whether the applicant was actually juvenile when the agreement was made was a factual question left undecided in the Section 482 proceedings. No final age determination or ruling on the applicable juvenile procedure was made.	49
Criminal breach of trust by a merchant — dishonest retention of entrusted advance funds may justify prosecution	Sections 405 and 409 IPC address dishonest misappropriation or conversion of entrusted property, including property entrusted in the course of a merchant's business. The receipt and retention of substantial supply advances, partial delivery, acceptance of a further advance, and continued failure to supply the balance or refund the money disclosed a prima facie case against the applicant as a merchant. The Court therefore declined to quash prosecution under Section 409 IPC.	71
Non-return of stridhan may be pursued through a Section 406 IPC complaint	Articles given to a woman at marriage form her stridhan. Where her in-laws have not returned it, she may pursue a complaint under Section 406 IPC; invoking that legally available remedy cannot itself be held against her. The maintenance decision does not determine criminal guilt in that complaint.	205
Goods-booking agent's disclaimer and investigation of criminal breach of trust	A person who booked the consignment could not obtain quashing of the breach-of-trust FIR merely by denying registered ownership of the trucks or relying on a consignment clause assigning responsibility for non-delivery to the truck owner and driver. Applying the common-carrier definition and Sections 10–12 Carriage by Road Act, the Court held that booking the consignment did not by itself absolve the petitioners. Their possible common intention with the drivers remained for investigation.	269
Goods-booking agents within the statutory definition of common carrier	Section 2(a) Carriage by Road Act includes goods-booking companies, contractors, agents and brokers within the definition of common carrier, together with the other activities and conditions specified in that provision. A person's role in booking the consignment therefore cannot be excluded from the carrier-liability assessment merely because another person is the registered truck owner.	269

Jewellery entrusted for safekeeping and not returned— Section 406 IPC	Specific allegations that the four household relatives took the wife's jewellery for safekeeping on an assurance of return and then failed to return it disclosed a prima facie offence under Section 406 IPC. The finding permitted prosecution and did not determine guilt.	411
Criminal breach of trust: entrustment and dishonest misuse must be alleged	Section 405 IPC requires entrustment of property or dominion over it and dishonest misappropriation, conversion, use or disposal, or wilfully permitting another person to do so, in violation of the law or contract governing discharge of the trust. A mere incorrect monetary demand or civil default, without factual allegations satisfying those requirements, does not attract prosecution under Section 406. The Court adopted the Deepak Gaba test reproduced through Sachin Garg and quashed the present proceedings after finding a predominantly business repayment claim rather than disclosed criminal ingredients.	778
	Sub-Chapter no. 32.3 Cheating, Dishonest Inducement and Commercial Transactions
Cheating in plot sales — dishonest intention at inception	Section 420 IPC requires an intention to deceive from the beginning; a later failure to keep a promise does not by itself constitute cheating. In assessing the proposed colony's plot sales, the Court found sufficient prima facie material for a cheating charge in the purchasers' statements about residential use and promised amenities, the absence of registration and diversion, and the sale of the land as agricultural land.	60
False land description and prima facie cheating	Section 420 IPC requires deception and dishonest inducement resulting in delivery of property or the making, alteration or destruction of the specified valuable security or signed instrument. Deliberately obtaining registration by falsely declaring a lower conveyance value can deceive the State authorities into granting registration and transferring valuable ownership rights. On the allegation that diverted land was shown as agricultural to pay less stamp duty, the Court found a prima facie cheating offence.	164
Property under Section 420 IPC and registration rights	Property under Section 420 IPC includes a valuable right or interest capable of ownership and having exchangeable value. Applying that meaning, the Court treated registration enabling transfer of valuable ownership rights as property for examining the alleged dishonest inducement of the registering authorities.	164
Blank-paper signature used for an affidavit — prima facie cheating and forgery for cheating	The Court treated an affidavit as property for the purpose of Section 415 IPC. Allegations that a person's signature was obtained on blank paper and contents were later typed and presented as that person's sworn statement, which the person denied executing, prima facie supported charges under Sections 420 and 468 IPC. The finding concerned the sufficiency of the allegations for trial.	318
Adulterated milk sold as pure — separate cheating allegation survives FSSA override	Selling adulterated milk to purchasers by representing it as pure discloses cheating. The FSSA's overriding provision does not by itself exclude every IPC offence, and no provision barring the distinct Section 420 IPC allegation was shown. On the allegations and the food analyst's report identifying adulterated milk solution and powder capable of use as an adulterant, the Court declined to quash the FIR. This was a decision on the sufficiency of the allegation for prosecution, not a final finding of guilt.	346
Selling substandard food as pure and safe: cheating	Selling adulterated or substandard food to unsuspecting consumers by representing it as pure and safe for human consumption may disclose cheating under Section 420 IPC. At the quashing stage, the dairy operator's assertion that the sampled material was residual product not intended for sale was a defence requiring examination, rather than a basis for terminating the FIR.	434
Second sale of an already conveyed flat and prima facie cheating	The registered deed of 1 June 2002 described first-floor Flat No. 10 as sold to the earlier buyer. The applicant conceded that no registered correction deed had changed that description, despite asserting that a ground-floor unit had been intended. The Court treated the first conveyance as divesting his title to the	449 described flat and its subsequent sale to the complainant as disclosing cheating under Sections 415 and 420 IPC. At this quashing stage, the separate bank-loan default and eviction did not answer the allegation concerning the second sale.

Broker's Section 420 IPC Liability for a Seller's Failure to Supply Goods	Where the complaint identified the accused only as a broker and alleged no specific duty or liability to ensure delivery, the seller's failure to supply goods did not establish a prima facie case against the broker under Section 420 IPC. Section 2(5) of the CGST Act includes a broker within the definition of agent, but a broker arranging a bargain for brokerage cannot simply be equated with a commission agent who buys or sells, keeps custody or control of goods and collects payments. The Court applied that distinction to the complaint and the statement under Section 200 CrPC, set aside cognizance only against the broker and discharged him.	538
Section 420 IPC — adulterated food represented as pure and safe	Selling adulterated or substandard food to unsuspecting consumers by representing it as pure and safe for consumption can constitute cheating under Section 420 IPC. Applying the quoted decision in Manish Gupta, the Court refused to quash the Section 420 FIR concerning suspected adulterated mawa. The decision permits the prosecution to continue on the allegations; it does not determine guilt.	806
Selling adulterated food as pure— Section 420 IPC	Selling adulterated food by representing it as pure discloses cheating of purchasers and may sustain prosecution under Section 420 IPC. The Court adopted Neelkamal Sharma, which relied on Rohit Jain and Manish Gupta, and distinguished the FSSA override concerning Sections 272–273 IPC from the separate allegation of deception. No provision completely excluding Section 420 was shown. The application to quash the FIR was dismissed without a trial determination of guilt.	811
Section 420 IPC: deception and dishonest inducement to deliver property	Cheating under Section 420 IPC requires deception followed by fraudulent or dishonest inducement causing the deceived person to deliver property or valuable security, or to consent to another retaining property. The delivery or consent must result from that deception, and the inducement must be fraudulent or dishonest. Deception need not be expressed in words; it may arise from conduct or the nature of the transaction. The Court relied on the reproduced Ram Narayan Popli explanation when examining the alleged government-land transactions.	871
Office practice and business motive as defences to participation in insurance fraud	Following a wrongful office practice or claiming an intention to increase business did not absolve the manager on the evidence of this case. He knowingly instructed issuance of cover-note books to an unauthorised probationary officer and took no action on insureds' acknowledged complaints. Premiums were withheld or insurance records manipulated, causing loss to the company. The Court inferred that the manager acted in concert with the officer and affirmed the cheating, conspiracy and corruption convictions. Its conclusion rested on participation shown by the combined evidence, rather than an office-rule breach alone.	968
Fraudulent KCC preparation and withdrawal — prima facie cheating	Obtaining the borrowers' signatures on loan papers and vouchers, fraudulently creating a KCC facility in their names and withdrawing ₹5.75 lakh so as to burden them with repayment and interest prima facie disclosed cheating under Section 420 IPC. On those allegations, the Court declined to quash the FIR and consequential proceedings. Its conclusion concerned the sufficiency of the accusation for prosecution, not proof of guilt.	992

Theft, Robbery, Dacoity and Extortion

Robbery — threats of instant violence while carrying away	Theft becomes robbery where, for committing the theft or carrying away the stolen property, the offender voluntarily causes or attempts death, hurt or	74

stolen timber may satisfy Section 390 IPC	wrongful restraint, or puts a person in fear of instant death, hurt or restraint. Allegations that armed persons removing cut timber threatened to kill and cut the complainant if he approached disclosed the required element prima facie. The Magistrate therefore erred in treating the allegations as lacking the ingredients of robbery and refusing cognizance under Section 395 IPC.
Dacoity — five or more joint participants include persons present and aiding the robbery or attempt	Under Section 391 IPC, dacoity requires five or more persons conjointly committing or attempting robbery, counting persons present and aiding that commission or attempt. Every person committing, attempting or so aiding is included. The Court distinguished robbery from dacoity by the number of participants and, on the allegations before it, directed cognizance under Section 395 IPC.	74
Robbery recovery: inconsistency with alleged apprehension at the scene	Recovery evidence must fit the prosecution account of the occurrence. Although the accused was allegedly caught at the spot, the victim's motorcycle and a loaded pistol were said to have been recovered from a public road about 100 metres away. The unexplained inconsistency, together with the claim that the robbers left their own motorcycle behind, contributed to doubt about the robbery account. The Court did not establish a general bar against recovery from a public place.	287
Section 327 IPC — purpose of extorting property or compelling an illegal act	For Section 327 IPC, the prosecution must prove that hurt was caused for the purpose of extorting property or constraining an illegal act. A demand for a bicycle followed by an assault in anger at refusal did not establish that purpose where the prosecution case did not allege hurt or fear being used to compel delivery. The Section 327 conviction therefore could not stand.	316
Section 383 IPC — dishonest inducement to deliver property through fear of injury	Section 383 IPC defines extortion as intentionally putting a person in fear of injury to that person or another, thereby dishonestly inducing delivery of property, valuable security, or a signed or sealed item capable of becoming a valuable security. The Court read this definition with Section 327 in assessing the purpose of the alleged hurt.	316
Sentencing Firmness in a Violent Train Robbery	The Court regarded violent robbery in a running train as requiring firm treatment and found no ground for leniency. It therefore declined to interfere with the seven-year rigorous-imprisonment terms and fines of ₹25,000 imposed on the appellants whose convictions under Sections 394/397 IPC were sustained.	405
Seven-year minimum sentence for gunpoint robbery under Section 397 IPC	Where the appellants were convicted of gunpoint robbery under Sections 392 and 397 IPC read with Section 13 of the MPDVPK Act, the statutory seven-year minimum under Section 397 precluded reducing imprisonment to the period already undergone. Their request for a shorter sentence, including reliance on conduct while on bail, could not justify imprisonment below that minimum. The Court affirmed seven years' rigorous imprisonment and dismissed the appeals.	508
Section 397 IPC — dismemberment of teeth during robbery	In the robbery proved against Purshottam, the complainant had suffered dismemberment of her teeth. On that basis, the Court affirmed the conviction under Section 397 IPC, along with the conviction under Section 452 IPC.	548
Unexplained possession and documentary linkage of a stolen motorcycle	Recovery of the complainant's motorcycle, identified by its matching engine and chassis numbers, was considered with a diary recording its mortgage and the absence of an explanation for possession. The Court upheld the Section 411 IPC conviction after accepting the trial court's comparison under Section 73 of the Evidence Act identifying the diary entries as the accused's handwriting.	574
Robbery by theft and robbery by extortion under Section 390 IPC	Theft becomes robbery when, for committing the theft or carrying away its proceeds, the offender voluntarily causes or attempts death, hurt or wrongful restraint, or fear of their instant occurrence. Extortion becomes robbery when the offender is present, puts the person in fear of instant death, hurt or wrongful	574 restraint and thereby induces immediate delivery. The Court used that distinction in examining the extortion-based robbery charge.

Failure of one recovery link where independent evidence establishes dacoity murder	Failure to identify the recovered jewellery as the stolen article did not defeat the prosecution where reliable injured-eyewitness identification and the firearm evidence established the appellants' participation. On that combined proof, the Court upheld the convictions under Section 396 IPC read with Sections 11/13 of the MPDVPK Act. It did not treat the defective jewellery identification as evidence of guilt.	761
Section 329 IPC — grievous hurt following a demand for money	The conviction for voluntarily causing grievous hurt to extort property was sustained where the eyewitness's prompt report and testimony established a demand for money to purchase liquor, refusal by the injured man and the ensuing knife assault. Her evidence on the demand, together with the proved injuries, established the Section 329 IPC offence beyond reasonable doubt.	908
	Sub-Chapter no. 32.5 Forgery, Fabricated Documents and Use of False Document
Proof of sale deeds executed by impersonating the landowner	The Court found the sale deeds forged where the true owner had not executed them, the photograph and thumb impressions belonged to an impostor, and the appellants knowingly identified the impostor and signed as witnesses. The purchaser's and draftsman's evidence, together with signature comparison, established participation in the false transactions.	234
Notary's duty to verify the identity of the executant	Under Section 8 of the Notaries Act, a notary must exercise utmost care in verifying or attesting an instrument and satisfy himself that the person appearing is the named executant. Reliance on another person's identification did not justify quashing where a will bearing the purported testator's photograph was notarised after his death and the thumb impression did not match. A notary's statutory verification duty differs from an advocate's reliance on a client's instructions.	271
Proof of a forged power of attorney used to transfer land	The Court sustained the finding that a power of attorney was forged on the complainant's denial of execution and the fingerprint expert's evidence that the disputed thumb impression was not hers. The absence of evidence of the alleged consideration and the execution of the sale deed within two days supported the finding that the accused used the forged authority to transfer her land.	273
Using a forged power of attorney as genuine	An accused who relied on a forged power of attorney as genuine, assumed authority to act for the complainant and executed a sale deed on that basis was held liable for using the forged document. The finding was based on proof that the purported authority bore a forged thumb impression.	273
False affidavit — making a false document and using it as genuine	Obtaining a person's signature on blank paper and later inserting contents to represent that the person signed the completed statement can amount to making a false document under Sections 463 and 464 IPC. On the allegations considered, this supported a charge under Section 465; using the forged document as genuine supported Section 471. These were prima facie findings, with the actual execution and intent to be determined at trial.	318
Revenue-record interpolation — alleged motive and quashing	The Court rejected the claim that adding a location to the revenue record could confer no advantage. On the alleged facts, insertion of 'Quilla' could change the temple's recorded identity and location and undermine the father's claim as its priest amid a family dispute. The Court distinguished Parminder Kaur, where the reproduced passage concerned altered dates on certified copies without an identified advantage or loss. It found a sufficient basis to reject absence of mens rea as a ground for quashing, without finally determining that the applicant made the insertion.	326
False document — conveyance in one's	The passage from Mohammed Ibrahim v. State of Bihar considered by the Court distinguishes a false claim of ownership from making a false document. A	326

own name while falsely claiming title	person conveying property in his own name, without impersonating another or falsely claiming another's authority, does not make a false document under Section 464 merely because he lacks title. Without a false document, the forgery offences discussed in that passage are not attracted. The present allegation concerned interpolation in an existing government revenue record, and the passage was not treated as requiring its quashing.
Second sale deed's declarations and prima facie forgery allegations	The later sale deed declared the sellers' authority to sell and that the flat had never been sold, mortgaged, gifted, willed or otherwise transferred and was unencumbered, despite the earlier registered conveyance of that same described flat. Relying on those particular declarations, the Court rejected the contention that Sections 467 and 468 IPC were not attracted and found a prima facie case requiring prosecution. The decision is confined to that deed and the allegations before the Court; it does not supply a general rule that every transfer by a person lacking title constitutes forgery.	449
Alleged fabrication of a Will — criminal ingredients despite a civil property dispute	An allegation that a Will was forged involves criminal ingredients and cannot be treated as predominantly civil merely because it also concerns property or inheritance rights. The burden on a civil plaintiff relying on a Will to establish its genuineness does not prevent an opposing party from initiating criminal proceedings alleging fabrication. These principles permit the criminal allegation to proceed; they do not establish that the disputed Will is in fact forged.	705
False declarations in government-land sale deeds: prima facie forgery	In the alleged sale chain before it, the Court treated express declarations that government lease land was privately owned and was not government lease land as supporting a prima facie case of making a false document and forgery. The original lease had expired, the persons first selling the land had acquired no title, and the Court found that the declarations sought undue gain at the Government's expense. On that basis, it refused to quash the prosecution. This is the Court's application at the FIR stage.	871
Expired government patta and mutation entries in an alleged forged sale chain	The circular dated 26 June 1984 did not retrospectively confer bhumiswami rights on a lease that had already expired; the patta had to subsist on that date, and conferral required an order of the competent authority. Mutation is a fiscal entry and does not itself confer title. Persons without title cannot convey a better title by registered sale deeds. Applying these principles, the Court rejected reliance on the Additional Collector's validation of the sale deeds: the lease had expired in 1977, and the subsequent recorded holders had neither a title document nor inheritance from the lessee.	871
Making a false document: false ownership claims and impersonation distinguished	The Mohd. Ibrahim passage reproduced by the Court distinguishes executing a sale deed in one's own name while claiming ownership from impersonating the owner or falsely claiming the owner's authority. Under that passage, dishonest execution alone does not satisfy the relevant category of Section 464 IPC: the document must be intended to appear to have been executed by, or under the authority of, someone by whom or under whose authority the maker knows it was not executed. An ownership claim by itself is therefore insufficient under that test. The Court subsequently found a prima facie forgery case on the express government-land declarations before it.	871
Forgery and use of a forged document: false document and required intent	Forgery requires the making of a false document or part of it with the intent specified in Section 463 IPC, including intent to cause damage or injury, support a claim or title, procure parting with property, or commit fraud. Under the reproduced Ram Narayan Popli explanation, forgery for cheating is complete when the false document is made with that particular intent. For liability under Section 467 read with Section 471, knowledge or reason to believe that the document was forged must be shown.	871
Proof of fabricated	The Court assessed the note sheet, estimate, measurement and billing records	914

municipal work records from contradictory documents and site evidence	with evidence from the site. The note sheet asserted that the submersible pump had already been removed, yet the estimate charged for removal and the spot panchnama found it still in the bore. The hand pump was absent although completed work had been billed, and technical scrutiny of the quotations had been bypassed. These combined circumstances supported the finding of a manufactured work file and the contractor's convictions under Sections 467, 468, 471, 420 and 120B IPC. The judgment did not separately formulate a general definition of making a false document.
Deliberate alteration shown by damaged originals and inconsistent insurance copies	The original cover note was torn selectively at the insured’s name, premium and material vehicle particulars, while its photocopy preserved those entries. A duplicate described a Luna insured for Rs.30 although the original related to a truck for which Rs.1,350 had been collected. Another original bore a cancellation endorsement absent from the earlier photocopy. With the payment evidence, complaints and non-deposit, these discrepancies supported deliberate manipulation rather than mishandling or genuine cancellation, and the Court affirmed the forgery and use-of-forged-document convictions. It did not rely on a separate document-expert opinion.	968
Outpatient-slip explanation where inpatient admission is alleged	At the bail stage, the doctor's explanation that staff entered patients' names on outpatient slips did not answer the allegation before the Court. The disputed documents also represented inpatient admission and examination by him, and the inquiry had considered the hospital records and his explanation. The Court therefore declined to accept the outpatient-name-entry defence as a basis for bail.	989
	Sub-Chapter no. 32.6 Night House-Trespass and House-Breaking — Section 460 Joint Liability for Death or Grievous Hurt
Section 460 IPC — joint participation and injury during night house-breaking	Section 460 IPC applies when, during lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, a person guilty of that offence voluntarily causes or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt. Every person jointly concerned in that night offence is liable. The prosecution must establish the accused’s participation and the temporal connection between the injury-causing act and the continuing trespass or house-breaking. Proof of a break-in and a guard’s homicidal death did not, without reliable evidence connecting the accused to the occurrence, establish his guilt under Section 460.	335
	Sub-Chapter no. 32.7 Mischief by Fire and Destruction of Dwelling or Property-Custody Structure
Section 436 conviction on proof of the use and burning of the structures	The challenge that the burnt hut was not shown to be used for dwelling or keeping property failed on the evidence. The complainant described goods and household articles stored in the structures, and the defence witness admitted that the hut was used for cattle and had burnt. Accepted eyewitness evidence identified the persons who set the houses on fire. On that record, the Court upheld the Section 436 conviction.	717
	Chapter no. 33 Offences Affecting Public Justice and Fabrication of Evidence
	Sub-Chapter no. 33.1 Fabrication of Evidence, False Charge and Public Justice Offences
Conditional criminal action for a false custodial medical report	Where CCTV footage and the detainee's condition contradicted the claim that he had no injuries, and the officers were recorded discussing the fabrication of medical evidence, the DGP was directed to verify the detainee's medical report. If it recorded no injuries, criminal proceedings against the doctor for preparing a false report and reference to the appointing authority for departmental action were directed. The report itself had not been placed before the Court.	22

Section 340 CrPC: expediency and optional preliminary inquiry	Before making a complaint for an offence within Section 195(1)(b) CrPC connected with its proceedings or evidence, the Court must form and record the opinion that further inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. A preliminary inquiry is optional, and the decision to complain is not automatic merely because an offence appears to have occurred. This stage concerns the need for inquiry, not a finding of guilt or innocence.	37
Hearing before and after a Section 340 CrPC complaint	There is no statutory right to a hearing before the Court decides to make a complaint under Section 340 CrPC. A right of appeal under Section 341 does not itself create such a preliminary hearing right. Once the complaint reaches the Magistrate, Section 343 requires it to be dealt with as a case instituted on a police report. The accused must receive the relevant documents and may contest the allegations at the pre-trial stage, including seeking discharge under Section 239 CrPC.	37
Section 340 CrPC — expediency finding and discretionary complaint, without a mandatory preliminary inquiry	For an apparent offence within Section 195(1)(b) CrPC connected with court proceedings, Section 340 requires the court to consider whether further inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. A preliminary inquiry is optional and does not determine guilt or innocence. Even a prima facie offence does not compel a complaint as a matter of course; if the court decides to proceed, it must record the requisite finding and make a written complaint to the competent Magistrate. That procedure did not justify the demolition-related police-registration directions in this case, which were not orders for prosecution of false evidence.	78
Section 340 complaint — hearing before the Magistrate and police-report procedure under Section 343 CrPC	There is no statutory right to be heard before the court decides to make a Section 340 complaint, and the availability of an appeal under Section 341 does not create such a right. The accused is heard in the Magistrate's pre-trial inquiry, including on whether the allegations are groundless under Section 239. Section 343 requires the Magistrate to proceed as on a police report, with relevant documents supplied, discharge considered, and a charge framed only if the statutory grounds exist; guilt is determined at trial.	78
Section 201 IPC — disappearance of evidence with intent to screen an offender	Section 201 IPC requires knowledge or reason to believe that an offence has been committed and causing its evidence to disappear, or knowingly giving false information about it, with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment. In this case, the finding that the victim was strangled and her body thereafter burned, considered with the other established circumstances, supported affirmation of the Section 201 conviction along with the murder conviction.	138
Section 340 CrPC: preliminary inquiry is not mandatory	A separate preliminary inquiry under Section 340 CrPC may be dispensed with when the court can already form the necessary prima facie opinion on the apparent offence and the expediency of further inquiry in the interests of justice. That opinion initiates the statutory process and is not a finding of guilt. The challenge based on the asserted mandatory inquiry requirement therefore failed.	144
Section 340 CrPC: prima facie offence and expediency in the interests of justice	Action under Section 340 CrPC requires material disclosing a prima facie case concerning an offence within Section 195(1)(b), together with the court's opinion that further inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. Neither a suspected offence alone nor contradictory statements by themselves make a complaint automatic.	144
Perjury prosecution: deliberate falsehood on a material matter	Perjury prosecution requires a prima facie foundation of deliberate and conscious falsehood on a matter of substance, with a reasonable likelihood of conviction. An innocent or immaterial inaccuracy, doubtful material, or a contradiction alone does not justify prosecution. The court must apply due care and separately consider whether prosecution serves the interests of justice.	144
Section 340 CrPC: expediency	In deciding whether to make a complaint under Section 340 CrPC, the court normally assesses the alleged offence's effect on the administration of justice	144

measured by impact on the administration of justice	rather than merely the extent of private injury caused by the document or false evidence. Even a document causing serious private loss may have only a limited effect within the judicial proceeding, so a complaint need not follow as a matter of course.
Section 340 CrPC: participation of the proposed accused in preliminary inquiry	A person against whom a Section 340 complaint is contemplated has no right to participate in the preliminary inquiry merely as the proposed accused. The inquiry concerns the court's decision whether further proceedings are expedient in the interests of justice, rather than adjudication of that person's guilt.	144
Section 340 CrPC: deliberate material falsehood and expediency of prosecution	Action under Section 340 CrPC requires a reasonable prima facie basis for deliberate falsehood on a matter of substance and the Court's satisfaction that an inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. Mere suspicion is insufficient. The effect of the false statement on obtaining a favourable order is a relevant consideration, rather than an exhaustive test. Here, misdescribing old-age pension as family pension did not alter the availability of admitted signatures for comparison, so proceedings were refused despite criticism of the careless affidavit.	282
False affidavit as giving or fabricating false evidence	A knowingly false statement sworn by a person bound by oath to state the truth may constitute giving false evidence under Section 191 IPC. An affidavit containing a false statement may also fall under Section 192 when intended to appear in judicial evidence and induce an erroneous opinion on a material issue. These requirements depend on the statement and the maker's knowledge or intention.	282
Deliberately false affidavits and interference with justice	Filing a false affidavit or fabricated document with knowledge of its falsity and an intention to deceive the court may constitute criminal contempt where it interferes, or tends to interfere, with judicial proceedings or the administration of justice. The relevant deceit or knowledge must be present; the Court did not treat every inaccurate affidavit as contempt.	282
False affidavit — due care and the plea of good faith	Section 52 IPC excludes good faith where due care and attention are absent. A deponent who signed blank material without knowing the resulting affidavit's contents, while knowing it would be used in the High Court, could not excuse the false sworn statement merely by relying on his employer. The Court treated the filing as intended to give a false impression and held the deponent guilty of contempt. His apology was accepted for the time being with a warning and ₹15,000 costs, subject to recovery and registration of a contempt case on non-payment.	309
False sworn affidavit — Sections 191–192 IPC and a Section 199 declaration	The Baban Singh passage adopted through Kamla Sharma distinguishes a sworn false affidavit from a declaration merely capable of being received as evidence under Section 199 IPC. A knowingly false statement by a person bound on oath to tell the truth may fall under Section 191. A false document intended to appear in a judicial proceeding and induce an erroneous opinion on a material point may constitute fabrication under Section 192. The Court applied the false-affidavit analysis here, while disposing of the contempt and representation issues rather than pronouncing a separate IPC conviction.	309
False court filing — deceit and interference with the administration of justice	A deliberately false affidavit or a fabricated document knowingly filed to mislead the court may constitute criminal contempt because it interferes or tends to interfere with judicial proceedings or the administration of justice. The Dhananjay Sharma and Chandra Shashi passages adopted through Kamla Sharma require attention to deceit, knowledge and the intention to obstruct or deflect the judicial process. The present Court relied on the deponent's admitted conduct and known judicial use in finding contempt.	309
False-affidavit prosecution — deliberate falsehood	The Muthu Karuppan passage relied upon through Kamla Sharma requires a prima facie case of deliberate falsehood on a matter of substance and a reasonable foundation for the charge before prosecution is ordered as expedient	309

on a substantial matter	in the interests of justice. The Court invoked that qualified approach in explaining the seriousness of false affidavits; the present order did not itself conclude a separate IPC prosecution.
False affidavits — giving or fabricating false evidence	A knowingly false statement made on oath can constitute giving false evidence under Section 191 IPC. Making a document containing a false statement with the intention that it appear in judicial evidence and induce an erroneous opinion on a material point can constitute fabrication under Section 192. The reproduced Baban Singh decision applies those principles to affidavits tendered in court.	318
False-affidavit prosecution — deliberate falsehood on a material matter	The reproduced Muthu Karuppan standard requires a prima facie case of deliberate falsehood on a matter of substance and a reasonable foundation for the charge before prosecution for a false affidavit is ordered. The court must consider prosecution expedient in the interests of justice.	318
Knowingly fabricated court material — interference with administration of justice	The relied-upon contempt authorities treat filing a fabricated document with knowledge of its falsity and an intention to deceive or defraud the court as conduct interfering, or tending to interfere, with the administration of justice. The element of deceit or knowledge is material; the present revision did not itself determine contempt liability.	318
Section 340 CrPC — preliminary inquiry is discretionary	Before making a complaint under Section 340 CrPC, the court must consider whether an inquiry into the apparent offence is expedient in the interests of justice. A preliminary inquiry may assist that decision, but is not compulsory. Applying Pritish v. State of Maharashtra, the High Court rejected the objection that the complaint was invalid solely because no preliminary inquiry had been held. The preliminary stage does not determine guilt, and a complaint does not follow automatically from every inconsistency in testimony.	320
Section 340 CrPC — hearing before the complaint and later safeguards	Section 340 CrPC does not require the court to hear the proposed accused before deciding to file a complaint. The appeal provided by Section 341 does not imply a right to participate before that decision. Applying Pritish v. State of Maharashtra, the Court explained that the accused has a right to be heard once called before the Magistrate, including an opportunity to seek discharge under Section 239. The decision to make the complaint determines neither guilt nor innocence.	320
Section 340 CrPC — expediency and deliberate changes in material testimony	Whether a complaint is expedient under Section 340 CrPC depends on the apparent offence's effect on the administration of justice, rather than merely the extent of injury to an individual. Applying Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, the High Court upheld the complaint against a seizure witness who repeatedly changed his account of the place of recovery to help the accused. His membership of the Gram Raksha Samiti and statutory duties were relevant to that assessment. The ruling upheld initiation of prosecution; guilt remained for determination in the complaint case.	320
Prima Facie Deliberate False Evidence and Expediency Under Section 340 CrPC	A Section 340 complaint requires prima facie material of a qualifying offence affecting judicial proceedings and an opinion that an inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. Mere discrepancies or contradictory statements do not automatically warrant prosecution; the court must consider deliberate falsehood and its impact on the administration of justice. Applying the reproduced authorities, the Court found apparent fabrication by two investigating officials and seven witnesses sufficiently serious to direct prosecution steps. That direction did not determine their guilt.	389
Preliminary Inquiry Under Section 340 CrPC Is Discretionary	A preliminary inquiry is a means of assisting the court to decide whether a complaint is expedient in the interests of justice; it is not an obligatory stage in every Section 340 proceeding. Where the court can form the necessary prima facie opinion from the existing material, it may proceed without a separate	389

	preliminary inquiry. Applying Pritish and Amarsang, the Court made clear that this process concerns whether an inquiry into the alleged offence should follow, rather than a determination of guilt.
No Mandatory Pre-Complaint Hearing Under Section 340 CrPC	Section 340 does not require an opportunity of hearing to the proposed accused before the court decides to make a complaint. The reproduced Pritish ruling distinguishes that preliminary decision from the later proceedings before the competent Magistrate, where the person may contest the charge and seek discharge. The availability of an appeal under Section 341 does not itself create a right to a pre-complaint hearing. The court forming the Section 340 opinion must leave guilt or innocence to the competent criminal court.	389
Fabricated prosecution evidence—direction for perjury proceedings	Where the record disclosed a prosecution built on fabricated evidence and forged memoranda, the Court found it appropriate to direct proceedings under Section 340 CrPC against the three witnesses and two investigating officers responsible for the alleged false evidence. The direction initiated prosecution; it did not determine their guilt in that prosecution.	410
Section 340 CrPC—prima facie offence and interests of justice	Proceedings under Section 340 CrPC require both a prima facie basis for an offence within Section 195(1)(b) and an opinion that inquiry into it is expedient in the interests of justice. A complaint does not follow automatically merely because an apparent offence is identified.	410
Contradictory statements and intentional false evidence	A contradictory judicial statement does not by itself justify perjury prosecution. The material must indicate intentional falsehood or fabrication for use in judicial proceedings, and the Court must separately assess expediency in light of the circumstances and probable consequences of prosecution.	410
Section 340 CrPC—impact on administration of justice	Expediency under Section 340 CrPC normally turns on the effect of the alleged false evidence on the administration of justice, rather than solely on the size of the private injury. Even serious private injury does not make a court complaint compulsory.	410
Section 340 CrPC—preliminary inquiry is discretionary	A preliminary inquiry under Section 340 CrPC is optional. Its purpose is to assist the Court in deciding whether inquiry into an apparent offence is expedient, rather than to determine guilt. A Court able to form the required prima facie opinion from the record may dispense with a further preliminary inquiry.	410
Section 340 CrPC—hearing before making a complaint	Section 340 CrPC does not require a prior hearing for the person against whom the Court proposes a complaint. The accused's right to be heard arises in the ensuing criminal proceedings, and the availability of an appeal under Section 341 does not itself create a right to participate at the preliminary stage.	410
Section 340 CrPC—no adjudication of guilt at complaint stage	At the Section 340 stage the Court determines whether the available material calls for criminal inquiry in the interests of justice. It must not decide or express a conclusion on the proposed accused's guilt or innocence, which belongs to the subsequent prosecution.	410
Section 340 CrPC: deliberate falsehood, expediency and procedural safeguards	A Section 340 complaint requires a prima facie case of deliberate falsehood on a material matter and a separate finding that inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. Mere contradiction or innocent inaccuracy is insufficient; expediency concerns the effect on administration of justice, rather than private injury alone. If the court can form that opinion on the material already available, a preliminary inquiry is discretionary and the proposed accused has no right to participate before the complaint decision. The direction to complain against the two witnesses was a threshold decision, not a perjury conviction or removal of their defence rights in the ensuing case.	441
Police Investigation of a Document Allegedly Fabricated before Its Filing in	Where a document is allegedly fabricated outside court before being filed, rather than manipulated while in court custody, the Court rejected the objection that proceedings could be initiated only through a court complaint. Applying	532

Court	Iqbal Singh Marwah, it treated the complaint-route bar described in the judgment by reference to Section 340 CrPC as inapplicable to that alleged prior fabrication. The Court directed inquiry into the applicant's claimed sawmill ownership and licence, and registration of an offence against the Sarpanch who issued the certificate if the applicant was found not to own a sawmill. The direction was conditional on the inquiry.
Police suppression of evidence — prima facie action under Section 201 IPC	Where officers deliberately failed to collect and preserve evidence in order to protect the persons implicated, the Court found prima facie grounds for action under Section 201 IPC. It left the independent investigating agency free to implicate every public or private person found involved. The direction arose from the identified efforts to shield suspects and did not finally determine the offence or individual guilt.	546
Concealment of a body to screen an offender	Section 201 IPC concerns disappearance of evidence with knowledge or reason to believe that an offence has been committed and an intention to screen the offender from punishment. The Court upheld the Section 201/34 convictions in the circumstances of the child's body being hidden in a lavatory compartment sealed with bricks and cement, together with the other incriminating evidence.	648
Section 340 CrPC: expediency finding and optional preliminary inquiry	For an apparent offence within Section 195(1)(b) CrPC committed in or in relation to a court proceeding, the court must decide whether further inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice before making a written complaint under Section 340. A preliminary inquiry is discretionary, and even an apparent offence does not make a complaint obligatory. This stage concerns the need for inquiry and must not determine or express a conclusion on guilt. The power did not authorise the unrelated police-prosecution directions issued over the demolition proceedings in this case.	864
Section 340 CrPC: no mandatory hearing before the court makes its complaint	A person against whom a court proposes to complain under Section 340 has no statutory right to participate in the court's preliminary inquiry or to be heard before the complaint is made. The appeal provided by Section 341 does not create such a prior-hearing requirement. The absence of that hearing does not offend natural justice because the person's right to contest the accusation arises in the subsequent proceedings before the Magistrate.	864
Section 343 CrPC: Magistrate's procedure on a Section 340 complaint	A Magistrate receiving a Section 340 complaint proceeds under Section 343 as if the case were instituted on a police report. For the warrant offences discussed in the relied-upon passage, the Magistrate must ensure supply of relevant documents, hear the prosecution and accused under Section 239, and discharge the accused with recorded reasons if the allegations are groundless. If there is ground for presuming commission of an offence, a written charge is framed under Section 240 and the case proceeds in accordance with the accused's plea.	864
Section 340 CrPC: deliberate material falsehood and expediency of prosecution	Action under Section 340 requires material establishing a prima facie offence within Section 195(1)(b)(i) and a separate opinion that inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. A contradiction or innocent or immaterial inaccuracy is insufficient: perjury prosecution requires a reasonable foundation of deliberate, conscious falsehood on a matter of substance and a reasonable probability of conviction. Expediency turns principally on the effect on administration of justice, rather than the magnitude of private injury. The Court held that its earlier judgment had considered these requirements and could not reassess them by prohibited merits review.	869
Section 340 CrPC: optional preliminary inquiry and no right of prior participation	A court may dispense with a preliminary inquiry where the existing material enables the requisite prima facie satisfaction and expediency decision. A prospective accused has no right to participate before that decision, because Section 340 initiation does not determine guilt. Even after the apparent offence is identified, filing a complaint is not automatic. Absence of a preliminary inquiry or prior hearing therefore did not invalidate the earlier perjury direction	869 or provide a basis for recall in this case.

Section 343 CrPC: police-report procedure and adjournment pending appeal	A Magistrate receiving a complaint under Section 340 or 341 proceeds, as far as may be, as in a case instituted on a police report, notwithstanding Chapter XV. If an appeal is pending against the decision in the judicial proceeding from which the complaint arose, the Magistrate may, in discretion and at any stage, adjourn the complaint case until that appeal is decided.	869
Section 340 CrPC: deliberate falsehood and expediency in the interests of justice	Section 340 action requires material establishing a prima facie false-evidence offence and a judicial opinion that inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. Mere contradiction, innocent inaccuracy or an immaterial statement is insufficient; the apparent falsehood must be deliberate and substantial, with a reasonable foundation for prosecution. Expediency concerns the effect on administration of justice in the overall circumstances. Finding that the complainant deliberately reversed his account after initiating and actively participating in the trap, the Court directed a written complaint under Section 340, without deciding his guilt.	879
Section 340 CrPC preliminary inquiry is discretionary	A preliminary inquiry under Section 340 is optional. If the Court can form the requisite prima facie opinion and find inquiry expedient in the interests of justice on the existing material, it may dispense with a further preliminary inquiry. Such satisfaction does not determine the proposed accused's guilt, and even a prima facie offence does not make a court complaint automatic.	879
No right to participate before a Section 340 expediency decision	The prospective accused need not be heard in a preliminary inquiry concerned with whether a court complaint is expedient in the interests of justice. Following British, the Court held that such an inquiry is not an adjudication of guilt and did not require a prior opportunity to the complainant before directing a Section 340 complaint against him.	879
Section 340 CrPC: prima facie satisfaction, preliminary inquiry and prior notice	Initiation under Section 340 CrPC requires a prima facie opinion that an inquiry into the alleged offence is expedient in the interests of justice. A preliminary inquiry is optional where the Court can otherwise form that opinion, and the proposed accused has no right to prior notice or participation at that stage. The opinion is not a finding of guilt; the person retains a full opportunity of defence at trial. Even after such an opinion is formed, making a complaint is not automatic. On findings of deliberate false testimony and investigation facilitating false implication, the trial court was directed to initiate proceedings against the specified witnesses and police officers.	942
Tampering with the firing pin and conviction under Section 201 IPC	The Court upheld the shooter’s conviction under Section 201 IPC because the firing pin of the mouzer used in the offence was found to have been tampered with. It identified the gun as the licensed weapon of the shooter’s father from whose possession it was seized. This was the specific evidentiary basis stated for affirming the Section 201 conviction together with the convictions for murder and the Arms Act offence.	951
Prima facie action under Section 340 CrPC and hearing the suspect	The Court may form a prima facie opinion for action under Section 340 CrPC from material on record; a separate inquiry and hearing of the suspect are not invariably required. Here the doctor had already been heard during the police inquiry and the Court had considered the resulting report in the earlier bail-cancellation proceedings. It held that Section 340 action could have been considered without a further notice, but had instead recorded the prosecutor's undertaking.	989
Forged medical certificates and fraud on the Court	The Court treated issuance of a forged medical certificate for use in securing judicial protection for an accused as interference with the administration of justice and fraud on the Court. This characterisation of the allegation informed its refusal of bail.	989
Section 340 CrPC — prima facie offence	Action under Section 340 CrPC requires material disclosing a prima facie case	990

and expediency in the interests of justice	concerning an offence covered by Section 195(1)(b) and an opinion that an inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. A preliminary inquiry is permissible but is not mandatory where the existing record permits that opinion. Even then, a complaint does not follow automatically. A contradictory statement alone does not justify prosecution for false evidence without intentional falsity or fabrication. Expediency ordinarily turns on the effect on the administration of justice rather than the extent of private injury. Applying State (NCT of Delhi) v. Pankaj Choudhary and its reproduced discussion of Amarsang Nathaji and Iqbal Singh Marwah, the Court considered Section 340 action available in relation to the medical certificate filed to obtain anticipatory bail, but left action to the State instead of making a court complaint.
Section 201 IPC — concealing the victim's body to cause disappearance of evidence	Concealment of the victim's body to hide the commission of rape and murder was held to constitute causing disappearance of evidence under Section 201 IPC. The Court found that the appellant had thrown the child's body into a drain to conceal the offences; the police later recovered it after information from villagers. On the evidence accepted in the appeal, this concealment supported the separate conviction under Section 201 IPC in addition to the convictions for rape and murder.	1002
	Sub-Chapter no. 33.2 False FIR, False Complaint and Fabricated Criminal Material
Unproved connection between recovered money and alleged ransom	A conviction under Section 412 IPC could not rest on the alleged money recovery where payment of ransom itself was unproved, the seizure memo did not record the claimed signatures on currency notes, and witnesses materially differed about the denominations. The prosecution failed to connect the recovered amount with any ransom payment.	410
	Sub-Chapter no. 33.3 Offences Relating to Public Servants and Obstruction of Duty
Assault on a railway gateman in connection with the discharge of official duty	Closing a railway crossing to protect persons when a train is about to pass is part of a gateman's official duty. The accused showed no authority to insist that the closed gate be opened. His defence witness admitted the dispute over opening the gate, while the injured gateman's account was supported by witnesses who reached promptly and by medical evidence. On that evidence, the Court sustained the convictions under Sections 332 and 353 IPC.	852

	Chapter no. 34 POCSO Act and Child-Specific Criminal Process
	Sub-Chapter no. 34.1 POCSO Age Determination and Proof of Child Status
Child's age — attested school-record correction and contrary medical estimate	The Court accepted the original school register and transfer certificate recording the prosecutrix's birth on 2 January 1997. The school officer explained that the correction from a 1999 entry was signed and attested by the Principal; it made her older and did not support the accused's claim that she was an adult. The records preceded the offence and were proved under Section 35 of the Evidence Act. The defence ossification estimate of eighteen to twenty years did not displace those accepted records, which established that she was under eighteen at the occurrence.	13
Rule 12 of the 2007 Juvenile Justice Rules — age	The Court applied Jarnail Singh to determine a child victim's age using Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007. Under that scheme, the first available source in the prescribed sequence governs: matriculation or equivalent certificate, then	13 determination of a child victim	the birth entry from the first school attended, then a municipal, corporation or panchayat birth certificate. Medical opinion is sought only when those documentary sources are absent. The Rule's age-determination method applies to child victims as well as children in conflict with law.

Section 35 Evidence Act — admissibility and probative value of birth entries	A school register maintained in discharge of public duty is admissible under Section 35 to prove the recorded birth date, but admissibility does not eliminate scrutiny of the entry's probative value. The Court may examine who supplied the information, its source and whether corroboration is needed. Records made before the dispute arose may be relied on when duly proved; the Court accepted the pre-offence register and transfer certificate on the evidence presented here.	13
Ossification opinion — useful estimate rather than conclusive proof of age	Radiological or ossification evidence is a useful guide to age but is subject to a margin of error and individual developmental variation. It cannot be treated mechanically as conclusive or as the sole criterion; it must be considered with the other circumstances and the applicable documentary framework. The medical estimate did not override the proved school records in this case.	13
Rule 12 age-proof hierarchy applied to a child victim	The Court applied Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 to determine a child victim's age. The first available category in the prescribed order governs: matriculation or equivalent certificate, the date-of-birth record from the school first attended, a municipal or Panchayat birth certificate, and medical opinion only if those documentary categories are unavailable. It accepted the proved school admission register and found the victim below sixteen. The unproved ossification report could not assist the prosecution; although an unexhibited prosecution document may be considered if it favours the accused, this report did not do so.	38
Admissibility and probative value of school age records	A school register maintained in discharge of public duty is admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act for proving date of birth. Admissibility does not remove the Court's duty to assess the entry's probative value, including the source of the information; corroboration may be necessary in some cases. Records made before the dispute, supported by reliable evidence, may safely be relied upon. Applying the narrated authorities, the Court found the school register reliable here.	38
Ossification evidence as a guide rather than conclusive age proof	Radiological or ossification evidence is useful for age estimation but is subject to variation and a margin of error. It cannot be treated mechanically as conclusive or as the sole criterion; the other circumstances must also be considered. This qualification formed part of the age-proof framework adopted from Mukarrab.	38
Proof of a child victim's age by school records and corroborating testimony	The Court accepted the proved school admission register and the certificate based on it, read with consistent evidence from the prosecutrix, her mother and brother, as establishing that she was fifteen years and twenty-one days old. The absence of a notation identifying the source of the school entry did not discredit it on this record: the entry predated the dispute, there was no reason shown for a false date, and the prosecutrix's asserted age had not been challenged in cross-examination. With reliable documentary proof available, further age evidence was unnecessary.	89
Sequence of age-proof materials for a child victim under Rule 12 of the 2007 Rules	Applying Jarnail Singh, the Court used the Rule 12(3) sequence for determining a child victim's age: the matriculation or equivalent certificate first; in its absence, the birth entry from the first school attended; then the municipal, corporation or panchayat birth certificate; and medical opinion only when the prescribed documentary sources are unavailable. An available and reliable higher-priority source is not displaced by a later option in that sequence.	89
Admissibility and probative value of age entries in official	A school register maintained in discharge of public duty is admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, but admissibility does not prevent scrutiny of the entry's probative value. The information on which the entry was made and	89 and school records	its source may require corroboration. Records made before the dispute, supported by reliable family testimony, may provide dependable age evidence. The Court applied these principles in accepting the school record and corroborating oral evidence here.

Medical age estimation is a guide rather than conclusive proof	Radiological or ossification evidence provides useful guidance about age but is subject to a margin of error and must be considered with the surrounding circumstances. It is not the sole or conclusive criterion. The Court referred to Mukarrab while accepting reliable school records and declining to require another mode of age proof.	89
Acceptance of a pre-dispute school record to establish the prosecutrix's minority	The Court accepted the date of birth in the original school admission register, produced by its custodian and stated to derive from a transfer certificate. It treated the entry as relevant under Section 35 of the Evidence Act and as having been made before the dispute, when there was no reason to anticipate the offence. Applying documentary priority in age determination, it found the prosecutrix below sixteen on the date of the incident rather than substituting the approximate radiological estimate.	124
Rule 12 of the 2007 Juvenile Justice Rules in determining a child victim's age	The age-determination method in Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 may be applied to a child victim as well as a child in conflict with law. Under that scheme, the first available source in the prescribed order governs: matriculation or equivalent certificate, birth entry from the first school attended other than a play school, and then a municipal or panchayat birth certificate. Medical opinion is resorted to only in their absence.	124
Documentary priority under Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015	Under Section 94(2) of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015, the school date-of-birth certificate or matriculation or equivalent Board certificate has priority, followed in their absence by a municipal or panchayat birth certificate. An ossification or other medical age test is required only when those documentary sources are unavailable. The Court referred to that priority when accepting the available school record.	124
Relevance and probative value of school records under Section 35 of the Evidence Act	A school-register entry made in performance of the relevant public or legally imposed duty is relevant under Section 35 of the Evidence Act. Its admissibility does not eliminate examination of its probative value. The source of the information, the circumstances of recording and corroborative evidence may affect reliability. An entry made before the dispute may support its authenticity, but the surrounding evidence remains material.	124
Ossification evidence as an approximate guide to age	Radiological and ossification evidence is a useful guide to age but is not conclusive or exact. Individual developmental variation and a margin of error must be considered with the other circumstances. The Court must not determine age by a blind or mechanical use of medical opinion or treat ossification as the sole criterion.	124
Unchallenged age evidence and Section 5(m) POCSO Act	The mother's evidence that the victim was about eight years old was not challenged in cross-examination. On the accepted age evidence and proof of the sexual act, the Court held that the offence fell within Section 5(m) POCSO Act and affirmed the conviction under Section 6.	151
Rule 12 age-proof hierarchy applied to a child victim	For the 2014 offence, the Court applied Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 to the victim's age, following Jarnail. The prescribed order is the matriculation or equivalent certificate, the birth entry from the school first attended, the corporation, municipal or panchayat birth certificate, and only in their absence medical opinion. The Court accepted the school admission register proved in this case and held that the ossification estimate could not displace that available record.	179
No automatic two-year margin in medical age	There is no fixed rule requiring a two-year margin of error in an ossification estimate always to be taken in the accused's favour irrespective of the	179

estimation	surrounding circumstances. The Court may consider circumstances supporting a different inference. In this case, the medical estimate did not override the school record accepted under the applicable age-proof hierarchy.
Reliance on a first-school admission register proved by its maker	The Court accepted the first-school admission register proved by the headmistress who admitted the child and made the entry. Although the basis for the date of birth was uncertain, the register contained no overwriting and had been made years before the offence, when false implication of this accused was not in contemplation. On the evidence considered, it established that the prosecutrix was below eighteen on the incident date.	228
Rule 12 age-determination hierarchy applied to a child victim	The Court followed Jarnail Singh in applying Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 to the age of a child victim. Under that scheme, a matriculation or equivalent certificate has priority, followed in its absence by the birth entry of the first school attended, then the specified municipal or panchayat birth certificate. Medical opinion is sought only when the specified documentary sources are absent.	228
Admissibility and probative value of school age records	A school register maintained in discharge of public duty is admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act. Its contents must still be assessed for probative value, including whose information supported the entry and the source of that information. Corroboration may be necessary in some cases; pre-dispute records and supporting parental evidence are relevant to reliability.	228
Radiological age assessment is a guide rather than conclusive proof	Radiological and ossification evidence provides useful guidance on age but is subject to a margin of error and cannot be treated as conclusive in isolation. Age must be assessed with the other relevant circumstances rather than by mechanically adopting a medical estimate.	228
Proof of minority by a school admission register	A school register maintained according to law is admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act. Its probative value remains open to examination, including the source of the recorded information and any need for corroboration. In this case, the Court accepted the proved register, prepared before the criminal dispute, despite the absence of the underlying admission form, horoscope and birth certificate, and found the prosecutrix to have been 16 years and nine months old.	246
Rule 12 hierarchy for determining the age of a child victim	The age-determination method in Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 was applied to a child victim as well as a child in conflict with law. The first available category governs in the stated order: matriculation or equivalent certificate; in its absence, the birth entry from the first school attended other than a play school; then a birth certificate from the municipal or panchayat authority. Medical opinion is sought only if these documentary categories are unavailable. An available earlier category takes precedence over a later one.	246
Medical age estimation is not conclusive	Radiological examination and ossification tests are useful guides to age, but cannot be treated as conclusive or applied mechanically. Their estimates are subject to a margin of error and must be considered with the other circumstances, rather than treated as the sole criterion of age.	246
Proof of child status through a duly proved school-register entry	The school witness proved the register recording the prosecutrix's date of birth, along with the Headmaster's certificate, and her evidence remained reliable after cross-examination. Treating the official entry as relevant under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, the Court found that the prosecutrix was under eighteen on the incident date and applied POCSO.	254
Final determination of prosecutrix's age reserved for trial at the bail stage	Where the prosecutrix's age remained for determination by the trial court, the High Court declined to give a final age finding in the bail proceeding. It nevertheless took account of the school record showing minority when deciding whether there was a basis to depart from the previous refusal of bail.	263
Proof of minority	The Court accepted the deceased's date of birth from the original admission	393

through the original school admission register	register proved by the school witness, whose evidence remained unrebutted in cross-examination. Compared with the date of the offence, that evidence established that he was below eighteen and therefore a child within the POCSO Act.
Prosecutrix's age—proof of available school records	Where school records relied on by the prosecution were available to establish the prosecutrix's birth date under Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007, the trial court had to obtain proper proof of those records. It should not bypass them in favour of an oral estimate based on assumed gaps between the ages of siblings.	414
Documentary age evidence instead of an FIR estimate at the charge stage	For the charge-stage assessment of the prosecutrix's age, the Court applied the documentary method in Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015, rather than the husband's age estimate in the FIR. That provision prioritises a school birth-date certificate or a matriculation/equivalent certificate, followed in their absence by specified local-authority birth records, and medical determination only if both documentary categories are absent. The school admission register and Headmaster's certificate showing the birth date as 20 December 2003 supported treating her as below eighteen when she left in June 2021.	468
Victim's age at bail stage — school record and later declaration of adulthood	Where the school record showed that the prosecutrix was a minor on the date of the incident, her alleged declaration of adulthood in later marriage proceedings did not warrant resolving the age dispute in the bail application. Referring to documentary age assessment under Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015, the Court left the effect of the inconsistent declaration to the trial court when assessing her age.	488
Proof of the child's age by school records	Applying the age-determination approach quoted from Jarnail Singh, the Court accepted the proved school admission register and Class VIII marksheet, which recorded the same date of birth. The register maintained according to law was admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, and the recorded date had not been challenged in cross-examination. These documents established that the prosecutrix was fifteen on the date of the offence.	560
Proof of the child's age by the original school admission register	Where the school witness produced the original admission register and the photocopy was exhibited after comparison with it, the objection that only an unverified photocopy had been produced was contrary to the record. Non-production of the underlying admission form did not by itself make the register's birth entry incorrect. The Court accepted the school record to establish that the prosecutrix was a child on the date of the incident.	616
Child victim's age: priority of documentary proof under Rule 12	Applying Jarnail Singh, the Court used Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 to determine the victim's age. The hierarchy gives priority to an available matriculation or equivalent certificate, then the birth entry from the school first attended, then the municipal or panchayat birth certificate; medical opinion is used only in their absence. The Court accepted the proved school register and certificate and found the victim to be fourteen on the incident date.	623
Ossification estimates and their margin of error	An ossification estimate is medical opinion subject to a margin of error. In this case, the Court noted a two-year margin on either side of the estimated sixteen-to-eighteen-year range, which could accommodate age fourteen at its lower end. It nevertheless based the minority finding on the available school record rather than replacing that record with the medical estimate.	623
Proof of victim's age — school record under the Rule 12 sequence	Applying Jarnail Singh, the Court used the documentary sequence in Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 to determine the child victim's age: matriculation or equivalent certificate; failing that, the first school's date-of-birth record; failing that, a civic birth certificate; and medical opinion only in the absence of those documents. The proved school admission register and the headmaster's certificate recorded the date of birth as 3 February 1999. The Court accepted that record, made before the prosecution could have been	676 anticipated, and found corroboration in the ossification report. It therefore found the prosecutrix below eighteen on 25 October 2015. The judgment does not expressly identify the school as her first school.

School-entry weight and medical age estimates require contextual assessment	The Lekhram and Murugan passages relied upon by the Court recognise the relevance of school records under Section 35 of the Evidence Act while permitting scrutiny of their source and probative value, including corroboration where needed. Records made before litigation may carry particular weight. Mukarrab explains that radiological and ossification estimates are useful guides but are not conclusive or precise and must be considered with other circumstances. Here, the ossification report corroborated the school record rather than displaced it. The Court's finding of minority did not accept the appellant's proposed two-year margin despite the challenge based on the father's assessment at admission.	676
Age determination — statutory records and disputed school correction	The Court relied on its earlier order applying Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act: school birth-date or matriculation records take priority, followed in their absence by a municipal or panchayat birth certificate, and only then medical age determination. A further ossification test was refused where a school register and an existing medical report were available. A Samagra ID and an unattested caste-certificate application were not accepted as statutory age proof. The Court had considered the supplementary school affidavit and rejected the co-accused's majority claim; the same contention did not justify quashing here.	809
POCSO bail — Documentary age evidence before medical testing	Applying Section 94(2) of the Juvenile Justice Act as a guide, the Court gave priority to the school birth certificate or examination-board certificate, followed, in their absence, by the specified municipal or panchayat birth certificate. Medical age testing is available only when those documents are absent. The consistent school record and pre-incident mark sheet were not rejected merely because the school was private, and no overwriting was found. On that record, refusal of ossification testing did not displace the documentary age assessment in the bail proceeding.	823
Child-victim age determination under Rule 12 of the 2007 Juvenile Justice Rules	The Court applied Jarnail Singh's extension of Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007 to a child victim. The prescribed order was matriculation or equivalent certificate, then the birth record from the first school attended, then a municipal or panchayat birth certificate, with medical opinion used only if the earlier documentary options were unavailable. The first available higher-ranked source takes precedence. On the proved school record, supported by the headmaster's evidence and the unchallenged family evidence, the Court found the prosecutrix to be a minor at the time of the incident.	876
Section 35 Evidence Act: admissibility and probative value of school age entries	School birth entries made in discharge of public duty are admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, but admissibility does not dispense with examination of their probative value. The Court may consider who supplied the information, its source, authenticity and the need for corroboration. Entries made before the dispute arose may be relied on where duly admissible and supported. Applying the reproduced Lekhram and Murugan passages, the Court accepted the school birth date established by the headmaster with the supporting oral evidence.	876
Proof of minority — date of birth in proved school admission registers	The Court relied on the school admission registers proved by the prosecution witnesses, recording the victim's date of birth as 11 August 1997, to determine his minority on the date of the offence, 8 October 2014. The recorded dates established that he was below eighteen years when the incident occurred.	886
Section 94 JJ Act — documentary priority over medical age testing	For determining the victim's age, the Court applied the sequence in Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015: first the school date-of-birth certificate or matriculation/equivalent certificate; in their absence, the birth certificate issued by the specified public authority; and only in the absence of both categories,	1007

	ossification or another medical age test. The school register was available and an ossification report was already in the case diary. The Court rejected the request for an ossification test and stated that the accused could not dictate the investigation.
Samagra ID and unattested caste-certificate application — inadequate age evidence	The Court declined to treat the family's Samagra ID as a document proving the prosecutrix's age. Its entry showing her as eighteen in 2014 would make her about twenty-five in 2021, inconsistent with the applicant's own claim that she attained eighteen in June 2021. The application for a caste certificate mentioning another birth date was also rejected because it lacked attestation by a competent authority and was not a document specified in Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015. These documents did not establish the age defence advanced in the anticipatory-bail proceeding.	1007

POCSO Victim Testimony and Corroboration Standards

Prosecutrix's testimony assessed with corroborating evidence	The Court accepted the prosecutrix's account of confinement and sexual assault after considering it with the supporting evidence, including the medical opinion. The absence of support from one witness did not require rejection of the account on the record as a whole. This was an assessment of the evidence in the case, without an automatic presumption that every allegation of sexual assault is proved.	38
POCSO commencement and an objection based on the 2013 IPC amendment	The objection that the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 2013 commenced after the initial February 2013 incident did not displace the conviction under Section 6 of the POCSO Act. The Court noted that POCSO had already come into force on 14 November 2012 and therefore rejected the challenge to its application to the proved acts.	89
Corroboration of the prosecutrix's account by recovery, admission and FSL evidence	The prosecutrix's account of sexual intercourse was corroborated by her recovery from the appellant's custody, his Section 313 CrPC admission that they had travelled to Punjab, and the FSL detection of human sperm on her vaginal slides and clothing. The Court assessed this evidence together in sustaining the conviction; the scientific result was used as corroboration of her testimony.	89
Proof of penetrative sexual assault and sexual intent under POCSO	The evidence did not prove penetrative sexual assault by the appellant or that his proved act of pressing the child's neck had sexual intent. After considering Sections 3 and 7 of the POCSO Act, the Court therefore set aside the conviction under Sections 3/4. The neck assault, consistently reported in the FIR and the child's testimony, remained proved as hurt under Section 323 IPC.	91
Unclarified expression in a child's account of alleged sexual assault	The child's use of the word 'छाले' in her recalled testimony, without clarification by the trial court, did not permit an inference that the appellant had raped her. She stated that she became unconscious after neck compression and did not know what happened afterwards. Her further statement that she spoke of pain in her private parts on her father and uncle's instructions was also considered in assessing the allegation.	91
Child victim's credible testimony — Corroboration is not mandatory	A sexual-assault victim is not an accomplice, and a reliable, convincing account can support conviction without corroboration as a rule of law. The Court must consider the testimony as a whole and may seek supporting assurance where there are compelling reasons to doubt or hesitate over it. The child's account, recorded after the trial court checked her understanding, was accepted as trustworthy. In this case it was also supported by her immediate disclosures, family and neighbour testimony, and medical findings.	116
Child victim's shorter testimony and alleged	A child's shorter account in Court did not contradict his more detailed statement under Section 161 CrPC when both consistently identified the accused and described the sexual act. The child denied the suggestions of tutoring and a	151

contradictions	family dispute, and his account was supported by his mother's eyewitness testimony and the forensic findings. The Court found no material contradiction warranting rejection of his evidence.
Consent of a prosecutrix proved to be below eighteen	Once the prosecutrix was proved to be below eighteen on the date of the sexual offence, her purported consent did not answer the charge. The Court therefore found it unnecessary to decide whether she had in fact consented to the acts alleged.	228
Conviction on reliable prosecutrix testimony without independent-neighbour corroboration	The absence of testimony from independent neighbours did not prevent reliance on the prosecutrix's trustworthy account that the appellant caught her hand with sexual intent. The central allegation remained intact, her mother reached the spot immediately on hearing the alarm, and the FIR was lodged within ninety minutes. The Court upheld the conviction on that evidence.	254
Failure to raise an alarm by a victim with communication difficulties	The prosecutrix's failure to raise an alarm did not establish consent in the circumstances assessed by the Court. The trial judge's notes showed difficulty in understanding some of her answers. Considering her communication disability, her age of fifteen and the appellant's age of about sixty, the Court rejected the contention that she had willingly participated.	560
Prompt disclosures corroborating the child prosecutrix's evidence	The prosecutrix was the sole witness to the incident, but she promptly narrated it to her father and a neighbour, and her father immediately informed his sister. The Court treated their evidence of those disclosures as corroborating the child's account. On the total evidence, it found the prosecution case proved beyond reasonable doubt.	616
Victim testimony and medical corroboration despite absence of DNA testing	Absence of DNA testing did not prevent conviction where the victim's account was accepted with medical and forensic corroboration. The doctor's findings supported recent penetration, and semen and sperm found on the examined material further corroborated the account. Without DNA analysis, the vaginal material was not independently identified as the appellant's; the conviction rested on the combined evidence.	623
Proved minority — apparent willingness did not defeat the sexual-offence convictions	Once the prosecutrix was found below eighteen at the time of the incident, the Court treated the alleged consent as immaterial. Her account of sexual assault was accepted with corroboration from the medical report, whose material findings were not challenged in cross-examination. Absence of external injuries did not alter that assessment on this record. The appellant's argument based on voluntary travel and failure to raise an alarm did not defeat the convictions under Sections 363, 366 and 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO. The Court assessed the testimony and medical evidence together.	676
Child sexual-assault testimony — absence of injury and forensic corroboration	Absence of bodily injury does not by itself disprove a sexual assault where reliable ocular evidence establishes it. Semen findings may corroborate the victim's account. In the prosecution under Section 377 IPC and, alternatively, Sections 3–4 POCSO Act, the Court accepted the boy's account of being taken away, restrained and assaulted, his prompt disclosure to his father and the next-day FIR. Although the medical examination disclosed no injury, human sperm and semen found on the anal samples and underwear corroborated his testimony. The Court also considered the cross-examination and absence of any suggested enmity before finding the prosecution case proved beyond reasonable doubt.	886
Reliable testimony of a child prosecutrix and corroboration	Reliable testimony of a prosecutrix does not require further corroboration as a condition for acceptance. In this case, the child's account was also corroborated by her immediate disclosure, witnesses who saw her bleeding and the appellant leaving, and the medical and FSL evidence. The Court found the rape proved beyond reasonable doubt.	980

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Sub-Chapter no. 34.3 POCSO Sexual Offences — Minor Consent and Compromise-Based Quashing
Sexual offences against a child — willing accompaniment does not make consent material	Once the prosecutrix was proved to be below eighteen at the occurrence, her admission that she had willingly accompanied the accused did not make consent a defence to the sexual offences proved against him. On the evidence of repeated intercourse and the established age, the Court affirmed conviction under Section 376(2)(n) IPC and Section 6 of the POCSO Act, together with the Section 368 IPC conviction.	13
POCSO and rape allegations — consent during minority and later family circumstances	For the quashing request, the Court accepted the prosecution material showing that the prosecutrix was under eighteen when the relationship began and that intercourse occurred during her minority. Her consent was therefore immaterial at that stage, notwithstanding that she was close to eighteen and relied on the couple's marriage and child. Those assertions did not eliminate the prima facie sexual-offence case; the trial court remained free to decide the evidence according to law.	15
Consent of a victim below sixteen under the provisions applied	Having found the victim below sixteen at the time of the incident and accepted the evidence of intercourse, the Court rejected the plea of consent as an answer to the rape charge under the provisions applicable to that offence. It sustained the direct offender's conviction under Section 376(2)(i) IPC and Section 4 POCSO Act.	38
POCSO prosecution — minor's consent, later compromise and marriage	Under Section 375 Sixthly IPC, consent does not make sexual intercourse with a girl below eighteen lawful. The Court held that the later compromise or marriage relied upon by the accused could not bypass that protection or justify quashing the pending Sections 3 and 4 POCSO prosecution under Section 482 CrPC. Treating POCSO as a protective special statute, it refused settlement-based termination of the child-sexual-offence proceedings.	58
Consent where the prosecutrix was proved to be fifteen years old	Once the prosecutrix was proved to have been fifteen years and twenty-one days old at the relevant time, her apparent consent did not furnish a defence to the appellant's liability for the proved sexual offences. The Court therefore found it unnecessary to resolve the appellant's argument that her travel with him and failure to complain at intermediate places showed willing participation.	89
Consent of a fifteen-year-old prosecutrix	Once the prosecutrix was proved to be fifteen on the date of the offence, her alleged consent was immaterial to the convictions under Section 376 IPC and Section 4 of the POCSO Act.	560
Minor victim’s or parent’s compromise — refusal to quash alleged POCSO sexual assault	Verification of a family compromise did not justify quashing proceedings alleging an offence under Section 354 IPC and Sections 7/8 of the POCSO Act against a minor girl. The offences were reported as non-compoundable under Section 320 CrPC, and the victim’s father had sought to compromise on her behalf. Relying on Arif Khan and the child-protective reasoning drawn from Independent Thought, the Court held that consent legally immaterial to the sexual offence could not become decisive through a later compromise. Accepting settlement on that basis would indirectly defeat the protection that could not be waived directly. The Court therefore refused quashing under Section 482 CrPC. Its references to Section 375 IPC explained that reasoning; the prosecution before it concerned alleged touching and threats, not a charge of rape.	997
	Sub-Chapter no. 34.4 POCSO Penetrative Sexual Assault — Section 3 Ingredients and Extent of Penetration
Section 3 POCSO Act — Intact hymen and the Court's penetration analysis	The Bench read Section 3 POCSO Act as covering penetration to any extent into the specified body parts and manipulation of the child's body to cause penetration. In applying that provision, it stated that manipulation with an intention to penetrate amounted to penetrative sexual assault. It rejected the	116 intact-hymen objection in light of the child's credible account and internal redness and swelling, although the medical opinion described symptoms suggestive of attempted rape. The Section 4 POCSO and Section 376 IPC convictions were affirmed.

Penetrative anal assault on a child	Penile penetration of a child's anus to any extent falls within Section 3 of the POCSO Act. The Court accepted the medical evidence of penetrative anal assault and the connected forensic and last-seen evidence in affirming the conviction under Sections 3 and 4 alongside the IPC offences.	393

POCSO Section 42 — Greater-Degree Punishment for Overlapping IPC Offences

Section 42 POCSO requires the punishment greater in degree for overlapping offences	Where the same conduct attracts the relevant POCSO offence and Section 376 IPC, Section 42 requires punishment under whichever enactment provides punishment greater in degree. On its comparison of the punishments applicable to the 2014 offence, the Court retained the ten-year IPC sentence and imposed no separate sentence under Section 4 POCSO, while maintaining the convictions and the concurrent sentences for the other IPC offences.	179
Sentence where the act attracts both POCSO and the higher IPC minimum	For the offences considered in this case, the Court noted a seven-year minimum for penetrative sexual assault under POCSO but a ten-year minimum under Section 376(2)(i) IPC. It therefore refused reduction to the period undergone and affirmed the ten-year rigorous-imprisonment sentence imposed under Section 4 POCSO.	246
Section 42 POCSO Act and overlapping IPC conviction	Where the same assault resulted in convictions under Section 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO Act, the trial court applied Section 42 and imposed one substantive sentence under POCSO, with no separate sentence under the IPC offence. The High Court affirmed the convictions and that sentencing disposition while considering the parallel IPC punishment in rejecting reduction.	623

POCSO Trial Procedure and Fair Opportunity in Sexual-Offence Prosecutions

Separate sentences for overlapping IPC and POCSO sexual offences	While upholding the convictions under Section 376(2)(i) and (n) IPC and Section 6 of the POCSO Act, the Court applied Section 71 IPC and held that a separate sentence for the IPC rape offence was unnecessary for the same acts. The ten-year sentence under Section 6 remained.	228
Remand for proper age proof and a fresh judgment	Failure to obtain essential school-record evidence required setting aside the judgment and sentences and remanding for proof of that record, a fresh age finding and a fresh judgment. The father's evidence could corroborate a conclusively proved school record or be considered to assess age if documentary proof failed.	414
Two-year-old victim — non-examination and protected identification	Non-examination of the two-year-old victim did not undermine this prosecution when medical evidence established rape and injuries and her father and independent witnesses identified the appellant as her abductor. The Court considered her limited vocabulary and rejected the demand for conventional dock identification by reference to Sakshi and Section 36 POCSO. That provision protects the child from exposure to the accused during testimony while preserving the accused's ability to hear the evidence and communicate with counsel. These principles were applied in an appeal against IPC convictions.	482
Non-compoundability of the POCSO charges despite a voluntary settlement	The charges under Sections 7, 8, 11 and 12 of the POCSO Act were non-compoundable under Section 320 CrPC. The trial court's rejection of the compounding application was followed by separate consideration of the Section 482 request; the Registrar's verification of a voluntary settlement did not itself	578

	compound those charges.
Power to Secure Necessary Documents and Witness Evidence at Any Trial Stage	Under Sections 91 and 311 CrPC, the trial court may secure production of necessary documents and examine, summon or recall a witness at any stage where the material is needed for a just decision. Applying these powers, the Court rejected the contention that an earlier failure to obtain DNA evidence exhausted the trial court's authority to permit necessary scientific evidence. The application challenging that authority was dismissed.	659
POCSO trial: closure of cross-examination after repeated unexplained deferment	Where the minor prosecutrix repeatedly attended and the defence, despite a prior warning, sought to defer cross-examination without giving a reason, closure of the right under Section 309 CrPC did not warrant interference under Section 482. An assertion that counsel sought adjournments contrary to instructions did not justify subjecting the child to further harassment. The accused could change counsel or approach the Bar Council regarding the alleged misconduct.	860
	Sub-Chapter no. 34.7 POCSO Sections 7–8 — Non-Penetrative Sexual Assault and Punishment
Touching a child's breast with sexual intent under Section 7 POCSO Act	Touching a child's breast with sexual intent constitutes sexual assault under Section 7 POCSO Act. The provision covers physical contact without penetration. On the child's specific testimony that the appellant touched her breast, considered with the evidence that he tried to take her towards a vacant area and fled after a witness intervened, the Court affirmed his convictions under Section 8 POCSO Act and Section 354 IPC.	421
Reduction of Section 8 POCSO sentence to custody already undergone above the statutory minimum	Section 8 POCSO Act, as applied in this appeal, prescribed imprisonment of three to five years and liability to fine. The appellant had remained in custody after conviction because bail was refused and had served more than three years and seven months. Since his actual custody exceeded the statutory minimum, the Court reduced the four-year rigorous imprisonment term to the period already undergone. It maintained the sentence under Section 354 IPC and otherwise affirmed the judgment, including the fines, with release directed unless he was required in another case.	421
Prima facie inference of physical contact under Section 7 POCSO	At the stage of framing charges, the Court inferred physical contact from the allegations that the applicant possessed photographs of the minor prosecutrix taken at parties and other places and threatened to upload them. On that inference, it held that the allegations prima facie supported a charge under Section 7, punishable under Section 8 of the POCSO Act.	568
Skin-to-skin contact is unnecessary for sexual assault under POCSO	Section 7 POCSO covers touching a child's vagina, penis, anus or breast with sexual intent, making the child touch those parts of another person, or another sexual-intent act involving physical contact without penetration. Applying Attorney General of India v. Satish, the Court recognised that the required physical contact need not be skin-to-skin.	568
	Sub-Chapter no. 34.8 POCSO Abetment, Intentional Aid and Mandatory Reporting — Sections 16–19
Counsellor's omission and prima facie POCSO abetment	Intentional aid under Section 16 POCSO may consist of an act or illegal omission facilitating the offence before or at its commission. A counsellor responsible for the safety of resident girls allegedly knew of repeated sexual abuse of a mentally disabled minor, saw the accused with her, and merely asked him to stop instead of reporting or acting. That material was sufficient to sustain an abetment charge under Sections 16 and 17. Section 17 requires the abetted offence to be committed in consequence of the abetment and prescribes the punishment provided for that offence; the charge-stage assessment does not determine guilt.	432

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Counsellor's duty to report known child sexual abuse	A counsellor who learns of sexual abuse of a child must inform the Special Juvenile Police Unit or local police under Section 19(1) POCSO. Asking the alleged perpetrator to desist does not discharge that reporting duty. Noncommunication of the required information is punishable, with imprisonment extending to six months as stated in the judgment.	432
	Chapter no. 35 Victim Rights, Vulnerable Witnesses and Special Protection
	Sub-Chapter no. 35.1 Victim Privacy, Anonymity and Dignity Protection
Protection of the prosecutrix's identity in charge-sheets	Where the prosecutrix stated that police had included her name in the charge-sheet with her consent and the officers tendered apologies, the Court declined to pursue the disclosure issue further. It nevertheless directed the DGP to examine disclosure of a prosecutrix's identity through charge-sheet particulars and issue preventive directions, completing the exercise within thirty days.	62
Judicial sensitivity to sexual violence and victim dignity	Sexual violence infringes a woman's privacy, dignity and Article 21 rights, and courts must deal with sexual-offence cases with sensitivity. Conduct such as stalking, harassment and coercive demands must not be dismissed as trivial merely because it differs from rape. The Court invoked these principles in requiring the full allegations, including pressure for intimate images and its psychological impact, to be considered at the charge stage.	63
Protecting a Child Victim's Identity During Playback of Recovery Video	When the body-recovery video was to be played, the Court stopped live streaming so that the child victim's identity would not be disclosed. It converted that part of the hearing into an in-camera proceeding while permitting counsel for both sides to view the complete recording. The adopted procedure protected the child's identity while preserving the parties' opportunity to examine the evidence.	389
Rape victim's video statements — secure custody, privacy and identity protection	The Court found that police video statements were absent from the case diary and had been transmitted through WhatsApp without a lawful explanation, compromising the rape victim's privacy. It directed registration of Section 228-A IPC against the responsible officers on a prima facie basis. The WhatsApp captions did not establish when the original recordings were made. The copy supplied to the Court was retained in a sealed cover, while the independent investigation remained free to examine responsibility.	546
	Sub-Chapter no. 35.2 Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Marriage) Act — Talaq Pronouncement and Criminal Liability
Conditional written talaq and Section 2(c) of the 2019 Act	On the Section 482 CrPC application, the Court examined the actual terms of the notice described as talaq-e-ahsan. It announced a final and irrevocable divorce after three menstrual cycles unless the wife returned during iddah. Reading that conditional announcement in light of the 2019 Act's protective purpose, the Court treated this notice as expressing an already intended irrevocable talaq within Section 2(c), despite the stated interval, and refused to exclude it from the Act merely because of its label.	256
Prima facie offence from oral triple talaq before the written notice took effect	The FIR also alleged that, before the written talaq notice's three-cycle period elapsed, the husband went to the wife's parental home and pronounced talaq three times. The Court held that this alleged talaq-e-biddat, while the earlier notice had not become operative, disclosed an offence against the applicant and furnished a further ground to refuse quashing.	256

witnesses against pressure by the accused	v. Union of India. Where witnesses had turned hostile after pressure by the accused, the Court found that the prosecution had failed to provide that protection. Their hostility was considered in deciding bail subject to stringent conditions.
Sexual-offence proceedings — Judicial sensitivity and freedom from stereotypes	Courts must treat complainants of sexual harassment and assault sensitively while ensuring that the facts necessary for fair adjudication are brought on record. Trauma, embarrassment and social stigma must not obscure the evidence. Judicial language and reasoning must remain impartial and avoid stereotypes or extraneous assumptions about women. This duty extends to all forms of sexual violence and harassment, including offences regarded as comparatively minor.	353
Sexual-offence testimony — Privacy and respectful cross-examination	Trial courts must provide appropriate protection when a person testifies about sexual harassment or violence. Measures include in-camera proceedings where appropriate under Section 327 CrPC or otherwise; a screen, or the accused's temporary absence, so that the witness need not see the accused; and respectful cross-examination without inappropriate questions, especially about sexual history. Questions may be submitted through the court, and cross-examination should, as far as possible, finish in one sitting.	353
Rape victim protection — dignity and freedom from pressure during independent investigation	When transferring the case, the Court directed the CBI to provide full protection to the rape victim, maintain her dignity and ensure that she was not pressurised. It referred to the Witness Protection Scheme formulated in Mahender Chawla. Protection was part of securing a fair investigation after the findings of local police intimidation.	546
Witness protection as a condition of truthful and fair testimony	The State must protect witnesses' life and liberty so that they can testify truthfully without fear. Courts must recognise that threats, inducement, money or muscle power, family or political pressure and protracted proceedings can undermine testimony. Applying the witness-protection principles, the Court required active trial management to prevent unjustified delay from exposing eyewitnesses to pressure or compromise.	868

Intimation to the Complainant When Bail Is Granted	On allowing the bail application, the Court directed that intimation of the grant of bail be sent to the complainant, applying Aparna Bhat v. State of M.P., Criminal Appeal No. 329/2021, decided on 18 March 2021.	650
Complainant to be informed of the grant of bail	When allowing the regular-bail application, the Court directed that intimation of the grant of bail be sent to the complainant, referring to Aparna Bhat v. State of M.P. The direction required communication of the bail decision to the complainant. The judgment did not reproduce or decide any broader proposition about a right to veto bail or a condition of prior consent.	674
Aggrieved complainant or victim — standing to challenge an erroneous bail order	The State's responsibility to prosecute does not prevent an aggrieved party from approaching the superior court against an illegal or perverse grant of bail. The power may be invoked by the State or an aggrieved party and may also be exercised suo motu. A person with a bona fide connection to the matter is not left without recourse merely because the State does not act. Standing must be assessed with care: an unconnected stranger or a person pursuing a merely personal grievance cannot claim unrestricted access on that basis.	707
Victim participation — information and opportunity to present concerns	Victim-sensitive criminal procedure includes informing victims of their role and the scope, timing and progress of proceedings and allowing their views and concerns to be considered at appropriate stages when personal interests are affected. Such participation must remain consistent with the criminal justice system and must not prejudice the accused. State control of prosecution does not require the actual victim to remain outside the process without an opportunity to address grievances.	707
Intimation to the complainant after grant of bail	The Court directed that the complainant be informed of the grant of bail, applying the Supreme Court's decision in Aparna Bhat. The direction concerned notice of the bail disposition in the pending prosecution, including the POCSO charge.	709
Grant of bail — Intimation to the complainant	When granting bail, the Court directed that intimation of the grant be sent to the complainant, following Aparna Bhat v. State of Madhya Pradesh.	821
Intimation of anticipatory-bail grant to the complainant	When allowing the anticipatory-bail appeal, the Court directed that the complainant be informed of the grant of bail. It issued that direction in light of Aparna Bhat v. State of Madhya Pradesh, preserving the complainant's notification interest in the bail proceeding.	839
Intimation to the complainant when bail is granted	Applying Aparna Bhat, the Court directed that the complainant be informed of the grant of bail. This was a distinct post-decision intimation, following the State's report that notice of the pending SC/ST Act appeal had already been	865

Intimation of bail to the complainant	Following Aparna Bhat, the Court directed that intimation of the grant of bail be sent to the complainant. This was an express requirement of the bail order in addition to the applicant's release conditions.	878
Victim's counsel in a Sessions trial — assistance without a parallel prosecution	Under Sections 225 and 301(2) CrPC and the proviso to Section 24(8), the victim's counsel assists the Public Prosecutor and ordinarily cannot independently make oral arguments or examine or cross-examine witnesses. The extent and manner of assistance depend on the case. Overlooked questions or points may be routed through the prosecutor. If the prosecutor disregards a material suggestion, counsel may bring it to the judge, who may act under Section 311 CrPC or Section 165 of the Evidence Act if it has merit. Counsel cannot put the questions independently.	890

SC/ST Act and Caste-Based Criminal Process

Sub-Chapter no. 36.1
SC/ST Act — Registration, Public Accountability and Misuse Allegations Where Decided

Sections 18-A and 4 of the SC/ST Act do not create an automatic right to FIR-registration mandamus	The removal of a preliminary-enquiry requirement by Section 18-A and the punishment for wilful neglect of duty under Section 4 of the SC/ST Act do not themselves entitle an informant to bypass the available statutory remedies and obtain a writ directing registration of an FIR. The Court left the petitioner free to pursue the complaint and investigation remedies under criminal procedure.	128
No preliminary inquiry before registration of an SC/ST Act FIR	Section 18-A of the SC/ST Act removes the requirement of a preliminary inquiry before registration of an FIR for an accusation under the Act. That statutory rule concerning registration is distinct from the question whether an Article 226 petition should be entertained without use of the available statutory remedies.	128
Complaint alleging wilful neglect of duty by a public servant under Section 4	Section 4 of the SC/ST Act punishes a public servant who is not a member of a Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe and wilfully neglects duties imposed by the Act or its rules, with imprisonment from six months to one year. The reproduced provision requires an administrative-enquiry recommendation for booking the charges and provides for Special Court or Exclusive Special Court cognizance. A complainant alleging punishable neglect through non-registration may include the responsible SHO as an accused in a complaint, subject to those statutory requirements.	128

SC/ST Act — Public View, Caste-Based Insult and Special Court Process

Caste-based humiliation in public view at the quashing stage	Where the FIR alleged specific words intended to humiliate or insult the complainant by caste and an incident at a public place within public view, no ground was made out to quash the proceedings at the Section 482 stage. Whether those allegations were proved remained for trial; the refusal to quash did not amount to a conclusive finding of guilt.	142
Magistrate's jurisdiction over a pre-amendment SC/ST Act complaint	Under Section 14 of the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act as it stood in 2012, the Special Court remained a Court of Session and could take cognizance only after committal by a Magistrate. A private complaint alleging an offence under Section 3(1)(x) was therefore maintainable before the Magistrate at that time. The later amendment conferring direct cognizance power did not render the Magistrate's 2012 entertainment of the complaint and issuance of summons illegal.	241
SC/ST Act public view — prima facie caste insult and	Where the recorded allegation was that the person stood outside the room while the victim was inside, called her by her caste name and threatened to kill her if	546

threat from outside the victim's room	she disclosed the incident, the Court treated the alleged insult as occurring at a place within public view. On that prima facie basis, it directed his addition as an accused with offences under Sections 3(1)(r) and 3(1)(s) of the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act and Section 506 Part II IPC. The observations remained confined to the writ and did not finally decide guilt.
Telephone caste abuse received alone in a private room — public view	Where the complainant's own statement showed that he was alone in his drawing room when he received the alleged caste abuse by telephone, the insult or humiliation was not within public view. On that factual basis, the Court found no prima facie offence and quashed the invoked SC/ST Act counts under Sections 3(1)(r), 3(1)(s) and 3(2)(va).	685
SC/ST Act — public view distinguished from a public place	A privately owned place may still be within public view. An insult outside a house at a location visible from a road or lane, or inside a building in the presence of members of the public rather than merely relatives or friends, may satisfy that requirement. Private ownership alone does not answer whether the place is within public view.	685
Section 3(1)(r) SC/ST Act — intentional caste-related humiliation	Section 3(1)(r) requires intentional insult or intimidation with an intent to humiliate a member of a Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe within public view. An insult does not fall within that provision merely because the person insulted belongs to such a community; the insult or intimidation must be on account of that status.	685
SC/ST Act public view — knowing recording followed by public playback	In the Section 482 CrPC challenge, the Court distinguished public view from a public place. It found that the applicant knew his telephonic conversation was being recorded and could later be played before others, yet continued the caste-directed abuse and threats. When the recording was subsequently played within public view, the private setting of the original call did not exclude a prima facie case. On those circumstances, the Court declined to quash the allegations under Sections 3(1)(r), 3(1)(s) and 3(2)(va) of the SC/ST Act.	1009
	Sub-Chapter no. 36.3 SC/ST Act Offences and Public-Order Allegations at Pre-Trial Stage
Caste-abuse allegations at the investigation stage	Where the FIR alleged caste-related abuse and assault causing injury, the Court declined to quash the pending investigation into the alleged SC/ST Act offences. The decision permitted collection of evidence and did not finally determine whether every statutory ingredient was proved.	201
	Sub-Chapter no. 36.4 SC/ST Act Section 3(2)(v) — Caste Nexus, Knowledge and Temporal Amendment
Pre-2016 Section 3(2)(v): proof of caste status and caste-based offence	For conduct before 26 January 2016, Section 3(2)(v) of the SC/ST Act required proof that the offence was committed on the ground of the victim's protected caste or tribal status. Mere knowledge did not satisfy that former test. The later knowledge standard and Section 8(c) presumption could not be applied retrospectively. Here protected status itself was not proved and there was no evidence that the assault occurred because of caste; the conviction under Section 3(2)(v) was set aside.	295
	Sub-Chapter no. 36.5 SC/ST Act Anticipatory Bail Bar and Abuse-of-Process Review
SC/ST anticipatory-bail bar where alleged words and work-payment context are unclear	On a prima facie assessment of the particular FIR and surrounding circumstances, the Court held that the bar under Sections 18 and 18-A of the SC/ST Act might not apply where the actual words allegedly spoken were not disclosed and the State and complainant could not clarify whether the appellants were labourers seeking payment for work under MGNREGA. It accordingly granted conditional anticipatory bail in the Section 14-A(2) appeal. The conclusion was confined to the bail stage and did not finally determine the	505 occurrence or guilt.

Prima facie SC/ST Act inquiry before applying the anticipatory-bail bar	In an appeal seeking anticipatory bail, the Court may examine whether the allegations prima facie disclose an offence under the SC/ST Act before applying its Section 18 bar. Here a Section 250 M.P. Land Revenue Code order had been passed against the complainant party, which had nevertheless not vacated the disputed land, and the incident allegedly occurred on that plot. In those circumstances, the Court could not rule out false or excessive implication or an exercise of private defence. It held the Section 18 bar inapplicable and granted conditional anticipatory bail without determining the merits or finally accepting any defence.	839

Chapter no. 37
Juvenile Justice, Age Inquiry and Children in Conflict with Law

Sub-Chapter no. 37.1
Juvenile Justice Act Section 15 — Preliminary Assessment of Heinous Offences

Scope of preliminary assessment under Section 15 JJ Act	Where a child who has completed sixteen years is alleged to have committed a heinous offence, Section 15 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015 requires assessment of mental and physical capacity, ability to understand the consequences and the circumstances of the alleged offence. The assessment concerns those capacities and is not a trial of guilt.	168
Planned conduct and prima facie capacity assessment	The alleged use of a condom, preparation and sequence of conduct were treated as prima facie indications of mental and physical capacity and awareness of the consequences, including avoidance of forensic detection. The Court found that the alleged incident was not sudden and that the Board's assessment had a factual basis. Finding neither perversity nor a jurisdictional error, it declined interference under Section 102 of the Juvenile Justice Act.	168

JJ Act Procedure, Bail and Rehabilitation

Registration of an institution housing children in need of care and protection	An institution housing children in need of care and protection requires registration under Section 41 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015. The absence of children in conflict with law did not remove that requirement. The Court declined to quash the Section 42 offence where the institution was admittedly unregistered and the records showed children left by parents or without the asserted parental care.	277
Children in need of care and protection under Section 2(14) JJ Act	Section 2(14) of the Juvenile Justice Act includes children without a home or settled abode and without apparent means of subsistence; children without parents and with no one willing to care for and protect them, or who are abandoned or surrendered; and missing or runaway children, or children whose parents cannot be found after reasonable inquiry. These categories were relevant to deciding the institution's registration obligation.	277
Section 12 Juvenile Bail Before Section 15 Preliminary Assessment	The Juvenile Justice Board may decide bail under Section 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 before completing the Section 15 preliminary assessment. Section 12 contains no contrary restriction; assessment concerns whether and how the child is to be tried. Trial commences on framing of charges, and bail may be considered earlier. Grant of bail does not relieve the Board of its duty to pass the required orders under Sections 14, 15 and 18, or displace Section 12's statutory grounds for refusing release.	526
Continuation of Board-Granted Bail Following Transfer to the Children's Court	Bail granted by the Juvenile Justice Board under Section 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 continues until conclusion of trial. Reading the Act with Rule 13 of the 2016 Rules, the Court found no requirement to reconsider bail merely because preliminary assessment leads to trial before the Children's Court as an adult. The different trial and sentencing	526

	routes do not by themselves terminate the existing bail order; the Board must still complete its statutory assessment and related orders.
Juvenility accepted on appeal — Conviction retained and sentence replaced by Board disposition	Acceptance of juvenility need not disturb the finding of guilt. Applying Section 20 of the 2000 Act and Devilal, the Court affirmed the juvenile appellant's convictions but set aside his adult sentence. Having considered the custody already undergone and Section 15(d), it remitted the matter to the jurisdictional Juvenile Justice Board to determine the appropriate fine, rather than fixing the amount itself. The Board was directed to decide within six months.	829
Section 20 Juvenile Justice Act, 2000 — Ordinary court and Board functions	Proceedings covered by Section 20 continue in the ordinary criminal court notwithstanding the later acceptance of juvenility. That court may determine guilt, but instead of imposing an adult sentence it must forward the juvenile to the Board for an appropriate order under the 2000 Act. Juvenility may also be determined after conviction, with the conviction maintained and the sentence set aside for Board disposition.	829

Juvenility Claim and Age Determination of Accused

Conflicting Birth Records Require a Reasoned Reliability Finding	Where school records give different dates of birth, the court must decide which document is more reliable and in accordance with law. A discrepancy does not by itself justify substituting medical age estimation. Here, the proved first-admission register was preferred because the later Class 10 date remained unexplained and the Court found it inconsistent with the permissible age of entry into Class 1 on the schooling progression it considered.	452
Section 94: Medical Age Estimation Is a Documentary-Evidence Fallback	Under Section 94(2)(iii) of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015, ossification or another latest medical age-determination test ordered by the Board or Committee is available only in the absence of the documents specified in clauses (i) and (ii). The available school record could not be displaced by dental and radiological estimates merely because another educational record gave an unexplained different birth date. Finding the respondent an adult on the incident date, the Court set aside the juvenile declaration and directed transfer of the charge-sheet for trial in the regular court with the other accused.	452
Unreliable school birth entry and medical examination for juvenility	A school birth entry cannot be treated as conclusive for juvenility when the parent who supplied it admits that it was deliberately incorrect and his evidence has not been rejected for cogent reasons. Here, the father's consistent admission that he understated the age, together with the inconsistent voter-list entry, made the school record unreliable. With no municipal, corporation or panchayat birth certificate available, the Court held that an ossification or other latest medical age-determination test should have been ordered. It set aside the juvenility finding and remanded for age adjudication after medical examination, without itself fixing the accused's age.	507
Documentary priority before medical age determination under Section 94	Where age is reasonably in doubt, Section 94(2) of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015 provides first for a school date-of-birth certificate or a matriculation or equivalent certificate from the examination board, followed, in their absence, by a birth certificate from a corporation, municipal authority or panchayat. Ossification or another latest medical age-determination test is used only when the prescribed documentary evidence is unavailable. The Court applied that sequence to an unreliable school entry and the absence of the other birth certificate. The statutory provision reproduced in the judgment requires the ordered medical test to be completed within fifteen days.	507
Abeyance of Juvenile Justice Board proceedings pending fresh age adjudication	After setting aside the order declaring the accused juvenile, the Court remanded the age issue to the Sessions Court for a decision after medical examination and directed that the Juvenile Justice Board proceedings remain in abeyance until age was authoritatively adjudicated. The entire remand exercise was ordered to	507

	be completed within one month.
Pending appeal — Under-eighteen juvenility for an offence under the 1986 Act	Section 20 and its Explanation in the Juvenile Justice Act, 2000 require juvenility in pending trials, revisions, appeals and other criminal proceedings to be determined under the under-eighteen definition in Section 2(l), as if it applied when the offence was committed. An accused who was above sixteen but below eighteen at the time of a pre-2000 Act offence receives that benefit even though he was not a male juvenile under the 1986 Act and had become an adult before the 2000 Act commenced.	829
Repeal of the 2000 Juvenile Justice Act — Pending juvenility inquiry	The repeal of the 2000 Act with effect from 15 January 2016 does not defeat the inquiry in which a juvenility claim of this kind is accepted. Section 25 of the 2015 Act preserves that treatment.	829

PCPNDT Act and Reproductive-Health Criminal Regulation

Sub-Chapter no. 38.1
Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act — Rape-Related Pregnancy and Minor Safeguards

Termination of a minor's pregnancy following alleged rape	Applying the MTP Act provisions reproduced in this 2020 decision, the Court authorised termination of a 15-year-old's 12–14 week pregnancy in view of her age, trauma and the Medical Board's high-risk assessment. That framework required one practitioner's good-faith opinion up to 12 weeks and at least two beyond 12 and up to 20 weeks on a risk to life, grave injury to physical or mental health, or substantial risk of serious foetal abnormality, presumed grave mental injury from a pregnancy alleged to result from rape, and required written guardian consent for a minor. Section 5(1) provided a separate exception for termination immediately necessary to save life.	392
Medical safeguards for termination of a high-risk minor's pregnancy	Where the Medical Board found the minor's reproductive organs underdeveloped and the pregnancy high risk, termination was directed with necessary precautions and referral to a medical college for skilled management if required. The Court required the presence of gynaecology, anaesthesia and other necessary specialists, with experienced senior substitutes where the department heads were unavailable, and directed the State to ensure postoperative care.	392
Protection of doctors carrying out a court-authorised termination	Following the protection recognised in the reproduced Shaikh Ayesha Khatoon passage, the Court granted immunity to the doctors participating in the authorised termination against litigation arising out of its order. The protection was tied to their participation in the procedure authorised by that order.	392
Preservation of the foetus for paternity DNA examination	After authorising termination of the minor's pregnancy following alleged rape, the Court directed preservation of the foetus so that DNA could be extracted to establish paternity.	392
Termination of a minor rape survivor's pregnancy after medical assessment	Under the Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act as reproduced and applied in this 2020 decision, anguish from a pregnancy alleged to have been caused by rape was presumed to constitute grave injury to the pregnant woman's mental health. Applying Murugan Nayakkar, the Court considered the minor's age, trauma and the medical-board opinion in allowing the father and daughter's request for termination. The board assessed an approximately eight-to-ten-week pregnancy, advised an early procedure and made fitness conditional on normal investigations. The permission remained subject to medical complications and the applicable statutory safeguards.	955
Specialist presence and State-provided postoperative care for a minor's	Having permitted termination, the Court directed prompt admission and performance of the procedure as early as possible, subject to medical complications. Because of the girl's tender age and possible threat to her life, the heads of gynaecology and anaesthesia and the other specialists were to	955 termination	remain present. If those department heads were unavailable, experienced senior doctors in the relevant fields were to perform the procedure. The State was also directed to ensure postoperative care.

Written guardian consent for termination of a minor's pregnancy	Section 3(4)(a) of the Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act, reproduced in the judgment, required written consent of the guardian before terminating the pregnancy of a woman below eighteen years. The Court treated the prosecutrix as a minor on the school record and considered the request made by her father and herself within that statutory framework. The permission for termination was accompanied by medical safeguards; the judgment did not record a separate finding that written consent had already been obtained.	955
Protection for doctors participating in termination under the Court's order	Following the clinician-protection direction reproduced from Shaikh Ayesha Khatoon, the Court directed that doctors participating in the permitted termination would have immunity in litigation arising out of its order. The protection was expressly tied to the court-authorised process. The medical conditions, specialist requirements and postoperative-care directions continued to govern performance of the procedure.	955
Rape-related pregnancy of a minor — medical assessment and termination under the then-applicable MTP Act	Under Section 3(2) of the Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act as applicable in March 2020, termination beyond twelve weeks and up to twenty weeks required the good-faith opinion of at least two registered medical practitioners on the statutory grounds, subject to the consent requirements. Where pregnancy was alleged to result from rape, the resulting anguish was presumed to cause grave injury to mental health. Applying Murugan Nayakkar, the Court considered the seventeen-year-old petitioner's age, trauma and the Medical Board's assessment of a pregnancy of sixteen weeks and six days. It permitted termination subject to medical complications and correction of anaemia.	1003
Termination of a minor's pregnancy — specialist attendance, correction of anaemia and postoperative care	Permission to terminate the minor's pregnancy was subject to the Medical Board's assessment that she was fit after correction of anaemia. The Court required prompt admission and termination as early as possible, subject to medical complications and specifically after anaemia correction. The heads of the gynaecology and anaesthesia departments and other specialists were to attend; experienced senior doctors could perform the procedure if the departmental heads were unavailable. The State was directed to ensure postoperative care in view of the girl's tender age and the possible threat to her life.	1003
Section 3(4)(a) MTP Act — written guardian consent for termination of a minor's pregnancy	The statutory consent requirement reproduced by the Court provides that the pregnancy of a woman who has not attained eighteen years cannot be terminated without the written consent of her guardian. Section 3(2), under which the Court considered the minor petitioner's pregnancy, was expressly subject to subsection (4). Written guardian consent therefore formed part of the statutory framework set out for termination of a minor's pregnancy.	1003
Court-authorised termination — immunity of participating doctors from litigation arising out of the order	Following Shaikh Ayesha Khatoon, the Court directed that doctors participating in the authorised termination would have immunity in the event of litigation arising out of its order. The protection accompanied permission to perform the procedure in the medically assessed circumstances of the minor petitioner. Its stated scope was litigation arising from the particular judicial order authorising termination.	1003

Section 138 Cheque Prosecution — Insolvency Moratorium and Personal Penal Liability

Section 138 NI Act — signatory's conviction despite initiation of insolvency proceedings	In rejecting a cheque signatory's challenge based on an asserted interim moratorium under Section 96 IBC, the Court applied Ajay Kumar Radheyshyam Goenka and held that initiation of insolvency proceedings did not, by itself, enable the signatory to escape criminal liability or invalidate the Section 138 NI Act conviction on that ground.	54
Section 138 NI Act — penal prosecution distinguished from debt recovery	The Goenka principle relied upon by the Court treats Section 138 NI Act proceedings as penal proceedings for dishonour of a negotiable instrument, carrying imprisonment, fine or both. Their origin in a financial default does not convert them into a civil suit or a proceeding merely to recover the debt with interest. Their penal consequences remain distinct from financial liability under insolvency law.	54
IBC debt extinguishment — effect on personal criminal liability for cheque dishonour	Extinguishment or compromise of a debt through the IBC process does not automatically extinguish the criminal proceedings against a person liable for cheque dishonour. The possibility of partial recovery under a scheme, or of recovering through the insolvency process, does not by itself absolve that person of the penal consequences under Section 138 NI Act.	54
Company resolution or dissolution — continuing liability of natural persons under Section 141 NI Act	Where Section 138 NI Act proceedings have already commenced, subsequent approval of a resolution plan or dissolution of the corporate debtor does not, by itself, terminate the personal penal liability of signatories, directors or other accused covered by Section 141. Difficulty in continuing the prosecution against the corporate debtor does not permit those natural persons to escape prosecution merely on that basis. If the company survives resolution, its erstwhile directors can no longer represent it.	54

Section 138 Cheque Complaint — Amended Territorial Jurisdiction and Pending-Case Validation

Cheque complaints — retrospective payee-bank territorial jurisdiction	For a cheque delivered for collection through an account, Section 142(2)(a) of the Negotiable Instruments Act confers jurisdiction on the court for the bank branch where the payee or holder in due course maintains the account. Section 142-A(1) gives the provision retrospective effect and overrides inconsistent CrPC rules and earlier jurisdictional rulings, including Dashrath Rupsingh Rathod. Applying Bridgestone India, the Court held the complaint at Lahar within territorial jurisdiction and set aside the earlier order to the contrary. Proceedings were to restart after fresh notice to the unserved respondent, who was given liberty to seek recall.	66

Section 143A Interim Compensation — Discretion, Prima Facie Merits, Financial Distress and Quantum

Section 143A NI Act — reasoned discretion and assessment of	The power to award interim compensation under Section 143A of the Negotiable Instruments Act is discretionary. Applying Rakesh Ranjan Shrivastava, the Court explained that brief reasons must address the	303

quantum	complainant's prima facie case, the defence in reply and relevant circumstances, which may include financial distress. A prima facie plausible defence may justify refusal. If compensation is warranted, its amount requires separate consideration of the transaction, the parties' relationship and other relevant factors; the listed considerations are not exhaustive. In declining interference with the 8% award here, the High Court noted both the reduced percentage and the applicant's failure to produce the trial order, which prevented scrutiny of its actual reasons.
Section 143A NI Act — proof of claimed financial distress	Bank-loan default alone was insufficient to establish the accused's claimed bankruptcy. Although financial distress could be considered under Section 143A, the SARFAESI demand notice showed arrears and NPA classification, while no material established bankruptcy or pending proceedings for that purpose. Nor was there evidence of regular instalment payments before the Covid-19 period from which the accused attributed his financial decline. On that record, the Court declined to accept the asserted financial condition as a ground to interfere with the interim-compensation order.	303
	Sub-Chapter no. 40.4 Section 141 NI Act — Director Liability, Complaint Averments and Quashing
Complaint averments for prosecution of a non-signatory director	For prosecution under Sections 138 and 141 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, a non-signatory director's designation alone is insufficient. The complaint must disclose that the director was in charge of and responsible for the company's business at the relevant time, with averments explaining that responsibility. A Managing or Joint Managing Director stands differently by virtue of that office. Read as a whole, the complaint's allegations of daily involvement in running the business, shared profit and loss, and joint responsibility sufficiently supported process against the applicant directors.	641
Quashing director prosecution despite a sufficient basic averment	Even where a complaint contains the basic relevant-time responsibility averment under Section 141 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the High Court may quash proceedings if unimpeachable, incontrovertible material or wholly acceptable circumstances show that the director could not have been concerned and that trial would abuse the court's process. Otherwise, fuller details of the director's role may be established at trial. Section 482 CrPC does not permit a mini-trial or roving factual inquiry at this stage.	641
Trial of director responsibility after refusal to quash	When refusing to quash a cheque-dishonour prosecution within its limited jurisdiction, the High Court's observations about a director's role do not determine liability at trial. The trial court must decide from the evidence whether the applicants were responsible for daily business or were sleeping directors, without being influenced by those preliminary observations.	641
	Chapter no. 41 NDPS Act and Narcotic Offence Procedure
	Sub-Chapter no. 41.1 NDPS Act Section 37 Bail Restrictions and Twin Conditions
NDPS bail on prolonged detention and absence of trial progress	On a second application under Section 439 CrPC, the Court considered approximately ten months of detention and repeated nonappearance of prosecution witnesses, whose absence was conceded by the prosecution. Without reconsidering the earlier rejection on merits, it held that Section 37 NDPS Act did not justify continued custody where the trial had made no progress, even if the prosecution could prima facie show commission of an offence. Detention-based bail to a co-accused also supported relief. Bail was conditional on the trial court verifying that no witness had appeared on 06.09.2022; appearance that day would automatically make the order	100 ineffective.

	Sub-Chapter no. 41.2 NDPS Conscious Possession, Quantity and Presumptions
Whole-mixture quantity under the 2009 NDPS notification and unchallenged acquittal	Clause 4 inserted by notification dated 18.11.2009 applies the scheduled small- and commercial-quantity limits to the entire drug mixture or solution rather than only its pure drug content. The Court therefore disapproved the trial court's use of the pure diacetylmorphine component of the fifteen-gram seizure to exclude Section 21(b) NDPS Act. However, because the acquittal under Section 21(b) had not been challenged, the Court declined to examine its correctness and affirmed the conviction under Section 21(a).	105
Quantity between small and commercial quantity in assessing an NDPS sentence	For the offence under Section 8(c) read with Section 22(b) NDPS Act as adjudicated, quantity greater than small quantity but below commercial quantity attracted imprisonment up to ten years and a fine up to one lakh rupees. Considering the eight grams of smack seized, the Court found no ground to interfere with the sentence of four years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ten thousand rupees.	935
Failure to prove the alleged household recovery of ganja	Once the sole searching officer's evidence was found unreliable, the prosecution also failed to prove that one kilogram and 250 grams of ganja had been recovered from the alleged house of Suraj and Ramkali. The Court considered the unsupported recovery and the lack of reliable house linkage and set aside the separate possession conviction as well as the cultivation convictions.	939
	Sub-Chapter no. 41.3 NDPS Search, Seizure and Statutory Safeguards
Unexplained non-production of seized contraband in an NDPS trial	In the circumstances of the case, unexplained failure to produce the seized ganja at trial was not a mere procedural irregularity. The prosecution did not show court-authorised destruction, and the investigating officer admitted non-production. Applying Jitendra and Ashok alias Dangra Jaiswal, the Court held that oral descriptions and seizure panchnamas did not discharge the burden of proving recovery of the alleged quantity from the accused and set aside the conviction.	186
Section 42 NDPS intimation to higher and immediate superior officers	Section 42 does not prohibit informing a higher officer in addition to the immediate official superior. Information was recorded in the station diary and sent to the SDO(P); after the search, the Dehati Nalishi reached the Town Inspector, the investigating officer's immediate superior, who registered the FIR and took over investigation. Noting the statutory seventy-two-hour period, the Court found compliance on this record.	935
Directory duties under Sections 52 and 57 NDPS Act	Sections 52 and 57 NDPS Act are directory rather than mandatory. Applying Gurbax Singh, the Court rejected the noncompliance objection: the arrest was promptly reported to the immediate superior officer, who took over investigation, and the handling required by Section 52 was also found to have been followed.	935
	Sub-Chapter no. 41.4 NDPS Act Section 50 — Personal Search and Mandatory Communication of Right
Recovery from hand-carried bags distinguished from body search	Where contraband was recovered from separate polythene bags carried in the accused's hands, the Court treated the recovery as a bag search rather than a search of the accused's body.	261
NDPS Section 50 — bag recovery after an unproductive	Where no contraband was recovered from the accused's body or clothes and ganja was recovered from the bag he carried, the Court applied Ranjan Kumar Chadha to hold that Section 50 compliance was not required for that bag	327

personal search	recovery. An alleged discrepancy in the notice therefore did not defeat the prosecution. The Court followed the narrated distinction between personal search and independently proved recovery from a bag, vehicle or container. It did not approve the disputed notice for a case in which recovery depended on a personal search.
NDPS Section 50 — strict communication of the personal-search right	When Section 50 applies to a personal search, the empowered officer must inform the suspect of the right to be searched before a Gazetted Officer or Magistrate and honour the option if exercised. No prescribed written form is necessary, but awareness of the right and strict compliance are required. The Jadeja and Baldev Singh passages reproduced through Ranjan Kumar Chadha explain that non-compliance makes personal recovery suspect and vitiates a conviction based only on that recovery; it does not automatically exclude other independently proved evidence. The present conviction rested on recovery from the bag.	327
NDPS Section 50 — plain statutory meaning and limits on judicial extension	The Ranjan Kumar Chadha passages applied by the Court reject extension of Section 50 to an accompanying object merely by treating it as part of the person. Clear statutory language governs, and courts cannot supply a legislative omission simply to address a perceived risk of misuse. The reproduced construction principles also require the statute to be read as a whole and recognise that an omission is not readily inferred; any exceptional supply of an omission requires clear necessity and a reason found within the statute itself. That reasoning supports the confined meaning of personal search applied to this bag recovery.	327
Communication of the Section 50 NDPS right before personal search	Recovery from clothing worn by the accused is a personal search attracting Section 50 NDPS Act. The suspect must be informed of the right to search before a Gazetted Officer or Magistrate, and strict compliance is required. No prescribed words or separate explanation of the section number is necessary if the right itself is effectively communicated. Compliance must be assessed from the evidence in each case, and knowledge of the safeguard cannot simply be presumed. Here, the written notice conveyed the right before the appellant consented in writing to search by the investigating officer. Search by a female officer also satisfied Section 50(4). Failure to communicate the right would render the recovery suspect and vitiate a conviction based solely on that personal recovery.	935

NDPS Cannabis Cultivation — Conscious Act and Proof Linking the Accused to the Crop

Proof of conscious cultivation of cannabis under Section 20 NDPS Act	Cultivation under Section 20 presupposes a conscious act attributable to the accused and proved beyond reasonable doubt. Revenue entries showing ownership did not establish that Ram Singh cultivated the alleged plants or exclusively possessed the field. He was absent during the search, and the purported land identification and seizure rested on the other accused's statements without reliable proof connecting the plants to his land. The Court also considered the absence of notice or consent in assessing the search conducted behind his back. Cultivation by him was not proved.	939
Visual disability and corroborative evidence in proving cannabis cultivation	The later date of the Medical Board's disability certificate did not justify disregarding it where the searching officer admitted that Suraj had limited vision at the search. The Court assessed that admission with the medical evidence, the Patwari's inspections showing no crop in the relevant year, and the failure reliably to identify the alleged cultivation plot. Ramkali had no recorded land and was not reliably connected to cultivation. On the combined evidence, cultivation by the accused was not established beyond reasonable doubt.	939

PMLA, Economic, Financial, Corporate, Tax and Customs Offences

Sub-Chapter no. 42.1
Negotiable Instruments Act — Cheque Dishonour, Statutory Presumptions and Prosecution

Amendment correcting the transaction already described in the statutory notice	The Section 138 complaint mistakenly described the cheque as repayment of a personal loan, although the statutory notice had already identified the advertising debt. In these circumstances, the application to correct the complaint, filed before cross-examination of the complainant though after framing of charge, should not have been rejected as belated or as changing its nature. The Court allowed the amendment to reflect the transaction stated in the notice.	176
Prosecution of the sole proprietor without separately arraigning the trade name	A sole proprietary concern is the proprietor's business name, not a company or partnership distinct from him. Section 141 of the Negotiable Instruments Act therefore does not require a separate prosecution of that concern. The proprietor who drew the cheque could be prosecuted alone despite the absence of separate statutory notice to, or arraignment of, the proprietary trade name.	176
Section 142 complaint in the name of a proprietary concern that is the payee	Section 142 requires a written complaint by the payee or holder in due course. Where a proprietary concern is named as payee, the Section 138 complaint may be filed in that trade name through its proprietor. The concern has no legal identity distinct from the proprietor; the manner of representing the payee is governed by general law rather than Section 142 itself.	176
Rebuttal of the statutory presumption of cheque debt	Once execution of the cheque is proved or admitted, Sections 118 and 139 of the Negotiable Instruments Act raise rebuttable presumptions of consideration and discharge of debt or liability. The accused need not disprove the debt beyond reasonable doubt or necessarily lead direct evidence; probable facts or circumstances may suffice. Bare denial does not. Here the unsupported theft account, undisputed signature and evidence of advertising services left the presumption unrebutted.	176
Bank return memo without a seal may be proved by other evidence	Section 146 of the Negotiable Instruments Act provides a presumption of dishonour for a bank memo bearing the official mark; it does not make a bank seal the exclusive means of proving the memo. The officer-signed memo, considered with the bank witness's evidence and the undisputed insufficiency of funds, was proved on this record despite the missing seal.	176
Court's application of Section 143 to a one-year sentence after reversal of acquittal	After reversing the Section 138 acquittal, the Court imposed one year's rigorous imprisonment and compensation. It construed Section 143 as dispensing with a separate hearing on sentence because it did not intend to impose imprisonment exceeding one year. That construction was the stated basis for proceeding directly to sentence in this appeal.	176
Completion of a signed blank cheque by another person	A person who signs a cheque and hands it to the payee remains liable unless the statutory presumption of debt or liability is rebutted. If a signed blank cheque is voluntarily delivered towards payment, the payee may fill in its particulars; a different hand or ink does not by itself invalidate an otherwise valid cheque. The requirement of voluntary delivery remains material, and the Court separately rejected the alleged theft on the evidence.	176
Cheque-dishonour trial need not await an absconding co-accused	The trial against accused persons who are before the court cannot be kept pending merely to await an absconding co-accused. A partner's fear that the entire civil liability might fall on him did not justify postponement. The firm was itself prosecuted, the applicant did not deny his partnership and the cheque also bore his signature; proceedings against him could continue without deciding his ultimate guilt or civil liability.	177
Correction of a	A simple, curable defect in a criminal complaint may be corrected by formal	225

cheque number mistakenly stated in a Section 138 complaint	amendment despite the absence of an express enabling provision in the CrPC, provided the amendment causes no prejudice. Where the cheque, return memo and statutory notice gave the correct cheque number and only the complaint misstated it, correction of that number was a formal amendment that did not affect maintainability.
Correct statutory notice distinguished from a complaint-only cheque-number error	A statutory notice is a prerequisite to maintaining a complaint under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. The Court distinguished a case in which the notice itself stated an incorrect cheque number, observing that such an error undermined the complaint's foundation. Here the notice identified the correct cheque, so correction of the number in the complaint did not suffer from that defect.	225
Signed Blank Cheque and Prima Facie Authority to Complete Its Entries	Referring to Section 20 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the Court stated that signing and issuing a blank cheque permits a prima facie presumption that the payee is authorised to complete the remaining entries. It considered that principle with the husband's initial bank email, which did not deny his signature, while refusing quashing. The disputed counter-investigation remained pending.	456
Stage-based costs for compounding cheque-dishonour offences	The Damodar S. Prabhu guidelines reproduced and applied by the Court allow compounding without costs at the first or second hearing. At a later stage before the Magistrate, the stated cost is 10% of the cheque amount, payable to the Legal Services Authority or another authority the court considers fit. Compounding before the Sessions Court or High Court in appeal or revision attracts 15%, and before the Supreme Court 20%. The Court applied the 15% cheque-amount condition to this revision.	609
Arraignment of the company for prosecution of directors under Section 141 NI Act	Commission of the offence by the company is a condition precedent to the vicarious liability contemplated by Section 141 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. Arraigning the company as an accused is imperative, and liability of the other persons depends on the necessary averments and proof. Where the company that drew the cheque was not arraigned, the applicants could not be prosecuted merely in their capacity as its directors; the complaint against them was quashed.	612
Statutory demand notice to the drawer company	For a cheque drawn by a company, the statutory demand must be addressed to the drawer company in compliance with the proviso to Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. Notice issued only to the cheque's signatory did not satisfy that requirement here. The company had neither received the statutory demand nor been made an accused, and the prosecution of the applicants as directors was therefore unsustainable.	612
Non-Filing of Income-Tax Returns Does Not by Itself Disprove a Loan	Failure to file an income-tax return or disclose income in it does not by itself establish that a complainant lacked the means to advance a loan. Tax compliance is a matter between the assessee and the revenue authorities. For a prosecution under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the existence of the loan and legally recoverable debt must be assessed from the entire evidence. The Court considered the complainant's explanation of his funds together with the statutory presumption and the inconsistent defence, and declined to draw an adverse inference solely from the absence of income-tax returns.	652
Completion of Particulars on a Signed Cheque by the Payee	The fact that the payee or another person filled in the remaining particulars of a signed cheque does not by itself absolve the drawer of liability under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. Applying the narrated reasoning in Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar, the Court recognised that, where signature and voluntary delivery are not displaced and no contrary circumstances are proved, subsequent completion of an unfilled signed cheque is not an alteration. Here, the drawer's earlier notice disputed the other entries without disputing her	652

	signature, and her later defence was rejected on the evidence.
Assessment of a Belated Signature Denial and Inconsistent Cheque-Theft Defence	In assessing the drawer's theft and forgery defence, the Court considered her inconsistent accounts of where the cheque was stolen, her conflicting statements about acquaintance with the complainant and her attempt to disown her counsel's notice. It also considered the absence of a theft FIR, her failure to seek expert examination despite the complainant's application, her admission of resemblance to the bank specimen signature and the bank's return of the cheque because the account was blocked rather than for a signature mismatch. Taken together, these circumstances supported rejection of the defence and the finding that the cheque discharged a legal liability.	652
Raising and Rebutting the Presumptions of Consideration and Debt	Once execution of the cheque is proved or admitted, Sections 118 and 139 of the Negotiable Instruments Act raise rebuttable presumptions of consideration and discharge of debt or liability. Applying Kishan Rao v. Shankargouda and the narrated Kumar Exports v. Sharma Carpets principles, the Court recognised that the accused need not invariably lead direct evidence of the negative. Facts or circumstances making the absence of consideration or debt sufficiently probable may shift the burden back to the complainant. Bare denial is insufficient; the presumption survives until rebutted by such material.	652
Absence of a Bank Transfer or Loan Receipt in a Cheque-Dishonour Case	Applying the narrated Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar reasoning, the Court recognised that a loan's having been advanced without a cheque or demand draft, or without obtaining a receipt, does not by itself defeat a Section 138 prosecution. The statutory presumption and the evidence concerning signature, issue of the cheque and the asserted debt remain material. Absence of those forms of documentation alone does not place the entire burden of proving the advance afresh on the complainant once the presumption operates.	652
Adequacy of Sentence for an Unpaid Dishonoured Cheque	The narrated Suganthi Suresh Kumar v. Jagdeeshan principle requires a sentence under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act to give effect to the legislation's object where the cheque amount remains unpaid; a merely token sentence may defeat that object. The Court nevertheless left the trial court's lenient punishment of admonition undisturbed because the complainant had not challenged it, while affirming the compensation. The non-interference with admonition was expressly based on the circumstances of this case.	652
Successive cheque presentation and a fresh cause of action under Section 138	MSR Leathers permits a cheque to be presented again during its validity, even after an earlier dishonour and demand notice. A later dishonour may support a fresh notice and prosecution if all conditions in the proviso to Section 138 are satisfied. Failure to prosecute the first default does not confer immunity on the drawer, though prosecution may be launched only once on the selected qualifying default. This rule requires a fresh presentation and dishonour; it does not validate repeated notices on the same old dishonour.	762
Cheque amount stated differently in words and figures	Under Section 18 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the amount stated in words controls where it differs from the amount in figures. The Court therefore considered the bank's return of the cheque for that discrepancy prima facie unwarranted, while noting that the bank had not been made a party. The provision did not resolve whether the drawer deliberately created the discrepancy or prevent consideration of the Section 420 IPC charge.	788
Concurrent prosecution under Section 138 NI Act and Section 420 IPC	Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act and Section 420 IPC have different ingredients, so overlapping facts do not bar simultaneous prosecution. The adopted Sangeetaben passage distinguishes Section 138's rebuttable presumption of antecedent liability and absence of a requirement to prove fraudulent intention on issuance from the IPC offence's relevant mens rea. An NI Act case requires a complaint, unlike the IPC prosecution; the quoted passage also distinguishes adjustment of an NI Act fine towards the legally enforceable liability. Availability of a cheque-dishonour remedy therefore does	788

	not exclude a distinct cheating charge.
Section 141 NI Act — pleading control of the company's business	A complaint must allege that the persons prosecuted under Section 141 NI Act were responsible for the company's day-to-day business when the offence was committed. Describing the applicants as the company's 'Karta Dharta' and authorised signatories, and alleging that they delivered its cheque with an assurance of encashment, supplied the necessary basic averment. Although inartfully worded, 'Karta Dharta' conveyed management of the company's daily affairs and justified cognizance and summons.	803
Section 138 NI Act — balance-price cheque where the seller has not conveyed the land	Where a cheque represented the balance price under an agreement to sell, the seller had not executed the sale deed and the buyer stopped payment, the Court found that the cheque did not discharge a legally recoverable debt. Time was not the essence of the agreement. The civil court's refusal of specific performance and direction to refund the buyer's ₹8.5 lakh advance with 6% interest further established that the seller could recover no balance from the buyer. The Court distinguished a case in which the seller had executed the sale deed but payment was then stopped, and quashed the Section 138 complaint.	804
Distinct requirements of cheque dishonour and IPC prosecution	Section 138 NI Act does not require proof of fraudulent or dishonest intention when the cheque is issued, whereas the relevant mental element must be established in the IPC prosecution. The NI Act provides a rebuttable presumption that the cheque discharges an antecedent liability, requires institution by complaint and provides for a fine to be adjusted against the legally enforceable liability. Those requirements do not govern the IPC offences. Overlap in cheque-related facts therefore does not make the offences identical.	924
Insufficient funds with an additional alteration or signature endorsement under Section 138	A cheque returned for insufficient funds does not fall outside Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act merely because the bank also states that an alteration requires the drawer’s full signature. The Court applied the purposive interpretation in Laxmi Dyechem and the reproduced discussion in Santosh Kumar Gupta: technical signature-related reasons cannot automatically displace the real reason for dishonour. The trial court had found issuance in discharge of legal liability and non-payment despite statutory notice. Because insufficient funds was also an established reason for return, the additional alteration endorsement did not justify acquittal. The Court set aside that perverse finding and convicted the respondent under Section 138.	954
Repeated presentation of a cheque and prosecution on a later default	Relying on MSR Leathers, the Court recognised that a cheque holder may present the cheque repeatedly and institute prosecution on a second or successive default. Here, the cheque was presented again after the first return, and the second dishonour for insufficient funds together with an alteration endorsement did not prevent prosecution under Section 138. The Court considered the subsequent statutory notice and non-payment in sustaining the complaint.	954
The court must determine cheque-signature genuineness rather than accept the bank’s endorsement mechanically	A banker’s statement that a signature differs is not conclusive proof that the signature is not genuine or that Section 138 is inapplicable. In the Devan passage reproduced through Santosh Kumar Gupta and relied upon by the Court, genuineness and execution are questions for judicial determination, together with the real cause of dishonour. If the court finds on evidence that the signature is not genuine, the instrument cannot be treated as the drawer’s cheque attracting Section 138. A mere mismatch endorsement therefore requires a different assessment from a judicial finding of a non-genuine signature.	954
Signature-related dishonour, statutory notice and the rebuttable presumption of liability	The principles reproduced from Laxmi Dyechem recognise that signature mismatch or a change in the authorised signatory may cause dishonour even without an intention to prevent payment. Such dishonour is not an offence by itself: the statutory notice and opportunity to pay, followed by failure to pay within the prescribed time, remain material. Whether a legally recoverable debt	954

	or liability existed is determined on the evidence, subject to the rebuttable statutory presumption of valid consideration. The Court applied that framework where the respondent failed to pay after notice and the trial court's finding of legal liability was affirmed.
Punitive, compensatory and restitutive purposes of cheque-dishonour proceedings	Following R. Vijayan v. Baby as narrated in the judgment, the Court recognised that Chapter XVII of the Negotiable Instruments Act serves punitive, compensatory and restitutive purposes. It provides a common process for enforcing criminal liability for dishonour and the civil liability to realise the cheque amount. That purpose informs the interpretation of Section 138 and the exercise of the power to award compensation, rather than treating the proceedings solely as a means of punishment.	954
	Sub-Chapter no. 42.2 Customs, GST, Tax and Corporate Criminal Prosecutions
Company cheque: arraignment and demand notice before vicarious director liability	Where a director signs a company cheque on its behalf to discharge the company's liability, the company is the principal accused. The director cannot be prosecuted vicariously when the company is neither arraigned nor given the statutory demand notice under Section 138 NI Act. The complaint and cheque showed that the ₹13 lakh settlement arose from investment in the company, rather than an independent personal debt. Applying Himanshu, the Court dismissed the complaint; the reproduced precedent also rejects later company arraignment without compliance with the demand-notice proviso.	442
	Sub-Chapter no. 42.3 Negotiable Instruments Act Section 138 — Cheque Presentation, Statutory Notice and Cause of Action
Cumulative statutory conditions and pleading of a Section 138 offence	An offence under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act requires presentation of the cheque within six months of drawing or its validity period, whichever is earlier; a written demand to the drawer within thirty days after receipt of the bank's information of dishonour; and the drawer's failure to pay within fifteen days after receipt of that notice. The complaint must contain factual allegations constituting the statutory ingredients. These cumulative conditions must be satisfied before dishonour constitutes the offence.	612
Repeated notices on one dishonour do not restart the Section 138 notice period	Where a cheque has been presented only once, successive notices based on that dishonour do not extend the thirty-day period for issuing the statutory demand notice. A later notice outside that period cannot support the prosecution merely because earlier notices were returned unserved and the later notice was refused. Applying its Devendra Prajapati ruling, the Court restored dismissal of the complaint on this ground.	762

Identity theft through the abductee's ATM card and PIN	Section 66-C of the Information Technology Act penalises fraudulent or dishonest use of another person's electronic signature, password or unique identification feature. On proof that Kamal Kishore obtained the abductee's ATM card and PIN and that withdrawals followed from the abductee's account, the Court upheld his liability even if he had passed the credentials to another person who operated the ATM. Missing CCTV footage left the actual operator unidentified but did not, on the total evidence, defeat his conviction.	183

	Chapter no. 44 Arms, Explosives, Excise, Gambling and Public Safety Statutes
	Sub-Chapter no. 44.1 Arms Act Section 17 — Licence Suspension for Public Peace and Safety
Household access to a licensed firearm and public-safety risk	In assessing suspension under Section 17 Arms Act, the authorities could consider the risk that the licensee's husband might access the firearm kept in their shared home. His continuing criminal activities and violent resistance to police and forest authorities supplied a reasoned basis for apprehending danger to public peace and safety. In those circumstances, the fact that the licence stood in the wife's name did not invalidate suspension.	213
Earlier acquittals and renewal in assessing firearm-licence suspension	Acquittals resulting from witnesses turning hostile did not, on this record, undermine the authorities' public-safety assessment. Renewal of the licence could indicate that earlier criminal cases had been overlooked, but continuing criminal activity after renewal remained relevant. The Court therefore found no fault with the subjective satisfaction supporting suspension.	213
Public peace and safety as grounds for licence suspension	The licensing authority may suspend or revoke an arms licence when it considers action necessary for public peace or public safety, upon subjective satisfaction supported by the material. Applying Abdul Saleem, the Court treated public peace as public tranquillity and order, and public safety as protection of the public from danger, beyond an effect on an individual alone. Pending or disposed criminal cases may be considered with due care where use, misuse or a threat involving the weapon is established, and the sufficiency of material and degree of danger require examination in each case.	213
Reasons and hearing in arms-licence action	An order suspending or revoking an arms licence must record reasons. A brief statement of those reasons must be furnished to the holder on demand unless disclosure is withheld in the public interest. The Court also reiterated that revocation requires an opportunity of hearing to the affected person.	213
Writ review of a reasoned public-safety assessment	Where the authorities' subjective satisfaction that an arms licence poses a threat to public peace or safety rests on cogent reasons and the record, the High Court does not reassess it as an appellate authority. Applying that limit, the Court upheld the suspension supported by the material before the licensing and appellate authorities.	213
	Sub-Chapter no. 44.2 Arms Act — Possession, Licence and Proof Requirements
Arms Act conviction: seizure evidence considered with corroborating murder evidence	The Court upheld Satish's conviction under Sections 25(1-B)(a) and 27 of the Arms Act on the evidence accepted in this case. The investigating officer proved the memorandum and seizure of the country-made firearm in witnesses' presence and stated that permission had been obtained from the concerned Magistrate for registering the Arms Act offence. The recovery evidence was considered with the other material connecting the weapons to the murder. The judgment did not formulate a rule that recovery alone proves every ingredient of those offences.	45
Arms conviction based on an unconcealed open-drain recovery	Recovery of a pistol from a drain near the accused's house did not establish the exclusive knowledge needed on this record. The prosecution did not show that the pistol was buried or otherwise hidden, and its dry condition supported the inference that the drain was dry and the weapon openly accessible. The Court therefore set aside the conviction under Section 25(1)(1-b)(a) Arms Act.	216
Proof of prosecution sanction after inspection of the seized firearm	Where the sanction order expressly recorded that the District Magistrate had inspected the seized firearm, the sanction was not invalidated by showing that the witness who formally proved the order had not himself seen it. That witness was not the sanctioning authority, and no question was put alleging that the	247

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	District Magistrate had failed to inspect the firearm.
Refusal to reduce the minimum sentence under Section 25(1-B)(a) Arms Act	Because the trial court had imposed the applicable minimum term of one year's rigorous imprisonment for the Section 25(1-B)(a) Arms Act offence, the High Court found no basis to interfere with that sentence and the accompanying ₹500 fine and default imprisonment.	247
Missing Malkhana register assessed with proof of sealed production for sanction	The missing Malkhana register did not unsettle the concurrent finding of firearm seizure in this case. The Collectorate arms clerk testified that the pistol was produced in a sealed condition and that the Collector examined the case diary and opened the sealed firearm before granting prosecution sanction. The Court considered that evidence while rejecting the custody objection.	257
Proof of unlicensed pistol possession despite a hostile independent witness	The prosecution case could not be rejected merely because the independent witness did not support it. The Court affirmed the conviction under Section 25(1-B)(a) Arms Act where no reason was shown to disbelieve the police witnesses' evidence of seizure and identity. Their evidence was considered with the armourer's report that the pistol was working when examined and the proof of prosecution sanction, despite the pistol no longer working when produced in court.	267
Unlicensed firearm possession proved with recovery and forensic evidence	The Court affirmed the conviction under Section 25(1-B)(a) of the Arms Act on proof of recovery of a country-made pistol and live cartridge, the firearm's working condition and its forensic connection with the bullet recovered from the deceased. The accused produced no licence authorising possession of that pistol.	275
Arms recovery — seizure before formal arrest and proof of possession	Formal arrest before seizure is not a prerequisite to a valid search. Where the firearm had already been seized before the recorded time of arrest, a witness's statement that no article was found at formal arrest did not contradict the earlier recovery or establish absence of firearm possession.	312
Section 25(1-B)(a) Arms Act — minimum sentence and reduction to time served	The Court treated one year's imprisonment as the statutory minimum for the offence under Section 25(1-B)(a) of the Arms Act and refused reduction of the sentence to the shorter period already undergone by the applicant.	312
Failure to connect recovered firearms with the crime — effect on direct evidence	Proof that weapons were recovered did not establish that they were the weapons used in the offence. After excluding the FSL report, the Court treated the failure to connect the seized weapons with the crime as non-recovery of the actual weapons. Recovery of the weapon used is not indispensable to conviction, and its absence did not undermine the otherwise reliable direct eyewitness evidence.	319
Arms Act prosecution — sanction based on a substituted firearm could not sustain the Section 27 conviction	The seizure memo and investigating officer identified a .12-bore firearm, whereas the armourer, forensic examination and sanction concerned a .315-bore firearm. The Court inferred substitution in the prosecution chain and treated the sanction based on inspection of the different firearm as invalid in this prosecution. The resulting failure to prove the offence weapon required setting aside the recorded Section 27 Arms Act conviction, while the separately proved Section 302 IPC conviction remained intact.	638
Unexplained firearm sealing gaps and missing ammunition	The prosecution failed to prove the gun seizures beyond reasonable doubt because it did not explain who resealed the guns after the armourer returned them open, or who opened them after the District Magistrate's office had resealed them. The guns reached court unsealed, the seizure memos lacked a specimen seal, and the removed gunpowder and pellets were unaccounted for. These deficiencies led the Court to set aside the Arms Act convictions of all four appellants.	716
Proof supporting separate Arms Act convictions	Proof of recovery of the pistol from Kunjilal, the cartridge-to-pistol forensic link and reliable evidence of his firing supported his separate Arms Act convictions. The Court also recorded due prosecution sanction and upheld his	761

	convictions under Section 25(1-B)(a) and Section 27, the latter read with Sections 11/13 of the MPDVPK Act. The finding concerned Kunjilal alone, and his sentences remained concurrent under the trial order.
Scene recovery of a firearm and doubtful attribution of its use	Recovery of the gun from the scene did not establish its use by the appellant beyond reasonable doubt in the circumstances of this case. The gun was not seized from his possession, and the unexplained serious injuries to the accused, suppressed origin of the incident and disputed possession made the allegation that he fired doubtful. The Court consequently set aside the Section 27 Arms Act and related hurt convictions. Its conclusion rested on the combined evidentiary defects, rather than on a general rule that recovery from the scene is insufficient.	923
Proof supporting conviction under Sections 25 and 27 Arms Act	The seizure witnesses proved recovery of the country-made pistol from Mukesh, the prosecution sanction was proved, and the armourer proved the ballistic report without cross-examination. On that evidence, the Court upheld his conviction under Sections 25 and 27 of the Arms Act.	934
Use of the father's licensed firearm under Section 30 of the Arms Act	The Court upheld Pawan's conviction under Section 30 of the Arms Act on the ground that he had used his father's licensed mouzer gun in the shooting. This was the specific basis stated for affirming that conviction together with the murder conviction. Khemraj, whose alleged participation with another firearm was not proved beyond reasonable doubt, was acquitted of all charges, including his Section 30 charge.	951

Prevention of Corruption Act and Public Servant Criminal Liability

Sub-Chapter no. 45.1
Sanction for Corruption Prosecution and Competent Authority

Proof of sanction without examining the sanctioning authority	A sanction order may be proved by a witness who can identify the sanctioning authority's signature. Application of mind may be established from the facts and grounds stated in the sanction itself or by independent evidence of the material placed before the authority and its resulting satisfaction. The sanction file was produced and the office witness's relevant evidence was not effectively challenged.	224
Actual failure of justice required for appellate interference over sanction defects	Under Section 19(3) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, a conviction or other order of the Special Judge cannot be reversed or altered in appeal merely because of absence of sanction or an error, omission or irregularity in it. Actual failure of justice must be found. The court must examine real prejudice and consider whether the objection could and should have been raised earlier.	224
Special Judge's power to examine validity of sanction at trial	The restriction on appellate or revisional interference in Section 19(3) does not prevent the Special Judge from holding the prosecution not maintainable for want of valid sanction under Section 19(1). The trial court's power to examine that requirement is distinct from the higher court's duty to consider actual failure of justice after a completed trial.	224
Administrative nature of sanction and limits of judicial scrutiny	Grant of sanction is an administrative function requiring prima facie satisfaction that the relevant facts constitute an offence. The prosecution must prove valid sanction, but the reviewing court does not sit in appeal over the adequacy of the material. Where the authority considered the material, failure to prove some of it does not itself invalidate sanction, and validity should not be tested through a merely technical approach.	224
Section 19 PC Act—2018 sanction amendment and a pre-amendment case	Following Kavindra Kiyawat and the reproduced Katti Nagaseshanna reasoning, the Court treated the 2018 amendment extending sanction protection to retired public servants as prospective. In this case, registration of the offence in 2013 and retirement in 2016 meant that the later closure report and	417

	cognizance in 2021 did not, merely because of their date, require sanction under the amended provision.
Proof of prosecution sanction and appellate failure-of-justice requirement	The prosecution must prove that the competent authority considered the relevant facts before granting sanction; the sanction order itself or other evidence may establish that consideration. Here, the detailed order of 26 July 2016 and the record-producing witness's proof of the authority's signature established application of mind. No timely request to examine the sanctioning authority or resulting failure of justice was shown. Under Section 19(3)–(4) PC Act, the Court rejected appellate interference, while recognising that the Special Judge may insist on valid sanction at trial.	441
Administrative character and scope of scrutiny of prosecution sanction	Grant of prosecution sanction is an administrative function requiring prima facie satisfaction that the relevant facts constitute an offence. The court does not sit in appeal over the adequacy of the material placed before the authority. Where all relevant material was considered, later failure to prove some of it does not by itself invalidate sanction. Sanction remains a safeguard against vexatious prosecution, but its validity is not tested through a pedantic or hypertechnical approach.	441
Corruption sanction: proof of application of mind without examining the sanctioning officer	The prosecution must establish a competent authority's prima facie satisfaction on the relevant facts. That may appear from the sanction order itself or be proved by other evidence of the material placed before the authority. The order may be proved through a witness who identifies the sanctioning officer's signature; examination of that officer is not invariably necessary. Sanction is an administrative safeguard, and the court does not sit in appeal over the adequacy of the material or test the order hypertechnically. The Court found the sanction's contents showed due application of mind.	879
Section 19 PC Act: appellate interference for sanction defects requires failure of justice	Under Section 19(3)–(4), appellate or revisional interference on the ground of absence, error, omission or irregularity in sanction requires actual failure of justice caused by the defect. The court must consider whether the objection could and should have been raised earlier. This appellate restraint does not prevent the Special Judge from addressing want of valid sanction at trial. Here the incorrect trap date in the sanction order was treated as a typing mistake, and no resulting failure of justice was demonstrated.	879
Timely objection to proof of sanction through a signature-identifying witness	Where the sanction was proved through a witness identifying the sanctioning authority's signature, the defence did not object at that stage that examination of the authority was needed for its application-of-mind challenge. The Court held that such an objection should have been raised in time to allow the prosecution to examine the authority; it could not later be taken by surprise through a claim that non-examination alone made the sanction unproved. The contents of the order remained available for assessing application of mind.	879
	Sub-Chapter no. 45.2 Demand, Acceptance and Proof of Illegal Gratification
Bribe for an official favour beyond the public servant's actual powers	A public servant cannot avoid liability for demanding and accepting illegal gratification merely because he lacked power to perform the promised official act or did not intend to perform it. It is sufficient that he induced payment by representing that he could secure the official favour. The presenting officer's lack of power to close the departmental inquiry did not answer the demand-and-acceptance charge.	224
Proof of demand and acceptance of a bribe for mutation	The prosecution proved that the Patwari demanded Rs 900 for mutation and accepted the money. His admitted receipt, considered with the proved demand and the failure of his loan-repayment explanation, established guilt under Sections 7 and 13(1)(d) read with Section 13(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act beyond reasonable doubt.	252

45.3 : Presumption under Corruption Law and Rebuttal

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Circumstantial proof of bribe demand despite a hostile complainant	The Court inferred the ₹3,000 demand from the proved complaints, signed transcript, trap circumstances, positive hand wash, refusal of a voice sample and pending partition work, despite the complainant's denial at trial. The original recording was not played and there was no scientific voice match; the conclusion rested on the combined evidence. The adopted Section 114 Evidence Act reasoning permits logical inference from proved facts, while cautioning against building a further discretionary presumption on another presumption. The pending larger-bench reference was not treated as a final resolution of the disputed question.	441
Bribe recipient's apparent ability to assist despite lack of final decision-making power	Applying the narrated Section 161 IPC principle, the Court held that a public servant's lack of power to make the final official decision does not defeat liability where gratification is sought or accepted by holding out assistance and the giver acts on that belief. The Patwari had prepared the partition documents and the matter remained pending before the Tahsildar; the complainant still regarded him as able to help. His unauthorised acceptance of affidavits and unequal proposal supported the finding of a continuing corrupt role. The appeal did not finally determine the parties' property rights.	441
Apparent authority in a demand for illegal gratification	In assessing the alleged demand, the material consideration was the payer's bona fide impression of the officer's authority, rather than whether the officer actually possessed that authority. The applicant's asserted lack of power to order offline distribution did not defeat investigation if the shopkeepers believed that the instructions came from competent officials. The Court applied this principle at the prima facie stage and did not determine that gratification had been paid or guilt proved.	600
Demand and acceptance through an intermediary in a corruption trap	The Court found demand and directed receipt of ₹7,000 for demarcation proved by the recorded negotiations, the Revenue Inspector's direction to contact the Patwari, the trap evidence and her instruction to hand the money to the intermediary in their presence. Recovery from the intermediary, rather than either officer, and the officers' negative phenolphthalein tests did not displace that combined proof. The convictions under Sections 7 and 13(1)(d) read with Section 13(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act and Section 120-B IPC were sustained.	879
Fabricated rejection records did not rebut the pending-work bribery case	The defence that the demarcation application had already been finally rejected failed on the record. Under the applicable Section 129 MPLRC procedure and the circular dated 28 January 2014, the Revenue Inspector carried out demarcation, while the final decision belonged to the designated Tahsildar. The alleged rejection papers conflicted with each other, lacked the required proof and were absent from the contemporaneously attested seized file. The Court found later fabrication after the originals were returned, reinforced by the evidence that the proceedings remained pending, and rejected the asserted prior disposal.	879
Bribery: actual power to provide the promised official assistance is not essential	A public servant who induces payment by holding out that official assistance or favour will be provided cannot escape liability merely because the servant lacked actual power or did not intend to provide it. The Court applied the reproduced Chaturdas Bhagwandas Patel reasoning, originally concerning Section 161 IPC, to reject the Patwari's claimed lack of authority. It also found that her actual demarcation role and conduct supported the complainant's belief in her influence.	879

Presumption under Corruption Law and Rebuttal

Proved demand and acceptance with the Section 20	Where the demand was unchallenged and acceptance and recovery of the tainted amount were proved, the Court considered that evidence together with the presumption under Section 20 of the Prevention of Corruption Act and	224

presumption	affirmed the conviction. Its conclusion rested on the proved demand and acceptance, rather than recovery in isolation.
Section 20 presumption and an unproved loan-repayment explanation	Where receipt of the money was admitted and the alleged loan repayment was not proved, the Court applied the presumption under Section 20 of the Prevention of Corruption Act. The complainant denied executing the photocopied loan acknowledgment, the original and attesting witnesses were not produced, and the document was given to a later investigator more than a year after the trap. Those circumstances did not substantiate the asserted innocent explanation.	252
Foundational proof and rebuttal of the corruption-law presumption	The Section 20 PC Act provision reproduced by the Court presumes the specified corrupt motive or reward once the public servant's acceptance, obtaining or attempted obtaining of the relevant advantage is proved, unless rebutted. The adopted reasoning distinguishes an inference of voluntary receipt from proved surrounding facts from the statutory presumption that follows. Mere unexplained recovery is insufficient without the relevant foundation. The appeal's finding rested on the combined evidence; the judgment does not separately apply that presumption to establish every ingredient of the Section 13 conviction.	441
	Sub-Chapter no. 45.4 Trap Proceedings, Recovery and Phenolphthalein Evidence
Returned trap money and corroborative value of a positive hand wash	The marked ₹3,000 was recovered from the complainant after his report that the appellant had returned it on detecting powder or the trap signal. Negative control washes, the appellant's positive hand wash, matching note numbers, the laboratory report and witness accounts supported the inference of contact and receipt. The Court rejected the handshake explanation. Receipt may be proved circumstantially, but bare recovery divorced from the circumstances of payment does not by itself establish voluntary acceptance of a bribe.	441
Shadow witness's inability to see an indoor bribe exchange	Where the complainant entered the accused's house while the shadow witness remained outside, the witness's inability to hear the demand or see money change hands did not, by itself, undermine the prosecution. The Court assessed that limitation against the witness's actual position and the corroborative trap evidence, rather than treating him as a direct witness to the private exchange.	441
Bribe receipt may be proved circumstantially; isolated recovery is insufficient	Direct observation of the passing of money is not indispensable: receipt may be established by the proved surrounding circumstances. Under the adopted Hazari Lal passage, recovery alone, separated from unreliable or absent evidence of the payment's circumstances, is insufficient. Here numbered and treated currency, controls and recovery evidence, the recorded demand and instruction to pay the intermediary were assessed together. The suspended first trap, resealing and renewed trap formed a connected evidentiary sequence.	879
	Sub-Chapter no. 45.5 Prevention of Corruption Act Section 17A — Prior Approval for Enquiry or Investigation
Section 17A approval for an official recommendation or decision	Section 17A of the Prevention of Corruption Act requires prior approval where the alleged offence relates to a recommendation made or decision taken by a public servant in discharge of official functions. The allegation here concerned the Collector’s silence and failure to enforce the airstrip agreement, while he pleaded ignorance of that agreement. As no recommendation or decision of his was under investigation, the Court held that Section 17A did not require prior approval. This ruling did not determine his criminal liability.	290
Section 17A and a preliminary enquiry pending before its introduction	The preliminary enquiry began in 2015 and remained pending when Section 17A of the Prevention of Corruption Act came into force. The Court held that the later approval requirement did not benefit the petitioner in that pre-existing enquiry. This was an independent ground for allowing the investigation to	290

	Macro Division X State, Local and Regulatory Criminal Statutes
	Chapter no. 46 Forest, Wildlife, Mining and Environmental Regulatory Offences
	Sub-Chapter no. 46.1 Mining Offences and Illegal Extraction
Gram Panchayat's public-works exception and illegal sand excavation	Rule 4 of the M.P. Mineral (Prevention of Illegal Mining, Transportation and Storage) Rules, 2022 grants Gram Panchayats an exception for transport and storage of minor minerals quarried from government land for public works. It does not authorise illegal excavation or theft of State-owned minerals. A claim that sand was intended for road construction did not justify quashing where lawful quarrying or purchase was not asserted and the relied-upon measurement book concerned another village.	35
Mining-law compounding and distinct IPC offences	Compounding under Section 23-A of the MMDR Act bars further proceedings for the mining-law offence so compounded. It does not bar prosecution for distinct IPC offences such as theft or dishonest dealing with stolen property. The Court relied on Jayant v. State of M.P. for this distinction; no actual compounding of the present applicant's case was determined.	35
Illegal sand mining: State's duty as custodian of public mineral resources	Sand and mineral resources are public property of which the State is custodian. Adopting the reasoning in Jayant, the Court emphasised the State's duty to prevent damage to rivers and ecological imbalance from excessive sand and gravel mining. Such extraction can degrade riverbeds, lower groundwater and dry water sources. Protection of these resources and the environment requires serious action against illegal extraction and transportation; compensation alone does not remove that protective responsibility.	44
Illegal sand transport — a post-seizure operating power of attorney does not by itself exonerate the owner	The operating and litigation powers conferred on the driver did not authorise criminal acts or make the driver alone responsible for them. Moreover, the power of attorney was executed after the vehicle had been seized. It therefore did not assist the owner's claim for interim release or absolve him on the asserted basis. The Court did not determine final guilt merely from ownership of the dumper.	79
MMDR Act Section 22 — complaint bar applies at cognizance, not to registration and investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC	A Magistrate may direct registration of an FIR under Section 156(3) CrPC for offences under the MMDR Act and its rules; Section 22 does not bar that registration and investigation stage. The bar applies when cognizance of the statutory offences is taken and process is issued. The investigating officer's report may be sent to the Magistrate and the authorised officer, who may file the required complaint with that report. The Magistrate may then take cognizance and issue process after following the prescribed procedure.	79
IPC offences arising from illegal mining — cognizance on a police report need not await the authorised officer's MMDR complaint	For a distinct IPC offence arising from illegal mining, the jurisdictional Magistrate may take cognizance on the police report without waiting for the authorised officer's complaint required for violations of the MMDR Act and its rules. The complaint restriction governing the statutory mining offences does not postpone cognizance of the IPC offence.	79
Compounding a mining offence does not bar independent IPC proceedings	Under Section 23A(2) of the MMDR Act, compounding bars proceedings for the statutory or rule offence actually compounded. It does not bar proceedings for independent IPC offences, including Sections 379 and 414. Applying the passage reproduced from Jayant v. State of M.P., the Court rejected payment of a sand-rules penalty as a sufficient answer to the applicant’s IPC liability. Its earlier Banti decision treated recovery of royalty and penalty as satisfaction of	670

	civil liability, without a bar to prosecution under general criminal law. The offer to pay the penalty therefore did not establish entitlement to regular bail.
Mining-rule penalty does not exclude IPC prosecution	Mere payment of a penalty under the mining rules does not absolve the person from prosecution for IPC offences. In the absence of a statutory bar excluding the IPC, the special mining legislation does not prevent proceedings under Sections 379 and 414 IPC.	688
Section 23A MMDR Act — compounding limited to the compounded mining offence	Under the relied-upon passage from Jayant, valid compounding under Section 23A(1), read with Section 23A(2) MMDR Act, prevents proceedings or further proceedings for the MMDR Act or rule offence so compounded. That bar does not affect prosecution for IPC offences such as theft or receiving stolen property under Sections 379 and 414.	688
	Sub-Chapter no. 46.2 Forest Act Offences and Violation of Permission Conditions
Forest vehicle confiscation: owner's plea of ignorance of the driver's illegal transport	In the Section 482 CrPC challenge to confiscation of a tractor and trolley used for illegal sand transport, the owners' assertion that they were unaware of the driver's conduct did not justify interference. The Court rejected that plea on the record and treated the tractor's absence of a registration number as an additional indication of a guilty mind. It affirmed the confiscation upheld in appeal and revision. The decision did not lay down an irrebuttable rule of owner liability for every act of a driver.	44
Offer of compensation or penalty: no ground to reverse vehicle confiscation	An offer to compensate forest damage or pay a policy-based penalty did not establish a ground to release the tractor and trolley confiscated for illegal sand transport. Relying on Jayant's environmental reasoning and the circumstances of the owners' case, including the unregistered tractor, the Court found no error in the confiscation orders. The reproduced discussion of Section 23-A MMDR Act distinguished compounded MMDR offences from separate IPC offences; the Court did not use that provision to decide the Forest Act confiscation challenge.	44
Forest-rights recommendations do not establish protected forest-dweller status	A claimant invoking Section 4(5) of the Forest Rights Act, 2006 must first establish the relevant forest-dweller status. Under Section 2(c), Scheduled Tribe membership must be accompanied by primary residence in, and dependence on, forests or forest land for bona fide livelihood needs. Scheduled Tribe membership, occupation of forest land and recommendations by the Gram Sabha or Van Adhikar Samiti did not establish that status without evidence of primary forest residence. The pending claim therefore did not protect this applicant's possession or defeat his conviction under Section 26(1-J) of the Indian Forest Act.	137
Forest offences — unauthorised delegation and continuing supervisory responsibility	The officer in charge of mining operations could not obtain quashing merely by asserting that he had delegated crack-filling work to a subordinate. No Act, rule, guideline or circular authorising the delegation was shown, and supervision of the work fell within his admitted responsibilities. The Court rejected the plea that the delegation automatically absolved him of liability for the alleged excavation of forest earth by machinery contrary to permission conditions. The prosecution was allowed to proceed for determination on evidence.	484
	Sub-Chapter no. 46.3 Forest and Mining Confiscation — Parallel Proceedings and Owner-Knowledge Defence
Confiscation of a forest-offence vehicle during criminal prosecution	Confiscation proceedings concerning a vehicle used in a forest offence are independent of criminal prosecution and serve a distinct purpose. The authorised officer may order confiscation on being satisfied that the vehicle was used in the offence without waiting for the criminal case to conclude. Pendency of the criminal trial therefore did not invalidate the tractor-trolley's confiscation.	196

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Owner's denial of knowledge of the vehicle's use in a forest offence	The Court rejected the owner's plea that the tractor-trolley was used for illegal sand transportation without his knowledge because it found that his son was present at the spot with the vehicle. The inference was drawn on the facts of the confiscation proceedings.	196
Owner's burden to obtain protection from forest-vehicle confiscation	An owner seeking the statutory protection discussed in Kallo Bai must establish that the vehicle was used without the owner's knowledge or connivance, or, where applicable, that of the servant or agent, and that all reasonable and necessary precautions were taken to prevent its use for a forest offence.	196
Forest-vehicle confiscation is independent of the criminal trial	Confiscation under the Section 15 scheme discussed in State of M.P. v. Kallo Bai is a quasi-judicial proceeding independent of the criminal trial. The authorised officer may order confiscation on being satisfied that the vehicle was used in committing a forest offence, without awaiting complete establishment of the accused's guilt in that trial. The reproduced scheme requires a written order recording the reasons for confiscation. Applying Kallo Bai, the Court rejected the contention that a vehicle allegedly used for illegal wood transport could not be confiscated while the prosecution remained pending, and declined interference under Section 482 CrPC.	957
Owner's lack of knowledge and reasonable precautions in forest-vehicle confiscation	The Section 15 safeguards reproduced from Kallo Bai protect the owner of a vehicle or other specified article where the required absence of knowledge or connivance is established and all reasonable and necessary precautions against its use in the forest offence have been taken. The reproduced provision addresses the owner and, where applicable, the servant or agent. These requirements qualify the independent confiscation power; the mere pendency of the related criminal trial does not substitute for that defence.	957
	Chapter no. 47 Electricity, Motor Vehicles, Municipal and Public Health Offences
	Sub-Chapter no. 47.1 Municipal, Public Health and Licensing Violations
Coloniser registration for land divided into residential plots	Rule 3(1) of the M.P. Nagar Palika (Registration of Coloniser Terms and Conditions) Rules, 1998 requires a person intending to develop land into plots for transfer for residential or non-residential construction or joint habitation to apply for registration. Land diversion is also necessary for the proposed residential colony. Purchasers' statements that small plots were sold for residential construction, together with the absence of coloniser registration and diversion, supported a prima facie charge under Section 339-C of the M.P. Municipalities Act, 1961, despite the seller's description of the land as agricultural.	60
Eligibility to prescribe allopathic medicines — qualifications and statutory exception	Under Sections 2(d) and 15 of the Indian Medical Council Act, 1956 as applied by the Court, allopathic practice requires the requisite qualification and enrolment on the State Medical Register; unauthorised practice attracts Section 15(3). Section 24(ia) of the M.P. Ayurvigyan Parishad Adhiniyam permits qualifying Ayurvedic or Unani graduates to prescribe allopathic medicines only when posted in government health institutions or allopathic centres, registered with the specified State Board and given government-prescribed training, and only to its authorised extent. The applicant's Ayurvedacharya degree and three months' training did not bring his private-hospital practice within that exception.	68
	Sub-Chapter no. 47.2 Food Safety and Adulteration Prosecutions
Overlapping food laws — overriding	Where the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954 and the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 apply to the same conduct but prescribe inconsistent penal	300

effect of Section 89 FSSA	consequences, Section 89 FSSA gives the latter Act priority to the extent of the inconsistency. The PFA remained unrepealed when the milk sample was collected on 29 August 2010; its repeal took effect on 5 August 2011. Applying the reasoning in Manik Hiru Jhangiani, which concerned misbranding under Section 52 FSSA and prohibited punishment under both regimes for the same act, the Court resolved the sentencing conflict in this milk-adulteration case by applying Section 57 FSSA.
Milk adulteration — modification of sentence without setting aside conviction	An inconsistency between the PFA and FSSA as to punishment did not require the proved milk-adulteration conviction to be set aside for a fresh prosecution. Both laboratory reports supported adulteration, no perversity was shown in the concurrent findings, and the applicant had not questioned prosecution under the PFA before either lower court. The Court therefore retained the conviction and substituted the monetary consequence under Section 57 FSSA for the PFA prison sentence. It imposed ₹2,00,000 with two months' rigorous imprisonment in default and directed release on payment.	300
Section 89 FSSA — override of inconsistent food-adulteration provisions	Section 89 of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 overrides inconsistent provisions of other food-related laws. Applying Ram Nath and Sushil Kumar Gupta to conduct covered by Section 59 FSSA, the Court recognised the FSSA's priority over IPC Sections 272 and 273 and observed that registration under those IPC provisions might not be correct. It nevertheless dismissed the application to quash the FIR because the separate Section 420 IPC allegation survived; it did not expressly quash the Sections 272 and 273 counts.	346
FSSA charges — conditional framing by the trial court	The FIR was not liable to be quashed merely because the alleged adulteration could attract the FSSA. If the trial court concludes that the conduct constitutes an offence requiring penalty or punishment under that Act, it may also frame charges for that offence. The High Court left that determination to the trial court.	346
Food Safety Charges: Distinguishing Substandard and Unsafe Food	Where both laboratory reports classified the sample as at least substandard, the charge under Section 3(zx) read with Section 51 of the Food Safety and Standards Act should not have been disturbed. A question about further testing for the unsafe-food allegation did not justify setting aside the entire charge-framing order. The Court distinguished the Section 3(zz)/59 charge as the part that could have been reconsidered after a further report, while leaving the prosecution's ultimate proof of that offence to trial.	369
Perishable Food Sample: Futility of a Much-Delayed Referral	The Court declined to require a third referral test after a long lapse where the mawa sample had never been sent and its short shelf life made testing purposeless even if the sample remained available. It restored the charge-framing order and directed the trial to proceed on the material accompanying the charge-sheet, with a specific determination of whether the prosecution proved the unsafe-food offence.	369
Food-safety penalties and distinct IPC prosecution	The Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 does not exclude resort to general criminal law merely because it provides its own adjudication, penalty, compounding and appeal procedures. In the absence of an identified statutory bar, police may proceed under Sections 420 and 272 IPC for distinct cheating and adulteration allegations alongside the food-safety contraventions.	434
Prima facie inference that a dairy sample was intended for sale	For the Section 272 IPC allegation, the sampled material's retention in an operating dairy shop, without any indication that it was not for sale, supported a prima facie inference that it was milk intended for sale. The operator's competing claim that it was residual 'sapreta' could not be accepted to quash the FIR at that stage. The inference was provisional and based on the circumstances of the sample's storage and presentation.	434
Delayed addition of a manufacturer	Adding the manufacturer as an accused in 2018 and framing charges in 2019, when the ghee had been analysed in 2011 and its shelf life had already expired,	567

defeating the retest right	deprived him of the valuable right under Section 13(2) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act to seek Central Food Laboratory retesting. The Court held that the delayed impleadment violated that right and set aside the charge, discharging the applicant.
Written warranty and proof of purchase from the manufacturer	Section 14 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act requires a written warranty concerning the nature and quality of food supplied to a vendor; a bill, cash memorandum or invoice for the sale is deemed to be such a warranty. The retailer produced no receipt showing purchase from the applicant or the asserted indemnification. The Court held that responsibility for adulteration occurring after supply could not be fastened on the manufacturer in the absence of that purchase receipt, and found the summoning and charge erroneous.	567
Procedure for seeking Central Food Laboratory analysis	Under Section 13(2) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, after prosecution is instituted the Local Health Authority must forward the adverse Public Analyst report to the person from whom the sample was taken and any person identified under Section 14A, informing them of the right to apply to the court within ten days of receiving it for analysis of the retained sample by the Central Food Laboratory. The Court recognised this as a valuable right available to a person aggrieved by the analyst's report.	567
Prima Facie Purchase and Same-Condition Link Before Adding a Food Manufacturer as Accused	For a seller's application under Section 78 of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 to add a manufacturer as an accused, there must be sufficient prima facie material connecting the seized article to purchase from that manufacturer in the same condition in which it was seized. Merely naming an industry does not establish its criminal liability. Where the seller produced no purchase bill and failed to establish the required link or show perversity in the Magistrate's refusal, the Court declined interference under Section 482 CrPC.	655
Food Safety and Standards Act — concurrent resort to the IPC	The Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 does not exclude general criminal law merely because it provides a separate regulatory and penalty procedure. In the absence of a statutory bar, the police may invoke the IPC where its distinct offences are disclosed. The Court applied this reasoning from Manish Gupta to reject the claim that the suspected food adulteration could be dealt with only under the 2006 Act.	806
Section 42 FSSA procedure and prosecution under the IPC	The procedure in Section 42 of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 for launching prosecutions under Sections 59–64 applies to offences punishable under that Act. In rejecting the challenge to the IPC prosecution, the Court held that this procedure did not govern offences otherwise punishable under the IPC. No provision barring resort to the general criminal law was shown; the Court relied by analogy on State of M.P. v. Rameshwar.	810
Parallel FSSA penalty adjudication and IPC prosecution —double jeopardy	The Court distinguished the regulatory penalties under Sections 50–58 of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 from the fine or imprisonment prescribed for offences under Sections 59–64. Penalty adjudication under Section 68 serves enforcement of the Act. It therefore held that the pending penalty proceedings and the IPC prosecution could continue simultaneously and rejected the plea of double jeopardy.	810
Regulatory penalties and absence of mens rea or actual loss	A statutory penalty imposed for breach of a regulatory obligation may operate without proof of a guilty mind. In explaining the enforcement character of FSSA penalties, the Court relied on R.S. Joshi v. Ajit Mills and the reproduced reasoning in Som Distilleries that a regulatory penalty for an established breach may be imposed without mens rea or actual loss. This reasoning concerns the regulatory penalty and does not dispense with the ingredients of an IPC offence.	810
Factors governing the quantum of FSSA penalties	When determining a penalty under the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006, the Adjudicating Officer or Tribunal must have due regard under Section 49 to any quantifiable gain or unfair advantage, loss caused or likely to be caused, repetition of the contravention, whether it occurred without the person's	810 knowledge, and any other relevant factor. Section 68 requires a reasonable opportunity to make a representation before penalty adjudication.

Section 89 FSSA and overlapping offences under Sections 272 and 273 IPC	Adopting the reasoning in Neelkamal Sharma, the Court held that Section 89 of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 gives the Act overriding effect over inconsistent food-related laws. Ram Nath and Sushil Kumar Gupta concerned the overlap between Sections 272–273 IPC and Section 59 FSSA. Registration under those IPC provisions might therefore be incorrect, but that limited override did not exclude a distinct offence of cheating under Section 420 IPC.	811
Food Safety Act — company must be arraigned for prosecution of its nominee on vicarious liability	Where a complaint attributes the offence to the company manufacturing the food and prosecutes its nominee only in that capacity, the nominee cannot be held vicariously liable under Section 66 of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 unless the company is also arraigned as an accused. The company's absence, together with the absence of any allegation against the nominee in his personal capacity, made the prosecution legally unsustainable.	903
	Sub-Chapter no. 47.3 Electricity Theft and Regulatory Prosecution
Unauthorised reconnection after disconnection for unpaid electricity charges	Conviction under Section 138 of the Electricity Act was sustained where inspection evidence established that the consumer resumed operating a flour mill through a direct connection from the pole after disconnection for unpaid charges following notice. His admission of outstanding charges and failure to produce receipts for the claimed payments supported the finding of illegal reconnection.	25
Alleged illegal reconnection distinguished from mere non-payment of electricity dues	The complaint was not confined to unpaid electricity charges: it alleged that the connection was unlawfully restored after the department had disconnected it. The Court treated that alleged reconnection and use as a prima facie electricity offence and refused to quash the pending Section 138 Electricity Act proceedings. This was a threshold assessment, not a finding of guilt.	579
	Sub-Chapter no. 47.4 Motor Vehicles Act Criminal/Regulatory Prosecutions
Alcohol odour and fatal negligent driving as prima facie charge material	The doctor's Pre-MLC notation of alcohol smell, considered with the material indicating negligent driving and a fatal accident, supported framing a charge under Section 304 Part II IPC. The Court referred to drunken driving as an offence under Section 185 of the Motor Vehicles Act and declined to interfere with the order also framing charges under Sections 184 and 185. Relying on the reproduced discussion of alcohol's adverse effects on coordination, judgment, reflexes and vision, it distinguished prima facie material from evidence sufficient to convict. Whether the medical observation justified conviction remained for trial, which had to be decided strictly on the evidence received without being influenced by the revisional observations.	830

	Sub-Chapter no. 48.1 Cooperative Society Recovery and Criminal Prosecution — No Implied Bar
Section 64 cooperative-society recovery and criminal prosecution	Recovery of a cooperative society's losses under Section 64 of the M.P. Cooperative Societies Act serves a different purpose from determining criminal liability. In the absence of an express or necessarily implied statutory bar, that recovery remedy does not prevent an FIR or criminal proceedings where a cognizable offence is disclosed.	197
Cooperative statutory remedies—	The Madhya Pradesh Cooperative Societies Act, 1960 did not exclude resort to general criminal law merely because it supplied statutory remedies. In the	418

CrPC Section 133 Public Nuisance — Obstruction of Adjudicated Public Way

Obstruction of an adjudicated public way as public nuisance	Where the lane's public character had been finally adjudicated up to the High Court and installation of the gate on that lane was not disputed, blocking the public way amounted to public nuisance warranting removal under Section 133 CrPC. The Court upheld the removal orders and directed the Chief Municipal Officer to remove the encroachment within fifteen days.	237

Panchayat Civil Recovery and IPC Prosecution — Independent Remedies

Panchayat recovery proceedings and independent criminal prosecution	A stay of Panchayat civil recovery did not bar a direction to lodge an FIR for alleged withdrawal and misappropriation of construction funds. The impugned direction concerned alleged embezzlement, rather than failure to deposit the recovery amount. Fixing liability under Sections 89/92 of the Madhya Pradesh Panchayat Raj Evam Gram Swaraj Adhiniyam is distinct from criminal investigation, and no provision was shown to curtail the IPC or CrPC process.	238
Special statutory remedies and prosecution under general criminal law	Prosecution under two enactments may proceed on the same facts when the ingredients of their provisions are satisfied and no statutory bar excludes general criminal law. Merely prescribing a special statutory remedy or penalty does not itself bar IPC prosecution. The Court applied the reproduced decisions on concurrent criminal remedies to reject the alleged bar under the Panchayat statute.	238

Local Body, Panchayat and Regulatory Criminal Process

Coloniser registration before development of a colony	Rule 3 of the M.P. Nagar Palika (Registration of Coloniser, Terms and Conditions) Rules, 1998 requires registration where a person intends to establish a colony by developing land into plots and transferring them to persons wishing to build residential or non-residential premises. Registration is required before undertaking that development; actual development of the colony is not a precondition for the rule to apply.	240
Panchayat Civil Recovery Does Not Bar Criminal Proceedings	The inquiry and recovery provisions in Sections 89 and 92 of the M.P. Panchayat Raj Avam Gram Swaraj Adhiniyam, 1993 do not themselves exclude the IPC or CrPC. No express or implied statutory bar was shown. The existence of a procedure for recovery of civil loss therefore did not prevent registration of a cognizable criminal case or require completion of that recovery process first.	459

Madhya Pradesh Public Distribution System — Control-Order Contraventions and Prosecution Thresholds

PDS stock variation —mandatory prosecution threshold and lesser shortages	The ten-percent stock-variation provision of the Madhya Pradesh Public Distribution System (Control) Order, 2015 makes prosecution mandatory above that threshold. It does not prohibit prosecution below the threshold. The absence of a finding that the shortage exceeded ten percent therefore did not, by itself, justify quashing the alleged contraventions.	418

Madhya Pradesh Local Criminal Laws and Public Order Regulation

Refund of Money Paid for Promised Employment Was Not a Loan	Money received on a false and illegal assurance of securing government appointments was not treated as a loan advanced by the applicants. Their demand for its return therefore did not disclose the alleged offence under	453

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Section 11 of the M.P. Money Lending Act. The Court quashed that charge against the applicants on the nature of the transaction before it.
Section 5(b): Specified Offending and Witness Reluctance Must Both Be Supported	Externment under Section 5(b) of the M.P. Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam, 1990 requires reasonable grounds to believe that the person is engaged or about to engage in the specified offences, and the District Magistrate's opinion that witnesses will not give evidence in public because they fear for their person or property. These findings must rest on material. The mere listing of five criminal cases and a preventive proceeding did not establish the required grounds or witness reluctance here.	454
Stale Criminal Cases Require a Live Link With Present Externment Necessity	The three minor cases registered seven years earlier lacked a live link with the need for externment. The District Magistrate had to consider the nature and outcome of the cases and their connection with a present need for removal, rather than rely on the number of registrations. The old cases could not sustain the impugned order on the circumstances found by the Court.	454
Reasoned Satisfaction Is Required for Externment	The competent authority must record specific, intelligible reasons showing that the statutory conditions for externment exist. Reasons must disclose consideration of relevant material and permit judicial review; a bare recital or a list of registered cases does not replace that assessment. The Court found that the impugned orders did not establish the application of Section 5 to the petitioner's activities.	454
Close proximity of criminal activity to externment proceedings under Section 5	Criminal history relied upon under Section 5 of the M.P. Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam must have a close and live connection with the proposed preventive action. Old and stale cases cannot supply that connection merely because they form part of the person's record. The Court found the cases from 2012, 2018 and 2020 too remote from the October 2023 recommendation; the remaining two cases of 2022 and 2023 were considered trivial on this record and did not sustain externment.	512
Opportunity to answer fresh adverse material received after final arguments in externment proceedings	If additional adverse material is received after final hearing, the externing authority must either leave it out of consideration or give the affected person an opportunity to meet it. Reliance on further police material received after final arguments, without that opportunity, vitiated the externment decision in this case.	512
Material showing witnesses' unwillingness to depose because of fear	Externment based on witnesses' fear requires supporting material that they are unwilling to give evidence because they apprehend harm to themselves or their property. The mere registration of criminal cases is insufficient. Here no such material was available; the police witness's statement that convictions had occurred indicated that witnesses had deposed, rather than establishing their unwillingness through fear.	512
Requested cross-examination in externment proceedings	Where the person facing externment asks to cross-examine departmental witnesses, the District Magistrate must provide that opportunity. The record did not show that the petitioner had refused to cross-examine the police witness when examined, and his later express request could not be left unfulfilled before the order was passed.	512
Timely preventive action and the live connection required for externment	Externment is preventive rather than punitive. Past activities must be assessed in the circumstances existing when the order is proposed, to determine the need to prevent future misconduct. Proceedings must be concluded within a reasonable time even where the statute prescribes no limitation period; unexplained inordinate delay can sever the live connection between the grounds and the preventive purpose.	512
Close proximity of alleged offences to an externment order	The alleged offending conduct must have close proximity to the externment order. The authority must assess the nature and outcome of the criminal cases	515

	relied upon and consider whether old cases can support present preventive action. Merely reproducing the earlier record and concluding that one fresh FIR makes the person liable for externment, without explaining the current necessity, does not satisfy this requirement.
Opportunity to argue after cross-examination in externment proceedings	Cross-examination in externment proceedings is a substantive safeguard. Requiring final arguments before the departmental witness is cross-examined, and then deciding the matter without allowing arguments on the answers elicited, violates natural justice. A formal opportunity to cross-examine does not cure the denial of an opportunity to address its result.	515
Reasons and independent application of mind in an externment order	An externment order must give cogent, clear reasons showing that relevant facts have been considered and explaining why removal is necessary. Pasting an earlier order, evidence, notice and reply into the decision, followed by an unexplained conclusion, is not reasoned adjudication. Applying Kranti Associates, the Court found non-application of mind; externment's serious effects on residence and livelihood require an actual assessment rather than completion of formalities.	515
Material showing unwillingness of witnesses to give statements against a proposed externee	An externment order requires some material showing that witnesses are not coming forward to give statements against the proposed externee, in addition to closely proximate offending conduct. The existence of a criminal record cannot itself replace consideration of this separate requirement.	515
Independent scrutiny by the appellate authority in an externment appeal	The right of appeal against externment is substantive. The appellate authority must scrutinise the challenged order and the procedure followed, and must address defects affecting its validity. Mechanical affirmation without examining the procedural deficiencies and absence of reasons does not fulfil that duty.	515
Ransom abduction in a notified area under the MPDVPK Act	The Court upheld liability under Sections 11/13 of the MPDVPK Act after finding the ransom abduction and associated acts proved and the area from which the abduction occurred notified under that Act. The finding was tied to the proved offence and the notified-area fact.	648
	Sub-Chapter no. 48.7 State Excise, Gambling and Licensing Offences
Minimum imprisonment under Section 34(2) of the M.P. Excise Act	The Court identified one year as the minimum imprisonment under Section 34(2) of the M.P. Excise Act and refused to reduce that term to the six months already undergone. A sentence below the statutory minimum could not be awarded.	780
	Chapter no. 49 Insecticides and Agricultural Inputs Criminal Regulation
	Sub-Chapter no. 49.1 Insecticides Act Section 24 — Analyst Report, Retesting and Shelf-Life Prejudice
Section 24 Insecticides Act — objection to the official who supplied the Analyst report	Where the Deputy Director supplied the Insecticide Analyst's report with a sales-restraint order and no separate notice from the Insecticide Inspector was shown, the applicants could address their timely written objection to that Deputy Director. Reading Sections 24(2) and 24(3) together, the Court held that they had not erred by notifying the same official who supplied the report. If he considered himself incompetent, he should have forwarded the objection to the Inspector. The State questioned the addressee but did not dispute the genuineness of the 6 August objection. The subsequent rejection of the court application as belated did not defeat the earlier exercise of the statutory right within twenty-eight days.	998
Section 24(3) —	A timely written notification of the intention to adduce evidence contradicting	998

written intention to controvert the report is sufficient	the Insecticide Analyst's report removes its otherwise conclusive evidentiary character. Applying Northern Mineral Ltd. v. Union of India, the Court held that the accused need not disclose the grounds of challenge or expressly demand analysis by the Central Insecticides Laboratory. The written intention itself preserves the statutory opportunity for Central Laboratory testing and enables the court to act under Section 24(4), subject to the provision's conditions. An additional formula of words cannot be required to expose the defence before that opportunity is exercised.
Section 24(4) — testing opportunity for an accused other than the sampled person	The twenty-eight-day period in Section 24(3) governs notification by the person from whom the sample was taken. As explained in Northern Minerals Ltd. v. Rajasthan Government, Section 24(4) also permits another accused proceeded against to seek Central Laboratory testing, without imposing that same statutory notification period on that accused. Where that accused invokes the right, the reproduced decision requires him to bear the testing expense under Section 24(5). The opportunity remains subject to Section 24(4), including its exclusion where the sample has already been tested by the Central Laboratory.	998
Section 24(4) — no further Central testing where its report is already on record	The Section 24(4) opportunity to seek Central Laboratory analysis concerns a prosecution founded on the State Insecticide Analyst's report. As explained in the reproduced Indofil Industries decision, it does not permit another test of the same sample where a Central Laboratory report has already been obtained and made part of the criminal prosecution. That report is conclusive under the statutory scheme. The distinction limits the testing right and prevents a claim to repeated analysis merely because another accused later seeks it.	998
Prompt Central testing — loss of a valuable statutory defence	Authorities must act promptly after a valid objection to the State Analyst's report. The reproduced Indofil Industries decision explains that the Inspector may send the sample to the Central Laboratory or institute proceedings and place the third sample before the court in time for effective testing before its shelf life expires. Northern Mineral, Gupta Chemicals and National Organic Chemical Industries emphasise that official inaction or failure to provide the statutory testing opportunity may deprive the accused of a valuable defence. Here, no effective action followed the timely objection, and the Court held that the applicants' testing right had been violated. It therefore quashed the five complaints and consequential proceedings.	998

High Court Criminal Jurisdiction, Appellate Control and Post-Conviction Remedies

Chapter no. 50
Inherent Powers, Quashing and Abuse-of-Process Control

Sub-Chapter no. 50.1
Quashing of FIR, Complaint and Criminal Proceedings

Restitution suit filed after the FIR — plea of counterblast	An FIR cannot be treated as a counterblast to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights instituted after the FIR was lodged. The subsequent institution or pendency of that matrimonial suit does not, by itself, justify quashing the FIR under Section 482 CrPC or Section 528 BNSS. Civil and criminal proceedings remain separate even when they arise from the same facts.	2
Matrimonial FIR — specific allegations against each accused	Where the FIR contains clear and specific allegations against each applicant of assault and an unlawful demand for money, those allegations cannot be treated as merely general or omnibus when considering quashing. The Court relied on that specificity in declining to interfere with the matrimonial prosecution.	2
Matrimonial FIR — suppression of admitted residence and unsupported	In assessing whether a prima facie case existed against the two sisters-in-law, the Court considered the complainant's earlier police complaint admitting that she had moved to Mumbai with her husband. The later FIR and Section 161	3

allegations	CrPC statement omitted that material residence history and contained no account of visits during which the applicants allegedly harassed her. Counsel's explanation about such visits was absent from both statements. In that combined context, the vague and misleading allegations disclosed no specific involvement by the applicants, and the FIR and consequential proceedings were quashed as against them.
Section 482 CrPC — intervention at an interlocutory stage to prevent abuse	Criminal proceedings are ordinarily not stopped at an interlocutory stage. Inherent jurisdiction may nevertheless be exercised to prevent abuse of the court's process and secure the ends of justice. In the matrimonial prosecution before it, the Court applied the caution against proceeding on omnibus allegations and quashed the case against the applicants because no specific prima facie involvement was disclosed.	3
Restitution petition — no automatic inference of a retaliatory matrimonial FIR	The filing of an application for restitution of conjugal rights under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act does not, by itself, establish that the wife's FIR is a false counterblast. Treating the FIR as invalid merely because it followed that application would assume the truth of the husband's civil allegations without a trial and judgment. Civil and criminal proceedings are independent, and findings in one do not automatically bind the other. A wife's delay in complaining while hoping for improvement and reconciliation does not, for that reason alone, make her complaint false or retaliatory.	5
Matrimonial prosecution — mere naming of distant relatives is insufficient	Distant relatives should not be summoned in a matrimonial case merely because they are named. A specific role and tangible material supporting their alleged involvement are required. At the same time, clear allegations of dowry-related harassment against the husband and his parents create triable issues whose truth cannot be resolved by comparing rival versions in quashing proceedings.	5
Reconciliation agreement — omission of cruelty allegations does not itself discredit a later FIR	An agreement intended to preserve marital ties and give the parties time to improve their conduct need not record every allegation of cruelty. The absence of such allegations from the agreement does not, by itself, make a later FIR an afterthought. The Court considered the agreement in its matrimonial context and treated the wife's initial omission and waiting period as consistent with an effort to save the marriage.	6
Restitution proceedings — later cruelty FIR not automatically a counterblast	An FIR alleging matrimonial cruelty cannot be quashed merely because the husband filed an application under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act before the wife approached the police. The wife's earlier efforts to preserve the marriage and the circumstances in which she later complained must be considered. Civil and criminal proceedings are independent, and civil findings do not automatically bind the criminal court. The criminal allegations must be assessed for a prima facie case on their own basis.	6
Omission from a later complaint of allegations made earlier	A subsequent complaint cannot be quashed merely because it omits allegations included in an earlier complaint. The accused's assertion that the omissions showed the complainant changing her version required examination of the allegations and could not alone terminate the FIR under Section 482 CrPC.	26
Foreign divorce decree obtained without effective notice: effect on cruelty prosecution	Under Section 13 CPC, a foreign judgment is not conclusive where it was obtained by fraud, through proceedings contrary to natural justice or on a claim contrary to applicable Indian law. Knowing that his wife had left for India, the husband obtained an ex parte Arizona divorce after publication in a local Arizona newspaper rather than a newspaper circulating where she resided. The Court found absence of effective service and fraud, and declined to treat the decree as conclusive. It also noted that irretrievable breakdown was not a recognised ground under the applicable Indian matrimonial law. The decree therefore did not justify quashing the cruelty prosecution.	29
Incorrect section number in FIR or	An initial reference to Section 498 IPC instead of Section 498-A IPC did not require quashing when the FIR's allegations disclosed the latter offence. The	29

charge-sheet where facts disclose cruelty	investigating officer's mistaken statutory description, subsequently corrected by adding the letter 'A', did not defeat a prosecution supported by the pleaded facts.
Alleged mala fides where the complaint discloses a cognizable offence	Where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence, the complainant's alleged mala fides do not by themselves justify quashing the FIR or complaint. The fact that the complaint followed cognizance of the accused's cheque-dishonour case does not displace this rule.	30
Settlement alleged to have been obtained by threat or coercion	Where the complaint alleges that a settlement document was obtained by threat or coercion, the Court cannot treat that document as conclusive while quashing the proceedings. The allegation concerning its procurement requires investigation.	31
Specific allegations against the husband and parents-in-law: refusal to quash	In a petition under Section 482 CrPC concerning Sections 498-A, 377 and 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, specific allegations against each accused must be considered at face value. Allegations of the husband's sexual acts and insults and the parents-in-law's dowry taunts and demands for a car, a flat and ₹10 lakh raised issues for trial. The proceedings against them could not be quashed without determining the truth of those allegations at trial. Relief granted separately to the sister-in-law did not extend to them.	40
Section 482 CrPC: interference with perverse concurrent maintenance findings	Concurrent findings concerning a wife's reasons for separate residence do not prevent correction under Section 482 CrPC where the evidence was not considered in its proper perspective and the resulting finding is perverse. The Court set aside both the Magistrate's rejection of the wife's claim and the revisional order affirming it after finding that the evidence established sufficient reason to live apart.	42
Section 482 CrPC — statutory purposes and reasons for intervention	The inherent power under Section 482 CrPC may be exercised to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the process of a court, or secure the ends of justice. The precedent relied upon requires its sparing, careful and cautious exercise. Intervention in investigation must be supported by reasons, and casual judicial observations affecting persons who have not been heard must be avoided because they may influence the course of the proceedings.	51
Section 482 CrPC — quashing confined to applicants facing vague allegations	Where both the FIR and the complainant's Section 161 CrPC statement repeated only general allegations against the two applicants, the Court quashed the FIR and further proceedings under Sections 498A and 323 IPC and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act only in relation to them. The relief followed the absence of specific allegations against those applicants despite the filing of the charge-sheet and pendency of the trial proceedings.	56
Specific dowry and cruelty allegations against husband and mother-in-law at the quashing stage	Where the FIR and Section 161 CrPC statement disclose specific allegations of dowry demands and physical or mental cruelty by the husband and mother-in-law, their prosecution under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act cannot be quashed by deciding the truth of the competing versions. Whether the alleged cruelty occurred is a matter for trial. The Court found sufficient allegations to continue their prosecution.	80
Vague and omnibus allegations against a sister-in-law	Prosecution of the husband's relatives for matrimonial cruelty requires specific and clear allegations concerning their involvement. Vague, general or omnibus accusations are insufficient. Where the FIR made no allegation against the sister-in-law and the Section 161 CrPC statement included her only in general allegations, while attributing the later specific incidents to the husband and mother-in-law, the Court quashed the FIR, charge-sheet and consequential proceedings against her alone.	80
General reference to 'in-laws' in a matrimonial-cruelty accusation	A general reference to 'in-laws' in a penal accusation cannot be enlarged to include every person related to the complainant's husband. The Court declined to treat that expression as an allegation against the sister-in-law where the body of the FIR attributed no act to her.	80

50.1 : Quashing of FIR, Complaint and Criminal Proceedings

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Disputed enticement and prima facie material against quashing	Whether the girl left her home voluntarily and without enticement required evidence and could not be finally resolved in the application under Section 482 CrPC. She was below 17 at the alleged kidnapping and the claimed marriage shortly afterwards. Considering the disputed inducement and the material concerning her minority and claimed marriage, the Court found a prima facie basis for prosecution and declined to quash the FIR.	94
Partial quashing — Distinct cruelty and hurt offences survive	Quashing the Section 377 IPC allegation did not require quashing the offences arising from the alleged assaults and cruelty. In the Section 482 CrPC application, decided after the charge sheet on the stated footing that charges had not been framed, the Court separately examined the Section 498A allegations. It partially allowed the application, quashed Section 377 and left the FIR under Sections 498A and 323 intact.	113
Earlier matrimonial proceedings — Counterblast allegation against a later cruelty FIR	The earlier restitution and child-custody proceedings had ended after reunion in 2019, while the FIR alleged ouster and cruelty arising in 2020. Their prior institution did not establish that the later FIR was a retaliatory counterblast. The Court also applied Pratibha for the principle that an FIR is not liable to quashing merely because matrimonial proceedings preceded it, and rejected the counterblast ground.	119
Divorce proceedings as a ground for treating a cruelty FIR as retaliatory	A cruelty FIR could not be treated as a counterblast to a divorce petition filed years after it. Even where the divorce petition precedes the FIR, that sequence alone does not justify quashing. Civil matrimonial proceedings and criminal proceedings are independent, and pendency of the former does not end the latter merely because they arise from the same facts.	121
Delay in lodging an FIR as a ground for quashing	Delay in lodging an FIR does not, by itself, justify quashing. The law fixes no general time limit for lodging an FIR, and genuine causes may explain a delayed report. A prompt FIR assists timely investigation and reduces the opportunity for fabrication, but promptness alone does not guarantee the truth of its contents.	121
Reconciliation efforts explaining delay in a matrimonial complaint	A delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty should not attract an adverse inference merely because the wife had left the matrimonial home earlier, where she and her family were attempting reconciliation. A complaint lodged after those efforts failed is not to be rejected solely on that chronology.	121
Complete charge-sheet when seeking quashing of an ongoing trial	Where a charge-sheet has been filed and the accused seek quashing of the pending criminal case, they should place the complete charge-sheet before the High Court to show the material available against them. The applicants' failure to do so did not prevent the Court from examining whether the FIR itself contained specific allegations disclosing a triable case.	121
Factual foundation of an offence and absence of exhaustive details in an FIR	An FIR is not required to contain every detail of the prosecution case. Where a factual foundation for an offence has been laid and its requirements are substantially satisfied, courts should not hasten to quash merely because one or two ingredients have not been expressly stated or do not appear to be satisfied. This does not dispense with examining whether the allegations as a whole disclose an offence.	121
Specific allegations required to prosecute the husband's relatives	A husband's relatives cannot be prosecuted merely on vague, omnibus or general allegations; the allegations against them must be clear and specific. The FIR attributed repeated threats, assault and accusations about the complainant's character to the sister-in-law herself. The Court found those allegations sufficiently specific to reject quashing, leaving their proof for trial.	125
Conditional restoration after counsel's same-day offer to supply missing documents	In the particular circumstances, the High Court set aside dismissal of the Section 138 NI Act complaint after counsel located the misplaced file, offered on the same day to supply the documents and accepted responsibility for costs. Restoration required payment of Rs.20,000 to the accused, appearance and	126 supply of the complete complaint and documents on the fixed date. If the accused's counsel was absent, filing the set in court for supply was permitted. Failure to meet the conditions automatically revived the dismissal.

Section 482 CrPC: face-value allegations and disputed facts	On an application to quash an FIR, the court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations, accepted at face value, disclose an offence. It must not resolve disputed facts, conduct a detailed assessment of evidence or decide whether conviction is likely. Specific allegations of caste-based humiliation and threats warranted continuation of the proceedings. These observations remained provisional, and the trial court was to decide the case on the evidence independently.	142
Quashing under Section 528 BNSS and disputed defences	At the quashing stage, the Court considers whether the uncontroverted FIR allegations disclose a cognizable offence. It cannot decide their truth or reliability by weighing a disputed defence. Specific allegations of pulling and attempting to hug the complainant, an indecent sexual proposal, tearing her clothes and threatening her disclosed an offence requiring investigation. The applicant’s claim of false implication over retirement benefits could not be adjudicated under Section 528 BNSS.	161
Disputed defence letter in quashing proceedings	The genuineness of a handwritten letter allegedly written by the deceased, and whether it was fabricated or manipulated, cannot be determined under Section 482 CrPC. The husband’s allegation that the deceased’s relatives caused her death was a defence requiring proof before the trial court. These disputed matters did not justify quashing the FIR under Sections 304-B and 498-A IPC or the pending sessions proceedings.	162
Cruelty FIR filed after a divorce petition	A divorce petition does not by itself justify treating a later cruelty FIR as a counterblast or quashing it. Civil and criminal proceedings are independent, and civil findings do not bind the criminal court. Where the wife had remained silent in the hope of reconciliation and complained after the husband sought divorce, that sequence did not establish an abusive prosecution. The criminal allegations must be assessed on their own terms.	163
Medical ailment and quashing of prosecution	Kidney transplantation or donation did not, by itself, furnish a ground to quash the prosecution. No empowering provision was shown for quashing solely because of the applicants’ medical ailments. If those conditions prevented attendance, the applicants could seek permanent exemption from appearance, to be considered by the trial court with their transplantation and donation history in view.	163
Purchaser’s good-faith defence at the quashing stage	Whether the seller told the purchaser that the land had been diverted was a disputed fact requiring proof at trial. The purchaser’s reliance on agricultural entries in revenue records could not resolve that defence under Section 482 CrPC. The Court proceeded on the uncontroverted allegations and directed the trial court to decide on the evidence without being influenced by its preliminary factual observations.	164
Prima facie offence disclosure in inherent-powers review of an FIR	In determining whether a cognizable offence is disclosed, the High Court examines the allegations in the complaint or FIR for a prima facie case. Quashing cannot rest on extraneous considerations or merely on connected civil litigation. The alleged resale despite an earlier conveyance, with concealment of the pending suit, supplied a basis for registration of the FIR; the revisional direction was upheld under Section 528 BNSS.	170
Filing of charge-sheet during Section 482 proceedings	An application to quash criminal proceedings under Section 482 CrPC cannot be dismissed solely because a charge-sheet has been filed.	191
Criminal court’s power to review its own order	In the absence of statutory authority, a criminal court cannot review its own order; Section 362 CrPC prohibits alteration or review of a signed judgment or final order disposing of a case, except to correct a clerical or arithmetical error.	200

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Dismissing a complaint merely because the FIR had been registered, after previously directing a police report and keeping the complaint pending, was treated as an impermissible review.
Quashing sought on an invalid parallel enquiry report	A parallel enquiry report lacking legal sanctity cannot justify quashing an FIR whose uncontroverted allegations disclose a cognizable offence. On that basis, the Court declined interference under Section 482 CrPC.	210
Prima facie examination impersonation and quashing	Where the uncontroverted prosecution allegations are that an unauthorised person answered an examination paper on behalf of the enrolled student, and the student does not claim to have answered it himself, those allegations prima facie disclose a cognizable offence. The separate acquittal of the alleged substitute does not remove that basis for prosecution under Section 482 CrPC.	231
Procedural objections to removal of a public-way obstruction	The asserted failures to follow Sections 137, 138 and 254 CrPC did not justify setting aside the removal proceedings in the circumstances considered. The record included a renewed spot inspection in the contesting party's presence, the lane's public status was settled, the matter had been remanded for removal of the obstruction, and no objection concerning ownership or the lane's nature had been raised before the SDM. Section 482 relief was refused because the findings were supported and no jurisdictional error was shown.	237
Alleged mala fides where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence	Where an FIR discloses a cognizable offence, allegations that the informant acted maliciously cannot by themselves justify quashing. The material collected in the investigation and the evidence at trial determine the accused's liability; the informant's alleged motive is secondary.	270
Incomplete FIR details while investigation is in progress	An FIR need not contain every fact and detail of the reported offence. While investigation is continuing, it is premature to conclude on incomplete or unclear facts that the FIR does not deserve investigation or necessarily amounts to an abuse of process. The police should be permitted to complete a legitimate investigation.	277
Matrimonial quashing: specific role alleged against a relative	A husband's relatives must face specific allegations supported by material rather than prosecution merely because of the relationship. Here, the elder brother-in-law resided in the same household and was specifically accused of filthy abuse linked to non-fulfilment of dowry demands. These allegations were not treated as mere naming of a relative. Under Section 482 CrPC, the Court could not determine their truth where the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence.	286
Mediation silence does not establish that earlier cruelty allegations are false	When spouses agree to forgive each other and resume married life, a mediator is not expected to reproduce every allegation that had caused their separation. The absence of those allegations from the reconciliation record therefore did not establish that the wife's later cruelty allegations were false or warrant quashing the FIR.	286
Failure to enforce public-dues obligations as a ground for investigation	An agreement executed by the Director of Aviation on behalf of the State remained a State agreement. The Collector could not avoid duties assigned to his office merely because he had not signed it. Material showing unpaid night-parking charges and failure to recover maintenance expenditure called for investigation into his omissions during his tenure. The Court's assessment was confined to whether a cognizable offence was disclosed and was not a finding of guilt.	290
Non-implication of other responsible persons and quashing	An accused cannot obtain quashing of an FIR merely because other persons who may also be responsible have not been named as accused. The investigating agency may implicate additional persons, and the criminal courts retain their powers under Sections 190, 193 and 319 CrPC as applicable.	290
Official commendations and exemption from criminal prosecution	Being a decorated officer does not itself confer exemption from criminal prosecution. The Court rejected the petitioner's reliance on official commendations because no legal provision granting such immunity was shown.	290

Matrimonial quashing — specific allegations against a mother-in-law	Courts must treat omnibus allegations against matrimonial relatives with caution, particularly where the relatives are ordinarily unconnected with the couple's affairs. That caution does not justify quashing a complaint disclosing specific conduct and a triable case. Applying Taramani Parakh, the High Court found clear allegations of cruelty, a specified dowry demand and expulsion from the matrimonial home. Their truth and reliability remained for trial. The precedents involving other relatives do not create an inflexible exemption from prosecution.	323
Divorce proceedings preceding a cruelty FIR — counterblast plea	The filing of a divorce petition before a cruelty FIR does not, by itself, justify quashing the criminal case as retaliatory. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, the Court treated civil and criminal proceedings as independent even where they arise from the same facts. It assessed the specific allegations of cruelty and dowry demand rather than deciding the applicants' claim of falsity from the sequence of the proceedings.	325
Section 482 CrPC — Partial quashing of vague allegations against a sister-in-law	The principal dowry demand was attributed to the mother-in-law, while the sister-in-law was collectively accused of misbehaviour and beating without clear particulars identifying when she allegedly assaulted the complainant. On that record, the Court found the allegations against the sister-in-law insufficiently specific and quashed both the FIR and pending criminal case only as to her. The husband’s and mother-in-law’s prosecution continued after their own quashing requests were withdrawn with liberty to raise trial defences. The ruling did not make absence of a date, by itself, a universal ground for quashing.	356
Quashing: Uncontroverted Allegations Disclosing an Offence	In deciding the Article 226 challenge, the Court examined whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence. Since the allegations in the FIR disclosed a cognizable offence, it declined interference. This assessment did not involve adjudicating the disputed defence on evidence.	361
Quashing for Want of Specific Allegations: Effect on a Co-Accused	Quashing proceedings against relatives because specific allegations were absent does not amount to a finding that the complainant's allegations were false. Such relief does not establish a ground to quash a distinct, specific accusation against another accused.	362
FIR: Basic Factual Foundation Rather Than Exhaustive Detail	An FIR need not contain an exhaustive account of the evidence. In considering quashing, the court asks whether the basic factual foundation of the alleged offence is present, rather than requiring every legal ingredient to be reproduced verbatim or evaluating the record as at trial.	362
Quashing: Surviving Allegations Despite Disputed Travel History	A disputed claim that some accused remained abroad after a visit did not dispose of specific allegations of cruelty committed while all had earlier lived together. Even accepting that some did not return, the earlier allegations remained to be investigated. The Court declined to resolve the contested travel account or assess the collected evidence on its merits while the investigation was incomplete.	363
Successive Quashing Petition on a Previously Unraised Ground	After a Section 482 CrPC challenge to cognizance had been rejected on merits, a successive petition could not reopen the same relief by raising a Section 468 ground omitted earlier; Section 362 barred that course. The court was not expected to decide an unraised ground on its own without hearing the State or opposite party. A case permitting a successive petition because an expressly raised defence had been overlooked was distinguishable.	376
Good Faith as a Factual Defence at Trial	Whether the officers acted in good faith was also a question of fact requiring evidence. In refusing to quash the unsafe-road prosecution, the Court confined its finding on the unavailability of Section 28 protection to the Section 482 proceedings. The trial court was directed to determine the defence on the evidence independently, without being prejudiced by that preliminary assessment.	387

Specific dowry and jewellery allegations —quashing refused	Specific allegations of dowry demands, harassment and retention of jewellery provided sufficient material to continue proceedings against the parents-in-law, elder brother-in-law and his wife. Whether the alleged harassment actually occurred was a matter for trial, rather than determination under Section 482 CrPC.	411
Delay in lodging an FIR—insufficient by itself for quashing	Delay in reporting the alleged offence does not, by itself, justify quashing an FIR. Genuine reasons may explain delayed reporting, while prompt reporting is also no conclusive guarantee of truth. The Court rejected delay as a standalone ground for terminating this prosecution.	411
Cruelty FIR filed after divorce notice —counterblast allegation	An FIR alleging matrimonial cruelty cannot be quashed merely because it followed service of a divorce petition. Efforts to preserve the marriage can explain why the wife did not complain earlier; the sequence of the divorce notice and FIR did not establish abuse of process in this case.	411
FIR after a matrimonial separation petition— counterblast objection	The wife's FIR could not be quashed merely because it followed the husband's petition under Section 10 of the Hindu Marriage Act. That sequence did not by itself establish the counterblast defence, and the disputed allegations in the husband's earlier police complaint remained matters for trial.	415
Dated and specific cruelty allegations against matrimonial relatives	Allegations identifying the applicants' roles in dated episodes of dowry demand, abuse, instigation to expel the wife and assault were sufficiently specific to withstand the challenge that they were vague or omnibus. The Court refused quashing without determining whether those allegations would be proved at trial.	415
Delayed cruelty complaint during efforts to preserve marriage	A wife's silence while attempting to preserve her marriage does not, by itself, make a later cruelty complaint false or an afterthought. Reporting after the prospect of reconciliation has ended must be assessed in context rather than treated as an automatic ground to quash.	415
Quashing safeguards and allegations of informant malice	The inherent power remains available where allegations disclose no offence, an express legal bar applies or demonstrated abuse of process requires intervention. An allegation that the informant bears malice is not, by itself, enough to quash an otherwise sustainable prosecution; the evidence collected and proved remains material to its outcome.	416
Essential Commodities Act FIR—complaint need not come only from Collector	The Court rejected the claim that only the Collector could initiate the FIR for the alleged PDS contraventions. Following Jagdish Kushwah's interpretation of the earlier 2009 Control Order, it held that adding an exclusive "only" requirement would conflict with the cognizable character of the offence under Section 10-A of the Essential Commodities Act.	418
Quashing matrimonial proceedings against relatives on vague and omnibus allegations	Vague, general and omnibus allegations are insufficient to prosecute the husband's relatives without a specific role attributed to them. The FIR and Section 161 CrPC statement contained no specific allegation against applicants 3–7. Applying Kans Raj, Monju Roy and Chandralekha, the Court quashed the FIR and consequential proceedings against those five relatives, while separately examining the specific allegations against the husband and mother-in-law.	420
Specific allegations required against in-laws despite residence in the same village	Relatives cannot be compelled to face trial for matrimonial cruelty on vague and omnibus allegations without particulars of their acts. Applying Kans Raj, Monju Roy, Chandralekha, Preeti Gupta and Neelu Chopra, the Court found no specific account of how applicants 4–10 had harassed the wife. The collective allegation that they barred her entry for failure to bring ₹5 lakh was insufficient on this record. Although applicants 4–8 lived in the same village and distance did not rule out day-to-day interference, specific allegations were still necessary; applicants 9–10 lived separately in other cities. The FIR, charge-sheet and consequential proceedings were quashed against applicants 4–10.	426
Order of cross-FIR	The fact that one side registered its FIR earlier does not by itself establish that	438

registration and identification of the aggressor	the later cross-FIR is a counter-blast or identify the aggressor. The explanation for the interval, including police referral for treatment and hospitalisation, must be considered. Where an encounter is admitted but the parties give rival accounts, the Court cannot decide who was the aggressor under Section 528 BNSS. An informant's alleged mala fides are secondary where the complaint discloses a cognizable offence.
Companies Act penalties and concurrent applicability of the IPC	A special statute's penalties do not by themselves exclude prosecution under the IPC where no statutory bar applies and the ingredients of the respective offences are met. Section 26 of the General Clauses Act permits prosecution and punishment under either or any applicable enactment but prohibits double punishment for the same offence. Applying the narrated statutory-coexistence authorities, the Court rejected the contention that the alleged company fraud could be prosecuted only under the Companies Act and refused to quash the IPC proceedings.	447
Delay alone and disputed facts at the quashing stage	Delay in lodging a complaint does not, by itself, justify quashing. At the initial Section 482 stage, the court does not resolve disputed facts or test the truth and reliability of the allegations as at trial. The adopted FIR authorities explain that prompt reporting assists timely investigation and reduces the opportunity for fabrication, but does not guarantee truth; genuine reasons for delay may exist and delayed reporting is not inherently illegal. Applying those principles to the private complaint, the Court rejected the delay ground without deciding whether the allegations were ultimately proved.	449
Co-accused acquittal during abscondence and the applicant's separate prosecution	Acquittal of co-accused in a trial conducted while the applicant was absconding did not itself entitle him to discharge or quashing. No legal basis was identified for treating that judgment or evidence recorded in his absence as binding in his favour. Without commenting on the acquittal reasons, the Court found a prima facie case against the applicant on the complaint and sale deeds and required him to face his own trial. It did not borrow a finding of guilt from the co-accused trial.	449
Restitution Proceedings Do Not by Themselves Establish a Counterblast FIR	The institution of proceedings under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act did not by itself justify quashing the criminal FIR as a counterblast. Civil matrimonial and criminal proceedings are independent, and findings to be made in the restitution case would not bind the criminal court. The Court therefore rejected the objection based on the FIR following the restitution proceedings.	458
Matrimonial FIR lodged after a divorce petition	The filing of a divorce petition before the wife's FIR does not by itself establish a malicious counterblast or justify quashing. A wife may delay reporting while hoping for reconciliation and complain when those efforts fail. Applying Pratibha, the Court rejected an adverse inference based merely on that sequence and declined to quash an FIR whose allegations disclosed a prima facie offence.	460
Inherent jurisdiction and an effective statutory remedy	Section 482 CrPC cannot be used inconsistently with a specific provision of the Code. The reproduced principles require restraint where the statute supplies an effective remedy that the litigant has not pursued. Inherent jurisdiction remains directed to giving effect to orders under the Code, preventing abuse of process and securing the ends of justice.	460
Divorce proceedings preceding a cruelty FIR: counterblast objection	A divorce petition filed before a cruelty FIR does not, by that sequence alone, establish a retaliatory prosecution. The Court treated the wife's later complaint as consistent with waiting until reconciliation appeared unlikely. Civil divorce proceedings and criminal proceedings are independent, and the pendency of the former cannot end the latter merely because they arise from overlapping facts.	469
Parallel civil and criminal proceedings — Pendency, stay and precedence	A criminal complaint concerning forged documents cannot be quashed merely because the dispute also has a civil aspect or a civil suit is pending. Both proceedings may continue and must be decided independently. Criminal proceedings ordinarily receive precedence, but there is no inflexible rule.	470

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Whether either proceeding should be stayed depends on the circumstances, including its nature and stage and the likelihood of embarrassment. A pending civil case, even before a higher court, does not itself bar prosecution.
Civil and criminal findings — Independent proof and relevance of previous judgments	Civil and criminal proceedings apply different standards of proof: preponderance of probabilities in civil cases and proof beyond reasonable doubt in criminal cases. Each court decides on the evidence adduced before it; findings in one proceeding do not automatically bind the other. A previous judgment may nevertheless be relevant under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act. Its relevance and effect must be examined in the particular case, including the conclusiveness prescribed by Section 41.	470
Successive quashing petition — earlier withdrawal and requirement of changed circumstances	Withdrawal of revisions challenging charges, with liberty to raise grounds before the appropriate court at the appropriate stage, did not permit a fresh Section 482 CrPC challenge based on the same charge-sheet and grounds already available. A later petition may be maintainable on genuinely changed circumstances; the applicant must establish that change. Mohan Singh was distinguished because the trial there had made no progress after the earlier refusal, whereas six prosecution witnesses had been examined here and complete order sheets were not produced to substantiate the delay plea. Applying Bhisham Lal Verma and M.C. Ravikumar, the Court rejected successive presentation of available grounds and reiterated that inherent power cannot override the Section 362 bar on reviewing a final order, apart from clerical or arithmetical correction. The petition was dismissed as not maintainable without deciding the evidentiary objections.	486
Matrimonial FIR quashing — divorce proceedings and alleged counterblast	An FIR cannot be quashed merely because it was lodged after a divorce petition. Applying Pratibha, the Court recognised that efforts to preserve the marriage may explain delayed reporting and that quashing must address whether the complaint or FIR allegations disclose a prima facie offence, without relying on extraneous considerations. Here, the complainant expressly explained her earlier silence as an attempt to preserve her matrimonial life. The applicants' property and separate-residence defences did not remove the specific allegations on a plain reading of the FIR. The Court refused quashing without adjudicating the truth of those allegations or the ownership dispute.	495
Quashing a cheque-theft prosecution founded on a fabricated loss report	A prosecution for theft, forgery and misuse of a cheque may be quashed under Section 482 CrPC where reliable material establishes that it was instituted to create a false defence to a pending cheque-dishonour complaint. Here, the original police inward register disproved the claimed receipt of the loss report, and the cheque-series history and admitted signature further undermined the asserted loss. On the combined record, the Court found the loss document fabricated and quashed the FIR and consequential Sessions proceedings. This determination did not dispose of the separate Section 138 NI Act complaint.	502
Unproved allotment and an unregistered community panchnama as grounds for quashing an FIR	An asserted right to the site did not justify quashing an FIR alleging damage to a statue. The Sarpanch's consent letter did not establish that the land was abadi land or that the Gram Panchayat was competent to allot it. A panchnama by community members purporting to gift the property to their own community was not a gift by the alleged allottee or his wife; the gift required registration and the panchnama transferred no title.	513
Civil transactions with criminal ingredients and quashing under Section 528 BNSS	A dispute that is essentially civil cannot be given a criminal form to harass a party. The High Court must examine whether the alleged facts disclose the ingredients of a criminal offence. Where they do, the availability of a civil claim does not prevent criminal proceedings. Applying these principles under Section 528 BNSS, the Court refused to treat the alleged purchase, resale and retention of the farmers' money as a mere civil payment dispute.	514
Quashing-stage	An FIR or charge-sheet may be quashed where the uncontroverted allegations	516

observations on consent and independent determination at trial	do not make out an offence. The alleged false promise of reemployment and the employment relationship prevented quashing on the asserted ground of consensual sexual relations. The Court expressly limited its observations to Section 482 review and directed the trial court to decide on the evidence without being influenced by them.
Alleged Political Vendetta Where the FIR Discloses a Cognizable Offence	An allegation that the informant acted from political enmity does not by itself justify quashing where the report discloses a cognizable offence. The informant's motive becomes secondary to the allegations and the evidence. The Court declined to decide the disputed claim of political vendetta under Section 482 and refused quashing based merely on inimical relations. This assessment preserves the exceptional power to prevent a demonstrably malicious abuse of process.	525
Section 482 CrPC — quashing matrimonial prosecution based on vague allegations against relatives	A husband's near or distant relatives cannot be compelled to face criminal trial on vague, omnibus allegations without specific instances or material identifying their involvement. A casual reference to their names in a matrimonial FIR is insufficient. Applying this principle to an uncle-in-law and an unmarried sister-in-law who were named only collectively in the initial allegations and were not implicated in the later specifically described incident, the Court set aside the orders refusing discharge under Section 239 CrPC. It quashed their charge sheet and prosecution under Sections 498A, 506 and 34 IPC and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act.	541
Limited quashing observations and independent decision at trial	Observations made while refusing quashing were confined to the limited scope of interference at that stage. The trial court was required to decide the complaint according to law on the material brought on record, independently of that preliminary assessment.	579
Specific allegations against the husband's relatives at the FIR-quashing stage	Vague and general allegations are insufficient to compel the husband's relatives to face trial, but the actual allegations must be assessed for specificity. The FIR attributed a particular assault and expulsion to all five applicants and a vehicle demand to the husband and mother-in-law. These allegations justified refusal to quash under Section 528 BNSS. A brother-in-law's separate employment and residence did not establish his absence on the alleged day of assault and expulsion.	589
Medical illness and quashing of criminal proceedings	An accused's medical ailment alone is not a ground to quash criminal proceedings. Without doubting the assertion of cancer and kidney problems, the Court rejected that ground but allowed the applicant to seek permanent exemption from personal appearance through representation by counsel, if required. The trial court was directed to consider such an application on the medical documents. Exemption was left for that court to decide.	597
Special statutory procedure and prosecution under the IPC	A separate procedure under a special enactment does not exclude recourse to the IPC unless the law creates a bar. Applying State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, the Court rejected the contention that the Essential Commodities Act or the food-distribution scheme made IPC prosecution unavailable merely because it provided a separate procedure. No bar to the applicability of the IPC was shown.	600
Disputed stock records and offline distribution allegations at the quashing stage	Where officials allegedly procured offline distribution by promising an adjustment in the POS balance and then demanded payment under threat of prosecution for the resulting shortage, accurate figures for online transactions did not answer the allegation. Whether the instructions were given and whether stock was short required investigation. The Court found a prima facie basis to investigate the alleged conduct, without determining guilt or accepting the applicant's disputed account.	600
Reopening an anticipatory-bail rejection in an FIR-	An application under Section 482 CrPC to quash an FIR cannot be used to reargue the correctness of the Court's concluded refusal of anticipatory bail. The Court treated itself as functus officio regarding that decision and stated that	600

quashing petition	the applicant could challenge it before the Supreme Court. Arguments seeking reconsideration of bail were therefore not entertained in the quashing proceeding.
Blanket protection from arrest after refusal to quash an FIR	When refusing to quash criminal proceedings, the High Court cannot grant a blanket direction against arrest or coercive steps until investigation is completed. Applying Neeharika Infrastructure and its reproduced discussion of Habib Abdullah Jeelani and Ravuri Krishna Murthy, the Court held that such protection would bypass the conditions of Section 438 CrPC and hamper investigation. It refused the requested protection, particularly when anticipatory bail had already been rejected.	600
Material suppression as a ground to refuse judicial relief	Suppression can justify refusal of relief only when the concealed fact is material to adjudication and would affect the merits or outcome. Applying S.J.S. Business Enterprises, the Court distinguished an immaterial omission from a material deception. Because absence of a preliminary inquiry would not itself invalidate the FIR, the dispute about what counsel had earlier said on that issue did not alter the quashing result.	600
Inconclusive foreign divorce decree as a defence to criminal proceedings	A foreign divorce decree must satisfy Section 13 CPC before it can be treated as conclusive on matters adjudicated. The Swedish petition was not a joint application for divorce by consent. The decree was unreasoned, did not decide the cruelty allegations on their merits and ignored the applicable Indian law. The Court therefore found it inconclusive and of no assistance in seeking quashing of the wife's criminal allegations. This conclusion concerned the decree produced in this case.	601
Responsibility for road-work safety and the claimed managing-director status	The applicant's own power of attorney described him as a partner of the contractor undertaking the road work. The Court treated him as a part-owner responsible for execution, rather than accepting his claim to be merely a managing director. The subcontract and site instructions required warning signs, flags and safety arrangements at both ends of the culvert. In view of those duties and the alleged failure that caused the fatal accident, the Court declined to quash the prosecution under Section 482 CrPC.	617
Omission of other accused is no ground to quash a prima facie prosecution	Proceedings against a person charge-sheeted after investigation on a prima facie case cannot be quashed merely because other possible participants were not charge-sheeted or cognizance was not taken against them. Applying Suvarna Cooperative Bank, the Court rejected the applicants' challenge based on the omission of other accused.	625
Quashing a Sexual-Offence FIR on the Judicial Statement and Investigation Record	Where the complainant, who was an adult when the FIR was lodged, stated under Section 164 CrPC that the applicant had committed no offence against her and that the report had been obtained under coercion, the Court assessed that statement with the police case diary and her father's Section 161 statement. The father had not described any earlier sexual abuse, and the Court accepted the explanation that the earlier allegations were made under coercion. On the totality of this record, continuation of the prosecution was held to be an abuse of process, and the FIR under Section 376 IPC and Sections 5(b)(i) and 6 of the POCSO Act was quashed. The Court expressly refrained from commenting on the asserted marriage.	656
Counterblast allegation and old enmity as grounds for quashing	Where a complaint discloses a cognizable offence, allegations of the complainant's mala fides are secondary and cannot by themselves justify quashing. Old enmity can explain either false implication or commission of an offence. Its effect is a disputed question of fact for the trial court after evidence is recorded.	661
Mala fides of the informant where a cognizable offence is	Once the complaint discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides become secondary and cannot alone justify quashing. Where the purchasers had no right to possession of a specific parcel before partition, their	663

disclosed	reliance on the civil decree did not establish that the FIR was malicious or an abuse of process.
Parallel Section 145 proceedings during civil adjudication of possession	Where civil proceedings concerning title or possession of the same property are pending and the civil court can grant effective protective relief, parallel, unfinished Section 145 CrPC proceedings should not continue. Prior final adjudication by the civil court is not essential to this rule. The parties may seek injunction, receivership or other appropriate interim relief in the civil proceedings; here they could also invoke Order XXXIX Rule 2-A CPC.	664
Non-joinder in the civil suit and parallel Section 145 relief	Where the competent civil court is already dealing with the property and has granted interim protection, the fact that the person seeking Section 145 CrPC relief is not a defendant in that suit does not, by itself, justify a parallel preventive proceeding. In the circumstances considered, appropriate protection could be sought from the civil court.	664
Civil suit filed after a concluded Section 145 order	A civil suit filed after a final Section 145 CrPC order does not, merely by its institution, require that concluded order to be quashed. That situation differs from a pending preventive proceeding begun after civil litigation over the same property in which effective protective relief is available. The pendency of any civil suit is therefore not an automatic bar to Section 145 proceedings.	664
Personal allegations of police mala fides —Impleadment and hearing	A person against whom personal bias or mala fides are alleged must be impleaded by name and given an opportunity to answer. Without that person being a party, the Court cannot inquire into the allegations to their detriment. Since the police personnel accused of coercive conduct were not impleaded, the allegation that they had abducted the applicant's daughter was not examined.	666
Particulars required for a plea of mala fides	Allegations of mala fides must be clear and specific. Vague assertions do not suffice, and the person whose conduct is challenged must have an opportunity to meet the particular allegations.	666
Divorce proceedings do not by themselves justify quashing a cruelty FIR	Filing a divorce petition does not itself justify quashing criminal proceedings arising from matrimonial cruelty. Relying on Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, the Court explained that civil and criminal proceedings are independent and that pendency of a civil proceeding cannot end a criminal proceeding merely because both concern the same facts. It also stated that civil-court findings do not bind the criminal court. Here, the asserted counterblast chronology was itself incorrect: the FIR preceded the husband's divorce petition. The Court therefore declined to quash the FIR on that basis.	671
Pending guardianship proceedings and forcible removal of a child	Pendency of a guardianship application does not permit a parent to take the child's custody by force. Where the applicant had no custody order in his favour, the custody dispute did not justify interference under Section 528 BNSS with an FIR whose allegations of assault and threats disclosed a cognizable offence.	680
Quashing suicide-abetment proceedings — tentative assessment of instigation	When considering quashing of suicide-abetment proceedings, the Court forms a tentative view from the prosecution record rather than marshalling and evaluating the evidence as at trial. Instigation may emerge from the circumstances and a course of conduct without direct exhortation. Where those materials prima facie disclose the offence, their disputed truth is not finally decided in the quashing petition.	684
Section 482 CrPC — statutory purposes and restraint in consequential observations	The relied-upon D. Venkatasubramaniam passage confines inherent power under Section 482 CrPC to giving effect to an order under the Code, preventing abuse of the process of a court and securing the ends of justice. The jurisdiction must be exercised sparingly, carefully and cautiously. The reproduced reasoning also cautions that higher-court observations can influence later events and legal proceedings: uncalled-for observations with far-reaching consequences should not be made casually, particularly without hearing	741 affected persons. These limits supported the High Court's refusal to prescribe arrest or a charge-sheet as the required course of investigation.

Effect of matrimonial decrees on quashing a cruelty FIR	Civil Court findings do not bind the Criminal Court. Dismissal of the wife's divorce petition under Section 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act and grant of the husband's restitution petition under Section 9 therefore did not justify quashing her cruelty FIR. The Family Court's criticism of directly reporting Section 498A cruelty was legally erroneous; its inference of affection from a joint locker also overlooked the wife's expenses and deposit and the mother-in-law's retention of the key.	783
Undertaking not to pursue legal proceedings in a cruelty prosecution	An alleged undertaking not to take legal action did not bar the cruelty FIR. The Court applied Section 28 of the Contract Act to reject the restraint on legal proceedings as void. It also relied on Section 41 of the Specific Relief Act in stating that an injunction could not restrain the complainant from taking such legal recourse.	784
Pending marriage-nullity petition and quashing of a cruelty FIR	The complainant's application under Section 11 of the Hindu Marriage Act did not adversely affect the cruelty FIR or supply a ground for quashing it. In the circumstances, the Court regarded the application as supporting her allegations.	784
Statutory purposes and reasoned exercise of inherent powers	Section 482 CrPC permits orders necessary to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of a court's process or secure the ends of justice. The power must be exercised sparingly and with care. Intervention requires reasons, and the Court must avoid casual observations capable of prejudicing persons or influencing the course of criminal proceedings.	791
Section 482 CrPC — grounds for exercising inherent powers	The High Court may exercise its inherent power, on an application or on its own motion, to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the process of a court, or secure the ends of justice. The power must be exercised sparingly, carefully and with caution where those statutory purposes justify it.	802
Section 482 CrPC — specific assistance in kidnapping and confinement	Specific allegations that the applicant transported the girl with the co-accused, provided a room, locked her inside and supplied food while the co-accused repeatedly raped her furnished grounds to refuse quashing. The asserted voluntary marriage did not displace the girl's contrary statement before the High Court that she had been forcibly married. The Court treated the applicant's alleged assistance as material when refusing to quash the FIR.	809
Section 482 CrPC — disclosure of an earlier rejection of bail	When seeking relief under Section 482 CrPC, counsel is expected to disclose whether the applicant's bail application has been rejected. Suppressing the recent rejection of anticipatory bail while repeating contentions already considered was treated as an attempt to mislead the Court. Lawyers, as officers of the Court, must present the case candidly so that the Court can pass a correct order.	809
Section 482 CrPC — marriage performed contrary to an operative restraint	The claimed marriage did not support quashing where it had been performed by an institution specifically restrained by the High Court from conducting marriages. The earlier order had treated a marriage performed by that institution contrary to the restraint as invalid; the present Court also noted dismissal of the institution's writ appeal. This reason was considered alongside the girl's statement that the marriage was forced.	809
Post-charge-sheet quashing petition after earlier investigation-stage petitions	Dismissal of an earlier FIR-quashing petition during investigation did not bar the later challenge to the charge sheet. Further evidence could still have been collected when the first petition was dismissed, whereas the later petition challenged the completed investigation. The intervening petition had also been withdrawn with liberty to challenge the charge sheet. In these circumstances, the subsequent Section 482 CrPC petition was maintainable.	831
Prior divorce as a ground for quashing	Dissolution of the parties' marriage did not justify quashing allegations of a later incident of abuse, assault and threats. Those allegations concerned conduct	837

allegations of a subsequent assault	independent of the parties' marital status. The earlier compromise divorce decree and alimony arrangement therefore did not answer an FIR that otherwise prima facie disclosed the charged offences.
General allegations of misuse based on the complainant's gender	A general accusation that a complainant is misusing her position merely because she is a woman was deprecated and rejected. Such a broad allegation against a woman or the female community did not displace the specific FIR allegations, which prima facie disclosed the charged offences.	837
Investigation of combined cognizable and non-cognizable offences	When the police investigate multiple offences that include a cognizable offence and a non-cognizable offence, they cannot be prevented from investigating the non-cognizable offence merely because of its character. Applying Ushaben, the Court found no ground to quash the FIR on the objection raised under Section 195 CrPC.	841
Section 482 challenge to a Section 156(3) direction where forgery is alleged	In reviewing the direction under Section 156(3) CrPC, the Court examined whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence. Allegations that an agreement to sell had been forged and used to institute a civil suit disclosed a cognizable offence; pendency of that suit did not justify interference with registration and investigation under Sections 420, 467, 468, 471 and 120-B IPC.	844
Purpose and limits of inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC	Section 482 preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the court's process and secure the ends of justice. Its exercise is exceptional, sparing and cautious; the Court does not act as an appellate or revisional court under this provision. Proceedings may be quashed when their initiation or continuation amounts to abuse of process or quashing is necessary to secure justice, but the power must not stifle a legitimate prosecution.	844
Reasoned and cautious exercise of Section 482 CrPC powers	The reproduced D. Venkatasubramaniam reasoning confines inherent power to giving effect to orders under the Code, preventing abuse of the court's process and securing the ends of justice. Exercise must be sparing, careful and justified by those purposes. The High Court must record why interference is required and avoid casual or uncalled-for observations that may influence the course of criminal proceedings or harm persons who have not been heard.	845
Hearing before drastic judicial directions to arrest or prosecute	In the D. Venkatasubramaniam passage reproduced and relied upon, judicial directions for arrest, seizure and filing of a charge-sheet were held invalid where the affected accused had not been impleaded or heard. The narrated Divine Retreat Centre reasoning concerns a judicial order initiating investigation from an anonymous petition and the need for a reasonable hearing before an order with drastic reputational consequences.	848
Purposes, reasons and caution in exercise of inherent criminal powers	The reproduced Section 482 CrPC reasoning permits inherent intervention to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of the court's process and secure the ends of justice. Exercise must be sparing, careful and justified by those purposes. Reasons for interference must be recorded, and casual or uncalled-for observations capable of influencing criminal proceedings or prejudicing unheard persons must be avoided.	848
Matrimonial civil proceedings and a plea that the criminal FIR is a counterblast	The fact that the husband had initiated restitution-of-conjugal-rights proceedings before the wife's FIR did not by itself justify quashing the criminal case as a counterblast. Civil and criminal proceedings are independent, and pendency of matrimonial civil proceedings does not terminate a criminal prosecution arising from the same facts where the allegations disclose an offence.	861
Collateral prosecution directions beyond the issues in a criminal trial	The trial court exceeded its jurisdiction by directing prosecution and departmental action against municipal officials and witnesses on findings about demolition proceedings whose validity was not an issue in the shooting trial. The directions also disregarded the High Court's earlier order quashing their	864

	summoning under Section 319 CrPC. The collateral directions in paragraphs 77, 79 and 80 were set aside; the merits of the shooters' acquittal were left to the pending State appeal.
Adverse judicial remarks: opportunity to explain, evidence and necessity	Before making disparaging remarks about a person or authority, the court must consider whether that person is before it or has had an opportunity to explain, whether evidence justifies the criticism, and whether the remarks are necessary to decide the case. Castigating remarks capable of serious career consequences require an opportunity of hearing. Unnecessary findings and consequential directions concerning the demolition officials and witnesses could not stand in the shooting trial.	864
Personal allegations of mala fides require personal impleadment	A person accused of personal bias or mala fides must be impleaded in that capacity and given an opportunity to answer the allegations. The Court cannot inquire into such accusations or condemn the person unheard. Allegations must also be clear and specific. As the SDM had not been impleaded in his personal capacity, the Court declined to consider the personal allegations against him in the FIR-quashing proceedings.	871
Section 482 CrPC — prima facie allegations and limits on credibility assessment	Quashing under Section 482 CrPC is exceptional and must be exercised cautiously. The Court considers whether the uncontroverted allegations, accepted as a whole, prima facie disclose an offence; it does not try their truth, assess witness credibility or weigh the defence as at trial. Absence of an offence, inherently absurd allegations, a clear abuse of process or an express legal bar may justify intervention. Specific allegations of a dowry-linked car demand, beatings and taking the complainant’s ornaments disclosed a triable case under Sections 498A/34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Their reliability could not be determined in the quashing application.	881
Section 482 CrPC — disputed private defence documents and the public-document exception	The High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused’s defence or determine the veracity of defence documents when considering quashing. In an appropriate case, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. Private photographs, WhatsApp chats, gifts and payment records relied on to deny dowry cruelty required proof in accordance with law; the Court could not take judicial notice of them or resolve the contested defence through a detailed merits inquiry under Section 482 CrPC.	881
Matrimonial cruelty — specific allegations against relatives and caution about omnibus accusations	Courts must exercise caution when matrimonial complaints make omnibus allegations against relatives who are not generally concerned with the couple’s affairs. That caution does not warrant quashing a triable case containing specific allegations of participation. The sister-in-law was specifically alleged to have insisted on a car for her brother and participated in taking the complainant’s ornaments. Whether those allegations were true was a matter for trial. Decisions quashing proceedings against relatives on different facts do not establish an inflexible exemption for relatives.	881
Personal allegations against an investigating officer — impleadment and opportunity to respond	Personal allegations against an investigating officer cannot be considered unless the officer is impleaded as a respondent in her personal capacity and given an opportunity to explain them. As the applicants had not impleaded the officer, the Court declined to examine their personal allegations against her.	881
FIR and complaint — factual foundation without exhaustive pleading of ingredients	An FIR need not contain every detail. A complaint is not required to reproduce the legal ingredients of the offence verbatim; where it lays the necessary factual foundation and substantially satisfies the requirements of the offence, proceedings should not be quashed merely because some ingredients have not been stated in detail. Quashing remains available where even the basic facts necessary to constitute the offence are absent.	881

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 482 CrPC — tentative assessment of material alleging abetment of suicide	On a request to quash proceedings for abetment of suicide, the Court forms a tentative view from the record and accompanying documents; it does not finally marshal the evidence or determine guilt. Instigation may be inferred from a continuing course of conduct, even without direct evidence. The suicide note and witness statements together supplied sufficient material to prosecute both applicants, including the alleged common intention of applicant 2 despite the absence of a specific rape-threat allegation against her in the note. The Court also rejected the claim that applicant 1's status as a doctor justified exemption from facing prosecution, as no supporting provision of law was shown.	884
FIR at the quashing stage — factual foundation without exhaustive detail	An FIR is not expected to be an encyclopedia. Where the factual foundation of an offence is laid, proceedings should not be quashed merely because every ingredient has not been stated in detail. The Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations prima facie disclose the offence, without conducting the detailed inquiry into merits that belongs to trial.	893
Pending restitution petition — no automatic inference that a later cruelty FIR is a counterblast	A wife's FIR cannot be quashed merely because it follows a petition for divorce or restitution of conjugal rights. Civil and criminal proceedings are independent. Here the husband's Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act petition was still pending, and its allegations could not be treated as proved. Its pendency therefore did not establish that the wife's FIR was a counterblast or displace the allegations of dowry demand and expulsion from the matrimonial home.	896
Specific allegations against relatives and refusal to quash cruelty proceedings	The caution against omnibus implication of the husband's relatives does not require quashing where specific conduct discloses a triable case. The FIR attributed dowry-related instigation, assault and expulsion from the matrimonial home to the younger brother-in-law and mother-in-law. Those allegations, accepted at face value, supplied sufficient material to proceed against them. Their truth and the competing defence remained matters for trial.	925
Quashing after framing of charge or commencement of evidence	The power under Section 482 CrPC is available at the threshold and at an intermediate or advanced stage, including after framing of charge or recording of evidence. Where the prosecution material, accepted in its entirety, does not disclose a triable offence, continuation may be stopped to prevent abuse of process. Material revealed by investigation may be examined for that limited purpose, without deciding guilt or innocence. The progress of the trial alone did not bar relief to the distant relative.	925
Express legal bar to institution or continuation of prosecution	An express statutory bar protecting the accused against institution or continuation of criminal proceedings may justify quashing under Section 482 CrPC. The power must be exercised sparingly and on sound legal grounds, without using it to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	925
Quashing criminal proceedings instituted for an ulterior purpose	The criminal process cannot be used as a weapon of harassment or persecution. Where sufficient material shows that proceedings were maliciously instituted to wreak personal vengeance or that continuation would abuse the process of court, the High Court may intervene under Section 482 CrPC. The power requires caution and cannot rest on a disputed defence or a premature assessment of evidentiary reliability.	925
Specific allegations against relatives and the limits of FIR quashing	Proceedings may be quashed where the allegations are absurd, disclose no offence or amount to abuse of process. Caution is required when matrimonial complaints make omnibus allegations against relatives who are not ordinarily concerned with the couple's affairs. Where specific allegations disclose a triable case, however, the Court cannot assess the reliability of the allegations or the defence version under Section 482 CrPC. The specific allegations against each applicant therefore precluded quashing at this stage.	930
An earlier divorce petition does not by itself justify	The filing of a divorce petition does not by itself justify quashing criminal proceedings as a counterblast. Civil matrimonial proceedings and criminal proceedings are independent, even when they arise from the same facts.	953

quashing a cruelty FIR	Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi as reproduced in the judgment, the Court rejected the applicants' reliance on the earlier divorce petition and assessed whether the FIR disclosed a prima facie offence. The reproduced precedent also explains that delay during efforts at matrimonial reconciliation does not by itself justify an adverse inference or permit the quashing court to rely on extraneous considerations.
Preliminary observations while refusing quashing do not determine trial facts	Observations made within the limited jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC are not conclusive findings on the disputed facts. In refusing quashing, the Court expressly directed that, apart from the stated legal position, its observations should not influence or prejudice the trial court. The trial was to be decided strictly on the evidence brought on record.	953
Delay in lodging the FIR is not by itself a ground for quashing	Mere delay in reporting an alleged offence does not make the FIR illegal or supply an independent ground for quashing. Following Skoda Auto Volkswagen, Ravinder Kumar and Mohammad Wajid, the Court held that no universal reporting period is fixed and genuine reasons may explain delay. Prompt reporting assists investigation and reduces the opportunity for fabrication, but does not guarantee truth. The applicants' reliance on a seventeen-day interval therefore did not warrant quashing: the complainant could explain the delay, and the Court noted the alleged effort to recover unpaid masonry charges and absence of previous enmity. The Court distinguished delay alone from an actual statutory time bar.	956
Limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents in a quashing application	Ordinarily, the High Court does not appreciate the accused's defence or decide the veracity of defence documents under Section 482 CrPC. The exception reproduced from Mohd. Akram Siddiqui permits consideration, in an appropriate case, of a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. That limited exception does not authorise adjudication of rival factual accounts or testing disputed defence material as though at trial.	956
A pending counter-complaint does not itself justify quashing the opposing FIR	The existence of the accused's complaint alleging misconduct by the informant is not by itself a ground to quash the informant's FIR. Where the rival versions raise disputed questions about what happened, the High Court cannot choose the correct account under Section 482 CrPC. The applicants' allegation that the complainant entered the house and tried to outrage a woman's modesty, and the pendency of their complaint, therefore did not displace the prosecution. The Court left the competing accounts to be tested on evidence.	956
Absence of legal evidence is distinct from a dispute about the weight of evidence	The R.P. Kapur principles reproduced through Renu Kumari distinguish a case with no legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, from one in which legal evidence may or may not support the charge after appreciation. The former may warrant exercise of the inherent power; the latter ordinarily requires the trial court to assess reliability and weight. A quashing application cannot be used to obtain a premature merits determination merely because the accused disputes the prosecution evidence.	956
A pending civil suit over a will does not by itself bar a criminal forgery complaint	A criminal complaint alleging forgery or fraudulent use of a will cannot be quashed merely because a civil suit concerning the document is pending. Applying M.S. Sheriff, M. Krishnan, Kamaladevi Agarwal and P. Swaroopa Rani, the Court held that civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously and the criminal allegations must be established independently. The civil nature of part of the dispute, or the possibility of different conclusions, does not by itself displace the prosecution. It therefore declined to interfere with the Sessions Judge's order setting aside the dismissal under Section 203 CrPC and directing registration of the complaint.	958
Stay and precedence between parallel	The ordinary preference for prompt criminal proceedings does not create an inflexible rule that one proceeding must always be stayed. The M.S. Sheriff	958

civil and criminal proceedings depend on the circumstances	principles adopted in the judgment identify the risk of embarrassment and special considerations, including the stage reached in either proceeding, as relevant to sequencing. The mere possibility of conflicting decisions is insufficient. Read with P. Swaroopa Rani and Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam, whether a stay is justified therefore depends on the nature, stage and circumstances of the particular proceedings.
Will-based mutation dispute without an allegation of forgery	Where the complaint concerned mutation under a father's Will that allegedly included the complainant's share, and no creation of a forged Will was alleged, the dispute was essentially civil. The complainant could challenge the Will to the extent of his share. The Court quashed the FIR under Sections 420 and 120B IPC without deciding the parties' title or the Will's validity.	981
Disputed consent and defence evidence in quashing proceedings	For quashing under Article 226 or the analogous limits of Section 482 CrPC, the Court considers the allegations at face value and does not conduct a roving inquiry into their truth or decide a disputed defence through trial-style evidence appraisal. Allegations of force and intercourse induced by a knowingly false marriage promise disclosed a prima facie case, so the petitioner's disputed consent defence did not warrant quashing.	982
Section 362 CrPC — repeated recall prayer after withdrawal of the earlier application	A further Section 482 CrPC application seeking the same recall relief as an earlier application withdrawn after argument would, in the circumstances considered, amount to review prohibited by Section 362 CrPC. The applicant had already sought recall of the observations concerning the medical certificate and then repeated that prayer while declaring that no earlier petition on the same subject had been filed. The Court refused the renewed recall request and dismissed the application with costs of ₹10,000, payable within thirty days.	990
Section 482 CrPC — disclosure of earlier applications seeking the same relief	An applicant invoking the Court’s jurisdiction must approach with clean hands and disclose material facts, including an earlier application seeking the same relief that was withdrawn after argument. Describing the renewed recall application as the first petition, despite the earlier identical prayer, suppressed a material fact. Counsel’s statement that he had not appeared in the earlier applications did not answer the applicant’s failure to disclose them.	990
Request for investigation near the parental home is not withdrawal of the complaint	A complainant’s request that one police station take no further action because she fears returning there does not amount to withdrawal of her allegations where she reiterates the alleged cruelty and asks for action at the police station near her parental home. The communication to the Panipat police repeated the allegations and threats and sought investigation at Karera. The police diary recorded that preference. The Court therefore rejected the contention that a withdrawn complaint established the falsity of the later FIR.	991
Section 482 CrPC — omnibus dowry allegations against a younger brother-in-law	General allegations against the husband’s relatives, without a specific role, incident or manner of harassment, are insufficient to compel them to face trial. Applying Kans Raj, Monju Roy and Chandralekha, the Court found that the FIR and Section 161 CrPC statement attributed no specific act to the younger brother-in-law. Where the complainant’s mother had taken her to the parental home after hospitalisation, his failure to bring her back without the husband’s and parents-in-law’s consent could not constitute continuing cruelty by him. The FIR, charge sheet and ensuing proceedings were quashed only against him.	1005
FIR after restitution proceedings — timing alone does not establish a counterblast	An FIR cannot be quashed merely because the husband instituted proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights before it was lodged. Applying Pratibha, the Court recognised that a wife may refrain from complaining while hoping that relations will improve and that she can return to the matrimonial home. The end of that period of patience after proceedings are instituted by the husband does not by itself make her complaint retaliatory. Civil matrimonial proceedings and a criminal prosecution are separate and independent, and pendency of the former does not end the latter.	1005

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Ex parte restitution decree — no ground by itself to quash a cognizable matrimonial FIR	An ex parte decree for restitution of conjugal rights did not justify quashing the FIR where the applicants showed no subsequent effort to bring the wife back, no execution under Order XXI Rule 32 CPC, and no indication that she knew of the decree. The Court noted that they could seek execution or, subject to the statutory condition of no restitution for one year or more, seek divorce under Section 13(1A)(ii) of the Hindu Marriage Act. Merely obtaining the decree without taking further steps did not defeat the FIR's allegations of cruelty, dowry demands and assault, which disclosed cognizable offences.	1006
Desertion — separate residence for valid reasons and the husband's own wrong	Desertion involves separation accompanied by an intention permanently to end cohabitation, without the other spouse's consent or reasonable cause attributable to that spouse. It is a continuing course of conduct inferred from the circumstances; temporary separation without that intention is insufficient. Applying Savitri Pandey and its discussion of Bipinchandra, the Court held that a wife living separately for valid reasons cannot on that account be treated as having deserted her husband, who cannot take advantage of his own wrong. The cruelty allegations explained her separate residence and the unacted-upon ex parte restitution decree did not warrant quashing.	1006

Supreme Court Standards Governing Quashing

Civil and criminal proceedings — independent findings and standards of proof	Findings in civil proceedings do not automatically bind the criminal court, and criminal findings do not automatically bind the civil court. Each proceeding must be decided on the evidence adduced in it. Civil liability is assessed on a preponderance of probabilities, whereas the prosecution must prove the criminal charge beyond reasonable doubt. The relevance and effect of an earlier judgment remain subject to the applicable provisions of the Evidence Act.	2
Matrimonial prosecution of relatives — specific allegations of involvement	A husband's relatives cannot be compelled to face trial merely because of their relationship to him or their collective naming in a matrimonial complaint. Specific and direct allegations must connect each relative with the alleged offence. Omnibus accusations against brothers, sisters or distant relations require careful scrutiny, and allegations against relatives living elsewhere who never or rarely visited the complainant must be assessed in that context. Mere naming without a specific role and supporting material is insufficient.	3
Quashing jurisdiction — exceptional exercise and judicial restraint	Quashing an FIR or complaint is an exceptional exercise of wide inherent power and requires caution, circumspection and adherence to established legal limits. The power does not authorise arbitrary decision-making. The description of quashing as appropriate in the rarest cases expresses restraint in this jurisdiction; it is distinct from the sentencing standard governing the death penalty.	5
Section 482 CrPC — exceptional intervention to prevent matrimonial process abuse	Criminal proceedings are not ordinarily stopped at an interlocutory stage, but the Court may intervene to prevent abuse of process or secure justice. In matrimonial accusations against relatives, absence of specific involvement, assessed with the attendant undisputed circumstances, may justify quashing instead of compelling them to face trial on vague collective allegations.	14
Quashing decision — factual setting and reasons must be stated	A court deciding a challenge to criminal proceedings should identify the brief material facts, examine the challenge under the governing quashing principles and give reasons for allowing or refusing interference. The relied-upon Sangeeta Agrawal passage requires a reasoned application of the legal tests to the case's factual setting.	15
Section 482 CrPC — specific allegations and disputed truth reserved for trial	Quashing may be justified where the allegations accepted as a whole and the supporting prosecution material disclose no offence. The Court should not conduct a roving inquiry into disputed facts, weigh reliability as at trial, or decide a contested defence to terminate a prosecution that raises triable issues.	18

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Here, the FIR read with the complainant's Section 161 statement attributed specific roles to each applicant, so the claims of omissions and general allegations did not warrant quashing the FIR, charge-sheet or consequential proceedings.
Quashing — limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	Ordinarily, a court considering quashing does not appreciate the accused's defence or investigate the truth of documents relied on by the accused. The reproduced Mohd. Akram Siddiqui principle recognises a limited exception in an appropriate case for a public document or one whose authenticity is not disputed by the complainant. That exception does not authorise a general trial of contested defence material.	18
Section 482 CrPC: consideration of unimpeachable defence documents	In proceedings under Section 482 CrPC, the High Court may consider defence material of sterling and impeccable quality even though the accused cannot ordinarily introduce defence evidence at the stage of framing charge under Section 227. Such material must conclusively displace the accusation, remain unrefuted or be incapable of justified refutation, and show that continuing the trial would abuse the court's process. Undisputed public records directly bearing on the complaint were considered on this basis.	20
Quashing a malicious complaint intended to deter lawful official action	A criminal complaint maliciously instituted to settle a personal grievance and deter an officer from performing statutory duties may be quashed under Section 482 CrPC. Where undisputed records showed that an electricity assessment arose from action against theft, the assessment could be challenged through statutory objections, and the defamation complaint also lacked prima facie reputational harm, its continuation amounted to abuse of process.	20
Alleged retaliation for prior complaints or a PIL as a ground for quashing	Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, allegations of the informant's mala fides are secondary and cannot by themselves justify quashing. The applicant's prior complaints and public-interest litigation did not establish that the FIR was a malicious counterblast when the parties' civil rights and competing allegations were disputed. Those factual disputes required adjudication through the ordinary criminal process rather than a decision under Section 482 CrPC.	26
FIR lodged during the overseas husband's return to India and alleged mala fides	Lodging a cruelty FIR when the husband returned to India did not establish mala fides where the wife had faced difficulty serving him abroad or securing his return for trial. Where the complaint disclosed a prima facie cognizable offence, alleged malice was secondary and could not by itself justify quashing; the investigation and trial evidence would determine the accusation.	29
Threshold grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	Section 482 CrPC permits intervention where the allegations accepted at face value disclose no offence, are patently absurd or inherently improbable, or where an express legal bar prevents the proceedings. The power must be used sparingly and on sound principles to prevent abuse of process or secure justice, without suppressing a legitimate prosecution or weighing disputed evidence.	31
Quashing — alleged informant malice where a cognizable offence is disclosed	Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged malice becomes secondary; the investigation material and evidence at trial determine the accusation. Personal hostility or a retaliatory motive cannot by itself justify quashing a legitimate prosecution. This does not remove the power to quash proceedings that are manifestly malicious and constitute an abuse of process under the stated Bhajan Lal categories.	64
Section 482 CrPC — purposes and exceptional exercise of inherent power	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's existing inherent power to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of court process, or secure the ends of justice. It must be exercised sparingly, carefully and on sound principles. In this jurisdiction the High Court does not function as a court of appeal or revision and must not use the power to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	64
Section 482 CrPC — face-value	The High Court ordinarily does not quash proceedings where the allegations,	71

allegations and restraint in examining defence material at the quashing stage	accepted at face value and in their entirety, disclose a cognizable offence. Save in very exceptional circumstances, it does not examine documents relied on by the defence or go beyond those allegations to find an absence of mens rea or actus reus. The power must be used sparingly on the merits of each case, while protecting an apparently innocent person from a false and wholly untenable complaint.
Quashing proceedings — an informant's alleged mala fides are secondary where a cognizable offence is disclosed	Allegations of malice against the informant cannot by themselves justify quashing proceedings where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. The case must be determined by the material collected in investigation and the evidence led before the court. Applying that principle, the Court held that the earlier registration of the accused's father's FIR did not establish that the complainant's FIR was retaliatory and declined to interfere.	72
Matrimonial FIR after a divorce petition — timing alone does not establish a retaliatory counterblast	An FIR alleging cruelty and dowry harassment cannot be quashed merely because it was lodged after the husband instituted divorce proceedings. In this case the divorce petition had itself been dismissed for want of prosecution, and the FIR contained specific allegations of physical and mental harassment linked to dowry demands. The sequence of proceedings did not, by itself, justify treating the FIR as retaliatory or terminating it under Section 482 CrPC.	76
Specificity required in an FIR and limits of Section 482 scrutiny	An FIR need not contain every minor detail or exhaustively describe each incident. At the Section 482 CrPC stage, the question is whether its uncontroverted allegations, taken as a whole, disclose a cognizable offence; the High Court must not scrutinise the material as a trial court would after evidence. Specific allegations of dowry demands and physical and mental harassment in this FIR disclosed a prima facie case, and the absence of individually detailed incidents did not justify quashing.	84
Section 482 CrPC — Face-value offence test and limits on fact-finding	The High Court may quash an FIR where the uncontroverted allegations, accepted in full, and the supporting material disclose no offence. That power must be exercised sparingly and cautiously to prevent abuse and secure justice. It does not permit a preliminary trial of disputed facts, a detailed weighing of the defence or an assessment of whether conviction is probable. The defence must be tested on evidence at trial.	117
Exceptional quashing grounds — Absurd allegations, legal bars and malicious proceedings	The Bhajan Lal principles reproduced in the authority relied upon recognise quashing where allegations are so absurd or inherently improbable that no prudent person could find grounds to proceed, where an express legal bar prevents the proceedings, or where prosecution is manifestly malicious and directed at vengeance or personal spite. They also recognise the restriction on police investigation of an exclusively non-cognizable offence without the Magistrate's order. These are exceptional grounds; they do not authorise a trial of disputed facts or suppression of a legitimate prosecution.	117
Criminal complaint — Necessary facts rather than verbatim statutory ingredients	A criminal complaint need not reproduce the legal ingredients of an offence word for word. If it states the necessary factual foundation, failure to spell out every ingredient in detail does not by itself justify quashing. Quashing on that basis is warranted when even the basic facts needed to constitute the alleged offence are absent.	117
Section 482 CrPC — Specific cruelty allegations raise triable issues	The Court cannot use Section 482 CrPC to conduct a roving inquiry or mini-trial into the truth of allegations that prima facie disclose an offence. Specific allegations against the husband and parents-in-law required trial. Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court declined to decide the rival versions at the quashing stage and found a prima facie case warranting prosecution. It expressly directed the trial court to decide independently, without influence or prejudice from the observations in the quashing order.	119
Quashing of cross-FIRs involving rival	Where both cross-FIRs acknowledged an assault at the same time and place,	120

accounts of an assault	and the complainant's medical record showed injuries, the High Court could not decide which account was true in proceedings for quashing. The wife's cross-FIR and pending matrimonial proceedings did not, by themselves, establish that the husband's FIR was false.
Informant's alleged malice where a cognizable offence is disclosed	Where the complaint discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged malice is of secondary importance and cannot, by itself, justify quashing. The material collected in investigation and the evidence at trial determine the accused's culpability. This does not exclude quashing where the proceeding itself is shown to be a malicious abuse of process.	120
Enmity as a possible motive for either the offence or false implication	Hostility between the parties may supply a motive for committing the offence as well as a reason for false implication. The existence of enmity therefore does not, without more, establish that a prosecution is false or justify quashing it.	120
Purposes and cautious exercise of inherent criminal jurisdiction	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the court's process and secure the ends of justice. The power must be exercised sparingly and cautiously on sound principles. It does not confer appellate or revisional jurisdiction and must not be used to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	120
Statutory bar to institution or continuation of criminal proceedings	An express legal bar to institution or continuation of the proceeding, including a requirement of sanction, may justify quashing under Section 482 CrPC. The reproduced quashing standards also recognise a specific statutory provision providing efficacious redress for the grievance as a relevant ground for considering intervention.	120
Non-cognizable allegations and Magistrate's authority for police investigation	Where the FIR and accompanying material disclose no cognizable offence, police investigation is not justified under Section 156(1) CrPC without a Magistrate's order under Section 155(2). An FIR alleging only a non-cognizable offence cannot be investigated by the police without that order.	120
Quashing of absurd and inherently improbable allegations	Quashing may be justified where the allegations are so absurd and inherently improbable that no prudent person could find sufficient grounds to proceed against the accused.	120
Quashing of proceedings instituted for personal vengeance	Proceedings manifestly tainted by malice or maliciously instituted to wreak personal vengeance may be quashed to prevent abuse of process. A bare allegation that the informant is hostile does not establish that ground where a cognizable offence is disclosed.	120
Specific dowry-harassment allegations against the husband and his relatives	Specific allegations that the husband and his relatives demanded money and a vehicle and subjected the wife to physical and mental harassment disclosed a triable case. Their plea that the relatives lived separately did not justify resolving the truth of those allegations under Section 482 CrPC. The Court's refusal to quash did not establish their guilt.	121
Caution against omnibus allegations implicating matrimonial relatives	In matrimonial prosecutions, courts must exercise caution where omnibus allegations are made against relatives who are not generally concerned with the couple's affairs. This requires examination of the allegations in the particular case, rather than an inflexible rule that relatives must always be discharged or that every matrimonial complaint must proceed to trial.	121
Express statutory bar to criminal proceedings	An express legal bar under the Code or another applicable enactment to the institution or continuation of criminal proceedings may justify intervention under Section 482 CrPC. The quashing inquiry must give effect to the specific statutory protection available to the accused.	121
Quashing of proceedings constituting malicious abuse of	The High Court may intervene where sufficient material shows that criminal proceedings were maliciously instituted to wreak personal vengeance or that the court's process is being used for an ulterior purpose. The power must rest	121 process	on sound principles and must not become a means of stopping a legitimate prosecution.

Patently absurd or inherently improbable allegations	The High Court may consider quashing where the allegations are patently absurd or inherently improbable so that no prudent person could conclude that an offence is prima facie established. The court must assess the allegations and accompanying record at the threshold without undertaking a trial of their truth.	121
Balancing personal liberty and legitimate prosecution when considering quashing	The wide power under Section 482 CrPC requires particular care and circumspection. Its exercise must balance the individual's freedom with the complainant's or prosecution's right to investigate and prosecute an offender. Intervention to prevent a miscarriage of justice must not needlessly terminate a legitimate prosecution at its threshold.	121
Aadhaar alone did not resolve a disputed place of residence in quashing proceedings	The applicant's Aadhaar bearing an address current to a date after the FIR did not conclusively establish that she lived away from the matrimonial home during the alleged incidents. The FIR placed her nearby, counsel could not confirm that the Aadhaar details had remained unchanged, and no supporting residence document was produced. The Court left the disputed residence question to the trial court.	125
Exceptional grounds for quashing and protection against abuse of criminal process	The Section 482 power must be exercised cautiously, without stifling a legitimate prosecution. Intervention may be justified where the allegations disclose no offence, are inherently absurd or improbable, face an express legal bar, or show a proceeding maliciously instituted for private vengeance. These grounds do not permit a trial of disputed credibility or an assessment of the probable verdict at the preliminary stage.	142
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	Ordinarily, the High Court does not assess the accused’s defence or determine the truth of documents relied on for quashing. An appropriate exception permits consideration of a public document or a document whose authenticity is not disputed by the complainant.	148
FIR details and premature assessment of merits	An FIR need not contain every fact or detail of the reported offence. While investigation is continuing, incomplete or unsettled facts do not justify prematurely deciding that the complaint lacks substance. If investigation finds no substance, the investigating officer may submit the appropriate report for the Magistrate’s consideration in accordance with law.	161
Uncontroverted allegations and limits of quashing inquiry	When considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC, corresponding to Section 528 BNSS, the Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence. It cannot conduct a roving inquiry into the truth of the FIR allegations.	162
Illustrative grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	Section 482 CrPC preserves power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of process and secure the ends of justice. Its exceptional exercise may be justified by an express legal bar; allegations that, even accepted fully, disclose no offence; uncontroverted material that fails to disclose an offence; inherently absurd allegations; a non-cognizable investigation without the required Magistrate's order; or a proceeding manifestly instituted maliciously for vengeance. Absence of legal evidence must be distinguished from evidence whose reliability requires trial. These illustrative grounds do not authorise a premature assessment of the evidence or arbitrary interference.	171
Informant's alleged mala fides do not alone justify quashing	Once the FIR discloses an offence, allegations about the informant's motive are of secondary importance and cannot by themselves justify quashing. The material collected during investigation and the evidence at trial determine the accused's liability. This does not exclude interference where a proceeding is demonstrably a malicious abuse of process within the recognised quashing grounds.	171
A complaint must	A complaint need not reproduce the legal ingredients of an offence word for	172

contain the factual foundation of the offence	word or state every ingredient in detail if it lays the necessary factual foundation. Quashing is justified where even the basic facts necessary to disclose the offence are absent. The complaint must be examined as a whole, without a detailed merits inquiry or an assessment of the allegations' reliability.
Informant's enmity and allegations of mala fides in quashing proceedings	Where the complaint discloses a cognizable offence, allegations that the informant acted from enmity or retaliation do not by themselves justify quashing. Enmity may motivate either false implication or commission of the offence, and the prosecution must be assessed on the material and evidence. The Court's reliance on Renu Kumari also preserves the distinct ground of manifestly malicious proceedings instituted for revenge or personal grudge. Mere alleged enmity did not warrant interference here.	189
Objects and restrained exercise of inherent criminal jurisdiction	Section 482 preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. The power is exercised sparingly, carefully and on sound principles; it does not make the Court an appellate or revisional forum for every grievance. The exceptional standard for quashing is distinct from the rarest-of-rare sentencing test used for the death penalty.	189
Incomplete FIR details and premature assessment during investigation	An FIR need not contain every fact and detail of the reported offence. While investigation is continuing and the facts remain incomplete, the Court should not decide the merits on probabilities or prematurely conclude that the case does not deserve investigation. If the investigating officer finds the complaint lacks substance, the appropriate report may be placed before the Magistrate for consideration according to law.	189
Non-cognizable allegations and Magistrate's order for investigation	Where the FIR discloses only a non-cognizable offence, police investigation requires the Magistrate's order contemplated by Section 155(2) CrPC. The reproduced Bhajan Lal categories recognise the absence of that authorisation as a ground for intervention; a non-cognizable allegation cannot by itself justify investigation under Section 156(1).	189
Legal bar to institution or continuance of criminal proceedings	An evident legal bar to institution or continuation of proceedings, such as want of a required sanction, is a recognised ground for quashing. The reproduced categories also address an express statutory bar or a specific provision giving efficacious redress for the grievance. The bar must be identified under the applicable law rather than supplied by assessment of a disputed factual defence.	189
Inherently absurd or improbable allegations as a quashing ground	Quashing may be justified where the allegations are so absurd and inherently improbable that no prudent person could reasonably find sufficient ground to proceed. This recognised category does not permit the High Court to resolve ordinary disputes about credibility or competing factual probabilities by conducting a mini-trial.	189
Prima facie case and abuse of process in quashing proceedings	The High Court assesses the allegations as a whole and at face value when considering quashing. Interference may be justified where they disclose no offence or are patently absurd and inherently improbable, or where the proceeding is manifestly malicious and abuses the criminal process. The power must be exercised sparingly and with care; a triable case cannot be rejected by evaluating its likely success at trial.	192
Quashing an FIR does not permit a premature assessment of disputed evidence	When an FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the High Court ordinarily permits investigation to continue. It cannot decide the reliability of disputed allegations or predict the prospects of conviction by weighing incomplete material as an appellate or trial court.	201
Informant’s alleged mala fides alone do not justify quashing	If the allegations disclose an offence, the informant’s alleged mala fides are of secondary importance and cannot by themselves justify quashing. The prosecution must be assessed on the material gathered in investigation and the evidence led before the court.	201

50.2 : Supreme Court Standards Governing Quashing

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Exceptional grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	Inherent jurisdiction may be exercised where a legal bar prevents prosecution, the allegations accepted in full disclose no offence, or the allegations are so absurd or inherently improbable that no prudent person could find sufficient ground to proceed. The power requires caution and must not be used to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	201
FIR need not contain every detail of the offence	An FIR need not set out every fact or detail concerning the reported offence. Where investigation is continuing, incomplete facts do not by themselves justify a premature conclusion that the FIR is an abuse of process or does not deserve investigation.	201
Public or undisputed defence documents may exceptionally be considered for quashing	Although the High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence or the truth of documents relied on by the accused, an appropriate case may permit consideration of a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute. The exception does not authorise resolution of contested facts.	209
Inherent powers protect against wholly untenable prosecution and manifest harassment	Section 482 CrPC may be used exceptionally where the allegations disclose no offence, are patently absurd or inherently improbable, or the proceeding is a manifest abuse directed at harassment or private vengeance. The power must be exercised cautiously on a clear foundation, while a genuine prosecution supported by prima facie material must not be stifled.	209
Substantial factual foundation matters more than formal recital of every ingredient	Where the allegations lay the factual foundation of an offence and substantially satisfy its requirements, proceedings should not be hastily quashed merely because one or two ingredients are not expressly stated or do not at first appear separately satisfied. The allegations must be read as a whole, while still examining whether an offence is disclosed.	209
Informant's alleged mala fides where the FIR discloses an offence	Where the FIR allegations, taken at face value, disclose a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides become secondary and cannot by themselves justify quashing. The prosecution must be assessed on the material collected during investigation and the evidence led before the trial court.	230
Purposes and cautious exercise of inherent criminal jurisdiction	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. The power must be exercised sparingly and with caution; it does not make the High Court an appellate or revisional court for reassessing the prosecution case.	230
Illustrative grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	Quashing may be justified where a legal bar prevents prosecution; the allegations accepted in full or the uncontroverted material disclose no offence; the allegations are inherently absurd or improbable; or the proceedings manifestly abuse the criminal process through malicious prosecution. The reproduced categories also distinguish non-cognizable allegations requiring a Magistrate's investigation order. These grounds are illustrative and must be applied cautiously, without stifling a legitimate prosecution.	230
Enmity as a ground for quashing	Enmity can supply a motive both for false implication and for committing an offence. Choosing between these competing explanations is a disputed factual inquiry that cannot be undertaken in a Section 482 CrPC petition merely because hostility between the parties is alleged.	230
Exceptional grounds and restraint in criminal quashing	Criminal quashing is exceptional and must rest on established legal principles. It may be warranted where allegations accepted in full, or the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material, disclose no offence, where a legal bar applies, or where sufficient material establishes malicious abuse of process. The width of inherent power does not permit arbitrary exercise or premature determination of disputed merits.	233
Quashing review and assessment of	Quashing may be warranted where the allegations, taken as true, do not disclose an offence, or where there is no legal evidence or the evidence is clearly	244

disputed evidence	inconsistent with the accusation. This differs from a case in which legal evidence exists but its reliability or ultimate sufficiency requires assessment at trial. The High Court should not weigh probabilities or decide whether conviction is likely in order to terminate a prosecution that has a prima facie foundation.
Alleged mala fides where allegations disclose a cognizable offence	The informant's alleged mala fides, by themselves, do not justify quashing where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. Applying Renu Kumari, the Court treated the alleged motive as secondary to the accusation and supporting material. The particular plea that the FIR was intended to jeopardise a teacher's appointment was also rejected because the FIR preceded that appointment.	260
Exceptional exercise and purposes of inherent power under Section 482 CrPC	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. The power must be exercised cautiously and sparingly on settled principles, rather than as an appeal or revision. The exceptional standard described as 'rarest of rare' in quashing cases is distinct from the death-penalty standard.	260
Illustrative grounds for quashing and the limit on evaluating evidence	The principles reproduced from R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal recognise quashing where there is a legal bar to proceedings, the allegations accepted at face value do not disclose an offence, or the allegations are inherently absurd or improbable. Absence of legal evidence or material manifestly inconsistent with the accusation differs from evidence whose reliability or sufficiency can be resolved only by appreciation at trial. A non-cognizable offence cannot be investigated by police without the Magistrate's order required by Section 155(2) CrPC.	260
Face-value examination and disputed defence in quashing under Articles 226/227 or Section 482 CrPC	In a challenge to criminal proceedings under Articles 226/227 or Section 482 CrPC, the Court examines whether the allegations accepted at face value disclose an offence. It does not ordinarily decide disputed defence facts, witness credibility or the likelihood of conviction through a detailed evaluation of evidence. The Court declined interference where the allegations disclosed a cognizable offence and the petitioner's defence raised disputed questions.	264
Informant's alleged mala fides where a cognizable offence is disclosed	Where the FIR allegations disclose a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are of secondary importance and cannot, by themselves, justify quashing. The accusation and the material collected in investigation or proved at trial determine the accused's case. Disputed allegations of motive do not permit the quashing court to conduct a trial of contested facts.	264
Cautious exercise of inherent power to prevent abuse of criminal process	Section 482 CrPC preserves inherent power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. Intervention is exceptional and must rest on settled principles. The adopted framework includes allegations disclosing no offence, an express legal bar, or allegations so absurd and inherently improbable that there is no sufficient ground to proceed. This power must protect against harassment without stifling a legitimate prosecution.	264
Purposes and restrained exercise of inherent criminal jurisdiction	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the court's process and secure the ends of justice. The power must be exercised sparingly and cautiously on sound principles, and must not be used to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	270
Legal bar to institution or continuation of criminal proceedings	An evident legal bar to the institution or continuation of proceedings, such as absence of a required sanction, can justify quashing under Section 482 CrPC. The statutory bar must apply to the proceeding sought to be quashed.	270
Investigation of a non-cognizable	Where the FIR allegations disclose only a non-cognizable offence, police cannot investigate without the Magistrate's order required by Section 155(2)	270 offence without a Magistrate's order	CrPC. The absence of such authority is among the recognised grounds for intervention in criminal proceedings.

Inherently improbable allegations as a ground for quashing	Quashing may be justified where the FIR or complaint allegations are so absurd and inherently improbable that no prudent person could conclude that there is sufficient ground to proceed against the accused. This threshold does not authorise an ordinary assessment of disputed evidence.	270
Defence documents capable of supporting quashing	Although the Court ordinarily does not assess an accused's defence or disputed documents in quashing proceedings, it may consider a public document or one whose authenticity is undisputed in an appropriate case. Material relied on to displace the prosecution case must be of sterling and impeccable quality, conclusively rule out the accusations without recording evidence, and be unrefuted or incapable of justified refutation. Continuation must also amount to an abuse of process and fail to serve the ends of justice.	290
Section 482 CrPC — face-value allegations and investigation	At the quashing stage, the Court considers whether the uncontroverted allegations, taken as a whole, disclose an offence. Where a cognizable offence and a triable case are disclosed, police investigation and prosecution should ordinarily continue. Applying the principles in Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan and the other reproduced authorities, the Court found specific allegations of dowry-related cruelty and refused to terminate the case before trial. This threshold finding does not establish the allegations as proved.	323
Quashing — malicious proceedings and manifestly untenable allegations	Section 482 may be used where proceedings are manifestly malicious or brought for private vengeance, or where the allegations are so absurd and inherently improbable that they cannot reasonably justify proceeding. The power protects against persecution and abuse, but is exercised sparingly on a demonstrated basis. The passages from S. Khushboo, Gourishetty Mahesh, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha preserve that protection alongside the rule against stifling a legitimate prosecution.	323
Quashing — express statutory bar to criminal proceedings	An express legal prohibition on the institution or continuation of criminal proceedings is a recognised ground for quashing. The Court included this principle in its jurisdictional framework through the reproduced passages from Amit Kapoor, Gourishetty Mahesh and the Bhajan Lal categories narrated in Padal Venkata Rama Reddy. No such prohibition was found to justify terminating the prosecution in this case.	323
Section 482 CrPC — effective statutory remedy and inconsistent exercise of power	The passage from Padal Venkata Rama Reddy reproduced in the Court's discussion states that inherent jurisdiction is not a substitute for an effective remedy specifically provided by statute and cannot be exercised inconsistently with the Code's express provisions. Where an effective alternative remedy is available, the High Court will ordinarily decline inherent relief, particularly when that remedy has not been used. The present application was rejected on the separate ground that it required adjudication of disputed defences.	323
Section 482 CrPC — discretionary relief and clean hands	Inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC is discretionary. The passage from Padal Venkata Rama Reddy reproduced as part of the governing principles recognises that the High Court may refuse relief where the applicant has not approached it with clean hands. This does not make the power arbitrary: its exercise must serve the ends of justice or prevent abuse. The High Court did not make a separate finding of concealment against this applicant.	323
Quashing orders — facts, governing principles and reasons	A court deciding a challenge to criminal proceedings should set out the material facts, examine the challenge under the governing principles and give reasons for granting or refusing interference. The High Court reproduced Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P. for this requirement before setting out the quashing principles and applying them to the allegations and defences in this case.	323
Informer mala fides alleged — secondary	Bhajan Lal recognises manifestly malicious prosecution as an exceptional	325

where face-value allegations disclose cognizable offence	quashing category, but an unsupported claim about the complainant's motive does not displace a prima facie cognizable offence. Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was quoted for the limited inherent jurisdiction, the face-value offence test and the caution that informer mala fides become secondary when the accusation itself discloses an offence; disputed evidence is for the ordinary process. The High Court found allegations of dowry demand, cruelty and expulsion against these three applicants and declined to adjudicate the asserted counterblast, adultery and falsity as established facts. This is not an absolute immunity for a truly manifestly malicious case meeting an established quashing ground (paras 4, 7–13).
Quashing — absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed weight	The Renu Kumari passage relied upon by the Court distinguishes absence of legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, from legal evidence whose weight may or may not support the charge. The latter requires appreciation by the trial court and ordinarily cannot be decided under Section 482. The inherent power prevents abuse but does not allow an accused to terminate a legitimate prosecution through a premature assessment of evidentiary reliability.	325
Section 482 CrPC — Quashing a retaliatory FIR as an abuse of process	Quashing an FIR, complaint or charge-sheet at the initial stage is exceptional. Although the complainant's mala fides become secondary when a cognizable offence is disclosed, the High Court may examine whether criminal process is being used vindictively. Here, earlier cruelty, divorce, maintenance and domestic-violence proceedings, together with delay and allegations the Court found superficial and trivial, established that the later FIR was a counterblast. Continued investigation would misuse lawful authority, warranting quashing. The conclusion rested on these circumstances together; the existence of earlier family litigation alone was not treated as sufficient.	351
Section 482 CrPC — FIR following a divorce petition is not automatically a counterblast	A cruelty FIR cannot be quashed merely because it was lodged after the husband filed for divorce. Delay may reflect an attempt to preserve the marriage and seek reconciliation until those efforts fail. Where the FIR discloses prima facie criminal allegations, its timing and the existence of earlier marital complaints do not alone establish retaliatory fabrication. The Court rejected that inference here and left the truth of the allegations for trial.	355
Matrimonial prosecution of relatives — Specific role and supporting material	Mere naming of distant relatives does not justify summoning them without a specific role and tangible supporting material. Where the allegations disclose triable issues, however, the court does not decide the truth of competing versions under Section 482 CrPC. Here the allegations of withholding food and concealing eatables specifically extended to the brother-in-law and his wife; the Court found the FIR's allegations against the applicants sufficiently specific and refused quashing.	355
Civil and criminal proceedings — Independent adjudication and different standards of proof	Civil and criminal proceedings remain independent even when they arise from the same facts. A pending divorce proceeding does not bring a criminal case to an end. Civil-court findings do not bind the criminal court, which must decide the allegations before it under the different standard of proof applicable to criminal proceedings.	355
Matrimonial prosecution of relatives — Individual role rather than relationship alone	The husband's relatives cannot be implicated in dowry offences merely because of their relationship or by conjecture. Distant relatives require a specific role and tangible supporting material; omnibus allegations against siblings and other relatives do not stand on the same footing as allegations against the husband and parents. Each person's alleged harassment must be examined individually. Although overt acts must be proved beyond reasonable doubt at trial, that trial standard does not require final proof in a Section 482 proceeding. Extremely general allegations, considered with the surrounding circumstances, may justify quashing as to the relatives concerned.	356

50.2 : Supreme Court Standards Governing Quashing

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 482 CrPC — Informant's alleged mala fides are secondary where a cognizable offence appears	Where a complaint discloses a cognizable offence, alleged personal hostility or a retaliatory motive of the informant does not, by itself, justify quashing. The material collected in investigation and evidence at trial determine the accused's liability. The allegation that an earlier encroachment complaint provoked the FIR therefore could not dispose of the prima facie assault and related allegations. This principle does not remove the exceptional power to quash a proceeding shown to be a manifest abuse of process.	357
Section 482 CrPC — Recognised grounds for exceptional quashing	Exceptional quashing may be justified where the allegations, accepted in full, or the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material disclose no offence; an express legal bar prevents proceedings; allegations are inherently absurd or improbable; or prosecution is manifestly malicious. A non-cognizable allegation cannot justify police investigation without the Magistrate's order required by Section 155(2) CrPC. Absence of legal evidence or evidence clearly inconsistent with the accusation must be distinguished from evidence whose weight or reliability requires trial. These grounds are illustrative and must be applied cautiously to prevent abuse or secure justice, without stifling a legitimate prosecution.	357
Section 482 CrPC — Exceptional intervention where the legal basis for prosecution is absent	The court may quash where the FIR or complaint, taken at face value and accepted in full, discloses no prima facie offence, or where the uncontroverted allegations and supporting evidence disclose no case against the accused. An express legal bar or sufficient material establishing malicious prosecution for personal vengeance may also justify intervention. The power must be exercised sparingly and on sound principles, without using a premature assessment of credibility to end a legitimate prosecution.	358
Costs for Repeated Attempts to Reopen Rejected Quashing Relief	Repeated Section 482 CrPC applications seeking to quash proceedings after earlier merits decisions may constitute misuse of the court's authority. In that setting, the petition was dismissed with costs of ₹10,000 payable within one month, with initiation of suo motu contempt proceedings directed if payment was not made within the stipulated period.	376
Matrimonial FIR after a Divorce Petition— Counterblast Allegation	The filing of a divorce petition before a matrimonial FIR does not, by itself, establish that the FIR is retaliatory. A wife may delay reporting while trying to preserve her marriage and complain when those efforts fail. The criminal allegations must be assessed on their own terms; pendency of the civil divorce proceeding does not itself justify quashing them.	401
Alleged Mala Fides and a Complainant's Lawyer Relative	The fact that a complainant's relative practises as an advocate does not, by itself, make the FIR liable to quashing. The Court must examine the allegations rather than the relative's professional status. Where a cognizable offence is disclosed, alleged malice of the informant is secondary and cannot alone justify quashing a legitimate prosecution.	401
Territorial Objection to FIR Registration and Transfer to the Competent Police Station	Information disclosing a cognizable offence may be lodged at any police station. If the receiving station finds that it lacks territorial jurisdiction to investigate, it must transfer the FIR to the competent station. An objection to the receiving station's territorial jurisdiction does not, by itself, justify quashing the FIR.	401
Grounds for Quashing under Section 482 CrPC	Inherent jurisdiction may be exercised where proceedings face a legal bar, the allegations accepted in full disclose no offence, or the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material fail to disclose an offence. The reproduced standards also recognise inherently absurd allegations, manifest abuse for private vengeance and investigation of only a non-cognizable offence without the required Magistrate's order. These are illustrative grounds, to be applied cautiously rather than as an appellate reassessment of the prosecution.	401
Alleged Informant Malice Where the	When the FIR allegations disclose a cognizable offence, alleged mala fides of	406

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
FIR Discloses a Cognizable Offence	the informant are secondary and cannot alone support quashing. The prosecution's fate depends on the investigative material and evidence, rather than a contested allegation that parallel litigation or an earlier defensive complaint proves false implication.
Quashing Grounds and the Distinction between Absent Evidence and Disputed Weight	The adopted quashing standards recognise a legal bar, allegations which disclose no offence even if accepted in full, and an absence of legal evidence or material manifestly inconsistent with the accusation. They distinguish those cases from evidence whose reliability or weight requires trial assessment. Inherent power is exceptional and cannot be used as an appeal or revision to terminate a legitimate prosecution.	406
Facial Absence of an Offence, Legal Bars and Established Abuse as Quashing Grounds	Inherent power may be exercised where allegations taken in full disclose no offence, the uncontroverted allegations and supporting evidence disclose no case, an express legal bar prevents the prosecution, or sufficient material establishes malicious proceedings for private vengeance. The power requires caution and sound reasons and must not stifle a legitimate prosecution by determining disputed evidentiary reliability.	407
Section 482 CrPC—prima facie offence and restrained scrutiny	Quashing requires a judicial assessment of whether the uncontroverted allegations, accepted at face value, disclose an offence, while preserving recognised grounds such as a legal bar or demonstrated abuse of process. The High Court must exercise the power sparingly and cannot use a roving inquiry into disputed facts to terminate a legitimate prosecution.	415
An FIR need not contain every evidentiary detail	An FIR is not required to be an exhaustive account of the evidence. At the Section 482 stage, the High Court must not scrutinise the allegations in the detailed manner of a trial court after evidence has been led.	415
Prima facie dowry-demand allegations—quashing refused	Reading the FIR as a whole, the Court found that allegations of additional demands for a car, money and gold, followed by cancellation of the proposed marriage, disclosed a prima facie case for prosecution under Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. It refused to forecast the outcome by weighing the disputed invitation against the witnesses' statements.	416
Absence of legal evidence and disputed weight of evidence	Quashing standards distinguish a case with no legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, from a case where existing legal evidence may or may not support the charge after appreciation. The latter requires trial-level evaluation of reliability and cannot be resolved by asking the High Court to choose the more credible version.	416
Matrimonial FIR after a divorce petition: chronology alone does not establish a counterblast	Filing a divorce petition before a matrimonial FIR does not, by itself, show that the FIR is retaliatory or justify quashing under Section 482 CrPC. Applying Pratibha, the Court recognised the independence of civil and criminal proceedings and that civil findings do not automatically bind the criminal court. A wife may initially seek reconciliation and report the alleged misconduct only after losing hope of saving the marriage. The sequence alone therefore did not establish the asserted counterblast.	426
Quashing an FIR that discloses a cognizable offence	Where the FIR allegations taken as a whole disclose a cognizable offence, investigation should ordinarily proceed. Section 482 interference is exceptional, including where the accepted allegations disclose no offence, are absurd or inherently improbable, proceedings face an express legal bar, or a manifest abuse of process is established. The Court must balance personal liberty with legitimate investigation and prosecution, and avoid premature merits findings where facts are incomplete or evidence has yet to be collected.	435
Purposes and controlled exercise of inherent criminal jurisdiction	Section 482 CrPC preserves power to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. Its breadth requires sparing, careful and principled exercise; it confers no arbitrary power to act on whim or caprice. The jurisdiction must prevent harassment through	435 untenable proceedings while allowing a legitimate prosecution to continue.

Factual foundation without verbatim pleading of offence ingredients	A complaint need not reproduce every legal ingredient verbatim. Where the necessary basic facts and substantial factual foundation of the offence are pleaded, the proceeding should not be quashed merely because some ingredients are not set out in detail. Quashing is justified when even the basic facts necessary to disclose the offence are absent.	435
Specific statutory remedies and limits on Section 482 relief	Inherent power cannot be exercised inconsistently with express provisions of the Code or used to bypass an effective specific statutory remedy. Where such a remedy is available and has not been used, the High Court may decline to exercise Section 482 jurisdiction.	435
Clean hands in discretionary inherent jurisdiction	Section 482 jurisdiction is discretionary. The High Court may refuse to exercise it where the applicant has not approached the Court with clean hands.	435
Reasons required when deciding a quashing challenge	A decision on quashing should state the essential facts, examine the challenge in light of the applicable legal principles and explain the basis for granting or refusing interference.	435
Disputed identity and alibi in an FIR-quashing petition	Where an FIR identifies the accused by name and parentage and its accepted allegations disclose an offence, a disputed claim of being elsewhere or of mistaken identity requires evidence and cannot be decided through a roving inquiry under Section 482 CrPC. Ordinarily, the Court permits investigation and does not assess defence reliability or predict conviction. Exceptional intervention remains available where the accepted materials disclose no offence, are absurd or inherently improbable, face a legal bar or demonstrate abuse of process; an informant's alleged motive is secondary to the material disclosing the offence.	436
Arrest protection after dismissal of an FIR-quashing petition	When the High Court declines to interfere under Section 482 CrPC and dismisses the quashing application, it cannot routinely append a blanket direction against arrest or coercive steps during investigation or until the police report is filed. Such an order may obstruct investigation and necessary custodial inquiry. An accused apprehending arrest may seek anticipatory bail under Section 438, subject to its statutory conditions.	436
Purposes and limits of inherent criminal jurisdiction	Section 482 CrPC preserves power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. The power is broad but not arbitrary or unlimited in its exercise; it must be used sparingly, carefully and on sound principles to prevent injustice without stifling legitimate prosecution.	436
Factual pleading and the limits of FIR detail	The FIR is not required to be an encyclopaedia, and a complaint need not reproduce each legal ingredient verbatim. A proceeding should not be quashed for omission of detailed ingredient language where the necessary factual foundation and substantial requirements of the offence appear. Absence of even the basic facts needed to disclose the offence may justify quashing.	436
Specific statutory remedy and inherent power	Section 482 relief cannot be used inconsistently with specific provisions of the Code or to bypass an effective statutory remedy. Availability of such a remedy, especially where it has not been used, is a reason to decline inherent jurisdiction.	436
Clean hands in discretionary Section 482 relief	The High Court's inherent jurisdiction is discretionary, and relief may be refused where the applicant has not approached the Court with clean hands.	436
Reasoned determination of a quashing application	The Court should set out the essential facts, examine the challenge against the applicable legal principles and state the reasons for granting or refusing interference under Section 482 CrPC.	436
Exceptional and reasoned interim	Interim protection or a stay of investigation in a pending quashing proceeding requires an exceptional case within the recognised limits of inherent jurisdiction	436

stay in quashing proceedings	and brief reasons showing application of mind. A mere prima facie case is insufficient to justify a routine blanket stay. Orders granting or extending a stay must account for delay and the police duty to investigate; prolonged restraint may impair collection of evidence.
Section 528 BNSS: quashing without a factual mini-trial	In exercising inherent power under Section 528 BNSS, corresponding to Section 482 CrPC, the Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence. It cannot conduct a mini-trial into their truth or the accused's disputed defence. Investigation of cognizable offences is the police's statutory function, complementary to the Court's role. Quashing remains exceptional and must rest on recognised principles preventing abuse or miscarriage of justice; the expression 'rarest of rare' in this context is distinct from the death-penalty standard.	438
Exceptional grounds for quashing under Section 482 CrPC	The inherent power must be exercised sparingly and on sound judicial principles. Interference may be justified where allegations accepted in full disclose no offence, are patently absurd or inherently improbable, face an express legal bar, or reveal manifest abuse of process. Where a cognizable offence has a sufficient factual foundation, a legitimate prosecution should ordinarily continue. Applying these principles, the Court found no basis to quash the matrimonial-cruelty FIR.	460
Factual foundation without verbatim recitation of every offence ingredient	A criminal complaint need not reproduce the legal ingredients of the alleged offence word for word. Where the necessary factual foundation and substantial compliance with the requirements of the offence are present, omission to state a few ingredients in detail does not by itself warrant quashing. A complaint lacking even the basic facts necessary to constitute the offence stands on a different footing.	460
Reasoned consideration of a challenge to criminal proceedings	In deciding a challenge to criminal proceedings, the High Court should identify the brief facts needed to understand the case, apply the governing legal principles and record the reasons for granting or refusing interference. The determination must follow the allegations and applicable tests rather than extraneous considerations.	460
Exceptional grounds for quashing a criminal prosecution	Quashing may be justified where allegations and supporting prosecution material accepted at face value disclose no offence, the allegations are patently absurd or inherently improbable, an express legal bar prevents proceedings, or continuation constitutes manifest abuse of process. The power is to be exercised sparingly and on sound principles, balancing personal liberty with the right to investigate and prosecute a disclosed offence.	469
Delayed matrimonial complaint after filing of divorce petition	A matrimonial FIR does not become a retaliatory complaint merely because it follows the husband's divorce petition. A wife may delay reporting cruelty while trying to preserve her marriage and approach the police when reconciliation appears to have failed. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, the Court rejected the argument that the filing sequence and earlier silence alone justified quashing the FIR. The allegations must still be examined to determine whether they disclose an offence on their face.	500
Conclusive defence material permitting quashing under Section 482 CrPC	Under the test in Rajiv Thapar v. Madan Lal Kapoor, defence material may justify quashing only when it is sound, reasonable and indubitable, of sterling and impeccable quality; it decisively refutes the factual accusations; it has not been refuted or cannot justifiably be refuted by the prosecution or complainant; and continuing the trial would abuse the court's process without serving the ends of justice. All four requirements must be satisfied. Applying that test to the original police register and the supporting cheque record, the Court rejected the objection that the material necessarily had to await trial.	502
Informant's alleged mala fides when	Where the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are of secondary importance and cannot by themselves	503

allegations disclose an offence	justify quashing. The accused's fate depends on the material collected in investigation and the evidence led before the criminal court. Applying Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, the Court rejected reliance on an allegedly retaliatory complaint as sufficient to end this prosecution. The power to prevent a demonstrably malicious abuse of process remains available within the established quashing principles.
Public or undisputed documents in considering a quashing application	Ordinarily, the High Court does not assess the accused's defence or determine the veracity of documents relied upon by the accused in proceedings for quashing. An exception permits consideration, in an appropriate case, of a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. The Court reproduced this qualification from Mohd. Akram Siddiqui while explaining the scope of Section 482 CrPC; the disputed defences advanced in the present case still required trial.	503
Caution about omnibus allegations against matrimonial relatives	Courts considering matrimonial quashing applications must be cautious about omnibus allegations, particularly against relatives who are not generally involved in the couple's affairs. That caution does not create an inflexible rule requiring quashing whenever a relative is accused. Under Taramani Parakh, where the allegations disclose a triable case, the Court does not determine the reliability of the rival versions at the quashing stage.	503
Substantial factual foundation and an FIR's level of detail	An FIR need not be an exhaustive account of the prosecution case. Where the factual foundation of an offence is laid and its requirements are substantially met, courts should not hasten to quash merely because one or two ingredients have not been expressly stated or do not appear to be satisfied. The Court examines the allegations as a whole for a prima facie offence and does not conduct the detailed merits inquiry appropriate after evidence is adduced.	503
Express legal bar to institution or continuation of prosecution	An express legal bar in the CrPC or the governing enactment to the institution or continuation of criminal proceedings is a recognised ground for exercising the inherent power to quash. The Court reproduced want of sanction as an example from R.P. Kapur. This ground concerns a manifest legal prohibition and is distinct from a disputed factual defence requiring proof at trial.	503
Purposes and restrained exercise of inherent criminal jurisdiction	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent powers to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of court process, and otherwise secure the ends of justice. It confers no new power and does not make the High Court an appellate or revisional court for reassessing the prosecution case. Its wide jurisdiction must be exercised sparingly, carefully and on sound principles, so that it prevents injustice without stifling a legitimate prosecution.	503
Prima facie allegations and limits on factual inquiry when quashing an FIR	Section 482 CrPC permits quashing where the uncontroverted allegations, taken as a whole, do not make out an offence. The power must be exercised cautiously and cannot be used for a roving inquiry into disputed facts, an assessment of the prospects of conviction, or a premature weighing of the accused's defence. Where the allegations prima facie disclose a cognizable offence, investigation should ordinarily proceed.	513
Section 482 CrPC: Face-Value Offence Test and Cautious Exercise of Inherent Power	Section 482 preserves inherent power to prevent abuse of process and secure justice, to be exercised sparingly and with caution. The Court examines whether uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence; it does not forecast conviction through detailed evidence appraisal. Allegations that the petitioners tied a Panchayat sub-engineer and others to a tree during official work disclosed a basis for the prosecution under Sections 342 and 353 read with Section 34 IPC, and no ground for interference was established.	525
Face-Value Allegations and Factual Foundation in Quashing	A complaint must be read as a whole to determine whether its allegations, accepted at face value, prima facie disclose an offence. A detailed inquiry into their merits, reliability or genuineness is not appropriate. The complaint need not reproduce every statutory ingredient verbatim if the necessary factual	531

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Proceedings	foundation is present. Quashing is warranted where essential basic facts are absent or the proceeding is a clear abuse of process, including malicious prosecution or absurd and inherently improbable allegations. The power must be used sparingly and cautiously so that a legitimate prosecution is not stifled.
Complainant's alleged mala fides where a cognizable offence is disclosed	Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary and cannot by themselves justify quashing. Applying Renu Kumari, the Court held that the sufficiently specific allegations against the husband permitted prosecution despite his claim of retaliation. Evidence collected and led in the criminal proceeding determines the merits; this rule does not remove the exceptional power to prevent an established abuse of process.	601
Defence documents relied on for pre-trial quashing	Exceptional reliance on defence documents for quashing requires material of sterling and impeccable quality that is sound, reasonable and indubitable, wholly displaces the accusations, and is unrefuted or cannot justifiably be refuted. Continuing the trial must consequently amount to abuse of process and fail to serve justice. Applying these requirements to the request to bypass revision, the Court found that the petitioners' counter-complaints and FIRs did not establish the complainant's wife's guilt or demonstrate that his complaint was malicious.	613
Informant's mala fides where a cognizable offence is disclosed	Where the complaint discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary. Allegations of hostility cannot by themselves justify quashing; the material collected and evidence led determine the accused's responsibility. Filing complaints or FIRs against a relative of the complainant does not, merely by its occurrence, establish the relative's guilt or the malicious character of the later complaint.	613
Prima Facie Offence and Abuse-of-Process Tests Without a Mini-Trial	Applying the narrated Bhajan Lal and Amit Kapoor principles, the Court examined whether the uncontroverted allegations and investigation material disclosed a prima facie offence and whether continuation would abuse the process of law. Inherent quashing powers require care and circumspection. The inquiry does not involve a full trial of the evidence or a forecast of conviction; the Court considers the allegations as a whole and balances personal liberty with the prosecution's right to proceed. Here, the judicial statement and material in the police case diary led the Court to find continued prosecution abusive.	656
Section 482 CrPC—Purpose and restrained exercise of inherent power	Section 482 preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. The power is exercised sparingly and cautiously, on sound legal principles. It does not permit the High Court to act as an appellate or revisional court or to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	661
Quashing on threshold defects—Illustrative grounds and limits	The reproduced quashing principles recognise intervention where an express legal bar prevents proceedings, the allegations accepted in full disclose no offence, or the allegations are so absurd and inherently improbable that no prudent person could find sufficient ground to proceed. These grounds do not authorise weighing contested evidence to predict whether a conviction will follow.	661
Section 482 CrPC—Preserved powers and judicial restraint	Section 482 preserves inherent powers to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. Those powers must be exercised cautiously and on sound principles. They do not make the High Court an appellate or revisional court for deciding disputed evidence or allow a legitimate prosecution to be suppressed.	663
Threshold defects that may justify quashing	The reproduced quashing principles permit intervention where proceedings face an express legal bar, the allegations accepted in their entirety do not disclose an offence, or the allegations are inherently absurd and improbable so that no	663 prudent person could find sufficient ground to proceed. Such intervention remains exceptional and does not authorise a trial of disputed facts.

Informant's mala fides and the dual relevance of enmity	Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary and do not by themselves justify quashing. Enmity can supply a motive for either false implication or commission of the offence. Its existence does not resolve the truth of the accusations at the quashing stage.	666
Section 482 CrPC—Threshold scrutiny and prohibition on a mini-trial	The High Court may quash proceedings where the allegations accepted in their entirety disclose no offence, an express legal bar applies, or another recognised ground of abuse is established. The power is exercised sparingly to prevent abuse or secure justice. It does not permit a roving inquiry into reliability, meticulous appreciation of evidence or findings on disputed defences. The allegations here disclosed offences on their face, leaving proof to trial.	666
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	Ordinarily, a Section 482 CrPC court neither appreciates the accused's defence nor tests the truth of defence documents. In an appropriate case, however, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. This limited exception does not permit adjudication of contested factual defences.	666
Proxy-examination allegations—Occupational incapacity as a disputed defence	A claim that an accused is an agriculturist without electrical knowledge and could not act as a solver in an electrician recruitment examination raises a disputed defence that cannot be decided under Section 482 CrPC. Where the examination and verification records disclosed mismatches in photograph, identity proof and retina, the Court declined to assess the accused's competence or test that defence through a roving evidentiary inquiry.	667
Section 482 CrPC—Purposes and cautious exercise of inherent power	The High Court's inherent power may be used to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of court process or secure the ends of justice. Its breadth requires cautious exercise on sound principles. It must not be exercised arbitrarily or used to suppress a legitimate prosecution, particularly while material facts remain incomplete.	667
Threshold grounds for quashing and the face-value offence test	Quashing may be justified where the allegations accepted in full disclose no offence, an express legal bar prevents proceedings, or another recognised ground of abuse is established. The reproduced grounds include absence of legal evidence and inherently absurd or improbable accusations. These principles do not permit a determination of the truth or reliability of contested allegations before investigation and evidence.	667
Quashing — prima facie allegations cannot be tested through a mini-trial	When deciding the application to quash the FIR under Section 528 BNSS, the Court applied the restrained inquiry described in authorities concerning Section 482 CrPC. It could not conduct a roving inquiry or a mini-trial to decide whether the allegations were true. The relevant inquiry was whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence. The Pratibha passage also disapproved going beyond the FIR to rely on extraneous considerations and investigative findings when assessing prima facie commission of a cognizable offence. Applying that standard to the specific allegations, the Court refused interference.	671
Quashing on alleged mala fides after a prior counter-complaint	In a petition under Section 528 BNSS, a prior complaint by the accused does not by itself discredit a subsequent FIR disclosing a cognizable offence. The informant's alleged improper motive is then secondary; the evidence collected in investigation and led at trial determines the accused's liability. The husband's earlier complaint to the Inspector General therefore did not justify quashing the allegations of assault and threats during the matrimonial dispute.	680
Inherent jurisdiction — purposes and restrained exercise	The inherent power preserves the High Court's authority to give effect to orders under criminal procedure, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. It is exceptional, must be exercised sparingly and cautiously, and does not make the High Court a court of appeal or revision.	680

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Illustrative grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	The reproduced quashing standards recognise legal bars to proceedings, allegations which disclose no offence when accepted in full, absence of supporting legal evidence, inherently absurd or improbable allegations, and proceedings manifestly instituted maliciously to wreak vengeance. These are illustrative categories; an allegation of improper motive alone does not require quashing a prosecution that discloses a cognizable offence.	680
Quashing while facts and evidence remain incomplete	Inherent power should not stifle a legitimate prosecution. The High Court should ordinarily refrain from a premature decision where material facts remain incomplete, evidence has not been collected or produced, and substantial issues cannot be assessed in their proper perspective without sufficient material.	680
Separately residing relative — specific participation defeats automatic quashing	Separate residence did not justify quashing where the FIR specifically alleged that the elder brother-in-law accompanied the other accused to the wife's parental home, demanded dowry and threatened that she could not return without fulfilling the demand. His own documents also showed active representation of the family in reconciliation proceedings. Those materials disclosed a prima facie role requiring trial.	687
FIR after divorce proceedings — delay during attempted reconciliation	A wife's report of cruelty is not discredited merely because it follows institution of divorce proceedings. She may have delayed reporting while hoping that the marriage would improve or reconciliation would succeed. Where she reports after those efforts fail, timing alone does not establish that the FIR is a retaliatory counterblast.	687
Quashing — prima facie offence assessed from the complaint or FIR	For the challenge considered here, the Court was required to examine whether the allegations in the complaint or FIR disclosed a prima facie cognizable offence. It could not quash by going beyond those allegations and substituting extraneous considerations, such as an adverse inference from divorce proceedings or delay explained by efforts at reconciliation.	687
FIR quashing — prima facie allegations and extraneous civil considerations	In assessing whether a complaint or FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the High Court must examine the allegations for a prima facie offence rather than quash proceedings on extraneous considerations. Civil proceedings arising from the same facts do not themselves end the criminal process. Applying that approach to an alleged forged Will, the Court refused quashing under Section 528 BNSS without finally determining the Will's authenticity or the accused's guilt.	705
Face-value scrutiny and restraint in FIR quashing	The power under Section 482 CrPC must be exercised sparingly and cautiously. When an FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the High Court should ordinarily permit investigation rather than assess the truth, reliability or probable success of the allegations. The Court retains inherent power to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of process or secure the ends of justice within the recognised grounds for quashing, but does not exercise appellate or revisional jurisdiction under this provision.	721
Informant's mala fides where an FIR discloses an offence	Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, alleged mala fides of the informant are secondary and cannot by themselves justify quashing. The prosecution's outcome depends on material collected during investigation and evidence led in court. An allegation that the complainant sought pressure in a property dispute did not displace the criminal allegations at the threshold.	721
Incomplete FIR details during investigation	An FIR need not contain every fact and detail of the reported offence. While investigation is continuing, the Court should not decide the merits on incomplete or uncertain facts. If investigation reveals no substance in the complaint, the investigating officer may submit the appropriate report for consideration by the Magistrate in accordance with law.	721
Illustrative grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	Recognised grounds for quashing include a legal bar to institution or continuation, allegations which taken at face value disclose no offence,	721

	uncontroverted allegations and supporting material which fail to disclose an offence, and allegations so absurd or inherently improbable that no prudent person could find sufficient ground to proceed. Proceedings manifestly attended by mala fides or maliciously instituted for vengeance also fall within the illustrative categories. These grounds operate subject to cautious exercise of inherent power and do not permit routine suppression of a legitimate prosecution.
Absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed evidentiary weight	For quashing, the absence of legal evidence or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation must be distinguished from legal evidence whose weight may or may not support it. The High Court should not ordinarily decide the reliability or sufficiency of such evidence under Section 482 CrPC, because that assessment belongs to the trial court.	721
Magistrate's order for non-cognizable investigation	Where an FIR discloses only a non-cognizable offence, police investigation requires an order of the Magistrate under Section 155(2) CrPC. An FIR disclosing a cognizable offence authorises police investigation under Section 156(1).	721
Section 482 scrutiny without a forecast of conviction	Section 482 CrPC preserves power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of process and secure the ends of justice. The power is wide but must be exercised cautiously and exceptionally. The Court ordinarily considers whether uncontroverted allegations prima facie disclose an offence, without deciding disputed facts or judging their probability, reliability or ultimate proof. Investigation into a disclosed offence should ordinarily be allowed to conclude; early interference requires a demonstrated basis such as gross abuse of investigative power. Defence documents and detailed credibility assessment cannot be used to quash process while a complaint is at the Section 202 stage.	726
Recognised grounds for exceptional quashing	Quashing may be justified where continuation would abuse the court's process or defeat the ends of justice, where a legal bar prevents institution or continuation, where the allegations accepted in full disclose no offence, or where an offence is alleged but there is no legal evidence or the evidence manifestly fails to support the charge. These grounds do not authorise a trial of disputed defence facts in inherent jurisdiction.	726
Specific statutory remedy and Section 482 CrPC	Inherent power should not be used inconsistently with specific provisions of the Code or where the statute provides an effective specific remedy. When such an alternative remedy is available, particularly if the applicant has not pursued it, the High Court will not exercise Section 482 jurisdiction.	726
Discretionary inherent relief and clean hands	The jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC is discretionary. The High Court may refuse to exercise it where the applicant has not approached the Court with clean hands.	726
Informant's mala fides are secondary at the quashing stage	Allegations of mala fides against the informant are of secondary importance when considering whether the prosecution should be quashed. The Court should not test the complaint against competing probabilities to forecast whether conviction is sustainable.	726
Alleged mala fides alone do not justify quashing a facially cognizable FIR	The Court observed that — Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, treats the informant's alleged mala fides as secondary when the FIR, accepted at face value, discloses a cognizable offence; motive alone cannot justify a Section 482 CrPC mini-trial into truth or reliability. The applicants asserted that Sarita's father-in-law owed large loans, threatened false implication on demand for repayment, and induced her FIR. Her report, however, alleged entry by a group into her home, assault, an attempt to outrage modesty, an attack on an intervening relative, and property damage. The High Court did not adjudicate whether the loan account or threat was true and refused to quash on that ground. Renu Kumari itself preserves exceptional quashing where recognised abuse or no offence on uncontroverted allegations is shown; its Bhajan Lal extract	730

	includes manifest mala fide as an illustrative category, which does not mean every disputed allegation of malice defeats a facially cognizable complaint.
Section 482 preserves inherent power for specified judicial purposes	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's existing inherent power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. The power is wide but must be exercised sparingly, carefully and on sound principles; its exercise does not make the High Court a court of appeal or revision. In adopting the passage from Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, the Court reiterated that the jurisdiction must prevent injustice without stifling a legitimate prosecution. These limits governed its refusal to terminate a prosecution on disputed assertions of a loan transaction and retaliatory implication.	730
Alleged mala fides and a prima facie cognizable accusation at the quashing stage	Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was quoted for sparing use of Section 482, the illustrative R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal situations, and the bar on deciding reliability or likely conviction prematurely. An asserted grudge is secondary where a cognizable accusation and supporting material remain; the professor did not show that Awdhesh Tiwari procured the student's complaint. The committee's findings on zero CCE marks and withheld admission card supported the prima facie account. The Court declined to quash the FIR and later charge-sheet proceedings, without deciding guilt.	734
Purposes and limits of the inherent power preserved by Section 482 CrPC	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of court process and secure the ends of justice. Although wide, that jurisdiction must be exercised sparingly and with caution, on sound principles; it is not an appeal or revision against the prosecution case. The passage from Renu Kumari adopted by the Court permits examination of the allegations to determine whether an offence is disclosed when they are accepted in full. It does not permit termination of a legitimate prosecution merely because the accused disputes the complainant's motive or predicts that conviction is unlikely.	734
Section 482 CrPC — quashing a prosecution supported by prima facie forgery material	Quashing under Section 482 CrPC is exceptional and serves to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of process or secure justice. The relied-upon authorities recognise intervention for a legal bar, allegations disclosing no offence, manifest absence of legal evidence or abuse of process. They reject a universal inquiry into the likelihood of conviction on disputed facts. The Court found sufficient prima facie material to prosecute the applicant for the alleged forged OPD slip and hospital entries used to support a false alibi, and refused to quash the FIR.	757
Duty to disclose material facts when invoking the High Court's inherent powers	A person approaching the Court must disclose material facts and come with clean hands. The Court noted that the applicant had failed to disclose the earlier rejection on merits of his anticipatory-bail application. That omission was criticised separately; the refusal to quash was also supported by the prima facie material warranting prosecution.	757
Previous enmity and mala fides as grounds for quashing	Where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence, the complainant's alleged mala fides are secondary and cannot alone justify quashing. Enmity may supply a motive either for false implication or for committing the offence. Choosing between those disputed inferences requires evidence and did not warrant quashing under Section 528 BNSS in this case. The recognised power to intervene against manifest malicious abuse remains available under the governing quashing standards.	785
Illustrative grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	The relied-upon R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal framework permits exceptional quashing where an express legal bar prevents proceedings; face-value allegations or uncontroverted material disclose no offence; no legal evidence supports the accusation or the evidence manifestly fails to support it; allegations are inherently absurd or improbable; or proceedings manifestly constitute	785

	malicious abuse for an ulterior personal motive. In the reproduced CrPC framework, police investigation of purely non-cognizable allegations requires the Magistrate's order under Section 155(2). The stated categories also recognise a statutory provision providing specific efficacious redress. They are illustrative and must be applied cautiously to prevent abuse or secure justice without stifling a legitimate prosecution.
Pending investigation into allegedly forged juvenility records	Where serious allegations disclose fabrication of age records to obtain juvenile status for a murder accused, a legitimate investigation cannot be stopped midway before the police collect the evidence. Applying the authorities cautioning against premature quashing, the Court refused Section 528 BNSS relief. The applicants' account of later age proceedings did not justify preventing investigation into the alleged document forgery and fraud on the Court.	787
Exceptional grounds and purposes of inherent-power quashing	The adopted Section 482 CrPC authorities preserve inherent jurisdiction to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of process and secure the ends of justice. Quashing may be justified where face-value allegations disclose no offence, an express legal bar prevents proceedings, or sufficient material shows manifestly malicious or vexatious abuse for an ulterior personal motive. The categories are illustrative. Caution against interrupting investigation does not require an apparently innocent person to undergo persecution on a wholly untenable complaint.	787
Specific allegations against a relative in a dowry-cruelty case	Prosecution of the husband's relatives requires clear and specific allegations, rather than vague or omnibus accusations. Allegations that a relative supported the husband's assault over an unmet dowry demand and threatened to deal with the situation disclosed a prima facie case warranting investigation. Quashing was therefore refused without determining guilt.	790
Omission of allegations during matrimonial reconciliation	Reconciliation proceedings aim to restore the marital relationship and do not determine the criminal allegations against each relative. A wife's failure to accuse her in-laws during reconciliation, in an effort to save the marriage, does not by itself establish that her later FIR allegations are false.	793
FIR lodged after divorce proceedings and unsuccessful reconciliation	An FIR cannot be quashed merely because it was lodged after notice of a divorce petition. Where the wife delayed complaining in the hope of preserving the marriage and complained after those efforts failed, her patience cannot itself be treated as proof that the FIR is a counterblast.	793
Facial scrutiny of an FIR under Section 528 BNSS	In considering quashing under Section 528 BNSS, the Court examines whether the uncontroverted FIR allegations disclose an offence, without deciding their reliability or truth. Police must ordinarily be allowed to investigate cognizable allegations. Inherent intervention is exceptional and must serve the ends of justice or prevent abuse of process, rather than stifle a legitimate prosecution.	795
Informant's mala fides where a cognizable offence is disclosed	If the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary. Those allegations alone do not justify quashing; the material gathered during investigation and the evidence led before the court determine the accused's case.	795
Section 482 CrPC — specific dowry demands and cruelty allegations	Specific allegations that the husband and his parents demanded ₹20 lakh and a vehicle and abused and assaulted the wife when the demand was not met disclosed a case for trial, despite her short stay in the matrimonial home. Whether the alleged harassment and cruelty actually occurred was a matter for trial. The Court refused to quash their prosecution because a legitimate prosecution should not be stopped midway.	801
Matrimonial prosecution — vague instigation by a separately residing	A husband's relative cannot be prosecuted on vague, general allegations without a specific individual role. Where a sister-in-law lived separately in Mumbai, neither the occasion of her alleged instigation nor the basis for attributing	801

sister-in-law	abortion-inducing pills given by the husband to her direction was explained. The allegations did not justify requiring her to face trial, and the FIR and charge-sheet against her were quashed.
Quashing a charge— prima facie ingredients and restraint	The Court relied on Amit Kapoor for the rule that a charge is a tentative assessment and that quashing under Sections 397 or 482 CrPC calls for sparing and cautious intervention. The court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations and prosecution documents prima facie disclose the offence. Interference may be justified where the allegations are patently absurd or inherently improbable, or the basic ingredients are absent; it must not decide whether the evidence is ultimately sufficient for conviction through a full inquiry or credibility assessment.	812
Section 482 CrPC— offence disclosed by uncontroverted allegations	Quashing power must be exercised sparingly and with circumspection. It may be used where allegations accepted at face value in their entirety, together with the uncontroverted supporting material, fail to disclose an offence; it does not permit a trial-like assessment of reliability. Here, the FIR prima facie disclosed cruelty, and counsel advanced no separate argument addressing its allegations. The Court therefore refused to quash the FIR and charge sheet without deciding the truth of the prosecution or defence case.	816
FIR quashing — Face-value scrutiny and restraint during investigation	At the FIR stage, the Court considers whether the allegations, accepted without testing their truth, disclose an offence. It cannot inquire into their reliability or genuineness. Quashing is exceptional and must be exercised sparingly within recognised limits. Police ordinarily must be allowed to investigate cognizable offences, although intervention remains available where no offence is disclosed or non-interference would cause a miscarriage of justice. The caution about the rarest cases is distinct from the death-penalty standard.	824
Informant's alleged malice — Cognizable offence disclosed	Where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary and cannot, by themselves, justify quashing. The material collected in investigation and evidence at trial determine the accusation. This does not exclude the recognised category of proceedings manifestly instituted maliciously for vengeance; a bare allegation of personal hostility is insufficient to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	824
Section 482 CrPC — Preserved powers and their purposes	Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent powers to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the court's process and otherwise secure the ends of justice. It does not confer new powers or permit the Court to act as an appellate or revisional court. Its width requires careful exercise on sound principles.	824
Quashing — Legal bar to institution or continuance	A manifest legal bar to institution or continuance of criminal proceedings, such as want of requisite sanction, is a recognised ground for quashing. The reproduced categories also recognise an express statutory bar or a specific statutory provision providing efficacious redress for the grievance.	824
Non-cognizable allegations — Magistrate's order for investigation	Where the FIR discloses only a non-cognizable offence, police investigation requires the Magistrate's order contemplated by Section 155(2) CrPC. The absence of cognizable allegations justifying investigation under Section 156(1), subject to that statutory route, is a recognised quashing category.	824
Quashing — Absurd or inherently improbable allegations	Quashing may be warranted where the allegations are so absurd and inherently improbable that no prudent person could conclude that there is sufficient ground to proceed against the accused. This threshold does not authorise weighing disputed evidence or predicting whether a conviction is probable.	824
FIR particulars — Investigation on incomplete initial information	An FIR need not contain every fact and detail of the offence. While investigation is in progress, incomplete or hazy facts do not justify a premature conclusion that the FIR is unworthy of investigation or amounts to abuse of process. If the investigating officer finds no substance, an appropriate report	824 may be submitted for the Magistrate's consideration in accordance with law.

Section 482 CrPC — Face-value allegations and disputed defence	Quashing requires consideration of the complaint and supporting material at face value. The Court cannot conduct a roving inquiry, decide disputed facts, test ordinary defence assertions or assess whether the prosecution evidence will ultimately sustain conviction. Where the accepted allegations and preliminary evidence disclose an offence, a denial of involvement does not justify terminating the prosecution. The power must be exercised sparingly and on sound principles.	825
Quashing — Public or undisputed defence documents	The High Court ordinarily does not appreciate an accused's defence or determine the truth of defence documents when deciding quashing. In an appropriate case, however, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity is not disputed by the complainant.	825
Quashing — Allegations and collected evidence disclose no offence	The High Court may quash where the allegations, accepted in their entirety, do not prima facie constitute an offence against the accused, or where the uncontroverted allegations and collected supporting evidence disclose no offence. This assessment does not permit a trial of disputed facts.	825
Quashing — Express legal bar to prosecution	The High Court may intervene under Section 482 CrPC where an express provision of the Code or the enactment under which the prosecution is initiated bars the proceedings.	825
Quashing — Manifestly malicious institution for private vengeance	The High Court may intervene where sufficient material shows that criminal proceedings were maliciously instituted with an ulterior motive to wreak vengeance because of a private or personal grudge. The inherent power nevertheless must not be used to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	825
Quashing during investigation — Incomplete allegations and premature findings	The High Court should not stall investigation by deciding contentious facts through a roving inquiry before investigation is complete. An FIR is not expected to contain every detail, and scrutiny of the material as though evidence had already been led at trial exceeds the limits of Section 482 CrPC.	825
Civil features of a transaction where criminal ingredients are prima facie disclosed	Criminal proceedings cannot be quashed merely because the transaction also involves a civil dispute when the allegations prima facie disclose the ingredients of an offence. Receipt of substantial payment without delivering possession, followed by an attempt to sell the same property to a third person, prevented the dispute from being treated as purely civil in this case. The correctness of the allegations and the accused's competing contractual defence remained for trial. Refusal to quash did not determine guilt, and the trial court was directed to decide on the evidence without being influenced by the High Court's observations.	831
Allegations of entry and assault inside a house at the quashing stage	A Section 452 IPC charge could not be displaced by the accused's assertion that the incident occurred outside when the Section 161 CrPC statements specifically alleged that he entered the house and his wife's room, threatened her, and assaulted the intervening complainant inside with fists and a chair. The allegation that stones were thrown after coming outside did not negate the preceding indoor incident. The material was sufficient prima facie; the finding was not conclusive for trial.	832
Absence of criminal antecedents as a ground for quashing	A claim of no previous criminal history does not by itself justify quashing an FIR or establish that its allegations are false. Registration of a first case necessarily precedes any prior criminal background. The relevant inquiry remains whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose a cognizable offence.	832
Threshold grounds for quashing and restraint against stifling prosecution	Section 482 CrPC may be used sparingly to prevent abuse of process or secure justice where allegations accepted in their entirety disclose no offence, an express legal bar prevents proceedings, or sufficient material shows malicious prosecution for private vengeance. Exercise of that power must rest on sound principles and caution. It does not authorise a trial-like assessment of reliability	832 or allow an accused to bring a legitimate prosecution to an end without inquiry merely by alleging false implication.

Face-value offence inquiry and exceptional FIR quashing	The Section 482 CrPC power serves to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of process and secure justice, and must be exercised cautiously on sound principles. The Court considers whether the allegations accepted as a whole disclose an offence; absence of basic ingredients, inherent absurdity, an express legal bar or sufficiently established malicious abuse may justify interference. It cannot predict acquittal by a roving assessment of reliability or stifle a legitimate investigation into a disclosed cognizable offence. Here allegations of interception, abuse, assault and threats prima facie disclosed Sections 294, 323 and 506 read with Section 34 IPC, so quashing was refused without deciding guilt or binding the trial court.	837
Reasons addressing the factual matrix in a quashing decision	A decision on a request to quash criminal proceedings must identify the brief facts necessary to understand the case, assess the challenge under the governing legal principles, and state the basis and reasons for granting or refusing interference. Recitation of the power's scope does not replace its application to the particular challenge.	837
Illustrative grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	The reproduced R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal principles permit quashing where an express legal bar prevents proceedings; allegations accepted in full disclose no offence; uncontroverted allegations and supporting material disclose no case; allegations are absurd or inherently improbable; or prosecution is manifestly malicious and intended to wreak personal vengeance. They also address absence of a cognizable offence or investigation of only a non-cognizable offence without the Magistrate's order required by Section 155(2) CrPC. A statutory provision providing efficacious redress may also bear on intervention. These categories are illustrative and require cautious application to prevent abuse or secure justice.	844
Exceptional grounds and evidentiary limits governing quashing under Section 482 CrPC	Section 482 preserves inherent power to give effect to Code orders, prevent abuse of a court's process and secure justice; it is not an appellate or revisional fact inquiry. The adopted Renu Kumari passage recognises exceptional grounds including a legal bar or specific statutory provision for efficacious redress, allegations or uncontroverted material disclosing no offence, absence of legal evidence or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the charge, inherently absurd allegations, and clearly malicious proceedings. It also includes cases disclosing only non-cognizable offences where police investigation lacks the required Magistrate's order under Section 155(2). Absence of legal evidence must be distinguished from contested reliability, which is for trial. Where a cognizable offence is disclosed, alleged informant malice is secondary and cannot by itself justify quashing; the investigation material and trial evidence determine the accused's case. The power must be exercised cautiously without stifling a legitimate prosecution.	857
Section 482 jurisdiction after a charge sheet, framing of charges and commencement of evidence	A Section 482 CrPC petition cannot be dismissed merely because a charge sheet was filed during its pendency, charges were framed, or trial evidence began. Applying Satish Mehra, Anand Kumar Mohatta and Ravikant Dubey, the Court considered the petition on its merits. Sparing intervention remains available where prosecution allegations and investigation material, accepted in their entirety, disclose no offence; the material is examined for that purpose rather than to determine guilt or innocence. The adopted passages also preserve intervention against abuse of process, a manifest legal bar, or absence of legal evidence as distinguished from an assessment of guilt at trial.	859
Section 482 CrPC: disputed denial of a specifically alleged matrimonial assault	At the quashing stage, the court tests whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence; it does not decide a disputed assertion that the incident never occurred. Where the wife specifically alleged assault by all three	861

	applicants over the unperformed ritual, their denial did not justify treating the allegation as false and quashing the FIR and consequential proceedings.
Delay in a matrimonial complaint while reconciliation is attempted	In assessing a request to quash a matrimonial FIR, delay cannot be viewed adversely without considering an explanation that the wife and her family were trying to secure a settlement and her return to the matrimonial home. The relied-upon precedent rejected an adverse inference where the complaint followed failed reconciliation efforts and the husband's civil matrimonial petition.	861
Section 482 CrPC: prima facie offence and limits on appreciation of evidence	Quashing powers must be exercised sparingly and on sound principles. The High Court may intervene where allegations accepted in their entirety do not disclose an offence, where an express legal bar applies, or where sufficient material establishes malicious institution for personal vengeance. It must not conduct a roving inquiry into disputed facts or assess the reliability of evidence as at trial. An FIR need not contain every detail, and a legitimate prosecution cannot be terminated merely by accepting a contested defence.	862
Age and professional status do not confer immunity from prosecution	Advanced age does not by itself justify quashing proceedings for an offence, and an accused's status as an advocate does not establish inability to commit it. Where specific allegations disclose cruelty, those personal circumstances do not exempt the accused from prosecution.	862
Civil claims do not preclude prosecution where criminal ingredients are disclosed	A transaction may give rise to both a civil claim and a criminal prosecution. Quashing may be justified where the allegations predominantly disclose a civil wrong and do not satisfy the basic ingredients of a criminal offence. The existence of civil remedies alone does not justify quashing where the allegations also disclose criminality. Applying that distinction to the alleged unauthorised sale of government land, the Court refused interference under Section 482 CrPC.	871
FIR following a divorce petition: timing alone does not establish retaliation	A criminal complaint cannot be quashed merely because it was filed after the husband instituted divorce proceedings. Civil and criminal proceedings are independent. Where the wife had waited in an effort to save the marriage and complained after reconciliation failed and the husband sought divorce, that chronology alone did not make the FIR a counterblast. Applying Kamaladevi Agarwal and Pratibha, the Court refused to quash the prima facie dowry-harassment case against the husband and his parents on that ground.	872
Alleged informant mala fides do not alone justify quashing an offence-disclosing FIR	Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, an allegation that the informant acted with hostility or at another person’s instance does not by itself justify quashing. Applying Renu Kumari and its discussion of R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal, the Court distinguished a demonstrable abuse of process or a proceeding barred by law from a dispute requiring appreciation of evidence. The material collected and evidence at trial determine the accused’s liability. The applicants’ assertion that a neighbour had engineered the FIR was a disputed defence which could not be decided in the Section 482 application.	956
Informant’s alleged malice: insufficient by itself to quash an offence	Where the FIR discloses an offence, the informant’s alleged mala fides are of secondary importance and cannot by themselves justify quashing. The prosecution’s fate depends on the investigative material and evidence. This does not exclude quashing where sufficient material establishes a prosecution maliciously instituted to abuse the process.	972
Prior hostility and counterblast allegation: limits of quashing	Where an FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the informant’s alleged mala fides or the existence of earlier cross-cases do not by themselves justify quashing. Enmity may motivate either false implication or the offence itself. Whether the FIR was a retaliatory counterblast was a disputed factual issue that could not be resolved under section 482 CrPC on this record.	976
Section 482 CrPC: face-value offence test without a trial of	The FIR allegations must be accepted at face value for the limited purpose of determining whether they disclose an offence. If they do not, or the proceeding	977 credibility	amounts to abuse of process, quashing may be justified. Where a triable case is disclosed, the Court cannot conduct a roving inquiry into reliability or decide disputed factual defences.

Factual foundation for an offence: detailed recital of every ingredient unnecessary	Where the necessary factual foundation is laid and the offence's requirements are substantially met, proceedings should not be hastily quashed merely because one or two ingredients have not been stated in detail. The Court considers the allegations as a whole at the prima facie stage without conducting a meticulous evidentiary inquiry.	977
Quashing cognizance: facial offence test and limits on evidentiary assessment	A quashing court may examine the record to decide whether the complaint, read as a whole and accepted prima facie, discloses the offence; it may intervene where the ingredients are absent or continuation would abuse the process. It cannot resolve disputed defences, assess evidentiary reliability or predict conviction as a trial court would. The petitioner's contested justification for the letter did not establish a ground for quashing the defamation proceedings.	978
Public or undisputed defence documents in a quashing application	Although a court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence or test the veracity of defence documents when deciding whether to quash proceedings, an appropriate exception permits consideration of a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute.	982
Section 482 CrPC — prima facie assessment on the allegations in the FIR	For deciding whether a complaint or FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the Court exercising Section 482 CrPC jurisdiction must examine its allegations for a prima facie case. It cannot quash proceedings by relying on extraneous considerations or going beyond those allegations in the manner disapproved in Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi. Applying that decision, the Court declined to treat the divorce litigation and the sequence of complaints as grounds to terminate the criminal proceedings.	991
Quashing jurisdiction — cognizable allegations and restraint in examining disputed truth	Applying Neeharika Infrastructure, the Court treated quashing as an exceptional exercise requiring caution. Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the Court ordinarily permits investigation and does not test the reliability or genuineness of the allegations. An FIR need not contain every factual detail. Inherent powers remain available to secure justice or prevent abuse, including where no offence is disclosed; their width does not permit arbitrary intervention. The exceptional-restraint standard for quashing is distinct from the standard governing capital punishment. Because the uncontroverted allegations disclosed triable dowry harassment and cruelty, the applicants' denial did not justify terminating the proceedings.	995
Amit Kapoor principles — prima facie offence and limits on evidence assessment	In exercising Section 482 CrPC jurisdiction, the Court must cautiously examine whether the uncontroverted allegations and prosecution record prima facie disclose an offence. It may intervene where basic ingredients are absent, the allegations are patently absurd or inherently improbable, or continuation would abuse the court's process. It must not conduct a full evidentiary inquiry, weigh the prosecution material as at trial, or predict conviction or acquittal. An available civil claim does not bar a criminal complaint where the same allegations also disclose an offence. Applying the reproduced Amit Kapoor principles to the alleged knowing delivery of fake silver, the Court permitted the prosecution to continue.	996
	Sub-Chapter no. 50.3 Section 482 CrPC — No Mini-Trial or Evidence Appreciation
FIR delay — no quashing through assessment of disputed facts	Delay in lodging a complaint does not, by itself, justify quashing the FIR. In exercising inherent jurisdiction, the Court cannot determine disputed questions of fact or enquire into the reliability or genuineness of the allegations at the initial stage. The allegations must be examined to determine whether they disclose a prima facie offence.	2

50.3 : Section 482 CrPC — No Mini-Trial or Evidence Appreciation

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Matrimonial FIR — no mini-trial on the truth of specific cruelty allegations	In a challenge under Section 482 CrPC or Section 528 BNSS, the High Court cannot conduct a mini-trial or a roving enquiry into the reliability and credibility of the FIR's allegations. The threshold question is whether the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. Specific allegations that the husband assaulted the wife and that he and his parents harassed her over an unmet demand for money raise triable issues; whether that cruelty actually occurred must be decided at trial.	5
FIR — absence of every factual detail is not a ground to stop investigation	An FIR need not contain every fact and detail about the reported offence. While investigation is continuing, the Court should not decide its merits on incomplete or uncertain facts and prematurely conclude that it does not deserve investigation or constitutes an abuse of process. If investigation reveals no substance in the complaint, the investigating officer may place an appropriate report before the Magistrate for consideration according to law.	5
Section 482 CrPC — triable cruelty allegations and disputed versions	Where the complaint contains allegations of dowry-related physical and mental cruelty against the husband and his parents which disclose a prima facie offence, their truth is a matter for trial. The Court cannot resolve the veracity of rival versions in quashing proceedings. Inherent jurisdiction may still be exercised where the proceedings, on their face, amount to an abuse of the court's process.	6
Quashing — prosecution case taken as a whole without deciding conviction	At the threshold of quashing, the Court considers the uncontroverted allegations and the prosecution record as a whole to determine whether an offence is prima facie disclosed. It does not conduct a full evidentiary inquiry, decide reliability and admissibility as at trial, predict conviction, or use external defence material to negate the prosecution case. Exceptional intervention remains available where the accepted allegations disclose no offence or the process constitutes abuse; the petitioner's liberty must be considered with the right to investigate and prosecute a disclosed offence.	15
Section 482 CrPC: limits on deciding disputed facts and defence evidence	The High Court must exercise quashing jurisdiction sparingly and on sound principles. It must not conduct a roving inquiry into the truth of the allegations, meticulously weigh evidence or determine disputed defence facts as a trial court would. Those restrictions do not prevent a legal assessment of whether the allegations, taken at face value, constitute the alleged offences.	24
Quashing jurisdiction and the reliability of allegations or witnesses	In deciding a Section 482 CrPC application, the High Court does not conduct a trial of the truth of the allegations or the reliability and credibility of witnesses. It tests whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence and exercises its inherent power cautiously to prevent abuse of process or secure justice. Disputed defence assertions cannot be decided through a meticulous assessment of evidence at this stage.	26
Disputed parentage of the complainant and opportunity for cross-examination	A dispute about the complainant's father's name did not justify quashing when the accused would have a full opportunity to cross-examine her and establish the correct particulars at trial. His apprehension that the asserted error would prevent a later malicious-prosecution claim was rejected.	26
Tentative assessment of circumstantial instigation on a quashing application	When considering quashing of an abetment-of-suicide prosecution, the court forms a tentative view of the allegations and accompanying material. It does not marshal or evaluate the record to determine whether the offence has ultimately been proved. The absence of direct evidence of instigation does not require quashing when the alleged circumstances permit an inference of instigation.	27
Quashing stage: prima facie allegations and disputed defence facts	A quashing application does not call for a trial of witness reliability or an assessment of whether the prosecution will ultimately secure conviction. The allegations must be examined for a prima facie offence, while disputed defences remain for evidentiary determination. The husband's assertion that he had no intention to remarry could not displace the allegation of mental cruelty at this	29 stage.

Section 482 CrPC: limits on assessing disputed evidence	The High Court ordinarily cannot decide disputed facts, test the reliability of prosecution evidence or determine the accused's defence while considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC. It must assess whether the allegations, taken as a whole, disclose an offence, rather than conduct a trial in advance or predict conviction or acquittal. An FIR need not set out every evidentiary detail.	31
Public or undisputed documents in a quashing application	Although the accused's disputed defence and documents are ordinarily not assessed under Section 482 CrPC, a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute may be considered in an appropriate case. This exception does not permit the Court to resolve contested authenticity or conduct a detailed evidentiary inquiry.	31
Disputed matrimonial facts in a Section 482 CrPC application	At the quashing stage, the Court considers whether the allegations, taken uncontroverted, make out a prima facie offence. A disputed allegation about where the spouses lived requires evidence and cannot be resolved as a trial of credibility in the quashing application. Considering the FIR and the documents produced by the applicants, the Court found no ground to interfere.	39
Section 482 CrPC: disputed allegations and the accused's defence	When deciding the quashing application, the Court considers the uncontroverted FIR allegations at face value. It does not resolve rival versions or examine the accused's defence to determine whether those allegations are true. Where the allegations raise triable issues, their truth must be decided at trial; quashing remains available where the proceedings on their face abuse the process of the Court.	40
Transfers to wife's account — effect on quashing a cruelty FIR	Transfers of money by the husband to the wife's account do not, by themselves, establish that her cruelty allegations are false. In rejecting that defence at the quashing stage, the Court noted that the relied-upon transfers preceded the alleged ouster and were made while the spouses were living together. Those payments did not justify rejecting the FIR's allegations.	53
Sections 482 CrPC and 528 BNSS — no mini-trial of disputed cruelty allegations	When considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC or Section 528 BNSS, the High Court cannot conduct a mini-trial to decide the truth of disputed allegations. In the application before it, the Court tested whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence. Where they raised triable issues of cruelty, their factual truth had to be determined at trial rather than by choosing between the rival versions at the quashing stage.	53
Quashing — unsupported counterversion of an admitted incident	An applicant's competing version of an incident does not by itself justify quashing an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence. The applicant admitted that an encounter occurred but alleged that the complainant attacked him. The Court declined to accept that defence where no medical report supported his alleged injury, he had lodged no report against her, and his later complaints to senior police officers did not establish false implication. The incomplete ordersheets also failed to substantiate his claim of being targeted for representing her opponent.	64
Quashing — absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed reliability	A case with no legal evidence, or material plainly inconsistent with the accusation, differs from one in which legal evidence may or may not support the charge after appreciation. Section 482 CrPC ordinarily does not permit inquiry into reliability or a prediction whether conviction will follow. Restraint is particularly necessary where the facts are incomplete, evidence has not yet been collected or produced, and the issues cannot fairly be assessed on the available material.	64
Quashing medical-negligence proceedings — inconclusive cause-of-death opinion	On the combined material of unauthorised allopathic treatment, medicines detected in the viscera and the competence certificate, an opinion unable to determine whether death was natural or caused by an overdose did not exclude a prima facie case. The Court refused to quash the charge-sheet under Section	68

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	304-A IPC and Section 24 of the State Act. It directed the trial court to decide on the evidence ultimately recorded, without being prejudiced by these preliminary observations, and to endeavour to conclude the trial within nine months.
Quashing a cross-FIR — disputed claims of counterblast and delayed identification require evidence	Where rival FIRs acknowledge an incident at the same time, the later registration of one FIR does not by itself establish that it is a false counterblast. A claim based on delayed clarification of the accused's identity and the parties' property dispute did not justify deciding disputed facts in inherent jurisdiction. Under Section 528 BNSS, corresponding to Section 482 CrPC, the Court cannot conduct a roving inquiry into the truth of allegations that disclose an offence on their face.	72
Comparison of divorce pleadings with FIR allegations under Section 482 CrPC	The High Court must ordinarily assess the uncontroverted criminal allegations without deciding their reliability or resolving disputed defence facts. It cannot conduct a trial-like comparison of the wife's divorce pleadings and her FIR to determine which account is true. Applying the settled limits of Section 482 CrPC, the Court left that credibility dispute to investigation or trial and refused to quash the prosecution.	87
Earlier complaint expressing apprehension of false implication	An accused's earlier representation anticipating false implication cannot be preferred over the FIR as proof that its allegations are false at the quashing stage. Whether the allegations are correct remains a question for the trial court. The Court therefore declined to quash merely because the husband had previously complained to police that he feared a false case.	87
Public or undisputed defence documents at the quashing stage	Although the accused's defence and the truth of defence documents are ordinarily not assessed on a quashing application, an appropriate case may permit consideration of a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. The Court recognised this limited exception through Mohd. Akram Siddiqui while declining to resolve the contested accounts in the divorce petition and FIR.	87
Later Section 164 and supplementary Section 161 allegations — Quashing review	Where the prosecutrix implicated the applicant in her Section 164 CrPC statement and supplementary police statement, omission of his name from the earlier FIR did not permit the High Court to declare the later allegations false or disregard them under Section 482. Their credibility required evidentiary assessment beyond the initial quashing inquiry. The post-conviction decision cited by the applicant was distinguished because assessment after trial differs from review of material before trial.	117
Absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed evidentiary weight	A case with no legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, differs from one in which legal evidence may or may not support the charge after appreciation. In exercising Section 482 CrPC jurisdiction, the High Court ordinarily does not decide the reliability or weight of that evidence, which is for the trial court.	120
No determination of disputed facts or defence merits in quashing proceedings	Section 482 CrPC does not permit a mini-trial to decide whether disputed allegations are true or false. The High Court ordinarily does not weigh witness statements, determine evidentiary reliability, or test the accused's defence as at trial. It must not end a triable prosecution by predicting an acquittal through meticulous appreciation of the material.	121
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	The High Court ordinarily neither appreciates the accused's defence nor decides the veracity of documents relied on by the accused when considering quashing. In an appropriate case, however, it may consider a public document or a document whose authenticity is not disputed by the complainant.	121
Defence documents in a Section 482 petition	Ordinarily, the High Court does not assess the accused’s defence or determine the truth of documents relied on to seek quashing. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant	142

	does not dispute may be considered.
Section 482 CrPC: triable cruelty allegations and rival factual versions	A Section 482 petition does not permit a trial of the reliability or credibility of FIR allegations or a detailed weighing of the defence. Where the FIR and witness statements disclose specific dowry-related cruelty and assault, short cohabitation and a rival account do not justify deciding their truth at the quashing stage. The disputed allegations remain for trial.	148
Disputed alibi cannot be decided in a Section 482 petition	An alibi is a defence to be established by cogent and reliable evidence before the trial court. A claim of being at a distant workplace, supported by proposed phone-location and CCTV material, raised a disputed question of fact that could not be determined under Section 482 CrPC. Leaving the defence for trial did not amount to finding the alibi false.	149
Disputed good-faith defence in proceedings under Section 528 BNSS	Good faith under Section 2(11) BNS requires due care and attention. The applicant's disputed claim of good faith could not be accepted without evidence in proceedings to quash the FIR; it had to be established before the trial Court. The application was dismissed as withdrawn with liberty to raise the available defences at trial.	150
Disputed defences cannot be tried while quashing an investigation	For quashing under Section 482 CrPC, the allegations must be taken at face value to determine whether they prima facie disclose an offence. The High Court cannot resolve disputed facts, assess credibility or weigh the likelihood of conviction. Where an offence is disclosed, a legitimate investigation should ordinarily be allowed to continue unless compelling grounds justify interference.	171
Exceptional consideration of unimpeachable defence material for quashing	Defence material may exceptionally justify quashing when it is sound, reasonable and indubitable; it completely rules out the factual basis of the accusations; the prosecution or complainant has not refuted it or cannot justifiably do so; and continuing the trial would abuse the process of court without serving the ends of justice. All four requirements must be satisfied. A disputed claim about residence or visiting terms does not permit a factual trial at the quashing stage.	171
Private partnership deed requires proof at trial	In Section 482 CrPC proceedings, the Court declined to determine the accused partner's liability from a private partnership deed. Such a document could not be judicially noticed as a public document; the applicant had to prove it before the trial court. Its asserted allocation of responsibility therefore did not establish an exculpatory defence at this stage.	177
Private attendance records supporting alibi require proof at trial	The private documents relied upon to show the applicant's presence at work could not be judicially noticed as establishing his absence from the scene of the offence. He was required to prove those documents by evidence before the trial court. The Court therefore declined to decide that factual defence while considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC.	189
No mini-trial or assessment of evidentiary reliability under Section 482	When considering quashing, the High Court does not conduct a roving inquiry into the truth, credibility or reliability of the allegations or decide whether the evidence will ultimately sustain a conviction. It must distinguish the absence of legal evidence or material manifestly inconsistent with the accusation from a case requiring the trial judge to weigh otherwise admissible evidence. Disputed factual defences cannot be decided through a mini-trial.	189
Alibi unrelated to the alleged period of cruelty	An alibi for a period in which no assault is alleged does not displace allegations of dowry-related cruelty. The accused’s training in March 2020 did not answer allegations concerning an earlier period, and the husband’s presence at work did not answer the allegation that he failed to attend reconciliation. These pleas afforded no ground to quash the prosecution under Section 482 CrPC.	190
Prima facie allegations and	Where the uncontroverted allegations prima facie disclose an offence, the prosecution cannot be quashed under Section 482 CrPC by accepting the	190 defence pleas under Section 482 CrPC	accused's defence. Applying this test, the Court declined to quash the dowry-cruelty prosecution.

Comparison of Sections 161 and 164 statements under Section 482 CrPC	In proceedings under Section 482 CrPC, the Court cannot compare statements recorded under Sections 161 and 164 to decide which is more reliable. No legal basis was shown for automatically preferring the Section 164 statement. The accused may put alleged omissions to the prosecutrix when she is examined at trial.	191
Accused's earlier complaint as a defence at the quashing stage	The accused's earlier complaint against the prosecutrix alleging financial exploitation was a defence plea. It did not warrant quashing the rape prosecution where the FIR and accompanying material disclosed a prima facie case.	191
Effect of observations made while refusing quashing	Observations made while considering the limited grounds for interference under Section 482 CrPC must not prejudice the trial. The trial must be decided on the evidence adduced before the trial Court.	191
Defence evidence and roving enquiry under Section 482 CrPC	The High Court cannot conduct a roving enquiry into disputed facts or assess the accused's defence under Section 482 CrPC. The husband's assertion that he regularly paid maintenance did not justify rejecting the allegations of dowry-related cruelty at that stage. The Court must assess whether the uncontroverted prosecution allegations disclose an offence, without deciding whether conviction or acquittal will follow.	192
Public or undisputed defence documents at the quashing stage	Although the High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence documents when considering quashing, it may consider a document in an appropriate case if it is a public document or its authenticity is not disputed by the complainant.	192
Reliability of cruelty allegations in Section 482 proceedings	The High Court cannot meticulously assess the evidence or decide the reliability and credibility of witness statements under Section 482 CrPC. It considers whether the FIR allegations disclose a cognizable offence. Specific allegations of cruelty against the husband therefore could not be rejected through an assessment of their truth at the quashing stage.	193
Public or undisputed documents in quashing proceedings	The High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence or test the authenticity of the documents relied on by the accused when considering quashing. In an appropriate case, it may consider a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute.	193
Concurrent confiscation findings and Section 482 CrPC	Where the confiscating authority, appellate authority and revisional Court have concurrently found that the vehicle was involved in the forest offence, the High Court will not substitute a different factual finding under Section 482 CrPC without demonstrated perversity. No perversity was identified in the findings challenged here.	196
Face-value review without assessing witness credibility	At the investigation stage, the High Court does not decide the correctness of allegations or the reliability and credibility of witnesses when considering quashing. It assesses whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence; the power remains available to prevent a prosecution lacking that foundation.	198
Public or undisputed documents as an exception to defence-material restraint	The High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence documents in quashing proceedings. In an appropriate case it may consider a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute.	198
No roving inquiry at the stage of cognizance or framing charges	At the stage of taking cognizance or framing charges, the Court does not conduct a roving inquiry into the merits. In the alleged manipulation of State-quota medical seats, advance fee payment before the claimed vacancy and the later admission record provided prima facie material warranting continuation of the prosecution.	204

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Quashing tests the allegations without trying disputed facts or predicting conviction	The High Court ordinarily considers whether the uncontroverted allegations, accepted in their entirety, disclose an offence. It must not weigh disputed evidence, assess the accused's contested defence or conduct a detailed inquiry into whether conviction is likely. Where a cognizable offence is disclosed, the case should proceed unless a recognised ground for quashing is established.	209
CCTV-based plea of alibi at the quashing stage	A disputed plea that CCTV footage places the accused elsewhere requires proof through cogent evidence. The High Court cannot decide that defence or conduct a roving inquiry into the truth of the FIR while exercising jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC (Section 528 BNSS).	230
Absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed reliability	For quashing, a case with no legal evidence or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation is different from one in which available legal evidence may or may not sustain the charge after appreciation. Assessing the reliability or probable effect of the latter evidence ordinarily belongs to the trial judge.	230
Disputed allegations in an Article 227 challenge to domestic violence proceedings	In the Article 227 petition seeking to end Section 12 Domestic Violence Act proceedings, the High Court declined to compare disputed allegations in the application and an earlier FIR to decide their truth, reliability or genuineness. Such an inquiry would amount to a mini-trial at the threshold.	233
Undisputed or public defence documents at the quashing stage	Ordinarily, a court considering criminal quashing does not assess the accused's defence or decide the truth of defence documents. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered.	233
Triable matrimonial allegations and disputed versions	Where the pleaded allegations disclose a triable case of matrimonial cruelty, the High Court does not determine the truth of rival versions in a Section 482 petition. Quashing remains available where abuse of process appears on the face of the proceedings, but specific prima facie allegations require trial.	235
FIR following a divorce petition and alleged counterblast	A cruelty FIR does not become a retaliatory counterblast merely because it follows the husband's divorce petition. Efforts to preserve the marriage and obtain reconciliation may explain earlier silence; a complaint made after those efforts fail cannot be rejected on that chronology alone.	236
Facial offence allegations and prohibition on a roving inquiry	For the criminal quashing request, the relevant inquiry was whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence. The High Court could not conduct a roving inquiry into the truth of the FIR allegations or resolve disputed defence accounts as if conducting the trial.	236
Unsupported allegations of mala fides in a quashing petition	Where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary and cannot by themselves justify quashing. A plea that prosecution was intended to suppress compensation or rehabilitation demands could not be accepted on verbal assertions alone. In the absence of unimpeachable or sterling material supporting that defence, the disputed allegation of mala fides could not be resolved in the accused's favour under Article 226 or Section 482 CrPC.	244
Material considered in a quashing challenge after filing of the police report	After the final police report has been filed, a quashing challenge cannot be examined by confining attention to the FIR alone. The Court must also consider the material collected during investigation, including the witness statements filed with the charge sheet, to determine whether the alleged offences are disclosed.	244
Disputed defence recording at the Section 482 stage	Section 482 CrPC does not permit a roving inquiry into the reliability of disputed defence evidence. Verification that a transcript matched a CD did not establish the identity of the recorded speaker or exclude manipulation. Because verification was conducted without the complainant and did not lawfully authenticate the recording, the Court declined to rely on it to quash specific allegations against the husband, while leaving him free to prove the CD at trial according to law.	249

50.3 : Section 482 CrPC — No Mini-Trial or Evidence Appreciation

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Exception permitting consideration of certain defence documents in quashing	Ordinarily, the High Court does not assess the accused's defence or determine the truth of documents relied on by the accused in a quashing petition. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. A disputed recording that had not been authenticated did not satisfy that basis for reliance here.	249
Section 482 court assesses FIR ingredients without trying disputed matrimonial facts	For the Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS request, the Court assessed whether the uncontroverted FIR allegations disclosed an offence. It could not conduct a roving inquiry into their truth or resolve disputed claims of retaliatory matrimonial litigation. Because the FIR contained specific dowry-demand and harassment allegations, the Court refused to interfere with the investigation.	258
Omission of accused's name from FIR and later attribution under Section 161 CrPC	Where later statements under Section 161 CrPC name the accused and assign specific acts of assault, the High Court cannot decide in a Section 482 proceeding that the later naming amounts to false implication merely because the names were omitted from the FIR. The complainant must have an opportunity to explain the omission. Whether it is a material omission or contradiction requires consideration of witness evidence.	260
Limited exception for public or undisputed defence documents in quashing	Ordinarily, a quashing court does not assess the accused's defence or decide the truth of the documents relied on by the accused. The Mohd. Akram Siddiqui passage reproduced by the Court recognises an exception in an appropriate case for a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute.	264
Disputed alibi cannot be decided in a quashing proceeding	A plea of alibi raises a disputed question of fact requiring proof by cogent evidence. The Court declined to decide the applicant's claim that he was at a hotel away from the scene while exercising quashing jurisdiction. The truth of that defence required evidentiary assessment rather than a decision on the papers in the inherent-power proceeding.	266
De facto truck ownership and common intention left for investigation	Documents showing that a truck is registered in another person's name do not, by themselves, resolve whether the accused is its de facto owner. In the non-delivery prosecution, both de facto ownership and any common intention shared with the drivers required investigation. The High Court declined to adjudicate those disputed factual questions in the Article 226 quashing petition.	269
Absence of legal evidence distinguished from assessment of its reliability	For quashing, absence of legal evidence or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation must be distinguished from evidence whose effect depends on appreciation. The High Court ordinarily does not decide reliability or predict whether a conviction will result, particularly while investigation is incomplete; those questions belong to the trial.	270
Pending investigation into trafficking and unlawful-conversion allegations	The Court declined to quash the added allegations under Section 370 IPC and Sections 3 and 5 of the M.P. Freedom of Religion Act, 2021 while investigation was pending. Legitimate collection of evidence could not be stopped at that stage. If investigation produced no material substantiating those allegations, the police could not file a charge-sheet for those offences.	277
Section 482 CrPC: disputed alibi cannot be tried on an unproved attendance sheet	The High Court does not conduct a roving inquiry into the truth of FIR allegations or test a disputed defence as at trial. The Court stated that an alibi must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. The father-in-law's attendance sheet, lacking formal proof, could not establish that defence for quashing the FIR. The face-value allegations disclosed an offence and required the ordinary criminal process.	289
Quashing: limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	Ordinarily, the High Court does not assess the accused's defence or adjudicate the truth of documents relied on for quashing. In an appropriate case, a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. This limited exception did not establish the contested attendance-based alibi on the record before the Court.	289

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Quashing at the investigation stage and disputed factual defences	When uncontroverted allegations prima facie disclose a cognizable offence, the Court ordinarily permits investigation to continue. It does not conduct a roving enquiry into the reliability of the allegations or decide disputed defences to predict conviction or acquittal. The Collector's asserted ignorance of the agreement and absence of mens rea were matters for trial on this record.	290
Section 482 CrPC — disputed defence and credibility	A quashing petition does not permit a trial of disputed facts, assessment of witness credibility or a prediction of conviction after weighing the prosecution and defence versions. The Court relied on the reproduced decisions, including CBI v. Arvind Khanna and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, to leave the applicant's disputed matrimonial account for proof at trial. The claimed short period of cohabitation and the assertion that the wife did not wish to live with her husband did not justify deciding the truth of the allegations under Section 482.	323
Section 482 CrPC — public or undisputed defence documents	The ordinary rule against assessing an accused's defence at the quashing stage has a limited exception. In an appropriate case, a defence document may be considered if it is a public document or its authenticity is not disputed by the complainant. The Court reproduced this qualification from Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar while setting out the governing jurisdictional principles; the applicant's contested factual defences did not establish a basis for quashing.	323
Missing-person report — omission of cruelty allegations and later FIR	A report confined to a husband's disappearance serves a different purpose from an FIR alleging matrimonial cruelty. The wife's failure to allege cruelty in that missing-person report did not establish that the later allegations were an afterthought. The High Court declined to compare the statements to determine their truth in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC / Section 528 BNSS.	325
Quashing — disputed adultery defence and truth of allegations	The High Court cannot use Section 482 CrPC / Section 528 BNSS to conduct a roving inquiry into whether the FIR allegations are true. An allegation by the accused that the complainant was living in adultery was a disputed question of fact and could not be decided at that stage. The Court examined whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence and left factual adjudication to the ordinary criminal process.	325
Section 482 CrPC — disputed consent cannot be decided through a mini-trial	Where the FIR alleges that the accused took the complainant to a hotel on the pretext of visiting his sister, raped her and thereafter promised marriage, the High Court cannot accept the defence of consensual relations as established while considering quashing. Whether consent was affected by Section 90 IPC requires evidence tested by cross-examination at trial. The High Court cannot conduct a mini-trial. Taken at face value, the allegations prima facie warranted prosecution under Sections 376 and 506 IPC.	340
Section 482 CrPC — Disputed defence cannot be decided through a mini-trial	A quashing proceeding does not permit a roving inquiry into whether the FIR's allegations are true or a detailed weighing of the accused's competing version. Evidence reliability and disputed defences ordinarily belong to the trial court; Section 482 is not an appellate or revisional merits review. Here the accused's complaints about encroachment and his assertion that the assault never occurred required factual proof. The FIR's allegations of a demand for money, abuse, assault and threat disclosed a prima facie case, so the Court refused to quash without deciding which version was true.	357
Section 482 CrPC — Limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	Ordinarily, the High Court does not assess the accused's defence or determine the truth of documents relied on to seek quashing. In an appropriate case, however, it may consider a public document or a document whose genuineness the complainant does not dispute. The exception does not authorise deciding contested factual issues through a detailed evidentiary inquiry. No document was found to dispose of the allegations under that exception in this case.	357
Section 482 CrPC —	The High Court does not decide the truth of disputed allegations or conduct a	358

Disputed fraud allegations and documentary authenticity require trial	detailed evidentiary inquiry when considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC. The complainant's account and the company's verification provided prima facie material that the accused had falsely represented company posts, sought money and delivered a purported dealership letter. The accused's denials and challenge to the letter's authenticity could not be resolved by a mini-trial. Quashing of the FIR and charge-sheet was refused; the Court did not make a final finding of guilt.
Section 482 CrPC — Public or undisputed defence documents	The accused's defence and the truth of supporting documents are ordinarily not assessed in a quashing proceeding. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or one whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. That limited exception does not permit adjudication of contested facts by detailed evidence appraisal. No dispositive defence document was found to warrant quashing here.	358
Section 482 CrPC: Delayed Allegations and Disputed Forensic Evidence	Whether an allegation was made belatedly, why it was delayed and what effect the delay has are matters for the trial court. Proceedings cannot be quashed merely because a particular allegation first appeared in a later statement. The Court also declined to determine the accused's challenge to the correctness of the allegations, including the disputed forensic account, through a roving inquiry under Section 482 CrPC.	362
Defence Documents at Quashing: Limited Exception	Ordinarily, a court considering quashing does not appreciate the accused's defence or decide the truth of documents relied on by the accused. The narrated rule permits consideration, in an appropriate case, of a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute.	362
Incomplete Investigation: No Premature Assessment of Reliability	While investigation is in progress, the court should not decide the reliability or genuineness of the FIR allegations by weighing incomplete material. An FIR need not contain every evidentiary detail. Police should ordinarily be allowed to complete the investigation, subject to the recognised power to prevent abuse of process or miscarriage of justice.	363
Section 482 interference with factual maintenance findings	In exercising Section 482 CrPC jurisdiction, the High Court does not interfere with findings of fact unless they are shown to be perverse or contrary to law. The husband did not dispute the material findings supporting his earning capacity, and no such defect was demonstrated; interference with the maintenance orders was therefore refused.	396
Disputed Residence as a Defence in Quashing Proceedings	A disputed claim about the complainant wife's actual residence, based on a process-server's report whose account the applicants themselves contested, required proof at trial. The High Court declined to resolve that defence as a conclusive fact in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC.	401
Absence of Legal Evidence Distinguished from Disputed Reliability	For Section 482 CrPC, the absence of legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, must be distinguished from evidence whose reliability or weight requires evaluation. The latter inquiry ordinarily belongs to the trial court. The High Court should not predict the prospects of conviction by testing incomplete material against competing probabilities or use inherent powers to stifle a legitimate prosecution.	401
Delayed Cruelty FIR after Divorce Proceedings and the Counterblast Plea	A wife may refrain from reporting matrimonial cruelty while seeking reconciliation and complain after a divorce petition removes her hope of preserving the marriage. The sequence of the divorce proceeding and the later FIR does not, by itself, establish a retaliatory complaint or justify quashing allegations of cruelty.	404
Separate Residence of Parents-in-Law as a Defence to Specific Cruelty Allegations	Where the FIR specifically alleges dowry demands, cruelty and participation in ouster by the parents-in-law, their claim that they lived in another city while the wife lived with her husband raises a defence requiring evidence. Separate residence did not, on that record, disprove the specific allegations or justify	404

	quashing the FIR.
Omitted Sexual-Harassment Allegations in Parallel Matrimonial Proceedings	An omission to allege sexual harassment in other matrimonial proceedings did not justify an adverse inference at the quashing stage without allowing the complainant to explain it in cross-examination. Cruelty under Section 498-A IPC and outraging modesty under Section 354 IPC are distinct. Assessing the omission's effect on credibility required trial evidence, not a mini-trial in inherent jurisdiction.	406
Disputed Pronouncement of Triple Talaq at the Quashing Stage	Whether the husband had pronounced the alleged oral talaq-e-biddat could not be decided by weighing his denial, the disputed notice chronology and the wife's earlier pleadings in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC. The Court had to assess the allegations at face value and leave disputed factual defences to evidence at trial.	407
Limited Consideration of Defence Documents in Quashing Proceedings	The High Court ordinarily does not assess an accused's defence or decide the truth of disputed defence documents while considering quashing. In an appropriate case, however, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. This exception does not authorise adjudication of contested factual defences.	407
FIR Detail and Meticulous Evidence Assessment in Inherent Review	An FIR is not required to contain every evidentiary detail. The High Court should not scrutinise the material as a trial court would after evidence or conduct a detailed merits inquiry in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC.	407
Quashing jurisdiction—disputed facts and triable allegations	When the allegations disclose triable issues, the Court exercising Section 482 CrPC jurisdiction does not decide the truth or reliability of rival factual versions. Facial abuse of process may warrant quashing, but the veracity of specific allegations of cruelty must be tested at trial.	411
Defence documents at the quashing stage	The High Court ordinarily does not determine the accused's defence or verify disputed defence documents under Section 482 CrPC. A public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute may be considered in an appropriate case. Here, the husband's prior complaint could not be accepted as true without proof at trial.	415
Separate-residence defence—proof of location and access	Samagra IDs and the husband's complaint disclosed addresses in the same ward, leading only to a prima facie observation that the applicants and husband lived in the same premises. Their contention that they lived separately and had no access to the wife's residence required proof; it did not warrant quashing the specific allegations.	415
Conflicting oral and documentary evidence—limits of quashing	Under Section 482 CrPC, the High Court could not decide whether to believe witnesses alleging dowry demands or prefer a seized Peeli Chitthi said to relate to a different couple. The reliability and effect of that competing evidence had to be decided by the trial court after recording evidence.	416
FIR following a divorce petition and limits of Section 482 scrutiny	An FIR cannot be quashed merely because it followed the husband's divorce petition. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, the Court recognised that civil and criminal proceedings are independent and that attempts at reconciliation may explain a later complaint. It distinguished Amit Kumar Shrivastava, where admissions before the Family Court had demolished the cruelty allegations. Mere chronology did not establish a counterblast here. Section 482 scrutiny proceeds on the uncontroverted allegations and does not permit an inquiry into the accused's disputed defence.	420
Subsequent ex parte divorce decree and an earlier cruelty complaint	An ex parte divorce decree obtained after a cruelty complaint does not, merely by being granted, absolve the applicants of the alleged earlier criminal conduct. The complaint preceded both the divorce petition and decree. The Court rejected reliance on that later decree and declined to decide the disputed truth of the cruelty allegations at cognizance. The complaint and Section 200 statement supplied a prima facie basis for prosecution under Section 498-A IPC.	425

50.3 : Section 482 CrPC — No Mini-Trial or Evidence Appreciation

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Triable dowry-cruelty allegations against husband and parents and limits of Section 482 scrutiny	Where uncontroverted allegations disclose a triable offence, Section 482 scrutiny does not extend to deciding the reliability of the prosecution version or the accused's counter-version. Applying Taramani Parakh and the Amit Kapoor principles reproduced in it, the Court distinguished the husband and his parents from the other relatives. Allegations against the parents included initial harassment and refusal to admit the wife without ₹5 lakh. The husband was separately accused of assault, expulsion during pregnancy, mistreatment after compromise, abandonment at Indore and refusal to keep her after renewed assurances. These allegations prima facie supported continuation under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act, without deciding their ultimate truth.	426
Counter-blast FIR and competing versions of the same incident	An FIR disclosing an offence cannot be quashed merely on the assertion that it is a counter-blast to the accused's FIR. The truth of competing accounts and an allegation of retaliatory motive require evidence and cannot be resolved as disputed facts under Section 482 CrPC. Mala fides attributed to the informant are secondary and do not, by themselves, justify terminating the proceedings.	435
Defence material and the public-document exception in quashing	The High Court ordinarily cannot decide the accused's disputed defence, assess the veracity of defence documents, or weigh contested evidence under Section 482 CrPC. Those matters belong to trial, and quashing is not an appeal or revision on the merits. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered.	435
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing	Although defence documents and their disputed veracity are ordinarily not examined in quashing proceedings, the High Court may, in an appropriate case, consider a public document or one whose veracity the complainant does not dispute.	436
Section 482: Rival Versions and a Pending Counter-Investigation	Where the allegations disclose a triable offence, the quashing court does not decide the reliability of the prosecution version or its counter-version, or predict whether conviction will follow. The husband's allegation of fraudulent cheque withdrawal was still under investigation. The bank complaint and disputed account did not displace the specific allegations against the applicant at this stage.	456
Section 482: No Meticulous Comparison of Maintenance Pleadings and FIR	The Court found the basic cruelty allegations in the maintenance application and declined to undertake a trial-like comparison of that pleading with the FIR. Section 482 does not permit detailed appreciation of disputed evidence, and the FIR need not contain every evidentiary detail. The specific allegations warranted continuation of the proceedings against the applicants.	458
No assessment of disputed facts or prospects of conviction at the quashing stage	In considering quashing, the High Court does not conduct a trial of the allegations, assess the reliability of evidence or decide whether the prosecution will ultimately secure a conviction. Disputed defences ordinarily require evidence at trial. The inquiry is whether the allegations and relevant prosecution material, taken as a whole, disclose an offence and whether continuation would abuse the court's process.	460
Limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	The High Court ordinarily does not appreciate an accused's defence or determine the truth of defence documents when deciding quashing. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. This limited exception does not permit adjudication of contested defence material.	460
Night-duty chart did not conclusively exclude the alleged daytime visit	The duty chart placed the husband on duty from 8 p.m. to 8 a.m., leaving the daytime free on the date of the alleged visit. On the Court's approximate assessment, travel to the complainant's town and back remained possible before that shift. The chart therefore did not establish an inability to attend the alleged incident and did not justify quashing on the alibi claim.	469

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Face-value allegations and disputed defences in Section 482 proceedings	The High Court tests whether the uncontroverted allegations, taken at face value, disclose an offence. It does not conduct a detailed inquiry into their truth, assess reliability as at trial or resolve disputed defence accounts. Where a triable case is disclosed, the merits must be tested through evidence rather than a premature assessment of whether conviction is likely.	469
Public or undisputed documents as a limited exception in quashing	Although an accused's disputed defence and the veracity of defence documents are ordinarily not examined on quashing, an appropriate public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. That limited exception does not permit trial of a contested defence or make a document conclusive of facts it does not establish.	469
Section 482 CrPC — Prima facie material and prohibition on a mini-trial	At the quashing stage, the High Court examines whether sufficient prima facie material warrants trial. It cannot conduct a mini-trial or quash proceedings on the ground that the charges have not been proved. Applying CBI v. Aryan Singh, the Court left contested proof and the allegation of malicious prosecution for consideration at the conclusion of trial. The conflicting death certificates and the allegations in the complaint warranted continuation of proceedings; their ultimate truth was not decided.	470
Section 482 CrPC — Restraint during investigation and facial disclosure of an offence	The High Court must consider whether the FIR allegations, taken as stated without adding or subtracting facts, prima facie disclose an offence. It cannot test their reliability or conduct a mini-trial. An FIR need not contain every detail, and police should ordinarily complete investigation where a cognizable offence is disclosed. Quashing remains available where no offence is disclosed or exceptional circumstances show gross abuse, malicious prosecution or a miscarriage of justice. As the investigation status was unknown, the Court assessed the FIR on the assumption that investigation was pending and left the applicants' common object to investigation.	472
Section 482 CrPC — Specific allegations and disputed separate-residence defence	Where uncontroverted allegations disclose a triable offence, the High Court cannot decide the reliability of the accusation or the competing defence under Section 482 CrPC. Whether the applicants lived separately, and whether their explanation or the complainant's account was true, required evidence tested by cross-examination. Quashing may be justified where allegations are absurd, disclose no offence or reveal abuse of process, but does not require a meticulous assessment of whether conviction is likely. Here, the specific dowry and cruelty allegations disclosed a prima facie case.	476
Section 482 CrPC — surrounding circumstances and disputed factual defences	A claim of manifestly frivolous or vindictive prosecution may require examination of attending circumstances and investigation material beyond the wording of the complaint. That scrutiny does not permit a mini-trial or determination of disputed evidence under Section 482 CrPC. The injustice warranting intervention must be grave, palpable and clear, rather than trivial or doubtful. Inherent power must be exercised cautiously to prevent abuse or secure justice, without stifling legitimate prosecution. The claim that proximity of forest land to the mine caused an innocent mistake was a disputed defence requiring trial; it did not justify quashing the alleged breach of express permission conditions.	484
Truth of cruelty allegations at the FIR-quashing stage	In considering whether to quash a matrimonial FIR under Section 482 CrPC, the Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence. It cannot determine their disputed truth at that stage. Where specific allegations of dowry demands and forcible expulsion disclose cruelty, a contest over whether those allegations are false must be resolved in the criminal proceedings rather than through factual adjudication in the quashing application.	500
Disputed defence and credibility in matrimonial FIR-quashing	On an application under Section 482 CrPC, the uncontroverted prosecution allegations must be taken as a whole and accepted at face value to determine whether they disclose an offence. The High Court cannot conduct a roving	503 proceedings	inquiry, decide the truth or reliability of disputed allegations, or assess whether the defence is likely to succeed at trial. Where the allegations disclosed a cognizable offence, the applicants' competing account of the marriage and matrimonial dispute required proof at trial and did not justify quashing.

Absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed evidentiary sufficiency	In applying Section 482 CrPC, a case with no legal evidence, or evidence clearly inconsistent with the accusation, must be distinguished from one in which legal evidence may or may not sustain the accusation after appreciation. The latter assessment of reliability and sufficiency belongs to the trial court. The inherent power cannot be used to predict conviction by weighing competing evidence or to end a legitimate prosecution prematurely.	503
Claim of easementary rights in a petition under Section 482 CrPC	The High Court cannot adjudicate an asserted easementary right in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC. The applicants' claim that the open land lay in front of their houses did not justify quashing where they had obtained no declaration of that right from a competent civil court.	513
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	The High Court ordinarily does not assess an accused's defence or the veracity of defence documents under Section 482 CrPC. In an appropriate case, however, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. This exception does not authorise a trial of contested defence facts at the quashing stage.	513
Unproved allegations of forced signatures as a defence to quashing a purchase-payment FIR	The applicant's complaint alleging abduction and forced signatures on blank papers did not justify quashing where those allegations had not been established. On the material before it, the Court considered the complaint prima facie an attempt to create a defence to the handwritten purchase account. That assessment formed part of its refusal of inherent relief and did not finally adjudicate a separate false-complaint offence.	514
Section 482 CrPC: Prima Facie Offence Test and Limits on Evidence Appraisal	In considering quashing, the High Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations, taken as a whole, disclose an offence. It cannot conduct a roving inquiry, decide disputed facts, assess credibility or scrutinise the material as a trial court would after evidence. The FIR’s prima facie disclosure of cognizable offences, coupled with disputed questions of delay and consent, did not warrant quashing the FIR or criminal proceedings.	520
Section 482 CrPC: Disputed Identification in Prosecution Video	Whether the petitioners were visible in the prosecution videograph was a disputed factual question that the Court declined to decide under Section 482. The petitioners had not filed the CD supplied under Section 207 CrPC. They remained free to question the witnesses at trial about their identity and presence in the recording; the asserted absence from the video did not warrant quashing on this record.	525
Exceptional Interference with a Framed Charge under Section 482 CrPC	A challenge to a framed charge does not permit a full inquiry into whether the evidence will ultimately sustain a conviction. The High Court must consider the uncontroverted prosecution allegations and record as a whole, without deciding reliability or relying on external defence material to establish innocence. Interference is exceptional where the allegations are patently absurd, inherently improbable, fail to disclose the basic offence ingredients or continuation would constitute an abuse of process. Where the factual foundation broadly supports the offence and disputed facts require trial, the charge should not be quashed through detailed evidentiary appraisal.	536
Disputed residence and possession defences at the quashing stage	A disputed factual defence that the applicant only occasionally visited accommodation allotted to her husband could not be adjudicated under Section 482 CrPC. The Court noted her presence alone at inspection and the absence of pleading or proof that her husband exclusively possessed the accommodation. Those circumstances did not justify terminating the complaint at that stage.	579
Section 482 CrPC: no assessment of	At the FIR stage, Section 482 CrPC requires an assessment of whether the	600

disputed evidence at the FIR stage	uncontroverted allegations disclose a prima facie offence. The High Court must not weigh their reliability, test a contested defence or decide whether conviction is likely. Applying the reproduced quashing precedents, including Amit Kapoor, Arvind Khanna and Kunwar Singh, the Court left the disputed stock position, offline distribution instructions and the applicant's posting dates for investigation.
Consideration of public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	Although the accused's defence and the veracity of defence documents are ordinarily not examined under Section 482 CrPC, an exception may arise where the relied-on document is public or its veracity is not disputed by the complainant. The Court reproduced this qualification from Mohd. Akram Siddiqui while defining its jurisdiction; it did not treat the contested stock and posting assertions before it as established facts.	600
No inquiry into the truth of dowry-cruelty allegations under Section 482 CrPC	In deciding whether to quash proceedings under Section 482 CrPC, the High Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence. It cannot conduct a roving inquiry into their reliability or correctness. Applying the reproduced Neeharika Infrastructure principles and the cited authorities, the Court left the truth of the specific dowry and cruelty allegations for the criminal process and declined to quash them. Its assessment was prima facie, rather than a finding of guilt.	601
Unproved private documents do not establish a director's non-involvement at the quashing stage	The directors' claim that they did not manage daily business raised a disputed question requiring evidence. Their private, notarised MoU was unproved, had not been presented to the Registrar of Companies, and did not bind the complainant. Requests to alter bank operation were unsupported by proof that the bank had changed the mandate, and the cheques had not been dishonoured for stop payment. These documents were not sterling material establishing a basis to quash the prosecution.	641
Challenge to cognizance—No mini-trial of disputed complaint allegations	In a challenge under Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS to an order taking cognizance, the Court considers whether the uncontroverted complaint allegations disclose an offence. It cannot conduct a mini-trial to decide whether those allegations are true or reliable. Contested factual defences must be determined on evidence at trial.	661
Absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed reliability	For quashing purposes, absence of legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, differs from evidence that may or may not support the accusation after appreciation. The High Court ordinarily does not decide the reliability or sufficiency of such disputed evidence under Section 482 CrPC; that assessment belongs to the trial judge.	661
Quashing—Absence of legal evidence and disputed evidentiary weight	Absence of legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with an accusation, differs from evidence whose weight depends on appreciation at trial. Under Section 482 CrPC, the High Court ordinarily does not determine witness reliability or predict whether a conviction will be sustainable. That assessment belongs to the trial court.	663
No legal evidence distinguished from evidence requiring appreciation	For quashing, a case with no legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, differs from one in which existing evidence may or may not support the charge after appreciation. The latter question ordinarily falls to the trial judge and cannot be decided by weighing the evidence under Section 482 CrPC.	666
Quashing — absence of legal evidence and disputed reliability	Absence of legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, differs from evidence whose reliability or weight is disputed. In inherent jurisdiction the High Court ordinarily does not decide whether the prosecution evidence is reliable or likely to sustain conviction; that assessment belongs to the trial court.	680
Triable matrimonial allegations — rival	Where the complaint discloses triable allegations of dowry harassment and	687 versions reserved for trial	cruelty, the High Court does not decide the truth of rival versions in a quashing petition. Whether the complainant was actually harassed is for trial; quashing remains available where the proceedings are, on their face, an abuse of process.

Disputed alibi cannot be decided in a Section 482 petition	An assertion that the accused was hospitalised and absent from the place of occurrence is a plea of alibi requiring proof at trial through cogent evidence. The Court applied the rule that alibi must be established beyond reasonable doubt and declined to decide that disputed defence under Section 482 CrPC. At the charge stage, the accused cannot introduce defence material to obtain a mini-trial; the opportunity to make submissions is confined to the prosecution record and accompanying documents.	726
Later conveyance and disputed loan claims do not warrant quashing an earlier alleged house-trespass offence	The Court observed that — a civil dispute and documents invoked by the accused do not automatically displace an FIR alleging independent acts of house entry, assault, modesty offence and damage. The wife of applicant No. 2 had a pending specific-performance and injunction suit, with no temporary injunction; a sale deed dated 9 October 2023 conveyed possession only then, after the alleged incident of 11 December 2022. Even assuming the reported attack occurred at that same house, the later conveyance did not show that applicants possessed it on the incident date. The asserted large cash advances and repayment were disputed facts unsuitable for final determination under Section 482. The order also referred to Section 269SS of the Income-tax Act as a reason not to accept the cash-payment defence, without an independent tax-law adjudication. The Court, citing a group of Supreme Court quashing authorities, declined a roving enquiry into whether the FIR was true and dismissed the application; no finding of guilt or civil title was made.	730
Absence of legal evidence differs from disputed evidentiary sufficiency in quashing proceedings	For the purpose of Section 482 CrPC, a case with no legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, must be distinguished from one in which legal evidence exists but its weight or reliability remains open to assessment. The latter assessment ordinarily belongs to the trial judge. The R.P. Kapur principles reproduced through Renu Kumari recognise the former category as a possible ground for quashing; they do not authorise the High Court to decide whether available evidence will ultimately sustain a conviction. The Court relied on that restraint in declining to test the truth of the allegations through the applicants' disputed defence.	730
An unreasoned internal committee report did not justify quashing	A committee formed after a student complained about her professor recorded his admission of zero marks on two CCE papers and found that he withheld her admission card until the principal issued a duplicate. It gave only an unexplained one-line view that the hand-grabbing allegation lacked clarity and did not examine the reasons for the marks or card withholding. A reasoned assessment was absent on the decisive allegation. Its report was incomplete and substantially adverse to the applicant, so the claimed clean chit did not justify terminating criminal proceedings or conducting a trial of disputed facts under Section 482.	734
No legal evidence and disputed reliability are distinct grounds of assessment under Section 482	The R.P. Kapur principles reproduced through Renu Kumari distinguish the absence of legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, from legal evidence whose reliability or sufficiency requires appreciation. The latter assessment ordinarily belongs to the trial judge. The High Court should not examine all probabilities to decide whether a conviction will ultimately be sustainable. In this case, the committee's incomplete opinion did not eliminate the prima facie accusation or its supporting material, and the Court refused to quash the FIR and consequential proceedings.	734
Government-land fraud — bona fide purchaser defence cannot be tried in	In considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC, the Court cannot conduct a roving inquiry into the truth of the FIR or adjudicate the applicants' disputed defence. The uncontroverted allegations must be assessed to see whether they	742

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 482 proceedings	disclose an offence. Here, alleged collusion in converting forest land into private land, enlarging its recorded area and continuing commercial possession after restoration of the government entry disclosed offences under Sections 420, 467, 468, 471, 120-B and 201 IPC. The Court reasoned that a vendor without title could convey no title through the sale deed. The applicants' claim that they had purchased bona fide after checking the revenue record did not warrant quashing. The application was dismissed while investigation remained pending.
Section 482 CrPC — disputed defence to alleged fabrication of hospital records	At the quashing stage, the Court does not determine disputed probabilities, reliability or genuineness of the allegations by assessing whether they will ultimately be proved. Applying the reproduced authorities, the Court did not accept the applicant's assertion that he was only a driver and had no duty to make OPD entries as a basis to terminate the prosecution. The allegation that he prepared the forged slip, supported by the hospital enquiry into fabricated entries, warranted prosecution on a prima facie basis.	757
Alternative factual explanation for property damage must be tried	Section 482 CrPC does not permit a mini-trial to decide whether the accused damaged property or others caused it. The applicants' suggestion that tractors driven by other persons destroyed the cement poles disputed the facts; it did not show that the uncontroverted allegations failed to disclose an offence. That factual question was for the trial court, and no ground for quashing was established.	767
Triable cruelty allegations and assessment of rival versions on quashing	When allegations of matrimonial cruelty raise triable issues, the Court exercising quashing jurisdiction does not decide the truth of rival versions. Whether the alleged harassment actually occurred is for trial. Proceedings may nevertheless be quashed where abuse of process is apparent on their face; specific allegations disclosing a case cannot be quashed merely by disputing their truth.	783
Private marriage certificate relied on as a defence to quashing	A private certificate relied upon to allege the complainant's prior marriage could not be accepted through judicial notice in the Section 482 CrPC proceedings. The asserted defence had to be proved by the applicants by leading evidence; the certificate did not itself justify quashing the FIR.	784
Disputed medical alibi in a Section 528 BNSS quashing application	An alibi based on alleged medical treatment elsewhere, supported by a haematology report and a prescription on plain paper, raised a highly disputed question of fact. It required proof through cogent defence evidence and could not be resolved in the Section 528 BNSS quashing application merely from those papers.	785
Limits on evidence assessment in inherent-power quashing	Inherent jurisdiction preserves power to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of process and secure the ends of justice; it is exercised sparingly and does not turn the High Court into an appellate or revisional fact-finding court. Absence of legal evidence is distinct from evidence whose reliability or weight remains disputable. The latter assessment belongs to the trial court. Quashing cannot rest on weighing probabilities to predict whether conviction will ultimately follow, particularly where facts or evidence remain incomplete.	785
Contested defence and evidence assessment at the quashing stage	Inherent-power quashing does not permit a roving inquiry into disputed facts, testing the reliability of allegations or detailed assessment of the accused's contested defence. Those questions ordinarily require investigation and trial evidence. The High Court must use its wide power cautiously on sound principles and cannot short-circuit a genuine prosecution by deciding disputed documents or factual explanations prematurely.	787
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	Ordinarily the High Court does not assess the accused's defence or verify documents relied on by the accused when considering quashing. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose veracity is not disputed by the complainant may be considered. This limited exception does not authorise adjudication of contested defence material as though at trial.	787

50.3 : Section 482 CrPC — No Mini-Trial or Evidence Appreciation

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Triable allegations and disputed versions in quashing proceedings	Where the allegations disclose a triable case, the Court exercising quashing jurisdiction does not determine the truth of competing versions. Proceedings may be quashed where they constitute an abuse of process on their face, but an allegation of cruelty that requires trial cannot be rejected through an assessment of its truth at this stage.	790
Triable matrimonial allegations and defence scrutiny under Section 482	Proceedings may be quashed where the allegations are absurd, disclose no case or constitute abuse of process. Where specific uncontroverted allegations disclose a triable case, Section 482 CrPC does not permit determination of the reliability of the competing defence version. The prima facie allegations against the other three relatives were therefore left for prosecution.	793
Disputed counterblast allegations arising from civil and criminal litigation	Where earlier FIRs preceded the accused's civil suits and the accused alleged that a later FIR was intended to compel withdrawal of those suits, which proceeding was retaliatory remained a disputed question of fact. That controversy could not be resolved in inherent quashing jurisdiction.	795
Absence of legal evidence distinguished from disputed evidentiary weight	For inherent quashing, absence of legal evidence or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation is distinct from evidence that may or may not sustain it after appreciation. The High Court ordinarily does not assess reliability or decide whether conviction is likely; that assessment belongs to the trial court.	795
Section 482 CrPC — triable issues and rival factual versions	Where a criminal complaint raises triable issues, the High Court should not determine the truth of rival versions in quashing proceedings. It may exercise its inherent jurisdiction where the proceedings, on their face, amount to abuse of the Court's process.	801
Section 141 NI Act — disputed management and director status	Once the basic averment of responsibility for the company's business is made, whether the accused actually held that responsibility is a disputed question for evidence at trial. A memorandum of association omitting their names as directors did not resolve whether its list applied when the cheque was issued, whether it was later altered, or whether they managed the company's business or were authorised signatories. Those disputed matters did not warrant setting aside cognizance and summons.	803
Food-adulteration prosecution — disputed claim that goods were not for sale	A disputed defence that the seized dairy product was a residue not intended for sale could not be accepted at the quashing stage where the material prima facie indicated that it was kept for sale in the dairy shop. The relied-upon decision treated the nature and intended use of the product as matters that could not be resolved in the accused's favour at that stage.	806
Section 482 CrPC— disputed credibility and exculpatory defence writings	The High Court does not ordinarily determine the truth of rival allegations, the complainant's credibility or the genuineness of defence documents in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC. Alleged exculpatory writings and the claim that the complainant acted under her lawyer brother's influence required assessment of disputed facts. The Court declined that inquiry and expressly stated that its observations about possible motives on either side were not findings on the merits.	816
Exception for public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	Although a quashing court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence or the veracity of defence documents, it may consider a document in an appropriate case where it is a public document or its veracity is not disputed by the complainant. The Court reproduced and relied on this qualification from Mohd. Akram Siddiqui while declining to resolve the disputed exculpatory writings relied on here.	816
Counterblast plea — Disputed assault versions and FIR chronology	Section 482 CrPC does not permit a mini-trial to choose between conflicting assault allegations, particularly where the accused's counter-FIR partly supports the complainant's account of the encounter. An FIR lodged before the accused's later FIR cannot be treated as a counterblast to that later report.	824

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Quashing — Absence of legal evidence versus appreciation of evidence	A case with no legal evidence, or evidence clearly inconsistent with the accusation, differs from one where legal evidence may or may not support the charge after appreciation. Section 482 CrPC does not ordinarily permit an inquiry into reliability or an assessment whether the accusation will be proved; those functions belong to the trial court.	824
Unproved private defence documents in charge-sheet quashing proceedings	Private documents outside the prosecution charge sheet, requiring formal proof and not qualifying as public documents, could not establish the accused's contractual defence in proceedings under Section 482 CrPC. The Court confined its examination to the prosecution documents and declined to treat the asserted buyer default, forfeiture entitlement or revocation of a third-party sale agreement as proved. It also reiterated that an accused has no right to introduce defence documents at the stage of framing charges.	831
Counter-FIR timing and disputed identity of the aggressor in quashing proceedings	A counter-FIR lodged forty minutes after the accused's FIR could not be treated as retaliatory merely because it was later in time. Both versions acknowledged the accused's visit to his wife's parental home and an incident there. Which party was the aggressor required evidence tested by cross-examination and could not be decided under Section 482 CrPC through a roving inquiry into the truth of the competing allegations. Earlier apprehensions of false implication, amid admitted matrimonial hostility and multiple disputes, did not establish that the later FIR was false.	832
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	Ordinarily, the High Court considering quashing does not appreciate the accused's defence or assess the veracity of documents relied upon by him. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. The exception does not permit a general trial of disputed defence material under Section 482 CrPC.	832
Disputed defence facts and evidentiary appraisal under Section 482 CrPC	The High Court does not determine disputed defence facts or meticulously weigh their evidence when considering FIR quashing. Whether the prosecution can ultimately prove the charge belongs to trial, rather than a preliminary prediction of conviction or acquittal. The applicant's disputed claim that he was at his office therefore could not be accepted at this stage as an established answer to the FIR. Refusal of that defence did not determine his actual whereabouts or guilt.	837
Public or undisputed documents as an exception to ordinary defence-material restraint	Ordinarily, a quashing court does not appreciate the accused's defence or determine the veracity of documents he relies upon. In an appropriate case, however, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. That limited exception does not authorise resolution of a disputed alibi through a preliminary trial of evidence.	837
Informant's alleged mala fides where a cognizable offence is disclosed	Where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary and cannot by themselves justify quashing; the investigation and evidence determine the accusation. Applying Renu Kumari, the Court declined to decide the disputed allegation of mala fides under Section 482 CrPC. The reproduced quashing principles nevertheless preserve intervention for manifest malicious prosecution or other established abuse of process.	844
No trial of evidentiary reliability in Section 482 proceedings	Absence of legal evidence, or evidence clearly inconsistent with the accusation, differs from evidence that may or may not sustain it after appreciation. Under Section 482, the High Court ordinarily cannot decide evidentiary reliability or predict whether conviction will follow; that assessment belongs to the trial court. Particular caution is required while facts are incomplete, evidence has not been collected and issues cannot be assessed in their proper perspective.	844
Unproved private defence document in Section 482	The private declaration relied upon to show that the wife had voluntarily left the matrimonial home required proof. The Court could not accept it in support of the defence at the quashing stage. The reproduced Taramani Parakh	846 proceedings	reasoning distinguishes manifest abuse apparent on the face of proceedings from triable issues for which the Court cannot determine the truth of rival versions.

One-day discrepancy in the alleged date of matrimonial ouster	The difference between 4 and 5 May in the accounts of the wife's departure did not justify undue importance at the quashing stage. The complainant remained entitled to explain the discrepancy, and a plausible explanation could be accepted. The Court considered the discrepancy alongside specific allegations of harassment rather than treating it as conclusively disproving the incident.	846
Refusal to entertain a matrimonial FIR-quashing application while trial evidence is in progress	After rejecting the contention that the FIR was a counterblast merely because it followed divorce proceedings, and considering the admitted separate residence and the dowry-cruelty principle, the Court declined to entertain the Section 482 CrPC application when evidence was already being recorded at trial. The refusal rested on those circumstances together.	851
Disputed defences and document reliability ordinarily cannot be decided under Section 482 CrPC	The High Court ordinarily cannot determine the truth of disputed allegations, weigh evidence or conduct a mini-trial when considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC. The applicant's denial of physical relations and allegation of blackmail through a WhatsApp QR-code money demand were defences requiring proof before the trial court. The adopted authorities preserve sparing intervention where allegations accepted in full disclose no offence, an express legal bar exists, or sufficient material shows a malicious prosecution. They also recognise consideration, in an appropriate case, of a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute.	855
Specific cruelty allegations and disputed medical material raise triable issues under Section 482 CrPC	Applying Taramani Parakh, the Court distinguished mere naming of distant relatives without specific material from allegations against the husband and his parents that raised triable issues. The complaint alleged dowry-related assaults, expulsion and denial of the child's custody. The hospital record supported the pleaded treatment history, and the supplementary statement explained the absence of miscarriage documents rather than withdrawing the cruelty allegations. On the allegations and material considered, the Court declined to determine their ultimate truth under Section 482 CrPC and refused quashing.	856
Section 482 CrPC: disputed defence documents and the undisputed-document exception	The High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence or determine the veracity of defence documents while considering quashing. In an appropriate case, a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. Here, a telephone-usage statement in the husband's name did not establish that the wife used the phone late at night and did not justify accepting the disputed defence.	862
Quashing: prima facie allegations and limits on evidence assessment	The Court must consider whether the uncontroverted allegations and accompanying prosecution record prima facie disclose an offence, exercising quashing powers sparingly and with caution. It must not conduct a meticulous examination of admissibility or reliability, a full inquiry into guilt, or an assessment of whether conviction will ultimately follow. Patently absurd or inherently improbable allegations, or absence of the basic offence ingredients, may justify interference. Where an offence is broadly disclosed, the prosecution should ordinarily continue.	871
Section 482 CrPC: disputed matrimonial defences require trial	In quashing proceedings, the Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence; it cannot adjudicate a disputed defence. The alleged extramarital relationship and the complainant's conduct during reconciliation raised matters for the trial court. They did not displace the prima facie allegation of physical and mental harassment for an unmet demand of ₹4,00,000 against the husband and his parents.	872
Section 482 CrPC — disputed consent cannot be	In considering quashing, the High Court examines whether the allegations taken at face value disclose an offence and whether intervention is warranted to prevent abuse of process. It cannot conduct a detailed inquiry into their truth,	882 determined through a merits inquiry	weigh witness credibility or decide the contested defence as at trial. The plea that an adult police constable voluntarily continued the relationship and later ended the proposed marriage did not permit rejection of her allegations at this stage. The alleged later violence, salary pressure, abortion pills, circulation of photographs and threats were considered on the face of the FIR, and the Court found a prima facie case concerning vitiated consent.

Section 482 CrPC — disputed mobile-location alibi requires evidence	The High Court cannot decide a disputed defence or test the truth of the prosecution allegations in a Section 482 petition. An accused relying on alibi must prove it by cogent and reliable evidence. The applicant's claimed mobile location therefore could not be adjudicated to displace the FIR's allegations at the quashing stage.	893
Section 482 CrPC — limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	Ordinarily, the High Court does not assess the accused's defence or decide the veracity of defence documents when considering quashing. The reproduced principle in Mohd. Akram Siddiqui recognises an exception in an appropriate case for a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute. That exception does not permit the Court to resolve a contested alibi or authenticate an unproved private recording.	893
Quashing — limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	Although the High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence or verify defence documents when considering quashing, an appropriate case permits consideration of a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute.	900
Accident proceedings — conflicting accounts and CCTV at the quashing stage	CCTV footage forming part of the charge-sheet could be examined when considering the claim that the investigating officer had withheld it. A discrepancy between the FIR's description of the collision and the footage did not justify quashing where the material still disclosed a prima facie case. Disputed questions about lane use and negligence required evidence at trial. Observations made for this limited review were provisional and did not bind the trial court.	904
Quashing — public and undisputed documents as a limited exception	The High Court ordinarily does not assess the accused's defence or decide the authenticity of defence documents when considering quashing. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or one whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. This limited exception does not permit a trial of disputed factual issues.	904
Section 482 CrPC — delayed rape allegation and disputed spot-map chronology	The High Court cannot decide the truthfulness of the prosecutrix or other witnesses when considering quashing under Section 482 CrPC. The contention that rape was alleged four days after the initial account required an assessment of credibility. An allegation that the spot map was antedated because it mentioned the subsequently added Section 376 IPC was for the trial court to examine after giving the investigating officer an opportunity to explain. These disputes did not justify quashing the prosecution.	907
Quashing — limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	The accused's defence and the authenticity of defence documents are ordinarily not examined under Section 482 CrPC. In an appropriate case, a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. This exception does not permit disputed document chronology to be decided without evidence or an opportunity for the investigating officer to explain.	907
Section 482 CrPC review without a mini-trial	On a quashing application, the Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations and prosecution material, taken at face value, disclose a prima facie offence. It cannot conduct a roving inquiry, weigh disputed evidence, decide the truth of competing versions or predict conviction. A factual foundation substantially disclosing the offence must be assessed as a whole, without treating the FIR as an exhaustive account. The applicants' denial and reliance on an earlier reconciliation did not require acceptance of their defence against	925

	allegations of later cruelty.
Public or undisputed defence documents on a quashing application	Ordinarily, the High Court does not appreciate the accused's defence or determine the veracity of defence documents under Section 482 CrPC. In an appropriate case, however, a public document or a document whose authenticity is not disputed by the complainant may be considered. The exception does not permit adjudication of disputed defence evidence.	925
Plea of alibi based on an employer's certificate in quashing proceedings	A plea that the accused was on duty elsewhere is a defence requiring cogent and reliable proof. The accused bears a heavy burden to establish the alibi. Whether the father-in-law was on duty required examination of his employer and proof of the relevant documents, and could not be determined under Section 482 CrPC.	930
Section 482 CrPC does not permit a trial of disputed facts or witness reliability	A quashing court assesses the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material to determine whether an offence is disclosed; it does not conduct a detailed enquiry into whether the allegations are true or the witnesses reliable. Applying XYZ v. State of Gujarat, S. Martin, Gourishetty Mahesh, M. Srikanth, Arvind Khanna, Kunwar Singh and the other authorities discussed, the Court declined to decide whether the alleged construction had taken place or the incident had occurred as alleged. Those disputed matters required evidence before the trial court. The inherent power must be used cautiously to prevent abuse of process or secure justice, without stifling a legitimate prosecution.	956
Triable issues and the limits of assessing rival versions on quashing	When the complaint discloses triable issues, the High Court is not expected in quashing proceedings to determine the truth of rival versions. It may intervene where the proceedings are facially an abuse of process. The adopted Taramani Parakh passage treats allegations of dowry harassment and cruelty as requiring trial where, taken as proved, they disclose a case. This supported refusal of quashing against the parents while allowing separate relief for the sister-in-law's unspecified role.	967
Section 528 BNSS: disputed alibi cannot be determined in FIR-quashing proceedings	Whether the accused were at their office rather than at the scene was a disputed question of fact requiring assessment of evidence at trial. That contested alibi did not justify quashing the FIR under section 528 BNSS.	970
Section 482 CrPC: disputed defence and evidentiary reliability	In deciding a quashing petition, the High Court cannot conduct a mini-trial to determine the truth of the allegations, assess contested defence evidence or decide whether the prosecution evidence will sustain a conviction. Disputed evidence ordinarily falls for assessment at trial; a cognizable offence disclosed by the uncontroverted FIR allegations cannot be defeated by such an inquiry.	972
Defence documents in quashing: public or undisputed documents	Ordinarily, the High Court does not appreciate the accused's defence or test the veracity of defence documents when considering quashing. In an appropriate case, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute.	972
Quashing on a favourable expert report without the remaining prosecution material	A favourable handwriting report alone did not justify quashing where the applicant had not produced the charge-sheet to show what other evidence supported the prosecution and had not challenged the charge-framing order. Without material demonstrating the absence of other incriminating evidence, the Court declined to terminate the trial under section 482 CrPC.	973
Section 482 CrPC: no roving inquiry into disputed evidence	The High Court must not assess disputed evidence, test the truth of allegations or predict conviction through a mini-trial in quashing proceedings. Where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence, investigation ordinarily must proceed; intervention remains available where the legal grounds for quashing or a clear abuse of process are established.	976
Alibi concerns the time of the offence,	An alibi requires the accused to have been elsewhere when the offence allegedly occurred. Presence at the High Court on the following day, when the FIR was	976

not the time of FIR registration	lodged, did not establish absence from the village at the time of the alleged offence. The applicant did not claim absence during that relevant period.
Public or undisputed defence documents in quashing proceedings	Although a quashing court ordinarily neither appreciates the accused's defence nor tests the veracity of defence documents, it may consider a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute in an appropriate case.	976
Defence documents and disputed matrimonial counter-version at quashing stage	Ordinarily, the quashing court does not appreciate the accused's defence or decide the veracity of defence documents. In an appropriate case, a public document or one whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered. The applicants' rival account of the marriage and counselling required proof at trial and did not justify quashing the specific allegations.	977
Cognizance and framing of charge: no right to introduce defence material	An accused has no right to produce defence material at the stage of taking cognizance or framing charges. The contrary approach in Satish Mehra was disapproved in Debendra Nath Padhi. In this case, the petitioner's explanation for the allegedly defamatory letter was a disputed defence to be proved at trial, rather than decided in the writ challenge to cognizance.	978
Prima facie scrutiny without a trial of evidence in quashing proceedings	In deciding whether criminal proceedings should be quashed, the Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations and accompanying prosecution record prima facie disclose an offence. It does not conduct a meticulous appraisal of the evidence or a full inquiry into whether the prosecution will ultimately secure a conviction. This threshold assessment also governs a claim that the dispute is merely civil.	981
Section 482 CrPC — quashing cannot involve a trial of disputed allegations or defence	In considering quashing of a charge sheet and framed charges, the Court must ordinarily assess whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence, without deciding their truth, weighing credibility or conducting a detailed inquiry into the accused's defence. Quashing may be justified where the allegations taken in their entirety disclose no offence, an express legal bar applies, or sufficient material establishes malicious institution to wreak personal vengeance. The power must be exercised sparingly and cannot stifle a legitimate prosecution. Specific allegations of dowry demands, harassment, property taking and threats were sufficient to resist quashing of the charges under Sections 498-A, 406 and 506 Part II IPC.	1001
Section 482 CrPC — limited consideration of public or undisputed defence documents	The High Court ordinarily does not appreciate the accused's defence or examine the truth of documents relied on by the accused while considering quashing. As explained in Mohd. Akram Siddiqui, whose principle the Court reproduced in setting out the governing scope of Section 482 CrPC, an exception permits consideration in an appropriate case where the document is public or its veracity is not disputed by the complainant. This exception qualifies the ordinary rule against evaluating defence material at the quashing stage.	1001
	Sub-Chapter no. 50.4 Compromise-Based Quashing and Limits in Serious Offences
Compromise-based quashing — bank-official misappropriation affecting public trust	Alleged misappropriation of a deceased customer's money by a bank official affects public confidence in the banking system and is an offence against society. A private compromise is therefore insufficient to justify quashing that prosecution under Section 482 CrPC. The Court applied this principle to the remaining breach-of-trust, forgery and conspiracy charges even though the Section 420 IPC charge had already been compounded.	7
Section 482 CrPC quashing and Section 320 compounding — distinct powers	The High Court's inherent power under Section 482 CrPC is distinct from the statutory power to compound an offence under Section 320. A complete settlement may justify quashing even a non-compoundable offence in an appropriate case, but the power must be exercised sparingly and cautiously. The Court must form an opinion that intervention would secure the ends of justice	7 or prevent abuse of its process.

Settlement — serious offences and public-duty prosecutions	A compromise between the victim and accused is not a sufficient ground to quash prosecutions for heinous and serious offences with a substantial social impact, such as murder, rape or dacoity. The same restriction applies to offences under statutes such as the Prevention of Corruption Act and offences committed by public servants while acting in that capacity. Their character extends beyond a private dispute between the parties.	7
Settlement of predominantly civil disputes — conviction prospects and injustice	Criminal cases with an overwhelmingly and predominantly civil character, including appropriate commercial, matrimonial or family disputes, may be quashed after the parties resolve their entire dispute. The High Court must examine whether conviction is remote and unlikely and whether continuation would cause serious oppression, prejudice or extreme injustice. Settlement does not dispense with that judicial assessment.	7
Compromise-based quashing — significance of the stage of proceedings	The timing of settlement matters when exercising Section 482 CrPC jurisdiction. A settlement reached immediately after the alleged offence while investigation is continuing, or after charge framing but before evidence begins or while it is at an early stage, may receive more favourable consideration, subject to a prima facie assessment of the material. When prosecution evidence is almost complete or arguments have begun, the High Court should ordinarily leave the trial court to decide the merits rather than quash on settlement.	7
Rape prosecution — later marriage or private settlement is no ground for quashing	A pending rape prosecution cannot be quashed merely because the accused has married the prosecutrix or the parties have settled. Applying Madanlal and the serious-offence principles in the other cited decisions, the Court treated rape as a wrong affecting society and the woman's dignity, rather than a private dispute capable of termination by agreement. Marriage or compromise could not justify a softer approach or the assumption that trial would be futile.	58
Compromise-based quashing — trial stage and disclosure of progress	The timing of settlement and the stage of trial are material to Section 482 CrPC discretion. In the Narinder Singh principles relied upon, early settlement or evidence at an initial stage may permit a favourable assessment in an otherwise eligible case; quashing is ordinarily inappropriate when evidence is substantially complete or arguments are pending. Mere compromise does not justify acquittal on appeal after conviction for a serious offence. Here, failure to disclose whether the prosecutrix had been examined or supported the prosecution was an additional ground for rejecting the petition.	58
Sections 482 and 320 CrPC — quashing distinguished from compounding	The principles relied upon distinguish statutory compounding under Section 320 CrPC from the High Court's inherent power under Section 482. Section 482 preserves existing inherent power and may permit quashing even of a non-compoundable offence in an appropriate case. Settlement alone is insufficient: the Court must determine, cautiously and on the case's circumstances, whether intervention secures justice or prevents abuse of the court's process.	58
Settlement quashing — nature, gravity and social impact of the offence	When considering settlement-based quashing, the High Court must examine the substance of the allegations, the nature and gravity of the offence, and its impact on society. Heinous offences such as murder, rape and dacoity cannot be treated as private wrongs merely because the victim or family agrees to settle. A mechanical inference from compromise that conviction is unlikely does not replace that assessment.	58
Economic offences — public consequences despite a private settlement	The Parbatbhai principle reproduced and relied upon excepts economic offences affecting the State's financial or economic well-being from the ordinary treatment of settled civil-flavour disputes. The High Court may decline quashing where financial fraud or similar conduct has consequences beyond the private parties. Its effect on the financial or economic system must be weighed.	58
Special-statute examples in	In the Monu @ Ranu Kushwah reasoning expressly relied upon, the reference	58

settlement restrictions — illustrative scope	to the Prevention of Corruption Act and offences by public servants in the Narinder Singh settlement restriction was illustrative rather than exhaustive. Monu applied that reasoning to SC/ST Act offences. The present Court relied on it to refuse compromise-based quashing of the alleged POCSO offences.
Prospect of compromise does not justify using notice to pressure the complainant	Compounding under Section 320 CrPC requires a voluntary compromise in a legally compoundable offence. A request to issue notice merely in the hope of negotiating a settlement cannot be used to put pressure on the complainant; a compromise produced by such pressure is not voluntary.	209
Subsequent repayment and quashing of alleged economic offences	Subsequent payment of outstanding money does not by itself justify quashing where the allegations concern economic wrongdoing affecting public funds and society. The Court must consider the substance and seriousness of the allegations and the public interest rather than treat repayment or settlement as automatically ending criminal liability. On this record, later deposits did not warrant stopping the investigation.	290
Compromise-based quashing — repeated stalking and public sexual harassment affect society	The distinction between predominantly civil or private disputes and offences seriously affecting society governs compromise-based quashing under Section 482 CrPC. An asserted settlement did not justify quashing allegations of repeated stalking and harassment followed by obstruction on a public road, a fall from a scooter, sexually motivated grabbing, threats and abuse. The Court treated women's ability to move safely in public as a substantial societal interest and refused quashing on compromise. This was an assessment of the FIR allegations, not a finding of guilt.	345
Section 482 CrPC — Later marriage does not justify quashing rape and POCSO allegations	A later marriage between the accused and prosecutrix does not justify quashing an allegation of rape or convert a serious sexual offence into a private dispute. Applying the principles against compromise in rape cases, the Court rejected the asserted marriage as a ground to quash the alleged repeated rape of a minor and offences under Sections 5(l)/6 POCSO Act. The alleged repeated exploitation and the accused's continued abscondence after filing of the charge-sheet also weighed against interference. The refusal to quash did not determine guilt after trial.	354
Compromise-based quashing — Distinction from statutory compounding and public-interest limits	Quashing under Section 482 CrPC is distinct from compounding under Section 320 CrPC and may extend to a non-compoundable offence where the ends of justice or prevention of abuse justify it. Settlement alone is insufficient: the court must examine the allegations, the settlement, the nature and gravity of the offence and its social impact. Heinous offences such as rape are not merely private wrongs and cannot appropriately be quashed on settlement. A prediction of acquittal following compromise cannot replace that public-interest assessment.	354
Compromise quashing refused where the applicant evades unfinished investigation	The Court refused compromise-based quashing where co-accused were already on trial but the applicant's non-cooperation had prevented arrest, seizure and completion of investigation. He suppressed his conditional anticipatory-bail history, and the Court inferred that he had neither complied nor appeared before the officer. The alleged ₹4 crore fraud affected numerous victims; complete settlement lacked proper affidavit support, and claimed repayments lacked documentary proof. Earlier refusals and the possibility of further incriminating material also weighed against relief. The decision was a refusal of discretionary quashing, not a final determination of guilt.	443
Compounding distinguished from compromise-based inherent quashing	Section 482 CrPC quashing is distinct from statutory compounding under Section 320 and may extend to non-compoundable offences, but must be exercised sparingly to secure justice or prevent abuse. The adopted test considers the offence's public impact, whether the entire dispute is settled, the prospects of conviction and the prejudice of continuing proceedings. Predominantly civil commercial or family disputes may qualify, whereas	443

	serious offences affecting society, corruption and official misconduct are not quashed merely because the parties settle. The Court treated the alleged multi-victim fraud as having a wider societal impact.
Stage of proceedings when considering a compromise for quashing	The timing of settlement is material to Section 482 discretion. The adopted Narinder Singh passage permits greater latitude during investigation or before evidence has substantially progressed, subject to a prima facie assessment of the material. Once prosecution evidence is almost complete or arguments are imminent, the court ordinarily allows the trial to determine the merits. In this case, an unfinished investigation caused by the applicant's evasion, while co-accused faced trial, did not justify treating the settlement as eliminating the possibility of further evidence.	443
Compromise-based quashing of a private property prosecution under Sections 420 and 409 IPC	The Court exercised Section 482 CrPC to quash a prosecution under Sections 420 and 409 IPC after a voluntary settlement of a private plot-allotment and refund dispute. Although the verification report identified Section 409 as non-compoundable, the Court applied Gian Singh and Narinder Singh, relying on the private nature of the dispute, the settlement and relinquishment of the victims' property claims, and the absence of any allegation that a government agency had been defrauded. The ruling turned on those circumstances and did not make every Section 409 prosecution quashable merely on compromise.	506
Compromise accepted for a bedridden victim through affidavit and authorised counsel	In verifying the settlement, the Court accepted the compromise of a victim who could not attend because she was bedridden. Her affidavit, resignation from the society and counsel's statement that he had specific authority to confirm her consent and redress of her grievances satisfied the Court on this record. The other appearing parties' consent had been verified by the Principal Registrar as voluntary and free from threat, inducement or coercion.	506
Verified compromise and quashing of sustained stalking of a minor	Verification that a compromise is voluntary does not by itself justify quashing under Section 482 CrPC. Where the allegations concerned prolonged stalking and harassment of a minor, public misbehaviour and threats to kill or throw acid, the Court treated the alleged conduct as affecting society and declined to quash the FIR and pending trial on the settlement.	578
Compromise-based quashing of a rape prosecution	Rape is a heinous offence affecting society and cannot be treated as a private dispute capable of ending merely through compromise. A Registrar's report verifying a voluntary settlement did not justify quashing the rape FIR where an earlier compromise-based request had already been dismissed on merits.	797
Inherent quashing distinguished from statutory compounding	The High Court's inherent power under Section 482 CrPC is distinct from statutory compounding under Section 320 CrPC. A settlement may support quashing of a non-compoundable prosecution only within the cautious exercise of inherent jurisdiction to secure justice or prevent abuse of process; it does not create an entitlement to quashing.	797
Compromise-based quashing while a closure report awaits decision	Where the police closure report remained pending before the competent Magistrate, the Court declined compromise-based quashing under Section 482 CrPC because an efficacious statutory remedy was available. The Court left the report for the Magistrate's consideration without deciding whether the compromise justified quashing on its merits.	798
Section 308 IPC: compounding and inherent quashing	An offence under Section 308 IPC is not compoundable under Section 320 CrPC. A request to end the prosecution on compromise therefore requires consideration under the High Court's distinct inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC, exercised sparingly and cautiously to secure justice or prevent abuse of process.	798
Judicial assessment of a settlement offered for quashing	Compromise-based quashing requires consideration of the offence's nature and societal impact, the relevant prima facie material, prospects of conviction and the stage at which settlement is reached. Heinous offences and offences with	798

	serious public impact cannot be treated like predominantly civil disputes. The applicable safeguards in Gian Singh and Narinder Singh must be followed; settlement alone does not determine the outcome.
Breach of a conditional settlement as a ground for quashing an FIR	An asserted settlement requiring withdrawal of civil and criminal cases does not by itself require quashing of an FIR when a party fails to honour its conditions. The Court must still consider whether the allegations, accepted as correct, disclose an offence. Withdrawal of the civil suit pursuant to the settlement did not displace that inquiry or entitle the accused to quashing on the settlement ground alone.	831
Compromise-based quashing of public abduction, armed assault and coerced self-incrimination	On an application under Section 528 BNSS/Section 482 CrPC, allegations of abduction from a public place, assault with the butt of a pistol and forced videos containing false self-incriminating admissions were treated as heinous and directed against society. Read as a whole, the FIR also alleged extraction of ₹16,000 and a further monetary demand. Applying Gian Singh and Narinder Singh, the Court refused to quash the FIR on compromise. The decision concerns the nature of these allegations at the quashing stage and does not determine guilt or make every offence under the cited provisions categorically incapable of compromise-based quashing.	910
Compromise-based quashing of heinous sexual offences against a minor	Section 482 CrPC cannot be used to quash heinous offences that are not purely private and have a serious societal impact merely because the parties have settled. Even a prediction that compromise makes conviction remote does not justify terminating such proceedings. Applying Ramji Lal Bairwa, the Court refused to quash the prosecution alleging rape and POCSO offences against a minor on the basis of compromise.	933
Compromise or marriage as a ground to terminate a rape prosecution	Compromise is not an acceptable basis for a lenient judicial approach in cases of rape or attempted rape. A proposal to marry the victim may itself place pressure on her and does not justify such an approach. Applying Madanlal and Arif Khan, the Court reiterated that even marriage with the prosecutrix does not justify quashing a rape prosecution.	933
Verified settlement and quashing of non-compoundable proceedings	Quashing under Section 482 CrPC differs from compounding under Section 320. Even a non-compoundable case may be quashed after settlement, but the power is sparing and cautious and must secure the ends of justice or prevent abuse of process. Predominantly civil commercial, matrimonial or family disputes require consideration of complete settlement, the likelihood of conviction and oppressive or unjust continuation. Heinous offences with serious societal impact, offences under statutes such as the Prevention of Corruption Act and offences by public servants in their official capacity cannot be quashed merely on private compromise. Verification of the settlement did not by itself satisfy these requirements.	938
Misuse of government agencies in a forgery case and compromise-based quashing	Allegations that a sale deed was obtained in a dead person's name and a false death certificate was prepared through misuse of government agencies prevented treating the prosecution as a simple private property dispute. On those allegations, settlement between the parties did not justify quashing the FIR or sessions trial.	938
Disclosure of the trial stage when seeking compromise-based quashing	The timing of settlement and stage of proceedings materially affect the exercise of Section 482 power. Settlement during investigation, before evidence or at its early stage may receive favourable consideration after the required prima facie assessment. Where prosecution evidence is nearly complete, has concluded or arguments have begun, the High Court should ordinarily allow the trial court to decide the merits. The applicant's failure to disclose the stage of the sessions trial was therefore material to the refusal of quashing.	938
Compromise in a prosecution	Compromise did not justify quashing where the applicants had represented ownership of land belonging to a third person and tried to sell it without	964 involving the purported sale of third-party land	authority. Earlier proceedings had already found prima facie material under Sections 420, 467 and 468 IPC. The transaction affected the third-party owner as well as the complainant, and the Court applied the distinction between private disputes and offences against society. Counsel neither explained the circumstances of the later compromise nor identified the trial stage. In those circumstances the Court refused to quash, without finally determining criminal guilt.

Compromise-based quashing of predominantly civil disputes	Section 482 CrPC may be used to quash non-compoundable proceedings having an overwhelmingly and predominantly civil character, particularly commercial, matrimonial or family disputes, when the parties have resolved the entire dispute. That power does not make compromise sufficient for offences against society. The Court adopted this distinction from Gian Singh, Narinder Singh and the reproduced Laxmi Narayan principles.	964
Antecedents and settlement circumstances in compromise-based quashing	When considering settlement of non-compoundable offences that are private in nature and have no serious societal impact, the High Court must consider the accused's antecedents and conduct, including any absconding and its reasons, and how the compromise was obtained. A settlement cannot be assessed independently of those circumstances. Here, the absence of an explanation for the complainant's change of position was material to refusal of quashing.	964

Section 482 CrPC — Quashing Where Criminal Ingredients Are Absent

Omnibus dowry allegations — undisputed childhood at the alleged onset	An FIR and Section 161 statement that collectively alleged dowry demand and mental and physical harassment, without any specific act or manner of harassment by the husband's two siblings, did not disclose a prima facie case against them. Their undisputed ages placed them at thirteen and eleven when the alleged conduct began, which the Court considered with the vague account. It quashed the Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act FIR only against these applicants.	14
Accused-specific quashing where face-value allegations disclose no offence	Proceedings may be quashed under Section 482 CrPC where the allegations, accepted in their entirety, do not disclose an offence against the applicant. Detailed allegations against the husband did not supply the missing offence ingredients against his mother. On the allegations of household objections, taunts and non-intervention attributed to her, the Court found no offence under Sections 498-A and 506 read with Section 34 IPC or Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, and quashed the FIR and prosecution only as against her.	24
Quashing where specific allegations disclose an offence	A challenge under Section 482 CrPC cannot succeed merely because the accused disputes a specific allegation which, taken uncontroverted, discloses an offence. Filing a charge-sheet does not establish guilt: the prosecution must still prove the allegation. The specific statement attributing storage of the sand to the applicant therefore justified leaving the prosecution to proceed, without a final finding of guilt.	35
Quashing where the allegations disclose no offence or are inherently absurd	Criminal proceedings may be quashed where the FIR or complaint, accepted fully at face value, does not prima facie disclose an offence, or where the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material disclose no case against the accused. Inherently absurd or improbable allegations may also justify quashing where no prudent person could conclude that sufficient ground exists to proceed.	64
Quashing dowry proceedings — individual scrutiny of relatives	Relatives of the husband cannot be prosecuted merely because of their relationship or on vague, general or omnibus allegations. Their own specific role must be examined rather than attributing the husband's alleged conduct to the whole family. The Court applied that rule to quash the FIR and	69

	consequential proceedings only against the married sister-in-law. The husband's challenge was not pressed, and his prosecution continued.
Section 482 CrPC — Quashing where the alleged conduct does not constitute abetment	At the quashing stage, the Court forms a tentative view from the allegations and record rather than finally evaluating or weighing the evidence. The only alleged basis for suicide here was the deceased's grievance over the wife's FIR. As that conduct disclosed no abetment, the Court quashed the Sections 306/34 FIR, charge sheet and consequential proceedings against the wife and her parents.	114
Quashing where the allegations and uncontroverted material disclose no offence	Quashing may be justified where the FIR or complaint, read as a whole and accepted at face value, does not disclose the alleged offence, or where the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material disclose no offence against the accused. The inquiry concerns legal sufficiency of the allegations, rather than a prediction of whether conviction will follow.	120
Absence of offence ingredients in allegations accepted at face value	Quashing is justified where the allegations, accepted at face value and in their entirety, do not prima facie constitute an offence against the accused, or where the uncontroverted allegations and supporting evidence disclose no offence. The test concerns the allegations as a whole and is not a full inquiry into the prospect of conviction.	121
Quashing where accepted allegations disclose no offence	The High Court may quash where the FIR or complaint, read at face value and accepted in its entirety, does not disclose an offence. The same threshold includes uncontroverted allegations and supporting material that do not make out an offence against the accused. This inquiry concerns the legal sufficiency of the allegations rather than proof of their truth through a trial of the evidence.	189
Section 409 FIR based on funds used in a Lokayukta trap	Withdrawal of hostel funds followed immediately by handing the money to the investigating agency for a bribery trap did not constitute misappropriation where the same notes were recovered during the trap and remained with the agency and then the trial Court. Since the FIR itself acknowledged that use and custody, its allegations taken at face value disclosed no offence under Section 409 IPC, and the FIR was quashed.	198
Quashing in favour of a co-accused depends on the material against each accused	Quashing the proceedings against a co-accused for want of material showing his involvement does not establish that no offence occurred or entitle every accused to the same relief. The candidates' advance fee payments and admission chronology supplied material distinguishing their cases from the co-accused whose prosecution had been quashed.	204
Vague dowry allegations against the husband's relatives	Relatives cannot be compelled to face a matrimonial prosecution merely because they are named as family members. Where neither the FIR nor the complainant's and family members' Section 161 statements attributed a specific incident or role to applicants 3–8, the general and omnibus allegations did not justify continuing proceedings under Sections 498-A/34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act against them.	235
Separate residence and alleged non-involvement of a relative	A claim that a relative living separately had no involvement in the couple's affairs may be rejected at the threshold where the applicants' own complaint cites her as an eyewitness to an incident at the matrimonial residence. The Court also considered allegations in the relatives' own daughter-in-law's FIRs as context for its prima facie finding of interference, without making a final determination of those accusations.	236
Vague telephonic allegations against a brother-in-law	General allegations that the younger brother-in-law abused the complainant and threatened expulsion while speaking to his parents by telephone, without identifying specific occasions or instances in either the FIR or the Section 161 statement, were insufficient to require him to face prosecution. With no particular act of personal cruelty attributed to him, the Court quashed the FIR and consequential prosecution only as against that applicant.	249
Face-value test for	In deciding whether to quash criminal proceedings, the Court examines whether	260

disclosure of an offence at the quashing stage	the uncontroverted allegations, accepted in their entirety, disclose an offence. It does not determine whether those allegations will ultimately be proved or whether a conviction is likely. The reliability of evidence ordinarily falls for assessment by the trial court.
Face-value disclosure of an offence in inherent-power review	In considering quashing, the High Court examines whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence. It does not decide the disputed defence as though conducting the trial. Applying that test, the Court found no basis to interfere with the FIR alleging abuse and assault.	266
Quashing where the allegations disclose no offence	Criminal proceedings may be quashed where the FIR or complaint, accepted at face value and in its entirety, does not constitute the alleged offence, or where the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material disclose no offence against the accused.	270
FIR quashing: disclosure of an offence and assessment of truth	At the quashing stage, the Court considers whether the FIR allegations disclose a cognizable offence; it does not determine their reliability or genuineness by examining the merits. Where no cognizable offence or offence of any kind is disclosed, investigation need not be allowed to continue. Quashing remains an exceptional exercise governed by the recognised legal parameters.	277
Section 482 CrPC — face-value offence test in a speech prosecution	In deciding this request to quash, the Court examined whether the uncontroverted FIR allegations disclosed an offence. The admitted additions to the cartoon prevented acceptance of the claim that no Section 153A offence could arise on those allegations. The disputed explanation and lack-of-intent defence required examination at trial, rather than a final determination in the quashing proceeding.	348
Quashing: Uncontroverted Allegations Must Be Tested for an Offence	The court may examine whether the uncontroverted allegations, taken at face value, disclose an offence. It cannot decide their truth by assessing contested evidence or by conducting a trial within the quashing proceedings. The Court found the allegations before it sufficient to continue the prosecution.	362
Face-Value Allegations and Extraneous Considerations in FIR Quashing	When considering whether an FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the High Court must examine its allegations for a prima facie case. It should not replace that inquiry with extraneous considerations or findings from an investigation report to decide contested allegations in inherent jurisdiction.	404
Vague allegations against separately residing matrimonial relatives	Prosecution of the husband’s relatives requires clear and specific allegations. In this case, an assurance about return of jewellery and general telephone remarks about bringing a car or obtaining divorce were insufficient against the married sister-in-law and her husband living separately in Kanpur. Their proceedings were quashed.	411
Face-value absence of an offence as a ground for quashing	Where the allegations, accepted in their entirety at face value, do not make out the offence in question, the High Court may quash the prosecution under Section 482 CrPC. Applying its interpretation of Section 377 to the marital allegations, the Court found no such offence and did not need to decide the separate contention that omission of those allegations from an earlier report showed an afterthought.	437
Company-liability objection apparent from the complaint must be decided at the threshold	An objection to prosecuting a director without the company, ascertainable from the complaint's allegations and the company cheque, raises a pure question of law. Where the record also showed notice only to the director, postponing the maintainability decision until completion of trial was materially illegal. The High Court exercised Section 482 CrPC power to set aside the Magistrate's and revisional court's orders and dismiss the complaint on that threshold ground.	442
Section 482: Testing Whether Accepted Allegations Disclose the Offence	At the quashing stage the court may examine whether the allegations, accepted as stated, disclose the statutory ingredients, while avoiding a final evaluation or marshalling of disputed evidence. After the charge-sheet had been filed, the	453

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Court considered the suicide note and witness statements and found no offence of abetment of suicide or the alleged money-lending offence against the applicants; it quashed the FIR and subsequent proceedings against them.
Completion of a voluntarily delivered signed blank cheque	Where a drawer voluntarily delivers a signed blank cheque to the payee towards payment, the payee may fill in the amount and other particulars. Completion by someone other than the drawer does not by itself invalidate the cheque. Applying Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar and Sections 20, 87 and 139 of the NI Act, the Court stated that the drawer must rebut the presumption of debt or liability by evidence. Section 138 may apply if the cheque is otherwise valid. The rule was applied to reject the particular allegation based on filling the cheque, without deciding the pending dishonour complaint.	502
Disowning a signed agreement on the plea that its language was not understood	A plea of good faith under Section 52 IPC requires pleading and proof of due care and attention. The complainant could not disown the agreement he signed merely by saying that it was in Gujarati, which he did not understand, and that he trusted the applicants. In rejecting that plea, the Court held that he should have understood the agreement before signing and also invoked Section 92 of the Evidence Act against oral evidence contradicting its written contents.	518
Testing whether uncontroverted complaint allegations disclose an offence	For the challenge considered, the Court tested whether the uncontroverted allegations in the complaint disclosed an offence. Since the alleged unlawful reconnection made out a prima facie case, the disputed defence did not warrant quashing the proceedings.	579
Reasonable force to protect lawful custody: absence of a hurt offence	On the FIR allegations and arrest record as assessed by the Court, the forest officials had arrested the complainant's husband during forest-land protection work and were attacked as villagers sought his release. The officials were entitled to use reasonable force to prevent removal of the arrestee. Independently of the sanction requirement, the Court found no offence disclosed against the ranger under Sections 323 or 325 IPC. The asserted forest-rights defence had no supporting possession material on record. The cognizance order was set aside and the closure report accepted. The ruling concerns reasonable force on those facts.	598
Exceptional grounds for quashing criminal proceedings	Criminal proceedings may be quashed where the allegations, accepted in full, disclose no offence, are inherently absurd or improbable, encounter an express legal bar, or establish a manifestly malicious abuse of criminal process. These powers require caution and cannot become an inquiry into the truth of disputed allegations. Applying the reproduced Bhajan Lal principles and related authorities, the Court found that the allegations required investigation rather than quashing.	600
Absence of legal evidence and disputed evidentiary weight in quashing proceedings	The quashing jurisdiction distinguishes a case with no legal evidence, or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusation, from a case where existing legal evidence may or may not support the accusation after appreciation. The latter assessment belongs to the trial court. The Court reproduced and relied on this distinction in Renu Kumari when refusing to test the reliability of the husband's alleged acts under Section 482 CrPC.	601
Section 306 IPC quashing: dispossession from lawful livelihood land	In the Section 482 challenge to a prosecution under Section 306/34 IPC, the Court treated cultivation under the mother's government lease as lawful possession and forcible dispossession without authority as deprivation of livelihood. Read with the authenticated suicide note and surrounding circumstances, this disclosed a prima facie cognizable case warranting refusal of quashing. The assessment was preliminary and did not finally determine guilt or establish that every dispossession amounts to abetment of suicide.	625
Section 482 CrPC — coercive demands and threatened	An accused seeking quashing must show that the uncontroverted allegations do not disclose an offence. An extramarital relationship alone may be insufficient	636

exposure disclosed prima facie abetment of suicide	for prosecution under Section 306 IPC, but allegations of pressure for sexual relations and remarriage, enforced by threats of public defamation, disclosed a prima facie active role in instigation or aid. Those additional allegations precluded quashing without determining their truth at trial.
Quashing suicide-abetment proceedings where the alleged acts do not establish instigation	Praveen Pradhan, (2012) 9 SCC 734, and Amit Kapur, (2012) 9 SCC 460, were quoted for a tentative threshold appraisal, with possible inference of instigation from the alleged circumstances at the threshold stage rather than a full evidence evaluation. The Court accepted for the application the uncontroverted claims that five persons damaged the shop, abused the deceased, and assaulted him and Suresh Singh on 8 April 2023, before Neeraj hanged himself overnight. It nevertheless held the allegations and witness statements, assumed true, lacked Section 107 instigation or intentional aid and thus could not support Section 306/34 IPC. It quashed Crime No. 101/2023 and consequential proceedings on that charged basis, without deciding whether a different offence arose from the alleged assaults or damage.	736
Quashing a suicide-abetment prosecution where accepted allegations lack abetment	At the Section 482 stage, the Court forms a tentative view from the allegations and record rather than determining disputed guilt by evaluating the entire evidence. Instigation can be inferred from circumstances, but those circumstances must prima facie disclose abetment. As the accepted allegations against the father did not do so, the Court quashed the FIR, charge-sheet and proceedings under Sections 306/34 IPC.	764
Section 482: civil recovery dispute given the form of a criminal prosecution	Section 482 CrPC must be exercised cautiously and sparingly, but criminal proceedings may be quashed where an essentially civil dispute is given a criminal form without the necessary offence ingredients. A civil transaction may also disclose a criminal offence, so the allegations must be examined for those ingredients. Applying the reproduced authorities to the FIR and Section 161 statements, the Court found a predominantly business repayment dispute and an attempt to recover money through prosecution. Continuation amounted to abuse of process; the FIR under Sections 406, 420 and 34 IPC and consequential proceedings were quashed.	778
Quashing rape proceedings on the Court's promise-of-marriage analysis	The Section 164 statement alleged an initial forcible act and subsequent physical relations on assurances of marriage. In assessing the statement as a whole, the Court relied on the three-year relationship, continued hotel meetings and a New Year outing, and treated the subsequent refusal to marry as, at most, a breach of promise rather than a promise false from inception. On that assessment it held prosecution under Sections 376 and 376(2)(n) IPC to be misuse of criminal law and quashed the FIR and consequential proceedings.	847
Quashing where the complainant's allegations do not disclose the alleged rape	After considering the FIR and the complainant's statements in light of her acknowledged subsisting marriage and the voluntary relationship described, the Court found no misconception of fact vitiating consent and no case warranting prosecution of the petitioner. It quashed the FIR under Sections 376 and 323 IPC and all consequential criminal proceedings.	859
Section 498-A IPC: vague collective allegations against a married sister-in-law	Prosecution of the husband's relatives requires clear and specific allegations identifying their involvement. Merely naming a married sister-in-law in collective allegations of harassment, abuse or assault, without attributing a specific role to her, was insufficient to require her to face trial. The FIR and consequential proceedings were therefore quashed against her, while the prosecution against the husband and parents-in-law continued on the specific allegations against them.	862
Section 482 CrPC: quashing remains available after framing of charge	The inherent power to prevent abuse of process is available at the threshold and at a later stage, including after framing of charge. At the later stage, material disclosed by investigation may be examined to determine whether, even if accepted in its entirety, it discloses the alleged offence. This inquiry does not	862 authorise deciding guilt or innocence or weighing contested evidence.

Omnibus dowry allegations against separately residing remote accused	Mere naming of relatives in a matrimonial complaint, without specific allegations or tangible material showing their involvement, does not justify prosecution. Each accused's role must be stated; a recital of statutory language or a collective accusation is insufficient for remote persons living separately. Applying the reproduced authorities to the FIR and Section 161 statements, the Court quashed proceedings against two remote, separately residing accused against whom only a collective dowry demand and harassment were alleged. It found sufficient prima facie material to continue the case against the husband and his parents.	872
FIR quashing — allegations accepted at face value and no assessment of disputed evidence	In considering quashing, the High Court ordinarily examines the uncontroverted allegations without assessing witness reliability, resolving disputed facts or conducting the detailed scrutiny appropriate to trial. The power must be exercised sparingly and with care. Where the allegations, accepted in their entirety, do not disclose the ingredients of an offence, criminal proceedings may be quashed.	900
Quashing — professional status does not displace a prima facie offence	Where the material disclosed a prima facie accident offence, the petitioner's status as an Army officer did not justify quashing the proceedings. His driving of the car and its ownership were undisputed, and his negligence remained to be determined at trial.	904
FIR quashing — prima facie offence and prevention of abuse of process	Quashing requires cautious exercise of inherent powers. The uncontroverted allegations and supporting prosecution material must be considered as a whole to determine whether they disclose an offence. Proceedings may be quashed where the basic facts do not disclose an offence, the allegations are patently absurd or inherently improbable, a legal bar applies, or the process is manifestly used for an ulterior purpose. The Court must not resolve disputed evidence or predict conviction and acquittal in the manner of a trial; a legitimate prosecution should ordinarily continue.	907
Quashing — factual foundation is required rather than a verbatim recital of offence ingredients	A complaint need not reproduce every legal ingredient of the alleged offence verbatim. Where the necessary factual foundation and substantial compliance with the offence requirements are present, absence of a detailed recital of one or more ingredients does not by itself justify quashing. Quashing remains appropriate where even the basic facts necessary to constitute the offence are absent.	907
Vague instigation allegations against a distant relative	A distant relative cannot be required to face trial merely because of kinship and general, vague allegations that he instigated the husband. Specific involvement supported by tangible material is required. No clear individual act was attributed to the uncle-in-law beyond the omnibus allegation of instigation. Taking the allegations at face value, the Court quashed the FIR and subsequent proceedings against him alone, while allowing proceedings against the relatives assigned specific roles to continue.	925
Quashing where accepted allegations do not disclose an offence	Quashing is justified where the FIR or complaint, read at face value and accepted in its entirety, does not prima facie disclose an offence against the accused, or where the uncontroverted allegations and supporting material disclose none. This test does not permit adjudication of disputed facts; here, the allegations disclosed a cognizable offence.	972
Quashing test: accepted allegations must disclose the offence	The Court may quash where the allegations, taken at face value and accepted in full, do not prima facie constitute an offence, or where uncontroverted allegations and supporting material disclose none. Inherently absurd or improbable allegations may also warrant intervention, but that assessment cannot become a detailed inquiry into disputed evidence.	976

financial support — absence of abetment ingredients	education and marriage expenses, and for leaving tractor-loan instalments unpaid, did not disclose instigation or intentional aid to suicide. Failure to meet the deceased's expectation of support, even if morally blameworthy, was not criminal abetment on the allegations before the Court. The loan dispute could have been pursued through legal remedies; the note did not supply the ingredients of Section 306 IPC. The Court therefore quashed the FIR under Sections 306/34 IPC, the charge-sheet and the consequential proceedings. The decision turned on those allegations and did not determine guilt after a trial.

Section 482 CrPC — Judicial Restraint in Directing Arrest and Charge-Sheet During Investigation

Section 482 CrPC — directions compelling arrest or a charge-sheet	In a pending investigation, the High Court cannot direct arrest or compel a charge-sheet merely because the complainant seeks those steps. Such directions would predetermine decisions entrusted to the investigating police and remove their discretion to submit a closure report if the evidence warrants it. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused the requested arrest direction while requiring the investigation to be completed according to law.	51
Hearing before drastic judicial directions against a person during investigation	A High Court must not casually issue directions requiring arrest, seizure of property or a charge-sheet against a person without giving that person a reasonable opportunity to be heard. The relied-upon decision treated such adverse judicial directions, made without notice and with drastic consequences, as unsustainable. This safeguard concerns the court's proposed coercive directions, rather than a general right to participate in police investigation.	88
Section 482 CrPC — hearing before drastic investigative directions	The relied-upon D. Venkatasubramaniam discussion treats directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge-sheet, issued without hearing the affected persons, as impermissible. It invokes Divine Retreat Centre for the need to give a reasonable opportunity of hearing before a judicial order with such drastic consequences for an affected person's reputation. This safeguard forms part of the limits on intrusive judicial directions during investigation.	305
Section 482 CrPC — statutory purposes and reasons for interference	Inherent power must be exercised sparingly and with caution to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of a court's process or secure the ends of justice. The D. Venkatasubramaniam passages relied upon by the Court reject unexplained intervention and casual observations that can influence an investigation and cause serious consequences to affected persons.	305
Hearing affected suspects before coercive judicial directions during investigation	Judicial directions requiring arrest, seizure and a charge-sheet can have drastic consequences for persons accused. The reproduced authority disapproves issuing such directions without impleading or hearing those affected. The Court invoked that safeguard when refusing an arrest direction against suspects who were not parties to the application. This concerns coercive court directions, rather than a general right to a hearing before routine police investigation.	462
Section 482 directions to arrest and file a charge-sheet	In a pending investigation, directions requiring the police to arrest the accused and file a charge-sheet would amount to judicial supervision of investigative decisions. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused those directions. Investigation may lawfully result in a charge-sheet or a closure report, depending on whether an offence is made out.	564
Hearing and reasons before coercive judicial directions during investigation	The relied-on D. Venkatasubramaniam passage condemns judicial directions to arrest, seize property and file a charge-sheet issued mechanically, without reasons or hearing the persons affected. Such directions have serious consequences for liberty and reputation. This safeguard concerns the High Court's coercive judicial orders in the investigation context; it does not establish a general right to be heard before police register an FIR or carry out ordinary statutory investigation.	607

for arrest, seizure and prosecution— Hearing affected persons	sheet cannot be issued casually without notice and a reasonable opportunity to the persons likely to be adversely affected. The reproduced authority treated coercive judicial directions issued without that opportunity as invalid because of their serious consequences for those persons.
Reasons and restraint in inherent-power directions affecting investigation	Exercise of inherent power must be justified by giving effect to orders under the Code, preventing abuse of court process or securing the ends of justice. The High Court must state why intervention is required and avoid uncalled-for observations that may influence the investigation or cause serious consequences to persons who have not been heard.	668
Section 482 CrPC — reasons and restraint in investigation directions	Interference with a police investigation under Section 482 CrPC requires reasons showing why intervention is justified. The High Court should avoid casual observations or mechanical directions that may influence the investigation or have serious consequences for persons likely to be affected.	802
Judicial directions for arrest and prosecution — hearing affected persons	Judicial directions requiring arrest, seizure of property and filing of a charge-sheet, with serious consequences for identified persons, cannot be issued mechanically without impleading and hearing those persons. The relied-upon precedent treated such an order, made without notice to the affected persons, as a nullity.	901
Coercive judicial directions during investigation — notice to affected persons	A judicial order directing arrest, seizure of property and filing of a charge-sheet against identified persons cannot be issued mechanically without making them parties and giving them an opportunity to be heard. The relied-upon precedent treated an order with such serious consequences, made without hearing the affected persons, as a nullity.	906
Coercive judicial directions — opportunity of hearing for affected persons	Judicial directions for arrest, seizure of property and filing of a charge-sheet cannot be issued mechanically against identified persons without making them parties and giving them an opportunity to be heard. The relied-upon precedent treated such a coercive order, issued without notice to those affected, as a nullity.	909
	Sub-Chapter no. 50.7 Civil Dispute Criminalisation and Abuse of Process
Civil remedies alongside criminal proceedings	The availability of a civil claim does not bar criminal proceedings where the allegations also disclose the ingredients of an offence. Conversely, a purely civil dispute cannot be given a criminal character to secure repayment or settlement when those ingredients are absent. The Court must examine the criminal ingredients of the transaction rather than its commercial setting alone.	31
Arbitration clause and prosecution for a criminal offence	A contractual provision for arbitration does not substitute for criminal prosecution where the alleged act constitutes an offence. Arbitration provides relief for breach of the agreement; it does not authorise the arbitrator to try the criminal offence arising from the same transaction.	31
Divorce proceedings and a later criminal complaint	The filing or pendency of a divorce petition does not by itself justify quashing a criminal complaint arising from the same matrimonial facts. Civil and criminal proceedings are independent, and the civil proceeding does not bring the criminal case to an end. The later timing of the FIR alone does not establish that it is an abusive counterblast.	39
Earlier divorce petition — later cruelty FIR alleged to be a counterblast	A cruelty FIR cannot be treated as false or retaliatory merely because the husband filed a divorce petition earlier. Where a wife delays complaining in the hope that matrimonial relations will improve and approaches the police after reconciliation appears impossible, her patience cannot by itself be used against her. Allegations in the divorce petition also require proof; the sequence of filings does not establish their truth or discredit the FIR.	53
Predominantly civil	In the framework relied upon, criminal proceedings with an overwhelmingly	58

disputes — settlement and remote prospects of conviction	civil character, including appropriate commercial, financial, partnership, matrimonial or family disputes, stand differently from heinous offences. Where the entire dispute is settled, conviction is remote, and continuation would cause oppression, prejudice or injustice, quashing may be justified. That reasoning does not convert a rape prosecution into a civil dispute merely because the parties later marry.
Contractual disputes — civil remedies do not bar prosecution where the allegations also disclose criminal ingredients	The existence of a contractual dispute or civil remedy does not by itself justify quashing criminal proceedings. Although attempts to give a purely civil dispute a criminal character should be discouraged, proceedings may continue where the allegations disclose dishonest inducement or criminal breach of trust. The alleged acceptance and retention of successive advances despite substantial non-supply provided that prima facie basis in this case.	71
Civil remedies where the allegations also disclose criminal offences	The availability of civil remedies does not prevent criminal proceedings where the allegations disclose criminal ingredients as well as a civil dispute. Applying Amit Kapoor, the Court rejected the contention that disputes over society management and accounts necessarily excluded prosecution. The complaint alleged forged authority and misappropriation of society money and assets, and no ground was established to interfere with cognizance under Sections 420, 409, 467 and 120-B IPC. The allegations remained to be proved in the criminal proceedings.	86
Civil wrong without criminal ingredients distinguished from concurrent remedies	A charge may be quashed where the allegations predominantly disclose a civil wrong and do not satisfy the basic ingredients of a criminal offence. Where the same allegations also amount to an offence, the availability of a civil claim does not, by itself, bar the criminal complaint.	121
Revenue mutation and forcible dispossession	A mutation entry serves fiscal purposes and is not a document of title. Even mutation in a person’s favour does not authorise forcible dispossession of an occupant. A claim to possession must be pursued through lawful proceedings, including a suit for possession, and the mutation does not by itself justify quashing allegations of criminal conduct during the attempted dispossession.	142
Civil remedies and parallel criminal allegations	The availability of a civil claim does not bar criminal proceedings when the same facts also disclose a criminal offence. Quashing may be justified where the allegations establish only a civil wrong without the necessary criminal ingredients. A dispute over land entitlement does not by itself remove independently alleged intimidation or caste-based abuse from the criminal process.	142
Pending appeal does not suspend an unstayed civil decree	Although a first appeal continues the suit, its filing does not by itself suspend the operation of the judgment and decree. A restraint against creating further third-party rights does not amount to a stay of the decree. The pending appeal therefore did not, by itself, justify quashing the criminal proceedings concerning a subsequent sale.	170
Civil proceedings do not bar prosecution where the allegations disclose an offence	Civil and criminal proceedings arising from the same transaction may continue simultaneously. A transaction's civil or commercial character does not exclude cheating where the allegations disclose that offence. Pendency of civil litigation, even before a court higher in status, is not by itself a ground to quash criminal proceedings.	170
Stay and priority of concurrent civil and criminal proceedings	Whether civil or criminal proceedings should be stayed depends on the circumstances of the case. Criminal matters ordinarily receive precedence, but there is no inflexible rule. The likelihood of embarrassment and special circumstances, including another proceeding being close to conclusion, may justify a different course; the mere possibility of conflicting findings does not determine priority.	170
Criminal process cannot enforce	A civil wrong cannot be given criminal colour merely to compel execution or	172

specific performance of a contract	registration of a sale deed. When the FIR, read at face value, alleges only non-performance of an agreement without facts showing initial deception, the cheating prosecution may be quashed under Section 482 CrPC. The complainant may pursue the available civil remedy for specific performance.
Land dispute does not authorise forcible dispossession or justify quashing an assault FIR	A pending land-boundary dispute or demarcation proceeding does not authorise a party to dispossess the occupant by force. Possession must be recovered through the competent authority under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code. The asserted encroachment did not establish that the FIR alleging assault was a malicious counterblast.	201
Pending matrimonial and property proceedings do not by themselves justify quashing a dowry FIR	A divorce petition, maintenance application or property suit does not by itself defeat an FIR containing specific allegations of dowry demands and physical and mental harassment. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, the Court held that civil and criminal remedies remain independent even where they arise from the same facts. Filing the FIR after the divorce petition was not, by itself, a reason to treat it as a counterblast and quash it.	258
Parallel civil and criminal proceedings do not attract an automatic stay rule	Civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously; any stay depends on the circumstances. The applied authorities ordinarily favour criminal proceedings taking precedence, because criminal justice should not await protracted civil litigation. A risk of conflicting findings alone is insufficient. Possible embarrassment and special circumstances, such as another proceeding nearing completion, must be considered; the preference is not an inflexible rule.	258
Disputed civil possession as a ground for quashing an FIR	In an Article 226 petition to quash FIRs, the petitioners' claim to possession could not be accepted at the initial investigation stage, particularly when their application for temporary injunction had been rejected. The Court declined to determine the disputed defence at that stage and left the petitioners free to establish it at trial.	270
Parallel civil litigation: no automatic bar to criminal proceedings	Civil and criminal proceedings concerning the same documents may proceed simultaneously. Pendency of a civil suit or appeal, even before a higher court, does not by itself justify quashing or dismissing the criminal case. Whether either proceeding should be stayed depends on the circumstances. Criminal proceedings ordinarily receive precedence, but this is not an inflexible rule and possible conflicting findings alone do not require a stay.	281
Divorce proceedings do not by themselves justify quashing a cruelty FIR	Civil matrimonial proceedings and criminal proceedings are independent. An FIR cannot be quashed merely because the wife lodged it after receiving notice of the husband's divorce petition. Her attempt to preserve the marriage before reporting alleged cruelty did not, by itself, establish that the criminal case was malicious.	289
Civil recovery remedy and criminal allegations arising from a contract	A civil recovery remedy does not by itself bar criminal proceedings if the allegations also disclose a criminal offence. Mere breach of contract creates civil liability, whereas cheating requires the necessary dishonest or fraudulent intention. The Court therefore rejected civil recoverability as a sufficient reason to quash investigation into alleged non-enforcement of the airstrip agreement and resulting public loss.	290
Quashing — civil wrong and criminal offence arising from the same facts	A dispute disclosing only a civil wrong, without the ingredients of a criminal offence, may justify quashing. But the availability of a civil claim does not bar criminal proceedings where the same facts also disclose an offence. These principles appear in the passages from Amit Kapoor and, through Padal Venkata Rama Reddy, Indian Oil Corporation reproduced as part of the Court's quashing framework. They do not authorise a detailed assessment of evidence at that stage.	323
Simultaneous Civil and Criminal	Civil and criminal proceedings arising from the same facts may proceed simultaneously. Whether either should be stayed depends on the circumstances,	401

Proceedings and Discretionary Stay	including the likelihood of embarrassment from parallel proceedings. The adopted passage favours precedence for criminal proceedings without imposing an inflexible rule; special circumstances and the stage of the other proceeding remain relevant. The possibility of conflicting findings alone does not dictate a stay.
Independent Civil and Criminal Findings and Previous-Judgment Relevance	Civil and criminal proceedings are decided on the evidence in each and apply different standards of proof. Findings in one do not automatically bind the other. The relevance and effect of an earlier judgment must still be examined under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, including Section 41's specified conclusiveness. Civil matrimonial litigation does not, by its pendency alone, end a criminal cruelty prosecution.	404
Simultaneous Civil and Criminal Proceedings and Qualified Criminal Precedence	Civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously. Any stay depends on the circumstances, including possible embarrassment and the stage reached in the other proceeding. The adopted authority favours criminal precedence without making it an inflexible rule; the risk of inconsistent findings alone does not determine the issue.	404
Matrimonial civil proceedings do not terminate criminal proceedings	Civil matrimonial proceedings and criminal proceedings are independent. The pendency of the former does not end the latter merely because both arise from the same circumstances. A Section 10 Hindu Marriage Act petition therefore supplied no automatic basis for quashing the cruelty FIR.	415
Criminal proceedings for a forged Will despite a pending civil suit	A pending civil suit concerning a Will does not, by itself, justify quashing criminal proceedings alleging its fabrication. The civil plaintiff's burden to prove the Will's genuineness does not prevent the defendant from initiating criminal proceedings on a forgery allegation. Applying Jagmohan Singh, P. Swaroopa Rani, Pratibha and Kamaladevi Agarwal, the Court held that civil and criminal proceedings can proceed together. Alleged creation of a forged document gives the dispute a criminal dimension despite its civil aspects. The pending suit and temporary injunction therefore did not warrant quashing the FIR.	424
Stay of parallel civil and criminal proceedings and ordinary precedence of criminal justice	Civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously; whether either should be stayed depends on the circumstances. The precedents relied on by the Court favour prompt criminal proceedings so that evidence and memories do not fade, but impose no inflexible rule of precedence. The possibility of conflicting findings alone is insufficient; the likelihood of embarrassment and special circumstances, such as another proceeding nearing completion, may justify a different course.	424
Civil remedies and the existence of criminal ingredients	Facts may constitute a civil wrong, a criminal offence, or both. Availability of a civil claim does not bar criminal proceedings where the allegations disclose an offence; conversely, a predominantly civil dispute without the necessary criminal element may justify quashing. The special-facts approach in Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia is not a general licence to predict conviction at inception; its application to predominantly civil, family or matrimonial disputes must be considered in that context.	435
Civil wrongs and criminal ingredients in quashing	The same facts may disclose a civil wrong, a criminal offence or both. A civil remedy does not exclude prosecution where criminal ingredients are disclosed; a predominantly civil allegation without criminality may warrant quashing. Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia does not permit a preliminary prediction of conviction in every case: its special-features approach is confined to the predominantly civil, family or matrimonial setting explained in the narrated authorities.	436
Independent civil and criminal proceedings arising	The availability or pendency of civil proceedings does not end criminal proceedings where the same facts also disclose an offence. A predominantly civil dispute lacking the ingredients of a criminal offence may justify quashing,	460

from the same facts	but a civil remedy alone is insufficient. In particular, a divorce proceeding does not extinguish an otherwise maintainable matrimonial prosecution.
Civil remedy and the presence of criminal ingredients	A predominantly civil wrong may justify quashing where the allegations lack an element of criminality and do not satisfy the basic ingredients of an offence. Even then, the Court does not undertake a critical appraisal of evidence. Conversely, the availability of a civil claim does not prevent a criminal complaint where the allegations also constitute an offence. The distinction turns on the alleged criminal ingredients, rather than the existence of a civil remedy alone.	503
Criminal proceedings as pressure to enforce a civil agreement	Criminal process cannot be used to coerce performance of a civil agreement where the dispute lacks a criminal foundation. Relying on Vijay Kumar Ghai and Radheshyam, the Court treated the controversy over execution of sale deeds and return of money as predominantly civil. It rejected the use of criminal prosecution to enforce the bargain and preserved the complainant's civil remedy.	518
Civil or Arbitration Remedies and Prosecution for Criminal Breach of Trust	A commercial transaction may give rise to both civil and criminal liability. The availability or pendency of a civil remedy or arbitration does not by itself justify quashing a prosecution if the allegations disclose a criminal offence. Arbitration cannot substitute for a criminal trial. Allegations of contribution to a partnership, entrustment of its property and misappropriation disclosed prima facie material for a charge under Section 406 IPC. Final proof of misappropriation remained a matter for trial.	531
Matrimonial FIR filed after divorce proceedings	An FIR is not a counterblast merely because it was lodged after proceedings under the Hindu Marriage Act or Special Marriage Act began. Applying Pratibha, the Court recognised that a wife may delay a complaint while trying to preserve the marriage and approach the police when reconciliation appears no longer possible. The earlier matrimonial proceeding therefore did not, by its timing alone, warrant quashing. The Section 482 inquiry remained whether the FIR allegations disclosed a prima facie offence, rather than whether extraneous circumstances justified an adverse inference.	597
Civil remedies do not exclude a disclosed criminal offence	A civil claim and criminal liability may arise from the same facts. Applying the principles reproduced from Amit Kapoor and Padal Venkata Rama Reddy, the availability of a civil remedy does not justify quashing if the factual allegations also disclose the ingredients of an offence. Conversely, a predominantly civil wrong lacking the basic criminal ingredients may warrant quashing without a trial of the evidence.	600
Parallel civil proceedings and criminal cognizance	Civil and criminal proceedings may continue together where the alleged conduct involves criminality. An existing civil remedy or award does not by itself require quashing a criminal proceeding. Here, the Facilitation Council award did not establish a purely civil dispute. The Court considered the petitioners' noncompliance, despite not pursuing the available Section 34 remedy after dismissal of their earlier writ, capable of supporting an inference of criminal intent for taking cognizance. Other objections remained open before the revisional court.	613
Civil decree for an undivided share and criminal allegations of demolition	A decree recognising a purchaser's undivided share, with possession conditional on partition, does not authorise taking a specific part of the property or demolishing the occupant's house before partition. Allegations of such demolition cannot be dismissed as merely giving a civil dispute a criminal character. The FIR was therefore not quashed on that ground.	663
Purchase of an undivided share—Possession of a specific parcel	A co-sharer may transfer an undivided share but cannot convey a specific piece of the joint land as an exclusively identified share. The purchaser steps into the seller's position and must obtain partition before claiming possession of a specific parcel. Without partition, the purchase did not confer the specific	663

	possessory right asserted in support of quashing.
Civil and criminal proceedings — simultaneous remedies and no automatic quashing	Civil and criminal proceedings may proceed simultaneously where the allegations disclose both civil and criminal aspects. A transaction's civil character or the pendency of a civil action does not alone justify quashing an FIR or criminal complaint at the outset. This remains so where the civil action is before a court of higher status. Whether either proceeding should be stayed depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.	705
Parallel civil and criminal proceedings — qualified preference for prompt criminal adjudication	Criminal proceedings ordinarily merit precedence because civil litigation may take years and delay may impair witness memory and evidence. The possibility of conflicting decisions is not itself a controlling reason to halt one proceeding. The preference is not an inflexible rule: the likelihood of embarrassment and special circumstances must be considered, and a civil or other proceeding near completion may make a different course more just and expedient.	705
Property disputes and independent allegations of criminal assault	A pending civil suit over property shares or the validity of a will does not make an allegation of assault and criminal intimidation purely civil. Refusal to give a claimed share may raise a civil dispute, but assaulting a person for demanding that share raises a criminal allegation. A will does not operate during the testator's lifetime and could not justify depriving a joint possessor of the claimed share on that basis.	721
Prior warning of a false FIR and threshold credibility	An accused person's earlier report to the police expressing apprehension of a false FIR is not, by itself, sufficient to disbelieve the FIR subsequently lodged. The Court declined to treat the prior warning as proof that the later allegations of assault were false.	721
Special civil features and limits on forecasting conviction	The principle permitting consideration of special features in predominantly civil, matrimonial, property or family disputes does not authorise a preliminary inquiry into the likelihood of conviction in every criminal case. In an appropriate case, those features and the prospect of genuine settlement may support quashing to prevent abuse or secure justice, without a full inquiry into the evidence.	726
Concurrent civil suit and criminal proceedings over an allegedly forged agreement	A pending civil suit does not by itself bar criminal proceedings arising from the same transaction. Civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously. Applying Kishan Singh, Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam and Prem Raj, the Court refused to interfere with the direction to register and investigate offences where the complaint alleged preparation and use of a forged agreement to sell in the civil suit.	844
Priority and stay of concurrent civil and criminal proceedings	The reproduced Supreme Court reasoning ordinarily favours giving criminal proceedings precedence because prosecution should not await prolonged civil litigation. There is no inflexible rule: the likelihood of embarrassment and special circumstances, including a proceeding being close to completion, may justify another course. Possible conflicting decisions alone do not determine priority, and whether either proceeding should be stayed depends on the facts and circumstances.	844
Divorce proceedings and civil findings do not by themselves justify quashing a cruelty prosecution	An FIR lodged after the filing of a divorce petition is not, for that reason alone, a counterblast warranting quashing under Section 482 CrPC. Civil and criminal proceedings must be decided independently on their evidence, and civil-court findings do not bind the criminal court. The adopted passages from Pratibha and Kamaladevi Agarwal distinguish proof on probabilities in civil proceedings from proof beyond reasonable doubt in a criminal case. The husband's reliance on divorce litigation and an ex parte decree therefore did not justify terminating the criminal prosecution.	851
Civil remedy and the existence of a criminal offence	Where the allegations predominantly disclose a civil wrong and do not satisfy the ingredients of a criminal offence, quashing may be justified without a	925 critical appraisal of evidence. Conversely, the availability of a civil claim does not bar criminal proceedings where the same allegations also disclose an offence.

Mutation entries and continuation of criminal proceedings	Mutation entries serve fiscal purposes and are not documents of title. A pending dispute over mutation entries does not, by itself, prevent a civil suit or criminal proceedings concerning the underlying transaction from continuing.	940
Pending civil suit as a ground for quashing criminal cognizance	Civil and criminal proceedings concerning the same allegations may proceed simultaneously. Pendency of a civil suit concerning a sale deed does not, by itself, justify quashing criminal cognizance where the alleged execution of a forged sale deed also involves criminal ingredients. Whether either proceeding should be stayed depends on the facts and circumstances of the case.	940
Use of criminal-court orders to negotiate civil liabilities	Civil liabilities should be determined in civil suits. Compromise means that the parties have forgiven each other; it does not permit a party to exploit court orders to take a dominant negotiating position. The Court expressed this limit while examining an unexplained compromise following contested criminal proceedings.	964
Civil remedy and the presence of criminal ingredients	The availability of a civil remedy does not bar criminal proceedings where the allegations also disclose an offence. Conversely, where an essentially civil dispute is given the form of a criminal accusation without the necessary criminal ingredients, Section 482 CrPC may be used to prevent the criminal process becoming a means of harassment. The allegations must be assessed for their actual criminal content.	981
Matrimonial FIR after a divorce petition — timing and efforts at reconciliation	An FIR alleging matrimonial cruelty cannot be quashed merely because the husband filed a divorce petition before the complaint or FIR. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, the Court treated civil and criminal proceedings as independent and rejected the inference that the later complaint was necessarily a counterblast. A wife's efforts to save the marriage may explain why she initially refrained from reporting cruelty. Her earlier patience and the intervening divorce petition do not by themselves establish that her allegations are false.	991
Commercial transaction — alleged substitution of fake security discloses criminal elements	The existence of a business transaction or civil remedy does not justify quashing where the allegations also disclose criminal conduct. The Court distinguished the original gold-secured loan from the later alleged delivery of silver-polished copper as temporary security for the unreturned gold. Although the applicants were not the original pledgee, they were alleged to have joined in giving the fake silver to gain the complainant's confidence. Their alleged knowledge that the metal was not genuine supplied the asserted element of deception. Considering the transaction as a whole, the Court held that it involved both civil and criminal elements and refused to quash the FIR. The ruling was made at the prosecution threshold.	996
Civil remedy concerning remarriage — no bar where allegations also disclose criminal offences	The availability of a civil or matrimonial remedy does not itself justify quashing criminal proceedings when the allegations disclose the ingredients of criminal offences. Applying Indian Oil Corporation v. NEPC India, the Court held that the same facts may give rise both to a civil dispute and to criminal liability because the nature and scope of the proceedings differ. The applicant's contention that his wife could seek a declaration that the alleged second marriage was void did not defeat the criminal prosecution founded on the allegations against him.	1001

Section 482 CrPC — Inherent Powers Affecting Investigation Where Abuse of Process Is Shown

Cognizable offences — police	The police have a statutory right and duty to investigate cognizable offences. The judiciary and police perform complementary functions, and the Court	5

investigation and exceptional judicial interference	should ordinarily allow investigation to proceed. Intervention remains available in exceptional cases to prevent a miscarriage of justice, secure the ends of justice or stop abuse of process; where the FIR discloses no offence, the Court need not permit investigation to continue.
Grounds and reasons for Section 482 interference with investigation	The High Court's inherent power is confined to giving effect to an order under the Code, preventing abuse of a court's process or securing the ends of justice. It must be exercised sparingly, carefully and with reasons showing why intervention is justified. Casual observations or unexplained directions that may alter the course of investigation are not a proper exercise of that power.	88
Reasons and statutory purposes governing inherent-power intervention in investigation	The Section 482 CrPC principles reproduced from D. Venkatasubramaniam confine inherent intervention to giving effect to an order under the Code, preventing abuse of court process or securing the ends of justice. Intervention requires reasons and caution. Casual directions or observations capable of influencing investigation and prejudicing affected persons do not satisfy that standard. The Court applied those principles in refusing the requested arrest and charge-sheet directions under Section 528 BNSS.	135
Section 482 application for FIR registration where complaint remedy is available	An application under Section 482 CrPC seeking action on a complaint and registration of an FIR was dismissed because an efficacious remedy lay in a criminal complaint before the competent court. The Court applied the alternative-remedy principles in Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria, including the distinction between the police duty addressed in Lalita Kumari and entitlement to High Court directions without using statutory remedies. Liberty to file the criminal complaint was preserved.	187
Judicial restraint while police investigate a cognizable offence	Police have the statutory right and duty to investigate cognizable offences, and courts ordinarily permit that investigation to proceed within its proper sphere. Judicial and police functions are complementary. Intervention remains available in exceptional cases where required to prevent abuse or miscarriage of justice, but the High Court must not ordinarily usurp the investigative function or stifle a legitimate prosecution.	189
Judicial restraint during investigation of a cognizable offence	The police ordinarily must be allowed to investigate allegations disclosing a cognizable offence. An FIR need not contain every fact or detail, and incomplete or hazy facts do not justify deciding the merits prematurely. Judicial intervention remains available within the recognised quashing principles, including where no offence is disclosed or non-interference would cause a miscarriage of justice.	260
Exceptional judicial intervention against abuse of investigative power	Investigation is ordinarily within the police domain, but must comply with statute and serve a legitimate purpose. The relied-on Manohar Lal Sharma passage permits exceptional intervention where illegal or improper use of investigative power jeopardises liberty or property, the process is abused, or the investigation lacks good faith or is tainted by animosity. The Romila Thapar passage preserves appropriate Article 226 directions where the High Court is satisfied that the investigating officer acted mala fide.	265
Judicial restraint and lawful police investigation	Investigation of a cognizable offence, including the course of evidence collection and interrogation, ordinarily belongs to the investigating agency so long as it acts within the law. Section 482 CrPC permits exceptional intervention where investigation involves mala fides, clear abuse of power or non-compliance with the Code requiring judicial correction. The power must be exercised cautiously to prevent abuse or secure justice.	277
Police Investigation and Exceptional Inherent Intervention	Police have the statutory duty to investigate cognizable offences, and courts should ordinarily permit that investigation to proceed. An FIR need not contain every detail, and incomplete or hazy facts should not be used to prejudge its merits. Inherent intervention remains available where no offence is disclosed or non-interference would cause a miscarriage of justice; it must be exercised	406 cautiously to prevent abuse or secure justice.

Reasons and statutory purposes for inherent intervention in an investigation	Inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC serves to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of court process or secure the ends of justice. An intervention affecting investigation must be justified by those purposes and supported by reasons. Casual judicial observations capable of influencing the investigation or prejudicing affected persons are inappropriate.	462
Section 482 request for a police progress report on an unregistered complaint	An application under Section 482 CrPC seeking a police progress report, an explanation for inaction, and action on a complaint was dismissed because the applicant had an efficacious remedy of filing a criminal complaint before the competent court. The applicant's assertion that a preliminary inquiry had established an offence did not result in a judicial determination of that allegation. Liberty to pursue the complaint remedy was preserved.	504
Purposes and caution governing Section 482 powers	The High Court's inherent power under Section 482 CrPC may be exercised to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of court process or secure the ends of justice. It must be used sparingly and carefully, with reasons justifying intervention. Casual observations capable of affecting the investigation or persons concerned should not be made without regard to their consequences.	564
Section 482 CrPC: no predetermined arrest or charge sheet	The High Court cannot use Section 482 CrPC to dictate arrest of the accused or filing of a charge sheet in a pending police investigation. Such directions would control particular investigative steps and predetermine matters entrusted to the investigating agency. Every investigation need not result in arrest, seizure or prosecution; its lawful outcome depends on the evidence collected.	624
Section 482 CrPC: purposes and restraint in investigative intervention	The inherent power under Section 482 CrPC is confined to giving effect to an order under the Code, preventing abuse of a court's process or securing the ends of justice. Its exercise requires care, caution and reasons. It does not justify casual directions controlling the police investigation or observations made without regard to their consequences.	624
Section 482 CrPC — directions to arrest or file a charge sheet impermissibly control investigation	The High Court should not direct the police to arrest accused persons or file a charge sheet in the exercise of Section 482 CrPC merely because a crime has been registered. Such directions prescribe the manner and outcome of investigation, which ordinarily belong to the police. Investigation need not result in arrest, seizure or a charge sheet; the evidence may instead justify a closure report.	632
Section 482 CrPC — inherent power requires a statutory purpose and cautious, reasoned exercise	Inherent power under Section 482 CrPC may be exercised to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the process of a court, or secure the ends of justice. Its exercise must be sparing, careful and justified by those purposes; interference with investigation cannot rest on casual observations or an order giving no reasons for intervention.	632
Disclosed offence and the ordinary continuation of investigation	Where the FIR and relevant material disclose an offence, investigation should ordinarily be allowed to continue to collect evidence. Where no offence is disclosed, investigation should not normally be permitted merely to expose a person's liberty or property to unnecessary harassment. Whether an offence is disclosed depends on the allegations and circumstances of the particular case.	667
Section 482 CrPC — statutory purposes and reasons for intervention	The inherent power under Section 482 CrPC may be exercised to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the process of a court, or secure the ends of justice. In the Venkatasubramaniam passage relied upon by the Court, intervention required reasons linked to those purposes. Casual directions or observations without regard to their consequences could improperly influence the investigation and the legal process. The Court applied that restraint when declining to supervise the investigation by ordering arrest and submission of a charge-sheet.	672

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 482 relief for inadequate investigation: alternative Magistrate remedy	A complainant dissatisfied with an ongoing police investigation may approach the competent Magistrate under Section 156(3) CrPC. Applying Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., the Court declined intervention under Section 482 where the basis of the allegations against the named respondents was unclear. It dismissed the petition with liberty to place the grievances and prima facie material supporting those allegations before the Magistrate.	770
Hearing before judicial directions imposing coercive investigative steps	In exercising Section 482 jurisdiction, the High Court cannot mechanically direct arrest, seizure and filing of a charge-sheet against persons who have not been impleaded or heard. The relied-upon precedent treats such a judicial order with drastic consequences as invalid for want of a reasonable opportunity of hearing.	791
Statutory purposes and reasoned exercise of Section 482 CrPC powers affecting investigation	The adopted D. Venkatasubramaniam passage confines Section 482 CrPC to orders necessary to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the process of a court, or secure the ends of justice. The power must be exercised sparingly, carefully and with caution. Directions intruding into the police investigation require reasons tied to those purposes; casual observations capable of influencing the investigation or producing serious consequences are unwarranted.	854
Inherent powers — statutory purposes and reasons for intervention	The High Court may exercise inherent powers, on an application or on its own motion, to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of a court's process or secure the ends of justice. Intervention in an investigation must be justified by those purposes and supported by reasons. Casual judicial observations capable of affecting the investigation or the reputation of persons should be avoided.	901
Section 482 CrPC — reasons and statutory grounds for intervention	Inherent powers may be exercised on an application or on the High Court's own motion to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of a court's process or secure the ends of justice. Interference in an investigation requires reasons linked to those purposes. The Court must avoid casual observations that may affect the investigation or the reputation of persons who have not been heard.	906
Inherent jurisdiction — statutory purposes and reasons for intervention	Inherent powers may be exercised, on an application or on the High Court's own motion, to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of a court's process or secure the ends of justice. Interference must be justified by those purposes and supported by reasons. Casual observations with serious consequences for the course of investigation or the reputation of unheard persons should be avoided.	909
High Court power under Section 482 CrPC to direct investigation after a charge-sheet	The limits imposed by Section 173(8) CrPC on investigating agencies and subordinate courts do not restrict the High Court's inherent power under Section 482 to order fresh investigation or reinvestigation when necessary to secure the ends of justice. The distinction reproduced from Mithabhai Pashabhai Patel confines ordinary statutory powers to further investigation and does not confer inherent powers on subordinate courts. Applying State of Punjab v. CBI, the Court held that filing a charge-sheet did not prevent it from directing further investigation. The order authorised further investigation into the withheld diary and the investigating officer's conduct, without directing a fresh investigation or transfer to another agency.	911
Purposes and restraint governing Section 482 CrPC intervention	The High Court's inherent power under Section 482 CrPC is confined to giving effect to an order under the Code, preventing abuse of the process of a court or securing the ends of justice. Intervention must be sparing, careful and justified by reasons. Casual directions or observations controlling investigation cannot be issued without regard to their consequences for persons affected.	922

Statutory purposes and restraint in exercising inherent powers	Section 482 CrPC permits orders needed to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the process of a court or secure the ends of justice. The power requires sparing, careful exercise supported by reasons. The Court must avoid casual observations or directions that influence investigation and produce serious consequences without hearing affected persons.	929
Restraint in interrupting investigation of a disclosed cognizable offence	Where the FIR prima facie discloses a cognizable offence, investigation should ordinarily be allowed to proceed so that evidence can be collected. Quashing must be exercised cautiously to prevent abuse or secure justice, rather than to stop a legitimate investigation through premature findings on disputed allegations.	982

Section 362 CrPC — Bar on Review or Substantive Recall of Final Criminal Orders

Section 362 CrPC: bail cancellation power does not confer review jurisdiction	An order finally granting bail cannot be reviewed through a miscellaneous application when the Code provides no power of review. Section 362 CrPC bars that course. The statutory power to cancel bail under Section 439(2) does not authorise the court to sit in review of its earlier grant, and a prohibited review cannot be achieved indirectly.	28
Section 362 CrPC: merits arguments cannot reopen a final criminal order	A request to reconsider the merits of the already decided Section 482 application fell outside the Court's power under Section 362 CrPC. The Court stated that it should not entertain those merits arguments. Its discussion at counsel's instance was only to clarify that the earlier decision had considered the important aspects; it did not amount to a fresh review allowing the application to be reopened.	46
Section 362 CrPC — substantive recall of bail-cancellation order	Section 482 CrPC could not be used to obtain recall of the concluded bail-cancellation order where the requested change amounted to substantive review prohibited by Section 362. After rejecting the contention that the subsequent Magistrate's release displaced the continuing anticipatory-bail order, the Court refused recall on that basis.	304
Section 362 CrPC: Review of the Earlier Listing Order	The Court held that Section 362 CrPC prevented it from reviewing its own order of the previous day rejecting the same request to transfer the bail application to a coordinate bench. The renewed listing request therefore could not be used to reopen that determination before the same Court.	365
Section 362 CrPC: extension of a final order's operative deadline	Subject to an express statutory provision, a signed judgment or final criminal order cannot be altered or reviewed except to correct a clerical or arithmetical error. An error on the merits, even if patent, must be corrected through a legally available procedure rather than a rehearing under Section 362 CrPC. The request under Section 482 to add fifteen days to an earlier order's deadline for applying to the trial court sought a substantive modification, not correction of such an error. Describing the request as modification rather than recall did not remove the statutory bar, and the application was dismissed.	558
Bar on Review of a Signed Criminal Order and Distinct Power of Recall	After a final criminal order is signed, Section 362 CrPC bars substantive alteration or review except as expressly permitted by law, including correction of clerical or arithmetical errors; Section 482 cannot circumvent that bar. Applying the narrated State of Punjab v. Davinder Pal Singh Bhullar principles, the Court distinguished recall of an order that is a nullity because of lack of jurisdiction, denial of a hearing or natural justice, or abuse of process amounting to want of jurisdiction. A party seeking such recall must establish absence of fault. The applicant's disputed allegations against his earlier counsel did not establish a present basis for recall; liberty was reserved to revive the petition	654

	after the Bar Council established the counsel's guilt.
Disputed Professional Misconduct as a Ground for Recall	A recall application cannot be used to adjudicate disputed professional-misconduct allegations against an advocate when that question lies within the Bar Council's exclusive jurisdiction. Applying R. Muthukrishnan v. Registrar General, High Court of Judicature at Madras, the Court declined to decide whether the applicant had supplied documents or whether counsel had failed to file a reply despite instructions. Even a prima facie finding on those questions would affect the pending disciplinary complaint. Having concluded that it lacked jurisdiction to determine them, the Court was required to refrain from findings that could prejudice the parties.	654
Allegations Against Earlier Counsel Without Impleading Him in Recall Proceedings	In seeking recall on allegations against earlier counsel, the applicant had not impleaded that advocate. The Court held that the allegations could not be considered in his absence. It also declined findings that might prejudice either side in the professional-misconduct complaint already pending before the State Bar Council.	654
Refusal of special leave and the independent bar on review of a criminal judgment	Refusal of special leave, whether by a speaking or non-speaking order, does not cause merger of the challenged judgment. A speaking refusal may nevertheless declare binding law under Article 141, and its other findings bind the parties and subordinate forum through judicial discipline. Merger follows grant of leave and an appellate decision, whether reversing, modifying or affirming the order. Non-merger does not itself confer power to review a signed criminal judgment: the proposed deletion of perjury directions remained subject to Section 362 CrPC.	869
Sections 362 and 482 CrPC: substantive review cannot be obtained by seeking recall	Once a criminal judgment or final order is signed, Section 362 bars alteration or review except correction of a clerical or arithmetical error or an express statutory exception. Section 482 cannot override that prohibition, even where the earlier decision is said to be patently erroneous. Genuine recall for denial of a required hearing differs from merits review. Here, reconsidering the evidentiary basis for the earlier perjury directions would be review, and no mandatory preliminary hearing had been denied. The recall petitions were dismissed; the nearly two-year delay was an additional ground.	869

Sentencing, Probation, Compensation, Victim Rights and Restorative Relief

Sub-Chapter no. 51.1
Sentencing Discretion, Proportionality and Mitigating Factors

Child rape — custody already undergone and proportionality of life imprisonment	In considering reduction of life imprisonment for rape of a six-year-old child, time served beyond the asserted statutory minimum was weighed against the gravity and manner of the assault, severe physical harm, recorded psychological impact on the child and the offence's effect on society. The Court applied proportionality and deterrence, and found life imprisonment just and proper despite more than eleven and a half years already spent in custody.	9
Sentencing discretion — rational assessment rather than personal notions	Sentencing discretion must be exercised on reasonable and rational grounds, with punishment proportionate to the gravity, nature and manner of the offence and its effect on the victim and society. Neither a judge's personal moral view nor hypothetical apprehensions can replace an assessment of relevant circumstances. Severity and leniency must each be justified by the facts rather than by an arbitrary exercise of discretion.	9
Death sentence — multiple victims, mitigation and prospect of reformation	Life imprisonment is the rule and death the exception, requiring a reasoned rarest-of-rare assessment of the crime and the offender, including aggravating and mitigating circumstances and the prospect of reformation. Three deaths and ten injuries did not by themselves justify enhancement to death. The Court considered the family land dispute, the earlier attempt to seek police	12

	intervention, absence of recorded criminal antecedents and absence of material negativing reformation. It declined to enhance the life sentences imposed by the trial court.
Corruption sentencing — small unpaid bill does not alone measure gravity	The gravity of corruption is not measured solely by the amount involved or by the fact that payment was stopped. The Court found the trial court unduly lenient for focusing on the unpaid ₹9,940 bill while overlooking the coordinated false-file process and the broader record of municipal files examined by the inquiry committee. Relying on J. Jayalalitha, it treated the public consequences of corruption as material to sentencing. It nevertheless left the imposed sentences intact for the separate appellate-notice reasons addressed in the judgment.	17
Minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for an offence under Section 302 IPC. After affirming the murder conviction, the Court accordingly maintained the life sentence imposed by the trial court.	23
Replacing imprisonment with a higher fine for a first Electricity Act offence	For a first offence under Section 138 of the Electricity Act, no minimum custodial term prevented substitution of an enhanced fine. Considering the appellant's age of about sixty-one, financial hardship and an advocate's offer to pay the fine, the Court set aside one year's imprisonment and increased the fine from Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 10,000, although the original sentence was not excessive on its merits. Release was conditional on deposit within fifteen days; otherwise the one-year sentence would automatically revive.	25
Proportionate sentence for a premeditated firearm attack	Sentencing discretion must be exercised on reasons and fair play, with punishment proportionate to the offence. Relevant considerations include the manner of planning and execution, motive, weapon, conduct, mitigating and aggravating circumstances, and the interests of the victim and society. Deterrence and rehabilitation must be assessed in the factual setting; undue sympathy or lapse of time alone does not justify an inadequate sentence. For the premeditated firearm attack near a vital part of an innocent victim's body arising from an old dispute with another person, seven years' rigorous imprisonment and the fine of Rs.1,000 were upheld. The period already undergone did not warrant reduction on those facts.	34
Statutory minimum sentence under the then-applicable rape provision	For the offence under Section 376(2)(i) IPC as applied to this incident, the Court identified ten years' imprisonment as the statutory minimum. It therefore declined to reduce the ten-year rigorous-imprisonment sentence imposed by the trial court. No separate sentence had been imposed on the direct offender under Section 4 POCSO Act.	38
Rape sentencing — compromise is no basis for reduction below the statutory minimum	The Shimbhu rule relied upon rejects compromise as a basis for reducing rape punishment below the statutory minimum under the former proviso to Section 376(2) IPC. Rape is non-compoundable and affects society, and the Court cannot assume that the victim's agreement is free from pressure. The reproduced decision also records that the 2013 amendment deleted that proviso, while explaining why even the older discretion was not attracted on its facts.	58
Youth and applicable minimum sentence in reducing imprisonment for rape and abduction	Considering that the appellant was about twenty-one and had a long life ahead, the Court reduced the ten-year rigorous-imprisonment terms under Sections 376(1) and 366 IPC to seven years each. It noted that the applicable minimum under Section 376(1) was seven years and that Section 366 prescribed no minimum. Each modified sentence carried a fine of Rs. 5,000 and five months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The Section 363 sentence remained unchanged, and all substantive sentences were directed to run concurrently.	102
Life imprisonment as the minimum sentence for murder	The Court held that life imprisonment was the minimum sentence under Section 302 IPC and therefore declined to interfere with the life sentence imposed for murder committed with common intention.	106

51.1 : Sentencing Discretion, Proportionality and Mitigating Factors

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Murder conviction — Life imprisonment as the minimum sentence	When affirming the murder convictions under Sections 302/149 IPC, the Court treated life imprisonment as the minimum punishment for the Section 302 offence. It therefore found no ground to interfere with the life sentence imposed by the trial court.	115
Sexual assault of a young daughter — Life sentence and proved antecedent	The Court refused the father's request to reduce life imprisonment to the ten-year term sought by counsel. It relied on the sexual assault of his young biological daughter, her right to safety and dignity, his prior conviction for a similar offence against another young child, and the risk of repetition. The claimed further incident at Khurai was expressly found unsupported by evidence. Life imprisonment was held appropriate on the proved circumstances.	116
Minimum sentence under Section 6 POCSO Act for the 2013 offence	For the offence committed in September 2013, the Court treated ten years' rigorous imprisonment as the minimum sentence under Section 6 POCSO Act and declined to reduce it. It affirmed the sentence of ten years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50,000 with default imprisonment; no separate sentence had been imposed for the accompanying conviction under Section 377 IPC.	151
Sentence for kidnapping for a substantial ransom	The manner of the kidnapping, the substantial ransom demand, use of the abductee's ATM credentials and the compulsion on relatives to travel from Tamil Nadu to meet the demand justified affirming life imprisonment under Section 364-A IPC read with Section 13 of the MPDVPK Act. The Court also affirmed the three-year terms for the related Section 419 IPC and Section 66-C IT Act offences.	183
Sentence reduction for rash driving causing two deaths	A sentence for rash and negligent driving must reflect the gravity of the offence, its manner of commission, the victims' rights and society's interest in deterrence. Where wrong-side driving caused two deaths and a serious jaw injury, about two months in custody did not justify reducing the one-year sentence under Section 304-A IPC to the period already undergone. Undue sympathy could not justify a token sentence.	194
Deterrence in sentencing for corruption offences	The Court treated the seriousness and social harm of public corruption as reasons for a stringent sentence and declined to interfere with the one-year and four-year rigorous imprisonment terms imposed for the respective corruption offences. This was an assessment of the sentences in the case before it.	224
Life imprisonment as the minimum sentence for murder	The Court declined to interfere with the life sentence following affirmation of the conviction under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC, since life imprisonment is the minimum imprisonment prescribed for murder under Section 302 IPC.	227
No reduction below the statutory minimum applicable to the offence	For the provisions applicable to the 2014 incident, the Court identified ten years' rigorous imprisonment as the minimum under Section 6 POCSO and Section 376(2)(i) and (n) IPC. In the absence of discretion to impose a lower term, more than five years already spent in custody did not justify reducing the surviving ten-year sentence to the period undergone.	228
Minimum imprisonment following affirmation of murder conviction	After affirming the conviction for murder under Section 302 IPC, the Court declined to reduce the sentence because life imprisonment is the minimum imprisonment prescribed for that offence.	229
Life imprisonment as the minimum sentence for murder	Having upheld the Section 302/149 IPC conviction, the Court declined to reduce the life sentence because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment for the murder offence. The collective-liability conviction did not provide a basis for a term below that minimum.	248
Protection of girls considered in refusing reduction of	In deciding whether to interfere with the sentence, the Court considered the increasing occurrence of similar sexual offences and the need to protect girls in society. On that basis it declined to reduce the sentences imposed for the proved	254

sentence for sexual offences	IPC and POCSO offences and affirmed the trial court's sentence.
Minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence prescribed for an offence under Section 302 IPC. After affirming the murder convictions, the Court found no ground to interfere with the life sentences on that basis.	272
Sentence reduction for a purchaser's lesser role in a forgery conspiracy	Sentences were assessed according to each accused's role despite a voluntary compromise. Five-year terms were retained for those who prepared or actively assisted the forged power of attorney and sale deed. For the purchaser, whose role did not include preparing the power of attorney and who was about 57 years old, imprisonment was reduced to the period undergone, subject to a fine of Rs. 1,00,000 within one month. Non-payment would revive the original five-year sentence, Rs. 2,000 fine and six-month default imprisonment.	273
Rational and proportionate exercise of sentencing discretion	Sentence must reflect the offence's gravity, the manner of commission, the victim's harm and the impact on society. Deterrence and the possibility of reform must be considered through rational judicial discretion. Neither personal moral views nor the existence of sentencing discretion alone justifies arbitrary severity or undue leniency.	273
Minimum punishment for murder and interference with sentence	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC. On affirming the murder convictions, the Court found no ground to interfere with the life sentences on that basis.	274
Minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence prescribed for murder under Section 302 IPC. Having affirmed the murder conviction, the Court declined to interfere with that sentence on this basis.	275
Minimum sentence for murder on two counts	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence under Section 302 IPC. On affirming the convictions on two counts, the Court declined to interfere with the life sentences awarded by the trial court.	278
Life sentence for rape of a very young child	In declining to reduce the life sentence under the then-applicable Section 376(2)(f) IPC, the Court considered the victim's tender age and the seriousness of the assault. It held that firm punishment was required for such conduct and affirmed the sentence. The decision concerned this assault on a child of about five years and did not prescribe life imprisonment as an automatic sentence for every rape case.	298
Section 302 IPC — minimum imprisonment and sentence reduction	Having upheld the murder conviction under Sections 302 and 34 IPC, the Court declined to reduce the imprisonment because life imprisonment was the minimum sentence for the offence under Section 302.	313
Section 302 IPC — minimum sentence on affirmation of murder conviction	On affirming the murder convictions, the Court declined interference with imprisonment because life imprisonment was the minimum sentence under Section 302 IPC.	319
Sentence — renewed cruelty after written assurances securing reconciliation	The Court declined to reduce the sentences of five years for abetment of suicide and two years for cruelty. It considered that, after an earlier cruelty prosecution, the husband obtained the wife's return through an apology and a written promise of proper treatment, then resumed the mistreatment. Those circumstances justified leaving the terms imposed by the trial court undisturbed.	328
Section 302 IPC — life imprisonment is the minimum sentence	Once the conviction under Section 302 IPC was affirmed, the life sentence did not call for reduction because life imprisonment is the minimum punishment prescribed for that offence.	341
Rape sentencing — Compromise is not a ground for leniency	Compromise in a rape case cannot be treated as a leading ground for a lesser sentence, particularly because apparent agreement may reflect pressure on the victim. The historical discretion under the former proviso to Section 376(2) IPC	354

	could not safely be exercised on that basis; the reproduced authority also notes the proviso's deletion in 2013. The case-specific reductions in Baldev Singh and Ravindra were confined to their own facts and were not treated as binding precedents for compromise-based leniency.
Unchallenged Evidence of Antecedents in Reviewing Sentence	In reviewing the five-year rigorous-imprisonment sentence under Section 307 IPC, the court relied on testimony that several criminal cases were registered against the accused, which had not been challenged in cross-examination. In those circumstances, it found no basis to reduce the sentence.	378
Life Imprisonment as the Minimum Sentence Under Section 364-A IPC	Life imprisonment is the lesser of the punishments prescribed by Section 364-A IPC. The court therefore could not reduce the sentence below life imprisonment to the period already undergone merely on a plea of disproportionality.	379
Proportionality Review of Legislatively Prescribed Punishment	Punishment must fit the nature and gravity of the crime, but prescribing penalties is a legislative function entitled to judicial deference. A court may interfere with a prescribed punishment that is outrageously disproportionate, inhuman or brutal by accepted standards of decency; a perception that it is excessive is insufficient. The relied-upon decision upheld Section 364-A's prescribed punishment and treated life imprisonment for a proved offence as compatible with Article 21.	379
Life Imprisonment as the Minimum Sentence for Murder	On affirming liability for murder under Section 302 read with Section 149 IPC, the Court treated life imprisonment as the minimum sentence for the murder conviction and found no ground to reduce it. The accompanying fines and default terms, and the sentences for rioting and the separately proved hurt offences, were affirmed.	381
Minimum Sentence on Affirming a Murder Conviction	After rejecting the Section 84 defence and affirming the convictions, the Court treated life imprisonment as the minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC. It therefore found no basis to reduce the life sentence and affirmed the trial court's sentence.	384
Trial Court's Power to Impose a Special Remainder-of-Life Sentence	Applying Union of India v. Sriharan, the Court stated that a judicially modified punishment specifying a term or imprisonment until the end of natural life as an alternative to death is reserved to the High Court and Supreme Court. The trial court could not impose that special sentence for the offences before it. The judgment separately considered the express statutory natural-life punishment in Section 376(3) IPC and held that the 2018 provision did not apply to this 2015 offence.	389
Section 376(3) IPC Punishment Did Not Apply to the Earlier Offence	The offence before the Court occurred in October 2015, whereas Section 376(3) IPC, expressly providing for imprisonment extending to the remainder of natural life, was inserted in 2018. The Court found no retrospective application of that provision and therefore held it inapplicable to the case. It assessed the trial court's sentence under the law applicable to the earlier offence, rather than using the later statutory provision to sustain it.	389
Meaningful hearing before imposing a death sentence	An effective hearing under Section 235(2) CrPC requires the accused to be told that death is contemplated and given a real opportunity to place mitigating circumstances before the court. The court must elicit relevant sentencing facts and consider mitigation. Imposing sentence on the day of conviction is not itself invalid if that opportunity is meaningful. Here, the deficient hearing and failure to consider mitigation prevented confirmation of death; the sentence was commuted to imprisonment for natural life without remission.	391
Mitigation and reform in capital sentencing for child rape and murder	The brutality of rape and murder and the child's age do not dispense with the rarest-of-rare assessment or consideration of mitigation and the possibility of reform. The sentencing court must elicit relevant mitigating facts even when the defence does not place them before it. Applying the reproduced sentencing	391

	authorities, the Court declined to confirm death where that assessment and an effective sentencing hearing were absent.
Effective mitigation hearing before imposing death	Sentencing on the day of conviction is not itself invalid if the accused receives a meaningful hearing under Section 235(2) CrPC and an opportunity to place mitigation on record. The court must specifically indicate that death is contemplated and elicit relevant facts. Here, the accused had no sufficient opportunity to submit mitigating material or an affidavit; the absence of an effective hearing prevented confirmation of death.	393
Death as an exception and consideration of reform	Life imprisonment is the rule and death an exception reserved for the rarest cases where the alternative is unquestionably foreclosed. Sentencing must account for both the crime and the offender, with meaningful consideration of mitigation and the possibility of reform. Here, the accused's youth, the absence of findings on a continuing threat and reform, and the failure to consider an alternative punishment weighed against confirming death.	393
Natural-life imprisonment without remission in place of death	When replacing death with life imprisonment, the court may determine the length of incarceration appropriate to the offence. Applying Mulla and considering the proved crime and circumstances, the Court directed imprisonment until the accused's natural death without remission.	393
Socio-economic circumstances and reform evidence in capital sentencing	The brutality of child rape and murder, though shocking, does not by itself justify death. The Court considered the accused's youth, poor and marginalised background, family circumstances and favourable jail report showing discipline, cooperation and reformative behaviour. Those mitigating circumstances supported the conclusion that the case was outside the rarest-of-rare category. Death under Section 376A IPC was replaced by imprisonment for the remainder of natural life.	397
Constitutional-court power to impose a special sentence instead of death	The High Court and Supreme Court may replace death with a modified sentence prescribing a particular period of incarceration or imprisonment for the remainder of natural life beyond ordinary remission. The reproduced Sriharan principle reserves that special power to those courts, rather than inferior courts. The Court also noted Section 376A IPC's express natural-life alternative and imposed that sentence here.	397
Life Imprisonment as the Minimum Sentence for Murder under Section 302 IPC	In affirming the murder sentences, the Court treated life imprisonment as the minimum punishment under Section 302 IPC and found no basis to reduce the life terms imposed for the two murders.	409
Corrupt misuse of partition work as a reason to decline sentence reduction	The Court declined to interfere with the sentence because the Patwari had attempted to deprive the complainant's sisters of their legitimate shares by accepting affidavits without authority and preparing unequal partition documents. It treated that misuse of official work, including the attempted relinquishment of pre-existing rights without a registered deed, as material to sentence. The concurrent sentences of three years under Section 7 and five years under Section 13(1)(d) read with Section 13(2) PC Act were affirmed.	441
Belated family compromise and further sentence reduction for forgery	Relationship and settlement did not justify reducing the remaining non-compoundable Section 467 IPC sentence to time already served. The compromise came about seventeen years after the fraudulent sale and six years after trial conviction, and disclosed no terms showing reconveyance or adequate compensation. The Court questioned the circumstances of settlement without finding coercion. Since the appellate court had already reduced three years' rigorous imprisonment to one year with ₹2,000 fine, the Court refused further leniency. The earlier compounding of Sections 419, 420 and 423 did not dispose of the forgery conviction.	444
Life imprisonment	After affirming the murder conviction, the Court declined sentence interference	445

as the minimum sentence for Section 302 IPC	because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment under Section 302 IPC. It maintained the life sentence and the concurrent Arms Act sentences imposed by the trial court.
Proportionate Sentencing for a Repeated Knife Assault	Sentencing discretion must rest on rational and objective consideration of the offence's gravity, manner of commission, impact on the victim and society, and the relevant circumstances, with punishment proportionate to the crime. Applying these principles to the armed attack and its serious injuries, the Court declined to reduce the ten years' rigorous imprisonment imposed under Section 307 IPC.	451
Murder sentence — Minimum life imprisonment and concurrent terms	Life imprisonment is the minimum punishment for murder under Section 302 IPC. The Court therefore found no ground to reduce the two life sentences imposed for the two murders and directed that they run concurrently.	474
Sentence for rape of an infant — Deterrence and life imprisonment	The extreme youth of a one-year-old victim and the gravity of the sexual assault warranted a deterrent sentence. On those circumstances, the Court upheld life imprisonment imposed under the then-applicable Section 376(2)(f) IPC. The decision affirms that sentence in this case; it does not state that life imprisonment is mandatory in every prosecution under that provision.	477
Section 376(2)(i) IPC — reduction of natural-life sentence to twenty actual years	The trial court's life sentence under Section 376(2)(i) IPC was read with its reasons as imprisonment for the remainder of natural life. Considering the available statutory sentencing range and absence of proved criminal antecedents, the Court substituted twenty years of actual rigorous imprisonment without remission. It retained the other sentences and directed substantive terms to run concurrently. Although clauses (i) and (m) constituted distinct offences, it found no illegality in the absence of a separate sentence under clause (m) on this record, given the punishments for rape and attempted murder and the absence of a State challenge.	482
Fatal rash driving — deterrence and refusal to reduce imprisonment	Deterrence and the driver's duty of care are important when sentencing for death caused by rash or negligent driving. Applying Dalbir Singh, including its caution against Section 4 Probation of Offenders Act relief in such cases, the Court refused to reduce the one-year rigorous imprisonment sentence under Section 304-A IPC. It distinguished Sagar Lolienkar because compensation of ₹3,00,000 had been paid there, whereas none was offered here. Despite no allegation of intoxication, the fatal driving during a traffic jam justified retaining the sentence, ₹500 fine and one-month default imprisonment.	485
Sentence reduction under Section 325 IPC — assault on vital parts	The absence of a statutory minimum sentence under Section 325 IPC does not by itself require reduction of the sentence. Although the quarrel arose suddenly over fetching water, the Court declined interference for the appellants who used lathis, dandas and an iron rod to cause head injuries, having regard to the manner of the assault and the vital part targeted.	491
Murder sentence — life imprisonment as the minimum punishment	After affirming the conviction under Sections 302/34 IPC, the Court declined to reduce the life sentence because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment for the murder offence. The sentence imposed by the trial court therefore called for no interference on that ground.	499
Proportionate sentencing for death caused by rash or negligent driving	A sentence must reflect the gravity and manner of the offence, the relevant aggravating and mitigating circumstances, and the interests of the victim and society as well as the offender. Corrective measures remain relevant, but deterrence may be necessary on the facts. In fatal road-accident cases, sympathy for the offender must not result in punishment disproportionate to the harm caused.	519
Failure to Appear During Appeal as a Sentencing	In declining to reduce the sentence, the Court relied on deterrence and the appellants' prolonged failure to appear before the Registry while on bail as showing no improvement in their conduct. It affirmed the sentences, cancelled	527

Consideration	the bail bonds and directed immediate surrender to serve the remaining imprisonment.
Section 397 IPC sentence — seven-year minimum and appellate reduction	The statutory minimum imprisonment for an offence under Section 397 IPC is seven years. The Court reduced Purshottam's ten-year rigorous imprisonment to seven years and imposed a fine of ₹2,000, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default.	548
Reduction of sentence below the applicable statutory minimum	For the offences and incident before it, the Court identified seven years as the minimum imprisonment under Section 4 of the POCSO Act and Section 376 IPC. As the trial court had imposed that minimum and the amended rape provision left no discretion to reduce it, the appellant's age and custody already undergone did not justify a shorter sentence.	560
Minimum life sentence under Sections 302 and 364A IPC	Having upheld the convictions under Sections 302 and 364A IPC, the Court declined to interfere with the life sentences because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment for those offences.	575
Minimum sentence upon affirming a murder conviction	After affirming the murder conviction, the Court declined to reduce the life sentence because life imprisonment was the minimum sentence under Section 302 IPC.	577
Hearing on sentence when an appellate court affirms conviction or reverses acquittal	When an appellate court converts an acquittal into a conviction, it must hear the accused on sentence. When it upholds a trial court's conviction and sentence, a further opportunity on sentence is unnecessary unless enhancement is contemplated. Section 235(2) CrPC therefore did not require a fresh sentencing hearing where the earlier appeal maintained the Section 498-A conviction and its existing sentence while setting aside the Section 304-B conviction.	581
Minimum sentence upon conviction for murder under Section 302 IPC	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for an offence under Section 302 IPC. Having upheld the murder conviction, the Court found no basis to interfere with the life sentence imposed by the trial court.	582
Death sentence sought against an accused similarly placed to co-accused serving life sentences	The Court declined to impose death after reversing acquittal where the State did not establish that the case fell within the rarest-of-rare category or identify a difference between the respondent's role and those of similarly placed co-accused already sentenced to life imprisonment. No enhancement appeal had been filed against those sentences. Following a hearing on punishment, the Court imposed life imprisonment on each murder count.	583
Life imprisonment as the minimum punishment for murder	On the murder convictions affirmed in this case, the Court held that life imprisonment was the minimum sentence under Section 302 IPC. The life sentences imposed by the trial court therefore called for no reduction. The separate direction about concurrent execution did not reduce those substantive sentences.	605
Minimum imprisonment for murder under Section 302 IPC	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence of imprisonment under Section 302 IPC. Upon affirming the murder conviction, the Court found no ground to interfere with the life sentence imposed by the trial court.	610
Life imprisonment as the minimum sentence under Section 302 IPC	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC. With the murder convictions sustained, the life sentences imposed by the trial court called for no reduction.	622
Minimum sentence following affirmation of murder conviction	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC. After affirming the conviction, the Court found no ground to interfere with the life sentence imposed by the trial court.	649
POCSO sentence — seven-year minimum applicable to the	For the offence committed in 2015, the Court stated that the minimum punishment under Section 4 POCSO and Section 376(1) IPC was seven years. The trial court had imposed seven years' rigorous imprisonment under Section	676

2015 offence	4 POCSO and, in view of that punishment, awarded no separate sentence under Section 376(1), though the conviction under that provision remained. The High Court affirmed that sentencing arrangement and declined to interfere with the statutory minimum. Its conclusion concerned the provisions applicable at the time of the offence, without analysing a general rule for all overlapping IPC and POCSO punishments.
Murder conviction — life imprisonment as the minimum sentence	After affirming the conviction for murder under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC, the Court declined to reduce the sentence because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment for the murder offence.	682
Minimum sentence of imprisonment for life for murder	The Court declined to reduce the sentence of the four appellants convicted under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC because imprisonment for life is the minimum sentence prescribed for murder under Section 302.	713
Life imprisonment as the minimum sentence for murder	After affirming the murder conviction under Section 302 IPC, the Court declined to interfere with life imprisonment because it is the minimum sentence prescribed for murder.	718
Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence under Section 364A IPC	After upholding the conviction under Section 364A IPC read with Sections 11/13 of the MPDVPK Act, the Court declined to interfere with the life sentence. It reasoned that life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for the Section 364A offence. The affirmed conviction therefore supplied no basis for reducing imprisonment below that statutory minimum.	731
Section 307 sentence reduced from ten to five years after conviction affirmed	Despite affirming seven appellants' convictions under Section 307 IPC directly or with Section 149 and other hurt/rioting counts, the appellate Court found ten years' rigorous imprisonment excessive in light of the incident's manner and the absence of a statutory minimum for Section 307. It imposed five years' rigorous imprisonment and ₹10,000 fine on each for that count, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default; other sentences stood concurrently. The judgment did not hold that five years is a general benchmark for attempted murder.	735
Refusal to reduce sentence for prolonged sexual exploitation of a girl below sixteen	The Court declined to reduce the ten-year term of rigorous imprisonment for the Section 376 IPC conviction. It relied on the unchallenged evidence that the appellant was already married and had three children, yet kidnapped a girl below sixteen and moved with her from place to place for approximately a year, during which she gave birth to a child. Those circumstances supported affirmance of the sentence imposed by the trial court. The decision concerns the offence and statutory setting applicable to the 2004 conduct and does not prescribe ten years as a general sentencing benchmark.	738
Appellate sentence modification — merits must first be examined	Following Nagpal Traders v. Davinder Singh, the Court held that the quantum of sentence cannot be interfered with without considering the merits of the case. Although the appellants sought reduction on the basis of the elapsed twenty years and the nature of the injuries, the Court first examined the prosecution evidence. It considered the injured complainant's testimony, medical corroboration, the doctor's evidence about injuries not attributable to a fall, and the absence of the alleged counter-case record. Finding that the appellants had been the aggressors and noting the absence of a serious challenge to conviction, it affirmed the convictions under Sections 324/34 and 323/34 IPC before deciding whether to alter the sentences.	744
Absconding after dismissal of appeal as a reason to refuse sentence reduction	The applicant's conduct in absconding after dismissal of his appeal and remaining unavailable until his later arrest justified refusal to interfere with the three-month sentence for the Section 324 IPC offence. The Court treated that conduct as a reason to retain the sentence already imposed.	752
Life imprisonment as the minimum	Once the conviction for murder under Section 302 IPC was upheld, the Court declined interference with the life sentence because life imprisonment is the	774 sentence for murder	minimum imprisonment prescribed for that offence. It affirmed the sentence and directed the appellant to undergo its remaining part.

Sentencing for a chest shooting and the victim's pending criminal trial	Five years' rigorous imprisonment under Section 307 IPC was not excessive for carrying an illegal firearm at night and shooting the victim in the chest over consumption of liquor. The fact that the victim was brought from jail to testify and faced trial in another case gave no one a right to injure him and did not warrant reducing the sentence.	782
Section 302 IPC— life imprisonment as the minimum sentence	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for an offence under Section 302 IPC. After affirming the murder conviction, the Court found no ground to interfere with the life sentence or with the sentence imposed under Section 201 IPC.	815
Section 302 IPC — Minimum sentence for the adult appellant	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC. The Court therefore affirmed the adult appellant's life sentences on both murder counts.	829
Section 302 IPC — life imprisonment as the minimum sentence of imprisonment	After sustaining the conviction under Section 302 IPC, the Court declined to reduce the sentence because life imprisonment was the minimum sentence of imprisonment for that offence. The life sentence, fine and default imprisonment were affirmed.	898
Sentencing parity with co-accused after reversal of acquittal	After reversing the acquittal, the Court considered the sentences already imposed on co-accused in the connected matters. Although those sentences had been disapproved as unduly light, the connected appeals had not resulted in enhancement, no enhancement notice having been given at admission and belated notice being considered unproductive. In those circumstances, the Court considered it inappropriate to impose a different sentence on the present respondents and applied parity when fixing punishment. This was a case-specific sentencing decision, not approval of the adequacy of the earlier sentences.	914
Capital sentencing: balancing aggravating and mitigating circumstances before commutation	The Court considered the aggravating circumstances reproduced from Ramnaresh and held that they did not fit the case. It weighed the absence of proved prior criminal antecedents and the failure to establish that the accused was a menace, threat or danger to society as mitigating circumstances. On that stated balance, it refused death-sentence confirmation and substituted imprisonment for the remainder of the accused's natural life under Section 302 IPC, retaining the ₹25,000 fine. The other convictions and sentences remained undisturbed. This records the Bench's assessment of this case without treating the absence of antecedents as automatically excluding capital punishment.	915
Sentencing parity with co-accused after reversal of acquittal	Although the Court considered the co-accused's six-month sentences inadequate, it had left them undisturbed in the connected appeals in which no enhancement notice had been issued at admission. In those circumstances, it considered a different sentence for the respondent inappropriate. It imposed six months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹10,000 on each count under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act and Section 120-B IPC, with one month's rigorous imprisonment in default on each count, and directed the substantive sentences to run concurrently. The sentence rested on parity in these circumstances.	920
Life imprisonment as the minimum sentence for murder	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for an offence under Section 302 IPC. After independently considering sentence in the absence of the appellant's counsel, the Court found no ground to interfere with the life sentence and affirmed the sentences, which were to run concurrently.	934
Minimum life sentence for murder in a Section 149	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC. Having upheld the convictions under Section 302 read with Section 149 for the	936 conviction	two deaths, the Court found no ground to interfere with the life sentences imposed by the trial court.

Murder sentence: life imprisonment is the statutory minimum	The Court refused to reduce the life sentence after affirming the Section 302 IPC conviction because life imprisonment is the minimum punishment for that offence. It also maintained the trial court's direction that the sentences under Sections 302 and 307 run concurrently.	949
Proportionality and rational discretion in sentencing	A sentence must be proportionate to the offence and its social and victim impact, without being disproportionately excessive. Relevant considerations may include culpability, antecedents, age, prospects of reform, future social risk, elapsed time and intervening conduct, assessed in the circumstances of the offence. There is no fixed formula; discretion must be reasoned rather than founded on personal moral views, hypothetical fears or mere indulgence. Correction and deterrence both remain relevant, and grave negligent driving may require deterrence despite a plea for leniency.	965
Sentence for insurance officers' breach of the insured's trust	Collecting premiums and issuing insurance documents creates an expectation of indemnity in the insured. Where the insurer's officers themselves defeat that trust through the proved misconduct, the Court found no basis for a liberal sentencing view. It held the concurrent terms of two and a half years and two years already lenient and refused further reduction for the surviving appellant. The observation concerned the proved insurance fraud, rather than an unqualified rule about the extent of every insurance policy.	968
Seven-year sentence for an unprovoked attack on a vital body part	The hurt-caused limb of Section 307 IPC permitted a sentence extending to life imprisonment. Given the unprovoked early-morning attack, repeated blows to the forehead and severe injuries, the Court found no basis to interfere with the seven-year rigorous-imprisonment term or reduce it to custody already undergone. The decision was an assessment of sentence on these circumstances, rather than a general minimum sentence for Section 307.	969
Sentence for rape of a young child	The victim's young age and the gravity of the sexual assault warranted refusal of leniency in sentence. For rape of a girl aged about eight, the Court affirmed the ten years' rigorous imprisonment awarded under Section 4 POCSO Act.	980

Costs, Compensation and Personal Accountability in Criminal-Side Proceedings

Costs — false implication of relatives who were children at the alleged onset	Having found an attempt to falsely implicate the husband's two siblings through vague allegations dating from their childhood, the Court awarded costs for the agony of a criminal case and the use of court time. It directed the complainant to deposit ₹10,000 within sixty days, allocating ₹4,000 to each applicant and ₹2,000 to the Registry.	14
Personal costs for custodial assault and fabrication of allegations	For custodial assault and fabrication of complaint material, the Court imposed personal costs totalling Rs. 1,20,000 on the six implicated police officials in different amounts reflecting their involvement. The amounts were to be deposited in the Registry within one month and made available to the petitioner on application. Default attracted recovery proceedings and separate contempt proceedings.	22
Litigation costs and compliance directions on dismissal of a maintenance revision	On dismissing the husband's challenge to interim maintenance, the Court awarded ₹20,000 to the wife towards the revision's litigation expenses. It required deposit within fifteen days and directed initiation of contempt proceedings and striking off the husband's defence in the trial court if he defaulted. These were the compliance directions made in this revision.	131
Personal costs and accountability for harassing a corruption	For the retaliatory FIR and recovery demand, the Court imposed separate costs of ₹25,000 in each connected writ, to be deposited within two months by the responsible official for payment to the complainant, without reimbursement by	198 complainant	the State. It directed recovery and contempt proceedings on default. The Chief Secretary was also directed to examine the official's conduct, take necessary action within two months and report to the Court within three months.

Compensation and personal accountability for continued denial of speedy trial	Where police witnesses continued to default despite an earlier compensation order, the Court directed the State to pay a further Rs 50,000 within fifteen days and recover it from the Superintendent of Police's salary for failing to ensure attendance. It also directed departmental inquiries against the defaulting witness and process-serving personnel, with compliance reports and an affidavit on recovery.	250
Return of money unconnected with the alleged offence—with interest	After rejecting the alleged ransom connection and finding the recovery documents fabricated, the Court ordered return of ₹25,000 to Bhagwan Singh/Harkanth and ₹1.90 lakh to Jagdish with interest at 7.5% until payment. The complainant who had received ₹1.90 lakh under an interim order had to redeposit it with interest from the date of recovery. The refund remained subject to any appeal.	410
Mala fide preventive proceedings—Costs and enforcement	The finding that Section 145 CrPC proceedings were initiated mala fide and arbitrarily justified costs of ₹20,000 against the private respondents who obtained the unlawful orders. The Court directed recovery in accordance with law and registration of contempt proceedings if the costs were not deposited within seven days.	664
False prosecution and prolonged custody — constitutional compensation beyond acquittal	Mere acquittal does not invariably entitle an accused to compensation. The Court nevertheless held that its constitutional duty under Articles 20 and 21 required redress where faulty investigation and false implication had kept an innocent person suffering from psychosis in jail for approximately thirteen years. Referring to compensation awarded under Article 142 in Ankush Maruti Shinde, it found acquittal insufficient in the present circumstances. It directed the State to pay ₹3 lakh within one month, preserved the appellant's liberty to sue for civil damages, and allowed the State, if it wished, to recover the amount from the witnesses. The Court found false implication intended to secure control of the appellant's property.	747
Personal compensation for deliberate withholding of trial material	The Court directed the then SP personally to deposit ₹5,00,000 with the Principal Registrar within one month for mala fide suppression affecting the fair-investigation and fair-trial rights of at least one side. Which side he intended to favour remained for inquiry. The deposit was to pass to the trial court and be paid to the complainant if the accused were convicted, or to the accused if acquitted. Default would lead to recovery proceedings and a separate contempt case.	769
Suppression of an earlier quashing refusal and costs	Concealment of the earlier merits dismissal of a similar compromise-based quashing request, both in the renewed application and before the Registrar, was treated as an attempt to defraud the Court. The Court imposed ₹25,000 costs payable within thirty days and directed recovery and registration of contempt proceedings only if payment was not made.	797
	Sub-Chapter no. 51.3 Set-Off, Concurrent/Consecutive Sentences and Default Sentence
Concurrent operation of a later life sentence with earlier life sentences	On the application under Section 427 CrPC, the Court directed that the life sentence in this murder case run concurrently with the life sentences in two earlier trials. Those earlier sentences had already been made concurrent by an appellate order, and the Court applied the same approach to the later sentence. The murder conviction remained affirmed.	98
Concurrent life sentences for several convictions at one	Under Section 31(1) CrPC, separate imprisonment terms ordinarily run consecutively unless the court directs otherwise. The choice is judicial and must reflect the totality of the offences. Applying O.M. Cherian and	103

trial	Muthuramalingam, the Court held that multiple life sentences must run concurrently because life imprisonment extends to the convict's remaining natural life and a further life term cannot commence after it. It also noted the authorities permitting concurrency for offences committed in one transaction. The convictions on two counts under Section 302 and under Section 307 IPC were affirmed, but the life terms were directed to run concurrently.
Reduction to the minimum sentences applicable on the date of the offence	For the offence committed on 31 January 2014, the Court identified seven years as the applicable minimum under Section 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO Act. It reduced each ten-year term to seven years' rigorous imprisonment, enhanced each fine to Rs.10,000, preserved the sentences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC, and directed all terms to run concurrently.	124
Separate punishment under overlapping IPC and POCSO provisions	While maintaining the convictions under Section 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO Act, the Court referred to Section 71 IPC and held that a separate sentence under Section 376(1) was unnecessary for the overlapping act. Its operative order nevertheless reduced the terms on both counts to seven years and directed concurrent operation.	124
Separate punishment for the same sexual act	Treating the convictions under Section 376 IPC and Section 4 of the POCSO Act as arising from the same offence, the Court affirmed the seven-year rigorous imprisonment and fine under Section 4 and awarded no separate sentence under Section 376 IPC.	560
Separate sentence for Section 147 IPC where punishment is imposed under Section 148 IPC	On conviction under both Sections 147 and 148 IPC, the Court imposed imprisonment under Section 148 and no separate sentence under Section 147 because it was the lesser offence.	583
Subsequent imprisonment where a life sentence is already being served	Under Section 427(2) CrPC, when a person already serving life imprisonment receives a subsequent sentence of imprisonment for a term or for life, that subsequent sentence runs concurrently with the earlier life sentence. Applying that provision and O.M. Cherian, the Court directed the substantive sentence in this trial to run concurrently with the life sentence imposed in the earlier trial. Life imprisonment extends through the convict’s normal life; fixed terms cannot be ordered to begin after it.	605
Default imprisonment remains consecutive despite substantive concurrency	An order that substantive sentences run concurrently does not make the terms imposed in default of payment of fines concurrent. Applying Sharad Hiru Kolambe, the Court expressly directed the default sentences to run consecutively even while directing concurrency of the substantive imprisonment across the two trials.	605
Section 427(2) CrPC: concurrency with an existing life sentence	Where a person already undergoing life imprisonment receives a subsequent sentence of imprisonment for a term or for life, Section 427(2) CrPC requires the subsequent sentence to run concurrently with the earlier life sentence. The Court therefore directed the substantive sentence in the later murder trial to run concurrently with the earlier murder sentence, although counsel had not raised the question.	622
Default imprisonment remains consecutive despite substantive concurrency	A direction that substantive sentences run concurrently does not extend to default imprisonment for non-payment of fine. Following Sharad Hiru Kolambe, the Court expressly directed the default sentences to run consecutively.	622
Section 427 CrPC — concurrent sentences for killings in one transaction	Where two victims were killed in one transaction but prosecuted separately because their bodies were left in different police-station areas, the Court directed the substantive life and fixed-term sentences in the second case to run concurrently with those in the connected case, although no such prayer had been made. Section 427(2) CrPC provides that a subsequent life or fixed-term sentence imposed on a person already undergoing life imprisonment runs	683

	concurrently with that life sentence.
Section 31 CrPC — life imprisonment and fixed terms	As explained in the relied-upon passage from O.M. Cherian, life imprisonment extends to the end of the convict's normal life. A direction to undergo fixed-term imprisonment after completing life imprisonment is therefore unworkable; fixed terms and multiple life terms must be directed to run concurrently in that setting.	683
Fine-default imprisonment remains consecutive despite substantive concurrency	The direction making the substantive sentences concurrent did not extend to imprisonment in default of payment of fines. Relying on Sharad Hiru Kolambe, the Court expressly directed the default sentences to run consecutively.	683
Separate punishment for Section 420 IPC and concurrent sentences in the connected work-file prosecution	While sentencing the contractor for the fabricated work transaction, the Court followed the approach taken for co-accused and awarded no separate sentence under Section 420 IPC, describing it in this context as a lesser offence of Section 468 IPC. It imposed terms for Sections 467, 468, 471 and 120B IPC and directed the sentences to run concurrently. The determination was confined to sentencing in this prosecution; it did not separately analyse the statutory ingredients or establish that cheating is invariably included in forgery for the purpose of cheating.	914
Default imprisonment for fine after imposition of imprisonment for natural life	When commuting the Section 302 IPC death sentence to imprisonment for the remainder of the accused's natural life, the Court retained the ₹25,000 fine and directed that no imprisonment in default of that fine was required in view of the natural-life sentence. The remaining counts and their sentences were left intact.	915
	Sub-Chapter no. 51.4 Sentence Reduction, Custody Period and Long Pendency
Section 376(2)(n) IPC — refusal to reduce the statutory minimum sentence	The Court declined to interfere with the ten-year sentence because it was the minimum punishment prescribed for Section 376(2)(n) IPC as applied in this case. The sentence and concurrent sentencing arrangement imposed by the trial court were affirmed.	13
Sentence reduction where the applicable POCSO punishment carried a ten-year minimum	The Court declined to reduce the ten-year sentence under Section 6 POCSO to the period already undergone, because ten years was the statutory minimum applicable to this case. It affirmed the sentences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC and Section 6 POCSO. The trial court had imposed no separate sentence under Section 376 IPC, treating the overlapping sexual offences under Section 71 IPC.	89
Minimum life sentence for murder under Section 302 IPC	After sustaining the conviction under Section 302 IPC, the Court declined to interfere with the life sentence because life imprisonment is the minimum sentence prescribed for that offence.	98
Custody already undergone for reduced hurt offences	For participants acquitted of murder, more than four hundred days of custody, with additional custody during appeal, was sufficient for the reduced hurt and rioting offences. The Court reduced their concurrent custodial sentences to the period undergone while retaining fines and default terms. The two direct murder offenders retained their life sentences; their attempted-murder counts were reduced to Section 324/149 with six months' rigorous imprisonment on each of three counts.	165
Custody exceeding the maximum terms for the substituted offences	On altering the conviction, the Court considered that the appellants had remained continuously in custody for eleven years and eight months. That period exceeded the seven-year maximum under Section 365 IPC and the ten-year maximum referred to under Section 11 of the MPDVPK Act; Section 13 carried a three-year minimum. They were sentenced to the period already undergone and directed to be released immediately unless required in another	188 offence.

Long pendency alone did not justify reducing sentence for a serious assault	The lapse of about 21 years did not warrant reduction of the sentence to the period already undergone. In view of the sword injuries, nasal fracture, brain haematoma and use of a country-made bomb, the Court considered the trial sentence already lenient and declined further reduction.	206
Sentence already undergone after alteration to Section 304 Part I	After altering the conviction to Section 304 Part I IPC, the Court took account of approximately twelve years of actual imprisonment and sentenced the appellant to the period already undergone, retaining the fine and default sentence. The assessment included undertrial detention and imprisonment after conviction, with the brief period of temporary bail noted.	223
Age and long pendency do not permit a sentence below the statutory minimum	Section 13(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, as applicable on the trap date in 1990, prescribed at least one year's imprisonment. The Court held that it could not impose a lesser term because thirty-four years had elapsed or the appellant was over seventy-six. It distinguished the sentencing precedent relied upon and affirmed the one-year term.	252
Reduction of sentence under Section 306 IPC where no statutory minimum applies	Section 306 IPC prescribes no minimum imprisonment. Taking account of the circumstances and approximately four years and eight months of actual custody, the Court maintained the conviction and reduced rigorous imprisonment from seven to five years. It enhanced the fine from ₹2,000 to ₹5,000, with six months' simple imprisonment in default.	268
Sentence already undergone after alteration to Section 304 Part II	After altering the conviction to Section 304 Part II IPC, the Court considered the sudden quarrel, fist assault, unknown liver condition, the appellant's age of about twenty at the time and more than nineteen years since the incident. It noted 257 days of undertrial custody and his later detention, assessing the custody undergone at approximately three years and four months. In those circumstances it imposed the period already served, with release if not required in another case.	295
Dowry-death sentence — effect of long appellate pendency	Fourteen years of appellate pendency did not automatically entitle the appellant to a reduced sentence. Considering the death within one year of marriage and the misleading account that the deceased had been found hanging, the Court upheld ten years' rigorous imprisonment under Section 304-B IPC.	302
Sentence on substitution of Section 323 conviction — time served and enhanced fine	On substituting the conviction under Section 323 IPC, the Court considered its stated custody total of 109 days sufficient imprisonment. In view of the multiple injuries, it enhanced the fine to Rs.15,000, payable within two months, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default.	316
Sentence Already Undergone After Alteration to Section 304 Part I IPC	After altering the conviction to Section 304 Part I IPC, the court considered the accused's subsequent conduct and continuous actual imprisonment of eleven years and ten months sufficient to meet the ends of justice. The sentence was reduced to the period already undergone, the custody record showing that he had not been released on bail during trial or appeal.	377
Section 324 IPC sentence reduction with an enhanced fine	Where Section 324 IPC prescribed no minimum imprisonment, the Court considered the appellant's age of twenty-five at the offence, absence of any criminal history asserted by the prosecution, lapse of more than nineteen years and twelve days already spent in custody. It reduced imprisonment to the period undergone while affirming the conviction and enhancing the fine from Rs 1,000 to Rs 15,000. Payment by 29 February 2024 was a condition of that relief; default would automatically revive the trial court's jail sentence.	439
Lapse of time as a ground to reduce imprisonment for fatal negligent	The lapse of 22 years after the accident did not justify reducing the six-month sentence under Section 304A IPC to the period already undergone by enhancing the fine. Applying Dil Bahadur, the Court refused undue sympathy that would disregard the loss of life and irreparable harm to the deceased's family. Passage	519 driving	of time alone cannot justify an inadequate sentence without considering the gravity of the offence.

Sentence Already Undergone After Alteration to Section 304 Part I	After altering the conviction from murder to Section 304 Part I IPC, the Court treated more than eleven and a half years of uninterrupted custody during trial and appeal as sufficient imprisonment. It imposed the period already undergone and a fine of ₹3,000, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default, and directed immediate release if the appellant was not required in another case.	524
Reduction to the Statutory Minimum Applicable to the 2007 Rape Offence	The Court reduced the Section 376 sentence from ten to seven years' rigorous imprisonment, the minimum applicable under the then provision, while retaining the ₹5,000 fine and one year's rigorous imprisonment in default. It affirmed the Section 363 sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment with ₹1,000 fine and three months' rigorous imprisonment in default, and the Section 366 sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment with ₹3,000 fine and six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The substantive sentences were to run concurrently. Bail bonds were cancelled and surrender was directed for the remaining term.	529
Sentence already undergone for simple hurt	After the murder convictions of two appellants were set aside, only their simple-hurt convictions remained. They had served approximately eleven months and twenty-six days against a one-year term. Considering that custody and remission, the Court limited their imprisonment to the period already undergone if the full one-year sentence had not already been completed.	561
Custody undergone after conversion to Section 304 Part I IPC	Following conversion of the murder conviction to Section 304 Part I IPC, the Court considered that the appellant had already served more than ten years. Referring to the statutory alternatives of life imprisonment or a term extending to ten years, it imposed imprisonment already undergone and a fine of Rs. 10,000, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default.	561
Long pendency and a request to reduce sentence to time served	Long passage of time and a short period already spent in custody do not by themselves justify reducing a sentence to time served. The seriousness of the assault, the weapon, the part of the body struck and the injuries remain relevant. The Court found the one-year sentence under Section 324 IPC already lenient and declined to reduce it or the concurrent three-month sentence under Section 323 IPC.	572
Reduction to time served after long pendency in a Section 411 IPC case	The Court reduced the sentence under Section 411 IPC to the three months already served after considering the ten-year interval, the absence of any shown criminal history or habitual offending and the absence of a prescribed minimum sentence. It increased the fine to Rs.5,000, payable within three months, with the original one-year rigorous imprisonment to revive if payment was not made within that period.	574
Long pendency and substantial custody as grounds for conditional sentence reduction	For the 1992 offence under Section 5 of the Explosive Substances Act, the Court proceeded on the absence of a minimum sentence under the provision as applied. More than thirty-one years had elapsed, and the Section 428 CrPC certificate showed ten months and four days of custody against a one-year sentence. The Court reduced imprisonment to the period undergone and enhanced the fine from ₹250 to ₹5,000, payable by 29 February 2024. The reduction was conditional: failure to pay would revive the original prison sentence, with a warrant available to enforce the remaining term.	587
Sentence reduction refused in light of the parallel IPC conviction	Although the then Section 4 POCSO minimum was seven years and counsel relied on custody including remission, the Court refused to reduce the ten-year sentence to the period undergone. It treated the parallel Section 376(1) IPC conviction as carrying a ten-year minimum and relied on that premise to uphold the sentence. It referred to the later 2019 POCSO amendment as removing the disparity, without applying that later amendment retrospectively.	623

51.4 : Sentence Reduction, Custody Period and Long Pendency

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Sentence reduction for long pendency — multiple weapon injuries to vital parts justified the custodial term	Long pendency did not justify reducing the Section 324 IPC sentence to the period already undergone where the assault involved multiple injuries to vital parts of the victims' bodies. The nature of the injuries, the body parts struck and the weapon used justified maintaining the one-year rigorous-imprisonment sentence and fine.	633
Section 302 IPC sentence — custody already undergone did not permit reduction below life imprisonment	Life imprisonment is the minimum sentence for the proved offence under Section 302 IPC. The period already spent in custody therefore did not justify reducing that sentence. The Court also rejected the asserted fourteen-year period because the custody certificate showed approximately eleven years after accounting for the interval spent on bail, and maintained the life sentence.	638
Murder conviction affirmed — life imprisonment as minimum sentence	After affirming the surviving appellant’s conviction for murder with the aid of Section 34 IPC, the Court declined to interfere with the life sentence because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment for that offence. Its sentencing conclusion followed the affirmation of murder liability; it did not treat the absence of proof that the appellant personally delivered the fatal blow as a ground to reduce the punishment below that minimum.	675
Murder sentence — life imprisonment as statutory minimum	After finding the offences under Sections 302 and 302/149 IPC proved beyond reasonable doubt, the Court affirmed the life sentences because life imprisonment was the minimum punishment for murder. The sentencing conclusion followed the upheld murder liability and did not identify a basis for a term below that statutory minimum. The appeal of the appellant who had died had already abated and was not the subject of the surviving merits determination.	678
Sentence already undergone after alteration to Section 304 Part I IPC	Although Section 304 Part I IPC permits life imprisonment, the manner of the incident and more than fourteen years of continuous custody justified a lesser sentence in this case. After altering the conviction from murder, the Court imposed imprisonment already undergone and a fine of ₹1,000, with one month’s rigorous imprisonment in default of payment.	691
Sentence reduction for arson after a long lapse of time	Section 436 IPC prescribes no minimum term and permits imprisonment for life or a term up to ten years, with fine. Considering the approximately thirteen-year lapse since the fire and the complainant's property loss and displacement, the Court reduced imprisonment from five years to two years, while increasing the fine from ₹5,000 to ₹20,000 and retaining three months' default imprisonment.	717
Hurt offences — fine substituted for imprisonment after twenty years, subject to payment	After affirming the convictions under Sections 324/34 and 323/34 IPC, the Court considered that the provisions prescribed no minimum sentence, twenty years had passed, and the incident had arisen from a trivial issue when all three persons were under the influence of liquor. A counter FIR had also been lodged, and the record showed that the appellants had not remained in jail. It replaced the concurrent one-year and six-month rigorous-imprisonment terms with fines of ₹10,000 and ₹1,000 respectively for each appellant. Payment was required by 29 February 2024. Failure to deposit the fines would automatically revive the trial court’s jail sentences, and the trial court was directed to issue arrest warrants to enforce them.	744
Sentence reduced to custody undergone subject to payment of enhanced fines	With Sections 363 and 366-A convictions sustained, the Court substituted approximately one year and twenty-six days already undergone for the three-year rigorous imprisonment on each count and increased each fine from Rs. 500 to Rs. 10,000. Nonpayment within three months would revive the trial sentence and require surrender.	776
Sentence after substitution of Section 376(1) IPC for aggravated rape	After substituting Section 376(1) IPC for the unsupported aggravated conviction, the Court applied the statutory minimum of seven years in force at the time of the offence. Considering the circumstances and the appellant's age	876 of about 21 years at the incident, it imposed seven years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹5,000, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The existing sentences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC were retained, with concurrent service.

Sentence reduction — youth, custody and absence of a statutory minimum	In reducing the sentences under Sections 307 and 329 IPC, the Court considered the appellant's age of about twenty years, his remaining life, the age of the incident, custody since arrest and the absence of a statutory minimum sentence. For each offence, ten years' rigorous imprisonment was reduced to seven years, while the fine was increased to Rs.10,000, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The substantive sentences were directed to run concurrently.	908
Section 307 sentence: substantial custody does not alone justify reduction	The Court refused to reduce the seven-year rigorous-imprisonment sentence to the period already undergone despite approximately four years' aggregate custody. The repeated iron-pipe blows, including seven directed at the head region, and the resulting multiple fractures justified retaining the sentence. The decision turned on the gravity and manner of the proved assault, rather than treating the custody already served as sufficient by itself.	947
Long lapse of time and sentence reduction for fatal negligent driving	The lapse of 32 years and an offer to pay a higher fine did not justify reducing the two-year Section 304-A IPC sentence to custody already undergone. The driver carried passengers in a tractor trolley meant for agricultural produce and turned around to collect fares while driving, losing control and causing two deaths and injuries to seven persons. Applying the deterrent sentencing approach in Saurabh Bakshi, the Court refused unwarranted sympathy. The decision turned on the dangerous manner of driving and its consequences; it did not make delay irrelevant in every case.	965
	Sub-Chapter no. 51.5 Probation and Reformative Sentencing
Section 3 Probation of Offenders Act relief in an Arms Act conviction	On the facts of the case, following Rakesh alias Nanga and taking account of 130 days already spent in custody, the Court maintained the Arms Act conviction but modified the sentence to release after due admonition under Section 3 Probation of Offenders Act. The order directed the applicant not to repeat conduct endangering social peace and provided that, if he was found involved in another offence in future, the benefit would stand withdrawn without further reference to the Court and the remaining jail sentence would have to be served.	267
Individualised probation — limited role, injury site and compliance with bond conditions	Probation may be considered individually despite conviction for a group assault. The Court extended Section 4 probation to the woman appellant who arrived later, used a danda only against one victim's knee, and had not spent time in custody, considering her role, weapon and the part of the body struck. Her convictions remained affirmed. The trial court was to obtain the required bond, and she had to pay ₹5,000 compensation to that victim under Section 5. She had to appear and complete the statutory requirements by 15 February 2024; failure to comply, or violation of the mandatory requirements, would revive the trial court's jail sentence.	491
	Sub-Chapter no. 51.6 Fine, Compensation and Victim Compensation
Compensation and custodial punishment for negligent road deaths	Payment of compensation does not by itself justify reducing a custodial sentence for rash and negligent driving causing death to a token period. Sentencing must also account for the loss suffered by victims and the need for deterrence, with punishment proportionate to the offence.	194
Compensation as a	Payment of compensation cannot by itself justify a custodial sentence that is	519

reason to reduce custody in a fatal-driving case	inadequate for the gravity of a fatal-driving offence. The adopted discussion of Saurabh Bakshi rejected reliance on compensation to reduce imprisonment to 24 days as misplaced sympathy. Financial relief to the victim must not displace the requirement of just and proportionate punishment.
Further Interest on Compensation for Cheque Dishonour Until Payment	Where compensation of Rs. 12,69,000 already included interest at 9% up to the trial judgment, the Court affirmed the compensation and directed that it carry further interest at 9% per annum from the trial judgment dated 23 January 2018 until actual payment. The direction continued interest beyond the period included in the compensation awarded by the trial court.	652
Compensation or a higher fine as a substitute for adequate punishment	An offer of compensation does not invariably justify reducing custody for an offence under Section 304-A IPC regardless of its gravity. Motor Vehicles Act compensation and compensation under Section 357(3) CrPC operate in different spheres and cannot, in every circumstance, substitute for an adequate sentence. The Court adopted this principle from Saurabh Bakshi and its discussion of Guru Basavaraj. In this case, the request was to enhance the fine and reduce custody; the Court rejected it because of the driving conduct and resulting deaths and injuries.	965

Criminal Appeal Jurisdiction and Appellate Review

Sub-Chapter no. 52.1
Appellate Interference with Conviction and Conviction Appeal Review

Attempted corruption — payment stopped after a false municipal work claim	Stopping payment after a complaint did not negate the proved attempted corruption and document offences. The municipal file charged for removal of a pump said already to have been removed, although it remained in the bore; quotations were opened without shown authority, a bill followed shortly after the work order, and no actual measurements supported the completion certificate. The Court found the work unperformed and assessed the officials' coordinated processing and payment recommendations. It affirmed Ajay Pandvia, K.K. Shrivastava and R.B. Shrivastava under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act read with Section 120-B IPC, and Narendra Singh Bhadoria under those provisions and Sections 420, 467, 468 and 471 IPC.	17
Sentence enhancement — declining a late show-cause notice in conviction appeals	Although the Court considered the sentence too lenient, it declined to issue a show-cause notice for enhancement at that late stage. The offences dated from 2003, conviction was in 2013, more than eight years had elapsed, no enhancement notice had been issued when the appeals were admitted, and related trials remained pending. Those circumstances led it to affirm the existing sentences despite its criticism of their leniency.	17
Co-accused's acquittal and parity in a conviction appeal	A co-accused's acquittal does not entitle other accused to acquittal on parity when the evidentiary positions differ. Where witnesses fail to establish the acquitted person's presence but consistently identify the other accused and describe their participation, the evidence against those accused must be assessed on its own merits.	32
Absconding after parole does not permit dismissal of an admitted conviction appeal without deciding its merits	An appeal against conviction already admitted for final hearing must be considered on its merits even if the appellant has absconded after jumping parole. Applying Dhananjay Rai alias Guddu Rai, the Court distinguished a surrender requirement governing admission from an appeal already admitted and heard the appeal on merits despite the appellant's absence from custody.	132
Independent appellate assessment after a separate trial	Where the appellant had been tried separately and evidence had been recorded independently, his appeal had to be decided on the evidence from his own trial. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court delivered a separate judgment despite	157

	hearing connected appeals together and expressly declined to consider evidence recorded in the co-accused's trial.
Merits consideration despite repeated absence of appellate counsel	After the appellant's counsel failed to appear and successive appointed amici also did not appear, the Court proceeded to examine the trial record itself and heard the State's counsel. Relying on Suryabaksh Singh, it decided the conviction appeal on the merits through its own scrutiny of the evidence.	157
Appellate consideration of a ground not raised in the appeal memorandum	On examining the complete trial record in a conviction appeal, the Court could consider the failure to produce the seized contraband even though the appellant had not raised that ground in the appeal memorandum. The admitted omission was assessed as a material issue bearing on proof of recovery and the safety of the conviction.	186
Merits examination when counsel and amicus fail to appear	After the appellant's engaged counsel and the appointed amicus curiae both failed to appear, the Court relied on Surya Baksh Singh and examined the trial record with the Public Prosecutor's assistance. It decided the conviction appeal on the evidence and merits.	219
Hearing a conviction appeal where the appellant's reported death is unverified	After repeated police inquiries failed to authenticate the reported death of an appellant, the Court heard his conviction appeal on merits rather than dismissing it as abated. It did so on counsel's submission that, without authentic verification, the appellant should be treated as alive for deciding the appeal.	227
Sentence for conspiring to transfer an owner's entire agricultural holding	The Court refused sentence reduction despite one appellant's age of about 65 at arrest and the plea that the appellants were merely witnesses and not beneficiaries. Their knowing participation in eight forged deeds intended to deprive the owner of his entire agricultural holding of about 70 bigha justified affirming the five- and seven-year rigorous imprisonment terms and fines imposed by the trial court.	234
Appellate merits review despite a concession on conviction	A criminal appellate court must examine the conviction on merits even where counsel does not challenge it and seeks relief only on sentence. It cannot accept the concession and proceed directly to the proportionality of punishment.	273
Appellate review of witness credibility — need for justified interference	The trial court must assess witness credibility on the whole evidence, and an appellate court should ordinarily have justifiable reasons for revisiting that assessment. Finding that the trial court had appreciated the evidence correctly and that its findings disclosed no illegality or perversity, the Court declined interference with the conviction.	315
Criminal appeal — decision on merits despite absence of counsel and amicus	After neither the appellant's counsel nor the appointed amicus appeared for hearing, the Court examined the record and the grounds of appeal itself and heard the Public Prosecutor, following Surya Baksh Singh. Written submissions later filed for the appellant were taken on record and considered. The appeal was decided on its merits rather than disposed of merely for non-appearance. The course adopted was tied to the recorded opportunities and absences.	328
Exceptional retrial and the prohibition on repairing an unproved prosecution case	Retrial is an exceptional remedy for serious defects that have prevented a real and fair trial, including circumstances beyond a party's control that prevented material evidence being tendered. It is not ordinarily available merely to let the prosecution repair weaknesses in evidence it could have produced or proved earlier. The corrective re-examination here addressed the denial of the accused's presence, rather than a failure by the prosecution to prove its case.	395
Conviction appeal — decision on merits despite repeated absence of counsel	A conviction appeal may be decided on merits after examining the record even when the appellant's counsel repeatedly fails to appear. Applying Surya Baksh Singh, the Court examined the record and grounds of appeal and heard the State after counsel remained absent on successive listings following suspension of sentence. The appellant's absence did not result in dismissal for default or automatic affirmation of the conviction.	480

52.1 : Appellate Interference with Conviction and Conviction Appeal Review

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Section 386(b)(ii) CrPC: alteration of a finding while maintaining sentence	In an appeal against conviction, Section 386(b)(ii) CrPC permits the appellate court to alter a finding while maintaining the sentence. The Court therefore examined the State's contention that the trial court had wrongly disbelieved an eyewitness, even though the State sought to maintain the conviction. After reviewing his evidence, it upheld the trial court's assessment.	553
Appellate reassessment of trial-court witness credibility	After considering the whole evidence, the trial court must form a view on witness credibility. The adopted authority states that an appellate court would ordinarily require justifiable reasons to reassess that view. The Court found the witnesses reliable on material aspects and upheld the trial court's evaluation.	555
Merits review despite a concession accepting conviction	An appellate court must examine the merits of a conviction appeal even when counsel does not challenge conviction and seeks only a reduced sentence. The court cannot accept that concession as a substitute for considering the evidence before deciding the sentence.	572
Declining to reopen an unappealed acquittal after long delay	In the accused's appeal, the Court disapproved the reasons for acquittal under Section 307 IPC but noted that no appeal against that acquittal had been filed. Although it considered issuing a suo motu show-cause notice, it declined to do so because of the long interval since the incident and affirmed the existing convictions and sentences without approving the Section 307 reasoning.	572
Appellate merits review after nonappearance of appointed amicus	Where the appointed amicus did not appear at the hearing, the Court examined the record itself and heard the State before deciding the criminal appeals on their merits. It followed that course expressly in light of the cited Supreme Court decision, rather than disposing of the appeals solely because of nonappearance.	573
Merits disposal of a criminal appeal after counsel's repeated absence	After counsel failed to appear, the Court deferred the hearing with a specific warning that it would examine the record if the absence continued. On the next date, it read the record, heard the State and decided the conviction appeals on their merits rather than dismissing them for default.	574
Independent appraisal of evidence in a first criminal appeal	The first appellate court must apply its own mind to the facts, examine the record and proved documents, and record findings based on an independent assessment. Merely reproducing the trial court's evaluation is insufficient to sustain an appellate decision.	576
Completion of sentence does not make a conviction appeal infructuous	An appeal against conviction under Section 374 CrPC remains to be decided on its merits even after the accused has completed the sentence imposed in that case. The Court therefore heard the appeal notwithstanding completion of the five-year sentences and payment of fines, and examined whether the prosecution had proved the convictions.	604
Conviction appeal after completion of the sentence	An appeal against conviction does not become infructuous merely because the appellant has served the entire sentence. The Court therefore examined the challenge on its merits and affirmed the conviction. The completed sentence required no further custodial action.	616
Conviction appeal: merits review before a sentence-only plea	A request to reduce sentence cannot be decided without first deciding the conviction appeal on merits. Applying Nagpal Traders, the Court independently examined the trial record and the evidence supporting conviction even though counsel confined his submissions to the period already undergone.	623
Unappealed acquittal — passage of nineteen years influenced refusal to reopen Section 307 liability	In the accused's appeal against a Section 324 IPC conviction, the absence of a State appeal against the separate Section 307 acquittal and the passage of more than nineteen years led the High Court to decline a show-cause notice to reopen that acquittal. It sustained the Section 324 conviction while expressly declining to endorse the trial court's erroneous view that non-life-threatening injuries necessarily excluded Section 307.	633
Appellate reassessment of	A trial court must assess witness credibility after considering the entire evidence. An appellate court should not ordinarily reassess that finding without	720

trial-court findings on witness credibility	justifiable reasons. Trivial discrepancies that leave the material prosecution account intact do not by themselves warrant rejection of the evidence.
Refusal of remand after a Section 273 defect in the circumstances of the appeal	After finding that material witnesses had been examined improperly in the appellant's absence and that dock identification was necessary, the Court separately considered whether to remand. It declined to do so because the incident was about ten years old and in view of the nature of the injuries. It set aside the Section 323 IPC convictions on two counts and the Section 354 IPC conviction and acquitted the appellant. The decision against remand turned on those circumstances rather than treating every Section 273 defect as incurable.	835
Appellate power to remedy defective witness examination	The appellate powers under Sections 386 and 391 CrPC include ordering retrial or taking, or directing the taking of, necessary additional evidence. When directing additional evidence under Section 391, reasons must be recorded and the accused or his pleader has a right to be present. The reproduced authority recognises that the lesser course of re-examining witnesses in the accused's presence can remedy earlier defective examination while allowing observation of demeanour and effective cross-examination. That cure differs from using earlier testimony where the Section 299 conditions were absent and the witnesses were no longer available for cross-examination, making prejudice inherent in the circumstances of that precedent.	835
Exceptional retrial and the prohibition on repairing avoidable prosecution omissions	A criminal retrial is an exceptional remedy requiring circumstances such as absence of trial jurisdiction, serious illegality or irregularity leaving no real trial, or inability for reasons beyond a party's control to tender material evidence, together with the interests of justice. It is not ordinarily ordered merely to let the prosecution supply evidence it could have led but failed to produce or prove. Because retrial displaces earlier proceedings and exposes the accused to another trial, it cannot be used simply to repair weaknesses revealed in the prosecution case.	835
Appellate evidentiary assessment and closure of the connected surety proceeding	Trustworthy eyewitness and injured-witness accounts, the medical evidence and the defence witness's admission of her husband's firing supported affirmance of the separate convictions. The Court declined to credit the other family defence witnesses, finding that they testified to save the accused. After dismissing both appeals and cancelling the bonds, it closed the connected Section 446 CrPC proceeding against the surety because no separate order was required in those circumstances.	849
Unchallenged acquittal of the intermediary did not decide the officers' appeals	The intermediary's acquittal had not been challenged and was left undisturbed. The Court nevertheless held that it did not adversely affect the separately established prosecution case against the two officers, whose coordinated demand and directed payment were supported by the other evidence. Their convictions were assessed and affirmed on that evidence.	879
Curing a Section 273 violation by limited re-examination on remand	Recording prosecution evidence in the accused's absence does not invariably require acquittal or a complete retrial. Applying Atma Ram and Chapter XXXV CrPC, the Court treated the violation as curable through fresh examination of the affected witness in the accused's presence, with an effective opportunity to observe and cross-examine. The reproduced distinction from Jayendra Vishnu Thakur concerned unavailable witnesses who could not be re-examined or cross-examined, making prejudice inherent. Here the conviction and sentences were set aside for fresh examination of PW-20 alone; the remaining prosecution and defence evidence was not reopened.	913
Exceptional retrial and the prohibition on repairing an inadequately presented	A complete retrial is an exceptional remedy. The Ukha Kolhe passage reproduced and relied on through Atma Ram identifies such circumstances as lack of trial jurisdiction, serious illegality or irregularity amounting to no real trial, or inability beyond a party's control to tender material evidence, where	913

prosecution	justice requires another trial. Retrial ordinarily cannot be used merely to allow the prosecution to supply evidence it could have produced or properly proved earlier. This limitation supported confining the present remand to fresh examination of the witness affected by the Section 273 violation.
Capital-reference remand and removal of prior conviction findings	A death-sentence reference under Section 366 CrPC continues the trial, obliging the High Court to ensure a fair procedure. The Atma Ram passage explains the broad powers under Sections 366–368 and 386/391 to direct further evidence and appropriate corrective proceedings, including acquittal in a reference without a separate conviction appeal. Here prejudice from absent-accused testimony and the DNA-report/final-argument sequence required setting aside the conviction and all sentences. The Court directed fresh evidence from two doctors and resumption from the report stage. All earlier conviction findings stood removed, and the trial court had to decide anew without being influenced by them, completing the directed exercise within four months.	917
Exceptional retrial and targeted correction of procedural unfairness	The Ukha Kolhe passage adopted through Atma Ram treats a complete retrial as exceptional, appropriate where jurisdictional failure, serious illegality or irregularity has prevented a real trial, or material evidence could not be tendered for reasons beyond a party's control and justice requires another trial. It ordinarily cannot serve merely to repair prosecution omissions that could have been avoided earlier. Where the defect can be corrected, targeted re-examination preserves both the accused's fair-trial rights and the societal interest in adjudication. The Court accordingly confined this remand to the affected medical testimony and the subsequent DNA-report stages.	917
Decision on a conviction appeal when counsel and appointed amici do not appear	After counsel failed to appear, the Court appointed amici curiae. When they also failed to appear at the final hearing, the Court applied Suryabaksh Singh, examined the trial record itself and heard the State. It decided the appeals on their merits, separately assessing the evidence against each appellant and also considering sentence.	934
Merits decision of a conviction appeal despite counsel's non-cooperation	A conviction appeal cannot be dismissed merely for non-prosecution without examining its merits, but the Court is not bound to adjourn because the appellant or counsel is absent or refuses to argue. It may decide the appeal after examining the trial record and judgment. Prudence may favour accommodation for an imprisoned appellant or appointment of counsel at State expense where appropriate. Counsel who accepts the brief owes duties to both the Court and the appellant. After notice of final hearing and repeated opportunities, the Court examined the whole record and the available written submissions and decided the appeals on merits.	936
Merits review of a conviction appeal despite repeated non-appearance	Where appellants released on bail and their counsel repeatedly failed to appear despite notice that final hearing could proceed, the Court applied Surya Baksh Singh, examined the trial record itself and heard the Public Prosecutor. It decided the appeal on the merits, found the charges unproved and set aside the convictions rather than dismissing the appeal for default.	939
Decision of a conviction appeal when counsel and amicus do not appear	When neither the appellants' counsel nor the appointed amicus curiae appeared, the Court examined the trial record itself and heard the State before deciding the conviction appeal on its merits, following Suryabaksh Singh. The appeal was resolved after judicial appraisal of the evidence, rather than by dismissal for non-appearance.	942
Incomplete judgment: limited remand for findings on undecided charges	A judgment that gives neither a conviction nor an acquittal on charged offences concerning distinct victims is incomplete. Here the trial court decided one murder and one attempted murder but left the other charged murder and attempted murder undecided. As no sentence existed on the omitted charges, enhancement proceedings were inappropriate; the defect also did not call for a retrial to cure a procedural lapse. Despite the absence of a State appeal, the High	944

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Court used Section 482 CrPC to remit the matter for findings on the omitted charges. The remand was expressly limited: the existing findings on the decided charges were to remain untouched, and another Additional Sessions Judge was to complete the exercise within three months.
Conviction appeal: appraisal of the particular trial record	A conviction appeal permits reappraisal of the oral and documentary evidence and an independent conclusion on guilt. That review ordinarily remains confined to the record of the particular accused's trial. Evidence from another trial cannot replace it merely because both trials concern the same offence. The qualification for further inquiry or additional evidence under Sections 367 or 391 CrPC, where applicable, remains intact.	944
Acquittal of co-accused with different roles: no automatic parity	Acquittal of co-accused alleged only to have held the deceased's hands did not entitle the appellant to acquittal where consistent eyewitness evidence specifically attributed the knife injuries to him and medical evidence corroborated that account. His culpability was assessed on the evidence of his own role.	971
	Sub-Chapter no. 52.2 Section 391 CrPC — Additional Evidence in Criminal Appeal
Section 391 CrPC — necessity and procedure for additional appellate evidence	An appellant seeking to introduce additional evidence must apply under Section 391 CrPC, establish its necessity for a just decision of the appeal and explain why it was not produced at trial. The appellate court must record reasons before taking the evidence itself or directing that it be taken. Photocopies filed with a printed document list did not satisfy that procedure. Since the appellate court had nevertheless considered the documents, the revisional court also examined whether they were material to a just decision.	137
Section 391 CrPC — appellate evidence where investigation is defective	The authority relied upon by the Court recognises recourse to Section 391 CrPC at the appellate stage to assist truth-finding where investigation is defective, rather than acquitting solely for the investigating agency's omissions. The power remains directed to obtaining and evaluating the relevant evidence; no additional evidence was ordered in these appeals.	319
Limited re-examination to cure a prejudicial procedural irregularity	The High Court's powers in a death reference and conviction appeal permit a focused corrective remand where a prejudicial defect can be cured by re-examining the affected witnesses. Applying Atma Ram, the Court set aside the judgment and sentence and directed fresh examination of the two witnesses whose evidence had been recorded in breach of Section 273 CrPC, instead of ordering acquittal or reopening the entire evidentiary case.	395
DNA report received after judgment: application under Section 391 CrPC	If the DNA report is received after delivery of judgment and the accused is required to file an appeal, the accused may apply to the appellate court under Section 391 CrPC to place the additional material on record. The availability of that application was a reason for refusing to stay judgment; the order did not direct automatic admission of the report or decide a future Section 391 application.	946
	Sub-Chapter no. 52.3 Victim Appeal, State Appeal and Leave to Appeal
No increase in conviction without a State appeal	In the absence of a State counter-appeal, the Court declined to replace Hariom's Section 323 conviction with Section 324 IPC despite its view of the proved firearm injury. It also declined to increase the simple-hurt convictions to all six supported counts. After reducing one existing Section 324/149 count, it confined the final Section 323/149 convictions to three counts.	165 acquittal — reasons may be reviewed without reversing the acquittal	particular attempt-to-murder charge, the Court could not reverse that acquittal in the pending appeals. It could nevertheless reconsider the trial court's reasoning about the defence doctor's evidence when assessing the prosecution case on the charges that remained before it.

Unappealed acquittal left undisturbed where no notice for its reversal had issued	Although the Court found the reasons for acquittal under Section 307 IPC erroneous, it did not convert the Section 324 convictions into convictions for attempted murder in the absence of a State appeal and notice to the appellants. Given the lapse of about 21 years, it declined to issue such notice and left the acquittal undisturbed.	206
Limits of appellate interference with a reasonable acquittal	An appellate court may reassess the evidence but must address the grounds supporting acquittal and identify illegality, perversity or material error that justifies reversal. A mere difference of opinion is insufficient. Where two reasonable views are possible and the trial court’s view favouring the accused is not perverse, its acquittal must stand, reinforced by the presumption of innocence.	226
Conviction on an acquitted charge in the absence of an acquittal appeal	In the absence of an appeal against the acquittal under Section 307/34 IPC, the Court declined to convict the appellants on that charge. It nevertheless assessed the proved firing and cartridge evidence when deciding whether the surviving murder convictions with common intention were sustainable.	274
Acquittal appeal: another possible view is insufficient for reversal	An appellate court should not reverse an acquittal merely because two views of the evidence are possible. Interference requires findings shown to be perverse or contrary to the record. The trial court's rejection of the co-accused's alleged participation was reasonably supported by material omissions and unreliable attribution, so the State's appeal did not warrant reversal.	288
Appellate Review of a Plausible Acquittal	An appellate court may reappraise the whole evidence in an acquittal appeal, but must examine whether the trial court considered the material evidence, committed a legal or factual error, and reached a fairly possible view. A reasonable acquittal cannot be reversed merely because another view is possible; an equally plausible view favouring innocence reinforces reasonable doubt and the presumption of innocence. Reversal requires the appellate court to address and displace the trial court’s reasons by identifying illegality or perversity.	375
Reversal of acquittal for perverse rejection of credible evidence	An appellate court has full power to review the evidence in an acquittal appeal, but must respect the strengthened presumption of innocence and retain a reasonable view favouring the accused where two views are possible. Interference requires perversity or compelling and substantial reasons, including unjustified rejection of relevant, convincing evidence. Here, the trial court rejected reliable eyewitness evidence on insubstantial grounds; that material error justified reversal of acquittal.	583
Insufficient evidence to reverse the acquittal of other accused	The State's appeal against the acquittal of three other accused failed because the prosecution evidence against them was insufficient. The Court affirmed the two appellants' convictions on their own evidentiary record without treating that proof as sufficient to reverse the separate acquittals.	648
Interference with acquittal where two reasonable views are possible	An appellate court must examine whether an acquittal is perverse or otherwise unsustainable, including through ignoring relevant evidence, relying on inadmissible material or placing the burden incorrectly. It should not replace a reasonable acquittal merely because another view appears more probable. Acquittal reinforces the presumption of innocence. Since the State showed no perversity and the substantive prosecution account remained unproved, the Court affirmed the acquittals.	716
Acquittal based on enmity reconsidered where injured-	Enmity did not justify the acquittal of an accused whose participation in the axe or lathi assault was established by consistent injured-witness evidence	753

witness evidence is medically supported	supported by medical findings. On that basis, the Court partly allowed the State's appeal and convicted the previously acquitted accused under Section 324 IPC, while the broader allegation of a shared murderous object was not accepted.
Acquittal based on enmity reconsidered where injured-witness evidence is medically supported	Enmity did not justify the acquittal of an accused whose role in the axe or lathi assault was established by consistent injured-witness evidence supported by medical findings. That evidentiary basis led the Court to partly allow the State's appeal and convict the previously acquitted accused under Section 324 IPC. The Court did not accept the broader case of a shared object to murder.	754
Leave to appeal against acquittal — no interference merely because another view is possible	The Court refused leave under Section 378(3) CrPC to appeal against the Section 323 IPC acquittal because no perversity in the trial court's findings was shown. The possibility of two views did not justify displacing the view favouring the accused. In the circumstances, it also regarded the complaint as an attempt to give a criminal character to the land dispute after an adverse civil appellate decree.	899
Reversal of acquittal based on perverse factual assumptions and improper evidence	An appellate court may reappraise the entire evidence in an acquittal appeal but must respect a reasonably possible view favouring the accused. It may interfere where the acquittal rests on material factual errors, findings without evidentiary support or a failure properly to appreciate the record. Applying Sambhaji Hindurao Deshmukh, Bhim Singh and State of Punjab v. Ajaib Singh, the Court reversed an acquittal founded on untested defence affidavits and assumptions inconsistent with the work estimate and spot record. Its decision followed a fresh assessment of the evidence, rather than merely preferring another possible view.	914
Acquittal appeal: full review and restraint where the trial court's view is reasonable	An appellate court may review all questions of fact and law in an appeal against acquittal; expressions such as compelling reasons do not curtail that power. It must nevertheless account for the presumption of innocence reinforced by acquittal. Where two reasonable conclusions are possible, the trial court's view favouring the accused should remain undisturbed unless shown to be perverse, unreasonable or unsupported by the record. Applying the quoted authorities, including Nandu Vishwakarma and its Chandrappa passage, the Court found the acquittal plausible in view of material FIR omissions, inconsistent testimony and the absence of stones in the site and seizure record, and dismissed the State's appeal.	916
Acquittal appeal: full evidence review and substantial grounds for interference	An appellate court may review the evidence underlying an acquittal while respecting the strengthened presumption of innocence and a reasonable view favouring the accused. Ignoring admissible, relevant evidence or reaching a clearly unreasonable conclusion may justify interference; the mere possibility of another view does not. Applying Gorle S. Naidu, the Court independently assessed this record and upheld the rejection of the claimed eyewitnesses. It dismissed the State's appeal while correcting the unsupported private-defence rationale, preserving the acquittal on failure of proof.	919
Interference with acquittal based on a perverse assessment of evidence	An appellate court may reappreciate the entire evidence, but must respect a reasonable view supporting acquittal where two views are possible. It cannot reverse an acquittal merely because it prefers another conclusion. Interference is justified where the trial court makes wrong assumptions about material facts, fails to appreciate the evidence or reaches a conclusion that is perverse or unsupported by the record. Here, treating the respondent's role as confined to inviting quotations ignored his further approvals and the documentary record.	920

Cross-Appeals, Cross-Cases and Connected Criminal Appeals

Separate trials — evidence assessed on	Where co-accused were tried separately and evidence was recorded separately,	19

each trial's own record	the conviction appeals must be assessed on the respective trial records. The common appellate judgment did not merge the evidence from Saurabh's trial with the separately recorded evidence in the trial of Ajju and Raghvendra. The Court expressly applied A.T. Mydeen in keeping those evidentiary assessments separate.
Cross-cases — separate evidence and simultaneous hearing	Each cross-case must be decided on its own merits using the evidence recorded in that case. Evidence from one case cannot be used as evidence in the other. The trials, or the appeals arising from them, should be conducted or heard simultaneously, while the evidence in each is analysed separately.	331
Cross-Cases: Same-Judge and Same-Day Decision	Cross-cases should be heard by the same judge and decided on the same day, with each case assessed on its own evidence and arguments. Applying Nathilal, the Court pronounced separate judgments in the connected appeals. In this record it also referred to an accused's admission and its finding in the cross-case to avoid contradictory findings about the occurrence, distinguishing an admission from the evidence led there.	360
Effect of the Acquittal in the Counter-Case on the Present Defence	The defence relied on the counter-case to assert that the complainant side had been the aggressor and that the appellants' individual acts should receive separate treatment. The Court noted the State's statement that the counter-case accused had been acquitted and no appeal had followed, and declined to give the appellants a benefit on that ground. It nevertheless determined liability in the present appeal from the evidence of the two successive attacks.	388
Cross-cases— simultaneous hearing and separate evidentiary records	Cross-cases must be decided on their own records and merits; evidence recorded in one cannot be used in the other. The trials, or appeals, should be taken up simultaneously, with each receiving its own decision. The Court accordingly reserved the cross-appeal for a separate judgment.	412
Separately tried co-accused — Independent assessment of each trial record	An appeal arising from a co-accused's separate trial must be decided on the evidence led in that trial. Although Kallu's appeal was heard alongside the present appeals, the Court reserved it for a separate judgment because its evidence required independent appreciation.	474
Separate trial records in simultaneously heard criminal appeals	Evidence led in one accused's trial cannot be read for or against a co-accused tried separately, or vice versa. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court kept the evidence in Pappu's trial separate from that in Phulle's later trial. Although their appeals were heard simultaneously, the Court delivered separate judgments to avoid confusion between the records.	605
Simultaneous hearing and same-day judgments in related criminal cross-cases	Following Nathilal, the Bench heard the present acquittal appeal, the related conviction appeals and the appeal arising from the cross-case together and pronounced their judgments on the same day. Each appeal remained separately decided; the coordinated hearing did not turn evidence or findings from another case into proof of the respondents' guilt in this appeal.	916
Coordinated hearing of appeals arising from criminal cross-cases	Following Nathilal, the Court heard the present acquittal appeal with the related appeals arising from the cross-case and pronounced judgment on the same day. The present adjudication remained confined to the respondent against whom leave to appeal had been granted; leave had been refused in respect of the other nine acquitted persons.	919
Separate appellate judgment where a co-accused was tried on separately recorded evidence	Where an absconding co-accused was tried later and the evidence in his trial was recorded separately, his appeal was heard analogously but required a separate judgment. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court distinguished that appeal from the appeals arising from the common earlier trial.	934
Separate trial records in connected conviction appeals	Evidence recorded in the trial of some accused cannot be read against co-accused who were tried separately. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court decided the four appeals arising from the common trial together, but reserved separate	936 judgments for the appeals of the two accused who had been arrested and tried later.

Chapter no. 53
Criminal Revision, Reference and Supervisory Correction

Sub-Chapter no. 53.1
Reference and Supervisory Criminal Correction

Collateral prosecution directions against witnesses outside the issues tried	In a trial concerning a fatal shooting during a municipal demolition, the Sessions Court could not decide the collateral legality of the demolition and direct prosecution and departmental action against municipal officials and others on that basis. Those matters were outside the charges tried, and the directions were not complaints under Section 340 CrPC concerning false evidence. The High Court set aside the collateral directions under Section 482 CrPC while leaving the acquittal's merits to the pending State appeal.	37
Magistrate's lack of power to review dismissal of a criminal complaint	After dismissing the criminal complaint for non-prosecution, the Magistrate could not review that order merely because counsel offered on the same day to supply the missing documents. The High Court accepted the bar under Section 362 CrPC, applying Adalat Prasad, while separately considering relief under its inherent jurisdiction.	126
Limits of supervisory correction of supported findings	Supervisory jurisdiction does not permit appellate reappreciation or reweighing of evidence, or correction of every factual or legal error where the ultimate finding is justified. It is exercised sparingly to correct grave dereliction of duty, flagrant abuse, violation of fundamental principles, findings unsupported by any evidence or perversity causing miscarriage of justice.	237
Reasons Required for Supervisory Interference With a Recall Order	The Shiv Kumar Yadav passage relied upon by the Court states that interference under Article 227 or Section 482 CrPC requires sparing exercise supported by reasons identifying patent error or gross injustice. A court cannot uphold the trial court's reasons yet overturn its refusal merely by invoking a fair opportunity in general terms.	385
Death-reference proceedings as a continuation of trial	A reference under Section 366 CrPC continues the trial and requires the High Court to ensure fair procedure and freedom from prejudice caused by procedural lapses. Under Sections 367 and 368, its powers include further inquiry, additional evidence, a new trial and acquittal, even without a substantive conviction appeal. Those powers supported the limited re-examination ordered here.	395
Revisional remand — premature findings must not prejudice the fresh Section 145 inquiry	Where a possession order has been set aside and the case remanded for evidence and hearing, the earlier findings do not survive as operative findings. Without a finding of the date of dispossession, a revisional observation approving eviction under Section 145 CrPC is premature. The fresh inquiry must determine that date and then decide whether the statutory time requirement is satisfied, uninfluenced by the premature observation.	703
Trial court action on conscious disobedience of its preservation order	A trial court must address deliberate suppression of material it has ordered preserved. Police cannot be excused from producing the record or accounting for its absence. The Court held that conscious concealment despite the preservation order warranted a contempt reference and directed the trial judge to initiate contempt proceedings against the then SP. This required commencement of the appropriate process, rather than constituting a final conviction for contempt.	769
Individual findings before proceeding against subordinate officers	Responsibility for a false compliance statement must be examined officer by officer. The former SHO had promptly sought preservation and might not have known that the SP received the records; the Court passed no present stricture, leaving his role open to detailed inquiry. The trial court could proceed against	769

	him after a specific finding about communication of receipt. It was also left to consider action against the current SHO for the false unavailability reply. Neither officer received an unconditional final exoneration.
Conditional inquiry into inaccurate trial-court order sheets	Where three handwritten order sheets listed the case for evidence although charges had not yet been framed, the Court directed the Principal District and Sessions Judge to inquire into how those entries had been written and signed. If judicial negligence was found, the report was to be placed before the Chief Justice for administrative action. If the clerk was found responsible for incorrect entries, departmental proceedings were to be initiated. The proceedings were to conclude within two months. These directions depended on the inquiry's findings.	775
Judicial discipline when related High Court proceedings on withheld evidence remain pending	A trial court aware of pending High Court proceedings concerning deliberate withholding of material evidence must respect those proceedings and the orders already passed. In the circumstances, it should have awaited their outcome before rejecting the request for further investigation. By ignoring those orders and refusing permission, the trial court sought to nullify the High Court's directions and violated judicial discipline.	911
High Court powers to cure trial defects in a death-sentence reference	Under Sections 366–368 CrPC, a death sentence requires High Court confirmation. The High Court may direct further inquiry or additional evidence and may acquit even without a separate appeal against conviction; confirmation proceedings continue the trial. Sections 386 and 391 also confer broad appellate powers concerning retrial and further evidence. As explained in the relied-upon Atma Ram passage, these powers permit a lesser, targeted fresh examination where appropriate. In this combined reference and appeal, the Court set aside the conviction and sentences and remanded for examination of PW-20, leaving guilt and sentence for fresh decision.	913
	Sub-Chapter no. 53.2 Precedent Discipline in High Court Criminal Proceedings
Respect for the earlier High Court order quashing Section 319 summons	The trial court's earlier Section 319 CrPC order against the applicant and others had been quashed by the High Court. In setting aside the later prosecution and departmental directions, the High Court relied on the trial court's disregard of that decision, together with its findings on matters outside the trial and the unwarranted adverse remarks. The ruling does not establish a general bar against every subsequent proceeding after a Section 319 order is quashed.	37
Coordinate-bench compromise order — per incuriam for overlooking controlling law	The Court declined to follow Pankaj Parmar's compromise-based quashing order because it had not considered the controlling Supreme Court decisions in Madanlal, Laxmi Narayan and Shimbhu, the relevant Vikash Kumar discussion, POCSO's status as a protective special statute, or Section 375 Sixthly IPC. The coordinate order was treated as per incuriam for those identified omissions and did not justify quashing the present rape and POCSO proceedings.	58
Baldev Singh and Ravindra — fact-specific sentence reductions are not binding precedents	The Madanlal passage relied upon, following Shimbhu, confines the compromise-related sentence reductions in Baldev Singh and Ravindra to their own facts and states that they are not binding precedents. Those outcomes therefore do not support a general rule of leniency in rape cases on the basis of settlement, later marriage or the age of the case.	58
Coordinate Bench ruling overlooking controlling Supreme Court authority	A coordinate Bench ruling is per incuriam on an issue when it overlooks the controlling Supreme Court decision on that issue. The Court declined to follow Abhishek Pandey on treating a cruelty FIR lodged after divorce proceedings as a counterblast, because that ruling had not considered Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi. The finding of per incuriam concerned this identified issue.	101
Coordinate-bench ruling overlooking	The Court declined to follow Abhishek Pandey @ Ramji Pandey on the divorce-counterblast contention because that coordinate-bench decision had not	163

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Supreme Court authority	considered the governing Supreme Court judgment in Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi. It treated the cited decision as per incuriam on that issue.
Reasons supporting a judicial conclusion	A judicial order must disclose the material facts, issues, submissions, applicable law and reasons supporting its findings. Reasons show whether the court has applied its mind. The unexplained conclusion in Smt. Sudha Gupta that inducement was absent did not resolve the issue in this case; the Court examined the meaning of property and the effect of registration for itself.	164
Limits of an earlier order concerning some rescued children	An earlier order passed on a petition by parents of some rescued children could not be applied to every child rescued from the institution. The Court therefore examined the remaining children's circumstances and the records showing children in need of care and protection.	277
Reliance on an Earlier Order Granting Good-Faith Immunity	The Court declined to extend the benefit of an earlier coordinate-Bench order that had quashed proceedings by referring to Section 28 protection without examining the facts in detail or finding that the officers had acted in good faith. The earlier result did not establish the factual basis for immunity in the present prosecution.	387
Fresh summons after restoration do not reopen cognizance already upheld by a coordinate Bench	Fresh summons issued merely to implement restoration of a complaint do not amount to taking cognizance afresh. The coordinate Bench had set aside the revisional order on territorial jurisdiction and restored the complaint. The Magistrate's consequential summons therefore created no fresh cause for revision, and the applicants could not again challenge the original cognizance order under Section 482 CrPC after it had been upheld by that Bench. Both the later revision and the renewed inherent-powers application were misconceived.	425
Pending larger-bench reference does not by itself displace an operative judgment	While acknowledging the reference concerning inferential proof of corruption offences without the complainant's direct evidence, the Court stated that an existing judgment continues to hold the field until set aside. It therefore applied the available authorities rather than treating the reference itself as a final decision of the disputed issue.	441
Coordinate-Bench Parole Decision Treated as Per Incuriam	The Court held the coordinate-Bench decision in Budh Singh Baghel v. State of M.P., MCRC No. 18164/2020, dated 23 July 2020, to be per incuriam on the maintainability of regular bail during parole without surrender. It reasoned that the earlier decision relied on Kanaksinh Mohansinh Mangrola, a temporary-bail case, without accounting for the distinction between interim bail and parole, and had not considered the effect of Section 31-A(4) of the Prisoners Act. The ruling was confined to the parole-and-surrender issue before the Court.	657
Judicial discipline — reported and unreported High Court decisions	A subordinate judicial forum cannot disregard a High Court decision merely because it is unreported. The Court reaffirmed its earlier ruling that a tribunal’s distinction between reported and unreported High Court judgments violated judicial discipline.	897

Criminal Revision — Scope, Limits and Interlocutory Bar

Challenge to rejection of a Section 156(3) application — hearing the prospective accused	Although persons named as accused have no right to participate in the complaint before summons are issued, they acquire a right to be heard when the complainant challenges rejection of a Section 156(3) CrPC application in a superior court. Applying Manharibhai and the hearing principle reproduced from Atul Pandey, the Court treated failure to implead those persons in the Section 482 challenge as an additional reason to refuse interference.	55
Rejection of a Section 156(3) application — revisable order	The conclusion reproduced from Atul Pandey and relied upon by the Court treats an order rejecting a Section 156(3) CrPC request for police registration and investigation as an order that is not interlocutory. It is therefore open to criminal revision under Section 397, in which the prospective accused must have an opportunity to be heard before a decision is taken.	55

53.3 : Criminal Revision — Scope, Limits and Interlocutory Bar

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Hearing the proposed accused in revision against dismissal of a complaint	Although a person named as accused cannot participate before process issues in a complaint case, dismissal of the complaint in limine creates a right in that person's favour. If the complainant challenges that dismissal in revision, the proposed accused becomes a necessary party. The Court used that distinction to explain why hearing rights depend on the procedural stage.	169
Concurrent findings of negligence in criminal revision	Concurrent factual findings supporting a conviction for rash and negligent driving do not warrant revisional interference where they are neither perverse nor contrary to the record. The High Court found that the evidence supported the findings identifying the accused as the wrong-side driver who caused the collision.	194
Acquittal not disturbed in revision where no perversity was shown	The complainant's revision against acquittal failed where no perversity in the trial court's findings was identified. The Court applied the principle that, where the evidence reasonably permits both guilt and innocence, the view favourable to the accused should prevail, recognising that acquittal strengthens the presumption of innocence.	207
Concurrent factual findings require demonstrated perversity for revisional interference	The High Court declined to interfere in revision with the trial and appellate courts' concurrent factual finding that the firearm was seized from the applicant. Revisional interference required the finding to be shown perverse, and the applicant identified no such perversity. The revision was dismissed at admission.	257
Limited revisional interference with concurrent findings of fact	Jurisdiction under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC is exercised to correct patent defects and jurisdictional errors. Concurrent findings of fact may be disturbed where they are perverse or contrary to the record. The revisional court does not reanalyse evidence merely because another view is possible. Applying Bir Singh, the Court affirmed the concurrent findings because no perversity was shown.	261
Revisional direction: Magistrate must independently identify offences	While sustaining interference with dismissal of the complaint, the Court disapproved a revisional direction requiring cognizance of specified offences. The Magistrate was directed to decide independently which offences were made out, without being influenced by that direction, and could consider offences not specified by the revisional court.	281
Reasoned remand in revision against a process order	A revisional court must identify a proper reason for remand; it cannot send a complaint back merely for reconsideration of the same material and rewriting of the order. Here meticulous reappraisal to discharge the accused from the SC/ST counts was impermissible at the process stage, and no reason was given for remanding the IPC counts. The entire revisional order was therefore set aside.	296
Territorial-jurisdiction observations concerning a co-accused who had not sought revision	The High Court faulted the revisional court for making territorial-jurisdiction observations concerning Devendra Kumar Vijaywat when he had not challenged the process order in revision. That defect formed part of the reasons for setting aside the revisional order. The decision did not finally determine territorial jurisdiction on the complaint's merits.	296
Sections 397 and 401 CrPC — concurrent findings of fact and perversity	In revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC, concurrent findings of fact cannot be disturbed unless shown to be perverse. Since no perversity was demonstrated in the concurrent findings supporting the conviction, the Court declined interference.	312
Reconsideration after revisional remand — no prohibited review	When the revisional court sets aside dismissal of a complaint and remands it for fresh consideration, the Magistrate's renewed appreciation of the material gives effect to the remand and does not review an operative earlier order. The former order has merged in the revisional decision. Reappreciating the existing material is sufficient; additional evidence is not required merely because the Magistrate reaches a different view on remand.	314

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Revision against charges — selective production of the charge sheet	An applicant challenging charges cannot seek a full appraisal of the prosecution material while producing only selected charge-sheet documents and withholding relevant witness statements. The Court considered the objections on the alleged facts and available record, avoided a detailed assessment that could prejudice trial, and required the trial court to decide on the evidence without being influenced by the provisional observations.	318
Revision against charge order — final proof of guilt is unnecessary	In revision against an order framing charge, the inquiry is whether the available material raises strong suspicion that the accused committed an offence which could be proved at trial. The court cannot require a finding of certain guilt at this stage. Where the allegations taken at face value furnished prima facie material for Sections 354 and 323/34 IPC, the High Court declined interference under Sections 397/401 CrPC.	330
Revisional scrutiny of concurrent conviction findings	Sections 397 and 401 CrPC confer restricted supervisory jurisdiction to examine correctness, legality, propriety and procedural regularity. The appellate powers available under Section 401 serve that purpose; revision is not a second factual appeal. Concurrent findings are not reopened through wholesale reappraisal without serious legal infirmity, perversity or failure of justice. Examining the impersonated co-owner's sale-deed case within those limits, the Court found no perversity and maintained the Section 467 IPC conviction.	444
Sentence-only submissions do not dispense with scrutiny of conviction	A court cannot accept counsel's decision not to challenge conviction as a substitute for examining the merits and proceed directly to sentence reduction. Applying Nagpal Traders and its narrated Jeetu principle, the Court examined the conviction despite sentence-only submissions. Because the proceedings were revisions, that examination remained subject to the restricted supervisory standard rather than a fresh factual appeal.	444
Suo Motu Revision Despite a Request to Withdraw the Challenge	The Court refused withdrawal of the challenge to the juvenile declaration because it involved an important question of fact and law and could be examined in suo motu revision. It proceeded to decide the age-determination issue after hearing counsel.	452
Remand of a dismissed complaint for further evidence — Conflicting material documents	Where two mutually inconsistent documents have a material bearing on the alleged forgery, the revisional court may set aside dismissal of the complaint and remit the matter to permit further oral and documentary evidence. The conflicting death certificates directly affected whether the testatrix could have executed the disputed will. Remand for further evidence was therefore justified without deciding which document was genuine.	470
Criminal revision — concurrent findings of rash and negligent driving	A revisional court does not reappraise evidence and substitute its own factual view for concurrent trial and appellate findings merely because another view is possible. Interference requires perversity, findings contrary to the record or jurisdictional error. Here the rider’s account of a rear impact during a traffic jam was not challenged by suggesting sudden entry onto the road or negligence on his part, and another witness described the truck’s high speed. Even on the suggested sudden-entry account, the truck driver remained obliged to drive attentively. No perversity was shown in the concurrent findings under Sections 279 and 304-A IPC.	485
Criminal revision — interference with concurrent findings requires recognised error	Under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC, the High Court does not substitute its own factual findings for concurrent findings merely because they may be erroneous. Applying Bir Singh, the Court stated that interference is warranted where findings are perverse or contrary to law, or the court lacked jurisdiction to try the offence. No such defect was shown in the concurrent Section 498-A IPC findings, and the Court declined to admit the revision and affirmed the conviction and sentence.	487
Revision of a process	The revisional court exceeded its jurisdiction by meticulously assessing the	559

order: no final appraisal of disputed evidence	preliminary complaint evidence as though deciding the trial. Whether the handwriting expert's opinion could be relied upon was a matter for trial, along with the disputed evidence about execution of the power of attorney. The High Court set aside the revisional dismissal and restored the Magistrate's process order, without deciding whether the document was forged or whether the respondents were guilty.
Revision against cognizance and summoning orders	An order taking cognizance and issuing summons is revisable when allowing the accused's objection would terminate the proceedings; such an order is not merely interlocutory under Section 397(2) CrPC. An additional ground may be raised in revision against cognizance. The petitioners' proposed reliance on outside documents did not, on examination of those documents, justify bypassing revision under Sections 397 and 401. Their Article 226 petition was dismissed with liberty to approach the Sessions Court.	613
Revision against a charge order — strong-suspicion inquiry does not require certainty of guilt	In revisional scrutiny under Section 397 CrPC at the charge stage, the inquiry concerns material supporting a strong suspicion that the accused committed an offence which could be proved at trial. The court must not apply the final test of guilt or require certainty of conviction. Where the charge-stage standard is met and disputed credibility issues require trial, the charge order discloses no jurisdictional error warranting interference.	635
Revisional Interference With Concurrent Findings in a Cheque-Dishonour Case	A revisional court does not reanalyse and reinterpret evidence to displace concurrent factual findings in the absence of perversity. Applying the narrated reasoning in Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar and its reference to Southern Sales and Services v. Sauermilch Design and Handels GMBH, the Court also recognised the requirement of a jurisdictional error for interference with an order of a court having jurisdiction. The concurrent findings on execution of the cheque, the debt and rejection of the drawer's defence supplied no ground for revisional interference.	652
Surrender for post-conviction revision and exceptional exemption	Rule 48 of Chapter X of the M.P. High Court Rules does not extinguish the High Court's inherent power to exempt a convicted applicant from surrender in an exceptional situation. A revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC may be registered despite the surrender requirement, but an exceptional case for exemption must be established. Past COVID-19 illness, the wife's diabetes and thyroid treatment, and an agreed opportunity to repay the amount did not establish such a situation. In the absence of surrender or grounds for exemption, the revision was dismissed as not maintainable, with liberty to file afresh after surrender.	723
Revisional interference with concurrent findings of fact	A revisional court does not reanalyse evidence to substitute its view for concurrent findings unless they are perverse or contrary to the record. Applying Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar, the Court also reiterated that an erroneous order passed by a competent court does not by itself justify revision in the absence of jurisdictional error. As the injured witness's testimony was corroborated by medical evidence and no perversity was shown, the concurrent conviction was affirmed.	752
Revision against framed charges — strong suspicion rather than proof of certain guilt	In revisional review of a charge order, the question is whether material supports strong suspicion of an offence that could be proved at trial. The final test of guilt is not applied at that stage. Following Fatehkaran Mehdu, the Court declined interference because sufficient material warranted framing charges. It expressly confined its observations to that preliminary assessment and preserved the applicant's right to raise all lawful defences before the trial court.	758
Revisional interference with factual findings requires perversity	While exercising revisional jurisdiction, the High Court cannot interfere with factual findings recorded by the courts below unless they are perverse. No perversity was shown in the concurrent findings identifying the applicant as the driver and establishing rash and negligent driving. After checking the	777

	supporting evidence, the High Court affirmed the convictions and sentences and dismissed the revision.
Revisional review of an appeal dismissed as time-barred	Where a conviction appeal was dismissed as time-barred without consideration of its merits, revision against that dismissal was confined to the propriety of refusing condonation. The High Court could not examine the merits to reduce the sentence to the period already undergone. Applying Nagpal Traders v. Davinder Singh, the Court stated that sentence cannot be considered until the merits of the case have been examined.	780
Revisional review of an order framing charge	At the stage of reviewing a framed charge under Section 397 CrPC, the inquiry concerns material supporting strong suspicion of an offence capable of proof at trial. The reviewing court does not apply the final test of guilt or require a conclusion that the accused is certainly guilty.	799
Revisional scrutiny of a charge-stage order—limits on evaluating disputed documents	A revisional court exceeds its jurisdiction when, at the preliminary stage, it conducts a roving inquiry into the truth of prosecution allegations and the correctness or genuineness of charge-sheet documents. Here, requiring handwriting-expert verification before allowing the Section 409 IPC case to proceed improperly displaced the allegations in the FIR and Section 161 statement. The revisional order substituting a Section 406 trial was quashed, and committal to the Sessions Court was directed.	812
Revisional interference with concurrent findings requires perversity or findings contrary to the record	The High Court cannot interfere in revision with concurrent findings of fact unless they are perverse or contrary to the record. After examining both prosecution and defence evidence as a measure of caution, the Court found no such defect in the concurrent findings of guilt and declined to interfere.	852
Criminal revision — interference with concurrent findings requires perversity	In a revision against concurrent findings of conviction, the High Court does not interfere with findings of fact unless they are perverse. In this revision filed under Sections 438 and 442 BNSS, the Court applied the standard stated under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC. Having considered the challenged recovery and identification evidence, it found no perversity warranting interference.	905
Merger of a cognizance order in the revisional decision	Where the accused challenges a cognizance order in revision and the revision is dismissed on merits, the original order merges in the revisional decision. A subsequent Section 482 CrPC application must therefore challenge the revisional order as well. An assertion that the entire criminal proceeding has been challenged does not cure the omission. This was an independent ground for refusing interference.	924
Revisional interference with findings of fact requires demonstrated perversity	In criminal revision, the High Court cannot interfere with findings of fact unless they are shown to be perverse. As the conviction findings were not challenged and no perversity was identified, the Court affirmed the convictions under Sections 279, 304-A, 337 and 338 IPC and considered the sentencing request separately.	965
Challenge to dismissal of complaint: revisional hearing right of suspects	Although a suspect has no right to be heard before issue of process in the initial complaint inquiry, section 401(2) CrPC requires an opportunity to defend a section 203 dismissal when the complainant challenges it in revision and reversal may revive the complaint. In this section 482 case, the High Court nevertheless proceeded without notice because it confined its intervention to correction of non-compliance with earlier directions and procedure, without deciding the complaint's merits.	975

Adverse Judicial Strictures in Criminal Proceedings — Prior Hearing and Corrective Remand

Adverse judicial remarks: hearing,	Before making adverse remarks against a person, the Court must consider whether the person had an opportunity to explain or defend the conduct,	37

evidence and necessity	whether evidence justifies the remarks, and whether addressing that conduct is necessary as an integral part of deciding the case. Judicial language must remain restrained even where criticism is justified. Reputation is protected by Article 21, and remarks affecting it require observance of fair hearing. Unnecessary strictures against persons who were not heard may be set aside.
Adverse judicial strictures — hearing, evidentiary support and necessity to the decision	Before making disparaging findings, the court must consider whether the affected person is before it or has an opportunity to explain, whether the record justifies the criticism, and whether the remarks are necessary as an integral part of the decision. Castigating remarks with serious consequences require an opportunity of hearing. Reputation is protected by Article 21; judicial criticism must therefore remain restrained and necessary, with sober language even where criticism is justified.	78
Prior hearing before adverse judicial strictures against an officer	Before making adverse remarks about an officer's integrity that may affect reputation or career, the Court must give an opportunity to answer the proposed strictures. Applying Manish Dixit and the reproduced Dilip Kumar Deka principle, the Division Bench set aside the remarks made without notice. It treated the earlier reasons as a prima facie show-cause notice, allowed one month for a reply and remanded only the question of adverse remarks and possible DGP referral. Those reasons were not findings of guilt; the fresh decision had to consider the prosecution lapses and the officer's defence. Existing bail remained intact, and writ-appeal maintainability was left undecided.	596
Judicial criticism: restraint and dignified language even where correction is justified	Judicial opinions must use sober, moderate and restrained language. Even justified criticism does not permit intemperate or derogatory remarks unnecessary to decide the issue. A superior court correcting a judicial officer's order must maintain dispassionate reasoning and restraint; appropriate reformative measures may be taken on the administrative side.	864

Suspension of Sentence, Remission, Parole, Furlough, Execution and Post-Conviction Custody

Sub-Chapter no. 54.1
Suspension of Sentence Pending Appeal

Suspension of sentence — insolvency objection to an appellate deposit condition	Where the sole challenge to a deposit condition for suspension of a Section 138 NI Act sentence rested on the asserted insolvency moratorium, the Court upheld the condition for the same reason that initiation of insolvency proceedings did not displace the cheque signatory's criminal liability. The moratorium objection did not justify removing the deposit requirement imposed in the pending appeal.	54
Unstayed corruption conviction — service and retirement consequences despite suspension of sentence	Suspension of imprisonment pending appeal does not stay the conviction or remove its adverse service consequences. Where the public servant's corruption conviction remained unstayed, termination under the cited Madhya Pradesh service rules was upheld, and the claim to provisional pension and gratuity was rejected. The relied-upon authority permits action following conviction without awaiting the appeal; if the employee is later acquitted, the service order can be reconsidered; if reinstated, the employee is entitled to the benefits he would have received had he continued in service.	333
Section 389(1) CrPC — exceptional suspension of conviction and disclosure of disqualification	Section 389(1) CrPC permits suspension of an order of conviction in very exceptional cases, separately from suspension of sentence. Filing an appeal does not itself justify that relief. The applicant must specifically disclose the disqualification or other consequence sought to be avoided, so that the appellate court can consider all ramifications and record reasons directed to that consequence.	333
Corruption	For a public servant convicted of corruption, the appellate or revisional court	333

conviction — public interest against suspension to retain public office	should not suspend the conviction merely to enable continuation in public office while the challenge remains pending, even though imprisonment is suspended. The public-interest principle applied is that the disability flowing from the conviction should continue until judicial exoneration.
	Sub-Chapter no. 54.2 Remission, Premature Release and Sentence Execution
Life sentence subject to the State's premature-release policy	Affirming life imprisonment did not make the sentence one without remission. The Court left the State free to apply its premature-release policy. If release had already been granted under that policy, no further action was required; otherwise the convict was to undergo the remaining sentence. More than fourteen years of actual custody was not treated as an automatic release order.	183
Remission ineligibility upon two life sentences under the circular dated 22 September 2022	Applying the circular dated 22 September 2022, the Court treated the appellant, who had received life imprisonment in two cases and whose earlier conviction appeal had been dismissed, as ineligible for remission. He was directed to undergo the remaining sentence.	934
	Sub-Chapter no. 54.3 Post-Conviction Custody, Surrender and Jail Compliance
Conviction revision — exceptional exemption from surrender	A revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC may be registered despite a High Court rule requiring surrender, and the High Court retains inherent power to exempt surrender in exceptional circumstances on a case being made out. Applying Vivek Rai and referring to Deepak Sahu, the Court considered whether an exceptional situation existed. Merely asserting that the CrPC contains no surrender mandate and that the applicant had been on bail during trial and appeal did not establish one. He had failed to surrender after appellate affirmance despite repeated opportunities to file a surrender certificate. The Court refused exemption and dismissed this revision as not maintainable.	489
Acquittal in one case does not displace custody under another sentence	Setting aside a conviction in the case under appeal does not justify release where the accused remains imprisoned under an independent life sentence in another case. Although the appellants were acquitted of all charges in this appeal, the Court declined to direct their release because the trial-court communication established that they were serving life imprisonment in another crime.	604
Proof of compounding-cost deposit before release	Where acquittal on compounding is expressly conditional on deposit of costs, the release direction remains subject to compliance with that condition. Here, the trial court could issue the release order only on production of the original deposit receipt with an attested copy showing payment of 15% of the cheque amount. Release was also subject to the applicant not being required in any other case.	609
	Sub-Chapter no. 54.4 Transfer of Investigation to CBI or Special Agency — Exceptional Circumstances Standard
Exceptional constitutional power to direct CBI investigation	A constitutional direction for CBI investigation is not a routine response to allegations against local police. The Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights passage reproduced and relied upon through Romila Thapar requires cautious and sparing exercise in exceptional situations, including where necessary to restore investigative credibility, do complete justice or enforce fundamental rights. No party has a right to select its investigating agency.	134
No right to choose an agency and exceptional transfer of investigation	An accused has no entitlement to select the investigating agency. The Romila Thapar passage relied on by the Court preserves appropriate Article 226 directions for mala-fide investigation and reproduces the exceptional standard for transfer to CBI: mere allegations against local police are insufficient;	266

	intervention must be sparing and justified by circumstances requiring credibility, public confidence, complete justice or protection of fundamental rights.
Exceptional transfer of investigation and review of mala-fide exercise of power	The relied-on Romila Thapar passage preserves appropriate Article 226 intervention where the court is satisfied that investigative power was exercised mala fide. Transfer to CBI is exceptional and cannot rest merely on allegations against local police. Such power must be exercised cautiously where needed to secure credible investigation, public confidence, complete justice or fundamental rights. Vague and unsupported claims do not establish a basis for changing the agency.	269
Transfer of investigation to CBI — exceptional exercise of constitutional power	A constitutional direction for CBI investigation must be exercised cautiously, sparingly and in exceptional situations. Allegations against local police alone do not justify a routine transfer. The reproduced Constitution Bench standard permits intervention where needed to restore credibility in investigation, address national or international ramifications, secure complete justice or enforce fundamental rights.	311
Article 226 transfer to CBI — exceptional loss of confidence in local police investigation	The High Court's Article 226 power to direct CBI investigation is not curtailed by the State-consent requirement in Section 6 of the Delhi Special Police Establishment Act. The power must be exercised cautiously in exceptional circumstances requiring credible, impartial investigation and enforcement of fundamental rights. Transfer is not available merely on demand or to secure a preferred conclusion. Where both the original and replacement local investigators were implicated in partisan conduct and efforts to shield officers, the Court transferred the case to a senior CBI officer. It could grant that relief although the petitioner had sought only a change of investigating officer, because the taint emerged from records unavailable to her.	546
Charge-sheet or commencement of trial is no absolute bar to investigation transfer	Filing a charge-sheet, commencement of trial or examination of witnesses does not absolutely bar a constitutional court from ordering independent, fresh or further investigation. The power remains exceptional and requires a grounded need to secure a fair investigation and prevent miscarriage of justice; dissatisfaction or imagined suspicion is insufficient. Ordinarily, a completed investigation should be left to the criminal court unless the exceptional grounds are made out.	714
Transfer to an independent investigating agency — exceptional grounds	Although parties cannot choose their investigating agency, the High Court may issue appropriate directions under Article 226 where it is convinced that investigative powers have been exercised mala fide. A CBI investigation is an exceptional remedy to be exercised sparingly and cautiously where necessary to restore confidence and credibility, address national or international ramifications, or secure complete justice and fundamental rights. Mere allegations against local police or vague assertions of mala fides are insufficient.	807

Relief in High Court Criminal Proceedings

Sub-Chapter no. 55.1
Expunction of Unwarranted Criminal-Trial Strictures and Collateral Prosecution Directions

Criminal-trial directions against non-accused persons — collateral prosecution cannot revive a quashed summoning order	A trial court cannot go beyond the issues being tried to condemn non-accused persons and direct collateral criminal and departmental action in disregard of the High Court's earlier order quashing their Section 319 CrPC summoning. The legality of the municipal demolition proceedings was outside the murder trial, and the impugned directions against the applicant were unwarranted and without jurisdiction. The High Court set those directions aside while expressly leaving the acquittal's merits to the separate State appeal.	78

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Restraint in adverse remarks against counsel	Judges should avoid unnecessary adverse remarks about counsel where the alleged lapse has no bearing on adjudication. Applying Neeraj Garg, the Court declined to criticise a possible minor bona fide mistake concerning preliminary inquiry, without deciding whether counsel had made a misleading statement. The ruling distinguishes such an immaterial mistake from conduct involving material deception.	600
Adverse judicial remarks against persons not heard	Courts must not make disparaging remarks or adverse observations affecting a person’s character, reputation or career without making that person a party and affording an opportunity to be heard. Condemnation without that opportunity violates natural justice.	666

Maintenance and Family Support under Criminal Procedure

Chapter no. 56
Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act — Monetary and Other Relief

Sub-Chapter no. 56.1
Domestic Violence Act Monetary Relief — Separate Residence and Restitution Decree

Domestic Violence Act monetary relief — reliance on an unexecuted restitution decree	A husband's assertion that he has obtained a decree for restitution of conjugal rights does not, by itself, justify rejecting the wife's claim for monetary relief under Section 20 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act on the ground that she lives separately without reasonable cause. Where the decree was not produced and, even assuming its existence, no execution application under Order XXI Rule 32 CPC had been filed, the Court treated the absence of efforts to resume cohabitation as material to rejecting that objection. It also found the monthly award of ₹4,000 reasonable in view of the price index, the cost of daily necessities and the income assessed by the appellate Court.	1
Desertion — separation, intention and absence of reasonable cause	In examining the objection to monetary relief based on the wife's separate residence, the Court relied on the principle that desertion involves separation coupled with an intention permanently to end cohabitation, without the other spouse's consent and without reasonable cause arising from that spouse's conduct. Separation in temporary anger or disgust, without an intention permanently to abandon cohabitation, does not amount to desertion. That intention must be inferred from the circumstances and the parties' conduct before and after separation; physical separation alone is insufficient.	1
Desertion — willingness to resume married life and a genuine offer to return	The spouse alleging desertion must remain ready and willing to resume married life on reasonable terms. In the desertion principles relied upon when rejecting the objection to monetary relief, a genuine offer to resume matrimonial life, made before divorce proceedings have commenced, may end desertion even after the statutory period has elapsed. An unreasonable refusal by the other spouse may place that spouse in desertion. The Court treated the husband's failure to take steps to bring the wife back as material to his objection to her separate residence.	1

Domestic Violence Act Shared Household — Permanency, Exclusion and Employment Elsewhere

Shared household: employment elsewhere and exclusion from the matrimonial home	Whether matrimonial residence has sufficient permanence under Section 2(s) of the Domestic Violence Act depends on the parties' intention and the nature of their living arrangement. Casual or fleeting visits do not suffice, but employment elsewhere for survival does not by itself show that the wife has voluntarily abandoned residence. The wife stated that she had lived in the matrimonial home for about two and a half months and was excluded when she returned. With the husband abroad and no maintenance being paid, the Court treated her employment at Rudrapur as compelled by livelihood needs. It	43

	therefore rejected the contention that her visits lacked permanence and refused to quash the Section 12 proceeding. The Act's beneficial purpose supported that construction; no final residence order or title determination was made.
Section 2(s) Domestic Violence Act: exhaustive definition and ownership of a shared household	The definition of shared household in Section 2(s), using both 'means' and 'includes', is exhaustive; the inclusive part explains its scope. It requires that the aggrieved woman lives or has lived there in a domestic relationship. She need not own or rent the premises. The household may be owned or rented by the respondent singly or jointly, or may belong to a joint family of which the respondent is a member, irrespective of either party's title or interest in that joint-family household. Applying the passage from Satish Chander Ahuja, the Court accepted that Sections 2(s), 17 and 19 confer a residence entitlement without requiring the woman's legal interest in the premises. S.R. Batra's narrower ownership-based interpretation was not accepted as correct law.	43

Domestic Violence Act Section 12 — Application, Domestic Incident Report and Continuing Proceedings

Section 12 application seeking several remedies: residence objection alone does not justify quashing	An objection directed to the wife's claim for residence under Section 19 of the Domestic Violence Act does not by itself justify quashing a Section 12 application that also seeks protection under Section 18, monetary relief under Section 20, compensation under Section 22 and interim or other relief under Section 23. The complaint alleged demands, violence, exclusion and withholding of stridhan. As residence was not the sole relief, the Court refused to terminate the entire proceeding under Section 482 CrPC. It did not decide that all allegations were proved or that each requested amount was payable.	43
Economic abuse under the Domestic Violence Act	Economic abuse is a form of domestic violence under Section 3. It includes deprivation of economic or financial resources to which the woman is entitled or which she needs, disposal of assets in which she has an interest or a right of use, and prohibition or restriction of continued access to resources or facilities available through the domestic relationship, including the shared household. The overall facts and circumstances must be considered.	96
Subsisting marriage and aggrieved-person status in a residence claim	Earlier separation did not exclude the wife from protection where the marriage continued without a decree of divorce. In considering the alleged economic abuse and residence claim, the Court treated the subsisting marriage as establishing the domestic relationship and recognised her as an aggrieved person under Section 2(a) of the Domestic Violence Act.	96
Scrutiny before rejecting a domestic-violence application at the threshold	Before rejecting an application under the Domestic Violence Act on maintainability, the court must carefully discuss the issues and scrutinise the facts from all relevant angles to determine whether the objection is legally sound. The beneficial nature of the legislation requires a sensitive approach so that an aggrieved woman's claim is not denied adjudication without proper consideration.	96
Domestic incident report is not a precondition to a direct Section 12 application	An aggrieved person may apply under Section 12 of the Domestic Violence Act herself or through an advocate without first obtaining a domestic incident report. The Magistrate need not call for a report as a condition of entertaining the application or passing an order. If a report is received from a Protection Officer or service provider, however, the proviso to Section 12(1) requires the Magistrate to consider it.	178
Subsequent ex parte divorce does not defeat an already pending domestic-violence application	Where the Section 12 application was instituted before the ex parte divorce decree, the later decree did not make the pending proceeding non-maintainable. The Court confined its decision to that sequence and expressly left open whether an application first instituted after divorce would be maintainable.	178
Omissions in an earlier FIR and later	An FIR need not contain every detail. Additional allegations against relatives in a later Section 12 Domestic Violence Act application cannot be treated as	233

domestic violence allegations	false merely by comparing them with an earlier FIR, without giving the complainant an opportunity to explain the omissions. Here, the FIR itself also referred to the father-in-law's demand for return of jewellery.
Civil nature of Section 12 domestic violence proceedings	Proceedings for relief under Section 12 of the Domestic Violence Act are not criminal in nature. The Court distinguished them from proceedings under Section 31 of the Act, which concern a criminal offence.	233

Domestic Violence Act Residence Order — Sham Transfer After Application

Sham transfer after a domestic-violence application and residence relief	A purported transfer intended to frustrate residence relief under Section 19 of the Domestic Violence Act did not defeat the woman's claim. Her husband's partition share was transferred through an applicant acting as attorney to another applicant's son after the application had been filed. The timing and family connection were undisputed, and the finding that the property remained in the applicants' possession supported the conclusion that the transaction was sham. The Court maintained the order against obstruction of her and her daughter's peaceful residence.	96

Sub-Chapter no. 56.5
Domestic Violence Act — Prior Conduct and Past Shared Household Maintainability

Domestic violence before commencement of the Act and past shared residence	Conduct predating the Domestic Violence Act may be considered when deciding an application under Section 12 and relief under Sections 18–20. A wife who shared a household in the past remains entitled to the Act's protection even if she was no longer living there when it commenced. Applying the Supreme Court decisions, the Court rejected the maintainability objection to the residence application and held that Devkaran v. Sanjana Bai was no longer good law on that issue.	96

Sub-Chapter no. 56.6
Domestic Violence Act Sections 19 and 23 — Interim Shared-Household Residence and Concurrent Maintenance

Section 125 rent provision does not bar interim shared-household residence	A direction to pay rent for separate accommodation under Section 125 CrPC does not make Section 19 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005 inapplicable or bar interim residence relief under Section 23. If residence relief warrants a change in maintenance, the respondents may seek alteration under Section 127 CrPC. Here they relied on an alleged rent component without producing the maintenance order; that contention could not defeat the wife's application for shared-household residence.	592
Prima facie response to a shared-household claim at the interim stage	Where the wife claimed that she had lived in the house after marriage, the respondents had to show prima facie why it was not a shared household. They could identify neither a reply to the Section 23 application nor material rebutting that claim. On that interim record, the burden could not be reversed by requiring the complainant to produce documents proving the shared-household claim. The refusals of interim residence were set aside, and the respondents were directed to permit her peaceful residence without obstruction or harm.	592
Pending divorce and continued application of the Domestic Violence Act	The pendency of a divorce petition does not by itself end the applicability of the Domestic Violence Act where the marital ties admittedly remain subsisting. The Court rejected the pending petition as an answer to the wife's claim while the marriage had not been dissolved.	592

	Chapter no. 57 Section 125 CrPC Maintenance, Disqualification and Child Support
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.1 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Restitution Decree and Sufficient Reason to Live Apart
Cruelty as sufficient reason to live apart despite restitution proceedings	Cruelty established from material relied upon by the husband may provide sufficient reason for the wife to live separately and claim maintenance under Section 125 CrPC. The diary page produced and relied upon by the husband required no separate formal proof in this case and disclosed physical cruelty. His restitution petition had been withdrawn. Even a restitution decree does not by itself defeat maintenance entitlement; the Court relied on Rina Kumari while sustaining interim maintenance on the material showing sufficient reason to live apart.	33
Ex parte restitution decree alone does not defeat wife's interim maintenance without proof of unjustified separation	An ex parte decree for restitution of conjugal rights did not by itself defeat the wife's claim for interim maintenance. The husband supplied no copy of the decree and had made no effort to enforce it. He had not proved that, despite his best efforts, she refused to return without sufficient cause. In those circumstances, he could not rely on the decree to avoid interim maintenance.	292
Wife's maintenance — restitution proceedings do not automatically disqualify a wife living apart	A wife subjected to cruelty cannot be compelled to remain in the matrimonial home. The husband's mere filing of a petition for restitution of conjugal rights under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act does not automatically disentitle her to maintenance under Section 125 CrPC. Relying on Rina Kumari, the Court noted that maintenance may be claimed even after a restitution decree. In the circumstances of the parties' dispute and the Section 498A IPC FIR, it set aside the finding that the wife lacked reasonable cause to live separately.	544
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.2 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Proof of Living in Adultery
Love or affection without sexual relations and the adultery bar	Maintenance may be denied under Section 125(4) CrPC on this ground only where the wife is proved to be living in adultery. Adultery involves sexual intercourse. Love or affection for another person, without physical relations, does not by itself establish that statutory disqualification.	33
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.3 Section 125 Interim Maintenance — Income Assessment and Quantum
Proof of alleged low income when fixing interim maintenance	An asserted low salary need not be accepted for fixing interim maintenance where the supporting salary certificate omits its date and place of issue and has not been proved by its issuer. In the circumstances of this case, the Court declined to rely on that certificate at the interim stage. Considering the cost of daily necessities and the existing maintenance award, it found no ground to interfere with the further interim award of Rs.4,000 per month.	33
Disowning notice contradicted by continued residence with the father	A newspaper notice by the husband's father purporting to exclude him from family property did not justify reducing interim maintenance where the husband continued to reside with his father at the same address. On that material, the Court rejected the notice as a camouflage. The conclusion depended on the shared residence shown by the notice and the husband's own case particulars.	33
Section 125 CrPC — interim maintenance without recording evidence	Under the second proviso to Section 125(1) CrPC, the Magistrate may fix reasonable interim maintenance and expenses of the proceedings without recording evidence. The assessment may take account of the parties' status and other relevant factors to provide for the wife's subsistence while the maintenance application remains pending.	50
Proof of the wife's	An employment certificate for an earlier academic year did not establish that	131

actual earnings when interim maintenance is claimed	the wife was earning when she filed her Section 125 CrPC application, particularly where the husband gave no explanation for failing to obtain records for the intervening or current academic year. A pamphlet advertising dance classes was also insufficient to establish that she was running such classes. These materials did not justify interference with interim maintenance.
Voluntary salary deductions in assessing interim maintenance	Only statutory deductions may be excluded when assessing take-home salary for interim maintenance. Voluntary contributions remain part of the husband's income. On the salary slip produced, the chosen AFPP contribution above the minimum statutory contribution and the AGIF and e-ticketing deductions were not shown to be compulsory. They therefore did not justify reducing the maintenance assessment.	131
Undisclosed employment and an unsupported resignation plea at the interim stage	The husband’s admitted employment had not been disclosed in his Rajnesh financial affidavit. His oral assertion that he had resigned because of litigation was rejected as an unsupported afterthought: neither a resignation nor its acceptance by the employer was produced. On the salary material before it, the Court assessed his income as Rs. 50,000 per month with allowances for the purpose of interim maintenance. That assessment remained subject to the parties’ evidence in the Family Court.	398
Family standard of living and adequate interim maintenance	A wife need not be absolutely destitute to claim maintenance under Section 125 CrPC. Support should permit a standard of living consistent with the family’s status, neither luxurious nor penurious. In view of the husband’s salary material and the cost of daily necessities, the Court enhanced interim maintenance from Rs. 4,000 to Rs. 10,000 per month from the date of the application. Its preliminary observations were not to influence the Family Court’s assessment after evidence.	398
Voluntary loan repayments in assessing income for interim maintenance	For assessing take-home salary for interim maintenance, only statutory deductions are to be deducted. A husband's voluntary loan repayment must be disregarded because the loan represents money already received in advance. On this basis, the Court assessed the husband's take-home salary at ₹53,950 without deducting the further loan EMI of ₹23,125.	792
Interim maintenance reflecting the family's standard of living	A wife and child are entitled to the standard of living they would have enjoyed in the matrimonial or parental home. Interim maintenance must be assessed with that entitlement and the husband's income in view. An award that is shockingly low on the available salary record warrants enhancement.	792

Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Cruelty as Sufficient Reason to Live Apart

Mental or physical cruelty as sufficient reason for a wife's separate residence	For Section 125(4) CrPC, the wife's actual reason for living apart must be examined. Mental or physical cruelty by the husband can provide sufficient reason even when it is unrelated to dowry. The Court found that excessive interference by his sisters led to renewed harassment after reconciliation. The wife's attempt to compromise and her decision not to incriminate the husband in the Section 498-A trial were considered efforts to preserve the marriage, rather than proof that her maintenance claim was false. The concurrent finding that she lived apart without sufficient reason overlooked the evidence and was perverse. As she could not maintain herself and the husband had neglected her, maintenance was payable.	42
False allegations against a spouse amount to cruelty	Making a false allegation against a spouse amounts to cruelty. The Court applied this principle when assessing the husband's apparently false allegations of an earlier marriage and his refusal to cooperate with testing of the material on which he relied in opposing interim maintenance.	131
Delay in reporting matrimonial cruelty	A wife’s failure to report alleged matrimonial cruelty immediately cannot automatically be used to discredit her or to conclude that she lives separately	205

may reflect an effort to preserve the marriage	without sufficient reason. Her patience in the hope of saving the marriage must be considered when assessing the delay.
Another family member's continued cohabitation does not disprove a wife's complaint of cruelty	A wife's complaint of matrimonial cruelty cannot be rejected merely because another woman in the family, also having daughters, continues to live with her husband. Continued cohabitation does not establish happiness, and one husband's treatment of his wife does not prove how another wife was treated.	205
Pursuing lawful statutory remedies does not itself amount to cruelty or defeat maintenance	A wife cannot be denied maintenance merely because she has pursued legally available proceedings for cruelty, domestic violence and return of stridhan. Those remedies have distinct ingredients and purposes; invoking them does not by itself constitute cruelty towards the husband or justify non-suiting her.	205
Cruelty as sufficient reason for the wife to live separately	For maintenance under Section 125 CrPC, the wife established sufficient reason to live separately by pleading dowry demand and cruelty, read with the husband's conduct. He abandoned his restitution petition after its transfer to Gwalior, withheld his pay slip despite directions, and answered a question about taking her back by stating that he had filed for divorce. His explanation that the Section 498-A prosecution caused him to abandon restitution was rejected because he had allowed the petition to be dismissed for non-prosecution rather than withdrawn it on that ground.	640

Section 125 Final Quantum, Effective Date and Overlapping Maintenance Remedies

Considering maintenance already awarded under another statute	A wife may seek maintenance under different statutes, but the Court fixing quantum must consider the maintenance she already receives under other provisions. A further award under Section 125 CrPC is not unlawful merely because maintenance under Section 24 of the Hindu Marriage Act is already being paid, where that earlier award has been taken into account.	33
Wife's maintenance: proved means, reasonable quantum and commencement date	Maintenance under Section 125 CrPC serves to prevent destitution and provide food, clothing and shelter. In fixing the amount, the Court applied the principles reproduced from Shamima Farooqui and Jasbir Kaur Sehgal: consider the parties' status and needs, the husband's capacity, reasonable expenses, legal obligations and involuntary deductions, and the wife's reasonable comfort in her accustomed way of life and ability to pursue her case. The amount must not be excessive. The husband was a contract teacher, the alleged coaching income was unproved, and both parties had limited means. The wife was awarded ₹2,000 per month from the Magistrate's order dated 26 June 2013, rather than the application dated 23 December 2011. That amount and date were fixed on the facts of this case.	42
Section 125 CrPC — final reassessment of interim maintenance	An interim maintenance award does not finally determine the amount payable. When deciding the Section 125 CrPC application on the evidence, the Magistrate may redetermine that amount by increasing or reducing it.	50
Maintenance awards under different statutes may be adjusted	The availability of maintenance under different statutes does not by itself bar another claim. When fixing the amount, the Court may take account of maintenance already awarded under another enactment and adjust the awards. An alleged existing award must be supported by the order relied on.	205
Maintenance quantum depends on reasonable needs, means and the matrimonial standard of living	Maintenance must be reasonable and realistic, having regard to the parties' status, the wife's and dependent child's needs, actual income, the husband's means and lawful liabilities, and the matrimonial standard of living. It should provide reasonable comfort without becoming oppressive. Childcare needs, inflation and the cost of daily necessities are relevant; no fixed formula governs the amount.	205
Wife's parents'	The financial position of a wife's parents is not material to fixing maintenance	205

financial position is immaterial to maintenance quantum	payable by her husband. The assessment turns on the parties' status, her own sufficient independent income and the husband's capacity to provide support.
Maintenance awarded from the date of application	Following Rajnesh v.Neha, the Court directed that the maintenance awarded to the wife and the enhanced maintenance for the child be paid from the date of the maintenance application.	205
Earning capacity and an able-bodied husband's plea of unemployment	An able-bodied husband capable of supporting himself cannot avoid maintenance of his wife and child by a bare plea of unemployment or financial difficulty. He must show cogent reasons beyond his control for inability to earn enough to discharge that obligation; failure to disclose income may permit an inference against him. Here, admitted past earnings, substantial deposits, bank funds and overseas assignments supported the finding of earning capacity, and no medical incapacity was asserted.	396
Fact-dependent maintenance and reliance on a 25% alimony observation	Maintenance must reflect the parties' status, the spouse's paying capacity and the facts of the case. For an eligible wife, adequate support means dignified sustenance consistent with the matrimonial standard of living, rather than mere survival, especially where a child is with her. The cited permanent-alimony observation about 25% did not justify reducing the separate awards to the wife and daughter in light of the accepted earning capacity. The Court affirmed Rs. 10,000 per month for each.	396
Mandatory and Voluntary Salary Deductions in Maintenance Assessment	In assessing a husband's income for maintenance, mandatory and statutory deductions may be considered, but voluntary deductions cannot reduce the income available for assessment. On the salary slips produced in revision, the Court accepted provident-fund and house-rent recovery deductions, disregarded the voluntary deductions, and assessed monthly income at ₹30,143 rather than the nominal net-pay figure.	402
Factors Governing Final Maintenance Quantum under Section 125 CrPC	Maintenance depends on the parties' status, the husband's actual income and capacity to pay, reasonable expenses for his own maintenance, legally dependent family members and liabilities. The Court must also consider the family's standard of living, inflation and the cost of living. Applying these factors to the salary evidence and the wife's and child's needs, the Court enhanced their separate monthly allowances to ₹7,500 each.	402
Litigation Conduct and the Effective Date of Maintenance Enhancement	In fixing the commencement of enhanced maintenance in cross-revisions, the Court noted that the husband had sought time to argue only on one occasion. On those circumstances, it directed payment of the enhanced allowances from the date of the revisional order. The direction was a case-specific effective-date determination.	402
Purposive Interpretation of Section 125 CrPC as Social-Justice Legislation	Section 125 CrPC enforces a continuing obligation of support towards wives, children and parents. As social-justice legislation protecting vulnerable persons, it calls for a purposive and social-context approach that advances maintenance, equality and dignity rather than a merely adversarial reading.	402
Child Maintenance from the Date of the Section 125 Application	Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, maintenance was payable from the date of the maintenance application rather than the date of the order. The Court found that the child had not caused unnecessary adjournments and that several later adjournments had been sought for the father. His monthly contribution of Rs. 4,000 was therefore made payable from 25 April 2015, when the Section 125 CrPC application was filed.	534
Section 125 maintenance — assessment of quantum and payment from the	After restoring the wife's entitlement, the Court fixed maintenance at ₹6,000 per month in the circumstances before it, including her assertion that the husband earned ₹30,000–35,000 monthly. It also noted the husband's admission that his own father, like the wife's father, worked in the police department.	544

application date	Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, it directed payment of the wife's maintenance from the date of her application.
Cost of living in assessing maintenance quantum	In assessing the challenge to monthly maintenance of Rs. 5,000 for the wife, the Court considered the price index, the cost of living and the cost of daily necessities. On those considerations, it found that the amount was not excessive and disclosed no jurisdictional error warranting interference.	562
Voluntary house-loan instalments in assessing maintenance	The house-loan instalment claimed by the husband was a voluntary repayment, not a statutory or mandatory deduction. He had already received the borrowed lump sum. The Court therefore refused to deduct the instalment when determining maintenance. The wife had also alleged that the loan was taken after separation to reduce his take-home salary. The ruling concerned that voluntary loan on the record before the Court, while the adopted maintenance criteria continued to recognise relevant liabilities generally.	591
Reasonable maintenance balancing needs, status and means	Maintenance protects a dependent spouse from destitution rather than punishing the payer. No fixed formula governs its amount. The inquiry balances the parties' status, reasonable needs, income and property, the matrimonial standard of living, employment history and family-related career sacrifices, litigation costs, the payer's actual means and reasonable expenses, lawful dependent obligations and relevant liabilities. Inflation and living costs also matter. The award should provide reasonable comfort without becoming oppressive or so meagre as to cause penury. Applying these criteria and current prices, the Court found the effective monthly provision of ₹7,500 inadequate and enhanced the Section 125 CrPC award, subject to adjustment.	591
Adjustment and effective date of enhanced maintenance	In assessing enhancement under Section 125 CrPC, the Court considered the effective provision after adjustment against a separate Domestic Violence Act award. It enhanced the Section 125 award from ₹5,000 to ₹7,500 per month, expressly retaining adjustment against maintenance awarded under the Domestic Violence Act or another statute. The enhanced amount was payable from the date of the application. The Court had not established whether the separate award was being regularly paid, so its adjustment calculation did not amount to a finding of actual payment.	591
Wife's parents' finances and maintenance quantum	The financial position of the claimant wife's parents is not material to determining maintenance quantum. The adopted criteria instead direct attention to the parties' status, the claimant's sufficient independent income and the other spouse's capacity to provide support.	591
Voluntary loan instalments in assessing take-home income	The husband's monthly bank-loan instalment of ₹13,600 was not deducted when assessing his take-home income for maintenance. He had already received the loan proceeds, and repayment of that voluntary borrowing was not treated as a compulsory statutory deduction from salary.	640
Maintenance from the date of application	Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, the Court directed maintenance from the date of the Section 125 CrPC application. The Family Court had given no reason for commencing maintenance from its order, and the husband, whose repeated defaults had delayed the proceedings, showed no exceptional circumstance justifying that later date. The enhanced award therefore ran from 19 August 2019.	640
Wife's matrimonial standard of living and maintenance quantum	A deserted wife is entitled to maintenance consistent with the status she would have enjoyed in the matrimonial home. Considering the husband's position as an Assistant Engineer, his admitted income and the Court's assessment of his take-home salary, maintenance was enhanced from ₹8,000 to ₹30,000 per month.	640
Adjustment of interim maintenance against the final	Interim maintenance already paid by the husband must be adjusted against the final maintenance payable from the application date. The Court directed	640 award	payment of the remaining arrears within three months.

Maintenance payable from the date of application	Maintenance is to be awarded from the date of the application. The claimant does not control the time taken to decide maintenance proceedings, and that delay cannot postpone the commencement of the entitlement.	792
Adjustment of maintenance received in other proceedings	Maintenance received in another proceeding is to be adjusted against the maintenance awarded, so that the amounts payable account for the overlapping relief.	792

Sub-Chapter no. 57.6

Section 125 Minor Child Maintenance — Independent Entitlement and Effective Date

Child's maintenance: separate assessment of the existing award	The child's existing maintenance award was assessed separately from the finding concerning the mother's reasons for living apart. Having granted maintenance to the mother, the Court considered the parties' financial and social status and found the child's award of ₹1,500 per month justified. It declined to alter that award, which had been payable from the Magistrate's order dated 26 June 2013. The judgment did not make the child's maintenance depend on the mother's entitlement.	42
Child maintenance payable from the application date	Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, the Court directed that both the maintenance awarded by the trial court and the amount enhanced in revision be payable from the Section 125 CrPC application date, 4 September 2019. The trial court's commencement from the order date was accordingly changed.	218
Child-support quantum and reasonable living and educational needs	Child maintenance must account for food, clothing, residence, medical care, education and reasonable supplementary coaching or training expenses. Applying the narrated Rajnesh principles, the Court considered the daughter's age, books, diet, educational requirements and rising daily costs. It found Rs. 1,000 per month inadequate and enhanced the award to Rs. 3,000 per month.	218
Sharing a child's education expenses between earning parents	A child's education expenses should normally be borne by the father. Where the mother is working and earning sufficiently, those expenses may be shared proportionately between the parents. The Court reproduced and applied this Rajnesh principle while reassessing the minor daughter's maintenance.	218
Unsubstantiated majority objection does not postpone children's interim Section 125 support	A father sought birth certificates under CrPC Section 91 and alleged all three children were major, then argued only one was. He supplied none of their dates of birth and did not dispute paternity. The Court refused to postpone interim maintenance on that inconsistent, unsupported assertion; if a child was ineligible as major on the relevant date, the amount could later be adjusted or recovered. This was an interim finding, not a final determination of the children's ages.	292
Child Maintenance Must Include Education, Nutrition and Other Basic Needs	A child's maintenance cannot be confined to ordinary food expenses; education, uniform, nutritious food and clothing must also be considered. Comparing the existing ₹4,000 award with the employed father's own subsidised food expense and assessed income, the Court found the child's allowance inadequate and enhanced it to ₹7,500 per month.	402
Minor Child's Maintenance and Contributions of Both Earning Parents	Both the father and an earning mother must contribute to their child's maintenance in proportion to their incomes. The mother's monthly honorarium of Rs. 2,500 was insufficient to maintain both herself and the child and did not justify refusing the child's claim under Section 125 CrPC. Considering the child's age and daily living costs, the Court assessed monthly maintenance at Rs. 6,000 and applied a 2:1 allocation, requiring the father to pay Rs. 4,000. The mother's withdrawal of her own revision did not dispose of the child's separate claim.	534
Minor child's maintenance —	A minor child cannot be held responsible for a dispute between the parents, and the father's obligation to maintain the child is not defeated by an allegation that	544

independent entitlement despite the parents' matrimonial dispute	the mother lives separately without reasonable cause. Considering the child's age and the mother's assertion that the father earned ₹30,000–35,000 per month, the Court found the existing award of ₹4,000 per month neither excessive nor inadequate and affirmed it.
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.7 Section 127 Maintenance Alteration — Changed Circumstances and Proof
Section 127 CrPC — proof of changed circumstances for alteration of interim maintenance	A person seeking alteration of interim maintenance under Section 127(1) CrPC must prove a change in circumstances by leading evidence. The fact that interim maintenance may initially be fixed without recording evidence does not dispense with this requirement. Where the main Section 125 application was pending and separate evidence hearings for alteration and final maintenance were impractical, the Court required the husband to lead his evidence in the main proceeding. It did not treat pendency of that proceeding as making every Section 127 application legally premature.	50
Income-tax return — proof and weight in maintenance proceedings	In proceedings under Sections 125 and 127 CrPC, the applicant's income-tax return cannot be treated as a public document of which the Court may take judicial notice. It must be proved like any other document. Whether the income disclosed in it is correct is a question of fact. The return is not binding on the Magistrate, who may assess income from the circumstances and evidence; the applicant must prove his income by leading evidence.	50
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.8 Section 125 Divorced Wife — Explanation (b) and Cohabitation Disqualification
Divorced wife's maintenance claim is not barred by refusal to resume cohabitation	A divorced woman who has not remarried remains a wife for claiming maintenance under Section 125(1), Explanation (b), CrPC. Following Rohtash Singh v. Ramendri, the Court held that refusal to live with the husband without sufficient reason presupposes a subsisting marriage and does not bar the divorced wife's claim on that ground. After divorce, she is under no obligation to resume cohabitation with her former husband.	133
Husband cannot rely on his own refusal to take the wife home as her desertion	A husband who failed to take his wife with him despite the court's direction could not attribute their continued separation to her desertion or take advantage of his own wrong. His withdrawal of execution proceedings for the ex parte restitution decree also weighed against his asserted willingness to resume cohabitation. In these circumstances, the decree and alleged noncompliance did not justify refusal of maintenance, particularly after divorce.	133
Protective interpretation of Section 125 CrPC in a divorced wife's claim	Section 125 CrPC is a measure of social justice protecting women and children. The Rohtash Singh passage relied upon by the Court, reproducing Captain Ramesh Chander Kaushal, requires its interpretation to reflect that protective purpose, supported by Articles 15(3) and 39 of the Constitution. The divorced wife's continued statutory status was considered in that setting.	133
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.9 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Actual Income, Earning Capacity and Child Care
Unsupported assertion that the wife earns from a business	A bare allegation that the wife earns from a beauty parlour does not justify denying interim maintenance when no documents show that she runs it or establish her earnings. The issue remains open to proof through evidence. The Court did not make a final determination of her income at this interim stage.	33
Earning capacity and qualifications are distinct from sufficient actual income	A wife’s educational qualifications or capacity to earn do not by themselves defeat maintenance. The relevant question is whether she actually has income sufficient to maintain herself in accordance with the matrimonial standard of living; some earnings alone are not a bar. Her inability to maintain herself, the husband’s sufficient means and his neglect to maintain her must be established.	205
Leaving employment	A mother’s resignation from employment to care for a young child does not by	205

to care for a young child is not necessarily mala fide	itself show that she deliberately stopped earning to obtain maintenance. Where the child requires constant care and the mother cannot reasonably discharge both responsibilities, leaving employment for childcare cannot be treated as mala fide merely for that reason.
Concealment of employment in a wife's maintenance claim	The Court upheld rejection of the wife's Section 125 CrPC claim after finding that she had concealed outsourced employment in the electricity department and denied it in evidence. The departmental RTI response and her refusal to consent to disclosure supported that finding on the record. The decision rested on material suppression and lack of candour in this claim.	218
Professional status as an advocate and proof of the wife's income	The wife's status as a practising advocate did not by itself establish sufficient income to maintain herself. Earnings do not necessarily begin upon enrolment, and the husband produced no evidence of a substantial practice, such as certified copies of vakalatnamas filed by her. The Court therefore declined to infer adequate earnings from her professional status at the interim stage, leaving the parties free to prove their positions at trial.	398
Education and Earning Capacity Alone Do Not Defeat a Wife's Maintenance Claim	A wife's literacy or capacity to earn does not, by itself, disentitle her to maintenance when she is not shown to have actual earnings. The employed, able-bodied husband's duty to maintain his wife and child must be assessed with regard to his means and the standard of life they could have enjoyed with him.	402
Education and earning capacity do not establish self-sufficiency	A maintenance claim is not answered merely by saying that the wife is educated and could support herself. The relevant inquiry includes whether she has independent income sufficient for her support in light of the parties' status and the payer's capacity. The claim must be assessed on its actual financial circumstances.	591
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.10 Section 125(3) Maintenance Enforcement — Monthly Default, Custody and Continuing Arrears
Imprisonment under Section 125(3) CrPC for several monthly maintenance defaults	Where a person fails without sufficient cause to comply with a maintenance order, Section 125(3) CrPC permits imprisonment of up to one month for the whole or unpaid part of each month's allowance remaining due after execution of the recovery warrant, or until earlier payment. The one-month ceiling applies to each monthly default. Several defaults can therefore support a cumulative term, and the Court upheld six months' imprisonment or earlier payment of the arrears, subject to the statutory requirement of a recovery application within one year of the amount becoming due.	511
Imprisonment for maintenance default does not discharge the arrears	Imprisonment under Section 125(3) CrPC enforces the maintenance order; it does not satisfy the liability. Only actual payment discharges the arrears. A defaulter's decision to undergo imprisonment therefore does not absolve the obligation to pay maintenance.	511
One-year recovery application requirement and continuing maintenance liability	An application under Section 125(3) CrPC to levy an amount due must be made within one year from the date that amount became due. This requirement does not extinguish the underlying maintenance liability or erase the arrears. Maintenance is a continuing liability, and successive applications may address subsequent defaults.	511
Release on an offered partial payment after prolonged maintenance default	The Court refused release from imprisonment on an offer to pay only part of the maintenance arrears and seek time for the balance where the defaulter had paid only ₹1,500 despite years of subsisting orders. His prolonged, non-bona fide non-compliance had left his wife and child without resources and did not justify sympathetic relief.	511

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.11 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Lifestyle, Moral Disapproval and Sufficient Reason to Live Apart
Moral disapproval of a wife's lawful lifestyle and maintenance	A husband's disapproval of his wife's modern lifestyle is not by itself a ground to deny maintenance. Courts must apply the law rather than substitute personal views of morality. Where the husband identified no ground beyond lifestyle to show that the wife was living separately without reasonable cause, the Court refused to interfere with her maintenance award. A wife engaging in no criminal activity was free to choose an orthodox or modern way of life.	562
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.12 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Long Cohabitation and Presumption of Marriage
Presumption of marriage from long cohabitation	Continuous cohabitation as husband and wife for a substantial period raises a presumption of marriage for a Section 125 CrPC claim. The presumption is rebuttable, but a heavy burden lies on the person disputing the relationship's legal origin, and circumstances weakening it must be considered. Here, failure to prove the asserted temple ceremony and rituals was not a specific finding that the claimant was not a legally wedded wife. The prolonged spousal cohabitation and birth of a child supported the maintenance award.	565
Standard of marriage proof in Section 125 proceedings	Proceedings under Section 125 CrPC provide a summary remedy to prevent destitution. They do not require the strict proof of marriage demanded in matrimonial proceedings or a prosecution under Section 494 IPC. Evidence supporting that the parties lived as husband and wife may sustain maintenance without strict proof of the marriage ceremonies.	565
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.13 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Genuine Offer to Maintain on Cohabitation Condition
Section 125(3) CrPC — willingness pleaded in a reply does not establish an actual offer to maintain	A husband's statement in his reply that he is willing to keep his wife does not, by itself, establish an offer to maintain her on condition of cohabitation. The offer should be specifically put to the wife in cross-examination, stated in his evidence or made through an application. Where none of those steps was taken, the plea of willingness did not justify denial of maintenance.	634
Conditional offer to maintain — justified refusal to cohabit does not defeat maintenance	Under the further proviso to Section 125(3) CrPC, where a husband offers to maintain his wife on condition that she live with him and she refuses, the Magistrate may consider her stated grounds of refusal. Maintenance may be ordered notwithstanding the offer if the Magistrate is satisfied that there is just ground for doing so.	634
Offer to resume cohabitation contradicted by the husband's conduct	The husband's assertion that he was willing to keep his wife did not defeat her maintenance claim where his conduct showed otherwise. He failed to pursue restitution after transfer of the proceedings and, when asked in cross-examination whether he would take her back, referred to his divorce petition. Read with the cruelty established by the wife, these circumstances justified her separate residence.	640
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.14 Maintenance Financial Disclosure — Rajnesh Affidavits, Nonproduction and Income Estimation
Claimed inability to pay maintenance must be supported by income evidence	A husband's claim of limited income must be examined against supporting evidence and disclosure of his means. Failure to disclose actual income may justify an adverse inference. The asserted daily-wage income was not substantiated by examining the employer, and the husband had not disclosed his income when consenting to parental maintenance orders.	205
Estimating income where correct sources are not	Some estimation is permissible in assessing maintenance income where all income sources, or the correct sources, have not been disclosed. The narrated criteria place that exercise within an assessment of payment capacity, liabilities,	591

disclosed	the claimant's needs and the parties' lifestyle.
Income estimation when the husband withholds his pay slip	Where the husband withheld his pay slip despite a direction to produce it, the Court assessed his income from his disclosure affidavit and income-tax information. Because actual compulsory deductions could not be ascertained, it estimated statutory deductions at 10% of the disclosed annual gross income of ₹12,35,123 and arrived at approximately ₹92,634 monthly take-home income. The 10% allowance was the estimate made on this incomplete financial record.	640
Disclosure of financial status in maintenance proceedings	Parties in maintenance proceedings must disclose their financial status by affidavit under the Rajnesh v. Neha guidelines, which dispense with the affidavit requirement for economically weaker sections, persons below the poverty line and casual labourers. The Court applied the disclosure requirement in assessing this salaried husband's means and his failure to produce the directed pay slip.	640
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.15 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Changed Circumstances and Repeat Applications
Repeat maintenance application after a change in financial circumstances	An earlier rejection of an application under Section 125 CrPC because the wife could maintain herself does not bar a later application when her means are no longer sufficient. A subsequent inability to maintain herself permits reassessment on the changed circumstances.	794
	Sub-Chapter no. 57.16 Section 125 Wife Maintenance — Actual Self-Sufficiency, Husband's Capacity and Quantum
Able-bodied husband's duty despite an asserted meagre salary	An able-bodied husband cannot avoid maintenance merely by asserting that his salary is meagre or that the award uses a large part of it. He must earn to maintain his wife or pay maintenance. The Court applied Rajnesh v. Neha in rejecting that objection to interim maintenance.	33
Earning capacity and a husband's plea of financial inability to maintain his wife	As explained in the Shamima Farooqui passage applied by the Court, an earning-capable husband cannot avoid maintenance merely by asserting financial constraints. An able-bodied young man is presumed capable of earning enough reasonably to maintain his wife and child according to the family standard. He must show cogent reasons beyond his control if he claims inability to do so. Failure to disclose his exact income permits an adverse presumption. This principle does not establish a particular alleged additional income without supporting evidence.	42
Able-bodied husband cannot avoid maintenance merely by pleading low income	An able-bodied husband cannot escape the obligation to maintain his wife and child merely by asserting a meagre salary or lack of sufficient income. He must substantiate circumstances beyond his control that prevent him from earning enough to discharge his legal obligations.	205
Wife's Parental Means Are Immaterial to Maintenance Quantum	The financial position of a wife's parents is not material in determining the maintenance payable by her husband. His obligation must be assessed by reference to the relevant means and needs of the spouses and dependants.	402
Plea of no income by an able-bodied husband	A husband's assertion that he has no income does not by itself discharge his duty to maintain his wife where he is able-bodied and has educational qualifications. His financial capacity, actual income, reasonable personal expenses and legal obligations to dependent family members remain relevant in fixing a just amount.	591
Wife's earning capacity and sufficiency of actual income	The wife's capacity to earn, or receipt of some income, does not by itself defeat maintenance. The Court must assess whether her income is sufficient to maintain her in accordance with the standard of living in the matrimonial home. Maintenance concerns more than mere survival.	794

Topic	Ratio	Case Sr.no.
Able-bodied husband's earning capacity and proof of inability	An able-bodied husband is presumed capable of earning enough to maintain his wife and children. He must produce material showing inability to discharge that obligation for reasons beyond his control; a bare assertion that he depends on his son is insufficient without proof of disability. Failure to disclose the exact income may justify an adverse inference.	794
Cost of basic needs in assessing maintenance quantum	Maintenance quantum must account for prevailing prices and the cost of basic living needs. On that assessment, a monthly award of ₹1,500 to the wife was not excessive.	794

Chapter no. 58
Child Support Directions in Criminal-Side Writ and Ancillary Proceedings

Sub-Chapter no. 58.1
Minor Child Maintenance — Parental Means and Ancillary Writ Directions

Able-bodied father's duty to maintain his minor child	An able-bodied father cannot escape maintenance of his minor child by deliberately choosing circumstances in which he earns a meagre amount while living with another woman. Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, the Court held that the father's stated monthly salary of ₹13,000 was not decisive of his child-support obligation. His acknowledged paternity and willingness to pay at least ₹6,000 per month formed the basis of the support direction.	642
Child-support payment and enforcement directions in habeas corpus proceedings	On the father's offer to pay at least ₹6,000 monthly for his minor child, the Court directed payment into the child's bank account by the second day of each month. It directed the mother to open and communicate that account, declared default liable to contempt proceedings, and preserved the child's liberty to seek enhancement of maintenance.	642

Case Sr. no. (1) Next

Headnote :- Domestic Violence Act — monetary relief / separate residence / restitution decree - In a proceeding under Section 12, the husband relied on an asserted decree for restitution of conjugal rights. However, no copy was produced in revision, and no application had been made for its execution under Order XXI Rule 32 CPC. The Court rejected reliance on the decree to establish that the wife was living separately without reasonable cause. Bipinchandra Jaisinghbhai Shah v. Prabhavati, AIR 1957 SC 176, was invoked on the significance of a spouse's efforts to bring the other spouse back. Savitri Pandey v. Prem Chandra Pandey, (2002) 2 SCC 73, was considered on the elements and continuing nature of desertion, including intention, absence of consent and absence of conduct giving reasonable cause to leave. It also explains that desertion must be inferred from conduct. Applying that discussion to the limited dispute over monetary relief, the Court affirmed the appellate order under Section 20. It declined to interfere with the award of ₹4,000 per month, having regard to the assessed income and living costs. The Supreme Court authorities concern desertion in matrimonial proceedings; their reasoning was applied here to the petitioners' objection to the respondent's separate residence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Poonam Jadon filed an application under Section 12 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act (DVA). On 21 July 2023, the Judicial Magistrate First Class, Gwalior dismissed the application in MJCR No. 47/2022 on the ground that she was living separately without reasonable cause. On 6 September 2024, the Eighteenth Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior allowed her appeal, Criminal Appeal No. 408/2023, set aside the Magistrate's order and awarded monetary relief of ₹4,000 per month. Aaditya Pratap Singh Jadon and the other petitioners challenged that decision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC. Their counsel asserted that the husband had obtained a decree for restitution of conjugal rights under the Hindu Marriage Act, but the respondent had not returned. On that basis, counsel argued that the Magistrate's dismissal of the application should have been upheld.

2. Precedents — Considered : Bipinchandra Jaisinghbhai Shah v. Prabhavati, 1956:INSC:56 : AIR 1957 SC 176, was cited on the relevance of a husband's efforts to bring his wife back where desertion is alleged. Savitri Pandey v. Prem Chandra Pandey, (2002) 2 SCC 73, was quoted at length on desertion in matrimonial law. The quoted discussion requires separation together with an intention permanently to end cohabitation. As regards the deserted spouse, absence of consent and absence of conduct giving the other spouse reasonable cause to leave are also relevant. Desertion is a continuing course of conduct inferred from all the circumstances. A bona fide offer to resume married life may affect that inference. The Supreme Court passage also discusses the burden and standard of proof in divorce proceedings. The High Court used these authorities to assess the petitioners' contention that the restitution decree conclusively established that the respondent's separate residence was unjustified. The proceedings before it concerned monetary relief in revision, rather than a divorce claim.

3. Statutes considered : Section 12 DVA governed the respondent's application, and Section 20 DVA provided for the monetary relief upheld in revision. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC conferred the High Court's revisional jurisdiction. The petitioners relied on a decree under the Hindu Marriage Act but filed no copy. The Court also considered their failure to seek execution under Order XXI Rule 32 CPC.

4. Issues : First, did the asserted restitution decree and the respondent's failure to return require rejection of her Section 12 DVA application on the ground that she was living separately without reasonable cause, despite the petitioners' failure to produce the decree or seek its execution? Second, did the appellate court's award of ₹4,000 per month under Section 20 DVA warrant revisional interference as to its amount?

5. Ratio / Findings : For its analysis, the Court assumed the asserted restitution decree in the petitioners' favour, while noting that no copy had been filed. It treated their failure to seek execution under Order XXI Rule 32 CPC as showing a lack of effort to keep the respondent with them. Referring to Bipinchandra and Savitri Pandey, the Court held, on these facts, that the decree alone did not establish that the respondent's separate residence was unjustified. It found no error in the appellate court's recognition of monetary relief under Section 20. This conclusion was confined to the facts and the revisional stage; it did not determine the validity or actual contents of the decree, which had not been produced. On the amount, the Court considered the price index, the cost of daily necessities and the petitioners' income as assessed by the appellate court. It found that ₹4,000 was not excessive.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the criminal revision.

Aaditya Pratap Singh Jadon and Ors. v. Poonam Jadon, Cr.R. no. 5692/2024, 26/11/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Inherent powers — matrimonial civil suit / FIR quashing - A suit for restitution of conjugal rights filed after the wife's FIR could not make the earlier FIR a counterblast to that suit. Following Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court held that parallel civil proceedings do not, by themselves, bring criminal proceedings to an end. The quashing inquiry must address whether the FIR's allegations disclose a prima facie offence, without relying on extraneous findings.

Civil and criminal proceedings — findings / prior judgments - The Court applied Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, (2010) 8 SCC 775, and Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Administration), (2009) 5 SCC 528. Civil and criminal proceedings have different standards of proof, and findings in one are not automatically binding in the other. A previous judgment may nevertheless be relevant under Sections 40–43 Evidence Act. Prem Raj v. Poonamma Menon, SLP (Cr.) No. 9778/2018, decided 02.04.2024, and Vishnu Dutt Sharma v. Daya Sapra, (2009) 13 SCC 729, reinforced these principles and confirmed that civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously. Whether either proceeding should be stayed depends on the circumstances of the case.

Quashing — FIR delay / disputed facts - Applying Pratibha and Skoda Auto Volkswagen (India) Private Limited v. State of U.P., (2021) 5 SCC 795, the Court held that delay alone does not warrant quashing. At this stage, the Court does not inquire into the disputed reliability or genuineness of the allegations. The allegations of assault and demand were specific, not omnibus.

Section 498A IPC — continuing mental cruelty - The Court followed Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, on the persistence of mental trauma at the parental home after alleged cruelty in the matrimonial home. For this prima facie assessment, it treated expulsion over the dowry demand and refusal to take the wife back without payment as capable of constituting continuing cruelty. The Court also referred to Amar Singh v. Vimla.

Limitation — Section 468 CrPC - The alleged ouster was on 30.07.2020, and the FIR was registered on 18.10.2021. Referring to the three-year limitation period for taking cognizance of an offence punishable with imprisonment of up to three years, the Court found no time bar. It dismissed the quashing application without deciding guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The second respondent married applicant no. 1, Aarif Rahin Khan, on 26 November 2017 according to Muslim rites. Applicant no. 2 was his elder brother, and applicant no. 3 was her mother-in-law. According to her FIR, her father had provided dowry within his means, but the applicants harassed her over an additional demand of ₹10 lakh. She alleged that applicant nos. 1 and 2 acted on applicant no. 3's instigation and that applicant no. 3 harassed her in her husband's absence. She further alleged that all three demanded ₹10 lakh, assaulted her when she refused, and expelled her. She went to her father's home with her young child. Her father allegedly sought to have her taken back, but the applicants made her return conditional on payment. Crime No. 797/2021 was registered at Janakganj Police Station, Gwalior, on 18 October 2021 for offences under Sections 498A and 323 read with Section 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The husband subsequently filed a suit for restitution of conjugal rights on 21 February 2022. The applicants sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS, arguing that the civil suit and the interval after the alleged ouster defeated the FIR. The State opposed quashing. The Court considered the allegations at this preliminary stage without finding them proved.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was applied twice. It disapproves quashing a matrimonial FIR by relying on extraneous civil proceedings or drawing an adverse inference from delay where efforts at settlement could explain the interval. Whether a prima facie offence is disclosed must be assessed from the allegations in the complaint or FIR. Kishan Singh (Dead) through LRs v. Gurpal Singh, (2010) 8 SCC 775, was invoked for the principle that civil and criminal findings are not automatically binding in the other proceedings, the different standards of proof, and the limited relevance of previous judgments under Sections 41–43 Evidence Act. Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Administration), (2009) 5 SCC 528, explained the exceptions under Sections 40–43 and the need to determine whether a prior judgment is relevant and, if so, its effect. It also discussed simultaneous proceedings and the treatment of the earlier reasoning in Karam Chand. Prem Raj v. Poonamma Menon, SLP (Cr.) No. 9778/2018, decided 02.04.2024, was considered for the Supreme Court's later explanation of the relationship between civil and criminal findings and their different proof standards, including Iqbal Singh Marwah and M.S. Sheriff. It did not establish a categorical rule that civil outcomes are irrelevant. Vishnu Dutt Sharma v. Daya Sapra, (2009) 13 SCC 729, was also cited for the different proof standards and the possibility of simultaneous proceedings, with a stay depending on the circumstances. Skoda Auto Volkswagen (India) Private Limited v. State of U.P., (2021) 5 SCC 795, stated the principle that mere delay in making a complaint and disputes about the reliability of factual allegations are not ordinarily grounds for quashing at the threshold. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, explained that mental trauma from cruelty may persist at the parental home after a wife is driven out. The Court applied that understanding to the alleged exclusion from the matrimonial home over the dowry demand. The Court's own Amar Singh v. Vimla, Criminal Revision No. 2376/2020, decided 22.06.2021, was noted for the principle that compelling a wife to reside at her parental home amounts to cruelty. Authorities appearing within the extensive Supreme Court quotations, including K.G. Premshanker, Iqbal Singh Marwah and M.S. Sheriff, form part of the cited courts' reasoning.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC and Section 528 BNSS were stated as the basis of the application invoking inherent powers. Section 498A IPC and its Explanation were reproduced. Cruelty includes qualifying wilful conduct affecting life, limb or physical or mental health, and harassment to compel compliance with an unlawful demand for property or valuable security. Sections 323 and 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act were among the registered offences. Section 468 CrPC was considered in relation to the three-year limitation period for taking cognizance of an offence punishable with imprisonment of up to three years. Sections 40–43 Evidence Act appeared in the Supreme Court passages on the relevance and effect of earlier judgments. The restitution suit did not, by itself, provide a defence to the criminal accusation.

4. Issues : (1) Could a husband's later suit for restitution of conjugal rights justify quashing his wife's earlier matrimonial FIR as a counterblast, or on the argument that civil and criminal proceedings cannot coexist? (2) Would findings in a civil case bind the criminal court, or would a previous judgment have only the relevance and effect prescribed by evidence law? (3) Did the interval between the alleged expulsion and registration of the FIR justify quashing at the threshold, particularly where the wife alleged continuing exclusion and cruelty? (4) Were the alleged dowry demand, assault and roles of the applicants sufficiently specific for a prima facie inquiry under Section 498A? (5) Was the criminal process barred by limitation under Section 468 CrPC on the dates cited?

5. Ratio / Findings : The suit for restitution of conjugal rights was filed in February 2022, after the FIR of October 2021. The Court therefore held that the earlier FIR could not be a counterblast to the later suit. Applying Pratibha, it held that civil proceedings concerning the matrimonial relationship do not automatically bring the criminal case to an end. The quashing inquiry must address whether the FIR's allegations disclose a prima facie offence. The Court considered Kishan Singh, Syed Askari, Prem Raj and Vishnu Dutt Sharma to explain that civil and criminal findings depend on the evidence in each proceeding and on different standards of proof. A previous judgment may have particular relevance under Sections 40–43 Evidence Act, but findings are not generally binding merely because the parties and subject matter overlap. Simultaneous proceedings are permissible, with any stay depending on the circumstances of the case. Applying Skoda Auto and Pratibha on delay, the Court declined to inquire prematurely into the disputed reliability of the allegations. It also applied Rupali Devi's explanation that mental trauma may continue after departure from the matrimonial home. The alleged demand for ₹10 lakh, expulsion, refusal to take the wife back without payment, and the alleged assault and roles of all three applicants were sufficiently specific to withstand quashing. This was a prima facie assessment only. The Court applied the three-year period for taking cognizance under Section 468 CrPC in respect of an offence punishable with imprisonment of up to three years and rejected the asserted time bar. It neither determined culpability nor weighed the defence evidence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. The FIR in Crime No. 797/2021 was not quashed. No applicant obtained partial quashing or separate relief. The Court made no trial finding of guilt.

Headnote :- Matrimonial offences — husband's relatives / particularised accusation - Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, and Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, were considered for the need for caution before implicating relatives merely because of their relationship or on collective allegations. Prosecution remains permissible where tangible, specific material supports their involvement. Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana, (2018) 14 SCC 452, Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, and Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, were applied to the requirement that each relative's role be specified and their separate circumstances examined in context. These authorities arose in different procedural settings; family relationship alone does not provide a conclusive defence.

Quashing — earlier complaint / omitted residence facts - In her earlier police complaint, the complainant stated that she had lived with her husband in Mumbai after marriage and described his conduct there. The later FIR and Section 161 statement neither explained any visits nor identified a specific act by either sister-in-law. Counsel's proposed explanation of visits was not pleaded. The married applicant lived separately in Bhind. On these facts, the Court held that collective allegations were insufficient to prosecute these applicants. It quashed the FIR and consequential proceedings only as to them.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married Manish Singh on 24 May 2020 at Gwalior. Her FIR alleged that, after an initially cordial period, her husband, his parents and his two sisters taunted her over dowry and demanded ₹10 lakh and a Creta car. She alleged physical and mental harassment, assault and expulsion, and stated that her parents' efforts to reconcile matters had failed. Police registered Crime No. 98/2021 at Mahila Thana Padav, Gwalior, for offences under Sections 498A, 506 and 34 IPC and Section 4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The applicants were the husband's sisters. Applicant no. 1 was married and was said to live separately in Bhind; applicant no. 2 was unmarried. They sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC, contending that the complainant had lived with her husband in Mumbai and that they had no role in the alleged acts. The State and the complainant opposed the application. During arguments, the complainant's counsel acknowledged that she had lived in Mumbai and asserted that she was harassed on visits to Gwalior. He conceded, however, that those visits were not alleged in the FIR or her Section 161 statement. The Court read her earlier complaint of 29 December 2020. It described her move to Mumbai soon after marriage, her husband's conduct there, her rescue by her father and uncle, and later demands attributed collectively to her in-laws.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, cautioned against implicating relatives in dowry death merely because of their association with the husband. Its reference to proof beyond reasonable doubt concerns conviction. Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, recognised the possibility that all family members might be named through exaggeration and required tangible material against distant relatives. It also cautioned against a mechanical assessment of harassment allegations. Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, 2013 (1) UC 155, quashed vague allegations against relatives, including a married sister-in-law, in the particular context of residence and delay. K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana, (2018) 14 SCC 452, warned against omnibus allegations against distant relatives. It recognised intervention to prevent abuse of process, while cautioning against routine interference at an interlocutory stage. Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, urged careful scrutiny of allegations against relatives living in different cities. Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, required particulars of each accused's acts, rather than mere repetition of statutory language. Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, treated casual naming without active involvement as insufficient. The Court reproduced and adopted these authorities as a common caution against implicating relatives through unsupported collective allegations. All the authorities were applied to the applicants' individual roles, residence and the earlier complaint.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the application invoking inherent powers to quash the FIR and consequential proceedings. The FIR invoked Sections 498A, 506 and 34 IPC and Section 4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The Court examined whether the allegations of harassment and dowry demand specifically connected each applicant to the alleged conduct so as to disclose a prima facie case. It did not finally decide the ingredients or proof of each charged offence. The complainant's statement under Section 161 CrPC was considered because it did not allege any visit to the Gwalior household.

4. Issues : Whether the two sisters-in-law could be required to face trial on collective allegations of dowry demand and harassment when one lived separately, the complainant's earlier complaint described her residence with her husband in Mumbai, and the later FIR and Section 161 statement did not specify visits or distinct acts by either applicant. The Court also had to determine the extent of any quashing, since the other accused had not applied for it.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court contrasted the FIR's general allegations against all the in-laws with the complainant's earlier police complaint, which described her move to Mumbai soon after marriage and her husband's conduct there. It found that the later FIR and Section 161 statement omitted her Mumbai residence and the visits raised orally by counsel. Applying the Supreme Court authorities, the Court held that family relationship and a collective demand were insufficient, in these circumstances, to sustain proceedings against the two sisters. Applicant no. 1 was married and lived separately in Bhind. That fact, together with the absence of a specific act attributed to either applicant, supported the conclusion. The Court found the allegations against them vague and misleading and held that no prima facie case had been made out to send them for trial. This finding concerned their alleged participation at the quashing stage. It did not acquit the husband or establish a general rule that relatives living separately cannot commit matrimonial offences.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application. It quashed Crime No. 98/2021 and all consequential criminal proceedings for offences under Sections 498A, 506 and 34 IPC and Section 4 Dowry Prohibition Act only insofar as they concerned Aarti Morya and the other applicant. The order did not quash the entire case against family members who were not applicants.

Aarti Morya and Ors. v. The State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 24751/2021, 14/02/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR — preliminary inquiry — cognizable information - Applying Lalita Kumari v. Government of Uttar Pradesh, (2014) 2 SCC 1, and CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045 of 2021, the Court held that a preliminary inquiry before registration of an FIR is not mandatory where the information discloses a cognizable offence. Any permissible limited inquiry is confined to whether such an offence is disclosed; it does not test the truth of the information. The absence of a preliminary inquiry alone neither invalidated the two FIRs nor provided a ground for quashing them.

FIR — pre-registration hearing — suspect's rights - Following SBI v. Rajesh Agrawal, (2023) 6 SCC 1, on the position at the stage of reporting a criminal offence, the Court rejected the claimed right to a hearing before registration of an FIR. The absence of prior notice or an opportunity to answer the allegations did not, by itself, entitle the petitioner to quashing.

Article 226 — investigation agency — accused's choice - Invoking Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, the Court held that an accused has no right to choose the investigating agency or dictate how the investigation is conducted. The exceptional constitutional power to direct an independent investigation remains available where substantiated grounds justify it. The petitioner's request and allegations, as presented, did not warrant intervention.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Abhishek Pandey appeared in person and described himself as a student leader. He filed a petition under Article 226 seeking an independent and fair inquiry, action against police officers, and quashing of FIR No. 178/2024 dated 07.04.2024 at Police Station Bhedaghat and FIR No. 183/2024 dated 13.04.2024 at Police Station Lordganj, both in Jabalpur. The first complaint alleged that Pandey, Aryan Tiwari and their companions entered the British School at Kudan, abused staff, damaged furniture and equipment, and threatened the principal. The second police complaint alleged that officers came to Pandey's home in connection with the first case, but he refused them entry, abused and scuffled with them, and tried to evade arrest. It further alleged that his relatives joined in assaulting the officers. These were FIR allegations, not findings of guilt. Copies of both case diaries were before the Court. Pandey acknowledged visiting the school in his claimed capacity as a student leader. He argued, however, that the police were required to verify the truth of the allegations before registration and give him a hearing. After the Court asked him to identify legal authority permitting a self-described student leader to enter a school without authorisation, the order records no other developed argument.

2. Precedents — Considered : In Lalita Kumari v. Government of Uttar Pradesh, (2014) 2 SCC 1, the Constitution Bench directed immediate registration under Section 154 CrPC when information discloses a cognizable offence. Where disclosure is uncertain, a limited inquiry may ascertain whether such an offence is disclosed, without testing the truth of the information. The High Court reproduced the illustrative categories for inquiry, the time limit and the diary-record requirements. It relied on the distinction between an inquiry that is permissible and one that is a mandatory precondition. In CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045 of 2021, decided 08.10.2021, the Supreme Court applied Lalita Kumari to clarify that a preliminary inquiry may be desirable even in corruption and disproportionate-assets cases, but is not invariably mandatory. Its omission does not, by itself, vitiate an FIR. The extensive passage reproduced by the High Court discussed P. Sirajuddin, Yashwant Sinha, Managipet and Charansingh in their respective corruption-related settings. The Court also cited its own order in Avijit Sharma v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. No. 9662/2022, dated 14.03.2024, for the same rule that absence of a preliminary inquiry does not itself vitiate an FIR. Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was invoked for the principle that an accused is not entitled to select the agency or insist on a particular manner of investigation. The reproduced Supreme Court analysis referred to Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt and E. Sivakumar on the accused's limited participation during investigation. It also distinguished the continuing power under Article 226 to address a mala fide investigation and, through State of West Bengal v. Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571, the exceptional and cautious exercise of the power to transfer an investigation to the CBI. In its own factual setting, the quoted Romila Thapar passage found unsubstantiated allegations insufficient. The High Court adopted its governing principle on the accused's choice of agency here. In SBI v. Rajesh Agrawal, (2023) 6 SCC 1, the Court relied on the distinction between a hearing under the principles of natural justice before a bank classifies an account as fraud and the absence of a right to a hearing when a criminal offence is reported. That Supreme Court passage cited Union of India v. W.N. Chadha and Anju Chaudhary v. State of U.P. for the absence of a right to be heard before registration of an FIR.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution provided the writ jurisdiction invoked for directions concerning investigation and for quashing the FIRs. Section 154 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, as explained in Lalita Kumari and Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, governed whether the information disclosed a cognizable offence requiring registration or called for a limited preliminary inquiry. The judgment's reference to constitutional supervision of investigation did not give an accused a right to direct an ordinary investigation.

4. Issues : (i) Could the petitioner invalidate the two FIRs merely because no preliminary inquiry had tested the complaints before registration? (ii) Was a suspect entitled to notice and a hearing before registration of an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence? (iii) On the material presented, did the petitioner's request under Article 226 for an independent agency and action against officers justify intervention in the ongoing police investigation? The Court did not decide the truth of the complaint allegations or whether the specific charged offences were proved. Nor did it decide the legality of an individual arrest step on a separately developed challenge.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the first issue, the Court examined the FIR accounts and rejected the contention that police must verify the truth of the allegations before registering an offence. Lalita Kumari requires registration when the information discloses cognizable criminal conduct. Any inquiry permissible in an appropriate case is limited to whether such conduct is disclosed. Thommandru

Hannah Vijayalakshmi confirmed that, even where an inquiry may be desirable, the accused has no automatic right to insist on it. Failure to hold an inquiry alone does not vitiate an FIR. The Court therefore rejected that ground for quashing without deciding whether either complaint was true. On the second issue, relying on SBI v. Rajesh Agrawal and the authorities cited in it, the Court held that an accused has no right to a prior hearing at the registration stage. The absence of notice or an opportunity to contest the allegations before registration therefore afforded no relief. On control of the investigation, the Romila Thapar passage stated that an accused ordinarily cannot select the investigator, dictate how the investigation is conducted, or require court monitoring. Exceptional constitutional supervision remains available where a proper factual foundation warrants it, but the Court found no ground in this petition for the requested intervention. Pandey admitted going to the school but cited no law permitting unauthorised entry in his asserted role as a student leader. The Court did not infer criminal guilt from that exchange. These conclusions were confined to the writ petition and the grounds actually advanced.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. It refused to quash FIR Nos. 178/2024 and 183/2024 on the asserted grounds of absence of a preliminary inquiry or a hearing before registration. It issued no direction for an independent investigation or action against police officers. The FIRs remained in place. The order did not convict the petitioner, determine the ultimate outcome of the investigation, or impose conditions or costs.

Abhishek Pandey v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, W.P. no. 14638/2024, 08/07/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Quashing — prima facie accusation / no mini-trial - Applying Neeharika Infrastructure v. State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, the Court held that investigation should proceed where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence. The Court does not determine the reliability or genuineness of the allegations at this stage. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was applied to distinguish specific allegations of cruelty against the husband and his parents from the mere naming of more distant relatives. Whether the allegations are true is a matter for trial.

Matrimonial FIR — restitution petition / alleged counterblast - Following Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court held that civil matrimonial proceedings do not, by themselves, end criminal proceedings. Allegations in the civil petition cannot replace the prima facie assessment of the FIR. The husband's allegations in his Section 9 petition had not been tried and could not establish retaliation. A wife's attempts to preserve or restore the marriage may explain the interval before a complaint. The applicants' request to quash the FIR was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married applicant no. 1, Abhishek Sarvariya, on 22 January 2017. Her FIR alleged that her father spent ₹8 lakh at the marriage and that she was treated well until 19 June 2017. Thereafter, her husband and his parents allegedly demanded ₹2 lakh repeatedly for a shop. She alleged that her husband assaulted her, her parents-in-law harassed her, and on 20 November 2020 she was expelled and told that she would be taken back only on payment. Her relatives' attempts at reconciliation failed. Crime No. 48/2021 was registered at Kotwali Datia on 1 February 2021 for offences under Section 498A IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The husband, father-in-law and mother-in-law sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC. They asserted that the allegations were false and that the FIR was a counterblast to the husband's petition under Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act for restitution of conjugal rights. The State opposed the application. The Court assessed the FIR's allegations without deciding whether they were true.

2. Precedents — Considered : Neeharika Infrastructure Private Limited v. State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, stated the restraint applicable at the FIR stage. Allegations disclosing a cognizable offence should be investigated; the Court should not decide their reliability or conduct a mini-trial. Exceptional quashing jurisdiction remains available where the legal parameters justify it. The judgment reproduced its caution that an FIR is not an encyclopedia and that the parameters laid down in R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal continue to govern quashing. S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das, Mohd. Akram Siddiqui, Gourishetty Mahesh, M. Srikanth, Arvind Khanna, Kunwar Singh, Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo, Sangeeta Agrawal, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha were also cited as confirming that position. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was applied to reject a civil matrimonial petition as an automatic ground for quashing criminal allegations and to recognise that attempts at settlement can explain delay. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was applied to specific allegations against the husband and his parents. The Kailash Chandra Agrawal discussion quoted in it separately cautioned against proceedings based only on the casual naming of distant relatives. The present applicants were the husband and his parents, and the Court found distinct allegations against them.

3. Statutes considered : The application was filed under Section 482 CrPC. The Court also referred to Section 528 BNSS when describing its inherent power. Section 498A IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act were the registered offences. The husband's petition for restitution of conjugal rights was under Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act. Its allegations were treated as unproved civil assertions for the purposes of the FIR-stage inquiry.

4. Issues : Did the FIR's allegations against the husband and his parents disclose a cognizable offence sufficient to withstand quashing under the Court's inherent powers, despite their assertion that the allegations were false? Could the husband's restitution petition and the interval before the complaint establish that the FIR was retaliatory or false without findings at trial?

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying Neeharika, the Court held that it could not conduct a mini-trial to determine the reliability or credibility of the allegations. The FIR attributed assaults to the husband and a specific demand for ₹2 lakh, harassment and expulsion to all the applicants. Taramani Parakh supported leaving these specific accusations against the husband and his parents for trial, as distinct from general allegations against distant relatives. Pratibha established that civil matrimonial proceedings cannot, by themselves, displace a criminal case arising from the same facts and that efforts to save a marriage can explain the interval before a complaint. The husband's Section 9 assertions had not been adjudicated. They could not be accepted as facts merely to characterise the FIR as a counterblast. These were prima facie conclusions. The Court neither decided guilt nor found the wife's allegations proved, and it did not determine the precise chronology of the delay.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. Crime No. 48/2021 and its proceedings remained pending against the three applicants. The Court granted no quashing relief and made no finding of guilt.

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty — relatives / specific allegations - Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207; Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693; Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan; Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741; and Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, (2010) 7 SCC 667, were considered for the caution required against implicating relatives through vague, collective allegations. The Court found that the present case was different because the FIR attributed abuse and assault to the sister-in-law on a stated date. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was applied to the specific allegations against the husband and parents; whether those allegations were true remained a matter for trial.

Quashing — reconciliation agreement / omitted accusations - The Court considered an early agreement intended to preserve the marriage. Failure to mention every alleged act in that agreement did not conclusively contradict the later detailed FIR.

Matrimonial FIR — restitution petition / counterblast - Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was followed: a husband's civil matrimonial pleading does not by itself bring criminal proceedings to an end, and efforts to reconcile may explain a delay in lodging the complaint. The restitution petition filed in July 2023 did not justify assuming that the FIR was fabricated when it contained specific allegations. The Section 482 application was dismissed as to all four applicants.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married applicant no. 1, Abhishek Sharma, on 22 February 2023. Her FIR stated that, soon after she entered the matrimonial home, her parents-in-law taunted her about insufficient dowry, her sister-in-law quarrelled with her, and her husband assaulted and threatened her. She also described her husband as drinking alcohol. She alleged that all four applicants demanded a car, ₹5 lakh, her salary and transfer of her parents' house. On 28 April 2023, her mother and relatives visited to reconcile matters. She alleged that applicant no. 4, the sister-in-law, abused them and assaulted her in their presence, and that her husband struck her brother when he intervened. She stated that she returned to her parental home on 29 April, received another monetary demand by telephone, and sought assistance from the Mahila Parmarsh Kendra before lodging FIR No. 291/2023 at Mahila Thana, Bhopal, for offences under Sections 498A, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The four applicants sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC on the ground that the allegations were vague and omnibus. They also relied on a marital agreement which, they said, did not mention cruelty, and on a petition for restitution of conjugal rights filed by the husband on 19 July 2023. The judgment records that the FIR was registered on 2 October 2023. The State opposed quashing. The accusations remained unproved at this procedural stage.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, 2013 (1) UC 155, Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, and Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, (2010) 7 SCC 667, were cited together for the need to scrutinise vague, collective allegations against a husband's relatives. The Court did not treat that caution as immunity from prosecution: it found a specific allegation of assault and abuse against this sister-in-law on a stated date. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, reproduced the distinction between merely naming distant relatives and making allegations against the husband and parents that raise issues of cruelty requiring trial. The Court applied the latter reasoning to applicant nos. 1–3. The passages from Kailash Chandra Agrawal and Kans Raj quoted in Taramani explain the distinction concerning distant relatives. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was applied to reject the inference that an earlier civil matrimonial proceeding makes the wife's FIR a counterblast, and to recognise that reconciliation efforts can explain a delay in lodging the complaint. The Court did not treat a civil decree as conclusive evidence.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the quashing application. The FIR invoked Sections 498A, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The husband relied on his petition for restitution of conjugal rights under Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act to support his contention that the FIR was a counterblast. The Court did not finally determine whether the statutory ingredients were satisfied, whether the agreement was enforceable, or the merits of the restitution petition.

4. Issues : (1) Whether the allegation against the sister-in-law was merely general or sufficiently specific, bearing in mind the caution required when prosecuting relatives. (2) Whether the specific allegations against the husband and parents required a trial, rather than an assessment of credibility at the FIR stage. (3) Whether the absence of cruelty allegations in the early marital agreement established fabrication. (4) Whether the husband's earlier restitution petition made the later FIR retaliatory or brought the criminal proceedings to an end.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court identified a specific allegation that the sister-in-law assaulted the complainant and abused her visiting relatives on 28 April 2023. It applied the Supreme Court's caution regarding allegations against relatives, but found that the accusation went beyond merely naming a family member. The allegations against the husband and parents included dowry demands, physical or mental harassment and expulsion soon after marriage. The Court therefore applied Taramani Parakh's principle that such issues require trial. As to the agreement, the Court inferred that the parties were trying to preserve the marriage and allow time for their behaviour to improve; it did not require the complainant to list every accusation in a reconciliation document. Applying Pratibha, it rejected the argument that the husband's Section 9 pleading automatically made the FIR a counterblast. It concluded that a prima facie case warranted prosecution of all four applicants, without deciding guilt, the validity of the agreement, or whether the complainant's account would ultimately be believed.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the application. FIR No. 291/2023 and the consequential prosecution continued against all four applicants; no applicant obtained partial quashing.

Headnote :- Inherent powers — compromise / public impact / bank official - Gian Singh v. State of Punjab, (2012) 10 SCC 303, was cited for the High Court's limited power to quash proceedings on settlement even where Section 320 CrPC does not permit compounding. Narinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 6 SCC 466, was applied: the Court must distinguish private disputes of a civil character from offences with serious consequences for society, consider the prospect of conviction and the stage of trial, and exercise its power under Section 482 cautiously. The charge under Section 420 had been compounded, but charges under Sections 409, 467, 468, 471 and 120B IPC remained. The alleged transfer of funds associated with a deceased account holder to a friend of the bank's relationship manager raised concerns about confidence in banking. Substantial evidence had already been recorded. Compromise and the assertion that some witnesses were hostile did not result in quashing. Guilt and the weight of the evidence remained for the trial court to decide.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Abhishek Tiwari worked as a relationship manager at HDFC Bank, Sagar. According to the account placed before the High Court, a loan of ₹8.20 lakh had been sanctioned against the joint KCC account of Devi Singh and Devendra Singh. After Devi Singh's death, Devendra Singh's brother, Ramnaresh, requested a no-dues certificate. He later complained that he had not received it, and an alleged transfer to an account belonging to the applicant's friend then came to light. Crime No. 290/2019 led to Sessions Trial No. 129/2021 before the IV Additional Sessions Judge, Sagar. The applicant stated that, on an application under Section 320 CrPC, the trial court had compounded the offence under Section 420 IPC by order dated 5 January 2022, but had refused compounding for Sections 409, 467, 468, 471 and 120B IPC. He sought quashing of the remaining charge sheet under Section 482, stating that twelve witnesses had testified and some had turned hostile. The Court asked counsel to explain the legal basis for quashing and the effect of the alleged role of a bank official on public confidence. Counsel gave no substantive answer. The record mentions PW6 Manoj Tiwari's evidence that the applicant had been dismissed from bank service. The Court did not treat these accusations and testimony as establishing guilt.

2. Precedents — Considered : Gian Singh v. State of Punjab, (2012) 10 SCC 303, was cited for the proposition that inherent powers may, in appropriate circumstances, be exercised to dispose of proceedings even where the offences are not compoundable. Narinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 6 SCC 466, was quoted in detail and applied. It distinguishes statutory compounding under Section 320 from the cautious exercise of powers under Section 482 after settlement. It directs attention to securing justice or preventing abuse of process, excludes serious offences affecting the public from routine closure on compromise, favours quashing of certain disputes of a predominantly civil or family character after full resolution, and requires consideration of the prospect of conviction and the timing of settlement. Its specific discussion of Section 307 IPC, injuries, weapons and compromise after conviction illustrates the limits in that context; those facts were not present here. The High Court applied the broader principles concerning impact on society to refuse quashing of the alleged misappropriation by a bank official.

3. Statutes considered : Section 320 CrPC governed the trial court's compounding of the offence under Section 420 IPC and its refusal to compound the remaining offences. The separate request for quashing was made under Section 482 CrPC. The remaining charges were under Sections 409, 467, 468, 471 and 120B IPC and concerned alleged breach of trust, offences involving documents and conspiracy. The individual ingredients of those offences were not adjudicated in this order.

4. Issues : Whether a private settlement and compounding of the offence under Section 420 IPC justified quashing the prosecution for the remaining non-compoundable offences under Section 482, given the alleged role of a bank relationship manager in transferring funds, the effect on public trust, and the stage of a trial in which twelve witnesses had already been examined.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court distinguished compounding under Section 320 from quashing under its inherent powers and applied Narinder Singh's principles concerning impact on society. It regarded the alleged defalcation by a bank official, particularly the transfer of funds relating to a deceased customer's account to the official's friend, as an accusation capable of undermining public trust in the bank. That aspect prevented the case from being treated as a purely private matter resolved by settlement. The trial was already substantially under way. The assertion that some witnesses had turned hostile did not lead the High Court to determine the prosecution's evidentiary strength in this proceeding. The Court referred to PW6's evidence about dismissal from service, but did not decide the final evidentiary effect of that testimony. It refused to quash the remaining charges without determining whether the charged acts had occurred.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. The earlier discharge following compounding of the offence under Section 420 was not disturbed. The trial continued on the remaining charges under Sections 409, 467, 468, 471 and 120B IPC.

Headnote :- Evidence — child eyewitness / minor omissions - Suryanarayana v. State of Karnataka, (2001) 9 SCC 129, was applied: tender age alone is not a ground for rejecting the testimony, and corroboration is a matter of caution rather than a mandatory requirement where the material account withstands cross-examination, inspires confidence and rules out tutoring. Mushkan (PW3) described her father stabbing her mother. The injured-witness and medical evidence provided further support.

Witnesses — independent examination / injured family member - Guru Dutt Pathak v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2021) 6 SCC 116, was followed: failure to examine independent witnesses is not fatal by itself; the quality of evidence matters rather than the number of witnesses. Injured Najma (PW1) remained consistent on material particulars. Her fresh sharp-weapon wound, the child's evidence and the accounts of others who promptly arrived supported her version.

Medical and ocular evidence — untested weapon - On the evidence in this case, the absence of a forensic report on the recovered knife and of a doctor's comparison of the knife with the injuries did not require acquittal. The recovery evidence, eyewitness accounts of repeated stabbing and postmortem findings of multiple fatal injuries caused by a sharp penetrating weapon were treated as consistent with one another. The Court did not state a general rule permitting every gap in forensic evidence to be disregarded.

Contradictions — materiality / cumulative proof - Krishna Gope v. State of Bihar, (2003) 10 SCC 45, was considered for the principle that peripheral mistakes by witnesses are not fatal to the prosecution. The Bench rejected objections based on minor omissions, FIR timing and access to the room in light of the substantially consistent eyewitness and medical evidence. It affirmed the convictions under Sections 302 and 324 IPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Najia, the wife of appellant Abid Mohammad Siddiki, was living with her children at her parents' home after matrimonial discord and an earlier police report. The prosecution alleged that, early on 8 April 2010, the appellant entered the home and repeatedly stabbed her. Her younger sister, Najma (PW1), intervened and suffered a knife injury. Najia's daughter, Mushkan (PW3), saw her father stabbing her mother and tried to stop him. The parents, alerted by cries, stated that they arrived while the attack was continuing. Najia died at the scene. A merg report and FIR followed. The investigation included collection of material from the scene, medical examinations, arrest and the alleged recovery of a knife on the basis of the appellant's memorandum. The prosecution examined eleven witnesses. The appellant denied involvement and alleged a conspiracy by his in-laws; he called no defence witness. On 18 October 2011, the 14th Sessions Judge, Gwalior, in Sessions Trial No. 272/2010, convicted him under Section 302 IPC and imposed life imprisonment and a fine of ₹3,000, with a default stipulation. The court also convicted him under Section 324 IPC and imposed one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000. The sentences were to run concurrently. On appeal, he alleged material inconsistencies, an ante-dated FIR, failure to examine independent witnesses, unreliability of the child witness, difficulty in observing entry into the room, and failure to obtain a forensic report or a doctor's comparison of the seized knife with the injuries. The State defended the verdict.

2. Precedents — Considered : Guru Dutt Pathak v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2021) 6 SCC 116, was applied to the objection that independent witnesses had not been examined. The Supreme Court's principle is that the absence of such a witness is not by itself fatal; the reliability and quality of the evidence actually given are decisive. Suryanarayana

v. State of Karnataka, (2001) 9 SCC 129, was considered in relation to child-witness testimony: age is not an automatic bar, while cross-examination, confidence in the testimony and absence of tutoring are relevant. Corroboration is a matter of caution rather than a formal prerequisite. The Bench applied that principle to Mushkan's central account of her father stabbing her mother. Krishna Gope v. State of Bihar, (2003) 10 SCC 45, was reproduced for assessing minor inconsistencies and the opportunity of eyewitnesses to observe events in their actual context. The Bench applied it to reject peripheral discrepancies while retaining the material prosecution case in view. It assessed the untested recovered knife together with the eyewitness, recovery and medical evidence in this case.

3. Statutes considered : The Court affirmed the convictions under Sections 302 and 324 IPC, respectively for the fatal assault on Najia and the sharp-weapon injury to Najma. The offences were initially registered under Sections 302 and 307 IPC, but the trial convictions recorded in the appeal were under Sections 302 and 324.

4. Issues : Whether the trial court's convictions for murder and hurt could be sustained despite alleged contradictions in the evidence of the child and other eyewitnesses, failure to examine independent witnesses, challenges to FIR timing and access to the room, and the absence of forensic comparison of the seized knife; and whether the eyewitness accounts, injured-witness evidence and medical findings together proved that the appellant had fatally stabbed Najia and injured Najma.

5. Ratio / Findings : Najma (PW1) testified that she saw the appellant repeatedly stab Najia and that she intervened and was cut. Her account remained unchanged on material particulars in cross-examination. Shortly after the incident, a doctor documented a fresh wound caused by a sharp weapon. Mushkan (PW3) described her father stabbing her mother and her attempt to stop him. The Bench treated minor omissions as peripheral and found no reason to reject her evidence merely because she was a child. Najia's parents stated that they arrived on hearing cries and saw the attack. The postmortem recorded numerous penetrating and incised wounds, including serious chest and abdominal injuries to vital organs, and attributed death to shock and haemorrhage caused by a single-edged sharp weapon. The Court found those medical findings consistent with the eyewitness account. It considered the knife allegedly recovered on the appellant's disclosure and the material from the scene. It rejected the defence contention that the absence of a forensic report or a doctor's comparison necessarily defeated the prosecution case. Applying Guru Dutt Pathak, it found that additional independent witnesses were unnecessary in view of the credible injured witness and other eyewitnesses. Applying Krishna Gope, it did not allow peripheral objections about timing or opportunity to observe to outweigh the consistent central account. It concluded that the appellant had inflicted the fatal attack and injured Najma, and affirmed the trial court's assessment of proof.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the conviction and concurrent sentences dated 18 October 2011 under Sections 302 and 324 IPC, including the fines and default stipulations. The appellant, stated to be in jail, was directed to remain there to serve the balance of his sentence. Copies were directed to be sent to the jail authorities and the trial court.

Headnote :- Evidence — test identification parade / child witness - Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1; Prakash v. State of Karnataka, (2014) 12 SCC 133; Sheo Shankar Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 3 SCC 654; and Mulla v. State of U.P., (2010) 3 SCC 508, were considered. Identification at a parade provides corroboration; identification in court is substantive evidence, but the weight to be attached to it depends on the circumstances. The frightened six-year-old's failure to identify the accused at the parade was assessed alongside her detailed and repeated identification in court, the evidence of two other identifying witnesses and the medical evidence.

Sentencing — child rape / proportionality - Shyam Narain v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2013) 7 SCC 77, and Raj Bala v. State of Haryana, (2016) 1 SCC 463, guided the refusal to reduce life imprisonment merely because the period in custody exceeded the stated ten-year minimum. The Bench considered the gravity of the assault, the victim's physical injury and observed fear, and the need for proportionate punishment.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 11 March 2006, a six-year-old girl was found bleeding near a public toilet or culvert. Her father (PW1) reported the occurrence without initially naming an assailant. The prosecution alleged that an unknown man had given her a sweet and money, taken her to the toilet and raped her. Dr Sunita Jain (PW11) recorded blood stains, a ruptured hymen and a tear of the posterior vaginal wall, and gave an opinion that recent sexual assault was possible. The accused, Aftab Khan, was later identified at parades by shopkeeper Ayodhya Prasad (PW2) and bystander Rishabh Vijay (PW5). The child could not identify him at the parade; the executive magistrate recorded her fear and young age. At trial, however, she identified him after initial reluctance and described the assault. PW2 and PW5 also identified him in court. On 26 August 2006, the Fourth Additional Sessions Judge (Fast Track), Shivpuri, in Sessions Trial No. 127/2006, convicted him under Section 376 IPC and sentenced him to life imprisonment. In his appeal under Section 374(2) CrPC, he challenged the identification evidence, including the child's failure at the parade. He later sought a reduction in sentence on the ground that he had already served more than eleven and a half years. The prosecution relied on the witnesses and medical findings. A shopkeeper called by the defence supported an alibi, but kept no records to substantiate it.

2. Precedents — Considered : Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, was cited for the distinction between substantive identification in court and the corroborative role of a test identification parade (TIP). It also recognised that the absence of a TIP does not automatically make identification in court inadmissible. Prakash v. State of Karnataka, (2014) 12 SCC 133, qualified that principle: a parade is desirable where a stranger has been seen briefly, and the weight of identification depends on the opportunity to observe, delay and surrounding circumstances. Its discussion of doubtful first identification did not automatically determine the result here, where two other witnesses had identified the accused at parades. Sheo Shankar Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 3 SCC 654, further explained that identification for the first time in court may be weak, that a TIP forms part of the investigation and provides corroboration, and that its absence is not inevitably fatal. It reproduced Malkhan Singh on Section 9 of the Evidence Act and Section 162 CrPC. Mulla v. State of U.P., (2010) 3 SCC 508, was cited on prompt conduct of parades and the risk of prior exposure of the accused. On sentence, Shyam Narain v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2013) 7 SCC 77, was applied in relation to gravity, proportionality, deterrence and the circumstances of the victim and society. Raj Bala v. State of Haryana, (2016) 1 SCC 463, reinforced the need to exercise sentencing discretion rationally.

3. Statutes considered : Section 376 IPC supplied the charge, conviction and sentencing issue. Counsel referred to a ten-year minimum for rape of a girl under sixteen when seeking a reduction in sentence; the Bench left the life sentence intact. Section 374(2) CrPC governed the appeal. Section 9 of the Evidence Act and Section 162 CrPC appeared in the quoted Supreme Court discussion of the relevance of identification evidence and its role during investigation. The High Court did not separately interpret those provisions. The judgment concerned an offence committed in 2006.

4. Issues : Whether guilt beyond reasonable doubt could be affirmed where the child complainant failed to identify the accused at a TIP but later identified him in court, while other witnesses identified him both at parades and in court; whether the medical findings supported the occurrence; and whether the period served beyond the stated minimum justified reducing the life sentence.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical examination showed recent genital bleeding, hymenal rupture and a vaginal-wall tear, which the Bench treated as proof of the assault on the evidence in this case. PW2 stated that he had seen the accused with the child at his shop. He identified the accused at a parade and in court, denied that the police had shown him the accused earlier, and explained the changes in beard and clothing. PW5 identified in court the man whom he had seen leaving the toilet with his trousers in his hand and blood on his shirt. The magistrate proved an earlier parade identification, although PW5 did not himself mention that parade in his testimony; the Bench expressly noted this gap. The child described the sweet, being taken to the toilet, removal of clothing and the assault. She repeatedly identified the accused in court and denied tutoring. The magistrate had recorded her fear and movement during the parade, and the trial judge recorded her initial reluctance to look at the accused. The Bench treated her failure at the parade as understandable, rather than decisive. It applied the distinction between substantive identification in court and a corroborative TIP, without treating identification in court as invariably reliable. The alibi witness provided no records to support the asserted employment and presence at the shop. These accounts, taken together with the medical evidence, established identity and guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. On sentence, the Bench treated the child's injuries and observed fear as material evidence of the impact on the victim. It considered the gravity of the assault and its consequences for society, and found life imprisonment proportionate despite the submission that eleven and a half years had been spent in custody. Its concern about possible lasting trauma was a judicial assessment, rather than medical evidence of a diagnosed condition.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the conviction under Section 376 IPC and the life sentence imposed on 26 August 2006. It declined the requested reduction in sentence.

Aftab Khan v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 653/2006, 28/03/2018, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Vivek Agarwal, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (10) Prev Next

Headnote :- Investigation — accused's role / fair process - Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was applied. An accused cannot choose the investigating agency or dictate how the investigation is conducted, although substantiated mala fides may justify exceptional judicial directions. The Court followed Prabal Dogra in distinguishing monitoring the fairness of an investigation from supervising the investigator's opinion. In the absence of specific investigative mala fides, the accused's alternative account of the complainant's travels did not justify intervention under Section 156(3) or Section 482. Section 91 CrPC may provide a later means of seeking production of documents.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In Crime No. 186/2020 at Malanpur police station, Bhind, a woman who had initially been reported missing later stated that she and her children had been taken to Haryana and that Rinka had sexually assaulted her. Aftar Khan, seeking to resist his implication in the investigation, asserted that she had instead travelled voluntarily with Vikas alias Javed through hotels and other cities, using a forged identity card. He asked the police to investigate that account and then applied to the Judicial Magistrate First Class, Gohad, under Section 156(3) CrPC. The magistrate rejected his application on the ground that an accused had no say in the matter. Khan then petitioned under Section 482 CrPC, seeking a fair and impartial investigation and challenging the magistrate's order. The High Court required counsel to address maintainability. Counsel invoked the constitutional importance of a fair investigation but did not identify specific investigative mala fides.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant cited Babubhai v. State of Gujarat, (2010) 12 SCC 254, on the fundamental importance of a fair investigation, along with State of Maharashtra v. Sheela Ramesh Kini, (1998) 9 SCC 346, and Varinder Kumar v. State of Himachal Pradesh, (2020) 3 SCC 321. The Bench relied on Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, for the governing distinction: an accused cannot choose the investigating agency or the manner of investigation. Specific material showing mala fide exercise of investigative power may justify appropriate directions under Article 226, while the extraordinary power to transfer an investigation to the CBI must be exercised sparingly and in exceptional circumstances. The quotations from Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt, E. Sivakumar and the Constitution Bench decision in Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights formed part of Romila Thapar's reasoning; the Bench made no separate findings under those cases here. The Bench also quoted and followed its earlier decision i*n Prabal Dogra v. Superintendent of Police, Gwalior* (MCRC 10446/2017, 30 November 2017). That decision used Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary to distinguish monitoring an inquiry to ensure that it is free, fair and timely from judicial supervision of the investigating officer's conclusion.

3. Statutes considered : Section 156(3) CrPC was the basis of the application rejected by the magistrate; Section 482 CrPC was invoked for relief before the High Court. Section 91 CrPC was identified as a possible later means of seeking production of hotel or other records; no order under that provision was made. Article 226 was discussed through Romila Thapar as an exceptional constitutional route where mala fides are substantiated; it was not the basis of any relief granted here. The quoted authorities mentioned Sections 154 and 173(2) CrPC in explaining FIR registration and investigative autonomy; the Court did not adjudicate those provisions as separate claims.

4. Issues : Whether an accused may invoke Section 156(3) and Section 482 to require the police to investigate his alternative account of the complainant's movements, or to control the agency and manner of an ongoing investigation, when no specific mala fides on the investigator's part have been shown; and whether rejection of his application to the magistrate called for interference.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench held that the right to a fair investigation does not entitle an accused to dictate how the investigator tests witness accounts or forms an opinion. Judicial supervision of investigative conclusions could prejudice the later trial. Exceptional monitoring or appropriate directions require concerns about fairness to be supported by material, including actual investigative mala fides. Khan offered an alternative account of the complainant's travels and alleged use of a forged identity card, but made no specific allegation that the investigating officer had acted for extraneous reasons. On that record, the magistrate correctly refused his request, and the High Court declined to direct the police to investigate from the accused's chosen perspective. The Court expressly preserved the ordinary procedural opportunities available to Khan: he could defend himself at later stages and, if advised, seek production of hotel or other documents under Section 91 CrPC. It neither found his alternative account false nor decided the underlying sexual-offence accusation.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application, leaving the magistrate's refusal dated 13 March 2021 undisturbed. No direction for investigation or order for production of documents was made.

Headnote :- Liberty writ — foreign national / completed sentence - Bhim Singh v. Union of India, (2012) 13 SCC 471, was applied. A foreign national who has served the sentence but cannot yet be repatriated may be kept at an appropriate detention centre with restricted movement and basic facilities. Such a person cannot be kept as a prisoner solely while confirmation of nationality is awaited. Declaring a jail a temporary detention centre did not justify this petitioner's continued confinement after completion of his sentence. The Bench directed his transfer to a detention centre in Assam pending determination of nationality and deportation, while permitting a later transfer to another detention centre by order of the competent authority.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ahmed Almakki described himself as a Rohingya refugee born in Saudi Arabia to parents from Myanmar. His account of travel through Bangladesh and India, and his nationality, remained disputed or unresolved. The Union reported that Saudi Arabia would not accept him and that the Bangladeshi passport he had used was forged. He was arrested at Gwalior, convicted of offences under the Foreigners Act, 1946 and Passport Act, 1920, and completed a three-year sentence in September 2017. He alleged harsh conditions in a detention room at a police station. He left that facility in June 2018, was arrested again and received a further three-year sentence under the Foreigners Act, which he also served. From July 2021, the authorities treated part of Central Jail, Gwalior, as a temporary detention centre for him, although he was no longer serving a criminal sentence. In Writ Petition No. 1818/2023 under Article 226, he sought habeas corpus or related relief, transfer to an appropriate detention centre, efforts towards deportation, basic amenities and return of materials. Interim orders sought information about other centres and the Union's plan. On 9 December 2024, the Bench recorded that neither the State nor the Union could justify designating the jail as a detention centre. It characterised the custody as illegal and allowed them time to address transfer or payment of monthly costs. At the final hearing, the Union stated that Saudi Arabia had refused repatriation, discussions with Bangladesh were continuing, and the petitioner could be kept at a centre in Assam or West Bengal. The judgment does not resolve the factual nationality dispute.

2. Precedents — Considered : Bhim Singh v. Union of India, (2012) 13 SCC 471, was the decisive Supreme Court authority. In that case, foreign prisoners who had served their sentences could not continue to be treated as prisoners merely because confirmation of nationality and repatriation were delayed. The Supreme Court described restrictions on movement at appropriate detention centres under Section 3(2)(e) of the Foreigners Act and paragraph 11 of the Foreigners Order, with basic electricity, water and hygiene facilities. It expressly left the validity of detention under those provisions undecided. The High Court applied to Almakki's case the distinction between continued imprisonment after completion of sentence and placement in an appropriate detention centre.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution provided the writ jurisdiction. The Bench held that continued prison confinement after completion of both sentences violated Articles 20 and 21. The convictions were under the Foreigners Act, 1946 and Section 3 of the Passport Act, 1920. The judgment's account refers to Sections 14(b) and, later, 4/14 of the Foreigners Act; it does not reopen those convictions. Section 3(2)(e) of the Foreigners Act and paragraph 11 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, appeared in the quoted explanation in Bhim Singh of restrictions on movement pending repatriation. The Bench did not decide the validity of any fresh detention order or the petitioner's statutory nationality status.

4. Issues : Whether the authorities could continue to hold a foreign national in Central Jail after completion of two criminal sentences merely by declaring the prison a temporary detention centre while nationality and deportation remained unresolved; and what placement the Court could direct in the liberty writ during that period.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench treated completion of both sentences and the fact that the petitioner was no longer required in any criminal case as decisive. It had already required the Union to explain the availability of detention centres, and neither government justified designating Central Jail as a detention centre. Applying Bhim Singh, it reasoned that inability to deport a person who has served the sentence does not permit continued treatment of that person as a prisoner or deprivation of basic human dignity. It characterised Almakki's continued confinement in Central Jail as violative of Articles 20 and 21 and directed that he be lodged in a detention centre in Assam pending determination of nationality and deportation. The Union had conceded that a centre in Assam or West Bengal could be used while discussions with Bangladesh continued. The order permits transfer from the Assam centre to another detention centre if the competent authority considers it necessary. The Court did not adjudicate citizenship, the factual allegations of mistreatment, damages or the detailed adequacy of facilities at a particular centre. The requirements for basic facilities were drawn from the applied Supreme Court standard.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the writ petition with a direction to place Almakki in a detention centre in Assam until his nationality is decided and he is deported. A later transfer remained subject to an order of the competent authority. The Court made no order for monetary compensation or return of property.

Headnote :- Trial — defence witness / cross-examination - Once a party begins examining DW3, it cannot "give him up" when adverse evidence emerges during cross-examination. Sections 138 and 154 of the Evidence Act provide for the proper sequence of examination, re-examination and, with permission, questions to one's own witness. The trial court's refusal to read the evidence on the ground that the defence had not had an opportunity to cross-examine its own witness was rejected.

Evidence — medical and ocular conflict - State of Uttarakhand v. Darshan Singh, (2020) 12 SCC 605, CBI v. Mohd. Parvez Abdul Kayuum, (2019) 12 SCC 1, and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, guided the test: expert opinion does not displace credible direct testimony unless it rules out that account. Reports from other doctors and the first doctor's conduct undermined his claims concerning blackening around all wounds and the trajectory of the shots.

Unlawful assembly — Section 149 / common object - Sukhbir Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 3 SCC 327; Manjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2019) 8 SCC 529; Vinubhai Ranchhodbhai Patel v. Rajivbhai Dudabhai Patel, (2018) 7 SCC 743; and Kuldip Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2011) 5 SCC 324, were considered. Repeated exhortations to kill and the supply of cartridges proved the participation and knowledge of the particular unarmed members in this five-person assembly.

Private defence — staged injury / proportionality - The evidence did not support the alleged attack or the account of firing from the roof. The contrary circumstances included a son's close-range injury, the burning roof, the absence of cartridges on the roof, the witnesses' positions and the damaged gun later concealed by the shooter. Dismissal of the cross-complaint did not replace examination of the evidence. No imminent need for defensive action justified the indiscriminate firing.

Sentence — state appeal / rarest of rare - Amar Singh Yadav v. State of U.P., (2014) 13 SCC 443, and Santosh Kumar Singh v. State of M.P., (2014) 12 SCC 650, were applied. Despite three killings and ten injuries, the Bench rejected enhancement to death sentences. It relied on the absence of criminal antecedents or evidence negating the possibility of reformation, the context of the family land dispute and the trial court's imposition of life imprisonment.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A boundary dispute between brothers Ahmed Sayeed and Abdul Azeez brought members of their families together in village Jhujhalakheda, Vidisha, on 5 May 2003 to affix stones following an attempt to resolve the dispute. The prosecution alleged that, after a scuffle, Ahmed Sayeed returned from his home with a .12-bore gun. In that account, his son Shakeel carried cartridges, while his sons Samim and Anees, along with Yusuf, exhorted him to kill. Repeated firing killed Abdul Azeez, Fida Mohammad and Rabia Bi and injured numerous others. Gaffar Khan reported the incident in a Dehati Nalishi at 10:25 a.m.; a formal FIR followed. Medical examinations recorded extensive pellet wounds. A cross-FIR alleged that the complainant side had attacked the home, set it alight and shot Samim. The police filed a closure report. A private complaint was dismissed, and that dismissal survived revision and Section 482 proceedings. On 13 April 2010, the Additional Sessions Judge, Sironj, convicted Ahmed Sayeed, Samim, Anees and Shakeel of three counts of murder under Sections 302/149 IPC, three counts of attempted murder under Sections 307/149, and rioting under Sections 147/148. The court imposed concurrent life and lesser terms with fines. Their appeal questioned the consistency of the medical and eyewitness evidence, Samim's injuries, non-recovery of a cartridge belt and the finding of common object. They also relied on private defence and, alternatively, sought application of Section 304. The State cross-appealed for death sentences. An unusual trial question also arose: after examining medical witness DW3, the defence sought to withdraw him during prosecution cross-examination.

2. Precedents — Considered : On medical and ocular evidence, the Bench used State of Uttarakhand v. Darshan Singh, (2020) 12 SCC 605, which discussed Abdul Sayeed v. State of M.P.; CBI v. Mohd. Parvez Abdul Kayuum, (2019) 12 SCC 1; and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195. These authorities required medical opinion to be tested against reliable direct evidence, while distinguishing a case in which the medical evidence genuinely ruled out the account. Sukhbir Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 3 SCC 327; Manjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2019) 8 SCC 529; Vinubhai Ranchhodbhai Patel v. Rajivbhai Dudabhai Patel, (2018) 7 SCC 743; Kuldip Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2011) 5 SCC 324; and Lakshman Singh v. State of Bihar, (2021) 9 SCC 191, informed the distinct inquiry into common object, including exhortation by unarmed members. Nathi Lal v. State of U.P., 1990 Supp SCC 145, and State of M.P. v. Mishrilal were considered on separate evidence and coordinated trial in genuine cross-cases. Abdul Sayeed v. State of M.P., (2010) 10 SCC 259, supported reliance on injured witnesses in context. Gurvinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 525, limited any automatic inference from an accused's unexplained injury. State of Karnataka v. Moin Patel, (1996) 8 SCC 167, and Jafel Biswas v. State of W.B., (2019) 12 SCC 560, guided the treatment of delayed FIR dispatch. Nagji Odhavji Kumbhar v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 5 SCC 802, and Mohd. Asif v. State of Uttaranchal, (2009) 11 SCC 497, addressed the exceptions to murder. Amar Singh Yadav v. State of U.P., (2014) 13 SCC 443, and Santosh Kumar Singh v. State of M.P., (2014) 12 SCC 650, supplied the framework for capital sentencing. The decision also cited a Kerala High Court ruling on withdrawal of a witness, which reproduced Sukhwant Singh v. State of Punjab.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 141, 147, 148 and 149 IPC govern unlawful assembly, rioting and constructive liability. The convictions under Sections 302/149 and 307/149 were affirmed. Section 300 Exception 4 and Section 304 Part I were invoked as an alternative to murder, but that contention was rejected. Private defence was considered on the factual record and was not upheld. Section 374(2) CrPC provided the basis for the appeals against conviction. Sections 82 and 83 concerned abscondence and attachment; Section 157 concerned delayed dispatch of the FIR; and Section 354(3) appeared in the reasoning on death sentences quoted from precedent. Sections 138 and 154 of the Evidence Act governed the sequence of examination and permission to question one's own witness. Section 313 CrPC was used at trial. The State's separate appeal sought enhancement to death sentences. The decision did not alter the statutory minimum sentence.

4. Issues : Whether reliable eyewitness and medical evidence established the killings, attempted killings and identity of the assailants despite conflicting accounts of blackening, unexamined or partially examined witnesses, delayed FIR dispatch and the missing cartridge belt; whether the sons and Yusuf formed a five-person assembly sharing a common object to kill; whether the alleged attack on the house and Samim's injury justified private defence or reduction to culpable homicide; whether a party could withdraw its own witness during examination; and whether the State established that the case fell within the rarest-of-rare category warranting enhancement to death sentences.

5. Ratio / Findings : Three postmortems established homicidal deaths from shotgun fire, and reports concerning numerous injured persons corroborated the firing. Dr Arun Jaroliya's claim of blackening around practically every wound conflicted with Dr Geeta Rani Gupta's postmortem findings and Dr Amit Hadole's examinations. The Bench also criticised Jaroliya's reluctance to attend trial and his unsupported inference based on the supposed heights of the deceased men. It rejected those particular opinions while retaining the consistent medical evidence of injury and the eyewitness accounts. The defence had called Hadole (DW3) to prove Samim's wound, but sought to give him up when cross-examination extended to other victims. A witness already examined in chief cannot be withdrawn to defeat cross-examination. The trial court's contrary ruling and its suggestion that the defence had a right to cross-examine its own witness were erroneous. His partially recorded evidence was read, and the available reports were evaluated. The Bench found Gaffar and the injured witnesses substantially credible despite peripheral variations; it did not require every injured person to testify. Earlier omissions at the crime scene, non-seizure of Shakeel's cartridge belt and belated dispatch under Section 157 did not undermine the prompt report, actual investigation and corroborated testimony. The evidence contradicted the account of private defence: the roof from which firing was alleged was tiled and burning; no cartridges were shown to have been found there; injury positions did not fit firing from a single point; the cross-case account had been rejected; and Samim's close-range wound was found to be a later contrivance. Ahmed Sayeed absconded and was found with a broken gun bearing nitrate residue and cut firing pins. In finding a common object, the Bench relied on the sons' specific, repeated exhortations and Shakeel's supply of ammunition after the group returned armed, rather than mere kinship. With Yusuf, whose separate trial remained pending, the group numbered at least five. The repeated firing after the initial scuffle, which killed three and injured ten, was neither justified force nor within the sudden-fight exception to murder. The State's request for capital punishment failed. The Bench weighed the severity of the offences against the context of the family land dispute, the absence of shown criminal antecedents and the absence of evidence foreclosing reformation, and retained life imprisonment.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed both the appeal by the convicted appellants and the State's appeal. It affirmed the convictions dated 13 April 2010, concurrent life sentences on three murder counts, seven-year terms on three attempted-murder counts, rioting terms, fines and sentences in default. It rejected enhancement to death sentences. Ahmed Sayeed and Shakeel remained in jail. Samim and Anees, who had been on bail, were ordered to surrender immediately, and their bail bonds were cancelled.

Headnote :- POCSO — victim age / school record and ossification - Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, applied the statutory hierarchy of documents to a child victim. State of Chhattisgarh v. Lekhram, (2006) 5 SCC 736, and Murugan v. State of T.N., (2011) 6 SCC 111, informed the consideration of Section 35 of the Evidence Act and the probative value of entries made before the dispute arose. The proved school register and transfer certificate recorded 2 January 1997. An attested correction from 1999 made the complainant older, but did not make her an adult. Mukarrab v.

State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210, cautioned against treating approximate ossification evidence as conclusive. Her age under eighteen rendered purported consent immaterial to the charged sexual offences.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant was reported missing from her family home in September 2013. She was recovered on 11 October from the possession of appellant Ajay after roughly a month at his house in Satpada. She described a promise of marriage and repeated sexual acts; in cross-examination she also admitted that she had gone with him willingly. The appellant relied on a marriage agreement and her affidavit, and disputed that she was a child. His defence doctor assessed her age at eighteen to twenty years on the basis of an ossification test. The prosecution produced a school register and transfer certificate recording 2 January 1997. The register showed an attested correction from 2 July 1999 to 2 January 1997. A school officer produced the original and testified about the entry and correction, though he could not identify the precise source of the entry made in Class I. On 23 September 2015, the First Additional Sessions Judge, Vidisha, convicted Ajay under Section 368 and Section 376(2)(n) IPC and Section 6 POCSO, imposing concurrent seven- and ten-year terms of rigorous imprisonment and fines. Two co-accused were acquitted, and their acquittals were not challenged. In appeal, Ajay relied on the medical estimate to challenge the documentary proof of age and also relied on her account of voluntary departure.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, was applied for the sequence under Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice Rules, 2007, which the Supreme Court extended to determining a child victim's age: the prescribed educational or birth documents, where available, take precedence over medical opinion. State of Chhattisgarh v. Lekhram, (2006) 5 SCC 736, established the admissibility of a school register under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, while observing that such entries have evidentiary value and can be corroborated. Murugan v. State of Tamil Nadu, (2011) 6 SCC 111, stressed documents made ante litem motam and careful appraisal of their source and probative value. Mukarrab v. State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210, treated radiological or ossification evidence of age as a guide subject to a margin of error, rather than a precise or conclusive measure. The Bench relied on the attested school material prepared before the incident, rather than rejecting it mechanically because of the visible correction. It did not hold that an ossification report could never assist where reliable documents were unavailable.

3. Statutes considered : Section 6 POCSO and Section 376(2)(n) IPC were the provisions under which the sexual-offence convictions were recorded. The conviction under Section 368 IPC was also affirmed. Section 35 of the Evidence Act governed the admissibility and weight of the school entry made in discharge of a public duty. Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Rules, 2007, as applied to a victim by Jarnail Singh, supplied the sequence for proving age discussed by the Court. Section 374 CrPC provided the route of appeal. The judgment concerned an occurrence in 2013.

4. Issues : Whether the school record, containing a visibly corrected but authenticated date of birth entered before the incident, and the transfer certificate proved that the complainant was under eighteen despite an ossification estimate of eighteen to twenty and uncertainty about the source of the initial entry; and whether the asserted marriage agreement and voluntary departure affected the sexual-offence convictions that were affirmed.

5. Ratio / Findings : The original school register and transfer certificate both recorded 2 January 1997. The earlier visible entry was 2 July 1999, and the principal had attested the correction. The correction made the complainant older and therefore did not favour a finding that she was a child. The records had been prepared long before the alleged offence. The Bench accepted them under Section 35, treating the inability to explain precisely the source of the Class I entry as insufficient to displace their probative value in these circumstances. The ossification estimate of eighteen to twenty was less precise and remained subordinate to the accepted documentary age. Either recorded birth date placed her below eighteen when the incident occurred in September 2013; the Court adopted 2 January 1997. It considered her recovery from Ajay's possession, her account of repeated sexual acts and her admission of voluntary departure. As she was a child, the purported consent and marriage materials did not negate liability under the charged sexual provisions. The Court affirmed proof beyond reasonable doubt without disturbing the unchallenged acquittals of the other two accused.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the conviction dated 23 September 2015. It affirmed the concurrent seven-year term under Section 368 and ten-year term under Section 376(2)(n)/Section 6 POCSO, together with the fines and default imprisonment. The ten-year term for the sexual offence was identified as the minimum then applicable. Ajay remained in jail.

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty — relatives / specific acts - K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana, Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2018 (21 August 2018), Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, Monju Roy v. State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693, Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan and Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, guided scrutiny of omnibus allegations. The complainant did not dispute that the two applicants were about thirteen and eleven when all the in-laws allegedly began demanding ₹5 lakh. Neither the FIR nor the Section 161 statement specified any act by them. The FIR was quashed insofar as it concerned these applicants.

Costs — implausible collective accusation - The Court imposed costs of ₹10,000 on the complainant for the unsupported inclusion of the siblings. Of this amount, ₹4,000 was payable to each of the two applicants and ₹2,000 to the Registry. The costs were payable within sixty days.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A woman married Pramod in July 2005 and lodged Crime No. 360/2017 at Kotwali, Bhind. She alleged that, from about 2006, his family collectively demanded ₹5 lakh and harassed her mentally and physically for non-payment. The police registered offences under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The husband's younger brother, Ajay Batham, and sister applied under Section 482 CrPC. They stated their ages in the petition as twenty-four and twenty-two and asserted that they had been twelve and ten when the marriage took place. They were therefore about thirteen and eleven when the alleged demand began. The complainant filed a reply but did not dispute those pleaded ages. Her Section 161 statement repeated the collective accusation without describing what either applicant had done or how either had harassed her. They sought quashing as to themselves. The State and complainant maintained that the allegations of demand and harassment were sufficient. The judgment does not decide the husband's or other in-laws' liability.

2. Precedents — Considered : K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana (Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2018, 21 August 2018) was cited for restraint in prosecuting relatives on omnibus matrimonial allegations and the threshold of abuse of process, referring to State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal. Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, cautioned against indiscriminate inclusion of relations. Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, required specific material against distant relatives and distinguished omnibus allegations against brothers, sisters and other relatives from those against the husband and parents. Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan illustrated quashing for general accusations in the particular chronology of that case. Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand and Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, reinforced careful scrutiny and the need to state individual roles. Arnesh Kumar v. State of Bihar, (2014) 8 SCC 273, was quoted on misuse and concerns about arrest, but the operative question here was quashing, rather than an arrest order. The Bench applied those principles to the undisputed chronology of the applicants' childhood and the lack of particulars.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC supplied the inherent jurisdiction to quash proceedings amounting to an abuse of process. Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the offences registered in the FIR. The complainant's statement under Section 161 CrPC was also examined for particulars of individual acts. The Court found no prima facie case against these particular relatives on the pleaded facts.

4. Issues : Whether a collective allegation that all the in-laws began demanding ₹5 lakh and harassing the wife from 2006 made out a prima facie case against the husband's younger siblings, given their undisputed minority at that time and the absence of any stated individual act; and whether their inclusion warranted quashing and costs in the circumstances of the case.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench accepted the applicants' pleaded ages because the complainant did not dispute them. According to the FIR's chronology, the siblings were about thirteen and eleven when the alleged collective demand began. Yet neither the complaint nor the police statement specified any overt act or concrete manner of physical or mental harassment by either applicant. The Court considered these allegations vague, omnibus and too far from reality. It reasoned that minors of those ages were not expected to understand the meaning of dowry or to harass the complainant for non-fulfilment of a dowry demand. On the undisputed ages and absence of particulars, it found no prima facie case requiring these two applicants to face trial. The ruling was confined to the younger brother-in-law and sister-in-law. The Court did not test the evidence at a full trial. It characterised their inclusion as a serious misuse that subjected them to the needless burden of criminal proceedings and awarded costs in the specified allocation.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application and quashed Crime No. 360/2017 under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act only insofar as the two applicants were concerned. It ordered respondent No. 2 to deposit costs of ₹10,000 within sixty days, of which ₹4,000 was payable to each applicant and ₹2,000 to the High Court Registry.

Headnote :- Kidnapping — minor's voluntary departure / enticement - Anversinh alias Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat, Criminal Appeal No. 1919/2010 (12 January 2021), distinguished an independent, informed departure from guardianship without assistance or inducement by the accused from active enticement. The school record showed that the girl was a minor when she met the petitioner at night and travelled with him on the prospect of marriage. The asserted marriage, her subsequent adulthood and her statements of willingness did not justify quashing the kidnapping and related sexual-offence charges; the reported physical relations began before she attained majority, when consent could not defeat the statutory allegations. S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, and Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, guided the inquiry into whether the allegations, taken at face value, warranted quashing.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In December 2019, a girl's father reported that she had disappeared during the night and that Ajay Jatav was also missing. Her school record gave her date of birth as 1 February 2002. She was therefore still under eighteen when she left during the night of 20–21 December 2019. She was later recovered with the petitioner and a child in January 2021. Her statements under Sections 161 and 164 CrPC described meeting him outside her home, travelling via Bhopal to Isanpur, Telangana, and living with him. In the latter statement, she said she had left voluntarily and described sexual relations roughly ten days after arrival. She wanted to remain with him. The accounts differed on the marriage chronology; her Section 164 statement placed the marriage in early 2020. The statements differed on the precise month of marriage, but the reported sequence placed the first sexual relations before she attained majority in February 2020. A charge sheet under Sections 363, 366 and 376 IPC and Sections 5/6 POCSO had been filed, and trial was pending in Sessions Trial No. 19/2021. The petitioner invoked Article 226 to seek quashing of the charge sheet and proceedings. He relied on their love, marriage and child, the prosecutrix's current adulthood and stated consent, as well as the stalled trial and refusal of bail. The petition contained a clerical inconsistency in the crime year: the pleading initially stated 2018 instead of 2019. The Court allowed amendment and did not decide the quashing issue on that error.

2. Precedents — Considered : Anversinh alias Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat (Criminal Appeal No. 1919/2010, decided 12 January 2021) was applied to kidnapping. Under S. Varadarajan's principle, voluntary departure assists the accused only if the minor knew and could understand the full import of her act, voluntarily left guardianship, and received no assistance or inducement from the accused. A minor's purported consent does not defeat a charge based on enticement. S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, referred to Bhajan Lal's exceptional grounds for quashing and the need for a genuine prima facie allegation. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, was reproduced to caution against a mini-trial or consideration of the accused's external defence at the stage of charge. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, restated that proceedings may be quashed where the allegations genuinely disclose no offence; on this record, the Bench found material allegations. The petitioner cited Bhajan Lal and decisions of the Allahabad and Delhi High Courts concerning mature couples. The Court distinguished the present case by the girl's age when the relevant acts occurred.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 363 and 366 IPC concerned the alleged taking or enticement of a minor and marriage-related abduction. Section 376 IPC and Sections 5/6 POCSO concerned alleged sexual activity while she was a child. The Court treated the age shown by the school record and the timing of the physical relations as decisive for the threshold inquiry, rather than as a final finding of guilt. Sections 161 and 164 CrPC supplied the recorded statements of the complainant. Article 226 was the pleaded route for seeking quashing by writ; standards under Section 482 CrPC were discussed by analogy through Supreme Court precedent. The separate refusal of bail did not determine the merits.

4. Issues : Whether a charge sheet for kidnapping and child sexual offences could be quashed solely because the girl said she had left willingly, later married the petitioner, had a child and wished to stay with him, although the school record showed that she was a minor both at departure and at the first reported sexual act; and to what extent a writ court could evaluate the evidence before trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench found that the girl had not attained eighteen when she left. Her own account described meeting the petitioner at night and travelling with him by bus and train on the prospect of marriage. Under Anversinh, these allegations could support active enticement despite her expressed willingness. The Court did not conclusively find that every element of kidnapping had been proved. It also noted that physical relations had begun about ten days after arrival, before February 2020. As she was then a minor, her consent could not negate a prima facie case under Section 376/POCSO. Her subsequent adulthood, marriage and child did not retrospectively change her age when the earlier acts occurred. Applying the test of taking the allegations at face value, the Bench declined to weigh the petitioner's defence or predict an acquittal. It expressly stated that its threshold observations would not bind the trial court, leaving final proof and credibility to be determined at trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition and declined to quash the charge sheet or Sessions Trial No. 19/2021. The trial court was directed to decide strictly according to law, without being prejudiced by the observations in the writ order. The application to correct and augment the petition was allowed separately. The amendment was to be carried out within two weeks from resumption of normal Court functioning, and the amended copy was to be uploaded in the meantime.

Headnote :- Liberty writ — prior anticipatory-bail refusal / parallel inquiry - After protection under Section 438 CrPC had been refused, the request under Article 226 to prevent coercive police action pending a Collector's committee inquiry was, in substance, an attempt to nullify the bail order. Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, supported the separate limit on a suspect's control of investigation, while preserving exceptional directions where the High Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. The pending administrative inquiry did not bar lawful criminal or departmental action.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Brindawan or Vrindavan Sharma, a suspended employee, died by suicide after leaving a note. The police registered Crime No. 213/2020 at Dehat, Shivpuri, under Sections 306/34 IPC. On 29 June 2020, the District Magistrate constituted a committee to examine the allegations in the note. Petitioner Ajay Katiyar, whose request for anticipatory bail had already been refused, sought relief under Article 226. He requested consideration of his representation, a fair investigation by the committee, deletion of his name from the FIR, and restraint on coercive police and departmental steps until the committee concluded its inquiry. The petition and counsel's arguments focused on protection during that parallel inquiry.

2. Precedents — Considered : The petitioner relied on Anjani Kumar v. State of Bihar, (2008) 5 SCC 248, to contend that no offence under Section 306 IPC was made out. The Bench did not finally examine the suicide note or the ingredients of that offence in this writ. Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was applied to the limited role of an accused or suspect in directing an investigation. The passages quoted from Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt, E. Sivakumar and Divine Retreat

Centre distinguish an impermissible choice of investigating agency or manner of investigation from exceptional directions under Article 226 where investigative power is shown to have been exercised mala fide. The Bench applied its earlier refusal under Section 438 to reject the protection sought by the no-coercive-action prayer.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution supplied the basis of the writ petition. Section 438 CrPC governed the request for anticipatory bail that had already been rejected. Sections 306/34 IPC concerned the registered allegations of abetment and common intention, which were not adjudicated on merits. Rule 9 of the M.P. Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules, 1966, was mentioned as governing possible service consequences if the petitioner were arrested. The Court also declined to prohibit a departmental inquiry merely because the Collector's committee was examining the note.

4. Issues : Whether a suspect whose request for anticipatory bail had been denied could obtain equivalent protection against coercive action under Article 226 until an administrative committee completed its inquiry into a suicide note; and whether he could direct the police investigation or prohibit lawful departmental action in the meantime.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench identified the practical effect of the requested police restraint as protection in the nature of anticipatory bail. Since the High Court had already refused relief under Section 438, granting the same restraint through the writ would nullify that earlier order. The committee's pending administrative inquiry did not give the suspect authority to control the registered police case. A blanket restraint on lawful departmental steps was also refused. If the petitioner were arrested, the applicable service law would take its course; the pending committee inquiry did not prevent a lawful departmental inquiry. The Court did not determine whether Katiyar had actually abetted suicide or decide the final administrative findings.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. No stay of arrest, change in the police investigation, deletion of the petitioner's name from the FIR or restraint on departmental action was granted.

Ajay Katiyar v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, W.P. no. 14101/2020, 25/09/2020, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Corruption — attempt — municipal work records - In appeals against convictions concerning a hand-pump work file, the Court found that the estimate, handling of quotations, bill, false completion certificate, absence of actual measurements and site evidence proved coordinated wrongdoing by the respective officials. Stopping payment of Rs. 9,940 after a complaint did not undo the established attempt. The convictions under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act read with Section 120-B IPC, and the additional IPC document and cheating offences against Narendra Singh Bhadoria, were affirmed on proof of the individual roles.

Evidence — official witness — measurement book - Following Dayal Singh v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 8 SCC 263, the Court independently examined the original record instead of accepting a committee witness's assertion that measurements had been recorded. The book reproduced an estimate without dimensions or particulars of the work; the site panchnama also showed that no hand pump had been installed. Defects or unsupported testimony do not relieve a criminal court of its duty to assess all reliable evidence fairly. The prosecution must still prove its case beyond reasonable doubt.

Sentencing — public corruption — quantum and enhancement - Applying the analysis of public interest and gravity in State of Karnataka v. J. Jayalalitha, (2017) 6 SCC 263, the Court considered it wrong to assess the corruption case solely by the modest bill amount and the absence of actual payment. It nevertheless declined to initiate enhancement at that late stage. No notice had been issued when the appeals were admitted, and more than eight years had passed since conviction. The existing sentences were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ajay Pandvia (Cr.A. 429/2013), Narendra Singh Bhadoria (Cr.A. 440/2013), K.K. Shrivastava (Cr.A. 441/2013) and R.B. Shrivastava (Cr.A. 445/2013) brought four connected appeals under Section 374 CrPC against the judgment dated 29.05.2013 of the Special Judge (Prevention of Corruption Act), Gwalior, in Special Sessions Trial No. 01/2010. A complaint about fictitious municipal water-supply maintenance work led to internal and vigilance inquiries and investigation by the Special Police Establishment (Lokayukt). The particular file, Article A-1, concerned a proposed hand pump at Rangiyana Colony. An undated request from a councillor sought a hand pump because of water scarcity. In a separate undated note, sub-engineer Narendra Singh Bhadoria claimed that the submersible pump had been removed and the bore cleaned. An estimate for Rs. 9,940 nevertheless included the cost of removing that same pump and installing the new equipment. Assistant engineer Ajay Pandvia forwarded the file. R.N. Karaiya, the executive engineer who was separately acquitted, permitted quotations. Notice was sent only to three identified contractors. Their undated quotations were entered consecutively on 19.08.2003. Pandvia opened them, although the Court found no authority for him to do so or to bypass scrutiny by the technical branch. A work order followed on 30.12.2003 and a bill on 02.01.2004. Bhadoria signed a certificate of satisfactory completion, which Pandvia later attested. The purported measurement book repeated the estimated items and prices without actual measurements or details of the installed pump or platform. The investigating officer who visited the site found the original submersible pump still in the bore and no hand pump installed. Payment was stopped after a complaint, and an inquiry committee closed the file.

The prosecution examined sixteen witnesses, including committee members, municipal staff and investigators. Several committee members acknowledged that they had reviewed thousands of files cursorily without site visits. One witness asserted in cross-examination that measurements had been recorded. The appellants maintained that quotations had been processed properly, the work had been done, no forged bill existed and no money had been paid. The trial court convicted Pandvia, K.K. Shrivastava and R.B. Shrivastava under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act read with Section 120-B IPC. It also convicted Bhadoria under Sections 420, 467, 468 and 471 IPC, in addition to the corruption and conspiracy charges. The four appeals were heard alongside separate State appeals concerning the acquittal of R.N. Karaiya, the contractor and another official. This common judgment disposed only of the appeals of the four convicted appellants.

2. Precedents — Considered : Dayal Singh v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 8 SCC 263, was quoted after the Court independently found that the measurement book did not support a committee witness's assertion. The Supreme Court explained that crime affects society as well as the parties, that a criminal court has an active duty to reach a fair and true determination, and that a suspicious or defective investigation does not automatically destroy independently credible evidence. Its discussion reproduced State of Karnataka v. K. Yarappa Reddy and Ram Bali v. State of U.P. on careful, independent evaluation where investigation is defective, and the fair-trial perspective reflected in NHRC v. State of Gujarat. The High Court applied that duty of independent scrutiny to Article B. It did not treat the quoted passages as dispensing with proof beyond reasonable doubt or the rights of the accused.

State of Karnataka v. J. Jayalalitha, (2017) 6 SCC 263, was quoted on the gravity of corruption when the Court considered the trial sentence. The reproduced analysis drew on State of M.P. v. Ram Singh and Niranjan Hemchandra Sashittal v. State of Maharashtra to reject treating corruption as trivial merely because a particular amount is small. It discussed R.S. Nayak v. A.R. Antulay on construing anti-corruption legislation to further its purpose, and Subramanian Swamy v. CBI on the public purpose of effective investigation. The High Court used this material to criticise the lenient sentence, but imposed no enhanced term.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC provided the route of appeal. For all four appellants, the convictions affirmed were under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1988, read with Section 120-B IPC. Under the trial judgment, Bhadoria was additionally convicted under Sections 420, 467, 468 and 471 IPC. The order described sanction under Section 19 of the Prevention of Corruption Act for certain serving officials and recorded that two others had retired. The Court assessed the documentary and oral proof of the attempted misconduct.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that the purported water work and its supporting estimate, quotations, measurement book, bill and completion certificate were false, and that each appellant's participation sustained his respective convictions; (ii) what weight should be given to a committee witness's assertion that measurements existed when the original book and other records showed otherwise, given the incomplete or cursory inquiries; and (iii) whether the trial sentence was too lenient because the particular bill was only Rs. 9,940 and remained unpaid, and whether the appellate court should now issue notice to consider enhancement. The separate State appeals against acquittals were not finally decided in this judgment.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court traced the municipal file chronologically. The initial assertion that the submersible pump had already been removed conflicted with an estimate charging for its removal and the spot panchnama showing it still in place. The claimed urgency due to summer water scarcity was questioned because approval to call quotations was given in late July. Only three contractors received notice. Their quotations appeared consecutively in the inward register on the same day; Pandvia opened and evaluated them without demonstrated authority and before examination by the technical branch. The bill submitted soon after the work order, the later general satisfaction stamp and the absence of contemporaneous site or measurement particulars did not establish installation. The Court examined Article B instead of accepting the contrary answer given by Rajesh Sharma (PW 6) in cross-examination. The book contained estimated prices, but neither the dimensions of the platform nor the specifications of a hand pump. Applying Dayal Singh, the Court made its own overall assessment of the reliable record despite weaknesses and changes in some official testimony. It found the file and certification false and the coordinated acts of the respective appellants proved beyond reasonable doubt. Bhadoria prepared the central note, estimate and purported verification; Pandvia handled quotations and attested completion; R.B. Shrivastava forwarded the bill without statutory deductions; and K.K. Shrivastava forwarded the file for payment despite the apparent defects. Payment was stopped because a complaint intervened, rather than because the underlying acts had not been attempted. The Court affirmed the respective convictions of all four appellants. These findings concerned the file under trial; references to other files provided context and were not additional findings of guilt.

On sentence, the Court considered that the Special Judge had been too lenient in focusing on the low value of this bill and the fact that payment had been stopped. It referred to the larger set of municipal files considered by an inquiry committee and to J. Jayalalitha's warning against measuring public corruption solely by an amount of money. However, the conduct dated from 2003, conviction was in 2013, more than eight years had elapsed by the appeal, other trials were said to be pending, and no enhancement notice had been issued when these appeals were admitted. The Court therefore declined to initiate enhancement at that late stage and maintained the sentences.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed all four conviction appeals. It affirmed the Special Judge's conviction and sentences dated 29.05.2013 insofar as they applied to Pandvia, Bhadoria, K.K. Shrivastava and R.B. Shrivastava, without issuing an enhancement notice. The affirmed sentences included six months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 10,000 for each offence under Section 15 of the Prevention of Corruption Act and Section 120-B IPC for each appellant. For Bhadoria, they also included two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 15,000 for each offence under Sections 467, 468 and 471 IPC. The sentences were to run concurrently. Their bail bonds were cancelled, and they were directed to surrender immediately before the trial court, and in any event by 31.03.2022, to serve the remaining sentence. The trial-court record was to be returned for compliance. The separate acquittal appeals mentioned in the narrative were not disposed of by this operative order.

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty — Specific allegations against in-laws — Read together, the complainant's FIR and Section 161 CrPC statement alleged specific conduct by the parents-in-law and two brothers-in-law, including demands for money to purchase a flat, a coerced withdrawal, burning the complainant's hand, and a brother-in-law exposing himself or insulting her. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, distinguishes mere naming of distant relatives from allegations assigning a specific role. Applying that distinction, the Court found triable allegations against each applicant under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act, without deciding guilt.

Section 482 CrPC — Omissions in the FIR and restraint in assessing evidence — Applying Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, the Court held that an FIR is not an encyclopaedia and that omission of later particulars does not, by itself, defeat an otherwise supported account. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021, informed the requirement to consider allegations at face value and the prohibition against a detailed inquiry into the merits before trial. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, identified a limited exception for public documents or documents whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. Since the Section 161 statement alleged specific conduct and disclosed triable issues, the FIR, charge-sheet and prosecution were not quashed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ajit Lalchand Thadhani, his wife Duru and their sons Sandeep and Nikhil sought quashing of Crime No. 716/2019, the resulting charge-sheet and prosecution under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3–4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The complainant married Amit Thadani in January 2016. Her FIR alleged taunts about dowry, physical harassment, demands for money to purchase a flat and for Rs 5,000 monthly, and withdrawal of Rs 3 lakh from her account under pressure. She later lived apart from the matrimonial family. Her Section 161 statement added specific allegations: Sandeep demanded money, Nikhil removed his clothes and insulted her, the father-in-law coerced the withdrawal, and the mother-in-law burnt her hand. The applicants argued that the FIR contained no allegations against the two younger brothers and that the accusations against the parents were vague. The State relied on the detailed subsequent statement. These are allegations at the quashing stage, not judicial findings that the acts occurred.

2. Precedents — Considered : Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, was applied for the principle that the first report need not contain every detail. Omissions must be assessed in their factual setting and are not automatically fatal. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, and State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, cautioned against a roving inquiry while investigation proceeds. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, recounted Bhajan Lal's caution that the power must be used sparingly. State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, supported consideration of allegations at face value and avoidance of adjudication on disputed evidence. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, described the limited exception permitting consideration of defence material where the document is public or its veracity is not disputed by the complainant. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, warned against proceedings based solely on distant family relationship but allowed trial where the complaint contained specific allegations. The Court also considered Monju Roy and Chandralekha and held that the specific allegations against all applicants prevented quashing.

3. Statutes considered : The application invoked the inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC. The complainant's statement recorded during investigation under Section 161 CrPC was read with the FIR at the stage before trial. The charged provisions were Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3 and 4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The Court did not finally determine the facts or adjudicate whether the ingredients of the offences were proved after evidence.

4. Issues : Whether omissions in the first report required the later specific allegations against the two brothers-in-law to be disregarded; whether the accusations against the four relatives were merely general; and whether, on those grounds, the High Court could quash the FIR, charge-sheet and prosecution under Section 482 before trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : A first report need not catalogue every alleged act. Reading it with the Section 161 statement, the Court found allegations of specific conduct against each applicant. Sandeep was alleged to have demanded money to purchase a flat and abused the complainant when she refused. Nikhil allegedly exposed himself and insulted her. The father-in-law allegedly compelled withdrawal of Rs 3 lakh from her account, and the mother-in-law allegedly demanded dowry and burnt her hand. In view of those particulars, the Court rejected the contention that no case was made out on the face of the allegations. Taramani Parakh's concern about implicating relatives without a tangible role did not justify quashing in the presence of these specific allegations. Applying the Supreme Court's principles of restraint, the Court declined a detailed inquiry into their disputed truth or genuineness or into the defence in proceedings under Section 482. It held that the material disclosed triable issues under the charged provisions, leaving credibility and liability to the criminal court.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. The FIR, charge-sheet and consequential prosecution against all four applicants were left to proceed; there was no acquittal or finding of guilt.

Ajit Lalchand Thadhani and Others v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 36197/2021, 07/03/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Alibi — Attendance at court in the same city — Presence at the time of occurrence — Jitender Kumar v. State of Haryana, (2012) 6 SCC 204, and Om Prakash v. State of Rajasthan, (2012) 5 SCC 201, required convincing proof excluding the accused's presence at the scene. Jumni v. State of Haryana, (2014) 11 SCC 355, required defence witnesses to be treated fairly. A bail order that did not record the time, read with the witness's account, did not establish that the appellants remained at the Bhind court when the burning occurred elsewhere in the city at 3 p.m. The alibi failed, but the prosecution still had to prove its case.

Dying declaration — extensive burns and mental fitness — Under Section 32(1) Evidence Act, Kanti Lal, (2009) 12 SCC 498, and Laxmi v. Om Prakash, (2001) 6 SCC 118, required fitness of the declarant and careful scrutiny of the declaration. Ashabai, (2013) 2 SCC 224, Sher Singh, (2008) 4 SCC 265, Jagbir Singh, (2019) 8 SCC 779, and Muthu Kutty, (2005) 9 SCC 113, permitted reliance on an otherwise trustworthy declaration without mandatory corroboration. Ramesh v. State of Haryana, (2017) 1 SCC 529, and Purshottam Chopra, (2020) 11 SCC 489, held that burn percentage does not conclusively determine the capacity to make a statement. The Court accepted a prompt, coherent declaration recorded in question-and-answer form by an executive magistrate after a doctor certified fitness, together with a credible oral declaration. The challenge based on 90–100% burns did not displace that evidence.

Homicide — burn complications and infection — Explanation 2 to Section 299 IPC, as discussed in Antram v. State of Maharashtra, (2007) 13 SCC 356, and Jagtar Singh v. State of Punjab, (1999) 2 SCC 174, preserves causation where bodily injury caused death even though proper treatment might have prevented it. Arjun Singh, (2011) 9 SCC 115, and Munnawar were applied on death from fatal injuries despite later sepsis. Khokan, (2021) 3 SCC 365, rejected an automatic reduction to Section 304 Part I in every case involving septicaemia and was distinguishable on its facts. Deliberately setting the victim on fire with kerosene, causing burns sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, supported conviction under Section 302. Sepsis did not justify alteration to a lesser offence in these circumstances.

Delayed FIR — defective investigation and independent proof — Ambika Prasad v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2000) 2 SCC 646, required the prosecution evidence to be examined for reliability despite the investigator's lapses. The unexplained pendency of the merg inquiry for a year and the delayed FIR did not invalidate the promptly recorded dying declaration, which was independently assessed. Guilt remained proved beyond reasonable doubt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Three connected appeals challenged life sentences imposed on 1 July 2011 in Sessions Trial No. 263/2010 for the murder of Sadhana Singh. Ajju alias Ajay, Raghvendra Singh Chauhan and Saurabh Singh were tried on evidence recorded separately after two accused were arrested later. The two trial judgments, delivered on the same day, were considered in a common appellate judgment. Sadhana suffered extensive burns at her Bhind home on 16 June 2009 and died on 21 June. An executive magistrate recorded her declaration in question-and-answer form at about 4:55 p.m. in hospital. It named the attackers and referred to their earlier quarrel. Her husband testified that she had also named them in an oral statement. Defence witnesses disputed her ability to speak and put forward an account of suicide. Some appellants had attended court for bail that day. The merg inquiry remained pending, and the FIR was lodged roughly a year later. The appellants disputed her fitness, relied on alibi and police delay, and argued that the later sepsis or treatment justified reducing the conviction from murder.

2. Precedents — Considered : A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Criminal Appeal No. 1306/2021, guided the Bench's separate consideration of the evidence from the two trials. Jitender Kumar v. State of Haryana, (2012) 6 SCC 204, and Om Prakash v. State of Rajasthan, (2012) 5 SCC 201, required strict proof of alibi excluding presence at the scene. Jumni v. State of Haryana, (2014) 11 SCC 355, recognised that defence witnesses are entitled to equal treatment. Kanti Lal v. State of Rajasthan, (2009) 12 SCC 498, and Laxmi v. Om Prakash, (2001) 6 SCC 118, required actual fitness of the declarant and careful scrutiny of the reliability of a dying declaration. Ashabai v. State of Maharashtra, (2013) 2 SCC 224, Sher Singh v. State of Punjab, (2008) 4 SCC 265, Jagbir Singh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2019) 8 SCC 779, Vikas v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 2 SCC 516, and Muthu Kutty v. State, (2005) 9 SCC 113, informed its admissibility, voluntariness and sufficiency as independent evidence when trustworthy. Ramesh v. State of Haryana, (2017) 1 SCC 529, and Purshottam Chopra v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2020) 11 SCC 489, including the Constitution Bench principle in Laxman, rejected any universal rule based on a fixed burn percentage or mandatory medical certification. The recorder's satisfaction as to fitness and the declaration's truthfulness remained essential. State of Rajasthan v. Arjun Singh, (2011) 9 SCC 115, Munnawar, Antram v. State of Maharashtra, (2007) 13 SCC 356, and Jagtar Singh v. State of Punjab, (1999) 2 SCC 174, addressed causation despite sepsis or treatment. Khokan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2021) 3 SCC 365, was distinguished because it involved a sudden quarrel and no premeditation. Ambika Prasad v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2000) 2 SCC 646, supported assessing reliable evidence notwithstanding police delay.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the appeals. The charges were under Sections 302 and 34 IPC, and life imprisonment under Section 302 was affirmed. Section 32(1) Evidence Act governed statements relating to the cause of the declarant's death. Explanation 2 to Section 299 IPC was material to the contention that infection or treatment had broken the causal connection. Sections 300 and 304 IPC framed the proposed reduction to a lesser offence. The Bench discussed proof and investigation delay.

4. Issues : Whether the separately tried appellants' attendance at court established an alibi for the time of the burning; whether a woman with 90–100% burns could make trustworthy written and oral dying declarations; whether death following sepsis or the possibility of better treatment broke causation or justified conviction under Section 304 Part I; and whether a year's police delay made the prosecution case unsafe.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench considered the evidence from the two trials separately. The court order, which did not record the time, and the defence witness's account did not prove that the appellants remained at court when Sadhana was burnt at about 3 p.m. The court and her home were in the same city. No animus was suggested against the executive magistrate. He described a coherent declaration recorded in question-and-answer form after obtaining a doctor's fitness certification; both signed it. The medical witnesses accepted that a person with superficial burns might still speak. The witnesses relied on to show inability to speak had either left before the declaration was recorded or could not speak to her condition at the material time. Her husband's evidence of the oral declaration also withstood cross-examination. The earlier jeep dispute and threat supplied a motive, whereas the suicide account lacked first-hand support. The post-mortem evidence connected death to infected burns covering about 90% of the body and sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Neither sepsis nor the possibility of better care broke the causal connection with the deliberate burning or required conviction for a lesser offence. The Court criticised the year-long pendency of the merg inquiry. However, the principal declaration had been recorded promptly on the day of the incident and was assessed on its own merits. Taken together, the evidence proved homicidal burning and the appellants' responsibility beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeals. It affirmed the two trial judgments and the appellants' Section 302 life sentences and fines of Rs. 200 each, with 7 days' rigorous imprisonment in default of payment. It directed the appellants, who were in jail, to serve the balance of their sentences and ordered that copies be supplied immediately and free of cost and that the trial record be returned.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — Public records relied on by the defence — Material of sterling quality — Rajiv Thapar v. Madan Lal Kapoor, (2013) 3 SCC 330, requires material that is sound, reasonable and indubitable and rules out the accusation. The material must not have been refuted or must be incapable of justifiable refutation. Continuing the trial must amount to an abuse of process and fail to serve the ends of justice. Prashant Bharti v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2013) 9 SCC 293, applied those requirements. Rukmini Narvekar v. Vijaya Satardekar, (2008) 14 SCC 1, addressed the wider scope of inherent review compared with the ordinary charge stage. The Court considered the undisputed public records of the utility's theft complaint and the court's cognizance order when examining the lawyer's account of his brother's provisional electricity bill.

Section 499 IPC — Explanation 4 — Harm to reputation — An imputation must prima facie harm reputation, directly or indirectly, in the estimation of others by lowering moral or intellectual character, character in respect of caste or calling, or credit, or by causing it to be believed that the person's body is in a loathsome state or a state generally considered disgraceful. The supporting advocate's account of the alleged office remarks did not state that they had lowered the complainant in his estimation. On this record, the complaint under Section 500 lacked that ingredient.

Quashing — retaliatory complaint concerning a statutory decision — State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal, 1992 Supp (1) SCC 335, permits intervention where the allegations, taken at face value, disclose no offence or the prosecution is manifestly malicious. Priyanka Srivastava v. State of U.P., (2015) 6 SCC 287, cautions against using criminal process to pressure officials over statutory actions for which avenues of challenge are available. The complainant pursued defamation proceedings after seeking alteration of his brother's provisional electricity assessment instead of using the objection procedure under Section 126. Finding an ulterior motive and absence of the reputational-harm ingredient, the Court set aside the cognizance and revision orders and dismissed the complaint.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A.K. Hade, an electricity distribution engineer, invoked Section 482 CrPC to challenge a private complaint under Section 500 IPC filed by advocate Shailendra Singh Yadav. Yadav alleged that, at the office, Hade refused to correct an improper bill, used defamatory or abusive words in another advocate's presence, and threatened to implicate him in false cases. The bill concerned an electricity connection in the name of Yadav's brother Arvind. Hade produced the utility's complaint alleging meter tampering and the Special Electricity Court's order taking cognizance against Arvind under Sections 135/138 Electricity Act. He contended that the bill was a provisional assessment and that the defamation complaint was a counterblast. Yadav and one advocate had been examined under Sections 200 and 202 CrPC. The magistrate took cognizance and framed a charge; the criminal revision failed. The High Court stayed the proceedings in 2012.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rukmini Narvekar v. Vijaya Satardekar, (2008) 14 SCC 1, was quoted for the distinction between the record ordinarily considered at the charge stage and the wider review under Section 482. Rajiv Thapar v. Madan Lal Kapoor, (2013) 3 SCC 330, set out four requirements for considering incontrovertible material produced by the accused that negates the accusation and shows that trial would be an abuse of process. Prashant Bharti v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2013) 9 SCC 293, applied those requirements before trial. The Bench considered undisputed public records to examine the billing context, rather than accepting a contested defence narrative. Priyanka Srivastava v. State of U.P., (2015) 6 SCC 287, warned against criminal applications intended to harass persons acting under a statutory framework that provides avenues of challenge. It supported the finding of retaliatory motive here. State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal, 1992 Supp (1) SCC 335, supplied illustrative grounds for quashing where allegations disclose no offence or proceedings are maliciously instituted to wreak vengeance. The Court applied both grounds to the ingredients of defamation and the undisputed assessment context.

3. Statutes considered : The Court exercised inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC. Sections 200 and 202 CrPC governed examination in the private complaint. Section 499 IPC, particularly Explanation 4, supplied the ingredients of defamation, and Section 500 prescribed its punishment. Section 126 Electricity Act provided for objections to a provisional assessment. The record also showed a separate prosecution against the brother under Sections 135/138 Electricity Act. The High Court did not determine guilt in that electricity case or the final amount payable.

4. Issues : Whether the undisputed public records produced by the engineer could be considered under the inherent jurisdiction; whether the alleged words and the sole supporting witness's evidence prima facie established harm to reputation under Explanation 4 to Section 499; and whether the complaint was a malicious response to the engineer's statutory electricity assessment, warranting quashing of cognizance and dismissal of the complaint.

5. Ratio / Findings : The utility's theft complaint and the Special Electricity Court's cognizance order were public documents that Yadav did not dispute. They placed his visit to Hade's office in the context of a provisional assessment against his brother, for which Section 126 provided an objection procedure. Yadav had not produced the bill with his defamation complaint. The Court regarded his attempt to obtain its correction and the ensuing prosecution as pressure on an officer performing statutory duties. It also considered Bar Association material concerning Yadav. Although the appellate committee had set aside the resolution for lack of jurisdiction, the High Court held that this did not erase the evidence collected. It relied on that material in deciding to scrutinise the complaint closely. The sole supporting advocate did not state that the alleged remarks had lowered Yadav's reputation in his estimation. The requirement of Explanation 4 was therefore not prima facie met. On the undisputed records and the complaint evidence, the Court found that Bhajan Lal's grounds of failure to disclose an offence and malicious motive applied, while following Rajiv Thapar's limited approach to defence material.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application. It set aside the Guna magistrate's order in the complaint case and the revisional order in Criminal Revision No. 47/2012, and dismissed the complaint under Section 500 IPC against Hade.

A.K. Hade v. Shailendra Singh Yadav and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 2629/2012, 07/05/2018, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Related eyewitnesses — Darya Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1965 SC 328, requires careful scrutiny of relatives who share the victim's hostility towards the accused, but does not make corroboration invariably necessary. The deceased's sons and grandson naturally came to the place of assault outside his home, sustained injuries themselves and gave consistent accounts. Their relationship to the deceased and the prosecution's decision not to examine his wife did not undermine that credible evidence.

Medical and ocular evidence — The cursory initial MLC, which described apparently simple injuries, did not outweigh the detailed post-mortem findings of skull fracture, hemorrhage and multiple contusions. The CT scan and treatment records, admitted in evidence, supported those findings. The defence objected to the photocopies and the non-examination of the report's author only at final argument, having raised no objection when the records were admitted at trial. In these circumstances, the Bench declined to give the initial report disproportionate weight.

Homicide — Exceptions to Section 300 / Repeated lathi blows — State of A.P. v. Rayavarapu Punnayya, (1976) 4 SCC 382, explained the distinction between murder and the wider category of culpable homicide. Kikar Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (1993) 4 SCC 238, requires a sudden mutual fight, without undue advantage or cruelty, for Exception 4 to apply. Although the victim had spoken while chasing a dog, his precise words were not proved and grave and sudden provocation was not established. The armed group repeatedly inflicted fatal blows on an unarmed victim; this was not a sudden mutual fight. State of M.P. v. Shyamlal (2025) was distinguished because the cause of death there was uncertain, and Anbazhagan v. State (2023) concerned a single blow with a weapon picked up at the scene. The conviction under Section 302 was affirmed; conversion to an offence under Sections 325 or 304 was refused.

Section 34 IPC — Common intention / Attribution of individual blows — Both appellants arrived armed and participated in the assault. Badan Shah also attacked an unarmed person who tried to rescue the victim. These acts established common intention even though the injured eyewitnesses could not identify the assailant responsible for every fatal head blow. The conviction under Section 302 and the three convictions under Section 323/34 were upheld.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Akbar Shah and Badan alias Badna Shah appealed against their conviction in Sessions Trial No. 29/2022 under Section 302 IPC and on three counts under Sections 323/34 IPC. On 24 October 2021, Chhital Shah shouted while chasing a dog near his home. The appellants' party took his words to be abuse directed at them, came armed with lathis and assaulted him. His sons Raseed and Bhanu and grandson Afsar intervened and sustained injuries. An FIR was registered that evening; a counter-FIR gave a different account of the scuffle. Chhital was referred from the first medical centre to Gwalior that night and died on 30 October. The appellants challenged the evidence of related witnesses, alleged delay in reporting, relied on the initial MLC's description of apparently simple injuries and the counter-case, and disputed common intention. They sought conviction for a lesser offence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Darya Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1965 SC 328, does not require corroboration merely because an eyewitness is related to the victim, although evidence must be carefully scrutinised where the witness shares the victim's hostility towards the accused. The Bench applied it to the injured family witnesses whose presence outside their home was natural. State of A.P. v. Rayavarapu Punnayya, (1976) 4 SCC 382, explained that culpable homicide is the genus and murder its species, and informed the inquiry under Section 300. Kikar Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (1993) 4 SCC 238, required a sudden mutual fight without undue advantage or cruelty for Exception 4 to apply; the Bench instead found a one-sided armed assault. State of M.P. v. Shyamlal (2025) was distinguished because the cause of death there was uncertain, whereas the head injury and continuing treatment established causation here. Anbazhagan v. State, Criminal Appeal No. 2043/2023, involved a single blow with a weapon picked up at the scene and a different question under Section 304, and was also distinguished.

3. Statutes considered : The judgment identified Section 374(2) CrPC/Section 420 BNSS as the appeal route. Sections 299–300, 302, 323, 325 and 34 IPC governed the homicide inquiry, possible conversion to a lesser offence, simple hurt and joint liability. The Court examined Exceptions 1 and 4 to Section 300. Section 157 CrPC arose in the argument about delay in sending the FIR to the magistrate; police delay did not invalidate the promptly registered report.

4. Issues : Whether the injured relatives' testimony was credible despite the absence of independent support and the non-examination of the deceased's wife; whether the cursory MLC, alleged delay in lodging the FIR or objections to the treatment records undermined proof of the assault and cause of death; whether the misunderstanding and counter-FIR established provocation or a sudden fight warranting conversion to an offence under Section 325/304; and whether Badan shared the intention to cause the fatal injuries even though his individual fatal blow could not be identified.

5. Ratio / Findings : The assault occurred outside the family's house, making the arrival of the deceased's sons and grandson natural. Their injuries and consistent testimony further established their presence. The FIR was lodged roughly two hours after an incident at dusk in which four people were injured, one seriously; this was not substantial delay. The counter-FIR differed materially from its maker's testimony and did not establish a mutual fight or injury to the appellants. The initial MLC was sparse and hurriedly prepared. The prompt referral, subsequent CT scan and case-history records, and detailed post-mortem findings established a depressed temporal skull fracture, subdural and subarachnoid hemorrhage, and multiple other injuries. The treatment documents had been admitted without timely objection and supported the detailed medical account. Repeated, forceful lathi blows to the unarmed victim's head caused his death. As the precise words said to have provoked the attack were not proved and there was no mutual combat on equal terms, neither Exception 1 nor Exception 4 applied. Both appellants arrived armed, and Badan attacked an unarmed rescuer. Their conduct established participation and common intention despite the eyewitnesses' inability to attribute each head blow. The Court refused conversion to a lesser offence and upheld the trial Court's findings of liability.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal, affirming both the convictions and the sentences. It directed the Registry to send a copy of the judgment to the concerned authorities in compliance with the legal provisions.

Akbar Shah and Others v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 8732/2024, 23/06/2026, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Anuradha Shukla, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Private defence — police force / retaliation — Extra-Judicial Execution Victim Families Assn. v. Union of India, (2016) 14 SCC 536, distinguishes protective force under Sections 96–106 IPC from retaliation after the danger has passed. The road video produced by the police showed the petitioner pushing an officer, who then beat him and kicked him while he was on the ground. No protester joined in attacking the officer. The Bench formed a prima facie view that the officer had used excessive retaliatory force; it did not finally find that the alleged bribe had been demanded.

Custodial violence — CCTV playback / official account — Undisputed station footage, supplied by the police under RTI and played in open court, showed an officer carrying a bamboo stick taking the petitioner into a room without a camera. Screams followed, and the petitioner was later unable to walk properly. The audio disclosed pressure to add allegations to the officer's complaint and fabricate evidence of damaged clothing or injuries. The recordings contradicted the explanation that the petitioner was merely being carried for medical examination and the internal inquiry's exoneration of the police. Ashwani Kumar v. Union of India, (2020) 13 SCC 585, recognised safeguards under Article 21 and judicial power to grant relief in individual cases of custodial torture. Pravat Chandra Mohanty v. State of Odisha, (2021) 3 SCC 529, addressed the grave public concern caused by police-station brutality. The DGP was directed to register an FIR against the police personnel involved, transfer the station staff and investigate the associated official records. These directions did not determine guilt in a criminal trial.

Station CCTV — Uncovered room / Statewide compliance — Paramvir Singh Saini v. Baljit Singh, (2021) 1 SCC 184, prescribed comprehensive audio-video coverage, preservation and oversight duties. The earlier surveillance observations in D.K. Basu and Shafhi Mohd. were also considered. As a room without a camera had been used for assault, the High Court directed reports on coverage from every district and installation of cameras covering every station room and space within the specified local deadlines. It required compliance reports and provided for contempt proceedings in the event of non-compliance.

Personal costs and compensation — The Bench apportioned costs of Rs 1,20,000 among respondents 5–10, payable into court and to be released to the petitioner on his application. D.K. Basu and Ashwani Kumar informed the framework for public-law compensation under Article 21. The Court held the petitioner entitled to compensation, while preserving his right to seek it in a fresh petition rather than awarding substantive compensation in this order.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Akhilesh Pandey alleged that police beat him on a road after he went to address a truck blockade by villagers, took him to Bhalumada station on 17 September 2023, assaulted him in a room without CCTV coverage and fabricated an FIR against him. He sought action against the officers, production of records, consideration of his representations and relief for detention or arrest. The police maintained that he had abused and pushed an officer, resisted medical examination, sustained no injuries and been properly charged. An SDO(P) inquiry rejected his allegations. Pandey produced station CCTV clips supplied by the police under RTI, and an officer produced footage of the road incident. Selected recordings, including their audio, were played in open court. Respondents 6–10 did not appear despite service. The Bench assessed the recordings, conduct at the station and official responses in the writ petition under Article 226.

2. Precedents — Considered : Extra-Judicial Execution Victim Families Assn. v. Union of India, (2016) 14 SCC 536, distinguished defensive force from retaliation; the Bench applied that distinction to the officer's beating of the petitioner after a push. Prakash Kadam v. Ramprasad Vishwanath Gupta, (2011) 6 SCC 189, was quoted for its condemnation of unlawful police force as contrary to the rule of law. Its discussion of encounter murder was not a finding of murder in this case. Pravat Chandra Mohanty v. State of Odisha, (2021) 3 SCC 529, treated brutality by police custodians as a matter of serious public concern; the refusal to compound offences in that death case was not the relief being considered here. Ashwani Kumar v. Union of India, (2020) 13 SCC 585, reviewed Article 21 safeguards against custodial torture, the arrest protections in D.K. Basu, public-law compensation for established violations, and judicial power to remedy individual cases despite rejecting a request to compel legislation. D.K. Basu v. State of W.B., (2015) 8 SCC 744, and Shafhi Mohd. v. State of H.P., (2018) 5 SCC 311, addressed cameras and oversight. Paramvir Singh Saini v. Baljit Singh, (2021) 1 SCC 184, prescribed station-wide coverage, audio-video recording, retention, SHO responsibilities and oversight duties. The Bench enforced those requirements after finding a room without camera coverage. It also quoted Prosecutrix (Minor) through her Natural Guardian

Vs. State of M.P. and others, 2021 (3) MPLJ (Cri) 339, which had directed implementation of Paramvir Singh and coverage of every police-station room within the Gwalior Superintendent of Police's jurisdiction.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided the writ remedy; Articles 21 and 14 protected dignity and liberty against custodial torture. Sections 96–106 IPC governed private defence and its limits. Sections 330–331 IPC were mentioned as offences concerning custodial coercion, without adjudication of particular charges. A notice under Section 41-A CrPC appeared in the account of custody. The police FIR complained of included proposed SC/ST allegations, but the writ did not finally determine the merits of that prosecution. The Protection of Human Rights Act mechanisms appeared in the directions quoted from Paramvir Singh.

4. Issues : Whether the officer's use of force on the road was defensive or retaliatory; whether the undisputed CCTV footage and audio established assault at the station and fabrication despite official denials and the SDO(P) report; what criminal and administrative action should follow; whether a room without a camera breached station-surveillance duties; and how personal costs and the separate claim for compensation should be addressed.

5. Ratio / Findings : The partial road recording produced by the police showed a push followed by repeated beating and a kick to the petitioner's head. The Bench found that no member of the assembled crowd had attacked the officer and characterised his force as retaliatory, while expressly declining to conduct a full investigation of the road incident. It did not find the alleged demand for Rs 5,000 proved. The undisputed station footage showed Pandey standing calmly before an officer carrying a thick bamboo stick took him into a room without a camera. Cries followed, others rushed into the room, and the police later lifted him when he could not walk properly. The audio disclosed the station officer directing alterations to a complaint, suggestions that a uniform be torn and old or self-inflicted injuries be recorded, and discussion of a proposed allegation of loot that was not ultimately registered. After playback, the State's counsel could no longer defend the internal inquiry report. The Bench found custodial assault and fabrication of a complaint, directed registration of an FIR and transfers to protect the evidence, and ordered inquiries into the doctor's MLC and the SDO(P) report exonerating the officers. It applied Paramvir's surveillance requirements to the room deliberately used for assault because it lacked camera coverage. These findings and investigation directions in the writ proceedings were distinct from the determination of criminal guilt that remained to follow.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the writ petition. It directed the DGP to register an FIR against respondents 5–10 and transfer the entire staff posted at Bhalumada on 17 September 2023, including respondents 5–10, to different places at least 900 km from Anuppur within ten days. Compliance with the FIR and transfer directions was to be reported within fifteen days. The DGP was to verify the petitioner's MLC and, if it recorded no injuries, register a criminal case against the doctor and refer the matter to the doctor's appointing authority for departmental action. He was also to inquire into the SDO(P) report and initiate criminal action if warranted. For statewide CCTV coverage with audio, the DGP was to obtain reports from every district Superintendent of Police within one month and ensure coverage of every station room and space within the following two months, completing the three-month sequence. A compliance report was required by 18 February 2025. Costs of Rs 1,20,000 were personally apportioned among respondents 5–10: Rs 40,000 from respondent 5; Rs 20,000 from the ASI who took the petitioner into the room with the bamboo stick; Rs 20,000 from respondent 10; Rs 20,000 from the Head Constable who pulled the uniform; and Rs 10,000 each from the remaining two respondents. The sums were to be deposited in the Registry within one month and paid to Pandey on a withdrawal application. Recovery and contempt proceedings were directed for failure to deposit costs. Failure to provide CCTV coverage would attract contempt action against the district Superintendent of Police and the station SHO; failure to submit the required reports would require the Registrar General to register contempt proceedings. The Court held him entitled to compensation but preserved a separate petition for that relief, without awarding substantive damages in this order. A copy of the order was to be sent immediately to the DGP, and the Government Advocate was also directed to communicate it immediately for information and compliance.

Akhilesh Pandey v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, W.P. no. 31360/2023, 18/10/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Sole eyewitness — related and inimical witness / Fear-induced conduct / Discerning scrutiny — Vijendra Singh v. State of U.P., (2017) 11 SCC 129, Raju v. State of T.N., (2012) 12 SCC 701, Jodhan v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 52, and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, establish that relationship alone does not require independent corroboration. Where a related witness also shares hostility towards the accused, the evidence must be examined with heightened care and discerning scrutiny because an innocent person may be added along with the real assailants. State of U.P. v. Moti Ram, (1990) 4 SCC 389, and Kunwarpal v. State of Uttarakhand, (2014) 16 SCC 560, treat motive or enmity as a double-edged circumstance that may support either false implication or the commission of the offence. As Ashok would have had to cross the appellants' field to reach the village, fear for his life explained why he remained hidden until sunrise after witnessing his brother's brutal murder. The bulb mentioned in the FIR, the absence of any proved obstruction and his familiarity with the attackers supported identification from 150 feet, consistently with Ramesh v. State, (2010) 15 SCC 49. His prompt and detailed account matched the penetrating, incised and neck-pressure injuries. Once his testimony was found reliable, the absence of independent witnesses did not defeat it, consistently with Mahesh, Ashok Kumar Chaudhary, Sadhu Saran Singh and Ambika Prasad.

Inquest — Limited scope / No adverse inference — Guiram Mondal v. State of W.B., (2013) 15 SCC 284, confines an inquest to ascertaining the apparent cause of death; it is not required to give a complete account of the assailants' identities or overt acts. Although Ashok signed the inquest and it did not name the assailants or describe their acts, he had already given a detailed FIR and his police statement was recorded before the post-mortem began. No adverse inference could therefore be drawn from the omissions in the inquest.

Section 157 CrPC — FIR dispatch / Ante-timing — Anil Rai v. State of Bihar, (2001) 7 SCC 318, explains that only extraordinary and unexplained delay capable of casting doubt on the FIR requires an adverse inference; every delay in forwarding the report to the magistrate does not invalidate the prosecution. The FIR lodged promptly after sunrise was followed by immediate field inquiry, investigative work throughout the day and the arrest of three accused that evening. Dispatch on the following day was therefore not undue. The challenge based on overwriting in the receipt date was not established because neither the magistrate's record nor the person who acknowledged receipt was produced. The FIR was not shown to be ante-dated or ante-timed. The convictions under Sections 302/149 and 148 IPC were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Three connected criminal appeals challenged the judgment dated 7 March 2009 in Sessions Trial No. 380/2007, by which the appellants were convicted for the murder of Bharat Singh in a field near Baraua. During the intervening night, Bharat's brother Ashok stated that he saw Albel and Kamal Kishore attack Bharat with axes, Gabbar with a ballam, and Amar and Pancham press a lathi across Bharat's neck. Fearing the attackers, Ashok remained hidden until sunrise. He then went home, returned with his family, found Bharat's body in a well and lodged the FIR at 7:15 a.m. The parties had a dispute because the appellants obstructed the route to the complainant party's adjoining fields. The trial court treated Kaptan Singh, Poshan Singh and Hawaldar as hearsay witnesses and held that the recovered weapons did not advance the prosecution case because they had not been sealed at the spot and no blood was found on them. The prosecution therefore depended substantially on Ashok's eyewitness account. The post-mortem recorded penetrating and incised injuries to the face and head, together with severe damage to the neck, trachea, larynx and carotid artery. Amar died during the appeal, which abated against him. The surviving appellants challenged Ashok's credibility, the inquest omissions, the timing of the FIR and the absence of independent witnesses.

2. Precedents — Considered : Vijendra Singh v. State of U.P., (2017) 11 SCC 129, distinguished a naturally present relative from an interested witness and permitted reliance on intrinsically reliable related testimony after careful scrutiny. Raju v. State of T.N., (2012) 12 SCC 701, required discerning scrutiny where relationship and enmity coexist because a hostile relative may add an innocent person along with the real assailants; it did not make independent corroboration an invariable requirement. Jodhan v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 52, and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, likewise allowed reliance on trustworthy related testimony after careful examination. State of U.P. v. Moti Ram, (1990) 4 SCC 389, and Kunwarpal v. State of Uttarakhand, (2014) 16 SCC 560, explained that motive or animosity may support either false implication or the commission of the offence. After testing the surrounding circumstances, the Bench held that the field-route dispute supplied the motive for the assault. Ramesh v. State, (2010) 15 SCC 49, supported identification by a familiar rural witness in limited light. Guiram Mondal v. State of W.B., (2013) 15 SCC 284, confined an inquest to the apparent cause of death and answered the challenge based on its omission of names and overt acts. Anil Rai v. State of Bihar, (2001) 7 SCC 318, explained when delay in forwarding an FIR under Section 157 CrPC may support an allegation of ante-timing. Mahesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 13 SCC 271, Ashok Kumar Chaudhary v. State of Bihar, (2008) 12 SCC 173, Sadhu Saran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, and Ambika Prasad v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2000) 2 SCC 646, supported the conclusion that absence of independent witnesses alone does not defeat otherwise credible eyewitness evidence.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 302/149 and 148 IPC supplied the convictions for murder committed with the common object of an unlawful assembly and for rioting. Section 157 CrPC governed forwarding the FIR to the magistrate. The limited purpose of an inquest, together with the evidentiary significance of the FIR and Ashok's Section 161 police statement, was also considered. The Court examined whether the prosecution had proved the surviving appellants' guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

4. Issues : Whether Ashok's remaining hidden until sunrise, the difference between the stated viewing distances of 150 feet and 10 feet, his relationship with the deceased and the field-route dispute made his sole eyewitness account unsafe; whether omission of the assailants' names and acts from the inquest and non-examination of independent witnesses created a fatal gap; whether the later dispatch of the FIR and overwriting in the receipt date showed that it had been ante-dated or ante-timed; and whether the ocular and medical evidence proved the murder and rioting charges despite the ineffective weapon recoveries.

5. Ratio / Findings : The spot map, Ashok's evidence and even defence witness Balwant placed the appellants' field between Ashok and his village. As Ashok would have had to cross that field after witnessing his brother's brutal murder, fear for his own life plausibly explained why he remained hidden until sunrise. The FIR mentioned a bulb, no obstruction over the 150-foot distance was proved, and Ashok was familiar with the attackers. The difference between the viewing distances stated in his evidence and shown in the spot map did not materially undermine identification. The penetrating injury, the axe-compatible incised wounds and the severe neck injury capable of being caused by pressure from a lathi fully corroborated the acts he assigned to the appellants. His relationship with Bharat and the field-route dispute required careful scrutiny, but that scrutiny disclosed no factual foundation for false implication; the dispute also supplied the motive for the assault. The inquest was not required to narrate the identities and roles of the assailants. Ashok's detailed FIR and his police statement recorded before the post-mortem had already described the incident consistently with the medical evidence. The prompt investigation and same-day arrests of Albel, Pancham and Amar undermined the allegation of ante-timing, and forwarding the FIR on the next day was not fatal. The challenge based on overwriting in the receipt date was not established because the appellants neither called for the magistrate's record nor examined the person who acknowledged receipt. Once Ashok's testimony was found credible, non-examination of nearby persons and the ineffective weapon recoveries did not create reasonable doubt. The surviving appellants' joint attack was proved beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeals concerning the surviving appellants and affirmed the judgment and sentence. It affirmed life imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100 under Section 302/149 IPC, with one month's simple imprisonment in default, and two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100 under Section 148 IPC, with one month's simple imprisonment in default. The sentences were to run concurrently. Amar Singh's appeal had abated in 2013. Albel, Gabbar and Pancham, who were in jail, were directed to undergo the remaining sentence. Kamal Kishore's bail bonds were cancelled and he was directed to surrender immediately before the trial court. A copy of the judgment was to be supplied to the appellants free of cost, and the trial-court record was to be returned with a copy of the judgment for information and compliance.

Headnote :- Section 498-A IPC — mother-in-law / statutory cruelty — On the allegations in the FIR itself, interference in household work, astrology-related taunts, failure to intervene in the son's marital disputes and alleged withholding of affection did not amount to cruelty by the mother-in-law. No unlawful property demand was attributed to her, and her alleged conduct was not of the grave nature required by the statutory Explanation. The separate allegations that the husband demanded property and assaulted the complainant were not adjudicated in this applicant-specific order.

Section 482 CrPC — Face-value test applied separately to each accused — XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, caution against resolving disputed merits at the quashing stage. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, permits quashing when the allegations, accepted at face value, disclose no offence. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognises a narrow exception for public or undisputed documents. Applying the face-value test only to the acts attributed to Alka, the Court quashed the prosecution under Sections 498-A and 506/34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act only so far as it concerned her.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Alka Sharma, the complainant's mother-in-law, sought relief under Section 482 CrPC against Crime No. 108/2021 registered at Mahila Thana, Madan Mahal, Jabalpur, and the resulting prosecution under Sections 498-A and 506/34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Her son and the complainant had married by choice in April 2016. Alka was then employed in Uttarakhand; after retiring, she stayed with the couple in Pune. The complainant alleged that Alka criticised her household work, taunted her about an astrologer's prediction of two marriages, did not intervene when the husband quarrelled with her, and withheld a mother-in-law's affection. The FIR separately attributed demands for a flat, car and costly appliances, physical assault and threats principally to the husband. Alka later moved abroad to live with her daughter. She sought quashing on the ground that, even if accepted, the acts attributed to her did not constitute the charged offences.

2. Precedents — Considered : XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, were cited for restraint against detailed pre-trial fact-finding, weighing the defence or prematurely terminating a prosecution that discloses an offence. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, states the complementary rule that proceedings may be quashed when the allegations, taken at face value, or the uncontroverted supporting material disclose no offence. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognises a narrow exception under which a public document, or a document whose authenticity the complainant does not dispute, may be considered. The Bench did not reject the truth of the FIR; it tested the acts attributed to Alka against the statutory definition in Section 498-A.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC conferred the inherent jurisdiction invoked. Section 498-A IPC and its Explanation define two forms of cruelty: grave willful conduct and harassment connected with coercion to meet an unlawful demand. The prosecution also invoked Section 506 read with Section 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The Court's conclusion was confined to whether the FIR disclosed a prima facie case against this applicant.

4. Issues : Whether criticism of household work, taunts, failure to intervene in her son's marital disputes and alleged withholding of affection, taken at their highest, constituted statutory cruelty or dowry harassment by the mother-in-law; and whether Section 482 permitted the Court to quash the prosecution against her while leaving the distinct allegations against the husband unresolved.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench accepted the FIR's account for the threshold inquiry. The demands for a flat, car and expensive articles were attributed to the husband, not to the mother-in-law. The mother-in-law's alleged objections concerning household work and her taunts, though said to have caused distress, were not alleged to be grave willful conduct or harassment connected with an unlawful demand as required by Section 498-A. In the circumstances alleged, failure to persuade her son or to show affection did not create criminal liability. The Court therefore held that the FIR, even if accepted in full, disclosed no offence by Alka under Sections 498-A and 506/34 IPC or Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. It applied the face-value no-offence category of inherent review without resolving disputed evidence. The holding was limited to Alka and did not determine the remaining allegations against others.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application. It quashed FIR Crime No. 108/2021 and the criminal prosecution under Sections 498-A and 506/34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act only insofar as they concerned Alka Sharma.

Headnote :- Electricity Act, 2003 — Section 138 / sentencing discretion — The conviction for unlawfully reconnecting a disconnected supply to operate a flour mill was supported by the inspection evidence and the accused's admissions. Although one year's rigorous imprisonment was not excessive, Section 138 prescribed no minimum sentence for a first offender. In view of the appellant's age and financial condition, and a member of the Bar's voluntary offer to pay on his behalf, the Court replaced the custodial sentence with a fine of Rs. 10,000. The substitution was conditional: payment within fifteen days would result in immediate release, but default would revive the one-year term. The decision rested on the particular mitigation and the concrete arrangement for payment; it did not recognise a general entitlement to a fine-only sentence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The appellant operated a flour mill through a 10 HP electricity connection. The department stated that substantial dues remained unpaid, notice was given before temporary disconnection on 19 June 2005, and an inspection on 4 July 2005 found the mill operating through a direct unauthorised connection from a pole. On the Junior Engineer's complaint, the Special Judge (Electricity Act), Mungawali, convicted the appellant under Section 138 of the Electricity Act, 2003 on 16 November 2007 and sentenced him to one year's rigorous imprisonment, a fine of Rs. 1,000 and three months' imprisonment in default. In the criminal appeal filed in 2008, the appellant was eventually produced under an arrest warrant in 2022. The complainant's witnesses described the disconnection and unlawful reconnection. The appellant testified about complaints against the disconnection and alleged payments but produced no receipts; he admitted the mill connection and knowledge that at least Rs. 30,000 was outstanding, while denying the unlawful reconnection. At sentencing, counsel stated that the appellant was then about 61, no longer operated the mill and survived by labour, but acknowledged that the alleged cessation had not been stated in his defence evidence. Counsel sought replacement of custody by an enhanced fine while also stating that the appellant could not pay it. A lawyer present in Court offered to deposit Rs. 10,000 for him.

2. Statutes considered : Section 138 of the Electricity Act, 2003 governed unlawful reconnection and, for a first offender, prescribed no minimum term of imprisonment. Section 374 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 provided the route of appeal against conviction. The appellant entered the witness box as a defence witness under Section 315 CrPC, and the Court considered the evidentiary effect of his admissions. The operative sentencing direction supplied the precise consequence of default.

3. Issues : Whether the inspection evidence and the appellant's admissions proved the Section 138 offence despite his denial and alleged payments; and whether the one-year sentence should be modified because of his age, means and the absence of a statutory minimum, together with the effect that payment or non-payment of an enhanced fine would have on his release.

4. Ratio / Findings : The Junior Engineer's evidence about the notice, disconnection and direct reconnection was corroborated by another complainant witness. The appellant admitted that charges were outstanding but produced no proof of the payments he claimed to have made. The Court therefore affirmed the conviction and held that one year's imprisonment was not excessive for operating the mill without paying the charges. It also noted that the alleged cessation of the milling business had not been stated in the appellant's defence testimony. Because the provision prescribed no minimum term for a first offender, however, the Court could adopt a different sentence. It was initially unwilling to interfere when counsel stated that the appellant could not pay an enhanced fine. A lawyer then voluntarily offered to pay Rs. 10,000 on his behalf. On that concrete basis, and having regard to the appellant's age and means, the Court replaced imprisonment with the enhanced fine. The result was an exercise of discretion on the particular circumstances, not a finding that age or poverty alone required substitution.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the appeal by affirming the conviction and modifying the sentence. It set aside the one-year prison term and increased the fine from Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 10,000. If the fine was deposited within fifteen days from the date of the order, the appellant, who was then in custody, was to be released immediately. If it was not deposited within that period, the one-year sentence would automatically revive, and he was not to be released on bail until he had served it.

Headnote :- Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 — Section 482 / cognizable offence / alleged retaliatory FIR - The applicant alleged that an FIR accusing him of sexual harassment was a counterblast to his PIL concerning encroachment on a temple. He also alleged that the informant had misstated her father's name and omitted allegations made in an earlier complaint. Applying Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, the Court held that, where an FIR discloses a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary and cannot, by themselves, justify quashing it. The parties' competing claims to occupation of the premises, the identity dispute and the history of complaints involved disputed facts that could not be finally decided in the exercise of inherent jurisdiction. The complainant's identity could be tested at trial, and the omission of allegations from an earlier complaint did not, by itself, warrant quashing the FIR. Applying the Supreme Court's principles on considering allegations at face value and avoiding a trial of disputed facts in inherent jurisdiction, including Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Cr.A. 709/2021 (30.06.2021), the Court refused interference without deciding the eventual merits.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The applicant, appearing in person, sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of the FIR in Crime No. 202/2021, registered at Police Station Inderganj, Gwalior, for offences under IPC Sections 354-A, 509 and 294. A charge-sheet had been filed during the pendency of the application, but he had not sought its quashing. He alleged that the complainant had falsely named Mahesh Chand Tiwari, rather than Harish Chand Tiwari, as her father, with a view to hindering any later action by him for malicious prosecution. He alleged that her family occupied a Hanuman temple and that the FIR was in retaliation for his complaints and PIL No. 19017/2020. He also relied on the omission from the FIR of allegations in an earlier police complaint concerning drug use and the taking of photographs. The State and the private respondent submitted that the FIR disclosed cognizable offences. The High Court examined the PIL record, including the initial directions to the revenue authorities in December 2020, subsequent compliance and inspection proceedings, and final disposal in February 2022 following an OSD's report. The applicant had initially failed to disclose that final disposal and later withdrew his submission that he had not been heard. The parties' claims concerning rights in, and occupation of, the temple premises remained disputed. The FIR alleged that the applicant repeatedly stared at the complainant, made indecent gestures and abused her when she objected.

2. Precedents — Considered : Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, and State of T.N. v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, were quoted for the need for caution against premature quashing or interference with an investigation where allegations disclose a cognizable offence and require inquiry. The Court applied that framework while recognising the power to intervene in exceptional cases of malicious prosecution or abuse of process. S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, discussed the categories in Bhajan Lal concerning allegations taken at face value and proceedings instituted with mala fides, and the need to protect a person from wholly untenable proceedings. Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, required a reasoned examination of the facts and the governing law. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, set out the broader principles governing quashing: consider the uncontroverted allegations and prosecution material; avoid weighing the evidence or relying on extraneous defence material; allow a prosecution with the necessary factual foundation to continue; and reserve intervention for exceptional abuse or failure to disclose an offence. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, reiterated the need for circumspection. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognised a limited exception permitting consideration of defence documents that are public documents or whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, and Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, distinguished the prevention of genuine abuse of process from the premature termination of a prosecution. The latter also reproduced the illustrative categories in Bhajan Lal and cautioned that the availability of a civil remedy or an assessment of the prospects of acquittal did not, by itself, justify quashing. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, addressed the corresponding power to intervene where allegations taken at face value disclose no offence or are inherently improbable. CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Cr.A. 709/2021 (30.06.2021), cautioned against a detailed assessment of disputed facts at the Section 482 stage. The Court considered these authorities together and applied the limits they placed on that jurisdiction. More directly, Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, quoted in paragraph 22, explained the exceptional scope of Section 482, the categories in Bhajan Lal and the secondary importance of the informant's alleged mala fides where an offence is disclosed. The Court followed it in rejecting the alleged counterblast as an independent ground for quashing on the disputed facts.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the limited exercise of inherent power to prevent abuse of process or secure the ends of justice. It did not permit the Court to decide contested questions of credibility or the ultimate merits of the prosecution. IPC Sections 354-A, 509 and 294 were the offences stated in the FIR; the Court considered whether the allegations prima facie disclosed cognizable offences. CrPC Sections 107/116 and 340 read with 195 appeared in the account of the earlier PIL and complaints. They formed part of that procedural background and were not the basis of the present ruling.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR should be quashed on the ground that the applicant's earlier PIL and complaints allegedly prompted its retaliatory filing; whether the alleged misstatement of the complainant's father's name or the omission of allegations from an earlier complaint warranted quashing; and whether these matters could be determined under Section 482 when the FIR alleged sexual harassment and a charge-sheet had been filed but was not challenged.

5. Ratio / Findings : In considering quashing under Section 482, the Court proceeds on the accusations taken at face value; it does not try their truth or assess the likelihood of conviction. The Court found that the allegations of staring, indecent gestures and abuse disclosed cognizable offences sufficient for the prosecution to proceed. Applying Renu Kumari, it held that the informant's alleged motive was secondary. The PIL had already ended, and the parties' claims concerning occupation and their history of complaints and counter-complaints involved disputed facts. The Court could not find in this application that the FIR was a retaliatory fabrication. The applicant would have an opportunity at trial to cross-examine the complainant about her parentage; the alleged misdescription therefore did not justify quashing the FIR. The omission of some allegations from the earlier complaint did not, by itself, invalidate the FIR. The Court observed that women residing in the complainant's house were visible in photographs filed by the applicant himself, and that the earlier allegation that he had photographed them appeared correct. This was a tentative observation in the quashing proceedings, not a final determination of guilt or credibility at trial. The application failed because the applicant had not established a prima facie case for quashing. The Court did not determine guilt, the complainant's exact identity or the parties' civil rights in the temple premises.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 to quash the FIR. The applicant had neither sought nor obtained an order quashing the subsequently filed charge-sheet. The prosecution remained subject to the ordinary trial process.

Aman Arora Jain v. Investigation Officer and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 42996/2021, 25/03/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Indian Penal Code, 1860 — Sections 306 and 107 / instigation at FIR-quashing stage - Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, and Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, recognise that instigation need not be expressed in direct words and may be inferred from a continuing course of conduct. There must, however, be an intention to incite the consequence and a reasonable connection between the conduct and that consequence. An utterance made in anger without intending its consequences, or ordinary discord, is insufficient. Gangula Mohan Reddy, M. Mohan and Amalendu Pal emphasise mens rea, positive conduct and proximity as requirements for conviction. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, requires the Court, on a quashing application, to form only a tentative view at the threshold. Here, the allegations were that the applicant, who was already married, persistently pressed the deceased to marry him despite her family's objections and harassed her before her suicide. The Court reasoned that a second marriage during the subsistence of the first was void and that the applicant was pressing her to enter a relationship not recognised by law. On these allegations, it held that the Section 306 FIR should not be quashed. Abetment was not finally proved in these proceedings.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : After a missing-person report was lodged, it was found that the deceased had died by jumping in front of a train. Crime No. 273/2021 was registered at Gwalior on allegations that the applicant had harassed her. These included persistent pressure to marry him, although he was already married and had children, and despite her parents' requests that he desist. The applicant sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC, submitting that even if all the allegations were accepted, they did not constitute abetment under Section 306 IPC. His earlier application for anticipatory bail had been dismissed on 11 June 2021 in M.Cr.C. No. 27345/2021. In that proceeding, he had submitted that he had advanced money to the deceased and her mother and had been falsely implicated after they demanded more money. The State relied on the alleged pressure to marry and the continued harassment. The present application concerned the FIR; it did not involve a trial of the parties' competing versions.

2. Precedents — Considered : Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, explained instigation as goading or provoking another person to act. Express words are unnecessary, but an intention to incite the consequence must be discernible with reasonable certainty. Instigation may be inferred from a course of conduct that leaves the deceased with no apparent option other than suicide. An emotional utterance without an intention that its consequences should follow is insufficient. Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, focused on the abettor's intention and the inference to be drawn from the circumstances, rather than a fixed formula. It also emphasised that an assessment on a quashing application is tentative. Sanju alias Sanjay Singh Sengar v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371, likewise required mens rea for instigation. Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., (2010) 1 SCC 750, State of W.B. v. Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73, M. Mohan v. State, AIR 2011 SC 1238, Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797, and Amalendu Pal v. State of W.B., (2010) 1 SCC 707, were quoted on the modes of abetment under Section 107, the need for positive and intentional conduct, proximity and causation, and the caution required before treating ordinary discord or a hypersensitive response as proof of abetment at trial. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, incorporated the principle in Chitresh Kumar Chopra and Ramesh Kumar that instigation may be inferred from the circumstances. It expressly cautioned against evaluating and marshalling the record to determine guilt at the threshold. The Court applied these authorities in deciding that the allegations should proceed. It did not hold that harassment alone would be sufficient for conviction.

3. Statutes considered : Section 306 IPC punishes abetment of suicide. Section 107 IPC defines abetment through instigation, conspiracy accompanied by the requisite act or illegal omission, or intentional aid. Its explanations address misrepresentation or concealment as instigation and facilitation as aid. Section 482 CrPC governed the request to quash the FIR at a preliminary stage. Section 438 CrPC concerned the earlier anticipatory bail proceeding, rather than the relief sought in this application.

4. Issues : Whether the allegations that an already married applicant persistently pressured the deceased to marry him and harassed her, taken provisionally as true, were sufficient to disclose abetment under Sections 306 and 107 so that the FIR should not be quashed, or whether they were legally incapable of constituting that offence.

5. Ratio / Findings : After setting out Section 107 and the Supreme Court's tests, the Court explained instigation as intentional goading, urging, provoking or encouraging, which may be inferred from a continuing course of conduct. It considered the State's account that the applicant persisted in asking the deceased to marry him although he was already married, had children and had been asked by her family to desist. The Court reasoned that a second marriage during the subsistence of the first was void and characterised his insistence as pressure to enter a relationship not recognised by law. It held that such alleged conduct could not be treated as incapable of amounting to abetment of suicide. The allegations therefore went beyond innocuous or ordinary discord and were sufficient to resist quashing at this stage. This conclusion was confined to the quashing application; it was not a finding, after evidence, that all the statutory ingredients had been proved.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application to quash the Section 306 FIR. Investigation and any prosecution were left to continue in the ordinary course. The ruling did not finally determine guilt.

Aman Parmar v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 22585/2021, 18/06/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (28) Prev Next

Headnote :- Criminal Procedure Code, 1973 — Section 439 / successive bail - The strict principle of res judicata does not bar a further bail application. However, after an application has been rejected on merits, repeated filing without a material change in circumstances or a valid new ground cannot be used to obtain review of the earlier order. Applying State of Tamil Nadu v. S.A. Raja, (2005) 8 SCC 380, and State of M.P. v. Kajad, (2001) 7 SCC 673, the Court rejected counsel's insistence on rearguing the merits in a third application. Abdul Basit v. Mohd. Abdul Kadir Chaudhary, (2014) 10 SCC 754, reinforced the distinct prohibition under Section 362 against indirectly reviewing an order granting bail. As no changed circumstance had been identified, the Court declined to reconsider the merits. It did not hold that every successive bail application was barred.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The applicant was arrested on 31 December 2021 in Crime No. 273/2021, Gwalior, for alleged abetment of suicide under Section 306 IPC. His first bail application had been dismissed on merits. His second application was dismissed on 5 July 2022 in M.Cr.C. No. 32265/2022. The present application was his third request for bail under Section 439 CrPC. When directed to identify changed circumstances, counsel insisted on arguing the merits again. He submitted that res judicata did not apply to bail applications and relied on S.A. Raja and the Division Bench ruling in Jagdish Arora. The State opposed a further application in the absence of changed circumstances.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Tamil Nadu v. S.A. Raja, (2005) 8 SCC 380, was cited by the applicant. It states that a fresh bail application made shortly after refusal and an unsuccessful challenge requires a major change in circumstances or valid grounds giving rise to a tenable case for bail. Repeated filing without a change in circumstances would set a bad precedent. The Court applied that qualification in rejecting the applicant's submission. State of M.P. v. Kajad, (2001) 7 SCC 673, recognises that successive bail applications may be made on changed circumstances, but treats repetition without change as an impermissible request for review. This was the direct basis of the present ruling. Abdul Basit alias Raju v. Mohd. Abdul Kadir Chaudhary, (2014) 10 SCC 754, explains that a court cannot indirectly review its own order granting bail through a request for cancellation, and that Section 362 bars such review in the absence of statutory authority. The Court invoked the prohibition on review. The present case, however, concerned a further bail application after refusal, rather than cancellation of an order granting bail.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed the request for regular bail; a further application could be made on changed circumstances. Section 362 CrPC was discussed in the quoted Abdul Basit ruling as a bar to review of an order granting bail; the present application sought bail again after an earlier refusal. IPC Section 306 identified the alleged offence. The Court did not reconsider its merits.

4. Issues : Whether the applicant was entitled to a fresh hearing on the merits of his third regular bail application merely because res judicata did not apply, when bail had earlier been refused on merits and no change in circumstances had been identified.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected counsel's reliance on S.A. Raja for an unqualified right to reargue the merits. The inapplicability of strict res judicata does not permit repeated argument on the same merits. Kajad permits a further application where circumstances materially change and treats repetition without change as an attempt to review the earlier order. Counsel identified no new circumstance after the previous refusal and persisted in seeking to argue the merits again. The Court held that this was an impermissible attempt to reopen its earlier bail decision. It did not reassess the merits of the suicide case. Abdul Basit was cited for the broader prohibition on indirect review; that authority concerned an attempt to review an order granting bail.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the third application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC. It did not decide the merits of the underlying Section 306 accusation afresh or impose a permanent bar on a future application based on changed circumstances.

Headnote :- Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 — Section 13 / foreign divorce in Section 482 petition - The husband knew that his wife had left Arizona for India, yet obtained an ex parte divorce decree after notice was published in an Arizona newspaper. The Court held that service was unfair and fraudulent, bringing the decree within the natural-justice and fraud exceptions to the conclusiveness of a foreign judgment. It also noted that the stated ground of irretrievable breakdown was not a recognised ground for divorce in India. The decree therefore did not conclusively defeat the prosecution arising from the Section 498-A FIR.

Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 — Section 468 / continuing Section 498-A cruelty - For the alleged offence, which carries a maximum sentence of three years' imprisonment, the period of limitation for taking cognizance is three years. Here, however, the alleged expulsion from the matrimonial home for want of dowry and the continuing mental consequences at the wife's parental home were treated as continuing cruelty, rather than an act completed in 2019. Applying Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, and Amar Singh v. Vimla, the Court rejected the limitation objection on the alleged facts.

Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 — Section 178 / territorial jurisdiction - On its prima facie view of continuing mental cruelty and the allegation of threatened remarriage, the Court held that Adhartal police could register and investigate the case despite the principal alleged acts having occurred in Arizona. In reaching that conclusion, it also noted that the husband's parents resided within Adhartal's territorial jurisdiction. The truth of the remarriage allegation remained to be tested in evidence.

Indian Penal Code, 1860 — Section 498-A / mental cruelty and threshold quashing - The alleged dowry demands, expulsion, continuing distress and threatened remarriage could disclose a cognizable offence of cruelty. The wife's silence or her failure to initiate matrimonial proceedings did not establish that she was content with the separation, consistently with Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369. Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, supported treating the informant's alleged mala fides as secondary where the complaint disclosed an offence. The initial mistaken reference to Section 498, later corrected to 498-A, did not invalidate the charge-sheet on these facts. The application was dismissed without final findings on the matters requiring trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The parties married in Jabalpur in 2005, lived in several Indian cities and later spent years in the United States. They had two children. The wife's FIR alleged subsequent dowry demands, physical and mental harassment, threats of divorce and remarriage, expulsion from the American home in November 2019, non-payment of maintenance and inability to return. The children remained with the husband. She returned to India, and FIR No. 1274/2023 was registered at Adhartal, Jabalpur, on 8 December 2023 under Section 498-A IPC; the initial police and charge-sheet papers referred to Section 498 and were later corrected. The husband sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC. He relied on an ex parte Arizona divorce decree, his assertion that there had been no contact after 2019, a travel record showing departure on 21 rather than 23 November, the elapsed time and the fact that the principal alleged acts occurred abroad. He submitted that she had sought a share in property and alimony in later emails, had not sought restitution of conjugal rights or divorce, and had lodged the FIR only when he visited India with the children. The Arizona divorce petition was filed in October 2019. Attempts at service in late 2019 failed, and publication was authorised and made in Arizona in early 2020, after she had left. In an email sent in June 2023, she challenged that service. The husband conceded that he had refused maintenance. The State submitted that the alleged cruelty connected with dowry demands and the threats of remarriage disclosed an offence. The application sought quashing; it did not involve a trial of those accusations.

2. Precedents — Considered : The husband cited State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal, 1992 Supp (1) SCC 335, in support of his allegation of mala fides. Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was quoted at length on the cautious exercise of jurisdiction under Section 482. The quotation included the illustrative categories in R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal concerning a legal bar, failure to disclose an offence and manifest mala fides, the need to avoid assessing credibility as at trial, and the secondary importance of the complainant's alleged motive where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. The Court applied that threshold when rejecting the alleged motive based on the timing of the complaint and the proposed defence concerning remarriage. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, explained that the mental effects of physical or verbal cruelty and forced separation may continue at the parental home where the wife takes shelter, even without a fresh act of physical cruelty there. The Court applied that principle to continuing cruelty and to the objections based on time and place. Amar Singh v. Vimla, Criminal Revision 2376/2020 (22.06.2021), stated the High Court's related conclusion that compelling a wife to remain at her parental home may itself amount to cruelty. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, rejected an adverse inference from delay where the wife and her family had been trying to achieve reconciliation. The Court applied it when considering the wife's failure to initiate matrimonial proceedings earlier.

3. Statutes considered : Section 498-A IPC and its Explanation governed cruelty comprising wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health; or harassment intended to coerce her or a person related to her to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or arising from their failure to meet that demand. Section 498 IPC was a distinct provision mistakenly entered in the earlier papers; the allegations were considered under 498-A. Section 482 CrPC governed quashing. Section 468(2)(c) CrPC prescribed the asserted three-year limitation for taking cognizance where the maximum sentence was three years, subject here to the Court's analysis of the offence as continuing. Section 178 CrPC permitted inquiry or trial where an offence continued across more than one local area or consisted of acts in different areas. Section 13(d), (e) and (f) CPC concerned the natural-justice, fraud and Indian-law exceptions to the conclusiveness of a foreign judgment. The Court also considered the ground of divorce stated in the Arizona decree. The Arizona procedure for publication formed part of the background to the service finding; it was not independently interpreted as Indian criminal law.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the Arizona divorce decree conclusively ended the marital basis of the cruelty prosecution. (ii) Whether the 2023 FIR was barred by a three-year limitation period calculated solely from the wife's departure in 2019. (iii) Whether Adhartal police could act when many of the alleged events occurred in Arizona. (iv) Whether the alleged cruelty, threatened remarriage and delayed complaint disclosed an offence under Section 498-A despite the asserted absence of later contact and earlier matrimonial proceedings, and whether the mistaken reference to Section 498 required quashing.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the husband's own account of her travel, the wife had left Arizona before notice was served by publication there. He knew that she was in India but relied on publication in an Arizona newspaper. The Court held that this involved fraud and denied fair notice, so that the foreign decree was not conclusive under Section 13 CPC. The stated ground of irretrievable breakdown was a further reason for attaching no weight to the decree in these proceedings. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court held that the alleged expulsion for want of dowry and consequent compelled residence with her parents could sustain continuing mental cruelty beyond the original act abroad. On that basis, Section 468 did not bar the case merely because the FIR was lodged four years after her departure. Silence and failure to initiate matrimonial proceedings did not show that she accepted the separation; Pratibha recognised that such delay could reflect efforts to save the marriage. The Court treated the alleged threat of remarriage as relevant to mental cruelty, while leaving the husband's actual intention disputed. On its view of continuing cruelty, Section 178 permitted local proceedings. The Court also noted that the husband's parents resided within Adhartal's territorial jurisdiction. Applying Renu Kumari, it refused to quash merely on the husband's theory that the wife had waited for his visit to India to complain. The mistaken initial reference to Section 498 did not defeat a prima facie case under Section 498-A. These were findings on the quashing application, not final determinations of cruelty, dowry demands, intended remarriage or guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482. It held that the FIR allegations prima facie disclosed an offence under Section 498-A and declined to quash the charge-sheet. The criminal case could continue, with disputed facts left for the competent trial forum.

Headnote :- Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881 — Sections 138 and 139 / allegedly interpolated security cheque - The presumption under Section 139 is rebuttable. It does not conclusively shield a cheque holder from a counter-complaint alleging that he changed the date of a postdated cheque from 25 December to 25 February 2013 and presented it before the alleged debt became due. On the complainant's version, liability had not accrued either by the altered date or when the Section 138 complaint was filed in May. The Court therefore declined to quash the order taking cognizance of the alleged IPC forgery and related offences. It did not decide whether the cheque had in fact been altered or whether liability was ultimately established.

Criminal Procedure Code, 1973 — Section 482 / delayed complaint and alleged counterblast - Applying Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, the Court held that the complainant's alleged mala fides were insufficient by themselves to justify quashing where the accusation disclosed a cognizable offence. Ravinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, (2001) 7 SCC 690, and Mohammad Wajid v. State of U.P., AIR 2023 SC 3784, supported the separate principle that delay alone neither invalidates a criminal complaint nor requires its quashing, unless a bar under Section 468 is established. The application challenging cognizance was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The applicant had filed a complaint under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act on a cheque which, according to him, represented an existing liability. The respondent alleged that the cheque had been issued as security and postdated 25 December 2013, but that the applicant changed the date to 25 February 2013, presented it and filed the Section 138 case on 18 May 2013, before the original date or the accrual of liability. On the respondent's complaint about the alteration, the JMFC, Satna, took cognizance on 23 March 2018 in RCT 219/2018 of offences under IPC Sections 420, 467, 468, 471 and 120-B. The applicant challenged that order under Section 482 CrPC, while acknowledging that revision was also available. He submitted that issuance of the cheque was admitted, that Section 139 raised a presumption of legally enforceable liability, that a security cheque could attract Section 138, and that the later complaint was a mala fide counterblast to his own case. The respondent submitted that alteration of a valuable security constituted a distinct offence. The Court considered the complaint at the threshold; it did not determine the allegation on tested evidence concerning the document.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant relied on Mahindra and Mahindra Financial Services v. Rajiv Dubey, (2009) 1 SCC 706, and the coordinate-bench decisions in G.D. Choudhary v. Vishnukumar and Adarsh Singh Kushwaha v. State of M.P., (2016) 3 MPLJ 176. Bhajan Lal, AIR 1992 SC 604, was invoked in support of the alleged counterblast. Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, expressly considered Bhajan Lal and R.P. Kapur. The Court applied its principle that the complainant's alleged motive alone does not justify quashing a complaint disclosing a cognizable offence. Ravinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, (2001) 7 SCC 690, explained that delay in reporting is common and that there is no fixed deadline for lodging an FIR. Neither promptness nor delay conclusively establishes the truth of the account. The Court relied on it to reject the contention that delay automatically invalidated the complaint. Mohammad Wajid v. State of U.P., AIR 2023 SC 3784, likewise held that delay alone was insufficient for quashing and was applied on that point.

3. Statutes considered : Section 139 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881 raises a rebuttable presumption that the holder received a cheque of the kind referred to in Section 138 in discharge, wholly or partly, of a debt or other liability. Section 138 concerned the applicant's underlying dishonour case, whose merits were not decided. IPC Sections 420, 467, 468, 471 and 120-B were the offences of which the Magistrate had taken cognizance on the allegations of alteration and use. Section 482 CrPC governed the quashing application. Section 468 CrPC was referred to as a possible statutory bar of limitation, but no such bar was asserted or established.

4. Issues : Whether admitted issuance of the cheque and the presumption under Section 139 defeated a complaint alleging a material alteration of its date and use before the asserted liability became due; and whether the alleged retaliation or delay following the applicant's Section 138 case required quashing of the Magistrate's cognizance order.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the respondent's version, the cheque was originally postdated 25 December 2013, but the applicant allegedly altered the date to 25 February 2013 and filed the Section 138 case in May. The Court reasoned that, even with the presumption under Section 139, liability on that version would arise, at most, on the original future date. The presumption therefore did not dispose of the allegation that the cheque had been altered and used before liability arose. The Court rejected quashing on that basis without deciding whether the allegations were proved. Under Renu Kumari, the alleged counterblast was secondary where the complaint disclosed cognizable offences. The Court noted the complainant's assertion that he had complained to the bank on 15 May 2013. Applying Ravinder Kumar and Mohammad Wajid, it held that mere delay in reporting was insufficient to terminate the proceedings; no bar under Section 468 had been alleged. These were threshold conclusions, not findings that the cheque had actually been forged or that either party would ultimately succeed in the parallel proceedings.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482. The JMFC's order taking cognizance of the listed IPC offences remained operative. The underlying Section 138 case was not decided.

Ameen Hussain v. Akash Kumar Dwivedi, M.Cr.C. no. 51510/2018, 15/01/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Indian Penal Code, 1860 — Sections 415 and 420 / inception intention / commercial transaction - A later breach of contract does not, by itself, establish cheating. Fraudulent or dishonest intention must exist when the original inducement is made. Sarabjit Kaur v. State of Punjab, (2023) 5 SCC 360, Mitesh Kumar J. Sha v. State of Karnataka, (2022) 14 SCC 572, and Harmanpreet Singh Ahluwalia v. State of Punjab, (2009) 7 SCC 712, explain that distinction. Here, the FIR alleged that a promise of 60 percent participation in a toll-plaza venture induced payment of Rs. 2.06 crore, but only 25 percent was allotted and the excess Rs. 1.215 crore was not returned. The cancellation deed was allegedly signed under pressure. Taken at face value at the Section 482 stage, those allegations supported an inference of deception at the outset, rather than merely a later failure to perform the contract. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, and Alpic Finance v. P. Sadasivan, (2001) 3 SCC 513, required consideration of the allegations at face value without resolving disputed evidence. The availability of a civil claim did not automatically preclude investigation of the alleged offence. Quashing was refused without final findings on the partnership terms or guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The respondent informant, who was said to be about 80 at the later meeting, met the applicant through a mutual acquaintance. He alleged that the applicant encouraged him to invest in a toll-plaza contract by promising monthly profit of 15–20 percent, return of the earnest money and a 60 percent partnership. The informant stated that he withdrew his savings and transferred Rs. 2.06 crore for the Kunwarpur toll plaza, representing roughly 60 percent of the total earnest money of Rs. 3.38 crore. The applicant's counsel accepted receipt of that aggregate amount, while submitting that it had been received indirectly through other persons. The written arrangement gave the informant a 25 percent share, provided for return of the excess Rs. 1.215 crore and treated Rs. 84.5 lakh as his 25 percent earnest-money contribution, refundable after the NHAI contract ended. He alleged that neither the excess nor the full refundable earnest money was returned. According to him, the applicant referred to penalties, gave him a cheque for Rs. 30 lakh, withheld the penalty details and compelled him to sign a cancellation deed in a closed office late at night in the presence of armed persons. He also alleged threats. FIR 134/2022 was registered at Sanjeevani Nagar, Jabalpur, under IPC Sections 420, 406 and 386. The applicant sought quashing of the FIR and consequential proceedings under Section 482 CrPC. Relying on V.Y. Jose, he submitted that the dispute over 60 percent or 25 percent participation and the accounts was civil. The informant maintained that the applicant had intended to deceive him from the beginning.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant relied on V.Y. Jose v. State of Gujarat, (2009) 3 SCC 78. Sarabjit Kaur v. State of Punjab, (2023) 5 SCC 360, held that breach of contract or failure to keep a promise does not, by itself, establish fraud at the outset, and cautioned against using criminal proceedings to exert pressure in a truly civil dispute. The Court distinguished its application because the alleged initial payment followed by a reduced allotment supported a different inference here. Mitesh Kumar J. Sha v. State of Karnataka, (2022) 14 SCC 572, including the principles in Hridaya Ranjan Prasad Verma and Indian Oil, likewise required dishonest intention at the time of inducement. The ingredients of the alleged offence had to be examined; a contractual setting did not, by itself, make every dispute purely civil. Alpic Finance v. P. Sadasivan, (2001) 3 SCC 513, considered the exceptional power to quash claims with a civil character while recognising, through Trisuns Chemical and Pratibha Rani, that civil and criminal remedies may coexist where facts constituting an offence are alleged. Harmanpreet Singh Ahluwalia v. State of Punjab, (2009) 7 SCC 712, set out the ingredients under Sections 405/415 and required, for cheating, dishonest intention when the original promise was made. The Court applied that requirement to the alleged initial inducement of a 60 percent share followed by a 25 percent allotment. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, required the allegations to be considered at face value without conducting a trial of disputed facts, and recognised that a civil claim did not, by itself, displace a criminal offence. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, State of T.N. v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Cr.A. 709/2021 (30.06.2021), were considered together on the need for restraint under Section 482. Disputed facts were to be investigated and tried, while intervention remained available where allegations taken at face value disclosed no offence.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 415 and 420 IPC concerned deception, dishonest inducement and delivery of property. The Court emphasised the need for dishonest intention at the outset. The elements of entrustment and dishonest misappropriation under Section 405 IPC were quoted through Harmanpreet in relation to the charge under Section 406. Section 386 IPC was an offence stated in the FIR in connection with the alleged coercion. Section 482 CrPC governed the request to quash the FIR and consequential proceedings at the threshold.

4. Issues : Whether the alleged failures concerning the partnership and refund amounted only to a civil dispute over accounts or contract, or whether the initial representation and handling of the investment disclosed dishonest inducement constituting cheating; and whether the disputed documents, shares, routes of payment and allegedly coerced cancellation could be determined in the exercise of inherent jurisdiction.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court distinguished a later breach of contract from dishonest intention at the time of the original promise. It considered the alleged representation of a 60 percent interest, receipt of the corresponding investment directly or indirectly, allotment of only 25 percent, failure to return the excess despite assurances, alleged withholding of refundable earnest money and the account of a cancellation deed signed under pressure. The Court explained that, if a genuine agreement for a 60 percent share had later failed because of intervening events, that failure alone would not establish cheating from the outset. Here, however, the alleged allotment of a reduced share after receipt of the investment, followed by retention of the excess, supported a prima facie inference of dishonest intention at inception. The civil features of a business venture did not automatically exclude the ingredients of a criminal offence. At the Section 482 stage, the Court could not resolve the conflicting accounts of the arrangement or the cancellation deed. It held that the allegations could not be treated as predominantly civil.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application to quash Crime No. 134/2022 and consequential proceedings. The FIR remained open to investigation or prosecution according to law. The threshold decision did not determine guilt or civil entitlements.

Amit Khampariya v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 39276/2022, 30/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Evidence Act, 1872 — injured and related eyewitnesses / contradictions - The injuries sustained by Jaswant and Rajendra supported their presence at the incident. Their relationship with the deceased did not, by itself, discredit otherwise credible testimony. Applying State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324, and Mritunjoy Biswas v. Pranab, (2013) 12 SCC 796, the Court distinguished minor variations from contradictions affecting the substance of the prosecution case. The witnesses consistently identified the appellants and described the armed interception, assault and burning of the jeep. Medical evidence corroborated their account.

Evidence Act, 1872 — hostile witness - Applying Malti Sahu v. Rahul, (2022) 10 SCC 226, the Court held that a witness's hostility did not remove the dependable part of the testimony from consideration. It relied on the admission that the jeep had been stopped at the barrier. That limited admission corroborated the occurrence; it did not establish every accused person's role.

Evidence Act, 1872 — Section 32(1) / CrPC Sections 161 and 162(2) - Ramswaroop's statement to the police concerned the assault that caused his death. After his death, it was admissible as a dying declaration under the exception to the usual restriction in Section 162. Applying Pradeep Bisoi v. State of Odisha, (2019) 11 SCC 500, the Court relied on the statement to support the eyewitness account and its finding that the death was homicidal.

Indian Penal Code, 1860 — Sections 141 and 149 / common object - A member of an armed unlawful assembly who shares its common object may incur constructive liability even without proof that he inflicted the fatal blow. Mere presence is insufficient. Applying Rabindra Mahto v. State of Jharkhand, (2006) 10 SCC 432, and Naresh v. State of Haryana, (2023) 10 SCC 134, the Court inferred the shared object and the required awareness from the weapons carried, the unlawful interception, the joint assaults and the burning of the jeep. It affirmed the convictions and sentences of the three appellants whose appeals remained for decision.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 13 August 2006, Ramswaroop Chaturvedi and his relatives were returning from a shrine in a jeep when a group intercepted them at the Pahadi Bandha toll barrier. The group allegedly assaulted the occupants with guns, lathis and an axe and set the jeep on fire. Ramswaroop later died of his injuries. The FIR initially alleged rioting, attempted murder and mischief by fire; the murder charge was added after his death. Investigators recovered weapons and recorded the accounts of eyewitnesses and injured persons, including Ramswaroop's statement under Section 161 while he was alive. Doctors examined the deceased and the injured occupants. The Sessions Court, Naugaon, convicted Amit Kumar, Babbu alias Babulal, Munna and Bhaiyan alias Jairam under Section 302/149 and the connected Sections 148, 323/149 and 435/149. It imposed life imprisonment and other concurrent terms, but acquitted Virendra. Several accused had died during the trial. Criminal Appeals 1753 and 1856 of 2010 were heard together. Bhaiyan's appeal had been withdrawn in 2022, leaving the appeals of Amit, Babbu and Munna for decision on the merits. They contended that the fatal blows were mainly attributed to assailants who had died, that their own specific roles were uncertain, and that the witnesses contradicted one another. They also relied on past enmity, Virendra's acquittal and their substantial period in custody to seek interference with the convictions or reduction of sentence. The State relied on the injured and other eyewitnesses, medical evidence and the deceased's recorded account.

2. Precedents — Considered : Mritunjoy Biswas v. Pranab, (2013) 12 SCC 796, distinguished minor discrepancies from omissions or contradictions that affect the substance of the prosecution case and undermine otherwise reliable evidence. State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324, required due weight to an injured witness's testimony because the injury supports presence, subject to rejection for major contradictions or discrepancies. It also held that relationship alone does not discredit a witness, whose evidence must be carefully assessed. The Court applied these principles to the accounts of the injured and related witnesses, which were corroborated by medical evidence. Malti Sahu v. Rahul, (2022) 10 SCC 226, permitted reliance on the dependable part of a hostile witness's evidence. Here, that use was confined to the admission that the jeep had been stopped at the barrier. Pradeep Bisoi v. State of Odisha, (2019) 11 SCC 500, explained Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act and the exception in Section 162(2) CrPC. Referring to Mukeshbhai Gopalbhai Barot, it recognised that a statement recorded under Section 161 concerning the transaction resulting in the maker's death becomes relevant after his death. On that basis, the Court admitted Ramswaroop's account of the assault. Rabindra Mahto v. State of Jharkhand, (2006) 10 SCC 432, allowed common object to be inferred from conduct, weapons and surrounding circumstances without proof of prior agreement. Naresh v. State of Haryana, (2023) 10 SCC 134, required proof that the accused shared the object and were aware of the offences likely to be committed in pursuing it. The Court applied those tests to the armed interception and group attack.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 141 and 149 governed the requirement of an unlawful assembly of five or more persons, its shared common object and constructive liability. Section 302/149 was the basis of the murder conviction. Sections 148, 323/149 and 435/149 concerned the connected convictions for rioting, hurt and mischief by fire. The trial acquittals under Sections 147 and 307/149 were not reinstated on appeal. Section 32(1) of the Indian Evidence Act made the deceased's statement about the cause or circumstances of his death admissible. Sections 161 and 162(2) CrPC governed its recording by the police and the exception to the usual restriction on its use. Section 25(a) of the Arms Act appeared in the charge-sheet background; it was not the subject of an appellate holding.

4. Issues : Whether the injured and other eyewitnesses, supported by medical evidence, proved homicidal death and the participation of the appellants whose appeals remained for decision; whether discrepancies, hostile testimony, relationship to the deceased or Virendra's acquittal undermined that proof; whether Ramswaroop's statement under Section 161 could be used after his death; whether the common object under Section 149 supported murder liability without separate proof that each appellant inflicted the fatal injury; and whether the convictions or life sentences called for interference on appeal.

5. Ratio / Findings : The autopsy disclosed ante-mortem blunt and penetrating injuries, with death caused by haemorrhagic shock. The Court found that the death was homicidal. Jaswant, Rajendra, Krishna Devi, Rampal and other witnesses described the interception, armed group assault and burning of the jeep. The injury reports supported their presence and the manner of attack. Their accounts consistently placed Amit, Babbu and Munna in the attack, and minor variations did not affect the substance of the prosecution case. The partly hostile witness's admission that the jeep had been stopped was relied on only to the extent that it was dependable. Ramswaroop's police statement concerned the assault that resulted in his death. It was therefore admissible under Section 32(1), read with the exception in Section 162(2), and corroborated the other evidence. The Court inferred the shared common object and the necessary awareness from the number of armed participants, the barrier, the joint assault and the burning of the jeep. Liability under Section 149 followed from each appellant's membership coupled with that shared object; it did not depend on separately proving that each had inflicted the fatal blow. The Court rejected the claim to parity with Virendra and the plea of false implication. It held that the prosecution had proved the case beyond reasonable doubt. Given the seriousness and manner of the attack, the life sentences could not be reduced to the period already undergone.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed both appeals and affirmed the convictions and concurrent sentences of Amit Kumar, Babbu alias Babulal and Munna. Under Section 302/149, each was sentenced to life imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The rigorous imprisonment terms under Sections 148, 323/149 and 435/149 were one year, six months and two years respectively. Bhaiyan alias Jairam's appeal had already been withdrawn, and Virendra's acquittal remained unchallenged. Amit and Munna were on bail. Their bail bonds were cancelled, and they were directed to surrender forthwith to serve the remaining terms, failing which non-bailable warrants would issue. Babbu, who was in custody, was directed to serve the balance of his sentence. The judgment and trial record were to be sent to the court concerned, and a copy of the judgment to the jail authorities, for compliance.

Headnote :- Maintenance — separate residence — cruelty and restitution - In a revision concerning interim maintenance under Section 125 CrPC, the husband produced a page of his wife's diary. It recorded alleged physical assaults and false representations about family property. The Court accepted those contents as sufficient reason for her to live separately. The husband had withdrawn his petition under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act. Citing Rina Kumari @ Rina Devi v. Dinesh Kumar Mahto @ Dinesh Kumar Mahato, SLP (Criminal) No. 5896/2024, decided 10.01.2025, the Court added that even a decree for restitution of conjugal rights would not, by itself, bar maintenance. It decided the dispute on the diary material and the absence of any subsisting restitution proceeding.

Maintenance — living in adultery — proof - In discussing the disqualification for "living in adultery", with reference to Section 125(4) CrPC and Section 144(5) BNSS, the Court held that adultery required sexual intercourse. A bare allegation of affection or a love affair, without proof of physical relations, did not disqualify the wife from interim maintenance. The Court made no finding that she was living in adultery.

Interim maintenance — income proof — overlapping remedies - Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, the Court held that an able-bodied husband's asserted meagre salary did not relieve him of his duty to maintain his wife. The Rs. 8,000 salary certificate was undated, did not state its place of issue and had not been proved. The allegation that the wife earned from a beauty parlour was unsupported. The father's purported disowning notice was contradicted by the husband's continued use of the same residential address. Those matters did not establish that the monthly interim award of Rs. 4,000 under Section 125 was excessive. The Family Court had considered the existing monthly award of Rs. 4,000 under Section 24 of the Hindu Marriage Act. Maintenance may be claimed under different statutes, but payments already received must be considered when fixing the amount. The revision was dismissed without a final evidentiary determination of the parties' incomes.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Amit Kumar Khodake challenged the order dated 20.04.2024 passed by the Principal Judge, Family Court, Chhindwara, in MJCR No. 37/2021, awarding his wife Madhuri interim maintenance of Rs. 4,000 per month under Section 125 CrPC. He invoked Sections 397 and 401 CrPC in criminal revision. She was already receiving maintenance pendente lite of Rs. 4,000 per month under Section 24 of the Hindu Marriage Act. The husband submitted that he worked as a ward boy and earned only Rs. 8,000 per month. He argued that the further award of Rs. 4,000 was excessive in view of that income and the existing award, and produced a certificate attributed to Anmol Hospital, Indore. He also produced a page of his wife's diary, alleged that she had a love affair and earned from a beauty parlour, and relied on a newspaper notice by his father purporting to dispossess him of family property. He had filed and later withdrawn a petition for restitution of conjugal rights under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act, and had filed for divorce. The diary page, however, recorded allegations that he had physically assaulted her and that false information about family land had been given before marriage. His father's notice and his own cause-title address placed them at the same residence. The High Court heard the applicant husband's counsel and decided the revision on that interim record. Evidence remained to be led in the underlying maintenance proceeding.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rajnesh v. Neha and Another, 2020:INSC:631, (2021) 2 SCC 324, was cited and applied to the maintenance obligation of an able-bodied husband. The High Court held that an asserted meagre salary did not automatically prevent an award. It did not rely on that authority to determine his actual income or to dispense with consideration of maintenance awarded under other statutes. Rina Kumari @ Rina Devi v. Dinesh Kumar Mahto @ Dinesh Kumar Mahato, SLP (Criminal) No. 5896/2024, decided 10.01.2025, was invoked for the proposition stated in this judgment that even a decree for restitution under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act would not, by itself, prevent maintenance. There was no subsisting decree or pending restitution proceeding here: the husband had withdrawn his petition. Independently, the Court found sufficient reason for the wife to live separately in the contents of the diary.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 397 and 401 CrPC governed the revision against the interim Family Court order. Section 125 CrPC governed the wife's interim maintenance, including the objection under Section 125(4) that she was living in adultery or refusing to live with her husband without sufficient reason. The Court also referred to Section 144(5) BNSS when discussing that objection. Section 24 of the Hindu Marriage Act was the basis of the existing monthly award of Rs. 4,000, whose payment had to be considered when fixing maintenance under Section 125. Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act concerned the husband's withdrawn restitution petition.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the diary and the withdrawn restitution proceeding established that the wife lacked sufficient reason to live separately and was therefore disentitled to interim maintenance. (ii) Whether the alleged love affair met the statutory disqualification for "living in adultery". (iii) Whether the further monthly award of Rs. 4,000 was excessive in view of the existing award under Section 24 of the Hindu Marriage Act, the husband's asserted income, the wife's alleged beauty-parlour earnings and the father's purported disowning notice. The parties' final incomes and the wife's alleged business activity remained to be proved in the pending proceeding.

5. Ratio / Findings : Because the husband himself relied on the diary, the Court did not require the wife to prove it formally before considering its contents. Her account of physical assaults and false pre-marriage representations about family land provided sufficient reason to live separately. The husband had withdrawn his restitution petition. Relying on Rina Kumari, the Court rejected the premise that even a decree for restitution would automatically bar maintenance; no subsisting decree fell for determination here. On the alleged love affair, the Court held that "living in adultery" required sexual intercourse. Love or affection without physical relations did not establish that disqualification, and no such physical relationship had been proved. The hospital salary certificate stated neither its date nor its place of issue and had not been proved by the issuer. The husband did not contend that he was incapable of work. Applying Rajnesh, the Court held that an able-bodied husband had to earn and discharge his maintenance obligation despite his asserted meagre pay. No document established that the wife owned or rented a shop for a beauty parlour, had other property for that purpose or actually earned from it. The claim therefore remained a bare allegation at the interim stage. The Court regarded the father's newspaper notice as a camouflage because the husband continued to give the same residential address as his father. Maintenance under different statutes could coexist, but the court fixing the amount had to consider payments received under the other statutes. The Family Court had expressly considered the existing monthly award of Rs. 4,000 under Section 24. In view of daily needs and prevailing prices, the further interim award of Rs. 4,000 per month disclosed no material illegality. These provisional findings did not establish the parties' final incomes or finally dispose of the pending Section 125 proceeding.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision. The Family Court's interim award of Rs. 4,000 per month under Section 125 CrPC remained undisturbed alongside the existing monthly award of Rs. 4,000 under Section 24 of the Hindu Marriage Act, which the Family Court had considered. The order did not fix final maintenance, award costs or issue any further direction.

Headnote :- Indian Penal Code, 1860 — Sections 307 and 34 / firearm attack / intention - The question is whether the act was accompanied by the intention or knowledge that would make the offender guilty of murder if death resulted. Serious injury is not a prerequisite, although the causing of hurt affects the applicable punishment. The shot near the upper left chest, the medically recorded entry wound and the retained projectile supported the conviction for attempted murder. The upward path of the projectile did not disprove the eyewitness account when the doctors had not been asked about possible internal deflection. Ajji's leg amputation did not exclude his participation by instigation.

Sentencing — proportionality / time served - State of H.P. v. Nirmala Devi, (2017) 7 SCC 262, Surjit Singh v. Nahara Ram, (2004) 6 SCC 513, and Adu Ram v. Mukna, (2005) 10 SCC 597, were considered for the need to balance deterrence, the gravity of the offence and mitigating circumstances. The planned firearm attack arose from old enmity and injured a person who was not involved in that dispute. It did not justify reducing the seven-year term to the shorter periods already spent in custody. The convictions and sentences were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 21 November 2016, Govind alias Tillu Balmik was outside his house in Shivpuri when Ammu alias Amar and Ajji alias Ajit allegedly challenged him for supporting Sunil Balmik. When Govind objected, Ajji allegedly instigated Ammu to kill him, and Ammu fired a shot, injuring his left upper chest or shoulder. Govind ran into the house to escape. Padam and Swaraj were said to have witnessed the incident. A Dehati Nalsi recorded at the hospital preceded FIR 1039/2016. A pistol seized from Ammu was found to be functional. A doctor recorded an entry wound in the left subclavicular region and an opaque projectile retained in the body. On 5 March 2021, the Sessions Court convicted both appellants under Sections 307/34 IPC in S.T. 34/2017 and sentenced them to seven years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000, with a default stipulation. It acquitted them under Section 294. In their appeal under Section 374, they disputed identification, relied on Ajji's earlier leg amputation and his conflict with Sunil, questioned the bullet's path and sought reduction of sentence to the periods already undergone. Ajji testified about an attack by Sunil's associates in 2013 and complaints he had made afterwards. He admitted that Govind was neither an accused in that case nor a person who had threatened him. The State relied on the injured witness, other eyewitnesses and medical evidence.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of H.P. v. Nirmala Devi, (2017) 7 SCC 262, was quoted extensively on the principled exercise of sentencing discretion, proportionality and consideration of aggravating and mitigating circumstances. It recognised the greater importance of deterrence in grave crimes. Surjit Singh v. Nahara Ram, (2004) 6 SCC 513, cautioned against undue sympathy leading to an inadequate sentence for a serious offence. Adu Ram v. Mukna, (2005) 10 SCC 597, addressed the social impact of crime and the limits of leniency based solely on the passage of time. Applying these principles to the planned shooting, the Court declined to reduce the sentence to the period already undergone.

3. Statutes considered : Section 307 IPC punishes an act done with the intention or knowledge that would make it murder if death resulted. The part of the provision dealing with hurt affects the available punishment. Section 34 concerned the common intention reflected in the alleged instigation and shooting. Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal against conviction. The appellants had been acquitted under Section 294 IPC. Sections 25/27 of the Arms Act appeared in the charge-sheet background and evidence of sanction. The appealed convictions stated in the order were under Sections 307/34; the Court did not record a new holding under the Arms Act.

4. Issues : Whether the eyewitness accounts and medical evidence proved the appellants' participation in the attack despite the objections based on old enmity, disability and the bullet's path; whether the proved act involved the intention or knowledge required by Section 307; and whether the seven-year sentence should be reduced to the periods already served.

5. Ratio / Findings : Govind's account as an injured witness described Ajji's instigation and the shot fired by Ammu. Padam and Swaraj supported the essential incident. The entry wound near the upper left chest, retained projectile and recovered functional pistol corroborated the firearm attack. Ajji's leg disability was established, but it did not make verbal instigation impossible. The Court rejected the suggestion that the injury had been staged: Govind had not taken part in the earlier attack on Ajji and had not threatened him. The Court also recognised that motive could explain either false implication or retaliation; it did not treat motive as pointing only to false implication. The doctors had not been asked whether the bullet could have changed direction inside the body. Its upward path therefore did not, by itself, disprove the eyewitness account. For Section 307, the weapon, the vital part of the body targeted and the conduct established the required murderous intention or knowledge, without a threshold requirement as to the seriousness of the injury. On sentence, the old grievance, planned shooting and harm to a victim who was not involved in that dispute made the trial court's seven-year term proportionate. The shorter periods spent in custody did not, by themselves, justify reducing it. These findings concerned this record; the trial acquittal under Section 294 remained undisturbed.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the convictions under Section 307/34, seven years' rigorous imprisonment and the fine of Rs. 1,000 with the default term. The appellants, who were already in jail, were directed to serve the remaining sentence. Copies of the judgment were to be provided to them immediately and free of cost. The trial record was to be returned immediately with a copy of the judgment for information and compliance.

Headnote :- M.P. Mineral (Prevention of Illegal Mining, Transportation and Storage) Rules, 2022 — Rules 3 and 4 / public works exception - The exception for a Gram Panchayat to transport and store minor minerals lawfully quarried from government land for public works did not authorise unlawful sand excavation or bar allegations of theft and receipt of State-owned minerals under IPC Sections 379/411. The petitioner's road document concerned a different village, and neither lawful quarrying nor purchase had been shown. The householder attributed the storage to the Panchayat Secretary. The allegation could be supported by oral evidence without a separate document proving the Secretary's act. The Court therefore refused to quash the case, while leaving guilt to be proved. Jayant v. State of M.P., (2021) 2 SCC 670, was considered for the distinction between mining-rule offences and IPC theft offences. Its holding on compounding under Section 23-A was background to the present decision, since no compounding had been established in this case.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In Crime No. 300/2022 at Badarwas, Shivpuri, the police alleged theft and receipt of stolen sand under IPC Sections 379 and 411 after sand was found stored at Narendra Yadav's house. Narendra attributed the storage to the applicant, a Panchayat Secretary. Seeking quashing under Section 482, the applicant submitted that the sand was intended for a concrete road and that Rules 3 and 4 of the M.P. Mineral (Prevention of Illegal Mining, Transportation and Storage) Rules, 2022 exempted the Panchayat. He objected that the case rested on a single oral statement without supporting documents. A measurement book produced by him showed a sanctioned road from Aadiwasi Basti to Ghurwar. Counsel conceded that Ghurwar and Rijaudi were separate villages. Narendra lived in Rijaudi. The Court examined the case diary, the claimed connection with the road and the scope of the exemption at the quashing stage.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jayant v. State of M.P., (2021) 2 SCC 670, was quoted for the distinction between offences under the MMDR Act and its rules and separate theft offences under the IPC. Compounding under Section 23-A bars further proceedings for the mining offence compounded; it does not automatically bar proceedings for a distinct IPC offence. The High Court adopted the distinction between the offences and the concern about unlawful sand extraction, but did not decide a compounding defence on the present facts. The judgment then listed XYZ v. State of Gujarat, State of T.N. v. S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav for the collective principle that the allegations must be considered at face value under Section 482, without conducting a trial of disputed facts. The Court applied that standard to the householder's statement and the disputed road documents.

3. Statutes considered : Rules 3 and 4 of the 2022 M.P. Mineral Rules were invoked. The Court read Rule 4 as a limited exception for transporting and storing minor minerals lawfully quarried from government land for public works. IPC Sections 379 and 411 were the registered allegations of theft and receipt of stolen property. Section 482 CrPC governed the quashing application, and Section 161 CrPC concerned Narendra's statement to the police. Section 23-A of the MMDR Act was discussed in the quoted Jayant decision on compounding; it did not determine the present case.

4. Issues : Whether the public-works storage exception entitled the Panchayat Secretary to quashing of the alleged sand-theft case when lawful extraction and the claimed connection with the road had not been shown; and whether the householder's oral statement could be considered at the quashing stage without documentary proof that the Secretary had stored the sand.

5. Ratio / Findings : The State owns the minerals. The limited exception for lawful Panchayat transport and storage did not permit unlawful excavation or theft. The applicant's road document referred to Ghurwar, whereas Narendra's house was in Rijaudi. It therefore did not establish that the storage at that house related to the claimed public work. Neither lawful quarrying nor purchase had been shown. Narendra's statement under Section 161 attributed the storage to the applicant. That account could not be disregarded merely because the police had not collected a document proving the same act: the case could be proved by oral evidence. In linking the applicant to the storage, the Court also considered his position as Panchayat Secretary and his own claim that the sand had been stored for Panchayat work. The allegations nevertheless remained for the prosecution to prove; filing a charge-sheet did not establish guilt. On the record before it, the Court found no basis to terminate the case under Section 482.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the quashing application. Crime No. 300/2022 remained in place, and the prosecution was required to prove the alleged offence in the ordinary proceeding.

Amol Singh Yadav v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 2555/2023, 13/05/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Evidence Act, 1872 — Sections 8 and 27 / circumstantial evidence / IPC Section 302 — In affirming the husband's conviction for murdering his wife with a firearm, the Division Bench considered the evidence that she had last been travelling with him, his conduct after her death, recovery of a country-made gun following his disclosure and the FSL match between the cartridge and that gun. It treated his absence from the inquest, postmortem, receipt of the body and cremation as relevant conduct under Section 8. The fatal gunshot to the chest established homicidal death within the Section 300 framework. The decision assessed the cumulative circumstances on this record; it did not lay down that last-seen evidence or conduct alone invariably suffices. The convictions under Section 302 and Sections 25/27 of the Arms Act, and the concurrent sentences, were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 2 June 2009, the appellant and his wife Urmila were travelling with their two daughters in a Maruti van. The initial account was that assailants had stopped the vehicle, attempted to rob her ornaments and shot her. The investigation instead accused her husband. The Sessions Court convicted him under IPC Section 302 and Sections 25 and 27 of the Arms Act, imposing life imprisonment and three-year terms with fines, to run concurrently. He appealed under Section 374 CrPC. The postmortem recorded a chest entry wound with tattooing, an exit wound, a fractured fourth rib and internal damage. The doctor attributed death to haemorrhagic shock from a homicidal firearm injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The police attributed recovery of a 315-bore katta to the appellant's memorandum under Section 27. The firearm examiner found it functional, and the FSL witness proved the report linking the cartridge to that gun.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, explained the distinction under Section 300 Thirdly. The required intention concerns the particular bodily injury proved; whether that injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death is an objective medical question. The judgment also reproduced the classification under Sections 299/300 from Arun Nivalaji More. It discussed Anda, Mahesh Balmiki, Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak, Pulicherla Nagaraju, Sangapagu Anjaiah, State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao on the significance of the weapon, the vital part targeted, a single injury and Exception 4. Those passages provided the framework for classifying the homicide. The Court's operative application chiefly concerned the medical proof and the circumstances identifying the appellant as the offender.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 299 and 300 provided the framework for distinguishing murder from culpable homicide, and Section 302 was the offence affirmed on appeal. The convictions under Sections 25 and 27 of the Arms Act were also affirmed. Section 8 of the Evidence Act concerned the appellant's conduct after the death, and Section 27 concerned the firearm recovered following his disclosure. Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal, and the appellant's denial under Section 313 was recorded. The Court applied Section 8 to his conduct and Section 27 to the disclosure-led recovery.

4. Issues : Whether Urmila's death was homicidal and amounted to murder; whether the husband, rather than the alleged robbers, had inflicted the injury; and whether the evidence sustained the trial convictions and concurrent sentences despite the challenge to the recovery and the non-examination of the daughters.

5. Ratio / Findings : The doctor's evidence established a fatal gunshot to the chest. The Court found that Urmila had been with the appellant immediately before the shooting and that he had failed to explain the circumstances. It treated his absence from the inquest, the hospital when the body was brought for postmortem, the later receipt of the body and the cremation as conduct relevant under Section 8. The recovery following his disclosure and the FSL linkage were further links in the circumstantial chain. The appellant contended that unidentified attackers had fired, that the daughters had not been examined and that independent witnesses did not support the seizure. The judgment recounted evidence of good marital relations and the robbery accounts, PW8's denial that the katta was seized in his presence, other testimony adverse to the seizures and PW12's account placing the appellant at the hospital. The Court nevertheless found the cumulative circumstances sufficient to hold him guilty. It invoked "res ipsa loquitur" and held that the connecting circumstantial evidence was sufficient.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the trial judgment. It upheld life imprisonment under Section 302, the three-year Arms Act terms, a fine of Rs. 5,000 under Section 302 and a fine of Rs. 500 under each Arms Act conviction, with all sentences running concurrently. The appellant, stated to be in jail, was to remain there to serve the balance of his sentence. A copy of the judgment was to be sent to the jail authorities, and a copy with the record to the trial court, for information and compliance.

Case Sr. no. (37) Prev Next

Headnote :- CrPC Sections 319, 340 and 482 / criminal trial / unwarranted prosecution directions — The Sessions Judge's earlier order summoning municipal officials under Section 319 had been reversed. In the later judgment acquitting the accused in the shooting trial, the Judge could not direct registration of an FIR and departmental action against those officials on the collateral premise that their demolition drive had caused the shooting. The validity of the demolition order was not an issue tried. Nor had the Judge directed a complaint under Section 340 for false evidence affecting the administration of justice. The High Court set aside the challenged prosecution and departmental directions against persons who were not accused in the trial. It applied the principles governing adverse remarks and the judicial discipline required by the earlier High Court reversal. The pending State appeal against acquittal was left untouched.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A municipal team arrived to demolish a reportedly dilapidated house in Rewa under an official order. During resistance to the drive, Rajbhan allegedly fired shots that injured Neeraj and fatally wounded Rajlallan. In Sessions Trial 382/2014, the Judge invoked Section 319 CrPC to summon municipal officers, including applicant Anand Singh Parihar, as additional accused on a theory of illegal demolition, conspiracy and abetment. The High Court quashed that order in criminal revision on 15 December 2017. The Sessions Judge later acquitted the persons facing trial. In the judgment dated 21 February 2018, however, the Judge directed the Inspector General to register offences against the applicant and others and ordered departmental action. The Judge reasoned that the demolition had provoked the shooting and had been undertaken to confer an improper benefit. The applicant challenged those directions under Section 482.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pritish v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 1 SCC 253, was quoted on Section 340. A court may form the opinion that an inquiry into an offence affecting the administration of justice is expedient and make a written complaint. A preliminary inquiry is discretionary, and the person proceeded against has procedural safeguards before the Magistrate. The High Court distinguished that mechanism: the Sessions Judge had not directed a complaint for false evidence under IPC Sections 193 –196, but registration of an FIR for collateral alleged offences. Niranjan Patnaik v. Shashibhusan Kar, State of U.P. v. Mohammad Naim, and Om Prakash Chautala v. Kanwar Bhan were considered on restraint in adverse judicial remarks, opportunity to respond, an evidentiary foundation and necessity for the decision. The coordinate Bench's earlier reversal of the Section 319 order was decisive context. The High Court did not reconsider the merits of the acquittal, against which the State had been granted leave to appeal.

3. Statutes considered : Section 319 CrPC was the basis of the earlier order summoning additional accused, which had already been quashed. Section 340 CrPC was discussed and distinguished from the impugned direction. Section 482 governed the High Court's corrective jurisdiction. IPC Section 99, limiting private defence against acts of public servants done in good faith, was reproduced in response to the trial court's reliance on private defence. The High Court found no material establishing absence of good faith while the demolition order remained unchallenged in separate proceedings. The offences proposed in the judgment included IPC Sections 452, 429, 325, 119, 120-B and 109. The High Court did not adjudicate guilt under those provisions.

4. Issues : Whether, in a judgment of acquittal, the court could go beyond the charges and matters tried, find misconduct in a municipal demolition and direct prosecution and departmental proceedings against persons whose summoning under Section 319 had already been quashed by the High Court; whether Section 340 justified those directions; and whether the adverse remarks were necessary and procedurally fair.

5. Ratio / Findings : The validity of the demolition proceedings was not an issue in the shooting trial. Although the earlier Section 319 order had been reversed, the trial court's later judgment effectively renewed the accusations against the applicant. Section 340 did not justify an FIR for the alleged demolition offences when the court had not directed a complaint for false evidence affecting the proceeding before it. The municipal officials were acting under colour of their official duties and an operative demolition order. The High Court found no basis in this trial to treat that order as mala fide or to conclude that Rajlallan had conspired to create circumstances leading to his own death. Adverse remarks against affected persons had to be supported by the evidence, necessary for the decision and made after an appropriate opportunity to respond. Taken together, those defects rendered the directions unwarranted and beyond the trial court's jurisdiction. The High Court expressly refrained from expressing a view on the acquittal because the State's appeal was pending.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application and set aside all the challenged directions against the applicant and the other affected persons, including the directions for criminal prosecution and departmental proceedings. The merits of the acquittal remained for the pending State appeal.

Headnote :- POCSO / IPC Sections 376(2)(i), 120-B / proof of child age and charge prejudice — The proved school admission register recorded the prosecutrix's date of birth as 16 August 2001. She was therefore under sixteen on 8 January 2015. The Court applied Jarnail Singh's documentary sequence for determining a child victim's age and did not rely on the unproved ossification report. Her account, the medical opinion and the surrounding circumstances supported the findings of rape and coordinated confinement despite the delayed FIR, her friend's hostile testimony and the negative sperm slide. Although the charge did not identify the particular clause of Section 376(2), the accused knew that the allegation concerned a girl under sixteen. The Court found no prejudice from that omission. The convictions and ten-year sentences were affirmed; no separate sentence had been imposed under Section 4 of the POCSO Act.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Anandi and Rajesh challenged their convictions in connected Criminal Appeals 1198/2015 and 73/2016. The prosecutrix alleged that, on 8 January 2015, Rajesh dragged her into his house and left her in a room where Anandi tied and raped her. She also alleged that Anandi threatened her. Fear delayed her report until 25 January. The trial court imposed ten years' imprisonment for the offence under Section 376(2), read with Section 120-B in Rajesh's case, and lesser terms for confinement and threats. The defence asserted that she was an adult and had consented, and that the appellants had been falsely implicated. The school admission register, Ex P4, proved through Mohanlal Ghavari, recorded her birth as 16 August 2001. He acknowledged that parents may sometimes give ages approximately. The prosecution did not prove the ossification report.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, was applied to determine a child victim's age through the sequence of documents in Rule 12(3) of the 2007 Juvenile Justice Rules. Where the preferred documents are available, the record of the school first attended takes priority over medical opinion. State of Chhattisgarh v. Lekhram addressed the evidentiary value of a school register under Section 35 of the Evidence Act and its possible corroboration. Murugan v. State of T.N. considered birth and school records made before litigation and the sources of their entries. Mukarrab v. State of U.P. cautioned against treating ossification estimates mechanically as exact. Sunil v. State of M.P., (2017) 4 SCC 393, explained that absent or negative DNA testing does not automatically defeat the prosecution. State of Haryana v. Sanjay Kumar, (2017) 2 SCC 51, concerned properly explained delay in reporting. The High Court applied the priority of the school record and assessed the remaining evidence, rather than treating the laboratory result or delay as decisive.

3. Statutes considered : Age was determined by reference to Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Rules, 2007, applied to a victim through Jarnail Singh. Section 35 of the Evidence Act concerned the school record. IPC Sections 342, 506, 376(2)(i) and 120-B were the offences affirmed. Section 4 of the POCSO Act was also held applicable to Anandi, but no separate sentence was imposed under it. Section 53-A CrPC arose in the quoted Sunil decision on DNA evidence. The Court examined whether the generic description of the charge under Section 376(2) had caused prejudice.

4. Issues : Whether the prosecutrix was under sixteen; whether her evidence proved intercourse, the appellants' participation and conspiracy despite the delayed report, her friend's failure to support the prosecution and the absence of sperm on the slide; and whether omission of the particular subsection from the trial charge prejudiced either appellant.

5. Ratio / Findings : The proved school admission register established that the prosecutrix was below sixteen on the date of the incident. The unproved ossification report could not support the prosecution and, as the Court recorded, did not favour the defence either. The Court therefore excluded it instead of using it in place of the school record. It accepted the prosecutrix's account, the medical opinion that intercourse had occurred and her subsequent disclosure. Pooja turned hostile but acknowledged that the usual route passed Rajesh's house. The Court considered the absence of sperm in light of the interval of about seventeen days before the report. Applying Sunil, it held that the absence of that material did not require acquittal. Coordination was established because Rajesh forcibly took the victim into the room, where Anandi was waiting, and locked her in. The Court acknowledged that the trial charge should have specified Section 376(2)(i). The allegation that the victim was under sixteen had nevertheless given the appellants notice of the case against them, and no prejudice was shown. Having found her age, the Court did not treat consent as a defence. It retained the ten-year term because that was the statutory minimum for the rape offence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed both criminal appeals and affirmed the trial convictions and sentences. Both appellants' rigorous imprisonment terms were six months under Section 342 and three years under Section 506. The ten-year terms of rigorous imprisonment imposed on Anandi under Section 376(2)(i) and on Rajesh under that provision read with Section 120-B were affirmed. Each also remained liable to a fine of Rs. 2,000, with two months' simple imprisonment in default. No separate sentence under Section 4 of the POCSO Act had been imposed on Anandi. Both appellants were in jail and were directed to serve the remaining sentence.

Anandi and Ors. v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 1198/2015 & 73/2016, 09/08/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- IPC Section 498-A / Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3–4 / CrPC Section 482 — The wife alleged further dowry demands and exclusion from her matrimonial home. At the FIR stage, the disputes about residence in the village where the report was registered, the differing dowry figures, ownership of the car, delay in reporting and the husband's earlier divorce petition required evidence; they did not justify quashing. The Court held that continued exclusion on account of dowry could amount to mental cruelty and noted the applicants' own messages restricting her return. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, it held that efforts at reconciliation and the filing of divorce proceedings did not, by themselves, make the report a counterblast. Even if a territorial defect were proved, it could require transfer of the investigation without invalidating the FIR. The Court did not determine guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The wife alleged that, after her marriage in June 2020, her husband and father-in-law demanded a further Rs 15 lakh and harassed her. She returned to her parents' home and had remained there for over two and a half years. The applicants sought quashing of Crime 158/2024, registered at Bhonti under IPC Section 498-A and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3–4. They contended that the May 2024 FIR was a response to the husband's divorce proceedings. They disputed the alleged stay in village Khod, pointed to different cash-dowry amounts in the mediation proceedings and the FIR, challenged ownership of the vehicle, and relied on the absence of an earlier complaint. The wife maintained that she had been kept out of the matrimonial home. WhatsApp messages produced by the applicants themselves restricted her return without their permission and warned of consequences if she returned.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court applied Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, for the independence of civil divorce proceedings and criminal proceedings, and for the principle that delay during attempts at reconciliation does not automatically justify quashing under Section 482. It also listed XYZ v. State of Gujarat, State of T.N. v. S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das, Mohd. Akram Siddiqui, Gourishetty Mahesh, M. Srikanth, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, Kunwar Singh, Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo, Sangeeta Agrawal, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha for the established standard: the allegations must be taken at face value, and disputed evidence cannot be tried in proceedings for quashing.

3. Statutes considered : The reported offences were under IPC Section 498-A and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Section 482 CrPC governed the application for quashing. The divorce proceedings formed part of the background; they did not determine the criminal allegations. The Court considered territorial jurisdiction over the investigation in response to the dispute about residence, but did not order a transfer.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR disclosed matrimonial cruelty and a dowry demand despite the separation, delay and prior divorce proceedings; whether the factual inconsistencies and disputed place of residence justified quashing at the outset; and what effect a defect in territorial jurisdiction would have.

5. Ratio / Findings : Taking the allegations at face value, the Court held that refusing to readmit the wife on account of dowry could amount to continuing mental cruelty even after the parties had stopped living together. The applicants had not claimed to have tried to bring her back, and their own messages required permission before she could return. The Court recognised that delay in reporting could reflect attempts to preserve the marriage. Applying Pratibha, it held that a report made after divorce proceedings had begun was not necessarily retaliatory. The differing dowry amounts, title to the vehicle and disputed residence in Khod required evidence and could not be decided under Section 482. Even if the alleged stay in Khod were ultimately found to be false, the Court said that the investigation might have to be transferred to the police station with territorial jurisdiction; the FIR would not be quashed on that ground. These observations concerned the prima facie case and left the truth of the allegations, the territorial facts and guilt to be determined.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application for quashing. The FIR and investigation continued. It made no final finding of guilt and did not direct transfer of the investigation.

Anant Devraj Singh Chauhan and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 30825/2024, 04/02/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- CrPC Section 482 / IPC Sections 498-A, 377, 34 / Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3–4 — The Court examined the allegations against each relative separately. The complainant made specific allegations against her husband and parents-in-law about dowry demands and conduct within the marriage; their truth was left for trial. The sister-in-law, however, was merely included in the allegation that the family members scolded the complainant, without any distinct role being attributed to her. Applying Taramani Parakh alongside Kans Raj, Monju Roy, Chandralekha, Geeta Mehrotra and Preeti Gupta, the Court quashed the FIR and prosecution only against the sister-in-law. It did not find that the allegations against the remaining applicants were true.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married applicant 4 in February 2021. She alleged that the marriage had initially been described as dowry-free, but was followed by insults about the expense of the ceremonies, mental harassment and demands for a four-wheeler, a flat and Rs 10 lakh. She also attributed particular acts to her husband, including alleged unnatural sexual intercourse, and identified her parents-in-law in allegations of dowry taunts and other conduct. The husband, father-in-law, mother-in-law and sister-in-law jointly sought quashing of the FIR under IPC Sections 498-A, 377, 34 and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3–4. They contended that the relatives had been implicated through vague and general allegations.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court quoted Meera v. State through Inspector of Police, (2022) 3 SCC 93, on cruelty by a mother-in-law towards a daughter-in-law, while examining the allegations in this FIR. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, supported leaving a case involving triable matrimonial allegations for evidence, while requiring care over general allegations against relatives. Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, Monju Roy v. State of W.B. and Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan addressed indiscriminate implication of relatives without specific material, including cases involving delay or separate residence. The Court applied Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P. and Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand to the general allegation against the sister-in-law. It considered the authorities in relation to each applicant rather than quashing the proceedings against the entire family.

3. Statutes considered : The FIR invoked IPC Sections 498-A, 377 and 34 and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3–4. CrPC Section 482 governed the inherent power to quash. The Court examined whether the allegations against each applicant justified continuing the prosecution; it did not decide on evidence whether the elements of Section 377 had been proved.

4. Issues : Whether the allegations against each of the four applicants were sufficiently specific to justify prosecution when taken at face value; and whether merely including the sister-in-law in a general allegation of scolding justified prosecuting her when more specific allegations had been made against the others.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court found specific allegations against the husband and parents-in-law concerning dowry demands and the conduct attributed to the husband. It declined to examine whether those allegations were true in proceedings under Section 482. The position of applicant 2, the sister-in-law, was different. Apart from including her in the collective allegation that family members scolded the wife, the FIR attributed no clear act to her. The Court held that those general allegations did not justify continuing her prosecution under the principles governing allegations against relatives. It referred to the observation in Meera that a mother-in-law should protect her daughter-in-law, but did not thereby determine guilt. The decision concerned the sufficiency of the allegations against each applicant at the outset of the proceedings.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court quashed the FIR and criminal proceedings only against applicant 2, the sister-in-law. It dismissed the application as regards applicant 1, the father-in-law; applicant 3, the mother-in-law; and applicant 4, the husband. Their prosecution was to continue.

Headnote :- Article 226 / Constitution Article 22(1) / BNSS Section 47 — A judicial remand narrowed the scope for examining the merits of that order, but did not bar a writ for liberty challenging non-compliance with mandatory safeguards at the initial arrest. The police had held the petitioner for hours before formally arresting him, yet never supplied written grounds of arrest. The station diary did not adequately state the particular ground, and neither oral intimation nor his statement before the JMFC waived the safeguard. Applying Vihaan Kumar and Mihir Rajesh Shah, the Division Bench held the arrest illegal and directed release subject to a bond, surety, execution of an existing peace bond and an undertaking to maintain public order. It treated the unargued prayer to quash the FIR as given up and left the investigation and trial unaffected.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In W.P. 2/2026, the petitioner, who had been arrested in Crime 1/2026 at the Gwalior Crime Branch, challenged his police custody, subsequent formal arrest and remand. The complaints concerned alleged public acts involving an image of Dr B.R. Ambedkar. His prayer to quash the FIR was not argued and was treated as given up. He contended that the police had intercepted him before the FIR was registered and had not communicated the grounds of arrest. State records and the officers' accounts showed that he was with the police after about 18:00 and at a police station before registration of the FIR at 19:56; he was formally arrested at 23:40. A JMFC had remanded him and refused bail. A separate PIL concerning installation of an Ambedkar statue in the High Court precincts was pending, with an interim direction to maintain law and order. An Executive Magistrate had also directed the petitioner to execute a peace bond, which remained unexecuted.

2. Precedents — Considered : V. Senthil Balaji v. State and Gautam Navlakha v. NIA restricted habeas corpus challenges to a reasoned judicial remand, while preserving scrutiny of non-compliance with mandatory provisions, lack of jurisdiction and orders passed in an absolutely mechanical manner. Kanu Sanyal, Sanjay Dutt and SFIO v. Rahul Modi were considered on the legality of detention at the date of return. Vihaan Kumar v. State of Haryana, (2025) 5 SCC 799, supplied the mandatory rule under Article 22(1), the State's burden to prove communication of the grounds of arrest, the consequence of release for a breach, and the distinction between an illegal arrest and the continuing validity of the investigation and trial. Mihir Rajesh Shah v. State of Maharashtra required written grounds in a language understood by the arrested person. Exceptional oral communication had to be followed by written grounds within a reasonable time and, in any event, at least two hours before production for remand. Perumal Raja was quoted on custody being wider than formal arrest in the different context of the Evidence Act; the Bench did not hold that custody before an FIR was invariably unlawful. Arnab Manoranjan Goswami v. State of Maharashtra guided the cautious exercise of Article 226 powers for bail-related liberty relief and the factors to be considered.

3. Statutes considered : Articles 21, 22(1) and 226 of the Constitution governed personal liberty and the writ proceedings. BNSS Section 47 concerned communication of the grounds of arrest; Sections 35, 48 and 480 were discussed in relation to arrest and remand. BNSS Sections 126, 135 and 141 concerned the existing preventive-bond proceedings, and Section 163 concerned the public-order direction. The FIR invoked BNS Sections 223(b), 196(1)(a)–(b), 353(1)(c), 353(2) and SC/ST Act Sections 3(1)(u)–(v). The Court did not determine the ingredients of those offences.

4. Issues : Whether the prior remand barred any challenge to the petitioner's liberty under Article 226; whether police custody before registration of the FIR or formal arrest, and the failure to supply written grounds, made the arrest illegal; and what relief could be granted without quashing the unargued FIR or deciding the pending investigation.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench declined to review the merits of the JMFC's remand order or refusal of bail in this writ, but held that compliance with mandatory safeguards at the initial arrest could still be examined. The separate PIL neither required the petitioner to approach another forum nor disposed of his claim to personal liberty. The Bench distinguished custody from formal arrest and rejected the contention that custody before registration of an FIR was prohibited in every case. It nevertheless said that a person could not be kept in custody for an unreasonable period without an FIR, while declining further consideration of that issue on these facts. The police had controlled the petitioner's movements for hours and showed no urgency preventing written communication of the grounds of arrest. They supplied no written grounds at all and therefore failed to supply them at least two hours before production for remand. The general station-diary entry about social discord did not communicate the particular alleged offence. Neither the asserted oral intimation nor the petitioner's statement at remand cured the omission or waived the safeguard. The arrest was therefore illegal. Although the Bench would not examine the remand order on its merits, it described that order as mechanical and passed without due application of mind in light of Vihaan Kumar and Mihir Rajesh Shah. It separately noted that information of the arrest had been given to a guard rather than a family member, but did not base its decisive holding on that concern. The illegal arrest did not invalidate the FIR, investigation, charge-sheet or trial. The Bench's observations about the alleged incident were not findings on its merits.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court granted relief for the petitioner's liberty. It directed his release on a personal bond of Rs 1 lakh with one surety for the same amount, to the satisfaction of the CJM. Before release, he had to execute the existing bond directed by the Executive Magistrate and submit an undertaking to the CJM that he would not act in a manner prejudicial or detrimental to law and order. The Senior Superintendent of Police, Gwalior, was directed to make immediate arrangements enabling him to execute both while in custody. The other conditions of bail also applied. The challenge to the merits of the remand order was rejected in this forum, the prayer to quash the FIR was treated as given up, and the investigation and trial remained open. The sealed pen drives were to be returned unopened to the Additional Advocate General, Shri Vivek Khedkar, in their original sealed condition with the original seal impressions. The case diary was also to be returned to him, with an acknowledgement obtained for both the drives and the diary. No order as to costs was made.

Anil Kumar Mishra v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 2/2026, 07/01/2026, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Ashish Shroti, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Maintenance — wife — sufficient reason to live apart - Cruelty that justifies a wife living separately under Section 125(4) CrPC is not confined to dowry-related harassment; established mental or physical cruelty may provide sufficient reason. The Court held that the concurrent rejection of her claim was perverse because the courts below had not properly considered the evidence of renewed harassment and interference by the husband's sisters after reconciliation. Her unsuccessful attempt to compound the non-compoundable Section 498-A IPC case, followed by testimony that did not incriminate him and led to his acquittal, showed an effort to save the marriage. It did not conclusively establish that she lacked sufficient reason to live apart. On this record, the Court recognised her entitlement under Section 125.

Maintenance — wife — quantum and effective date - Applying Shamima Farooqui v. Shahid Khan, (2015) 5 SCC 705, including its discussion of Jasbir Kaur Sehgal v. District Judge, Dehradun, (1997) 7 SCC 7, and Chaturbhuj v. Sita Bai, (2008) 2 SCC 316, the Court treated Section 125 as a remedy serving social justice. It considered reasonable needs, status and the obligation of a husband capable of earning, without assuming unproved income from coaching. Both parties had modest means. The wife was awarded Rs. 2,000 monthly from the Magistrate's order dated 26.06.2013, although the application had been filed on 23.12.2011.

Maintenance — minor child — independent award - The child's existing Section 125 award of Rs. 1,500 monthly was considered separately from the mother's eligibility and found appropriate to the parties' financial and social status. Recognition of the wife's entitlement did not, by itself, require a change in the child's amount or the date from which it was payable.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Anju Mishra and the parties' child sought maintenance from Arun Mishra under Section 125 CrPC. Anju stated that they married on 21.11.2007. She alleged demands for a motorcycle, furniture and cash, and abuse and beatings by her husband, with interference from his mother and sisters. Her account included an FIR leading to Crime No. 302/2010 under Section 498-A IPC. She said that he apologised and promised to change, and that she attempted a compromise to preserve the marriage. Her application to compound the offence was rejected because Section 498-A was then non-compoundable. She did not give incriminating testimony, and he was acquitted. According to her, harassment later resumed, his sister filed a complaint against her and her brother, and she was turned out of the matrimonial home. No maintenance was paid in response to her notice dated 17.11.2011. She filed the Section 125 application on 23.12.2011, seeking Rs. 5,000 monthly for herself and Rs. 2,000 for the child. She claimed that he earned as a contract teacher and tutor, while she had no independent means. He denied cruelty, described the application as a counterblast to his sister's complaint, alleged that Anju had chosen to live with her better-off parents, and offered to keep both applicants with him. Anju, her father, a neighbour and her brother gave evidence; the husband examined only himself. On 26.06.2013, the JMFC, Nagda, in M.Cr.C. No. 16/2012 awarded the child Rs. 1,500 monthly but rejected the wife's claim because she was living separately without sufficient reason. The Additional Sessions Judge dismissed Criminal Revision No. 217/2013 on 20.02.2015. The wife and child challenged those orders under Section 482 CrPC. The husband relied on the concurrent factual findings and argued that no perversity justified interference.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court quoted and applied Shamima Farooqui v. Shahid Khan, (2015) 5 SCC 705, on the social purpose of Section 125, a fair maintenance amount and the obligation of a husband capable of earning despite asserted financial constraints. The discussion of Jasbir Kaur Sehgal v. District Judge, Dehradun, (1997) 7 SCC 7, reproduced in that judgment required consideration of status, needs, reasonable expenses, lawful obligations and involuntary deductions, while avoiding an excessive or extortionate award. The High Court used that framework to fix a modest amount on the evidence. The passage from Chaturbhuj v. Sita Bai, (2008) 2 SCC 316, described Section 125 as a speedy measure of social justice against vagrancy and destitution, within Article 15(3) and Article 39. Chaturbhuj in turn referred to Capt. Ramesh Chander Kaushal v. Veena Kaushal, (1978) 4 SCC 70, and Savitaben Somabhai Bhatiya v. State of Gujarat, (2005) 3 SCC 636, in that account. Shamima also reproduced a Delhi High Court passage from Chander Parkash Bodh Raj v. Shila Rani Chander Prakash on an able-bodied husband's capacity to earn and the significance of failing to disclose his income. The High Court did not independently decide a constitutional question or find that the husband had undisclosed tutoring income; it adopted Shamima's maintenance framework to fix the wife's award. It also held that cruelty justifying separate residence need not be connected with dowry.

3. Statutes considered : Section 125(1) CrPC permits maintenance for a wife unable to maintain herself and an eligible minor child where a person of sufficient means neglects or refuses to maintain them. Section 125(4) excludes a wife who lives in adultery, refuses without sufficient reason to live with her husband, or lives separately by mutual consent. The Court reproduced Section 125, including the provision allowing payment from the order date or, if directed, the application date; here it chose the Magistrate's order date for the wife's allowance. In construing sufficient reason under Section 125(4), it considered the husband's behaviour: mental or physical cruelty may justify separate residence even without a connection to dowry. Section 482 CrPC provided the route for correcting the perverse concurrent finding. Section 320 CrPC arose from the unsuccessful attempt to compound the earlier Section 498-A IPC case. The resulting acquittal formed part of the evidence of the wife's attempt at reconciliation; it did not decide her Section 125 eligibility. The constitutional references were reproduced from Chaturbhuj through Shamima.

4. Issues : (i) Whether mental or physical harassment unconnected with dowry, considered with the full evidence and reconciliation history, gave Anju sufficient reason to live apart under Section 125(4), making the contrary concurrent finding perverse and open to correction under Section 482. (ii) If she was entitled to maintenance, what amount and effective date were justified by her inability to maintain herself and the husband's proved means, rather than alleged tutoring income. (iii) Whether the child's existing Rs. 1,500 monthly award required alteration when the wife's entitlement was reconsidered. The Court did not retry the Section 498-A charge.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected the husband's submission that the wife could claim maintenance only if the cruelty concerned dowry. Section 125(4) requires sufficient reason for refusing to live with the husband, and sustained mental or physical harassment may provide that reason. It considered the evidence of his conduct and excessive interference by his sisters. He had admitted that a sister whose matrimonial home was in Bihar lived nearby and that his sister had filed a complaint against Anju and her brother. The Court also considered the attempted reconciliation. The compounding application had failed because the offence was non-compoundable. Her decision not to give incriminating testimony led to his acquittal, but also showed her effort to save the marriage; the Court did not treat that acquittal as a finding against her. The courts below had not considered this evidence in its proper perspective, and their finding that she lacked sufficient reason to live separately was perverse. The wife was unable to maintain herself, and the husband had neglected her support. In fixing the amount, the Court applied Shamima Farooqui's social-justice and earning-capacity principles, with the needs, status and proportionality factors discussed there through Jasbir Kaur Sehgal and Chaturbhuj. The husband was a contract teacher, but the alleged income from tutoring was unproved. Both parties were financially weak. The wife was therefore awarded Rs. 2,000 monthly from the JMFC's order dated 26.06.2013, rather than the application date of 23.12.2011. The child's Rs. 1,500 award was assessed separately and found justified by the parties' financial and social status. These findings on evidence and amount concerned the maintenance proceeding; they neither reversed the husband's Section 498-A acquittal nor established tutoring earnings.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Section 482 application. It set aside the JMFC's order dated 26.06.2013 and the revisional court's order dated 20.02.2015 insofar as they denied the wife's claim, and awarded her Rs. 2,000 monthly from 26.06.2013. The child's existing Rs. 1,500 monthly award remained undisturbed. No further amount, costs or directions were imposed.

Anju Mishra and Others v. Arun Mishra, M.Cr.C. no. 2570/2015, 31/07/2018, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Domestic Violence Act — shared household — permanency and exclusion - Applying Satish Chander Ahuja v. Sneha Ahuja, (2021) 1 SCC 414, the Court considered Section 2(s) by examining the nature of residence in a domestic relationship and the intended degree of permanency, rather than property title. Fleeting stays do not suffice. The Supreme Court had rejected the restrictive interpretation in S.R. Batra v. Taruna Batra, (2007) 3 SCC 169. The wife pleaded that she had initially lived in the matrimonial house for about two and a half months, was later excluded, and had to work elsewhere to support herself while her husband lived abroad and no maintenance was paid. Her employment out of necessity and later visits did not show that she had voluntarily abandoned residence or justify quashing her Section 12 application. The Court did not finally determine her entitlement to a residence order under Section 19.

Domestic Violence Act — Section 12 — multiple reliefs - An objection confined to entitlement to a residence order under Section 19 cannot defeat an application under Section 12 that also seeks protection under Section 18, monetary relief under Section 20, compensation under Section 22 and interim relief under Section 23. The Court refused to quash the proceeding under Section 482 CrPC, without deciding the merits or amounts of those separate claims.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ankit Jain and other family members sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of the wife's pending application under Section 12 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act in MJCR No. 593/2020 before the JMFC, Gwalior. The wife stated that she married Ankit on 28.11.2017. She alleged that the applicants received cash, jewellery and other goods as her stridhan, refused to return them, and repeatedly demanded money. She described pressure to obtain money for a foreign honeymoon, insistence that she consume alcohol and non-vegetarian food against her wishes, a further demand of Rs. 40 lakh, abuse, physical violence and exclusion from the Moradabad matrimonial house unless that sum was paid. She said that Ankit lived abroad, that she worked in Rudrapur to support herself, and that the family repeatedly prevented her from entering the matrimonial house when she visited. Her account included a confrontation at a hotel on 15.04.2018, later emails about ending the relationship, and a written complaint to the Women and Child Welfare Officer on 24.10.2019. She sought protection under Section 18, residence under Section 19, monetary relief under Section 20 for medical expenses, stridhan, harassment, food and rent, compensation under Section 22, and interim or other relief under Section 23. These were claims for adjudication, not awards already made. The applicants challenged the existence of a shared household. They argued that her employment elsewhere and occasional visits to the matrimonial house lacked the necessary permanency. They relied on her affidavit under Section 23(2), which described her stay there from 29.11.2017 to February 2018, about two and a half months. The Court heard the applicants on that preliminary legal objection without trying the domestic-violence allegations.

2. Precedents — Considered : Satish Chander Ahuja v. Sneha Ahuja, (2021) 1 SCC 414, was quoted at length and followed. The Supreme Court held that the definition in Section 2(s), using means and includes, was exhaustive. An aggrieved person must live or have lived in the household in a domestic relationship, but ownership, tenancy or title in her name or the husband's name is not indispensable. A qualifying joint-family household may fall within the definition even without her proprietary interest. Residence must have some permanency; merely fleeting or casual stays at different places do not suffice. The parties' intention and the nature of their living arrangements must be considered, and Sections 17 and 19 protect residence without requiring ownership. Satish Chander Ahuja expressly disapproved S.R. Batra v. Taruna Batra, (2007) 3 SCC 169, insofar as its narrower interpretation required the house to be owned or rented by the husband. Applying that framework, the High Court considered the wife's initial cohabitation, alleged exclusion and need to earn elsewhere. It neither held that every brief visit creates a shared household nor finally granted a residence order.

3. Statutes considered : Section 12 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005, governed the application. Sections 2(f) and 2(s) define domestic relationship and shared household. The Court reproduced both definitions and applied the latter to the applicants' objection about residence. Sections 17 and 19 were discussed through Satish Chander Ahuja in relation to residence protection and the order sought. The wife also claimed protection under Section 18, monetary relief under Section 20, compensation under Section 22 and interim relief under Section 23. Those additional claims provided an independent reason not to quash the entire application on an objection about residence. Her affidavit under Section 23(2) was relied on for the dates of her stay; it did not conclusively exclude a shared household. Section 482 CrPC governed the quashing application. The Court did not finally determine liability or any precise amount under the DVA remedies sought.

4. Issues : (i) On this preliminary challenge under Section 482, did the wife's initial matrimonial stay of two and a half months, subsequent alleged exclusion and employment in another city fail to satisfy the shared-household requirement under Section 2(s) as merely fleeting visits, applying Satish Chander Ahuja? (ii) Could an objection about residence alone justify quashing a Section 12 application seeking other independent DVA remedies? The truth of the violence allegations, return of stridhan, monetary amounts and final entitlement to residence remained for the competent court.

5. Ratio / Findings : Section 2(s) covers a household in which an aggrieved person lives or has lived at any stage in a domestic relationship. Under Satish Chander Ahuja, the definition is exhaustive and ownership is not essential, but the residence must have some real permanency rather than be a fleeting or casual stay. The applicants did not contend that the wife had never stayed in the Moradabad house. Her affidavit described residence shortly after the marriage until February 2018, and she alleged that she was excluded whenever she later returned. Her husband lived abroad, she worked in Rudrapur, and the applicants did not claim to pay her maintenance. The Court considered her need to work for survival and the alleged exclusion when assessing the nature and intention of her absence. At this stage, it would not infer that she had voluntarily chosen not to reside there or exclude her application from the beneficial statute on that basis. Residence under Section 19 was also only one of the remedies sought. The disputed right to reside in a particular portion did not determine her claims under Sections 18, 20, 22 and 23. The entire Section 12 proceeding could therefore not be quashed on that ground alone. This was an assessment of prima facie maintainability, distinct from ultimate proof; none of the pleaded remedies was granted.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The proceeding under Section 12 of the Domestic Violence Act in MJCR No. 593/2020 remained pending before the JMFC, with all requested remedies left for adjudication. This decision granted no protection or residence order and awarded no monetary relief or compensation.

Ankit Jain and Others v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 12163/2020, 04/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Forest Act confiscation / owner's knowledge - The owners of a tractor and trolley used to transport sand illegally could not defeat confiscation merely by asserting that they did not know of their driver's conduct. The absence of a registration number on the tractor was a further adverse circumstance. On the evidence and procedural history before it, the High Court found no error in the confiscation upheld in appeal and revision. It did not lay down an absolute rule of vicarious liability.

Environmental damage / proposed payment - An offer to compensate for damage to the forest or pay a penalty under an asserted policy did not require release of the vehicle. The Court adopted the concern for ecological protection and public property expressed in Jayant v State of M.P., (2021) 2 SCC 670, in treating illegal sand transport seriously. The quoted discussion in Jayant distinguished compounding under Section 23-A MMDR from liability for IPC offences; that statutory bar was not the basis of the present Forest Act confiscation decision.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A tractor and trolley owned by the applicants were seized on the allegation that their driver had transported sand illegally without the relevant documents. POR No. 10610/2007 was registered for offences identified in the order as Sections 2(4)(b), 33(l)(b) and 52 of the Indian Forest Act. In response to notice, the owners said they did not know of the driver's activities and offered to compensate for damage to the forest area. The prescribed authority confiscated the vehicle. The Appellate Officer-cum-Chief Conservator of Forest, Shahdol, dismissed their appeal in Case No. 6/2023 on 4 July 2023. The Third Additional Sessions Judge, Shahdol, dismissed Criminal Revision No. 37/2023 on 4 December 2023. The owners challenged the revisional order under Section 482 CrPC, repeating their denial of knowledge and offer of payment. They relied on a State policy which, they said, permitted release after payment of a penalty. The tractor had no registration number.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court quoted extensively from Jayant and others v State of M.P., (2021) 2 SCC 670. That decision explained that compounding under Section 23-A of the Mines and Minerals (Development and Regulation) Act bars further proceedings for the MMDR or rule offence compounded, but does not prevent proceedings for the distinct IPC offences under Sections 379 and 414. Its discussion of environmental harm, drawing on State (NCT of Delhi) v Sanjay, (2014) 9 SCC 772, addressed degradation of riverbeds and groundwater through excessive sand mining, the State's stewardship of public mineral resources and the inadequacy of relying on penalties alone. The High Court expressly adopted the concern for ecological protection. It did not hold that Section 23-A MMDR governed this Forest Act confiscation or that Jayant determined a separate IPC prosecution. Sanjay appeared within the passage quoted from Jayant.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to challenge the revisional order. The order identifies Sections 2(4)(b), 33(l)(b) and 52 of the Indian Forest Act in recording the forest offences and confiscation. The passage quoted from Jayant concerned MMDR Act Section 23-A, the rules made under that Act and the distinct IPC offences under Sections 379 and 414. Those provisions explain the precedent's context; they were not the statutory basis of this vehicle-confiscation result. The owners also relied on an asserted State policy permitting release after payment of a penalty.

4. Issues : Whether the owners' asserted ignorance of their driver's illegal sand transport, together with their offer to pay compensation or a penalty, disclosed an error justifying interference with the confiscation upheld in appeal and revision; and what significance should be attached to the tractor's lack of registration and the environmental harm. The Court did not decide a separate criminal charge against the owners or the detailed terms of the policy they relied on.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court adopted Jayant's concern that illegal extraction and transport of sand harm rivers, groundwater and public resources held in the State's custody. The owners' assertion that they did not know of their driver's conduct did not relieve them of responsibility for the vehicle's use on this record. The Court treated the absence of a registration number as a further indication of guilty mind in the circumstances. The offer to pay for the damage did not require release, given the serious environmental concern and the confiscation decisions already made. The quoted MMDR compounding principle was not applied as an independent rule under the Forest Act. Finding no error in the confiscation orders, the High Court declined interference under Section 482. Its assessment concerned this vehicle and the available record, rather than a universal presumption against vehicle owners.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. Confiscation of the specified Massey Ferguson tractor and trolley, as upheld by the forest appellate authority and the Sessions Court in revision, remained undisturbed. The Court granted no release on payment, remand, compensation order or further condition.

Headnote :- IPC Sections 141, 149 and 302 / circumstantial evidence — In applying Section 149, a separate overt act by each member need not be proved once the unlawful assembly, its common object and the offence's connection with that object are established. In these five connected appeals concerning a murder at Gwalior Fort, the Court inferred the shared unlawful object from the evidence that five accused entered the fort with the deceased and emerged without him, the alleged dispute over money, discovery of the body, fatal firearm and penetrating injuries, and weapon recoveries. The Court held that evidence of the accused and deceased being last seen together was insufficient by itself. Section 106 could provide an additional link concerning facts within special knowledge only after the prosecution had proved the relevant incriminating circumstances. Despite the initial report against unknown persons, delayed witness statements, the hostile complainant and objections to identification, the Court found the evidence sufficient as a whole. It dismissed the appeals and affirmed the convictions and concurrent sentences.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Five criminal appeals (404, 464, 517, 611 and 730 of 2010) challenged a common Sessions conviction concerning Satendra Yadav's death near Gwalior Fort on 30 September 2006. According to the prosecution, he received a call asking him to collect money, told his mother that he was going to graze buffaloes, and did not return. His body was found in bushes during the night. The first report expressed suspicion that the killing arose from a lending dispute but named unknown assailants. The autopsy disclosed close-range firearm wounds to the head and back, a penetrating wound to the chest, fractures and fatal haemorrhage. Police seized a 315-bore country-made gun from Satish, another gun from Ashok Pal and a knife from Annudatt. Eighteen prosecution witnesses and one defence witness testified. The trial court convicted the appellants under IPC Section 302/149 and the associated assembly provisions, and separately convicted Satish under Arms Act Sections 25(1-b)(a) and 27. It imposed life imprisonment and shorter terms, to run concurrently.

2. Precedents — Considered : Dani Singh v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 203, and Kuldip Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2011) 5 SCC 324, required proof of an unlawful assembly of five persons and a clearly identified common object. Mahadev Sharma addressed the framing of charges under Sections 147 –149. Sharad Birdhichand Sarda, Padala Veera Reddy, Ramreddy Rajesh Khanna Reddy, Balwinder Singh and Sunil Clifford Daniel were quoted for the requirement that circumstantial evidence form a complete chain consistent only with guilt. State of Rajasthan v. Kashi Ram explained that Section 106 may provide an additional link after proof that the accused and deceased were last seen together; it does not transfer the prosecution's ultimate burden. Gian Chand and Tara Chand addressed the effect of delay. Jayabalan required careful assessment of related witnesses and cautioned against rejecting their testimony solely because of kinship. The judgment also discussed Sections 299–300 and the principles governing fatal injuries through Virsa Singh, Anda, Mahesh Balmiki, Sangapagu Anjaiah and Kanhaiyalal.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 141, 142, 148, 149, 299, 300 and 302 were discussed in relation to unlawful assembly, liability for its common object, culpable homicide and murder. Evidence Act Section 106 concerned facts within special knowledge after proof of the relevant incriminating circumstances by the prosecution. Arms Act Sections 25(1-b)(a) and 27 governed Satish's separate firearm conviction. CrPC Section 161 arose in the challenge to the delay in recording police statements.

4. Issues : Whether Satendra's death was homicidal and amounted to murder; whether the five accused formed an unlawful assembly with the common object of committing murder; and whether the circumstantial evidence proved their participation beyond reasonable doubt despite the absence of a direct eyewitness, the FIR against unknown persons, delay in recording witness statements, the witnesses' family connections, the hostile complainant and the disputed identification.

5. Ratio / Findings : Medical evidence established the fatal gunshot and penetrating injuries. PW7 described the deceased entering the fort with five accused and the five emerging without him shortly afterwards. The Court treated the other witnesses' accounts and the police and medical evidence as corroborative, and inferred a connection with money-lending and coordinated conduct. It applied Section 149 without requiring proof that each appellant had personally inflicted an injury, having identified the common object and the offence's connection with it. Evidence that the accused and deceased were last seen together would not, by itself, suffice. Here, the discovery of the body, medical evidence, account of the group's movements and recoveries completed the circumstantial chain. The Court found that the roughly seventeen-day delay in recording some witness statements and the minor discrepancies did not undermine the prosecution case. It did not reject the relatives' testimony merely because of their relationship. The complainant's failure to support the prosecution and the defence objections to identification were recorded. The Court further stated that a member could incur liability even without personally participating or being aware that the offence was being committed, where membership at the relevant time and the commission or likelihood of the offence in prosecution of the assembly's common object were established. The judgment also reproduced the requirements of a shared unlawful object and the statutory alternative concerning an offence the members knew was likely to be committed. There was no direct eyewitness to the attack itself.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed all five appeals and affirmed the convictions and sentences. It cancelled the bail bonds of the appellants who were on bail and directed them to surrender immediately before the trial court to serve the remainder of their sentences. A copy of the judgment and the record were to be sent to the trial court for information and compliance.

Annudatt v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 404/2010 & 464/2010 & 517/2010 & 611/2010 & 730/2010, 28/03/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- CrPC Sections 311 and 362 / speedy trial — The Court retained its direction to conclude a rape trial within three months because its own interim stay had halted the 2018 trial for more than five years. It distinguished an order giving exceptional priority to a delayed trial from an automatic deadline for acquittal prohibited by P. Ramachandra Rao. Applying the exceptional-circumstances principle in High Court Bar Association, Allahabad, it found the prolonged stay sufficient to justify the direction. The Court also observed that both the victim and the accused had an interest in a speedy trial. It maintained the earlier recall of the prosecutrix, who alleged that she had turned hostile under pressure, applying Rajaram Prasad Yadav's requirement that the evidence be necessary for a just decision. The application for review was dismissed. The disputed facts concerning the marriage affidavit and the question of guilt remained for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In a trial under Section 376 IPC, the prosecutrix first turned hostile and later sought recall under Section 311 CrPC. She alleged that she had testified under pressure and that the accused had since changed his position. The trial court allowed her application on 6 December 2018. The accused challenged that order on 13 December, and a High Court stay granted on 14 January 2019 halted the proceedings for more than five years. On 19 February 2024, the High Court dismissed the challenge, directed that her evidence be recorded without further delay and required the trial to conclude within three months. The accused then sought alteration or review of that order. He also disputed a marriage affidavit, contending that it purported to have been executed on a day when he was in jail.

2. Precedents — Considered : P. Ramachandra Rao v. State of Karnataka, (2002) 4 SCC 578, prohibits judicially prescribed limitation periods that automatically end a prosecution or entitle an accused to acquittal because of delay. The direction in this case contained no such consequence. M. Gopalakrishnan cautioned superior courts against casually directing district courts to expedite cases. High Court Bar Association, Allahabad v. State of U.P. (29 February 2024) stated that constitutional courts should normally leave scheduling and priority to the courts concerned, but may prescribe an outer limit in exceptional circumstances. The High Court treated the earlier stay of more than five years as such a circumstance. Rajaram Prasad Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2013) 14 SCC 461, explained the requirements of truth-seeking, necessity and fairness when exercising the power of recall under Section 311. Zahira Habibullah Sheikh (5) was also invoked in support of a fair trial. The Court assessed recall under these principles without finally deciding the pending rape charge.

3. Statutes considered : Section 311 CrPC governed recall of the prosecutrix. Section 362 restricted alteration or review after disposal, while Section 482 had provided the basis of the earlier challenge. IPC Section 376 was the charge being tried. The Court's references to IPC Sections 90 and 375 Fourthly depended on whether the apparent consent had been obtained through a misconception of fact; they did not amount to a conviction.

4. Issues : Whether the direction to conclude the trial within three months imposed an impermissible automatic limit on the prosecution or instead required exceptional expedition; and whether the accused's reliance on the authority concerning recall or his objection to the marriage affidavit justified reconsidering the February 2024 order.

5. Ratio / Findings : The earlier order provided neither acquittal nor abatement if the trial was not concluded within three months. The direction addressed the extraordinary delay caused by the stay granted in the accused's own challenge. A speedy trial served the interests of both the victim and the accused. The prosecutrix's allegations of pressure and changed circumstances had provided a basis for finding her recall necessary for a just decision. Section 311 permitted the necessary evidence to be received, subject to careful protection of a fair trial. The Court said that reconsidering arguments on the merits fell outside its power under Section 362. Nevertheless, at the applicant's counsel's instance, it considered those arguments to explain that the earlier order had taken account of the important aspects of the case. It did not finally resolve the disputed marriage affidavit or the pending charge. Its observations concerning Section 90 and Section 375 Fourthly were conditional on consent having been obtained through a misconception of fact, and did not determine guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. The earlier order permitting recall and the direction to expedite the trial remained in force. The Court neither decided the rape charge nor prescribed an automatic sanction for failure to meet the deadline.

Ansar Ali v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 4164/2019, 04/04/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Criminal-side writ — ongoing investigation — direction to arrest and charge-sheet - Registration of an FIR under Sections 406 and 420 IPC did not entitle the complainant to a mandamus requiring arrest of the accused or the filing of a charge-sheet. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, the Court held that the police must decide the investigative steps and the appropriate final report on the evidence. Directing arrest or a charge-sheet in this writ would amount to supervising the investigation. The Supreme Court had explained that arrest involves discretion and does not follow mechanically from an allegation of a cognizable offence. An investigation may properly conclude without arrest, seizure or a charge-sheet.

Investigation — statutory duty to conclude without unnecessary delay - Section 173(1) CrPC, cited by the Court alongside Section 193 BNSS, requires completion of an investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is disclosed and submit the appropriate report, including a closure report where warranted. The Court directed the officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law. It prescribed no investigative result and left the petitioner free to place any further grievance before the Superintendent of Police.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The petitioner filed a writ under Article 226 concerning a car said to be in the possession of respondent No. 4. He sought a direction to the police to seize the car and hand it over to him. Alternatively, if it was not seized, he sought payment of the insured sum with interest from the insurer. He also sought a direction restraining another respondent from taking coercive action. Counsel stated that the police had registered an FIR under Sections 406 and 420 IPC on the petitioner's complaint, but had neither arrested the accused nor completed the investigation. The Court recorded these prayers and the complaint without deciding ownership of the car, the insurer's liability or the criminal allegations. It considered whether it could direct arrest and prescribe the course of investigation, and what direction could be made about the investigation said to remain pending.

2. Precedents — Considered : In D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, the Supreme Court set aside a High Court order directing investigative steps, including recording witness statements, arrest, seizure and the filing of a charge-sheet, without reasons or a hearing for the affected accused. The passages reproduced and applied in this case explain the police's statutory duty and discretion to investigate. Every FIR need not result in arrest, seizure or a charge-sheet; the investigating officer may find that no case warranting prosecution is made out. The Supreme Court also required reasons and a fair hearing for directions seriously affecting a person's reputation, and cautioned against routine control of investigative methods under Section 482 CrPC. It quoted M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, on the discretion and caution required in making an arrest under Section 41 CrPC, and Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on hearing a person likely to be seriously affected by a direction for investigation. The High Court applied the decision here to refuse directions for arrest or a charge-sheet in this writ.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution supplied the writ jurisdiction invoked by the petitioner. Sections 406 and 420 IPC were the offences recorded in the FIR, not elements adjudicated on the merits. Section 173(1) CrPC was quoted for the requirement that every investigation under the relevant chapter be completed without unnecessary delay; the order also referred to Section 193 BNSS alongside it. Section 41 CrPC and Section 482 CrPC appeared in the Supreme Court passages to explain police discretion to arrest and the limits of inherent judicial intervention; this writ itself was brought under Article 226 rather than Section 482. The order did not decide the merits of any insurance claim.

4. Issues : (i) Whether a complainant could obtain a direction under Article 226 requiring the police to arrest the accused or file a charge-sheet during a pending investigation, having regard to police discretion and the limits on judicial supervision. (ii) Whether the statutory duty to avoid unnecessary delay justified directing the officer to conclude the investigation and take the lawful consequential steps, without deciding in advance what the outcome should be.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the first issue, the Court applied D. Venkatasubramaniam's distinction between the police's statutory duty to investigate and a judicial direction prescribing investigative methods or results. Registration of an FIR does not automatically require arrest. The investigating agency must assess the evidence before deciding whether arrest, seizure or a charge-sheet is warranted. The Court therefore refused to direct arrest and the filing of a charge-sheet, as that would supervise the investigation. On the second issue, it applied Section 173(1) CrPC, which requires completion without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer could not leave the investigation pending unnecessarily. The officer had to conclude whether any offence was disclosed and submit the appropriate final report, whether a closure report or a charge-sheet. The Court could require early completion while leaving the lawful outcome to the officer's assessment of the evidence. It made no finding of guilt and did not decide ownership of the car or the insurer's liability.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court finally disposed of the writ petition. It did not direct arrest, require a charge-sheet, order seizure or delivery of the car, or award payment against the insurer. It directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law. If a grievance remained, the petitioner could apply to the Superintendent of Police, Bhopal, who was to consider it according to law. The Court fixed no date for the final report and granted no specific monetary relief.

Anshul Gupta v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, W.P. no. 24626/2024, 30/08/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR registration — police duty and writ remedy — alternate statutory course - Information disclosing a cognizable offence requires the police to register an FIR. However, an allegation that the police have not acted does not ordinarily entitle the complainant to a mandamus under Article 226 without using the prescribed statutory remedies. Applying Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, and the Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (20.12.2016), the Court left the petitioner, who alleged that an assault had caused his father's death, free to approach the Magistrate. Shweta Bhadauria distinguishes the police duty stated in Lalita Kumari from entitlement to a writ, while preserving the recognised exceptions to the rule governing alternative remedies.

Magistrate's remedial jurisdiction — non-registration and improper investigation - Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, followed in Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, explains the statutory course from an approach under Section 154(3) CrPC to an application under Section 156(3). If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct registration of the FIR or proper investigation, and monitor compliance without personally investigating. Aleque Padamsee also identifies a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 as a remedy. The Court gave the petitioner liberty to approach the concerned Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202, without expressing a view on the alleged offence.

Article 226 — rare intervention in mala fide investigation - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, recognises exceptional intervention to require compliance with the Code where mala fide investigation, a clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII are shown. Even then, the High Court cannot prescribe how the police must conduct the investigation. The Court dismissed this petition with liberty to approach the concerned Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The petitioner sought a mandamus under Article 226 requiring the authorities to act on his complaint that his father had been assaulted and had died as a result. He stated that a complaint had been made to the police but that no action followed. The Court did not determine whether the alleged assault occurred or who was criminally liable. It considered whether, in these circumstances, it should direct the police to register an FIR. That question required consideration of the alternative statutory remedies and the limits of intervention through a criminal-side writ.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, distinguishes the duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence from the remedy available when the police fail to perform that duty. It directs the aggrieved informant to the Magistrate's complaint jurisdiction under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC, explaining that decisions concerning the police duty did not determine the separate question of remedy. The High Court relied on that distinction. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, permits rare intervention under Article 226 where mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC are clearly established. Even then, the Court may insist on the prescribed legal process but cannot dictate investigative methods. Its discussion of Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre and AIIMS Employees' Union explains the Magistrate's complaint jurisdiction in cases of police inaction. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, explains that an aggrieved person may first approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and then apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate can direct registration and proper investigation and monitor compliance. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reiterates Sakiri Vasu. It includes the Magistrate's discretion to recommend a change of investigating officer, while distinguishing monitoring from personally investigating. The High Court applied its preference for this statutory remedy over routine writ petitions. The binding Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (20.12.2016), permits refusal of mandamus where the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, subject to the recognised Whirlpool exceptions. It distinguishes the police registration duty stated in Lalita Kumari from entitlement to a writ.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution provided the jurisdiction under which the writ was filed. Section 154 CrPC governs information about cognizable offences and registration, while subsection (3) allows an aggrieved person to approach the Superintendent of Police. Section 156(3) empowers the Magistrate to direct investigation. Sections 190 and 200 govern cognizance and complaint proceedings, and Section 202 provides for inquiry or investigation as part of the complaint process. Chapter XII CrPC appeared in Divine Retreat Centre's discussion of the legal limits on police investigation. The provisions were considered in relation to the appropriate forum and procedure; the Court did not adjudicate the substantive allegation of assault.

4. Issues : Whether a complainant alleging police inaction over a fatal assault could obtain a direction under Article 226 to register an FIR without first using the remedies before the Superintendent of Police and the Magistrate; how the duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence differs from the remedy for failure to perform it; and whether an exceptional ground for writ intervention displaced the ordinary statutory course. The Court did not decide whether the assault occurred or whether the complaint ultimately established a cognizable offence.

5. Ratio / Findings : Following Aleque Padamsee, the Court distinguished the police duty to register an FIR on cognizable information from the remedy for non-registration. The ordinary remedy was the procedure under the Code, rather than a direct writ prescribing police action. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe explain the powers available under that procedure. After recourse to Section

154(3), an application may be made under Section 156(3); if prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may require registration and proper investigation and monitor performance. A complaint under Sections 190 and 200 provides another forum. Divine Retreat Centre preserves rare intervention under Article 226 on a clear showing of mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse and non-compliance with the Code. Even then, the High Court may require lawful process but cannot control the method of investigation. Shweta Bhadauria applies the alternative-remedy rule to mandamus for FIR registration, subject to the recognised exceptions, and distinguishes the duty to register from entitlement to a writ. Applying those authorities to the limited petition before it, the Court referred the petitioner to the Magistrate. It made no finding on the alleged assault or the merits of the proposed FIR.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. It expressly left the petitioner free, if he wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC for redress. The High Court did not order registration of an FIR or express any conclusion on the allegations or on a future application to the Magistrate.

Headnote :- Criminal breach of trust — truck sale, part payment and retained possession — FIR-quashing threshold - The complaint alleged that the applicant obtained a truck on part payment, failed to pay the balance promised to the finance company or seller, continued using the truck and did not return it. The Court held that these allegations disclosed a cognizable case under Sections 405–406 IPC sufficient to refuse quashing under Section 482. Reading Sections 4, 5, 31, 33, 45 and 46 of the Sale of Goods Act, it reasoned that the unpaid seller retained a lien and treated the buyer as a trustee until the full price was paid. The agreement had not been produced, and its other terms were unknown. This was the Court's assessment of the particular allegations at the FIR-quashing stage, without a determination of guilt. Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, was applied for the police duty to register an FIR where a complaint discloses a cognizable offence.

Minor's agreement — contractual incapacity and criminal allegation - The applicant's claim that he was a minor when the agreement was made, and that it was therefore void under Section 11 of the Contract Act, did not by itself exclude possible IPC liability on the allegations. The Court rejected a general exemption from criminal law on that contractual ground. It did not decide whether the applicant was in fact a juvenile, treating his age as a disputed question of fact that could not be determined in Section 482 proceedings.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant alleged that the applicant agreed to buy a ten-wheeler truck for ₹13,75,000, paid ₹5,85,000 to the complainant and undertook to pay the remaining ₹7,90,000 to Magma Finance Company. According to the FIR, the applicant took possession but neither paid the financed balance to the company nor paid it to the seller. He continued using the truck and did not return it. The complaint also alleged defaults in obtaining insurance and a fitness certificate, and referred to notices demanding payment. Police Station Aron, District Guna, registered Crime No. 463/2017 under Section 406 IPC. The applicant sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC. He principally argued that he was a minor on the alleged agreement date, 07.07.2014, so that the agreement was void and he could not be prosecuted on its basis. The State disputed any automatic exemption from criminal law on that ground. The applicant had not produced the agreement, leaving its other terms unavailable for examination.

2. Precedents — Considered : Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, was cited and applied for the rule that the police must register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence. The Court used that rule to assess whether the complaint supported registration and continuation of the investigation. Its separate consideration of Sections 405–406 IPC and the Sale of Goods Act concerned the alleged delivery, unpaid balance, continued use and non-return of the truck. It also considered the applicant's plea of minority.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 405 and 406 IPC provided the definition and punishment of criminal breach of trust. The former requires entrustment or dominion over property and dishonest misappropriation, conversion, use or disposal in the manner specified by the provision. Section 482 CrPC supplied the jurisdiction invoked for quashing. The Court reproduced Sections 4 and 5 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1930, concerning a sale or agreement to sell and the formation of the contract; Sections 31 and 33, concerning delivery and the duties of buyer and seller; and Sections 45 and 46, concerning an unpaid seller and the statutory rights attached to that position. It relied on these provisions in reasoning about a seller's lien after delivery and the applicant's continued use without completing payment. Section 11 of the Contract Act formed the basis of the applicant's incapacity argument. The Court left his actual age unresolved as a factual question not to be determined in this Section 482 proceeding.

4. Issues : Whether the alleged transaction, possession and continued use of the truck, and failure to pay the balance disclosed a cognizable offence under Sections 405–406 IPC sufficient to sustain the FIR; whether asserted minority and the claimed voidness of the agreement under Section 11 of the Contract Act necessarily excluded any criminal allegation; and whether the applicant's age could be determined on this Section 482 record when the agreement had not been produced. The Court was deciding a threshold request to quash the FIR, rather than trying the questions of dishonest intention, entrustment or ownership.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court considered the allegations that the applicant obtained possession on part payment and was to pay the balance to the finance company. The agreement itself had not been produced, so its other terms were unknown. Reading the Sale of Goods Act provisions on delivery and unpaid sellers' rights, the Court reasoned in this case that the unpaid seller retained a lien. It treated the buyer as a trustee and considered that his continued use of the truck without paying the balance or returning it could amount to criminal breach of trust. On that reasoning, it found that the complaint disclosed a cognizable offence and applied Lalita Kumari's registration principle. This was an assessment of the allegations at the FIR stage, based on delivery, part payment, the unpaid balance, continued use and non-return of the truck. The Court also rejected contractual incapacity as a ground for general immunity from the IPC. It did not decide whether the applicant was a juvenile on 07.07.2014, holding that his age was a question of fact beyond determination in these proceedings. It made no final finding of criminal liability.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application to quash Crime No. 463/2017, Police Station Aron, District Guna, under Section 406 IPC. The FIR remained in force. The Court made no final determination of the applicant's age, the precise terms of the agreement, civil rights in the truck or criminal guilt.

Headnote :- Maintenance — alteration — proof of changed circumstances - The second proviso to Section 125(1) CrPC permits reasonable interim maintenance without recording witness evidence. Section 127(1), however, allows alteration "on proof of a change in the circumstances"; the party seeking variation must prove that change by evidence. The husband's assertion that he had returned the stridhan and paid ₹9,17,999.38 did not dispense with that requirement. The Section 127 application could not categorically be called premature. In the pending Section 125 proceeding, however, recording evidence separately for alteration and then again for the main claim was not feasible. The final maintenance award could increase or reduce the interim amount.

Maintenance — income-tax return — evidentiary value - The husband's income-tax return was not a public document of which the maintenance court could take judicial notice. It had to be proved like any other document. Whether it correctly disclosed his income remained a question of fact, and the income declared to the revenue authority did not bind the Magistrate. In the absence of evidence proving his means or the alleged change in circumstances, the Court affirmed the refusal to alter the ₹15,000 monthly interim award and dismissed the revision.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Garima Ajmani's maintenance application under Section 125 CrPC was pending before the Principal Judge, Family Court, Gwalior, in Case No. 251/2016. On 18.08.2017, the Family Court awarded her interim maintenance of ₹15,000 per month. Her husband, Anubhav Ajmani, applied under Section 127 CrPC to alter that allowance. He asserted that, in compliance with the Jaipur Family Court's order dated 06.10.2017, he had returned all her stridhan and paid her ₹9,17,999.38, on which she could earn interest. He also alleged that she was educated but deliberately remained unemployed. She disputed the return of all her stridhan, said that she had received the amount under protest, and questioned whether his income-tax return disclosed his actual income. On 08.03.2018, the Gwalior Family Court rejected the application for alteration. It reasoned that alteration required evidence, that the Section 125 claim awaited final adjudication, and that the husband could challenge the interim order itself. In revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC, the husband argued that an interim allowance granted without recording witness evidence could also be altered without such evidence. He further contended that his income-tax return was a public document on which the Court could rely to assess his income. The High Court considered those legal submissions without finally deciding either party's disputed financial assertions.

2. Statutes considered : The second proviso to Section 125(1) CrPC permits reasonable interim maintenance and expenses of the proceedings while the main maintenance application is pending. The Court held that the Magistrate may fix a reasonable amount for provisional subsistence, having regard to the parties' status and other relevant factors, without recording evidence at that stage. Section 127(1) CrPC permits alteration "on proof of a change in the circumstances". The person seeking alteration must therefore establish that change by evidence. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC provided the jurisdiction invoked in revision. The income-tax return was considered as a document offered to prove income; the Court did not treat it as a public document of which judicial notice could be taken.

3. Issues : (i) Whether the power to grant interim maintenance under Section 125 without recording witness evidence also allowed alteration under Section 127 without proof of a subsequent change in circumstances. (ii) Whether the husband's income-tax return could be judicially noticed as a public document and treated as conclusive or binding proof of his income. (iii) Whether the Section 127 application was legally premature or whether, with the main claim still pending, the disputed evidence and final amount should be considered in the Section 125 proceedings. The Court did not finally decide whether all the stridhan had been returned, whether the wife earned interest, or whether the husband's disclosed income was accurate.

4. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected the husband's argument that an interim allowance granted without recording evidence could also be altered without evidence. Interim maintenance under the second proviso to Section 125(1) provides provisional subsistence and may be fixed without recording witness evidence. Section 127(1) expressly requires proof of changed circumstances, and the person seeking alteration must establish the change by evidence. The husband's assertions about the return of stridhan and a lump-sum payment did not remove that requirement; the wife disputed the completeness and circumstances of the return. His income-tax return concerned his dealings as an assessee with the revenue authority. It was not a public document of which the Court could take judicial notice and had to be proved like any other document. Whether it correctly stated his actual income was a disputed question of fact, and the return did not bind the Magistrate. The Court qualified the Family Court's description of the Section 127 application as premature, expressly observing that it might not be called premature. Its reason for refusing interference at this stage was that recording full evidence first for Section 127 and then again for the pending Section 125 claim was not feasible. The husband was to adduce evidence in the main claim, where the final maintenance amount could be increased or reduced from the interim award. No perversity warranting revisional interference was shown. The Court's reasoning rested on Sections 125(1) and 127(1) CrPC and the evidentiary value of the income-tax return.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court affirmed the Family Court's order dated 08.03.2018 refusing to alter the interim allowance and dismissed the criminal revision. The interim maintenance of ₹15,000 per month remained operative pending final adjudication under Section 125, when the amount and the parties' means could be established by evidence and reassessed. The Court did not determine the final award, find that all stridhan had been returned, or finally assess either party's actual income.

Headnote :- Inherent powers — investigation — arrest direction - Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, the Court declined to direct arrest or the filing of a charge sheet in the pending FIR investigation. In that decision, the Supreme Court relied on M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra to explain that arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and does not automatically follow an FIR. It also relied on Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala concerning drastic judicial directions affecting persons who had not been heard. Here, the police reported that three named persons had been arrested and another had not. The persons whom the applicant described as absconding had not been impleaded. The police retained discretion to assess the evidence and file either a closure report or a charge sheet.

Investigation — Section 173(1) — timely completion - Restraint over investigative choices does not relieve the police of their statutory duty to complete an investigation without unnecessary delay. In the pending investigation into the Section 307/34 IPC FIR, the Court directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and submit the final report required by the evidence and law. It did not require an arrest or direct that the report must be a charge sheet.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : An FIR lodged on 30.06.2024 alleged offences under Sections 307 and 34 IPC. Anuj Gurjar applied under Section 482 CrPC, complaining that the police were not arresting the accused and seeking the Court's intervention. In their status report, the police stated that Sanjeev Gurjar, Ravi Baghel and Bhupendra Singh had been arrested, but Manoj Gurjar had not yet been arrested. They also stated that Anuj was an accused in a cross-case. The persons whom he described as absconding had not been impleaded as respondents. After hearing the applicant and the State, the High Court considered whether it could direct arrest during the pending investigation.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam and Others v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari and Another, 2009:INSC:1132, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was quoted extensively and applied. The Supreme Court had set aside a High Court order directing the recording of witness statements, arrest, seizure and the filing of a charge sheet during investigation. It held that the police have the statutory duty to investigate and discretion over the method and outcome. The High Court must exercise Section 482 powers sparingly, for the purposes specified in that provision and with reasons; it should not dictate a particular course of investigation or assume that every FIR must lead to arrest and prosecution. The quoted decision relied on M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra for the principle that arrest without warrant under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be considered cautiously in light of personal liberty and the circumstances. It also relied on Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala concerning an opportunity of hearing before drastic directions affecting an unimpleaded person's reputation and interests. In the present case, the High Court noted that the persons described as absconding had not been impleaded, refused to direct arrest and left the police free to submit a closure report or a charge sheet according to the evidence. It did not determine an arrest application against any particular person or decide guilt.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the provision invoked for exercise of the High Court's inherent powers. The Court also referred to Article 226 when framing the question whether it could direct arrest. Section 41 CrPC featured in the quoted Supreme Court discussion of police discretion to arrest without warrant. Section 173(1) CrPC required completion of the investigation without unnecessary delay and a report reflecting whether the evidence disclosed a case. Sections 307 and 34 IPC identified the allegations in the FIR; the Court did not adjudicate those offences.

4. Issues : (i) Whether, on the applicant's Section 482 request, the reported arrests and the pending cross-case, the High Court could direct the police to arrest an unarrested suspect or file a charge sheet. (ii) Whether it could require prompt, lawful completion under Section 173(1) while leaving investigative choices and the outcome of the final report to the police. The Court did not decide the merits of the FIR, the applicant's role in the cross-case or whether any individual arrest was necessary.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court distinguished judicial control over the legality of an investigation from the police's discretion in conducting it. The quoted Supreme Court reasoning made clear that arrest under Section 41 is discretionary and does not follow mechanically from registration of a cognizable FIR. Depending on the evidence, the police may consider arrest necessary, submit a charge sheet or conclude that a closure report is appropriate. Directing arrest in this case would take away the police's lawful option of submitting a closure report and would dictate the course of investigation. The failure to implead the persons sought to be affected also supported restraint, consistently with the hearing principle in the quoted decision. That restraint did not permit the police to leave the investigation unresolved. Section 173(1) required completion without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer had to assess whether an offence was made out and submit the appropriate final report on the evidence. The Court therefore declined to direct particular coercive steps but required prompt completion according to law. It ordered no specific arrest, finding in the investigation or charge-sheet outcome.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the Section 482 application, directing the investigating officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law, consistently with Section 173(1). It refused the requested direction to arrest. It did not quash the FIR, require either prosecution or closure, or decide anyone's guilt.

Anuj Gurjar v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 45939/2024, 26/11/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 138 NI Act complaint — complainant's absence — First hearing after transfer and completed cross-examination - The Court held that dismissal for want of prosecution on the first hearing before the transferee Magistrate amounted to a material illegality, given the complainant's earlier appearances, her affidavit under Section 145 and the completion of her cross-examination. The order-sheets showed adjournments caused by the presiding officer's absence or other court work, defence requests, the complainant's illness and her own later requests. If the trial court considered that she was deliberately prolonging the proceedings, it should have closed her right to examine further witnesses and fixed the case for the accused's statement. The Court set aside the dismissal and restored the complaint for trial, without deciding the merits of the alleged cheque dishonour.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The applicant's complaint under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, Case No. 4189/2013, was pending in Gwalior. The substance of the accusation was read over to the respondent in April 2014. In May 2014, the complainant filed her affidavit under Section 145. She appeared on several dates, but cross-examination was postponed because the presiding officer was absent, the court was occupied with other matters, the respondent sought time, including time for payment, or further procedural adjournments were granted. She too was absent on some dates. Her counsel stated that she was receiving cancer treatment in Bombay, and costs were imposed for certain adjournments. Her cross-examination began in October 2015 and was completed on 22.02.2016. The case was then fixed for her other witnesses. On 07.04.2016, she sought an adjournment. The case was transferred from the ACJM to the JMFC, Gwalior. On 04.05.2016, neither she nor her counsel appeared before the transferee court, which dismissed the complaint for want of prosecution. She challenged the dismissal, relying on the earlier proceedings and contending that she had been unaware of the transfer. The respondent did not appear before the High Court despite service.

2. Statutes considered : Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act was the provision invoked in the complaint; the High Court did not decide whether its ingredients were established. Section 145 of that Act provided for the complainant's evidence by affidavit, as recorded in the procedural history. The order-sheets also referred to applications under Section 317 CrPC concerning attendance. The application challenging dismissal before the High Court was stated to be under Section 378(4) CrPC. The procedural question concerned the transferee court's response to the complainant's absence and the evidence of her remaining witnesses.

3. Issues : Whether dismissal of the Section 138 complaint for want of prosecution was justified on the first hearing before the transferee Magistrate, when the complainant had previously appeared, filed her evidence affidavit and completed her cross-examination, although she had also been absent on some earlier dates and other witnesses remained to be examined; and whether, if the trial court considered that she was deliberately delaying the case, it should instead have closed further complainant evidence and proceeded to the accused's statement. The alleged cheque liability and the respondent's territorial-jurisdiction objection were not decided.

4. Ratio / Findings : The Court examined the detailed order-sheets in the context of the complainant's absence on the date of dismissal. On several earlier dates, she had appeared but her evidence had not been recorded for reasons not attributable solely to her. Her cross-examination had ultimately been completed. The record also showed her own requests for adjournment and her illness, but it did not justify dismissal on the first hearing after transfer to the JMFC. If the trial court considered that she was prolonging the proceedings by failing to produce additional witnesses, it should have closed her right to examine those witnesses and fixed the case for the accused's statement. On this procedural history, dismissal at the first hearing before the transferee court was a material illegality. The Court therefore set aside the dismissal without determining the respondent's criminal liability. Its decision rested on the order-sheets, the completed cross-examination and dismissal on the first date after transfer. Closure of further complainant evidence was the alternative identified if the trial court considered the delay deliberate.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application and set aside the JMFC's dismissal order dated 04.05.2016, restoring the complaint for further trial. It directed the parties to appear on 07.03.2022. If the respondent failed to appear on that date, the trial court was to issue a warrant for his arrest. The underlying Section 138 complaint remained to be decided on its merits.

Anuradha Agrawal v. Mahehdra Gupta, M.Cr.C. no. 8166/2016, 13/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (53) Prev Next

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty and dowry demand — specific role — quashing threshold - The wife alleged a further demand of ₹5 lakh, beatings, refusal to keep her unless the demand was met, and expulsion from the matrimonial home. The Court held that these allegations attributed specific conduct to the husband and mother-in-law and went beyond merely naming them in an omnibus accusation. Applying Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, it held that taunts for inadequate dowry and alleged harassment forcing separation could disclose a prima facie case of cruelty; whether the allegations were true remained for trial. Drawing on Kailash Chandra Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2014) 16 SCC 551, Taramani distinguished unsupported allegations against distant relatives from allegations assigning material roles to close family members. The police's omission of the sister-in-law from the charge-sheet did not, by itself, negate the alleged roles of the two applicants.

Inherent quashing — divorce proceedings and later FIR - Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court held that a husband's earlier divorce petition did not, merely because it preceded the wife's complaint, establish that the FIR was false or retaliatory. Civil and criminal proceedings remained independent. Delay while attempting or hoping for reconciliation could not automatically defeat the criminal allegations. The unproved allegations in the divorce petition could not displace the prima facie allegations in the FIR.

Section 528 BNSS — no mini-trial of bank transfers - Payments into the wife's account before the alleged expulsion in late August 2024 did not conclusively disprove dowry harassment. The Court reasoned that the January–July transfers were made while she lived with the husband and were not maintenance. Alternatively, if they were separate maintenance payments, they indicated that he had kept her financially separate for her expenses despite their living together. The transfers did not, by themselves, establish that the FIR was false. Applying the settled Supreme Court principles against conducting a mini-trial, the Court tested the uncontroverted allegations without resolving disputed evidence. It dismissed the application without deciding guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The wife alleged that she married the first applicant on 20.01.2022 and that her family gave money, goods and ornaments at the marriage. According to the FIR, about one and a half years later, the husband and his mother demanded another ₹5 lakh and harassed and beat her when the demand was not met. She informed her relatives, and her father tried to intervene. She alleged that the husband took her to Pune on 23.08.2024, where he and his sister Aastha continued demanding the money and expelled her from the matrimonial home. On 29.08.2024, he left her at her parental home and told her to return only with the money. Crime No. 304/2024 was registered at Police Station Dinara, District Shivpuri. The police filed a charge-sheet against the husband and mother-in-law under Section 85 BNS and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, but did not charge-sheet Aastha. The applicants sought quashing under Section 528 BNSS. They contended that the allegations were omnibus, that the FIR dated 24.11.2024 was a counterblast to the husband's divorce petition dated 25.10.2024, and that his bank transfers to the wife during January–July 2024 disproved cruelty. The State opposed the application. The Court held that it could not conduct a mini-trial under Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS and examined whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed an offence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted and applied. It distinguished indiscriminate allegations against distant relatives without a specific role, as discussed in Kailash Chandra Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2014) 16 SCC 551, from allegations that the husband and close family members demanded dowry and harassed the wife until she left the matrimonial home. Where such allegations could constitute an offence if proved, their truth was a matter for trial and the proceedings could not be quashed at that stage. The Court applied that distinction to the alleged additional demand, beatings and expulsion. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was separately quoted and applied to reject the counterblast argument. It explained that delay and the earlier filing of a divorce petition did not automatically make the wife's complaint false; civil and criminal proceedings were independent, and the quashing court had to assess the FIR rather than rely on extraneous defences or disputed investigative findings. The Court also cited XYZ v. State of Gujarat, S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das, Gourishetty Mahesh, Amit Kapoor, S. Khushboo and other Supreme Court decisions collectively for the rule against a mini-trial and the test of allegations taken at face value. That series included Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav. Kans Raj, K. Ramakrishna, Pepsi Foods, Bhajan Lal and Asmathunnisa appeared within the Taramani quotation; Bhajan Lal also appeared within the Pratibha quotation.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS provided the inherent jurisdiction invoked for quashing in 2025. In explaining the governing standard, the Court also referred to its predecessor, Section 482 CrPC. Section 85 BNS and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the provisions under which the applicants were prosecuted for alleged cruelty and dowry demand; the Court did not finally determine whether the ingredients required for conviction were established. It expressly referred to Section 498A IPC when stating that taunts for inadequate dowry could prima facie warrant prosecution, and then applied the specific allegations to the present Section 85 BNS case. The husband relied on his divorce petition as a factual defence, but its allegations were not adjudicated. The independence of civil and criminal proceedings governed whether the divorce case could bring the criminal proceedings to an end.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR attributed sufficiently specific dowry harassment and cruelty to the two applicants to warrant continuation, despite their claim of omnibus allegations and the police's omission of the sister-in-law from the charge-sheet; whether the husband's earlier divorce petition established that the later FIR was a counterblast; and whether disputed bank transfers before separation conclusively disproved the wife's allegations at the quashing stage. The Court did not determine whether she had actually been assaulted or whether the allegations in the divorce petition were true.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying Taramani, the Court held that the alleged demand for ₹5 lakh, beatings, forced separation and condition for return attributed specific conduct to the applicants, rather than merely naming distant relatives. The police had omitted the sister-in-law from the charge-sheet, but counsel could not clarify whether the trial court had made any order on that omission. It did not establish a ground for quashing in favour of the two applicants. Applying Pratibha, the Court declined to infer that the FIR was false because the husband had filed for divorce earlier. The wife's delay might reflect hope of preserving the marriage. The husband still had to prove the allegations in his divorce petition, and parallel civil proceedings did not extinguish the criminal allegations. The bank transfers preceded the alleged August expulsion and were made while the couple reportedly lived together. The Court reasoned that payments made while the wife lived with the husband were not maintenance and must have been made for some other reason. Alternatively, if he separately paid for her maintenance while they lived together, this indicated that he had kept her financially separate for her expenses. Occasional transfers did not, by themselves, establish that the FIR was false. Under the principles against conducting a mini-trial, the Court confined its inquiry to whether the uncontroverted allegations could constitute an offence. Disputed evidence and credibility remained for trial. These prima facie conclusions did not establish guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 528 BNSS application seeking quashing of the FIR, charge-sheet and pending prosecution. Proceedings against the husband and mother-in-law were left to continue. It granted no relief concerning the sister-in-law or the divorce case and made no final determination of criminal liability.

Headnote :- Cheque dishonour — insolvency — personal penal liability - The Court rejected the cheque signatory's contention that the initiation of insolvency proceedings and the asserted interim moratorium under Section 96 IBC invalidated his conviction under Section 138 NI Act. It followed Ajay Kumar Radheyshyam Goenka v. Tourism Finance Corporation of India, (2023) 10 SCC 545. That decision had considered P. Mohanraj v. Shah Brothers Ispat, (2021) 6 SCC 258, distinguished the penal character of NI Act prosecution from debt recovery, and held that a corporate resolution process did not extinguish the personal penal liability of a natural person who signed the cheque.

Suspension of sentence — deposit condition — insolvency objection - For the same reason, the Court rejected the applicant's challenge to the ₹13,73,890 deposit required for suspension of sentence under Section 389 CrPC during his appeal. The initiation of insolvency proceedings did not extinguish his personal liability under Section 138. His conviction had resulted in six months' imprisonment and compensation of ₹68,69,457.24. The Court rejected the insolvency ground urged against the deposit condition; the appeal against conviction remained pending before the appellate court.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 13.03.2024, the JMFC, Burhanpur, convicted Anurodh Mittal under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act in SC-NIA No. 723/2019. It imposed six months' imprisonment and compensation of ₹68,69,457.24. He filed Criminal Appeal No. 102/2024 and applied for suspension of sentence under Section 389 CrPC. On 16.04.2024, the appellate court required a deposit of ₹13,73,890 as a condition of suspension. In his Section 482 CrPC application, he described himself as guarantor of M/s Shree Geeta Textiles Private Limited, a borrower that had defaulted on its debt. He relied on Company Petition (IB)/74(MP)2022 before the NCLT, Indore Bench, and asserted that an interim moratorium under Section 96 IBC had operated from 14.10.2022 and remained in force when he was convicted and filed his appeal. He therefore challenged the effect of the conviction and the deposit condition on that ground. The order described the borrower as having applied under Section 94 and recorded the moratorium claim as one concerning personal insolvency. Counsel relied on P. Mohanraj and the Punjab and Haryana High Court decision in Vijay Kumar Ghai v. Pritpal Singh Babbar. The High Court considered the moratorium objection and declined to interfere.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant relied on P. Mohanraj and Others v. Shah Brothers Ispat Private Limited, 2021:INSC:133, (2021) 6 SCC 258. The High Court quoted the later decision in Ajay Kumar Radheyshyam Goenka v. Tourism Finance Corporation of India Limited, 2023:INSC:232, (2023) 10 SCC 545, which had considered P. Mohanraj. The quoted passages distinguished the penal character of Section 138 proceedings from civil debt recovery. They held that resolution, dissolution or relief concerning a corporate debtor under the IBC did not, by itself, terminate the criminal liability of individual cheque signatories or directors under Sections 138 and 141 NI Act. The discussion expressly concerned the corporate moratorium under Section 14. It also referred to Aneeta Hada v. Godfather Travels & Tours (P) Ltd., (2012) 5 SCC 661, concerning continued prosecution of natural persons when the company was dissolved after proceedings had commenced, and to State of Rajasthan v. Shamsher Singh, 1985 Supp SCC 416, for the maxim that the law does not compel the impossible. The High Court applied Ajay Kumar to reject Anurodh's insolvency ground.

3. Statutes considered : Section 138 NI Act was the basis of the conviction and its penal consequences. Section 141 NI Act appeared in the Supreme Court's discussion of liability of cheque signatories and directors. In the present case, the order recorded the applicant's description of himself as guarantor and treated him as the cheque signatory. Section 389 CrPC governed the appeal-stage application for suspension of sentence and the associated deposit condition; Section 482 CrPC was invoked to challenge that condition. The applicant relied on Sections 94 and 96 of the Insolvency and Bankruptcy Code, 2016, concerning initiation of proceedings and the interim moratorium asserted from 14.10.2022. The quoted Ajay Kumar passages addressed the corporate moratorium under Section 14 IBC and subsequent corporate resolution provisions. They also referred to Sections 31 and 38–41 IBC in explaining that extinction of the debt through that process did not, by itself, extinguish criminal proceedings.

4. Issues : (i) Whether, on the ground urged, the initiation of insolvency proceedings and the asserted interim moratorium under Section 96 invalidated the conviction of the individual cheque signatory under Section 138 or barred its continuation. (ii) Whether that objection made the ₹13,73,890 deposit condition for suspension under Section 389 legally erroneous. The Court identified insolvency and the asserted bar on debt recovery as the sole ground urged against the deposit. It did not decide the separate appeal against conviction.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court identified the asserted moratorium as the sole ground urged against the appellate deposit condition. It quoted Ajay Kumar's reasoning that Section 138 proceedings are penal and do not merely recover the underlying debt, and that corporate insolvency processes do not extinguish a natural person's criminal liability as cheque signatory. Ajay Kumar had considered P. Mohanraj and rejected automatic termination of prosecution following a company's resolution or dissolution, while preserving the liability of individuals. Applying that reasoning, the High Court held that the mere initiation of insolvency proceedings did not invalidate Anurodh's conviction or make the appellate deposit condition erroneous. The applicant had invoked Section 96, whereas the quoted Ajay Kumar passages discussed Section 14. The High Court applied that reasoning on personal penal liability to reject that insolvency ground against the conviction and uphold the deposit condition for suspension of sentence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The conviction was not quashed. Criminal Appeal No. 102/2024 remained pending, and the appellate court's ₹13,73,890 deposit condition for suspension of sentence remained in force.

Headnote :- Section 156(3) CrPC — magistrate's discretion — Complaint procedure - Section 156(3) provides that the Magistrate "may" order investigation. The Court held that a Magistrate need not send every complaint alleging a cognizable offence to the police for registration of an FIR. After examining the allegations, the Magistrate may proceed under Sections 190, 200 and 202 CrPC, record the complainant's evidence and, if police assistance is later needed, order an inquiry under Section 202. Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, relied on by the applicant, concerned the police's duty upon receiving information disclosing a cognizable offence. Jayant v. State of M.P., (2021) 2 SCC 670, and Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, recognised the Magistrate's power to order investigation without deciding that it must invariably be exercised. The Court affirmed the JMFC's decision to follow the complaint procedure.

Section 156(3) rejection — superior-court challenge — hearing prospective accused - Persons named as accused in a complaint have no right to participate before summons merely because they have been named. The Court distinguished that position from their right to be heard when the complainant challenges rejection of a Section 156(3) request. It considered Manharibhai Muljibhai Kakadia v. Shaileshbhai Mohanbhai Patel, (2012) 10 SCC 517, concerning a hearing in superior-court revision against dismissal of a complaint, and Atul Pandey v. State of U.P. (Allahabad High Court, 08.01.2021), concerning the non-interlocutory and revisable character of Section 156(3) rejection and the hearing required in that revision. The failure to implead the persons named in the complaint in this Section 482 application was a further ground for refusing interference.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The applicant alleged that certain persons had sexually assaulted or humiliated her and that the police had not registered an FIR despite her repeated approaches. She applied to the JMFC, Gwalior, under Section 156(3) CrPC for police registration and investigation. By order dated 27.11.2021, the Magistrate rejected that request and directed her to examine her witnesses under Sections 200 and 202. She then filed M.Cr.C. No. 63392/2021 under Section 482 CrPC, seeking to set aside the order and obtain registration of an FIR against the named persons. She also sought investigation by an independent senior police authority uninfluenced by the earlier police reports. Counsel argued that an allegation disclosing a cognizable sexual offence required registration and that the Magistrate should have exercised the Section 156(3) power. The persons accused in the complaint were not impleaded before the High Court. The Court considered the choice of procedure and their hearing rights, without deciding whether the allegations were true.

2. Precedents — Considered : Counsel relied on Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, for the police duty to register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence. The Court distinguished that duty from the question whether a Magistrate must invariably order investigation under Section 156(3). The applicant also cited Jayant v. State of M.P., (2021) 2 SCC 670, and Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409. The Court explained that these decisions recognise the Magistrate's power to direct investigation, but do not decide that its exercise is compulsory. It relied on Manharibhai Muljibhai Kakadia v. Shaileshbhai Mohanbhai Patel, (2012) 10 SCC 517, concerning the right of a prospective accused to be heard in a superior-court revision against dismissal of a complaint. It also considered Atul Pandey alias Param Pragyan Pandey v. State of U.P. (Allahabad High Court, order dated 08.01.2021), which reproduced a Full Bench conclusion that rejection of a Section 156(3) request is not interlocutory and is revisable under Section 397, and that the prospective accused is entitled to a hearing in that revision. The Court applied the hearing concern to the persons not impleaded here, while affirming the Magistrate's choice of procedure.

3. Statutes considered : Section 156(3) CrPC empowers a Magistrate authorised under Section 190 to order police investigation; the word "may" was central to the Court's reasoning. Section 190 concerns cognizance upon a complaint, police report or other information. Sections 200 and 202 govern examination and inquiry when the Magistrate follows the complaint procedure. The Court noted that, after witnesses were examined, the Magistrate could still seek police assistance for an inquiry under Section 202. Section 397 CrPC appeared in the cited Allahabad decision as the revisional remedy against a non-interlocutory order rejecting Section 156(3) relief. Section 482 CrPC was the jurisdiction invoked in the present application. The Court decided the procedural challenge without determining the truth of the alleged sexual assault.

4. Issues : Whether the Magistrate's refusal to order police registration and investigation was legally erroneous merely because the Section 156(3) power was available; whether the Magistrate could instead proceed under Sections 200 and 202 and seek police inquiry later if needed; and whether the complainant's superior-court challenge could result in an adverse order without joining or hearing the persons named as suspected accused. The truth of the allegations and whether process should ultimately issue were not decided.

5. Ratio / Findings : Reading Section 156(3) with Section 190, the Court held that the word "may" leaves the Magistrate to decide the appropriate course on the allegations. If police investigation is necessary, the Magistrate may order it. Alternatively, the Magistrate may proceed with the complaint and record evidence under Sections 200 and 202. That choice does not prevent later police assistance for an inquiry under Section 202. The Supreme Court decisions cited by the applicant did not make an FIR direction compulsory in every case. Separately, the Court distinguished the absence of a right to participate in the original complaint before summons from the prospective accused's right to be heard when a superior court is asked to disturb rejection of the investigation request in their favour. The persons named in the complaint had not been made respondents. For these reasons, the Court found no ground to interfere with the JMFC's order. The Court neither prejudged the allegations nor prevented their examination through the complaint procedure.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application and affirmed the order dated 27.11.2021 passed by the JMFC, Gwalior. It directed neither registration of an FIR nor a separate investigation. The complaint remained before the Magistrate for the procedure under Sections 200 and 202 already ordered, without any finding on guilt or the eventual outcome.

Anusha Deepak Tyagi v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 63392/2021, 06/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty — married relatives living separately — particularised role - The allegation that two married relatives mentally harassed the wife about dowry during occasional visits did not explain when or how either applicant had acted. Their residence in Ludhiana and Shivpuri was undisputed. Applying Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, the Court cautioned against indiscriminate implication of relatives. Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, requires tangible material identifying a distant relative's role, while distinguishing the husband and close household members. Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan (cited as 2013 (1) UC 155) illustrates quashing of vague allegations against relatives, including a married sister-in-law, where no specific role was alleged and their residence with the complainant was unclear. K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana, (2018) 14 SCC 452, likewise requires specific instances of involvement rather than omnibus allegations. The Court applied these principles to the two applicants; the FIR separately attributed a demand and physical assault to the husband.

Section 482 CrPC — individualised accusation and partial quashing - Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, requires careful scrutiny of allegations against relatives living elsewhere. Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, requires particulars of each accused's acts, rather than merely naming statutory provisions; Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, distinguishes casual naming from active involvement. The complainant's Section 161 statement supplied no individual act or timing against the applicants. Finding that the allegations did not state when or how they had committed mental cruelty, the Court quashed the FIR, charge-sheet and trial only against them. The proceedings against others were outside the scope of that relief.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant alleged that she married Gyanendra Singh Tomar on 11.12.2019 and that her father gave cash, a vehicle and household articles. She stated that her husband and his parents began taunting and harassing her about inadequate dowry soon after the marriage. She also alleged that Aradhana alias Ashdeep Kaur and Swati, two married relatives of the husband, mentally harassed her about dowry whenever they visited the matrimonial home. She had been living at her parental home for about a year. According to the FIR, on 16.01.2024 the husband came there, demanded ₹2 lakh and a gold chain before he would consider taking her back, and slapped and pushed her, causing injuries. She informed her family of the incident, and the FIR was lodged on 24.02.2024. Crime No. 54/2024 was registered at Police Station Lahar, District Bhind. A charge-sheet under Sections 498-A and 323 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act led to RCT No. 367/2024 before the JMFC. Only Aradhana and Swati sought quashing under Section 482. Their counsel described the allegations as omnibus. The State and complainant opposed the application, but did not dispute that the married applicants lived in Ludhiana and Shivpuri and visited only occasionally.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, cautions against implicating every relative through conjecture in a dowry case. In the conviction context, it required proper proof of overt acts by persons other than the husband. The Court applied that warning against indiscriminate family implication at the present quashing stage, without treating the trial burden as a final finding here. Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, reaffirmed that caution and required tangible material concerning a distant relative's role. It recognised that allegations against the husband and parents stand differently and that genuine harassment must not be assessed unrealistically. Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, cited as 2013 (1) UC 155, quashed general allegations against relatives, including a married sister-in-law, where no specific role was alleged and it was unclear whether they had lived with the complainant. The Court considered their residence and the circumstances of the complaint. The Court used that factual analogy without adopting a categorical rule. K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana, (2018) 14 SCC 452, requires specific instances of involvement rather than bare allegations of support or conspiracy against relatives, while recognising that interference with ongoing proceedings is exceptional. Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, calls for care in examining allegations against distant or rarely visiting relatives and recognises the harm caused by needless criminal proceedings. Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, requires particulars of each accused's conduct; statutory section numbers and vague collective allegations do not suffice. Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, distinguishes casual reference to family names from allegations of active involvement. Considering these authorities together, the Court found the alleged acts of the two applicants insufficiently particularised. It did not decide the liability of the husband or other in-laws. The Monju Roy quotation included Raja Lal Singh v. State of Jharkhand and Kamesh Panjiyar v. State of Bihar; the K. Subba Rao quotation referred to Bhajan Lal, Kans Raj and Kailash Chandra Agrawal; and the Geeta Mehrotra quotation included G.V. Rao v. L.H.V. Prasad.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC provided the inherent jurisdiction invoked for quashing. Sections 498-A and 323 IPC and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the charged provisions. The question was whether the FIR and charge-sheet attributed sufficiently specific conduct to these two applicants, rather than whether every ingredient of an offence had been finally proved at trial. The Court also compared the complainant's statement under Section 161 CrPC with the FIR. It did not decide the sufficiency of the separate assault allegation against the husband or the outcome of the remaining prosecution.

4. Issues : Whether the allegation that the two married relatives, who lived separately, mentally harassed the complainant about dowry during occasional visits justified continuing their prosecution without particulars of dates, acts, manner or each applicant's role; whether the Section 161 statement supplied those particulars; and whether proceedings could be quashed only against them without deciding the different allegations against the husband and other relatives. The Court did not decide whether the account of the husband's conduct on 16.01.2024 was true.

5. Ratio / Findings : The FIR separately alleged that the husband demanded money and a gold chain and physically assaulted the complainant. The Court examined the allegations against Aradhana and Swati, who alone sought quashing. Neither the FIR nor the corresponding Section 161 statement explained when or how either applicant had subjected the complainant to mental cruelty, or identified each applicant's acts. Their separate residence and occasional visits made the lack of particulars material. The Supreme Court authorities required careful assessment of each person's alleged role, so that criminal proceedings did not rest merely on a family relationship, while allowing genuine allegations supported by specific material to proceed. The Court found no justification for continuing the charge-sheet and trial against these two applicants on the allegations as pleaded. It confined quashing to them, without adjudicating disputed evidence or exonerating persons who had not applied.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Section 482 application and quashed Crime No. 54/2024, the charge-sheet and RCT No. 367/2024 before the JMFC, Lahar, only against Aradhana alias Ashdeep Kaur and Swati. The order did not quash proceedings against the husband or other persons, or determine their guilt or innocence.

Aradhana and Others v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 13586/2024, 19/02/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Merg inquiry — prayer for FIR — Article 226 alternate remedy - A request for fair completion of a Section 174 CrPC inquiry and registration of an FIR does not warrant a writ directing registration merely because the informant is dissatisfied with police action. The Court applied Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, which distinguishes the police duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence from the aggrieved person's remedy under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (20.12.2016), permits refusal of mandamus where the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The police registration duty stated in Lalita Kumari does not determine entitlement to a writ. The petitioner remained free to apply to the Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202.

Fair investigation — exceptional writ oversight and magistrate's power - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, permits exceptional directions under Article 226 where mala fide abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with the Code are clearly established. Even then, the Court cannot prescribe how the police must investigate. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, explain the recourse to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and the Magistrate's power under Section 156(3), on prima facie satisfaction, to require registration of an FIR or proper investigation and monitor it. The Court dismissed the petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Archana Chaurasiya filed a writ petition under Article 226 seeking a direction to the authorities to conduct and complete a merg inquiry under Section 174 CrPC fairly within a specified time and register an FIR on its basis. The High Court considered the procedure for obtaining the requested FIR and inquiry relief. It did not decide the circumstances of the death or criminal liability. The question was whether a person dissatisfied with police action could seek a High Court direction to register an FIR or should approach the concerned Magistrate. The Court examined the distinction between the statutory police duty and the procedure and forum for redress. It dismissed the writ petition with liberty to pursue the statutory remedies.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court quoted Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, which distinguishes the police duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence from the aggrieved person's remedy of a complaint to the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200. That decision reconciles earlier authorities by distinguishing those on the police duty from those on the procedure for redress. The present Court followed the latter procedure. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for rare intervention under Article 226 where mala fide investigation and non-compliance with Chapter XII are clearly established. Such intervention may require compliance with lawful procedure, but cannot prescribe investigative methods. Its discussion of Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre explains the private-complaint remedy. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, provides for an approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), followed by a Section 156(3) application to the Magistrate if an FIR is not registered or the investigation is not proper. The Magistrate may direct and monitor proper investigation. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reiterates that procedure, subject to the Magistrate's prima facie satisfaction. It permits a recommendation for a different investigating officer where necessary, while making clear that the Magistrate cannot investigate personally. The Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (20.12.2016), applied the alternative-remedy rule to a prayer for mandamus directing FIR registration, subject to the established exceptions. It distinguished the police registration duty stated in Lalita Kumari from entitlement to a writ. Applying these authorities, the present Court dismissed the writ concerning the merg inquiry with liberty to pursue the stated Magistrate remedies.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided the jurisdiction invoked for mandamus. The prayer concerned fair completion of the merg inquiry under Section 174 CrPC within a specified time. Section 154 CrPC concerns recording information about a cognizable offence, and subsection (3) provides recourse to the Superintendent of Police. Section 156(3) empowers the Magistrate to order investigation. Sections 190, 200 and 202 govern cognizance on a complaint, examination and inquiry. Chapter XII appeared in Divine Retreat Centre's discussion of the limits on abuse of investigative power. The Court left the grievance to the Magistrate's statutory procedure without determining an offence or ordering registration of an FIR on the merits.

4. Issues : Whether dissatisfaction with the merg inquiry and a request for registration of an FIR justified a direct mandamus under Article 226, or whether the petitioner should pursue the statutory remedies before the police authorities and Magistrate. The quoted passages from Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria qualified the ordinary remedy rule by recognising exceptional circumstances for intervention. The Court did not decide the circumstances of the death or the criminal liability of any proposed accused.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court applied the distinction in Aleque Padamsee between the police duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence and the procedure for obtaining redress when that duty is not performed. The ordinary first recourse lies in the CrPC remedies. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe explain that, on prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate can require registration and proper investigation. The requested investigation relief therefore did not require immediate High Court supervision. Divine Retreat Centre permits rare writ intervention for clearly established mala fides and statutory abuse, while denying a general power to prescribe how the police must investigate. The binding Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria governed the Article 226 maintainability question, subject to the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The Court dismissed the petition and left the petitioner free to approach the Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202. This was a procedural disposal, without a finding that no offence had occurred.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition, expressly leaving the petitioner free, if she wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC. It neither directed registration of an FIR nor fixed a deadline for the merg inquiry. It appointed no investigator and made no finding on the criminal allegations.

Headnote :- POCSO — minor consent — compromise - Subsequent marriage and settlement could not, by themselves, justify quashing under Section 482 where the FIR alleged sexual relations with a girl aged about 17 and the accused faced trial under Sections 3/4 POCSO and Section 376 IPC. Applying Narinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 6 SCC 466, and Gian Singh v. State of Punjab, (2012) 10 SCC 303, the Court held that the charged sexual offence against a child under the special statute could not be treated as a private dispute resolved by compromise. Under IPC Section 375 Sixthly, consent is immaterial where the girl is below 18. Her later assent could not indirectly defeat that statutory protection. Age, commission of the charged act and guilt remained for trial.

Rape — settlement and marriage — public interest - State of M.P. v. Madanlal, (2015) 7 SCC 681, and Shimbhu v. State of Haryana, (2014) 13 SCC 318, rejected compromise or an offer of marriage as a reason for leniency in rape cases. Madanlal confined the contrary sentencing outcomes in Baldev Singh and Ravindra to their particular facts. Parbatbhai Aahir v. State of Gujarat, (2017) 9 SCC 641, distinguished grave sexual offences from disputes of a predominantly civil nature. State of M.P. v. Laxmi Narayan, (2019) 5 SCC 688, rejected mechanical quashing of serious offences on compromise. The Court refused to infer from the applicant's later marriage that the rape charge had ceased to exist or that conviction was impossible.

Precedent — coordinate bench — per incuriam - The Court declined to follow Pankaj Parmar v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. No. 6904/2019, which had quashed rape/POCSO proceedings after settlement. That order had not considered Madanlal, Laxmi Narayan and Shimbhu, the Delhi High Court's Vikash Kumar @ Sonu order and the Supreme Court order reported in that quotation. It had also overlooked IPC Section 375 Sixthly and POCSO's protective purpose in the light of Gian Singh and Narinder Singh. The Court held that these omissions rendered the coordinate-bench order per incuriam on the question before it.

Evidence — hostile prosecutrix — remaining proof - Applying Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi v. State of Gujarat, Criminal Appeal No. 913/2016, decided 28.09.2018, the Court rejected the argument that compromise and the prosecutrix's possible failure to support the prosecution necessarily meant acquittal. Independent scientific and circumstantial evidence may still establish the offence. Hemudan's discussion of expert reports and prejudice under Section 313 concerned the evidence in that case. The High Court did not finally assess any such evidence in this pending trial.

Quashing — settlement timing — trial stage - Narinder Singh, (2014) 6 SCC 466, requires the Court to consider whether settlement occurred before evidence began, at an advanced stage of trial or after conviction. The applicant had faced trial since 2017, but had not disclosed whether the prosecutrix had been examined or what she had said. The absence of that information was an additional ground for refusing relief under Section 482. The petition was dismissed without a finding on guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arif Khan applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime No. 656/2017 registered at Bahodapur Police Station, Gwalior, and Sessions Trial No. 221/2017 pending before the Tenth Additional Sessions Judge. The FIR dated 05.10.2017 alleged that the complainant was about 17, that Arif had developed a relationship with her through visits to her family and promises of marriage, and that sexual relations had begun about six months earlier. It alleged that, after an encounter on 03.10.2017, he refused to marry her. The police filed a charge sheet under Section 376 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Protection of Children from Sexual Offences Act, 2012. Arif submitted that elders had helped the parties settle during the trial, that he married her on 13.04.2019 and that they were living together peacefully. He filed a Nikahnama and argued that she no longer wanted the prosecution to continue. He contended that the High Court could quash a non-compoundable case on settlement and that conviction was now unlikely. He relied on Supreme Court decisions on settlement and the coordinate-bench order in Pankaj Parmar quashing alleged rape/POCSO proceedings. The State argued that Pankaj Parmar had overlooked controlling Supreme Court law. The complainant was represented by counsel. The order records no clear statement of whether she had testified or the stage reached in the trial. The Court considered the allegations and claimed later marriage for the quashing request, without deciding them as a trial court.

2. Precedents — Considered : Gian Singh v. State of Punjab, (2012) 10 SCC 303, and Narinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 6 SCC 466, were relied on to distinguish compounding under Section 320 from the cautious exercise of Section 482 after settlement. The Court quoted Narinder Singh's principles that heinous offences such as rape and serious offences under special statutes are not ordinarily private disputes. Cases of a predominantly civil, family or commercial nature stand differently. The prospect of conviction and, separately, the timing of settlement and progress of the trial are material considerations. The Court applied those distinctions in refusing to quash this trial for an alleged sexual offence against a child; it did not impose a blanket prohibition on quashing every non-compoundable case. Monu @ Ranu Kushwah v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. No. 11891/2016, was quoted to explain that Narinder Singh's example of a special statute was illustrative and not confined to corruption cases. Monu's holding under the SC/ST Act supplied an analogy for POCSO, without deciding any offence under that Act here.

The Court adopted State of M.P. v. Madanlal, (2015) 7 SCC 681, on the impropriety of treating compromise, mediation or proposed marriage as a reason for leniency in rape cases. The quotation referred to Shyam Narain v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2013) 7 SCC 77, on dignity, and to Shimbhu v. State of Haryana, (2014) 13 SCC 318. Shimbhu confined the sentence reduction in Baldev Singh v. State of Punjab, (2011) 13 SCC 705, to that case. Madanlal likewise confined both Baldev Singh and Ravindra v. State of M.P., (2015) 4 SCC 491, to their particular facts, rather than treating them as binding precedents on compromise. The High Court applied Madanlal in rejecting Arif's marriage argument; it did not sentence him. State of M.P. v. Laxmi Narayan, (2019) 5 SCC 688, criticised mechanical quashing under Section 482 of a serious Section 307 prosecution on settlement without examining the nature and gravity of the offence and its social impact. The High Court treated that reasoning as reinforcing the need for careful scrutiny here. The Laxmi Narayan quotation referred to Shiji v. Radhika, (2011) 10 SCC 705, on which the earlier High Court had relied, and State of Maharashtra v. Vikram Anantrai Doshi, (2014) 15 SCC 29, on examining the allegations, settlement and social impact. Parbatbhai Aahir v. State of Gujarat, (2017) 9 SCC 641, supplied the general principles governing inherent powers, their distinction from compounding and the public-interest limit concerning heinous offences. The separately quoted Shimbhu passage explained that compromise in a rape case cannot justify a lesser punishment because the victim may have been pressured to settle. The High Court used that reasoning against quashing, without deciding punishment.

The Court held the coordinate-bench order in Pankaj Parmar v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. No. 6904/2019, per incuriam because it had not considered the controlling decisions, Section 375 Sixthly or POCSO's special protection. It also considered the Delhi High Court decision in Vikash Kumar @ Sonu v. State, Crl.M.C. No. 2763/2017, refusing to quash rape proceedings despite a claimed marriage. That quotation reported dismissal on 08.02.2016 of the SLP against the separate Delhi order in Crl.M.C. No. 1824/2015. It treated Manteshwar Hanumantrao Kattimani and Jaya D. Ovhal as non-binding precedents and distinguished Deepak Gulati as an appeal against conviction in which the accused was acquitted on benefit of doubt. Hemudan Nanbha Gadhvi v. State of Gujarat, Criminal Appeal No. 913/2016, decided 28.09.2018, was quoted to reject the prediction that a hostile prosecutrix necessarily meant acquittal: independent medical, serological and circumstantial evidence may remain. Its discussion of Iqbal v. State of U.P., (2015) 6 SCC 623, on test-identification evidence and Nar Singh v. State of Haryana, (2015) 1 SCC 496, on prejudice under Section 313 concerned the evidence and circumstances in Hemudan. It did not concern proof examined in Arif's pending trial.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC provided the inherent-power jurisdiction invoked, which was distinguished from compounding under Section 320 CrPC. The pending charges were under Section 376 IPC and Sections 3 and 4 POCSO Act. IPC Section 375 Sixthly makes a girl's consent immaterial to rape where she is under 18. The Court applied that protective principle to the alleged 17-year-old and the request to quash POCSO proceedings on settlement, without finally determining age or guilt. The 2019 POCSO amendment bill was mentioned in discussing the protective legislative purpose; no amended punishment was imposed. The Monu quotation referred to the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989, and Article 17 as the context for its special-statute holding. The Prevention of Corruption Act appeared as Narinder Singh's illustrative example. The Madanlal/Shimbhu quotations discussed the former proviso to Section 376(2) IPC and its deletion by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 2013, in their sentencing context. Evidence Act Section 45 and CrPC Section 313 appeared within the quoted Hemudan decision. The High Court made no independent ruling on the exhibits or examination of the accused in this trial.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the later Nikahnama, relationship and compromise justified quashing the pending Sections 3/4 POCSO charge when the complainant was allegedly under 18 at the relevant time. (ii) Whether those events justified quashing the connected Section 376 IPC trial as a private settlement or on the assumption that conviction was unlikely. (iii) Whether the coordinate-bench order in Pankaj Parmar should govern despite its failure to consider higher-court decisions and the rule concerning a minor's consent. (iv) Whether the predicted hostility of the prosecutrix necessarily excluded other proof, and whether the omission to disclose the stage of trial was material. The Court was not determining the complainant's precise age, the truth of the charged sexual acts or the final trial evidence.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the POCSO charge, the Court applied the limits concerning serious offences under special statutes and public interest stated in Gian Singh and Narinder Singh, as explained in Monu. A private settlement could not negate the alleged sexual offence against a child. If the complainant was below 18, Section 375 Sixthly made her consent immaterial. Her later assent or marriage could not indirectly bypass that statutory protection. The Court refused to quash the Section 3/4 prosecution.

For the rape charge, Madanlal and Shimbhu treated the offence as affecting both individual dignity and society and rejected marriage as a basis for leniency. Parbatbhai and Narinder Singh distinguished heinous offences from genuinely private disputes. Laxmi Narayan required consideration of gravity and social impact, rather than an assumption that settlement made the trial futile. The Court refused to treat the Nikahnama as erasing the allegation made in 2017. Pankaj Parmar had granted quashing without considering controlling Supreme Court principles, POCSO's special purpose or the rule concerning a minor's consent. The Court expressly held it per incuriam. The later marriage did not, by itself, determine the trial evidence. Hemudan showed that hostile testimony from the victim need not end a case where independent proof exists; the High Court did not find that such proof had already been established here. Narinder also required attention to the stage of the proceedings: a case under investigation or at the beginning of evidence differs from one nearly concluded. The applicant had not even stated whether the prosecutrix had testified in his trial, pending since 2017. That omission was a separate ground for refusing discretionary quashing. These findings concerned the Section 482 request and did not decide conviction or sentence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 petition. Crime No. 656/2017 and Sessions Trial No. 221/2017 under Section 376 IPC and Sections 3/4 POCSO Act were not quashed. The case remained for proof before the competent trial court. The High Court made no determination of guilt and imposed no sentence, costs or special direction.

Headnote :- Section 311 CrPC — recall of forensic scientists — relevance to collection and custody questions - The accused sought recall of two DNA laboratory scientists to question them about collection of a blood sample, its safe custody and transport. The Court rejected that request because the scientists had not performed those functions. Satbir Singh v. State of Haryana (Supreme Court, 29.08.2023, SLP (Crl.) No. 1258/2022), drawing on Manju Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2019) 6 SCC 203, and Swapan Kumar Chatterjee v. CBI, (2019) 14 SCC 328, explains the discretionary power under Section 311 and the mandatory duty to summon or recall a witness whose evidence is essential to a just decision. The power requires strong reasons and consideration of prejudice, delay and abuse. Satbir Singh also cited Harendra Rai v. State of Bihar for the essentiality test. Counsel's assertion that the FSL result was negative while the DNA result was positive did not connect these scientists with handling of the sample before it reached the laboratory. The Court affirmed the trial court's refusal without deciding the reports' reliability or the accused's guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arjun Thapa faced trial in Sessions Case No. 37/2021 under Section 376(2) IPC and Sections 3–4 POCSO Act. He applied under Section 311 read with Section 243 CrPC to call Dr. D.K. Pandey and Dr. Kamlesh Kaitholia of the Regional Forensic Science Laboratory, Bhopal, for cross-examination. The application, reproduced in the order, referred to an FSL report of 2015 and a DNA report produced before the court in 2023. It sought clarification of possible errors in collecting, preserving and transporting the samples. Counsel also submitted that the FSL report was negative whereas the DNA report was positive. On 28.02.2024, the trial court rejected the request because the proposed scientists had not collected, stored or transported the blood sample. The applicant challenged that refusal under Section 482. The State submitted that the scientists could answer questions about laboratory testing, but not about handling of the sample before it reached the laboratory. The High Court examined the questions proposed in the application in relation to the witnesses' actual role.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant cited Satbir Singh v. State of Haryana (Supreme Court, decision dated 29.08.2023 in SLP (Crl.) No. 1258/2022), which the Court applied as the governing framework under Section 311. The quoted passage draws on Manju Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2019) 6 SCC 203, on clearing ambiguity in the evidence without causing prejudice, and Swapan Kumar Chatterjee v. CBI, (2019) 14 SCC 328, on the distinction between discretionary summoning or recall and the mandatory duty where evidence is essential to a just decision. It also cautions against belated or repeated recall. Harendra Rai v. State of Bihar is cited for the essentiality test. The High Court did not read Satbir Singh as requiring recall whenever expert testimony was requested. It considered whether the named scientists could answer the particular questions about collection and custody and concluded that they could not. The request failed because the scientists had no connection with collection, safe custody or transport of the sample. The Court did not decide whether either scientific report was correct.

3. Statutes considered : Section 311 CrPC empowers the court to summon, examine and recall witnesses, and requires it to summon or recall a witness whose evidence appears essential to a just decision. The need for the proposed evidence and whether these witnesses could address the questions were decisive here. Section 243 CrPC appeared with Section 311 in the accused's application for the two scientists' attendance. Section 482 CrPC was invoked to challenge the interlocutory refusal; the High Court found no jurisdictional error. Section 376(2) IPC and Sections 3–4 POCSO Act were the pending charges, without any decision on their merits. The ruling concerned the proposed questions and the scientists' role, leaving the reports' ultimate evidentiary weight for trial.

4. Issues : Whether recall was essential to a just decision when the accused sought to question the named laboratory scientists about collection, custody and transport of the sample in order to examine the asserted contrast between a negative FSL report and a positive DNA report; whether the scientists had any role in those steps before testing; and whether refusal under Section 311 warranted interference under Section 482. The truth of the sexual-offence allegations and the reports' ultimate evidentiary weight were not being decided.

5. Ratio / Findings : Reading the application itself, the Court found that the proposed questions concerned collection, safe storage and transport of the sample. Under the framework in Satbir Singh, the court must summon or recall a witness whose evidence appears essential to a just decision, while the discretionary power requires strong and valid reasons. The Court applied that test to the purpose for which these scientists were sought. They were responsible for the procedures adopted in the laboratory and had no role in the earlier handling stages under challenge. Their examination for that purpose was therefore unnecessary, despite counsel's assertion that the reports differed. The trial court's refusal rested on that specific lack of relevance and involved no jurisdictional error. The High Court did not determine whether the samples had been mishandled or whether the FSL or DNA report was reliable.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The order dated 28.02.2024 passed by the 14th Additional Sessions Judge, Bhopal, refusing the stated Section 311 recall request remained in force. The criminal trial continued without a finding on guilt or the final evidentiary value of the scientific reports.

Headnote :- Municipal colony — Rule 3 coloniser registration — agricultural labels - Rule 3 of the M.P. Nagar Palika (Registration of Coloniser Terms and Conditions) Rules, 1998 requires registration where land is developed into plots for transfer for habitation. Purchasers described plots of a size suitable for residential use. They said they had been promised road lights, a park and a temple. The applicant did not claim registration as a coloniser, and the land had not been diverted. The Court held that describing the land as agricultural in registered sale deeds did not, at the charge stage, displace the allegation of residential colony development or the prima facie offence under Section 339-C M.P. Municipalities Act.

Cheating — plot representations — intent at inception - Section 420 IPC requires a deceitful intention at the outset; later non-performance alone is insufficient. The alleged assurances that diversion and registration were complete and that amenities would be developed, considered with the alleged absence of registration and diversion, supplied prima facie material for a cheating charge. The Court did not finally determine intent or evasion of stamp duty.

Charge framing — grave suspicion founded on material - M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. CBI, (2020) 2 SCC 768, requires judicial sifting of the prosecution record to distinguish mere suspicion from grave suspicion. It does not permit a roving inquiry into the merits or reliance on a defence case outside that record. Soma Chakravarty v. State, (2007) 5 SCC 403, requires material supporting a prima facie possibility of the offence; suspicion alone is insufficient. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, (2020) 2 SCC 290, and State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, (2017) 3 SCC 198, likewise distinguish the material required for a charge from final proof of guilt. Applying these tests, the High Court upheld both charges and left their proof for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arun Nayak challenged the order dated 12.10.2021 passed by the JMFC, Niwari, framing charges under Section 420 IPC and Section 339-C M.P. Municipalities Act, 1961, and the Sessions Court's order dated 14.03.2022 dismissing his revision. A complaint and purchasers' statements alleged that he had divided several khasra lands into small plots of roughly 1,000–3,100 square feet and sold them by registered deeds describing them as agricultural land. The purchasers said he represented that diversion and registration were complete and promised road lights and space for a park and temple. They alleged that none of those amenities materialised. The State's case was that he was developing a colony without municipal registration, diversion or an approved map, with a possible loss of stamp duty. Counsel argued that the sale deeds did not mention residential use or prior diversion. The charge-sheet copy supplied to the High Court was incomplete. It contained witness statements and a seizure memo, but omitted documents listed in the index, including the seized sale deeds. The Court considered whether the available allegations and material justified framing charges, without deciding land title or ultimate guilt.

2. Precedents — Considered : M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. CBI, Bengaluru, (2020) 2 SCC 768, was quoted for the charge and discharge principles drawn from P. Vijayan. The judge must sift the prosecution record to distinguish mere suspicion from grave suspicion and must not act as a rubber stamp. Basic infirmities may be considered, but the court cannot conduct a roving inquiry, assess probative value as at trial or rely on documents newly produced by the accused. The quotation also discussed State of J&K v. Sudershan Chakkar, (1995) 4 SCC 181, on consideration of the defence at discharge, and State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, (2005) 1 SCC 568, on confining the charge-stage record to prosecution material. Soma Chakravarty v. State through CBI, (2007) 5 SCC 403, was applied for the requirement of material supporting a prima facie possibility of the offence, with separate attention to each accused. Proof beyond reasonable doubt is reserved for conviction. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, (2020) 2 SCC 290, explained the limited sifting and weighing permitted, the assessment of alleged ingredients at face value and the need for strong suspicion founded on material. It discussed Ramesh Singh and Dipakbhai in explaining why that assessment must not become a mini-trial. State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, (2017) 3 SCC 198, was quoted for restraint when revising a charge order and against applying the final-guilt standard at that stage. The Court applied these principles to the purchasers' accounts, residential plotting, absence of diversion and the applicant's failure to claim coloniser registration. It found sufficient prima facie material for the charges under Sections 420 IPC and 339-C municipal law.

3. Statutes considered : Rule 3(1) of the M.P. Nagar Palika (Registration of Coloniser Terms and Conditions) Rules, 1998 requires a person who intends to develop land into plots and transfer them for residential, non-residential or joint habitation to apply for registration in Form One. The Court reproduced the further provisions of Rule 3 governing applications and registration, but the decisive question was whether registration was required. Section 339-C(2) of the M.P. Municipalities Act supplied the basis for the municipal charge found prima facie justified. Section 420 IPC concerns cheating and dishonest inducement to deliver property. The Court distinguished deceit at inception from a mere failure to keep a promise. The prosecution also referred to diversion under revenue law and stamp duty, without any final determination of a separate diversion or stamp offence. Section 482 CrPC was invoked after dismissal of the criminal revision against the charges. Sections 227–228 and 397 CrPC appeared in the cited Supreme Court decisions as the contexts for framing charges and reviewing them.

4. Issues : Whether Rule 3 required coloniser registration where small plots were allegedly marketed for residential construction despite their description as agricultural land in the sale deeds; whether the purchasers' accounts of assurances about completed diversion and registration and promised amenities supported a prima facie allegation of deceitful intent under Section 420 or merely showed non-performance; and whether the record met the strong-suspicion threshold for the charges under Sections 420 IPC and 339-C municipal law after revision. The Court did not determine the exact stamp duty, the full terms of the registered deeds or the truth of every purchaser's statement.

5. Ratio / Findings : From the plot sizes and the purchasers' stated purpose, the Court concluded that the very small parcels could not plausibly have been offered for agriculture on the record before it. Development of the colony for habitation therefore required registration under Rule 3, which the applicant had not claimed to hold. The Court noted the absence of diversion and the purchasers' accounts of assurances about registration, road lights and communal space. Section 420 requires dishonest intention at the outset, rather than mere failure to perform a promise. The alleged representations, considered with the apparent absence of the required registration and diversion, nevertheless supplied prima facie material for trying the cheating allegation. The agricultural descriptions in the deeds and the incomplete document bundle did not require discharge at that stage. Applying the Supreme Court's grave-suspicion test, the Court held that judicial sifting was necessary and suspicion must rest on material, but ultimate prospects of conviction and disputed defence evidence could not be tried at the charge stage. It found sufficient material for both charges. Its passing observation about possible evasion of stamp duty was neither a conviction nor a decision on a separate charge.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The JMFC's charges under Section 420 IPC and Section 339-C M.P. Municipalities Act, and the order dismissing the revision, remained undisturbed. The accused retained his defences at trial. The Court did not finally determine guilt, civil title or revenue liability. Arun Nayak v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, M.Cr.C. no. 48402/2022, 18/03/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Privacy and dignity — suspect publicity — Article 21 - The Court held that an executive circular issued by the DGP could not authorise the police to disclose suspects' identities or photographs in print or digital media, produce suspects and victims before the media, or parade suspects in public. Suspicion, even where a person has criminal antecedents, does not extinguish reputation, dignity or privacy. Clauses 6B, 8 and 11 of the circular dated 2 January 2014 were quashed to the extent that they authorised disclosure and presentation before the media. Information about the progress of an investigation could be shared only with the district SP's approval. Puttaswamy, Mehmood Nayyar Azam and related Supreme Court authorities informed the Court's analysis.

Custody — mistaken identity — formal arrest safeguards - The police admitted taking an innocent namesake of a wanted person into custody without formally arresting him, and then publishing his uncovered photograph. The safeguards in D.K. Basu apply to detention as well as arrest. The Court found that the custody was illegal and that publication violated the petitioner's privacy, dignity and reputation. It directed a separate contempt show-cause proceeding against two officers; it did not finally decide contempt.

Public-law compensation — Article 226 - Anita Thakur, Bhim Singh and Sube Singh recognise a constitutional monetary remedy against the State for patent police misconduct, alongside remedies in tort and criminal law. The Court recognised that principle and found illegal detention. It nevertheless deferred the petitioner's compensation claim and consideration of the shop-eviction incident of 25 July 2020 until the next hearing. It made no monetary award.

Witness protection — police compliance - The DGP was directed to prohibit disclosure of identities and public parades, and to issue instructions protecting witnesses and ensuring their prompt attendance in court. The implementing circulars were to be filed within 15 days. The State was directed to implement the Witness Protection Scheme, 2018.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In W.P. No. 13057 of 2020, tenant Arun Sharma alleged that, after his landlady complained about rent and sought his eviction, Gwalior police forcibly removed him from a shop on 25 July 2020. He alleged that they took the furniture to the police station and compelled him to undertake to vacate. On 14 August, the police took him into custody because his name resembled that of a person wanted in a 2011 case. They published his uncovered photograph in newspapers and social media, presenting him as a hardened criminal. An inquiry found that he had no criminal antecedents, and he was released. The SHO was briefly suspended. After the suspension was revoked, a fine of Rs 5,000 was imposed on him and another officer was censured. Those penalties followed receipt of the writ notices and were imposed two days before the first compliance report was filed. Departmental charges concerning the shop incident were initiated against other officers. The High Court appointed amici and framed Article 21 questions concerning police publicity, detention, privacy, misconduct and compensation. This order decided the constitutional questions concerning police publicity and detention, while adjourning consideration of individual conduct and the award of compensation.

2. Precedents — Considered : Saeed Sohail Sheikh and Delhi Judicial Service Association provided the framework for police accountability. K.S. Puttaswamy (Privacy and Aadhaar), Maneka Gandhi, Francis Coralie Mullin, Mehmood Nayyar Azam, Subramanian Swamy and related decisions were cited on privacy, dignity and reputation as facets of Article 21, and on the need for legal authority and a rational nexus for restrictions. Malak Singh concerned discreet surveillance; PUCL addressed privacy; and Ramlila Maidan addressed restrictions on fundamental rights. Mohd. Hussain and Rajoo supported the presumption of innocence despite accusation. Mahender Chawla's approval of the Witness Protection Scheme, 2018 under Articles 141/142 supplied the basis for the witness-protection direction. D.K. Basu supplied the safeguards concerning arrest and detention, including documentation and notification requirements, and the consequences of non-compliance in contempt. Anita Thakur, Bhim Singh and Sube Singh supported constitutional compensation for established police misconduct. The decisions concerning trial delay and legal aid provided context; they did not decide any criminal trial against this petitioner.

3. Statutes considered : Article 21 governed privacy, liberty, dignity and reputation; Article 226 supplied the writ and suo motu remedial powers. The DGP's circular dated 2 January 2014 purported to regulate media briefings. Clauses 6B, 8 and 11, however, permitted suspect photographs or production of suspects and victims before the media, in conflict with the circular's protective provisions. The Court quashed those clauses to that extent. Statements under Section 161 CrPC were described as investigation material, rather than substantive proof on which the police could prejudge guilt. The Court applied the arrest and detention safeguards in D.K. Basu and the Witness Protection Scheme, 2018. It did not enter a criminal conviction, determine the officers' penal liability or pass a decree for damages.

4. Issues : Whether an executive police circular could authorise publicity or media presentation of suspects and victims, or public parades of suspects, before adjudication consistently with Article 21; whether the petitioner's custody without formal arrest was permissible because he had been mistaken for a wanted namesake; what police and witness-protection directions should follow; and whether public-law compensation was available for such infringements and should be awarded to this petitioner at that stage. Whether the police had also forcibly evicted him on 25 July, and the precise culpability of individual officers, remained open.

5. Ratio / Findings : Privacy, dignity and reputation remain protected even where a person is suspected of an offence or is a known offender. Any restriction requires authority of law, must be reasonable and must have a nexus to its purpose. A DGP instruction cannot, by itself, provide that legal authority. Publicising a suspect's photograph or parading the suspect before conviction prejudges guilt without a demonstrated investigative rationale. The public's interest in knowing the progress of an investigation can be met through approved updates. The circular's conflicting permission was therefore invalidated. The State's own account established that the petitioner had been taken into custody under a mistaken identity without formal arrest. Calling the custody detention did not avoid the safeguards in D.K. Basu, and publication compounded the injury. The Court directed a separate contempt show-cause proceeding, without deciding contempt. It explained that patent police violations of Article 21 can support public-law compensation borne by the State. It deferred a monetary award pending consideration of the facts and arguments concerning the earlier eviction. Witness security and timely attendance of prosecution witnesses serve a fair and speedy trial better than public spectacle.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court quashed clauses 6B, 8 and 11 of the 2014 DGP circular to the extent that they permitted disclosure or display of suspect and victim identities and their presentation before the media. It also held public parades of suspects unconstitutional. The DGP was directed to issue instructions prohibiting those practices. Information about the progress of an investigation required the district SP's approval, and SPs were made responsible for deviations. The State was directed to implement witness protection and ensure witnesses' safety and prompt attendance in court. The circulars were to be filed with the Principal Registrar within 15 days. A separate contempt show-cause case was directed against two officers, requiring their appearance on 20 November 2020. The Court granted a week for reconsideration and further argument concerning the 25 July eviction, police conduct and compensation. It listed the writ for 9 November and required the Gwalior SP to appear by video with the record. No compensation was quantified or awarded at that stage.

Headnote :- Sexual-offence victim identity — charge-sheet disclosure — police safeguards - The police included the complainant's name in the charge-sheet. She appeared personally and stated that she had consented to its inclusion. In view of that statement and the apologies tendered, the Court declined to proceed further over the disclosure. It nevertheless directed the DGP to examine the practice and issue necessary directions within 30 days to prevent disclosure of identity. A party relied on Kerala High Court decisions concerning inadvertent disclosure by a court under Section 228A IPC. The Court quoted that material but did not recognise a general exemption for police disclosure.

Defence access — sensitive photographs and whatsapp chats — inspection - The accused sought copies of items 24 and 25 filed with the charge-sheet, arguing that material already filed could not be withheld from him. The complainant feared that the objectionable photographs might be circulated. The trial court had permitted inspection of the documents in court. In view of that permission, counsel withdrew the Section 482 petition, which was dismissed as withdrawn. The Court did not finally decide that copies must always be supplied or always be withheld.

Earlier revision — pre-charge restoration - The revision order of 10 May 2024 restored the proceedings to the pre-charge stage and left the framing of charges to the trial court. It did not discharge the accused under Section 376(2)(n) IPC or determine the applicability of Section 228A.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arun Tiwari filed a petition under Section 482 CrPC challenging the trial court's refusal to supply photographs and WhatsApp chats listed as items 24 and 25 with the final report in a sexual-offence case. The trial court had refused copies because they could reveal the prosecutrix's identity, but had permitted inspection in court. Her name had also been included in the charge-sheet. She appeared before the High Court with the front camera switched off to conceal her identity. She stated that the police had included her name with her consent. She opposed the supply of copies of the sensitive photographs because she feared their circulation. Two persons apologised for the disclosure. The accused relied on an earlier revision order, contending that it had quashed the charge under Section 376(2)(n) IPC.

2. Precedents — Considered : Counsel cited a Single Bench judgment of the Kerala High Court in WP(C) No. 40709/2023, affirmed in W.A. No. 29/2024, concerning inadvertent disclosure in judicial proceedings and Section 228A IPC. The Madhya Pradesh High Court reproduced the passage. It addressed the immediate disclosure concern in view of the complainant's statement and the apologies, without holding generally that disclosure in a police charge-sheet falls within that analysis of judicial duties. Its own order of 10 May 2024 in Cr.Rev. No. 3977/2022 had merely restored the pre-charge stage. The Court rejected counsel's contention that the earlier order had discharged the accused.

3. Statutes considered : The petition was filed under Section 482 CrPC. Section 228A IPC was raised in relation to protection of the sexual-offence complainant's identity, but the Court did not finally adjudicate an offence under that provision. Whether to frame a charge under Section 376(2)(n) IPC remained for fresh consideration by the trial court. The charge-sheet and its list of documents provided the context for the defence request for access. The order did not decide a general statutory right to copies of the objectionable photographs or chats.

4. Issues : Whether protection of the complainant's privacy justified refusing copies of the filed photographs and chats despite the defence request for access; how to address disclosure of her name in the charge-sheet; and whether the earlier revision had discharged the accused from the rape charge. The request for copies no longer required a ruling by the High Court once counsel withdrew the petition in view of the permission to inspect the documents.

5. Ratio / Findings : In view of the complainant's statement that she had consented to inclusion of her name and the apologies tendered, the Court declined to proceed further over that disclosure. It nevertheless directed the DGP to examine disclosure of identity through the naming of a complainant in a charge-sheet and to issue preventive directions. The earlier revision had left the factual and legal questions concerning the framing of charges open; it had not discharged the accused on the merits. The trial court's existing order permitted the applicant to inspect the sensitive documents in court. His counsel chose to withdraw the petition in view of that permission. The Court did not decide whether inspection is mandatory or adequate in every case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application as withdrawn. It directed the DGP to examine disclosure of identity through charge-sheet naming and issue the necessary directions within 30 days. The Registry was directed to send a copy of the order for compliance. The trial court's permission to inspect the documents remained the operative arrangement for access. The High Court neither directed the supply of copies on the merits nor finally determined the charges to be framed.

Headnote :- Rape charge — consent — Section 90 IPC - The Sessions Court had reasoned that the applicant's sweet talk led to repeated intercourse. That did not answer whether the complainant's consent during 2018–2021 was freely given or obtained under a misconception of fact. Her alleged concealment of the applicant from her husband, and the explanation she later gave, required consideration in the context of the entire FIR. The High Court set aside the order framing a charge under Section 376(2)(n) and directed fresh consideration. It made no finding that she had consented or that the applicant was innocent.

Sexual harassment — coercive image demands - The FIR separately alleged that, after the applicant stopped visiting the complainant's house, he continued to pressure her to send intimate photographs and videos over WhatsApp, causing severe distress. The trial court had not examined whether that conduct could constitute offences under Sections 354A, 354C or 354D IPC. XYZ v. State of M.P., Ramdev Singh and Puttaswamy informed the need to consider gender-based harm and privacy. The High Court did not itself frame any alternative charge.

Charge framing — entire record — remand - Dilawar Balu Kurane, Mohanlal Soni, L. Krishna Reddy and Mauvin Godinho require the court to sift the material for the limited purpose of assessing whether it raises grave suspicion under Sections 227 –228 CrPC. The court must not conduct a full trial at that stage. The High Court allowed the revision, set aside the order of 21 September 2022 and directed the trial court to consider the charges afresh. It did not discharge the applicant or finally determine his culpability.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arun Tiwari sought revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC against the order dated 21 September 2022 passed by the 10th Additional Sessions Judge, Bhopal, framing a charge under Section 376(2)(n) IPC. The married complainant alleged that the applicant, who knew her husband, developed a relationship with her through messages and promises of lifelong companionship. According to her, intercourse began in 2018 and continued until 2021. She alleged that he threatened to tell her husband if she refused. On 24 February 2021, her husband found the applicant hidden in the bathroom. She helped the applicant leave and gave her husband an innocent explanation for his presence. She further alleged that the applicant later pressured her to send intimate photographs and videos over WhatsApp. This caused severe distress and led her to disclose the matter to her husband. The applicant argued that the relationship was consensual and between adults, relying on authorities concerning consensual relationships. The trial judge had focused on sweet talk and intercourse without separately examining Section 90 or the later allegations concerning images.

2. Precedents — Considered : The defence relied on Naim Ahamed, Dhruvaram Murlidhar Sonar, Shambhu Karwar and XXX v. State of M.P., together with High Court decisions, on consensual relationships. The Court did not finally apply them to exonerate the applicant. Dilawar Balu Kurane, Mohanlal Soni, L. Krishna Reddy and Mauvin Godinho were quoted on the prima facie standard at the charge stage: the court may sift the material for the limited purpose of assessing grave suspicion, but must neither weigh it as at trial nor automatically accept every assertion. The judgment referred to Prafulla Kumar Samal through the quoted authorities. It also quoted M.E. Shivalingamurthy, which referred to Debendra Nath Padhi on the limits of the material to be considered at the charge stage. XYZ v. State of M.P. discussed hidden and trivialised violence against women; Ramdev Singh emphasised the harm sexual assault causes to dignity; and K.S. Puttaswamy addressed bodily, informational and decisional privacy. These authorities supported consideration of the full range of alleged conduct. They did not result in a final finding on any charge.

3. Statutes considered : Section 376(2)(n) IPC concerned the charge of repeated rape under review. Section 90 IPC required consideration of whether consent was vitiated by a misconception of fact. Sections 354A, 354C and 354D IPC concerned possible offences of sexual harassment, voyeurism and stalking that the trial court had not examined in relation to the alleged pressure to send intimate images. Sections 227 and 228 CrPC governed discharge and the framing of charges, while Sections 397 and 401 provided for revision. The High Court made no final determination of the ingredients of any offence or of the authenticity and context of the electronic messages.

4. Issues : Whether the trial judge had adequately examined consent and misconception of fact, instead of inferring rape merely from sweet talk and physical relations; whether the later demands for intimate images required separate consideration under other IPC sexual offences; and whether, at the charge stage, the court could sift the FIR and prosecution material to assess the ingredients of the offences without deciding the contested merits. The Court identified omissions in the charge order and directed fresh consideration of the charges.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court considered the FIR in two parts: the allegation of intercourse during 2018–2021 and the later allegation of pressure to send intimate photographs and videos. The complainant's marriage, her concealment of the applicant and her false explanation to her husband required consideration in the particular circumstances when examining consent under Section 90. Those circumstances did not themselves require the applicant's discharge. The allegation that she sent the images under continued pressure, rather than voluntarily, could attract other IPC provisions, but the trial court had not examined that aspect. At the charge stage, the court must sift all the prosecution allegations and material for the limited purpose of assessing prima facie ingredients and grave suspicion. It must not conduct a mini-trial or mechanically confine its consideration to a single offence. The failure to consider the entire FIR amounted to material illegality in the charge order. The High Court therefore remanded the question of framing charges for fresh consideration, without finally determining the accused's culpability.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the revision. It set aside the order of 21 September 2022 framing a charge under Section 376(2)(n) IPC and remanded the matter to the trial court to consider the framing of charges afresh. That consideration was to cover the entire FIR, including consent under Section 90 and the possible offences arising from the demands for intimate images. No costs were awarded. The pre-charge stage was restored. The order neither acquitted nor discharged the applicant, and the High Court did not frame charges under Sections 354A, 354C or 354D.

Arun Tiwari v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., Cr.R. no. 3977/2022, 10/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — disputed roadside confrontation — no mini-trial - The complainant alleged filthy abuse in public, physical assault and a threat to kill her. The applicant admitted that a confrontation occurred on 6 August 2022, but claimed that she started it and injured his hand with a khurpa. He produced no medical report and had lodged no report against her. His competing account did not justify quashing the FIR and charge-sheet, which disclosed a cognizable offence. The allegations under Sections 294, 354 and 506 IPC remained for trial; the Court did not decide guilt.

Advocate status — retaliation claim - An advocate is not exempt from liability under the IPC. The applicant produced only two ordersheets from 2019, leaving the earlier case record incomplete. They did not substantiate his claim that the complainant had targeted him solely because he represented her opponent; another lawyer appeared to be the principal counsel. The Court did not foreclose a defence at trial.

Quashing — informant motive - Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, drawing on R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal, states that inherent power is exceptional. Where the allegations taken at face value disclose an offence, the informant's alleged mala fides are of secondary importance. Applying that principle, the Court dismissed the Section 482 application.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arunendra Tiwari sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of Crime No. 178/2022 registered at Chakghat, Rewa, the charge-sheet dated 26 December 2022 and the resulting proceedings before the JMFC in RCT No. 75/2023 under Sections 294, 354 and 506 IPC. The complainant alleged that, on 6 August 2022, while she was crossing the road towards her new house, the applicant arrived on a motorcycle, abused her obscenely, grabbed her and threw her to the ground. After two people intervened, he threatened her. The applicant contended that she had falsely implicated him because he represented a man who had filed a complaint against her and her son. He alleged that she stopped his motorcycle, attacked him with a khurpa and threatened him for continuing that case. He relied on complaints made to senior police officers. He produced only two ordersheets from 2019, without his vakalatnama or the complete record of the earlier case.

2. Precedents — Considered : The High Court applied Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346. The quoted discussion drew on R.P. Kapur and State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal. It identified circumstances in which proceedings may be quashed, including where the allegations taken at face value do not disclose an offence, an express legal bar applies, or the proceedings are manifestly abusive. It cautioned against deciding credibility or treating the informant's hostility alone as decisive. The Court applied the principle that, once a cognizable offence is disclosed and registered, the informant's motive is secondary to the material collected and the evidence led in the prosecution. Other authorities appeared within the long Renu

Kumari quotation, but were not separately applied to the present facts.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC preserved the High Court's inherent jurisdiction. Sections 294, 354 and 506 IPC were the provisions invoked in the FIR and charge-sheet for the alleged public obscenity, assault on a woman and criminal intimidation. Section 200 CrPC concerned the earlier complaint by a third party in which the applicant claimed to have appeared as counsel. The High Court did not decide that complaint. The applicant's status as an advocate gave him no statutory immunity from IPC offences.

4. Issues : Whether the earlier complaint case established the applicant's claim that he had been falsely implicated in retaliation for acting as a lawyer; whether his competing account and alleged injury justified quashing despite his admission that a confrontation had occurred; and whether the allegations of assault, abuse and threats in the FIR, taken at face value, disclosed cognizable offences. These questions concerned the threshold for quashing, rather than a full assessment of witnesses or medical evidence.

5. Ratio / Findings : One of the two ordersheets showed another lawyer appearing with the earlier complainant. The other showed the applicant appearing on a day when the judicial officer was absent. The applicant produced neither his vakalatnama nor the complete ordersheets, and did not substantiate the alleged retaliatory motive. His counsel conceded that the IPC applies to advocates. Ground D of the applicant's own petition acknowledged the roadside incident. No medical report supported his claim of a khurpa injury, and he had lodged no report against the complainant. The Court therefore declined to prefer his account in proceedings under its inherent jurisdiction. Under Renu Kumari, the informant's alleged mala fides alone did not justify quashing when the FIR disclosed a cognizable offence. The observation that the applicant appeared prima facie to have assaulted the complainant was neither a conviction nor a bar to a defence at trial.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The FIR, charge-sheet and trial proceedings remained in force. No charge was quashed and no immunity was granted on account of the applicant's status as an advocate. The disputed evidence remained for determination in the ordinary course of the proceedings.

Headnote :- Sexual-assault testimony — sterling witness — material contradictions - State of Punjab v. Gurmit Singh permits conviction on the sole testimony of a reliable prosecutrix and cautions against rejecting it for trivial discrepancies or routinely requiring corroboration. Krishna Kumar Malik and Rai Sandeep require the core account to be trustworthy and consistent. Here, the complainant's accounts of threats, an altercation and telephone recordings differed materially from her complaint and the witnesses' evidence. No alleged recording was produced. The Division Bench found the evidence as a whole unworthy of credit and acquitted the appellant. It did not prescribe independent corroboration as a requirement in every rape case.

Interested witnesses — enmity - All four prosecution witnesses had strained relations with the appellant. Enmity may explain the commission of a crime or a false accusation; relationship alone does not disqualify a witness. In this case, the Court considered the established hostility together with improvements, contradictions and the absence of supporting material, and found reasonable doubt. Unparticularised allegations of earlier rape charges could not establish criminal antecedents.

Delayed FIR — fear explanation - Fear and the need to stay with relatives could explain reporting nearly two months after the alleged assault. The Court nevertheless assessed that explanation alongside conflicting accounts of later events and the missing recording. It did not treat delay alone as an automatic bar. The convictions under Sections 376(2)(f) and 506 Part II IPC were set aside, and release and refund of any deposited fine were directed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arvind appealed against the judgment dated 18 August 2017 of the Additional Sessions Judge, Seondha, convicting him under Sections 376(2)(f) and 506 Part II IPC and sentencing him to life imprisonment and one year's rigorous imprisonment, with fines. The complainant was a close relative whose identity the Court withheld. She alleged that he raped her at home on 19 February 2016 and threatened her. She then went to stay with relatives, alleged further threats and reported the incident nearly two months later. The appellant, who had remained in custody since the trial judgment, relied on the delay, the related and hostile witnesses, contradictions in their evidence and a property dispute. The prosecution relied on the complainant, her relatives and a witness from her locality. The Division Bench examined the trial record and oral evidence in an appeal against conviction, rather than applying the threshold standard for assessing an FIR or framing a charge.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Punjab v. Gurmit Singh, (1996) 2 SCC 384, recognises that a sexual-assault complainant's reliable sole testimony may suffice for conviction. Corroboration must not be required routinely, and inconsequential discrepancies do not justify rejecting otherwise reliable evidence. Krishna Kumar Malik v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 130, requires solitary testimony to inspire confidence and be trustworthy. Rai Sandeep v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2012) 8 SCC 21, describes a sterling witness by reference to consistency from the initial statement through trial and correspondence with supporting material. The High Court applied those tests to material inconsistencies, rather than peripheral discrepancies, and expressly cautioned against emotional prejudgment. It did not use those authorities to impose a categorical requirement of corroboration.

3. Statutes considered : Section 376(2)(f) IPC and Section 506 Part II IPC were the rape and threat convictions on appeal.

4. Issues : Whether fear satisfactorily explained the delay in reporting; whether the related witnesses, who admitted prior hostility, could be relied on for the core allegation; whether the contradictions concerning a later visit, a fight, damage to a telephone and threats were material; and whether the complainant's testimony alone was sufficiently trustworthy to sustain both convictions beyond reasonable doubt. The Court considered the combined effect of those matters.

5. Ratio / Findings : The record comprised the written complaint Ex.P/1, earlier police statements Ex.D/1 and D/2, the trial testimony of P.W.1–3 and Tinku Jatav, and an FSL report. A recording of threatening calls allegedly stored on Tinku's telephone was not produced before the trial court, and he gave no evidence of such a recording. The Court found that the FSL report was of no vital consequence. It did not make scientific evidence a prerequisite in every case.

Fear could explain delay, but the Court identified conflicting accounts. The complaint stated that the complainant hid when the appellant visited a relative's house, whereas her testimony placed her there during a fight. A relative described a physical assault that was absent from the complainant's account, and material facts were missing from the earlier police statements. The complainant said that Tinku's telephone contained recordings of threats, but none was produced and Tinku did not support that assertion. Allegations concerning the appellant's antecedents were unproved, and an earlier related case had ended in acquittal. Four witnesses admitted hostile relations with him. Enmity could operate in either direction, but the core testimony still had to be reliable. The Court found that the contradictions, improvements, concerns about delay and lack of supporting material, considered together, created reasonable doubt. The Bench also drew an inference from the fact that the locked house had remained undisturbed; that was an additional observation on these facts, rather than a general test. Corroboration is not invariably required, but the complainant's evidence on this record did not inspire confidence.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the appeal and acquitted Arvind of the offences under Sections 376(2)(f) and 506 Part II IPC, reversing the trial convictions and sentences. It directed his immediate release unless he was required in another case. Copies of the judgment were to be sent to the jail authority and, with the record, to the trial court for information and compliance. Any fine already deposited was to be refunded.

Headnote :- Negotiable Instruments Act — territorial jurisdiction — amended Section 142 - The Magistrate's rejection of a Section 138 complaint for want of territorial jurisdiction in 2014, based on Dashrath Rupsingh Rathod v. State of Maharashtra, (2014) 9 SCC 129, was set aside following the 2015 amendment. Applying Bridgestone India Private Limited v. Inderpal Singh, (2016) 2 SCC 75, the Court held that, for a cheque delivered for collection through an account, Section 142(2)(a) gives jurisdiction to the court for the area in which the payee's bank branch is located. The non obstante and validating provisions of Section 142A displaced the earlier jurisdictional bar retrospectively. The Court held that the JMFC, Lahar, had jurisdiction and directed the proceedings to restart after fresh notice. The unserved respondent was given liberty to seek recall.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arvind Gupta's complaint under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act was registered as Criminal Case No. 397/2009 before the JMFC, Lahar, District Bhind. On 10.11.2014, the Magistrate held that the court lacked territorial jurisdiction in view of Dashrath Rupsingh Rathod v. State of Maharashtra. Arvind sought relief under Section 482 CrPC. He contended that the 2015 amendment of Section 142 and insertion of Section 142A made the complaint maintainable at Lahar. The High Court heard his counsel, reproduced the amended provisions and applied Bridgestone India Private Limited. The cheque amount and the Chandigarh and Indore bank particulars in the Bridgestone quotation concerned that precedent's complaint. Komal Pandey had remained unserved in the High Court proceedings, and the Court expressly preserved her opportunity to seek recall.

2. Precedents — Considered : Dashrath Rupsingh Rathod v. State of Maharashtra and Others, (2014) 9 SCC 129, supplied the territorial-jurisdiction rule on which the JMFC had rejected the complaint. The High Court described that earlier rule as denying jurisdiction merely because a cheque had been presented at a particular place. It quoted and followed Bridgestone India Private Limited v. Inderpal Singh, (2016) 2 SCC 75. The Supreme Court held that Section 142(2)(a), inserted by the 2015 ordinance and amendment, conferred jurisdiction where the cheque was delivered for collection through an account at the bank branch where the payee or holder in due course maintained the account. The non obstante language of Section 142A(1) overrode contrary CrPC provisions and judgments. The words “as if that sub-section had been in force at all material times” gave the jurisdictional rule retrospective effect. In Bridgestone, the cheque was drawn on Union Bank, Chandigarh, and presented through IDBI Bank, Indore. The JMFC, Indore, was held competent. The High Court applied that legal principle to reinstate the Lahar complaint under the amended rule.

3. Statutes considered : Section 138 of the NI Act defined the offence alleged in the complaint; the particular ingredients of dishonour were not adjudicated. Amended Section 142(2)(a) governed territorial jurisdiction where a cheque was delivered for collection through the payee's account. Section 142A(1) was considered for its non obstante clause and retrospective validating effect despite Dashrath. The order reproduced parts of Sections 142 and 142A, including provisions concerning cognizance and multiple complaints. It did not determine timeliness, consolidation or subsequent complaints under subsections 142A(2) and (3). Section 482 CrPC provided the procedural route for correcting the Magistrate's jurisdictional order.

4. Issues : Whether the 2015 amendments to Sections 142(2)(a) and 142A of the NI Act restored jurisdiction to the JMFC, Lahar, over a complaint rejected in 2014 under Dashrath; and what procedure was required when the respondent had not been served. The Court did not decide the merits of the dishonour complaint or make an evidentiary finding on the bank particulars quoted from Bridgestone.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Magistrate's refusal rested on the Dashrath rule then applicable. Bridgestone interpreted the new jurisdictional provision and its validation as superseding that rule for Section 138 complaints involving collection through an account, notwithstanding earlier judicial orders. It also recognised the provision's retrospective effect. Following that construction, the High Court held that the applicant's complaint fell within the territorial jurisdiction of the JMFC, Lahar. Since Komal had remained unserved in the Section 482 proceedings, the Court directed fresh notice before the proceedings restarted and expressly permitted her to seek recall if aggrieved.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court set aside the order dated 10.11.2014 passed by the JMFC, Lahar, in Criminal Case No. 397/2009. It directed the trial court to restart the Section 138 complaint after fresh notice to Komal Pandey and gave her liberty to seek recall of the High Court's order. The Section 482 application was disposed of. The Court neither convicted the respondent nor awarded compensation or finally determined liability on the cheque.

Arvind Gupta v. Komal Pandey, M.Cr.C. no. 11593/2014, 14/02/2020, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Speedy trial — police witness absence — Article 21 - The investigating officer repeatedly failed to obey summons and warrants. He falsely claimed that the FSL report and Marg papers were unavailable, although they had been filed with the charge-sheet. On the only occasion when he attended, the police case diary was missing. The Court held the State responsible for the delay in the murder trial. It considered Hussainara Khatoon, Sheela Barse, Supreme Court Legal Aid Committee and Kartar Singh on the constitutional obligation to ensure a timely trial.

Regular bail — delay — serious allegation - The fourth application under Section 439 CrPC relied on trial delay following the applicant's arrest in November 2017 for alleged offences under Sections 302, 201 and 34 IPC. Although the Court found that the State had caused the delay, it declined bail in view of the allegation of a killing arising from a property dispute. On these facts, delay did not automatically entitle the applicant to release or bring the prosecution to an end.

Compensation — recovery — trial management - The State was directed to pay the undertrial Rs 30,000 within one month for the breach of Article 21, with liberty to recover the amount from the defaulting town inspector's salary. The SP was directed to send monthly reports on the departmental inquiry to the Principal Registrar. The prosecution was directed to produce all witnesses on the next trial date. The order did not determine guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Asfaq Khan filed a fourth application under Section 439 CrPC for bail in Crime No. 493/2017 registered at Raghogarh, Guna, for alleged murder and destruction of evidence under Sections 302, 201 and 34 IPC. He had been arrested on 17 November 2017, and his third bail application had been withdrawn in 2018. He relied on delay in the trial. The High Court sought an explanation for Town Inspector D.P.S. Chauhan's repeated non-appearance and for warrants being returned unserved or not returned at all. The SP reported the officer's claim that the FSL report and statements recorded during the Marg inquiry were unavailable. A preliminary inquiry, however, showed that both had been filed with the charge-sheet. The officer had attended only once, when his cross-examination could not proceed because the police case diary was unavailable. Summons or telephone calls had reached him on other dates. His claim of law-and-order duties addressed at most two dates and was unsupported by any written order restraining his attendance. The records also showed poor execution and monitoring of numerous warrants, and departmental charges had been initiated.

2. Precedents — Considered : Hussainara Khatoon v. Home Secretary, Bihar, (1980) 1 SCC 98, states the State's obligation under Article 21 to ensure a speedy trial; shortages of resources do not excuse non-compliance. Sheela Barse v. Union of India addresses unreasonable trial delay and the possibility of quashing, except where delay is attributable to the accused or an order of a superior court. Supreme Court Legal Aid Committee v. Union of India discusses calibrated release on bail rather than automatic quashing of serious prosecutions delayed in trial. Its statutory context was not mechanically applied to the present IPC murder charge. Kartar Singh v. State of Punjab explains that the right extends from investigation through appeal and serves both individual and social interests. Jaipal Singh v. State of M.P., an earlier decision, was quoted on police-witness accountability and monetary compensation. The Court relied on these authorities in recognising State-caused delay, while separately considering whether bail should be granted.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed regular bail. Sections 302, 201 and 34 IPC were the alleged offences; guilt was not adjudicated. Article 21 protected liberty and the right to a timely trial. Police Headquarters circulars dated 30 March and 21 May 2019 concerned monitoring the service and execution of summons and warrants. A Gazetted Officer had failed to comply with them. The compensation and departmental-reporting directions provided constitutional redress; they did not amount to an acquittal or a criminal conviction of the officer.

4. Issues : Whether prolonged undertrial custody and repeated default by police witnesses justified bail despite the grave allegation of murder; whether the delay caused by the State violated the right to a speedy trial; what compensation and measures were required to remedy the breach and prevent further delay; and whether the officer's explanation for his absence was consistent with the charge-sheet and trial record. The Court considered release separately from redress for the procedural injury.

5. Ratio / Findings : The preliminary inquiry contradicted the investigating officer's account to the SP. The FSL report and Marg documents had already been filed, and it was the absence of the police diary that prevented cross-examination on his sole attendance. Despite notice on numerous dates, he failed to attend and could not explain most of his absences. The State was responsible for the lack of progress in the trial; an undertrial could not be left at the mercy of police witnesses. The Court nevertheless considered bail inappropriate on the particular allegation of a killing arising from a property dispute. It addressed the delay by awarding Rs 30,000 against the State, with liberty to recover the amount from the officer, and by directing departmental monitoring and the production of witnesses. It neither determined guilt for murder nor prescribed a general minimum period of custody entitling an accused to bail.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the fourth application for regular bail, declining bail and issuing directions. The State was directed to pay Rs 30,000 within one month, with liberty to recover it from Town Inspector Chauhan's salary. The Guna SP was directed to submit monthly reports to the Principal Registrar on the departmental inquiry against the erring officers. The prosecution was directed to secure the attendance of all witnesses on the next date fixed for evidence.

Headnote :- Medical-practice regulation — cross-system prescription — Section 24(ia), M.P. Ayurvigyan Parishad Adhiniyam - The limited permission introduced in 2016 applies only to eligible persons posted in government health institutions or allopathic centres. An Ayurvedacharya running a private hospital did not satisfy that opening condition, despite his degree and three-month training in allopathy. The Court held that he was not eligible to prescribe allopathic medicines and referred to the qualification and registration restrictions in the Indian Medical Council Act.

Criminal medical negligence — Section 304-A IPC — professional safeguard - Jacob Mathew v. State of Punjab, (2005) 6 SCC 1, distinguishes gross criminal negligence from civil negligence and requires independent competent medical opinion before proceeding against a doctor. Applying Poonam Verma v. Ashwin Patel, (1996) 4 SCC 332, the High Court held that this applicant's practice of allopathy without the necessary qualification itself amounted prima facie to gross negligence. It distinguished the safeguard in Jacob Mathew for competent practitioners and noted the CMHO's opinion that the applicant lacked competence. The applicant also relied on Martin F. D'Souza for safeguards against prosecution of doctors.

Section 482 CrPC — charge-sheet — inconclusive cause of death - Allopathic medicines were found in the viscera, and the applicant had treated the patient in a system in which he was not entitled to practise. The medical opinion could not establish whether death was natural or caused by an overdose. In these circumstances, the Court found sufficient prima facie material for trial and refused to quash the charge-sheet under Section 304-A and the State Act. It made no finding that an overdose had occurred. The trial court was to decide on its own evidence, without being prejudiced by these preliminary observations, and to finish the trial preferably within nine months.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashish Khare operated a private hospital at Gadarwara, District Narsinghpur. The informant alleged that his father had been admitted with high fever and died after Ashish gave him allopathic medicines. The complaint described Ashish as a homoeopathy doctor. A merg inquiry led to FIR No. 714/2017 and a charge-sheet under Section 304-A IPC with Section 24 of the M.P. Ayurvigyan Parishad Adhiniyam. The Chief Medical and Health Officer, Narsinghpur, certified that Ashish was not competent to treat patients in allopathy. Viscera were preserved during the post-mortem. The order records that methyl cobalamin and named anti-inflammatory and antipyretic drugs were found in them, but the doctors could not determine whether death was natural or caused by an overdose of medicine. In his Section 482 application, Ashish relied on his unchallenged Bachelor of Ayurvedic Medicine and Surgery (Ayurvedacharya) degree, obtained in 2006, and a certificate of three-month training in allopathy from 01.12.2006 to 02.03.2007. He argued that the 2016 State amendment permitted him to prescribe those medicines. Alternatively, he contended that no opinion on gross negligence had been obtained from a medical board or government doctor before prosecution and that the cause of death remained uncertain.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant relied on Jacob Mathew v. State of Punjab, (2005) 6 SCC 1. The Court reproduced its conclusions and interim guidelines at length. Jacob Mathew distinguishes an ordinary professional error or civil negligence from the high degree of rashness or negligence required for criminal liability under Section 304-A. It applies the standard of an ordinarily competent professional and the Bolam test, assessed by the knowledge and accepted practice at the relevant time. The availability of a better method or greater skill does not, by itself, establish a crime. A doctor may be negligent because he lacks the skill he professes to possess or fails to exercise his existing skill with reasonable competence. A criminal charge requires gross fault, with a hazard of such a nature that the resulting injury was most likely imminent. Res ipsa loquitur cannot, by itself, establish criminal liability. Pending statutory guidelines, an investigating officer should obtain an independent and competent medical opinion, preferably from a government doctor qualified in the relevant branch, before proceeding against a doctor. A private complaint likewise requires prima facie evidence in the form of a credible medical opinion, and a doctor should not be arrested routinely. The High Court held that the direction for an expert opinion did not apply to Ashish's unauthorised practice of allopathy, which fell outside the protection for a competent practitioner. This was the High Court's application of Jacob Mathew; the Supreme Court had not decided this applicant's conduct in practising another system of medicine. The applicant also cited Martin F. D'Souza v. Mohd. Ishfaq, (2009) 3 SCC 1, for safeguards against prosecution of doctors. The Court quoted Poonam Verma v. Ashwin Patel, (1996) 4 SCC 332, in which a practitioner registered in homoeopathy entered the field of allopathy without the required qualification. That conduct breached a statutory duty, amounted to actionable negligence and exposed him to prosecution under Section 15(3) of the Indian Medical Council Act. The High Court applied that principle concerning practice in a prohibited field to Ashish's prescribing allopathic medicines despite his Ayurvedic qualification. It did not treat Poonam Verma as proof of this patient's actual cause of death. The passage quoted from Poonam Verma itself refers to the three duties of care in Dr. Laxman Joshi; that reference forms part of the quoted decision.

3. Statutes considered : Section 24(ia) of the M.P. Ayurvigyan Parishad Adhiniyam, inserted by the 2016 amendment, gives specified practitioners limited permission to prescribe modern scientific medicine and protects them from punishment under that provision. They must be eligible Ayurvedic or Unani graduates posted in government health institutions or allopathic centres, registered with the specified State Board and trained as prescribed by the Government. The permission extends only to the training received. The Court held that the applicant, who ran a private hospital, did not satisfy the opening requirement concerning his posting, despite his accepted degree and three-month course. Section 24 of the State Act formed part of the charge-sheet; the order did not finally determine guilt under it. Sections 2(d) and 15(2)–(3) of the Indian Medical Council Act, 1956 distinguish practitioners of modern medicine from those of Ayurveda, Unani and homoeopathy. Subject to the stated statutory exception, they restrict practice to qualified practitioners enrolled on a State Medical Register and penalise contravention. The State provision referred to the Indian Medicine Central Council Act, 1970 and the Madhya Pradesh Ayurvedic, Unani Tatha Prakritik Chikitsa Vyavsayi Act for the qualifications and extent of training. Section 304-A IPC was the charged offence of causing death by negligence; Jacob Mathew explained the degree of negligence required for criminal liability. Section 482 CrPC governed the application to quash the police charge-sheet.

4. Issues : (i) Did amended Section 24(ia) authorise an Ayurvedacharya with this training, who ran a private hospital, to prescribe allopathic medicines? (ii) If not, did prescribing in that prohibited system amount prima facie to gross negligence for the Section 304-A charge, and did Jacob Mathew nevertheless require an independent medical board or government doctor to certify medical negligence before prosecution? (iii) Did the doctors' inability to determine whether death was natural or caused by an overdose leave no prima facie case on causation and require quashing at the charge-sheet stage? (iv) What remained for the trial court to decide after refusal to quash? These were questions about whether the case could proceed to trial, rather than final findings on medical causation or criminal guilt.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted the unchallenged Ayurvedacharya degree and training certificate, but held that they did not satisfy the opening condition in Section 24(ia). The provision did not permit every trained Ayurvedic graduate to prescribe allopathy: eligible practitioners had to be posted in government health institutions or allopathic centres. Ashish ran his own private hospital and fell outside that category. Sections 2(d) and 15 of the Indian Medical Council Act reinforced the distinction between recognised practitioners of modern medicine and those of other systems, and the statutory restriction on allopathic practice. Applying Poonam Verma's reasoning about entry into a prohibited field, the Court treated the applicant's prescribing outside his legal competence as prima facie gross negligence. It also stated that he could be prosecuted under Section 15(3). That statement concerned a potential statutory contravention; the charge-sheet before the Court was under Section 304-A IPC with Section 24 of the State Act. The Court distinguished the independent medical-opinion safeguard in Jacob Mathew because the applicant was not competent to prescribe allopathic medicines. The police had, in any event, obtained the CMHO's certificate confirming that lack of competence. On these facts, the Court held that no further report on medical negligence from an independent doctor or medical board was required. The viscera contained allopathic medicines, but the doctors could not determine whether death was natural or caused by an overdose. The Court held that, in the circumstances, the absence of a definite finding of natural death did not establish that there was no prima facie material, given the unauthorised treatment and the other circumstances. It made no affirmative medical finding of overdose. The Court stated that once negligence was proved, nothing more needed to be proved, and found sufficient prima facie material concerning death by negligence at this stage. It expressly directed the trial court to decide on the evidence without being prejudiced by the observations in the order. The merits, medical evidence and ultimate guilt remained for trial.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application and refused to quash the charge-sheet under Section 304-A IPC read with Section 24 of the M.P. Ayurvigyan Parishad Adhiniyam. It directed the trial court to decide on the evidence ultimately recorded, without being prejudiced by observations made within the limited scope of the quashing proceeding. The trial was to be concluded as early as possible, preferably within nine months of the date of the order. A copy of the order was to be sent to the trial court. No final finding on causation, conviction or sentence was made.

Headnote :- Dowry cruelty — sister-in-law — individual role - The wife alleged that her husband demanded property in Bhopal or a flat and Rs 20 lakh. The only specific allegation against his married sister was that, in one telephone call, she supported his demand and said that she would not allow the wife to live with him unless it was met. Applying Kans Raj, Monju Roy, Chandralekha, Kahkashan Kausar, Geeta Mehrotra and Preeti Gupta, the Court held that this material was insufficient to prosecute the sister under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act.

Section 482 — party-specific quashing - The Court quashed the FIR in Crime No. 534/2020 and the consequential proceedings only against Sushma Chouhan. Ashish Kumar Kotangale, the husband, did not press his application, and his prosecution was to continue. This partial relief did not determine the truth of the specific allegations against him or grant general immunity to relatives.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashish Kumar Kotangale and his married sister, Sushma Chouhan, jointly applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime No. 534/2020 at Sehore and the consequential proceedings before the JMFC under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. At the hearing, counsel did not press Ashish's challenge. The complainant said that she and Ashish had married for love in January 2020. Soon afterwards, he demanded that her mother's house in Bhopal be transferred to him or that he be given a flat there. He later demanded Rs 20 lakh, complained of inadequate dowry and behaved abusively. She described an incident in March in the presence of her mother and domestic staff, followed by further demands. The only specific allegation against Sushma concerned a telephone conversation arranged by Ashish. Sushma allegedly urged the wife to fulfil his demand and said that she would not let her live with him unless she did so.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, cautioned that the husband's fault does not, by itself, implicate every relative in a dowry demand. Monju Roy v. State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693, required tangible material concerning a distant relative's individual role and distinguished that person's position from the husband and parents. Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan concerned vague allegations and the abuse of process in prosecuting a married sister-in-law. Kahkashan Kausar, Geeta Mehrotra and Preeti Gupta were cited for the requirement of clear, specific allegations against near relatives, rather than merely naming them in general accusations. The High Court applied these authorities to the single telephone allegation against Sushma. It did not hold that a distant relative could never commit a dowry offence.

3. Statutes considered : Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the charged provisions concerning cruelty and dowry. Section 482 CrPC provided the inherent power to quash the proceedings. The complainant's statement under Section 161 CrPC was examined for any additional allegation. The Court distinguished the positions of the two applicants; it did not decide whether the charges were proved, determine a dowry amount or finally adjudicate the husband's liability.

4. Issues : Whether the single telephone call and support for the husband's demands amounted to sufficiently specific allegations of cruelty or dowry demands against his married sister; whether continuing the proceedings against her would be an abuse of process; and how the relief should be confined after the husband declined to press his own challenge. The Court considered these questions on the allegations in the FIR and the police statement.

5. Ratio / Findings : The wife made specific allegations of demands and other mistreatment against her husband. Against Sushma, however, she alleged no act beyond the single telephone call urging her to meet his demand. The Supreme Court authorities required specific material concerning a relative's role before that person could be prosecuted on general dowry allegations. On this record, the Court held that continuing the proceedings against Sushma was unwarranted. It did not assess the husband's case because his application was not pressed, and its reasoning did not negate the allegations against him.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed Ashish's application as not pressed and directed that his prosecution continue. It quashed the FIR in Crime No. 534/2020 and all consequential proceedings only against Sushma Chouhan. The Section 482 application was partly allowed; the proceedings were not quashed against all applicants, nor were all applicants discharged.

Headnote :- Circumstantial murder — complete chain - The neck wounds, fractures and post-mortem findings established that the death was homicidal. They did not establish that the appellant was the killer. Under Sharad Birdhichand Sarda, every link had to be fully proved and the circumstances had to be consistent only with guilt. The contradictory evidence of when the appellant was last seen with the deceased, together with the absence of blood on the seized tangi and clothing, left the chain incomplete. The convictions under Sections 302 and 201 were set aside.

Last seen — multiple companions and contradictions - Keshav's claimed sightings were absent from his police statement. Saraswati and Neelam withdrew their accounts in cross-examination, while Badri and Umakant relied on information from persons who were not examined. Geeta placed Phoolchand with the deceased and the appellant, but Phoolchand was not charged and did not support the account that they had been seen together. Shailendra Rajdev Pasvan, Digamber Vaishnav and Ashok require close proximity in time and corroborating links. The weak evidence of last being seen together could not, by itself, sustain conviction.

Forensic recovery — negative FSL - Recovery of the tangi, clothes and footwear was proved. However, Ex.P/14 found no blood on those articles. On this record, their seizure therefore did not provide an incriminating link.

Section 106 — foundational burden - Satye Singh cautions that the burden concerning facts within special knowledge does not relieve the prosecution of its duty to prove the case. The appellant's failure to explain could not supply the missing foundational links. The appeal was allowed. He was to be released in this case if still imprisoned for it; otherwise, his bonds were discharged.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashish Pathak appealed under Section 374(2) CrPC against the Rewa Sessions Court's convictions dated 9 June 2010 under Sections 302 and 201 IPC. He had been sentenced to life imprisonment and two years' imprisonment, with concurrent sentences and fines. Phoolchand, a scrap dealer, reported finding the injured body of Umashanker, also known as Lala Pathak, near a dhaba and canal on 11 July 2009. Some witnesses said that the appellant had consumed liquor with him the previous evening. The police seized articles from the scene. Following a disclosure memorandum, they also recovered an iron tangi, shirt, trousers, socks and shoes from the appellant's house. The defence disputed whether the circumstantial evidence formed a complete chain. The appeal concerned proof of homicide, the accounts of when the appellant and deceased were last seen together, and the forensic connection. It did not determine whether another named companion was guilty.

2. Precedents — Considered : Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, drawing on Hanumant, sets out five requirements for conviction on wholly circumstantial evidence. The circumstances must be proved, support only the inference of guilt, be conclusive, exclude alternative hypotheses and form a complete chain. Shailendra Rajdev Pasvan v. State of Gujarat requires the interval between the accused and deceased being seen together and the death to be short enough to exclude intervention by another person. Ashok v. State of Maharashtra and Digamber Vaishnav v. State of Chhattisgarh explain that evidence of last being seen together is not conclusive by itself; it requires trustworthy evidence, proximity in time and supporting circumstances. Trimukh, Kanhaiya Lal and other authorities appeared within those quoted passages. Satye Singh v. State of Uttarakhand, relying on Shambu Nath Mehra, cautions that Section 106 of the Evidence Act does not displace the prosecution's duty to prove the foundational facts. The High Court applied these principles to the disputed testimony and the FSL report finding no blood on the recovered articles.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 302 and 201 IPC were the provisions under which the appellant had been convicted of murder and causing disappearance of evidence. Section 374(2) CrPC governed the appeal. Section 106 of the Evidence Act concerned facts within special knowledge; the prosecution retained its primary burden of proof.

4. Issues : Whether the prosecution proved that the death was homicidal and, separately, that the appellant caused it; whether the accounts of when he and the deceased were last seen together were reliable and sufficiently close to the death, given the presence of other companions; whether proved seizure of articles on which no blood was found incriminated him; and whether Section 106 allowed his silence to fill the remaining gaps. The Court found homicide proved, but found that the appellant's identity as the killer and the complete chain of circumstances had not been established.

5. Ratio / Findings : Dr Atul Singh's post-mortem findings of serious neck wounds, fractures of the skull and cervical bones, and shock established that the death was homicidal. The seizure witnesses supported memorandum Ex.P/11 and seizure Ex.P/12. However, FSL report Ex.P/14 found no blood on the tangi, shirt, trousers, socks or shoes recovered from the appellant. The Court examined the accounts of when the appellant and deceased had last been seen together, comparing the witnesses' testimony and cross-examination with their police statements and the other evidence.

The nature of the post-mortem injuries established murder despite the suggestion in cross-examination that they could have resulted from a fall. Keshav's claimed sightings and account of the drinking companions were material assertions absent from his earlier statement. Badri's account of an episode in December was remote from the death; his account of a later sighting came from a person who was not examined. Umakant's evidence was likewise hearsay. Saraswati and Neelam said in cross-examination that they had not actually seen the appellant. Geeta gave a differing account of the meal and placed Phoolchand with the deceased and the appellant. Other family members did not corroborate her account, and Phoolchand did not support the evidence of last being seen together. No reliable observation placed the appellant near the scene at the time of death. Although articles were recovered, no blood was found on them. Neither the burden concerning special knowledge nor conjecture could supply these missing links. The prosecution failed to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt, including on the charge under Section 201.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal, set aside the convictions and sentences dated 9 June 2010, and acquitted Ashish Pathak of the offences under Sections 302 and 201 IPC. It directed his immediate release in this case if he was still imprisoned in connection with it; otherwise, his bail bonds were discharged. The judgment and record were to be sent to the trial court. The Court noted an earlier order in 2016 concerning a separate case under Section 307 and his apparent subsequent release, but did not adjudicate that prosecution.

Ashish Pathak v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 159/2011, 16/10/2024, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Vishal Mishra, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Contract and cheating — second advance before performance - The buyer alleged that it paid Rs 22 lakh for 50 tonnes of steel but received only 25 tonnes, valued at Rs 15,94,740. It then paid Rs 45 lakh for another 60 tonnes. The supplier admitted that at least 50 tonnes remained undelivered. He had accepted the further advance before completing the earlier order, and thereafter neither supplied the goods over a prolonged period nor refunded the money. On these facts, the Court found prima facie material indicating a dishonest intention from the outset for the purposes of Section 420 IPC. Mere breach of contract would not suffice; the Court did not finally determine dishonesty.

Merchant breach of trust — advance funds - The Court considered Sections 405 and 409 IPC. Substantial payments entrusted to a merchant had been retained without corresponding delivery or refund. At the quashing stage, the Court held that these circumstances were sufficient for the prosecution for criminal breach of trust to continue. Conversion of the funds and the final accounts remained to be proved.

Section 482 — civil overlap - Kamlesh Kumari and R. Kalyani distinguish a purely civil breach from criminal allegations arising out of a contract that also gives civil remedies. A charge-sheet had already been filed, and the shortfall in supply was admitted. Describing the dispute as civil did not, by itself, justify quashing. The application was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashish Sanghi applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime No. 215/2023 at Rewa under Sections 420 and 409 IPC. The police had filed a charge-sheet. The complainant alleged that it transferred Rs 22 lakh through the bank for 50 tonnes of sariya but received only 25 tonnes, valued at Rs 15,94,740. It later transferred Rs 45 lakh for another 60 tonnes, but received neither that supply nor a refund of the balance. Counsel admitted that the full contracted quantity had not been supplied and that at least 50 tonnes remained to be dispatched. He nevertheless contended that the dispute was purely civil. The Court considered the bank advances and repeated failure to supply at the quashing stage; it did not conduct a final accounting or determine guilt.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kamlesh Kumari v. State of U.P., (2015) 13 SCC 689, was applied by analogy. It concerned substantial advances retained after an obligation to sell property had not been fulfilled and a charge-sheet had been filed. That decision distinguished Ram Biraji Devi on the facts. Its quotation from R. Kalyani v. Janak C. Mehta explained that the power under Section 482 should be exercised sparingly, that the allegations in the FIR must be considered at face value, and that a civil dispute may also disclose a criminal offence. The Court also cited Hemant Singh v. Raghvendra Singh, a Madhya Pradesh High Court decision, for a similar inference from receipt of an advance followed by failure to perform or refund. The present judgment did not lay down a general rule that every failure to repay a contractual advance establishes a dishonest intention from the beginning.

3. Statutes considered : Section 420 IPC concerns cheating and dishonest inducement to deliver property. Section 405 defines criminal breach of trust through dishonest misappropriation or conversion of entrusted property. Section 409 provides aggravated liability where the person acts as a merchant, banker or in another listed capacity. Section 482 CrPC governed the application invoking the Court's inherent powers. Although a charge-sheet had been filed, the order did not finally decide the admissibility of the bank records, whether the funds had actually been used personally, the exact loss or proof of the offences.

4. Issues : Whether the sequence showed only failure to perform a contract or whether taking another substantial advance before completing the first supply, followed by retention without delivery or refund, indicated dishonesty from the outset; whether a merchant's receipt and alleged misapplication of advances could attract Section 409; and whether civil remedies barred the criminal proceedings. The Court considered whether there was a prima facie case, rather than finally resolving the disputed intention.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court acknowledged the need to discourage attempts to turn civil disputes into criminal cases and stated that mere breach of contract is not cheating. Here, however, the applicant accepted a further Rs 45 lakh before delivering the quantity covered by the first advance. Although the payments had been made in 2022, he admitted at the hearing that substantial supplies remained outstanding, and he had not refunded the money. The Court inferred prima facie that he had a dishonest intention when accepting the additional advance and that his retention of the entrusted funds as a merchant could amount to criminal breach of trust. Under Kamlesh Kumari, the existence of civil remedies did not, by itself, justify quashing a case that disclosed a cognizable offence and in which a charge-sheet had been filed. The suggestion that the money was being used personally was an inference from its retention at this stage. The Court had not traced the funds or finally determined the applicant's state of mind.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The FIR and charge-sheet proceedings under Sections 420 and 409 IPC continued. It ordered no repayment and decided no contractual claim. Guilt remained for the trial court to determine.

Ashish Sanghi v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 7682/2024, 21/02/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Cross-FIRs — timing and identity — quashing - Both FIRs referred to the confrontation on 8 July 2021. The father's report was lodged at 20:28 and the complainant's at 22:49. The Court held that this sequence, the pending property suit and her later identification of Chhotu as Ashish in a statement under Section 164 did not, by themselves, establish that her report was a false counterblast. Those disputed facts required evidence at trial. Section 528 BNSS/Section 482 CrPC did not permit the High Court to conduct a detailed inquiry into the truth of the rival accounts.

Mala fides — cognizable allegations - Renu Kumari, drawing on R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal, explains that the informant's motive is secondary when the allegations, taken at face value, disclose an offence. If a mutual free fight is proved, liability must be assessed by reference to each person's own acts. The High Court did not find that this defence had been established. It dismissed the application to quash FIR No. 382/2021 and RCT No. 5794/2023.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashish Sharma applied under Section 528 BNSS, 2023 (corresponding to Section 482 CrPC), to quash Gwalior Crime No. 382/2021 and RCT No. 5794/2023 under IPC Sections 451, 294, 323, 506, 354, 354B and 34. His father and the complainant disputed title to a house containing a temple. A later civil appellate injunction required them to maintain status quo and prohibited the creation of third-party rights. Both sides lodged FIRs after a confrontation on 8 July 2021: his father's Crime No. 381/2021 at 20:28 and the complainant's Crime No. 382/2021 at 22:49. Ashish contended that her report was retaliatory. He submitted that she had first identified him as Chhotu alias Aashish in a later statement under Section 164, after documents had been produced to show that his brother Abhishek was in Bengaluru. Charge-sheets had been filed in both cases. The High Court considered whether these circumstances justified quashing at that stage.

2. Precedents — Considered : Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was quoted extensively on the exceptional exercise of power under Section 482, including its discussion of the R.P. Kapur categories and Bhajan Lal illustrations. It explains that the informant's alleged mala fides cannot, by themselves, justify quashing where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. The Court also cited XYZ v. State of Gujarat, S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das, Gourishetty Mahesh, Amit Kapoor, S. Khushboo and other Supreme Court decisions for the limited inquiry into allegations taken at face value. Applying those principles, it declined to determine the disputed identity and competing accounts by conducting a mini-trial.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS preserved the inherent power corresponding to Section 482 CrPC. IPC Sections 451, 294, 323, 506, 354, 354B and 34 were the provisions invoked for the complainant's allegations concerning house entry, abuse, assault, intimidation, sexual conduct and common intention. The complainant's later statement under Section 164 CrPC identified the applicant. The civil status-quo injunction governed the property dispute; it did not determine criminal responsibility. The rival FIRs and the charge-sheets filed in them remained separate proceedings.

4. Issues : Whether the interval of two hours between the FIRs established that the complainant's report was a malicious counterblast; whether her later clarification of Ashish's identity, after production of an alibi document concerning his brother, required quashing; and whether the title suit or the possibility of mutual fighting displaced the cognizable offences disclosed by the allegations taken at face value. The Court treated these matters as disputed factual defences requiring evidence, rather than conclusive grounds for exercising its inherent power to quash.

5. Ratio / Findings : Both FIRs described an incident between 5:15 and 5:30 p.m. on 8 July. The occurrence of an encounter was therefore common ground, but the earlier filing of one FIR did not establish the truth of that side's account. The delayed clarification of identity and the plea that the property dispute had prompted a false counterblast raised disputed questions of fact. The High Court could not determine them in proceedings invoking its inherent power. Applying Renu Kumari, it held that the informant's alleged mala fides were secondary where the allegations disclosed offences. The Court observed that, if a mutual free fight was ultimately proved, each person would be responsible for his own acts and vicarious liability would not apply. It did not find that such a fight had been established. The alleged offences and the disputed identity evidence remained for trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 528 BNSS. Crime No. 382/2021, the charge-sheet filed in it and RCT No. 5794/2023 continued. The Court made no finding of guilt, did not establish that the report was a counterblast and did not decide civil title. It did not adjudicate the father's cross-case in this order.

Headnote :- Criminal Procedure Code — Sections 227–228 — framing of charge - The judge may sift the prosecution material to determine whether the alleged facts disclose the offence and raise grave suspicion. The judge must not conduct a mini-trial or require the proof needed for conviction. Applying Prafulla Kumar Samal, Ramesh Singh, Soma Chakravarty and Shoraj Singh Ahlawat, the Court distinguished strong suspicion from mere suspicion that an offence was possible. The applicant disputed the attribution of a CDR number to him. On a prima facie assessment of the alleged continuing harassment and threats of disclosure, the Court upheld the charge.

Indian Penal Code — Sections 306 and 107 — instigation of suicide - Instigation requires a positive intentional act or a continuing course of conduct, with a causal connection to the suicide. An isolated angry remark, ordinary discord or harassment alone is insufficient. The charge-sheet alleged repeated calls, pressure for a physical relationship and threats to disclose an alleged relationship, despite objections from the deceased and her husband. The woman subsequently died by consuming poison. On these allegations, the Court held that instigation could prima facie be inferred. It upheld the charge under Section 306 and dismissed the revision. Ownership of the telephone number, mens rea and causation remained to be proved at trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 09.02.2021, the First Additional Sessions Judge, Ganjbasoda, District Vidisha, framed a charge under Section 306 IPC against Ashok Ahirwar in S.T. No. 77/2020. The charge-sheet alleged that he pressured the deceased woman to enter a physical relationship and threatened to disclose what it described as an illicit relationship between them. The State relied on her husband's statement that Ashok continued to telephone and harass her despite his repeated objections. The husband had suggested that Ashok touch her feet to dispel his suspicion, but Ashok allegedly refused. After the husband learned of the matter, the woman consumed poison and died. The police filed call-detail records. In revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC, Ashok argued that no material linked mobile number 7724041619 to him. The State submitted that the husband's statement and the repeated calls supplied sufficient material to frame the charge. These were allegations and prosecution material at a preliminary stage. The Court did not determine whether the alleged relationship existed or who was the legal subscriber to the number.

2. Precedents — Considered : On framing a charge, Ajay Kumar Parmar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2013 SC 633, was quoted for the judicial duty, at cognizance, to examine the case diary and statements without deciding which evidence to believe. Soma Chakravarty v. State through CBI, 2007 AIR SCW

3683, distinguished material suggesting that the accused might have committed the offence, sufficient for a charge, from proof beyond reasonable doubt required for conviction. P. Vijayan v. State of Kerala, 2010 Cri LJ 1427, permits discharge where two possible views give rise only to suspicion rather than grave suspicion. The judge must sift the material and cannot simply act as a post office for the prosecution. State of Bihar v. Ramesh Singh, AIR 1977 SC 2018, explains that strong suspicion cannot replace proof at trial, but may justify proceeding where the proposed evidence, if accepted, could constitute the offence. Union of India v. Prafulla Kumar Samal, AIR 1979 SC 366, recognises limited sifting, consideration of broad probabilities and notice of basic infirmities under Section 227, without weighing the evidence as at trial. Niranjan Singh Karam Singh Punjabi v. Jitendra Bhimraj Bijjaya, AIR 1990 SC 1869, similarly requires the facts, taken at face value, to be tested against the ingredients of the offence, without marshalling the evidence as at the end of trial. Shoraj Singh Ahlawat v. State of U.P., AIR 2013 SC 52, discusses Sections 239–240 alongside Sections 227–228. It quotes Onkar Nath Mishra on strong suspicion, Som Nath Thapa on commission of the offence as a probable consequence, Mohanlal Soni on the prima facie inquiry and Debendra Nath Padhi on the exclusion of fresh defence material at the charge stage. The quotation also reproduces Rumi Dhar and Prafulla Kumar Samal. The High Court applied their common standard for framing a charge, without importing their unrelated facts.

On abetment of suicide, Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, explains instigation as goading, urging, provoking or encouraging. It may be inferred from continuing conduct that leaves the deceased with no alternative, but an angry remark without an intention that its consequences should follow is insufficient. Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, emphasises the accused's intention and permits an inference from the particular circumstances, without a rigid formula, especially when only a tentative view is permissible on quashing. Sanju alias Sanjay Singh Sengar v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371, explains the three forms of abetment under Section 107 and requires mens rea for instigation. Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., (2010) 1 SCC 750, M. Mohan v. State, AIR 2011 SC 1238, and Amalendu Pal v. State of W.B., (2010) 1 SCC 707, require a positive or active act, a clear mental element and a connection between the accused's conduct and the suicide; harassment alone or ordinary friction does not suffice. Amalendu Pal requires a positive act proximate to the suicide before conviction. State of W.B. v. Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73, cautions against treating hypersensitivity to ordinary discord as proof of abetment. Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797, explains instigation, conspiracy and intentional aid as the three alternatives under Section 107, and their connection with Section 109. Amit Kapur v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, considers these principles at the tentative stage of a charge or a request for quashing. It recognises that instigation may be inferred from sustained conduct without finally deciding the merits. The High Court held that the alleged repeated calls and threats of exposure could satisfy that preliminary standard, leaving proof for trial. Iqbal Singh, Surender, Sonti Rama Krishna and Ramesh Kumar appear within the extended quotations; they were not separately applied to the facts by the High Court.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 397 and 401 CrPC conferred revisional jurisdiction over the Sessions order dated 09.02.2021. Sections 227 and 228 CrPC governed discharge and framing of the charge in this Sessions trial. The inquiry concerned sufficient ground to proceed and a basis for presuming commission of the offence, rather than guilt. The quoted Supreme Court discussion also compares Sections 239 and 240 CrPC, which concern warrant cases instituted on a police report; that comparison did not alter the Sessions forum here. Section 306 IPC punishes abetment where suicide occurs. Section 107 IPC defines abetment through instigation, conspiracy followed by an act or illegal omission in pursuance of it, or intentional aid. Its explanations address wilful misrepresentation or concealment and conduct facilitating the offence. Section 109 IPC appears in the Kishori Lal quotation: where the abetted act occurs in consequence of the abetment and no express provision prescribes punishment for that abetment, the punishment for the original offence applies. It was not separately charged here. The High Court examined alleged instigation under Section 107; it did not find conspiracy or intentional aid proved.

4. Issues : Whether the material, assessed by the standard applicable to framing a charge, raised grave suspicion that Ashok had abetted the suicide under Sections 306 and 107; whether the repeated calls, pressure and threats of disclosure could amount to intentional instigation connected with the woman's suicide, rather than harassment alone or ordinary discord; and whether the absence of a document independently establishing that the mobile number belonged to Ashok required discharge at that stage. The revision did not require the High Court to decide guilt beyond reasonable doubt or finally determine the accuracy of the husband's statement.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first explained the limited inquiry under Sections 227–228. A judge may examine prosecution material and basic infirmities to decide whether the alleged facts disclose the offence and raise grave or strong suspicion. The judge must neither predict conviction nor weigh the evidence meticulously. Suspicion without the ingredients of the offence is insufficient, but a presumption founded on the material may justify a trial. The Court then examined the Section 306 charge in light of Section 107 and the Supreme Court's requirements of affirmative instigation or intentional facilitation, mens rea and a connection with the suicide. The charge-sheet alleged repeated telephone harassment despite objections from the woman and her husband, pressure for a sexual relationship and threats to disclose a relationship. The woman consumed poison after her husband learned of the matter. The Court held that continuing harassment despite those objections might amount to abetment and that a threat of disclosure would, on the alleged facts, prima facie amount to abetment. It therefore found sufficient material in the continuing harassment and alleged threat to warrant prosecution. Ashok disputed ownership of number 7724041619; the State relied on the husband's account of repeated calls and harassment. The Court did not find the telephone subscription, alleged illicit relationship, causative intention or precise sequence proved. The requirements stated in Gangula Mohan Reddy, M. Mohan and Amalendu Pal continued to govern proof at trial; the tentative inference supporting a charge did not reduce the prosecution's ultimate burden. The Sessions order disclosed no jurisdictional error.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court affirmed the order dated 09.02.2021 passed by the First Additional Sessions Judge in S.T. No. 77/2020, framing the charge under Section 306 IPC, and dismissed the criminal revision. The prosecution was to proceed to trial. The identity and significance of the CDR number, the testimony, intention, proximity and other elements remained open for proof. The Court entered no conviction or sentence.

Ashok Ahirwar v. State of M.P. and Others, Cr.R. no. 932/2021, 08/04/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Indian Penal Code — Sections 390, 391 and 395 — theft becoming robbery and dacoity - In his police statement, the complainant alleged that armed persons were removing Babool timber and threatened to kill and cut him when he confronted them during its removal. The High Court held that the threat, made to enable them to carry away the wood, prima facie supplied the fear of instant harm required by Section 390. It found the ingredients of dacoity under Section 395 available at that stage. The Court set aside the Magistrate's refusal to take cognizance under Section 395 and directed committal to the Sessions Court. It did not decide guilt.

Criminal Procedure Code — additional charge and threshold review - M.E. Shivalingamurthy, Soma Chakravarty, Shiv Charan Bansal and Fatehkaran Mehdu require grave suspicion founded on material and a limited judicial examination of the offence ingredients. The Court must not assess the probative value of the evidence as at trial or predict conviction. Here, the FIR and the statement under Section 161 supplied sufficient material at that stage. The revisional court's order upholding the Magistrate's refusal could therefore not stand.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashok Kumar Tripathi alleged that, on 22.06.2017, armed persons entered his field near Rampur Baghelan and cut Babool trees with an electric saw. After a neighbour informed him, he reached the field and found that some timber had already been removed and the rest was being carried away. He alleged that some persons carried lathi, farsa, danda and tangi. They abused him and threatened to kill or cut him if he approached. They also damaged the boundary markings, ploughed part of his land and loaded the timber onto a tractor. He stated that FIR No. 326/2018 under Section 379 IPC had been registered after he contacted the CM Helpline. The police filed a charge-sheet under Section 379. In an application under Sections 190 and 323 CrPC, he sought cognizance also under Sections 395, 447, 294, 506 Part II, 427 and 149 IPC. The JMFC, Rampur Baghelan, partly allowed the application, but on 06.09.2019 refused to take cognizance under Section 395, holding that the record disclosed neither the requisite voluntary violence nor fear of instant death, hurt or restraint. On 16.07.2022, the Additional Sessions Judge dismissed Criminal Revision No. 4/2021. Ashok challenged both orders under Section 482, relying particularly on his statement under Section 161 that the threats were made when he objected. The respondents submitted that the police had charged only theft and that the ingredients of dacoity were absent.

2. Precedents — Considered : M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. CBI, Bengaluru, (2020) 2 SCC 768, was quoted extensively on charge and discharge, drawing on P. Vijayan. Where two plausible views leave only suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge is permissible; material supporting grave suspicion may justify a charge. The judge must apply judicial mind, sift police statements and documents, consider broad probabilities and basic infirmities, and ask whether the prosecution material, accepted at face value, could constitute the offence. The judge cannot act merely as a post office for the prosecution or conduct a mini-trial by weighing probative value or a likely defence. The quotation also explains that submissions under Section 227 are confined to prosecution material, referring to Debendra Nath Padhi and Sudershan Chakkar. Those were authorities within the quotation; the High Court did not separately decide an issue about fresh defence evidence here. Soma Chakravarty v. State through CBI, (2007) 5 SCC 403, was separately quoted for the distinction between material suggesting that an accused might have committed an offence and proof beyond reasonable doubt required for conviction. It also requires factual material supporting the accused's role and the ingredients; bare suspicion does not suffice. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, (2020) 2 SCC 290, permits limited sifting under Sections 227–228 to determine grave suspicion and whether the allegations, taken at face value, disclose the offence, without meticulous weighing. Its extract discusses Ramesh Singh and Dipakbhai Jagdishchandra Patel, requiring material capable of becoming evidence at trial, rather than a prediction of conviction. State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, (2017) 3 SCC 198, explains that review under Section 397 after a charge concerns material suggesting strong suspicion of an offence, not certainty of guilt. The High Court applied these standards in correcting the refusal to take additional cognizance under Section 395 and to commit the case to Sessions. It did not use the facts of the cited decisions as proof of the allegations about timber removal.

3. Statutes considered : Section 379 IPC was the provision under which the police charged theft. Section 390 specifies the additional violence or fear of instant violence that turns theft into robbery, including where it is used for carrying away stolen property. The Court reproduced the separate branch concerning extortion, but the allegation here concerned taking timber, rather than inducing delivery by extortion. Section 391 defines dacoity where at least five persons conjointly commit or attempt robbery, counting those present and aiding the commission or attempt. Section 395 prescribes the punishment. The Court observed that the number of participants distinguishes dacoity from robbery. The application also invoked Sections 447, 294, 506 Part II, 427 and 149 IPC, but the High Court's reasoning and relief concerned Section 395; it did not independently decide those other offences. The complainant's recorded allegation was contained in a statement under Section 161 CrPC. Sections 190 and 323 were invoked for further cognizance and committal, and Section 482 for the High Court challenge to the lower orders. The Supreme Court extracts refer to Sections 227 and 228 on charge and discharge and Section 397 on revisional review. Those standards informed the preliminary inquiry without altering the procedural history of this case.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR and the statement under Section 161, alleging threats with weapons during the removal of timber, disclosed the fear of instant harm required for theft to become robbery under Section 390; whether the Magistrate and revisional court erred in finding that the recorded allegations lacked the necessary ingredients; and, if Section 395 was attracted, which court should try the case. The inquiry concerned the legal sufficiency of the alleged facts, rather than ownership of the timber or ultimate culpability.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court distinguished the statutory requirements. Section 390 concerns the specified immediate violence or threats used for theft or for carrying away property obtained by theft. Section 391 requires at least five persons acting conjointly, including persons present and aiding. The JMFC had found no allegation of the required immediate fear. Reading the FIR with Ashok's statement under Section 161, the High Court noted the account of an armed group cutting and carrying away Babool wood. Four accused allegedly abused him and threatened to kill and cut him if he approached; Chotkawa Kol, who was at the saw, also threatened to cut him. In the context of the ongoing removal, the Court found the threats prima facie sufficient for theft to become robbery under Section 390 and for the offence of dacoity under Section 395. Applying the Supreme Court standards, it held that the police decision to charge only under Section 379 did not prevent judicial cognizance of a further offence disclosed by the material. The permissible inquiry was limited sifting for the ingredients and grave suspicion, without proof sufficient for conviction. The recorded threats supplied those ingredients prima facie. The revisional order had not corrected the material illegality in refusing cognizance. As Section 395 was triable by Sessions, the Magistrate was required to take cognizance and commit the case. The Court did not determine ownership of the trees, accept the allegations as credible after testing, or find any defendant guilty.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court set aside the Additional Sessions Judge's order dated 16.07.2022 in Criminal Revision No. 4/2021 and the JMFC's order dated 06.09.2019 in RCT No. 326/2018. It directed the trial court to take cognizance under Section 395 IPC and commit the case to the Sessions Court. The application under Section 482 was disposed of. The allegations and defences remained for examination at trial. The High Court entered no conviction or sentence.

Ashok Kumar Tripathi v. Chhotelal and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 40369/2022, 15/03/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Charge — Section 91 CrPC production - Under State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, (2005) 1 SCC 568, whether a document is necessary or desirable depends on the stage of the proceedings and the party seeking it. An accused ordinarily cannot compel production of defence material at the stage of framing a charge to establish innocence. Nitya Dharmananda v. Gopal Sheelum Reddy, (2018) 2 SCC 93, permits the court, on its own satisfaction, to call for material of sterling quality withheld from the prosecution record if it has a crucial bearing on the charge. That exception gives the accused no unrestricted right to production. Here, the private transaction diary and disputed signatures did not justify invoking the exception, particularly in view of the specific ocular allegations of cheating. The revision against refusal of production was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashok Mandhwani and the other applicants faced a Sessions prosecution for cheating in Sessions Case No. 932/2015. After investigation and filing of the charge-sheet, they applied under Section 91 CrPC, at the stage of framing a charge, for production of a diary recording amounts received by a company. They relied on witnesses' statements that more money had been paid than was recorded in the diary and sought to establish that the entries did not bear their signatures. On 10 October 2018, the XII Additional Sessions Judge, Indore, rejected the application. In Criminal Revision No. 220 of 2019, under Sections 397/401 read with 482 CrPC, the applicants challenged that order and also sought allowance of an application under Section 205. The High Court considered the request for production under Section 91 and dismissed the revision, whose prayer also sought Section 205 relief.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, (2005) 1 SCC 568, was followed for the rule that necessity or desirability under Section 91 depends on the stage and on who seeks production. At the stage of framing a charge under Section 227, the relevant prosecution record is that supplied under Section 173. The accused ordinarily cannot use Section 91 to summon documents to establish a defence or innocence at that stage. The applicants relied on Nitya Dharmananda alias K. Lenin v. Gopal Sheelum Reddy alias Nithya Bhaktananda, (2018) 2 SCC 93, which permits the court to call for material of sterling quality withheld by the investigator or prosecutor, even if it was not filed with the charge-sheet, where it is crucial to deciding the charge. The High Court recognised that limited exception but emphasised that it depends on the court's satisfaction and creates no independent defence right. It found no ground for applying the exception to the requested diary.

3. Statutes considered : Section 91 CrPC permits compulsory production of a document when necessary or desirable for the investigation, inquiry, trial or other proceeding concerned. Its use at the stage of framing a charge is limited by the nature of that inquiry. Sections 173 and 227 CrPC concern the police record and the Sessions charge inquiry discussed in Debendra Nath Padhi. Sections 397/401 governed the revision, and Section 482 was also invoked. Section 205 appeared in the applicants' prayer.

4. Issues : Whether the accused could require production of a private diary under Section 91 before framing of the charge in order to dispute their connection with its entries; and whether the exception in Nitya Dharmananda for crucial, withheld material of sterling quality warranted production despite the ordinary restriction at that stage.

5. Ratio / Findings : Following Debendra Nath Padhi, the Court held that defence material ordinarily falls outside the inquiry at the stage of framing a charge. The accused cannot invoke Section 91 merely to establish innocence then. The Court recognised the limited exception in Nitya Dharmananda where it is satisfied that material withheld from the police report is of sterling quality and crucial to deciding the charge. The diary sought here was a private document, rather than a public document of which judicial notice could be taken. Even if subordinates had signed the entries on an applicant's instructions, that fact alone would not deprive the diary of probative value against the applicants. Specific ocular allegations of cheating remained. The Court was not satisfied that the request concerned crucial withheld material warranting production and found no illegality in the trial court's refusal. These findings concerned the charge stage; they did not finally determine guilt or the diary's evidentiary value at trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision and vacated the interim stay dated 23 January 2019. As the proceedings had been stayed, it directed the applicants to appear before the trial court on 14 October 2024. If they failed to appear, the trial court was free to take coercive steps to secure their attendance. A copy of the order was to be sent to the trial court. The dismissal disposed of the revision, whose prayer also sought relief under Section 205.

Headnote :- Quashing — matrimonial FIR after divorce proceedings - Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of W.B., (2002) 1 SCC 555, distinguishes civil and criminal proceedings and the standards of proof applicable to them. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, holds that delay while attempting reconciliation and the husband's filing of a divorce petition do not, by themselves, justify quashing a criminal complaint. Here, the divorce petition had been dismissed for default before the FIR was registered. The FIR contained specific allegations, and its timing did not establish that it was a counterblast.

Cruelty — continuing mental harm after leaving matrimonial home - Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, recognises that Section 498-A IPC encompasses mental as well as physical cruelty. The effects of being driven from the matrimonial home may continue while the wife stays with her parents. The allegations here concerned a demand for Rs. 10 lakh, harassment over the child's condition, assault and being compelled to remain at the parental home. They supplied grounds for refusing quashing at the preliminary stage, without deciding guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married in July 2013. She alleged that, after the birth of a child with disabilities, her husband and named relatives taunted her about the cost of the child's treatment, demanded Rs. 10 lakh from her father, assaulted or harassed her and threatened her. She also alleged that her husband repeatedly subjected her to non-consensual unnatural sexual acts and threatened her. In July 2020, she and the child were left at her parental home. She stated that her husband would not take her back unless she brought money. Crime No. 741/2021 was registered in December 2021 at City Kotwali, Shivpuri, under IPC Sections 498-A, 377, 506 and 34 and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The applicants sought quashing under Section 482, asserting that they lived separately and pointing to financial support provided by the husband. They also relied on a police circular said to require reconciliation before registration of the FIR and claimed that the complaint retaliated against the husband's divorce petition filed in September 2020. That petition had been dismissed for default on 9 November 2021. A connected anticipatory bail matter concerned a scheduled attempt at reconciliation with the husband; the parties disputed his willingness to participate.

2. Precedents — Considered : Counsel relied on Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, together with a police circular, to claim that reconciliation was required before registration of the FIR. The Court relied on Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of W.B., (2002) 1 SCC 555, which distinguishes the nature and standards of proof of civil and criminal proceedings and rejects quashing merely because civil proceedings exist. Its quotation discusses M.S. Sheriff v. State of Madras and the general preference for prompt criminal proceedings, subject to the circumstances of each case. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, rejects an adverse inference merely from a wife's delay while seeking settlement or from the husband's divorce petition. It also cautions against quashing under Section 482 on considerations outside the FIR's allegations. The High Court applied that reasoning to the sequence here. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, explains that mental cruelty under Section 498-A may continue after the wife takes shelter with her parents, and discusses recognition of those consequences under Section 179 CrPC. The High Court applied its cruelty principle to the alleged dowry-related exclusion. It did not treat any precedent as establishing the applicants' guilt.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC supplied the limited inherent jurisdiction invoked for quashing. The allegations of physical and mental cruelty and dowry harassment were considered under Section 498-A IPC. Sections 377, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the other provisions invoked in the FIR. Section 179 CrPC appears in the Rupali Devi quotation concerning continuing consequences and territorial venue; venue was not separately disputed here. The husband's divorce proceeding was civil and governed by a different standard of proof.

4. Issues : Whether registration of the FIR after the divorce petition established a retaliatory counterblast warranting quashing; whether the specific allegations disclosed cruelty and dowry harassment despite the applicants' claims of separate residence and financial support; and whether the alleged exclusion for non-payment of dowry, with continuing distress at the parental home, was relevant to Section 498-A at the preliminary stage.

5. Ratio / Findings : Although the divorce petition preceded the FIR, it had already been dismissed for default. The Court held that a wife's patience while hoping to preserve her marriage should not count against her. Applying Kamaladevi Agarwal and Pratibha, it held that civil litigation or its timing could not, by itself, displace a criminal complaint containing specific allegations. The FIR attributed physical and mental harassment and a monetary demand to the applicants. The Court observed that compelling a married woman to live with her parents because dowry had not been supplied could itself amount to cruelty. It applied Rupali Devi's recognition that mental trauma may continue after a wife leaves the matrimonial home. Because the FIR contained specific allegations, the Court refused quashing despite the submissions about separate residence and payments. Its remarks about the connected reconciliation attempt provided context; they did not finally determine criminal culpability.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 to quash Crime No. 741/2021. The FIR and criminal process remained in force. The Court made no final finding that any applicant had committed the alleged acts. This judgment did not separately decide the husband's connected application for anticipatory bail.

Headnote :- Unsoundness of mind — Section 84 IPC - Sudhakaran v. State of Kerala, (2010) 10 SCC 582, Ratanlal v. State of M.P., (1970) 3 SCC 533, and Hari Singh Gond v. State of M.P., (2008) 16 SCC 109, distinguish a medical illness from incapacity to know the nature of an act or that it is wrong or contrary to law at the time it is done. Conduct and treatment close to that time may establish the required incapacity; unusual conduct alone is insufficient. Having found that the appellant caused the two fatal shootings, the Court considered the doctor's evidence of bipolar affective disorder together with the surrounding conduct. It held that the appellant was incapable of knowing the nature or wrongfulness of his acts at the material time and acquitted him under Section 84.

Burden — insanity exception - Dahyabhai Chhaganbhai Thakkar v. State of Gujarat, as explained in Bhikari v. State of U.P., AIR 1966 SC 1, and Shrikant Anandrao Bhosale v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 7 SCC 748, requires the accused to establish the Section 84 exception on a preponderance of probabilities under Section 105 of the Evidence Act. The prosecution retains the burden of proving guilt, including the requisite mens rea, beyond reasonable doubt. Even evidence insufficient to establish the exception may raise a reasonable doubt about an ingredient of the offence. Here, the Court found the exception established.

Judicial inquiry — Section 165 Evidence Act - When the evidence raises a credible question about the accused's mental state, the judge may question witnesses or call for material to clarify the relevant facts. The judgment must nevertheless rest on relevant facts duly proved in accordance with the Act. The Court emphasised the need for active clarification of the appellant's psychiatric evidence. On acquitting him, it also directed that his continuing treatment be provided at State expense.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashok Singh appealed against his conviction dated 18 May 2010 in Sessions Trial No. 20/2004 for two murders under Section 302 IPC and attempted murder under Section 307. He had been sentenced to life imprisonment and five years' imprisonment, with fines, the terms to run concurrently. The prosecution alleged that, following a neighbourhood quarrel in October 2003, he fired at Rajabhaiya's young son Monu, who died. He later fired from his terrace at Vishal, who also died. A co-accused allegedly fired at Rajabhaiya but did not hit him. The complainant died before he could testify, but the trial court had other eyewitness testimony, post-mortem evidence and documents. Ashok challenged that evidence, sought conviction under Section 304 Part II as an alternative, and relied on a mental disorder that predated the incident. A treating doctor described bipolar affective disorder, admission to hospital on 18 October 2003, further treatment in 2004 and an abnormal mental state around the time of the incident. The trial had also been stayed for a period because of his mental condition. The Court considered his conduct after the shootings and the jail records.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, distinguishes the intention to inflict the particular injury from the objective question whether that injury is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death under Section 300 Thirdly. Arun Nivalaji More and the other homicide decisions, including Anda, Mahesh Balmiki, Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak, Pulicherla Nagaraju, Sangapagu Anjaiah and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao, were cited on the distinction under Sections 299/300, the inference of intention from the weapon and injury, and the proposed conversion to Section 304. That discussion did not displace the Section 84 exception established on the evidence. Bhikari v. State of U.P., AIR 1966 SC 1, explaining Dahyabhai Chhaganbhai Thakkar v. State of Gujarat, AIR 1964 SC 1563, places the burden of establishing the exception on the accused under Section 105, to the standard applicable in civil proceedings, while preserving the prosecution's ultimate burden to prove mens rea. The Orissa High Court's Ajaya Mahakud distinguished legal insanity from medical insanity. Sudhakaran v. State of Kerala, (2010) 10 SCC 582, likewise distinguishes a psychiatric diagnosis from the incapacity required by Section 84. Ratanlal v. State of M.P., (1970) 3 SCC 533, identifies the time of the act as the crucial time. Through Ram Bahadur Thapa, the judgment reproduced the discussion in Hari Singh Gond v. State of M.P., (2008) 16 SCC 109: conduct close to the act and medical history are relevant, whereas lack of motive or mere oddness is insufficient; a known history of insanity calls for proper medical investigation. Shrikant Anandrao Bhosale v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 7 SCC 748, reiterates the accused's burden on a preponderance of probabilities and the possibility that the evidence may nevertheless create a reasonable doubt in the prosecution case. Surendra Mishra v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2011 SC 627, was also cited on legal insanity and its proof. The Court used these authorities to assess the doctor's evidence and the appellant's conduct; it did not make a separate psychiatric diagnosis.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 299 and 300 IPC distinguish culpable homicide from murder. Section 300 Thirdly concerns the intention to inflict the proved injury and the objective sufficiency of that injury to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. The appeal challenged convictions under Sections 302 and 307; Section 304 Part II was proposed as a lesser alternative. Section 84 IPC exempts an act if, at the time it is done, unsoundness of mind makes the person incapable of knowing its nature or that it is wrong or contrary to law. Section 105 of the Evidence Act requires the court to presume the absence of circumstances bringing the case within the exception and places the burden of establishing them on the accused. Section 165 permits the judge to question witnesses and obtain material, subject to its safeguards; it does not dispense with proof of relevant facts. Section 374 CrPC provided the route of appeal.

4. Issues : Whether the eyewitness and medical evidence proved that the appellant fired the fatal shots despite the complainant's death; whether the offence should be reduced from murder to culpable homicide; whether the appellant's mental condition at the time of the acts met the requirements of Section 84, rather than merely establishing a medical diagnosis or a later disorder; and how the burden under Section 105 and the judge's powers under Section 165 applied to the evidence of his mental state.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical evidence established two homicidal gunshot deaths, and the eyewitnesses identified Ashok as the person who fired the fatal shots. The Court found that he had done the acts. It examined the principles under Sections 299/300, including Virsa Singh's test under clause Thirdly, before considering the decisive general exception. Section 84 requires incapacity to know the nature or wrongfulness of the act at the time of the shooting; a psychiatric illness by itself is insufficient. The accused may establish that incapacity on a preponderance of probabilities through evidence close to the relevant time, while the prosecution retains its ultimate burden of proof. The treating doctor described bipolar disorder and abnormal behaviour around the incident. The hospital records, Ashok's conduct on the terrace after both shootings, his surrender after the police arrived and his subsequent treatment supported the finding of incapacity. Although unusual conduct alone would not suffice, the Court held on the combined evidence that he could not know the nature or wrongfulness of his acts at the material time. Section 165 permits the judge to clarify credible evidence of such a condition instead of remaining a passive spectator, but the conclusion must still rest on proof. The established Section 84 exception resulted in acquittal, leaving no need to substitute a conviction under Section 304 Part II.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal appeal, set aside the convictions and sentences under Sections 302 and 307 IPC, and acquitted Ashok Singh under Section 84. It directed that he be informed of the result through the Jail Superintendent and released forthwith unless required in another case. As his condition persisted, his further treatment was to be provided at State expense. A copy was to be sent to the Chief Secretary for information and compliance. A copy of the judgment, together with the trial court record, was to be sent back immediately.

Ashok Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 504/2010, 10/12/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Criminal trial — collateral prosecution directions and adverse remarks - The Sessions court's earlier order summoning officials and witnesses under Section 319 had been quashed. In its later judgment of acquittal, it could not use the same demolition dispute, which lay outside the charges in the murder trial, to condemn persons not facing trial, infer their conspiracy with the deceased and direct further prosecutions and departmental action without a necessary, supported and fair basis. Adopting its companion order, the High Court set aside the directions against Ashutosh in paras 77, 79 and 80. The appeal against acquittal remained separate.

Code of Criminal Procedure — Sections 195(1)(b) and 340 — Complaint concerning an offence affecting justice - British v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 1 SCC 253, permits a court to decide whether an inquiry into a proceeding-related offence is expedient and to make a written complaint. A preliminary inquiry is discretionary. The person proceeded against has an opportunity to be heard before the Magistrate, and an appeal is available under Section 341. Here, the trial judge had not followed that procedure for false evidence. The murder-trial judgment could not instead be used to direct police registration of separate offences concerning the demolition.

Indian Penal Code — Section 99 — official act and private defence - The incorporated order rejected the Sessions court's collateral premise that demolition under an unchallenged municipal order was unlawful and gave the shooter a right of private defence. It quoted the statutory limits concerning acts done in good faith under colour of public office. It did not decide the pending appeal against acquittal or finally determine the shooter's defence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ashutosh Pandey applied under Section 482 CrPC to set aside the directions against him in paras 77, 79 and 80 of the judgment dated 21.02.2018 passed by the 3rd Additional Sessions Judge, Rewa, in S.T. No. 382/2014. The High Court held that his case was covered by its decision of the same day in M.Cr.C. No. 9246/2018. It reproduced that decision in full and then separately allowed Ashutosh's application. The incorporated case arose from the arrival of a municipal team on 26.07.2014 to demolish a house said to be dilapidated, under an official order. A possession dispute involved relatives and tenants. Rajbhan Singh allegedly fired at persons present, injuring Neeraj Singh and killing Rajlallan Singh. Crime No. 451/2014 led to the trial of Rajbhan and Ranveer for murder and attempted murder. The Sessions court had earlier invoked Section 319 to summon municipal personnel and others for conspiracy or abetment, on the view that the demolition was irregular. The High Court quashed that order on 15.12.2017 in Criminal Revision No. 3463/2017. In its subsequent judgment of acquittal, however, the Sessions court again criticised the demolition and directed registration of offences under Sections 120-B, 109, 452, 429, 325 and 119 IPC, as well as departmental action against persons including Ashutosh. On 20.03.2023, the State had separately obtained leave to appeal against acquittal, and Criminal Appeal No. 4450/2023 was registered. The present order dealt with the collateral directions against Ashutosh and left that appeal's merits open.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pritish v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 1 SCC 253, was quoted at length on Section 340 CrPC. For an alleged offence falling within Section 195(1)(b), the court considers whether a further criminal inquiry is expedient in the interest of justice. It may hold a preliminary inquiry but is not bound to do so; making a complaint is also discretionary. If it decides to complain, it must record the requisite finding and send a written complaint to the competent Magistrate. The preliminary exercise does not determine guilt. The proposed accused's statutory opportunity to contest the allegation arises in the Magistrate's process under Sections 238–240 and through an appeal under Section 341; it does not confer an automatic right to be heard before the Section 340 complaint is made. The quotation refers to M.S. Sheriff for the caution against pronouncing guilt at that stage. The High Court distinguished this procedure from the direction to register separate offences, which was not a complaint about false evidence. Niranjan Patnaik v. Shashibhusan Kar, (1986) 2 SCC 569, reproduced Mohammad Naim's tests for adverse remarks: an opportunity to answer, support in the record and necessity for deciding the case, together with sober expression. Manish Dixit v. State of Rajasthan, (2001) 1 SCC 596, requires a hearing before strictures that may seriously affect a person's career. Amar Pal Singh v. State of U.P., (2012) 6 SCC 491, emphasises restraint, moderation and corrective measures rather than unwarranted disparagement, particularly of a judicial officer. State of Gujarat v. Justice R.A. Mehta, (2013) 3 SCC 1, states the broader rule against intemperate and unnecessary remarks about parties, witnesses or courts, while preserving independent judicial decision-making. Om Prakash Chautala v. Kanwar Bhan, (2014) 5 SCC 417, treats reputation as protected and sets aside disparaging remarks against persons who were not parties and had not been heard, again applying Mohammad Naim's tests. The incorporated order applied these authorities to set aside unsupported collateral findings and directions against persons not facing trial. It did not read Pritish as requiring a prior hearing for every Section 340 complaint.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC provided the remedy against the Sessions court's collateral directions. Its earlier order under Section 319, summoning additional persons, had been quashed before the impugned judgment. Sections 195(1)(b), 340 and 341 CrPC concern the distinct procedure for a court complaint about specified offences affecting justice and the appeal from that decision. Sections 238–240 appear in Pritish's account of the subsequent proceedings before the Magistrate. The challenged police-registration directions listed Sections 120-B, 109, 452, 429, 325 and 119 IPC. Ashutosh had not been tried for those offences, and their commission was not finally adjudicated. Section 99 IPC, quoted in the incorporated reasoning, limits private defence against a public servant's act done in good faith under colour of office where no reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt arises. The quoted provision also addresses knowledge of the public office or authority and the limit of necessary harm. The validity of the demolition order was outside the charges in the murder trial, and the order had not been challenged in the proper forum.

4. Issues : Whether, after its Section 319 summoning order had been quashed, the Sessions court could use the judgment acquitting the murder accused to decide the validity and purpose of a municipal demolition and direct criminal and departmental proceedings against Ashutosh and others not facing trial; whether the direction was a permissible Section 340 complaint about false evidence or an unrelated direction for investigation; what necessity, evidentiary support and opportunity to answer were required before adverse comments against witnesses or officials; and whether Section 99 permitted the trial judge to assume that demolition under an unchallenged official order was unlawful and justified the shooter. The State's pending appeal against acquittal was outside this decision.

5. Ratio / Findings : Adopting M.Cr.C. No. 9246/2018, the Court distinguished the special procedure under Section 340 from the challenged direction. Under Pritish, a court may make a complaint about an apparent proceeding-related false-evidence offence when an inquiry is expedient, without a mandatory preliminary inquiry or prior hearing. The Sessions court had neither identified such an offence nor followed that procedure. Instead, it revisited the supposed invalidity of the municipal demolition, although that question lay outside the murder trial's charges and the competent authority's order had not been separately set aside. The earlier Section 319 summoning order had already been quashed. The High Court found the alleged conspiracy with the deceased, said to have created the circumstances of his own murder, untenable as a basis for the collateral directions. After quoting Section 99, it observed that nothing on record supported a finding that the officials had acted without good faith under the unchallenged demolition order. The correctness of that order was outside the trial's subject matter. The High Court refrained from deciding the merits of the acquittal because the State's appeal had been registered. Applying Niranjan Patnaik, Manish Dixit, Amar Pal Singh, R.A. Mehta and Om Prakash Chautala, it held that adverse judicial remarks affecting reputation and careers require relevance, evidentiary support, necessity, an opportunity to explain and restrained expression. The directions against Ashutosh and the others failed those requirements and exceeded the trial court's jurisdiction. Setting them aside did not acquit anyone of a new charge or decide the murder appeal.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application and set aside, as against Ashutosh, the directions in paras 77, 79 and 80 of the Sessions judgment dated 21.02.2018 in S.T. No. 382/2014. It incorporated the reasoning in the companion M.Cr.C. No. 9246/2018, but the operative relief in this order was expressly confined to the present applicant. It did not decide the underlying acquittal or the State's pending appeal.

Ashutosh Pandey v. State of Madhya Pradesh, M.Cr.C. no. 10230/2018, 28/06/2023, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- MMDR Act / compounding - Applying Jayant v State of M.P., Criminal Appeal Nos. 824–825/2020 (3 December 2020), the Court held that Section 23-A(2) bars further proceedings for the MMDR or rule offence actually compounded, but does not bar proceedings for a distinct IPC offence such as theft under Section 379. Payment of Rs 89,375 for the mining violation therefore did not bring the criminal proceedings or the dispute over custody of the dumper to an end.

Owner's power of attorney / illegal sand transport - The power of attorney gave the driver ordinary powers to operate the dumper and deal with accident-related matters. It neither authorised criminal acts nor made the driver alone responsible for criminal liability. It had also been executed after seizure of the vehicle. On this record, it did not justify release of the dumper or absolve the owner of liability. The Court did not finally determine guilt.

Seized property / interim release - The dumper, allegedly carrying a large quantity of illegally excavated sand concealed beneath black soil, was important evidence. The High Court upheld refusal of supurdagi under Sections 451 and 457 CrPC because it considered that the applicant could destroy that evidence if the vehicle were released. Its earlier decision in Banti treated recovery of penalty and royalty as, at most, satisfaction of civil liability. Counsel also relied on Sundarbhai Ambalal Desai, (2002) 10 SCC 283.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Police at Billaua, Gwalior, registered Crime No. 137/2020 under Section 379 IPC and Section 21(4) of the MMDR Act after a dumper was found carrying about 500 feet of allegedly illegally excavated sand beneath a six-inch layer of dust or black soil. Ashwani Kumar claimed to own the Ashok Leyland dumper bearing registration MP 07 GA 3687. He submitted that the Mining Department had compounded the transportation violation and that he had paid Rs 89,375. On 11 November 2020, the Judicial Magistrate First Class, Dabra, rejected his application for interim release under Sections 451/457 CrPC. In revision under Section 397, he contended that a power of attorney made the driver, Anil Parihar, solely responsible, and that compounding and the authority cited on release of property entitled him to supurdagi. The State opposed release, relying on concealment of the sand and the continuing criminal liability. The dumper had been seized on 18 August 2020; the power of attorney was executed later, on 1 November 2020.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court quoted and applied the Supreme Court's five-part conclusion in Jayant v State of Madhya Pradesh, Criminal Appeal Nos. 824–825/2020, decided on 3 December 2020. Jayant distinguishes registration and investigation from cognizance under Section 22 of the MMDR Act. An authorised complaint is required when the court takes cognizance and issues process for an MMDR offence. Police may investigate, after which the authorised officer may lodge a complaint. For the present case, its directly relevant conclusion under Section 23-A was that lawful compounding bars further proceedings for the MMDR or rule offence compounded, while distinct IPC proceedings, including theft, may continue. The High Court also quoted its decision i*n Banti v State of MP*, MCRC 37312/2020: recovery of penalty and royalty amounts, at most, to satisfaction of civil liability and does not bar proceedings under the IPC or another statute.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 451 and 457 CrPC governed the request for interim custody of the seized dumper, and Section 397 governed the revision. Section 21(4) of the MMDR Act was the mining provision invoked in the FIR. Section 23-A concerns the limited effect of compounding, while Section 22 requires an authorised complaint at the stage of cognizance, as explained in Jayant. Section 379 IPC concerned the distinct allegation of theft. The order did not finally determine all the ingredients of either alleged offence or the applicant's guilt.

4. Issues : Whether compounding and payment of the MMDR penalty required the IPC proceedings to end or the dumper to be released; whether the owner's power of attorney placed responsibility for any unlawful use solely on the driver; and whether interim custody should be granted despite concealment of the load and the Court's stated need to preserve the dumper as evidence.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying Jayant, the Court rejected the contention that payment of the mining penalty ended liability for a distinct IPC offence. Banti's treatment of penalty and royalty as satisfaction of civil liability supported that distinction. The power of attorney conferred ordinary powers concerning operation of the dumper and accidents; it did not authorise criminal acts or make the driver alone responsible for them. Its execution after seizure was a further reason why the owner could not rely on it. The quantity of sand and its deliberate concealment were material to the custody decision. The Court regarded the dumper as important evidence that the applicant could destroy if it were returned. These findings supported refusal of interim custody; they did not finally establish that the owner had committed theft. On the facts before it, the JMFC had not erred in refusing release under Sections 451/457.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision. The JMFC's order of 11 November 2020 refusing supurdagi of the specified dumper remained in force. The High Court did not grant release on alternative security or terminate the separate IPC proceedings.

Ashwani Kumar v. State of MP, Cr.R. no. 2291/2020, 13/01/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 482 / partial quashing in matrimonial offence - Taken at face value, the allegations that the husband and mother-in-law demanded money, harassed the complainant and renewed the demand after she left the matrimonial home disclosed a case for trial under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Applying Taramani Parakh v State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, the Court left the truth of those specific allegations for trial.

Delay in FIR / threshold - Applying Mohammad Wajid v State of U.P., AIR 2023 SC 3784, the Court held that delay in registering the FIR, by itself, did not justify quashing. It observed that a woman subjected to ill-treatment by her in-laws generally tries to preserve her marriage before reporting it. Delayed reporting alone did not show that the allegations were false; their credibility remained a matter for trial.

Relatives / specificity of accusation - The FIR contained no allegation against the sister-in-law, Jyoti Nayak. The later statement under Section 161 referred to her collectively with the other in-laws in its account of early events but attributed no specific role to her in the later incidents. Applying Kans Raj v State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, Monju Roy v State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693, and Chandralekha v State of Rajasthan, the Court held that the vague, general allegations did not warrant her prosecution. It quashed the proceedings only against Jyoti, leaving the husband's and mother-in-law's prosecution to continue.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Madhulika Mishra alleged that, after her marriage to Asish Mishra on 21 January 2004, he and his mother, Chandraprabha Mishra, demanded money and subjected her to mental harassment, followed by physical harassment. She alleged that her father paid Rs 2 lakh after the birth of their first daughter. On 18 May 2020, according to her, the husband sent her and their daughters to her parental home, requiring her to bring Rs 50 lakh before returning. She further alleged that he and his mother renewed the demand there on 13 July 2020 and took away the daughters. She sought reconciliation through a family counselling centre before lodging the FIR on 6 November 2020 at Civil Lines, Chhatarpur, as Crime 643/2020. The FIR attributed no act to the sister-in-law, Jyoti Nayak. In her statement under Section 161 CrPC, Madhulika named Jyoti collectively with the other in-laws in the early allegations of scolding and demands for money. The later incidents were attributed only to the husband and mother-in-law.

2. Precedents — Considered : Taramani Parakh v State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted and applied to the husband and mother-in-law: where the complaint alleges dowry harassment and forced separation, whether cruelty actually occurred is for trial. Its quotation from Kailash Chandra Agrawal v State of U.P., (2014) 16 SCC 551, requires a specific role for distant relatives and recognises quashing where the proceedings are an abuse of process. Kans Raj and other decisions appeared within that quotation as supporting authorities; they did not determine the husband's guilt in the present case. Mohammad Wajid v State of U.P., AIR 2023 SC 3784, supplied the directly applied rule that delay in lodging the FIR alone does not justify quashing. For Jyoti, the Court separately quoted and applied Kans Raj v State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, which cautions against implicating all in-laws merely through kinship or conjecture. Monju Roy v State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693, requires scrutiny of a relative's actual role rather than general allegations against the family; it reproduced Kans Raj and Raja Lal Singh as supporting examples. Chandralekha v State of Rajasthan illustrated abuse of process through very general allegations against relatives, particularly where the married sister-in-law's role and residence were unclear. The High Court applied these authorities to assess the allegations against each applicant; it did not require proof sufficient for conviction at the Section 482 stage.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the exercise of inherent jurisdiction to quash proceedings. Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the provisions invoked for alleged cruelty and dowry offences; guilt was not finally determined. The Court compared the later police statement under Section 161 CrPC with the FIR to assess Jyoti's individual role. Its inquiry concerned whether the allegations were legally sufficient for prosecution, rather than whether they had been proved at trial.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR warranted quashing against the husband and mother-in-law because it was lodged after a long marriage and without an earlier police complaint; whether the FIR and later police statement attributed a sufficiently specific role in dowry-related cruelty to Jyoti to justify her prosecution; and whether the connected applications required different outcomes for the respective applicants.

5. Ratio / Findings : The FIR and the statement under Section 161 attributed identifiable demands and physical or mental cruelty to Asish and Chandraprabha. Under Taramani Parakh, the Court could not resolve the disputed truth of those allegations against the complainant at the quashing stage when they disclosed a case for trial. Applying Mohammad Wajid, it rejected delay alone as a ground for quashing. Its observation that a woman generally tries to save her marriage before reporting ill-treatment explained why delayed reporting alone did not establish falsity; it did not establish that the allegations were proved. Jyoti's position was different. The FIR made no accusation against her, and the word ‘in-laws’ could not be extended in a penal case to every relative of the husband. The later statement under Section 161 contained a collective allegation about early events but gave her no role in the specific later incidents. Applying Kans Raj, Monju Roy and Chandralekha, the Court required a specific individual role or material beyond vague, general allegations. Even taken at face value, the statement did not warrant Jyoti's prosecution. This was a limited determination under Section 482; it did not acquit the remaining accused or resolve credibility for trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application of Asish and Chandraprabha, leaving their prosecution under Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act to continue. It allowed Jyoti Nayak's application and quashed the FIR, charge sheet and consequential proceedings against her.

Headnote :- Further investigation — rejected closure report - After the Magistrate rejected the 2017 closure report in Crime No. 131/2014, the direction for further investigation required the police to act. Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. Recording a few statements nearly four years later, followed by another period of inactivity, did not fulfil that duty. The High Court left the merits of the later closure report for the Magistrate to decide.

Case diary — contemporaneous record - Paragraph 642 of the Madhya Pradesh Police Regulations required the investigating officer to record the action taken each day in the case diary. The statements said to have been recorded in 2021 lacked corresponding case-diary proceedings and support in the station registers. The Court found the records prima facie suspect and directed an inquiry to fix responsibility. It did not decide the criminal allegations against the original suspects.

Police oversight — DGP inquiry - The pending investigation was not brought to light through the SP's monthly supervision, and he delegated the inquiry required for his response to the Court. In the continuing proceedings under Article 226, the Court directed the DGP to inquire personally into the officers' responsibility and to register an offence under the pre-amendment Section 13(1)(d) of the Prevention of Corruption Act against the former investigating officer and SHO. The DGP had to report within a month. The finding of a corruption offence was expressly prima facie.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Atul Mandlekar lodged Crime No. 131/2014 at Kotwali, Balaghat, under Sections 448, 452, 294, 427 and 506 IPC. The police filed a closure report, which the CJM rejected in 2017 while directing further investigation. The petitioner complained that neither meaningful investigation nor a final report followed. He sought prompt completion of the investigation, exclusion of the earlier officer from it and an inquiry into responsibility. On 12 March 2024, the High Court called for the SP's explanation and the minutes of the monthly crime-control meetings after finding that the photocopy of the diary produced in a sealed cover lacked records of the later work claimed by the police. At the March hearing, the CSP produced the Jarayam Register and Rojnamcha. The Court found that no investigation had been conducted between rejection of the closure report and 2021, that several statements allegedly recorded lacked contemporaneous diary entries, and that the registers did not corroborate the claimed work. A new closure report had since been filed and was pending before the CJM. The SP stated that the case had not been shown as pending in the monthly meetings. He had entrusted the inquiry required for his response to the Court to an Additional SP.

2. Precedents — Considered : The petitioner referred to Rajendra Singh Pawar v. State of M.P. in seeking compliance with the police general-diary requirements. In examining the records before it, the Court applied the Magistrate's earlier direction for further investigation, Section 173(1) CrPC and the Police Regulations.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided the jurisdiction to examine the police's response. Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of an investigation without unnecessary delay. Rejection of the closure report and the direction for further investigation required lawful investigative action and a further report. The Madhya Pradesh Police Regulations required daily entries of investigative action in the case diary; the petition also invoked paragraph 634 concerning the general diary. For its prima facie finding of suspected undue advantage, the Court invoked the pre-2018 version of Section 13(1)(d) of the Prevention of Corruption Act. The IPC provisions in the original FIR formed the factual background; their ingredients were not adjudicated.

4. Issues : Whether the police could leave the investigation inactive after the Magistrate rejected the closure report; whether the claimed recording of statements in 2021 was supported by contemporaneous entries in the case diary, Rojnamcha and Jarayam Register; whether the conduct of the investigating and supervisory officers required a personal inquiry by the DGP and registration of a corruption case; and whether the High Court should examine the merits of the new closure report while it remained pending. The Court left that last question for the Magistrate.

5. Ratio / Findings : Rejection of the closure report in 2017 did not end the investigation. The direction for further investigation still required action, and the years of inactivity contravened that direction and Section 173(1). Paragraph 642 required a daily record of investigative action, but no diary entries existed for several dates on which statements were said to have been recorded. The July 2021 entry did not reliably explain those earlier claims. The absence of contemporaneous records prevented verification and led the Court to suspect manipulation. The SP's explanation about monthly supervision was insufficient: the register did not record the investigation as closed, yet the case had not been shown as pending, and he had delegated the inquiry required for his response to the Court. The Court drew a prima facie inference that the former investigating officer and SHO intended to give the original accused an undue advantage. It invoked the pre-amendment corruption provision and directed the DGP personally to inquire into the other officers' responsibility. These directions neither decided the merits of the original FIR nor finally determined any individual's guilt of corruption.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court directed the DGP to conduct the inquiry personally, without delegation, and fix the responsibility of the SP, Additional SP, CSP, current and former SHO, and investigating officer. It directed registration of a case under Section 13(1)(d) of the Prevention of Corruption Act against the former investigating officer and SHO. Other persons could also be implicated if the inquiry disclosed their involvement in the offence. The report, supported by the DGP's affidavit, was due within one month, and the matter was listed for 22 April 2024. The police case diary and Jarayam Register were returned. The later closure report remained pending before the CJM, and the High Court made no final finding on it.

Headnote :- Pre-arrest protection / writ investigation - Applying Neeharika Infrastructure v State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, the Court held that, when declining to stay or quash an investigation, it could not nevertheless direct the police not to arrest the accused during that investigation. The passage quoted from Habib Abdullah Jeelani, (2017) 2 SCC 779, explains that such an order would effectively grant protection under Section 438 CrPC without satisfying its conditions. The accused agents had filed no copies of the FIRs and established no basis for a general stay of arrest.

Investigation agency / accused's role - Applying Romila Thapar v Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, and Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626, the Court rejected the accused persons' claim to choose an SIT, STF or CBI investigation or dictate how it should be conducted. Divine Retreat Centre recognises the High Court's power under Article 226 to give appropriate directions where mala fide investigation is established. Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571, requires exceptional circumstances for a CBI transfer. No such grounds were shown here.

Monitoring / supervision - Manohar Lal Sharma v Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, distinguishes monitoring to ensure a free and timely investigation from supervision that directs how the investigator forms an opinion under Section 173(2) CrPC. Such supervision risks influencing the trial court's later decision. The directions sought by the petitioners would have amounted to impermissible supervision.

Individual role / other suspects - The agents admitted persuading people to deposit money and receiving commissions. They could not avoid investigation merely because the company principals were allegedly not being pursued. The Court noted the statutory procedures for proceeding against other persons at later stages. It dismissed the Article 226 petition without finally determining the petitioners' guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The petitioners stated that they had worked as agents of companies which collected substantial investments without banking permission and later defrauded the depositors. They alleged that the police were targeting employees and agents rather than the company principals. An investor who was also a journalist had filed a PIL, WP 17126/2021, which remained pending. The petitioners conceded that they had persuaded members of the public to invest and had received commissions in addition to salaries. In WP 29556/2024 under Article 226, they sought protection from arrest, action on their police complaints, constitution of an SIT/STF or transfer to the CBI, seizure of other persons' bank accounts to protect investors, court monitoring, and action under the Multi State Cooperative Societies Act. They did not produce copies of the FIRs in which they said they were wanted. Counsel also sought a writ of quo warranto against the Superintendent of Police on the ground that he was not performing his duties properly. After the Court explained that the remedy concerns eligibility to hold public office, counsel withdrew that prayer.

2. Precedents — Considered : Neeharika Infrastructure v State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, was quoted and applied to refuse a direction against coercive steps while allowing the investigation to continue. Its discussion of State of Telangana v Habib Abdullah Jeelani, (2017) 2 SCC 779, explains that an order against arrest, made while declining to quash, effectively grants relief under Section 438 without its conditions. Romila Thapar v Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was quoted at length and applied to the accused's claim to choose an agency or dictate the manner of investigation. It brings together Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt, E. Sivakumar and Divine Retreat Centre on the accused's limited role, while recognising appropriate directions under Article 226 where mala fides are established. The Romila Thapar quotation also reproduces the Constitution Bench's caution in Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571, that transfer to the CBI is exceptional. The Court separately quoted Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626. Its discussion includes W.N. Chadha on the absence of an ordinary right to prior hearing or participation during investigation, Rajesh Gandhi on selection of the agency, and Sri Bhagwan Samardha and Narender G. Goel on further investigation and the opportunity to challenge evidence at trial. These authorities supplied the supporting principles; they did not independently determine the present agents' guilt. The High Court also cited its own decision in Prabal Dogra on the accused's role in investigation. Manohar Lal Sharma v Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, was separately quoted and applied to distinguish monitoring for impartial and timely progress from supervision that controls the investigator's method or opinion.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided the writ jurisdiction. Section 482 CrPC appears in the quoted precedent concerning orders against arrest. Section 438 CrPC provides the separate remedy of anticipatory bail; an unconditional writ direction staying arrest could not be used to bypass its conditions. Section 173(2) CrPC concerns the investigating officer's report, whose conclusion judicial supervision must not predetermine. The Court referred to Sections 319 and 190 CrPC, and the corresponding Sections 358 and 210 BNSS, as procedures for proceeding against persons omitted from the prosecution at later stages. Action under the Multi State Cooperative Societies Act was requested, but the Court did not interpret that enactment. The FIRs were not produced, so no particular provision governing the alleged fraud was established before the Court.

4. Issues : Whether agents who had solicited investments for commission could obtain a general writ direction against arrest; whether, as accused persons, they could require the police to pursue the company principals, choose another investigating agency or obtain judicial supervision of the investigation; whether exceptional circumstances justified transfer to the CBI; and whether failure to prosecute other suspected principals removed the agents' own prima facie liability. The quo warranto prayer was withdrawn and was not decided as an issue concerning the merits of the criminal allegations.

5. Ratio / Findings : The petitioners' failure to produce the FIRs, together with their admitted solicitation of investments for commission, did not support blanket protection from arrest. Under Neeharika and Habib Abdullah Jeelani, the Court could not leave the investigation intact yet direct the police not to arrest, thereby bypassing the separate conditions under Section 438. Romila Thapar and Dinubhai establish that an accused has no ordinary right to control the agency, method or conduct of an investigation. That rule preserves judicial intervention on established mala fides and the accused's later opportunity to defend the case. The petitioners showed no exceptional circumstances for transfer to the CBI under the constitutional limits explained in the quoted authorities. Applying Manohar Lal Sharma, the Court held that the requested directions would amount to supervision rather than monitoring. They could improperly influence the police report and the trial. The petitioners' admitted persuasion of investors and receipt of commissions supplied a prima facie basis for refusing to absolve them merely because the company owners might also be liable. Statutory procedures remained available for proceeding against other persons at later stages. The decision refused writ relief; it did not convict the petitioners or hold that every investment agent was criminally liable.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition, granting none of the requested directions against arrest or for transfer of the investigation, bank-account action or court monitoring. It dismissed the quo warranto prayer as withdrawn. The petition was not clubbed with the pending investor PIL because their subject matters differed. The Court did not finally determine any company principal's liability or any agent's guilt.

Headnote :- Look-out circular / travel permission — The petitioner was facing prosecution under Sections 498A/506/34 IPC and the Dowry Prohibition Act, but had appeared, obtained bail and secured the trial court's permission to travel abroad. An LOC issued during investigation remained in force, and immigration officials stopped him at Hyderabad on 20 September 2024. The Home Ministry's OM of 22 February 2024 required the originating agency to review the LOC, communicate relevant court orders and seek prompt deletion when it was no longer required. The State's subsequent withdrawal of the LOC made the prayer for quashing academic; it did not erase the completed violation of liberty. Satwant Singh Sawhney, Maneka Gandhi and Satish Chandra Verma supported the right to travel abroad under Article 21. Puttaswamy supplied the framework for lawful and proportionate restrictions. The Court also discussed the Bombay High Court's decision in Viraj Chetan Shah, noting the pending Supreme Court challenge and its interim order requiring permission to travel. It did not treat that interim order as a final decision on the merits.

Constitutional compensation — Following Rudul Sah, Sebastian Hongray, Bhim Singh, Saheli, People's Union for Democratic Rights, D.K. Basu and Nilabati Behera, the Court awarded Rs 5 lakh compensation against the State under Article 226 for the unlawful airport restraint and infringement of Articles 21/19. The State had to deposit the amount in the Registry within one month and recover it from the responsible officers' salaries. The petitioner remained free to seek damages in a civil suit. In default of deposit, recovery and contempt proceedings were directed. The Court quoted Ravikant S. Patil on the State's responsibility to pay and the procedure preceding personal action against an officer.

Police accountability — The misleading account of disciplinary action, the unexplained transfer of the inquiry to Katni and the lack of effective action against the former SHO led the Court to direct a departmental inquiry through the DGP, to be completed within six months. It also required consideration of the SPs' responsibility with reasons, review of possible criminal or service action, and compliance with the service-record and reporting directions. The Court did not decide the underlying matrimonial charges.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Avijit Sharma filed WP 28981/2024 under Article 226 to challenge an LOC relating to Crime 108/2021 at Mahila Thana, Jabalpur, and his detention at Hyderabad International Airport on 20 September 2024. He was employed by Google and was travelling to the United States for work. He faced trial in RCT 964/2022 under Sections 498A and 506 read with 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. After service of a notice under Section 41A, filing of the charge-sheet and his appearance before the court, he obtained bail. Trial-court orders dated 29 July and 19 September 2024 permitted him to travel abroad. Immigration officials nevertheless refused departure because an LOC issued from Jabalpur during investigation remained active, although he produced the court's permission. He stated that the alert had never been disclosed to him. The Jabalpur SP sought deletion on 26 September, and the Bureau of Immigration confirmed closure on 27 September. The State contended that withdrawal had made the challenge academic and that the travel permission had not been adequately or promptly communicated. Its return also stated that the then SHO, Shabana Parvez, had been suspended and was facing an inquiry. When the Court called for the record in January 2025, it found that the preliminary process had stalled and had been shifted to Katni, where she had subsequently been posted.

2. Precedents — Considered : K.S. Puttaswamy (nine judges) was quoted on the breadth of Article 21 and the requirements of legality, a legitimate aim, proportionality and safeguards against abuse when restricting protected rights. Francis Coralie Mullin was cited on the right to live with dignity. Satwant Singh Sawhney, Maneka Gandhi and Satish Chandra Verma supplied the principles governing the right to travel abroad. The Bombay High Court's decision in Viraj Chetan Shah was discussed in the context of LOCs. The Court noted the pending Supreme Court challenge and reproduced the interim direction that the litigants seek High Court permission to travel while the SLPs were pending. It did not treat that order as an affirmation or reversal of the Bombay decision on its merits.

Sebastian M. Hongray, Bhim Singh, Saheli and People's Union for Democratic Rights illustrated public-law remedies for unlawful State action, the State's responsibility and its recourse against the officials concerned. Rudul Sah supported monetary redress beyond an order of release. D.K. Basu and Nilabati Behera were quoted at length on compensation under Articles 21, 32 and 226. They explain that strict constitutional liability is distinct from the private-law remedy of damages in tort, and that sovereign immunity is no defence to the constitutional remedy. Ravikant S. Patil was also quoted: on its handcuffing facts, the Supreme Court required the State to pay and an inquiry before further action against the officer or an adverse service entry. The nested authorities, including Kasturilal, explained that distinction; they did not directly decide Sharma's case.

3. Statutes considered : The Court explained that LOCs are issued under the Ministry of Home Affairs' administrative and executive instructions, rather than a specific LOC provision in the CrPC. It reproduced the consolidated OM of 22 February 2024. Clauses 6(B), (G), (J), (K) and (N) respectively deal with approval by the competent originating authority, the originating agency's legal liability, quarterly and annual review with immediate deletion when the person is no longer wanted, communication of court orders, and urgent amendment or deletion following judicial directions or completion of the LOC's purpose.

4. Issues : Whether the withdrawn LOC still required an order of quashing; whether the originating agency had to review and delete an investigation-stage LOC after the accused had joined the trial, obtained bail and secured permission to travel; whether the airport restraint violated his rights to travel, personal liberty and occupation; whether compensation remained available after withdrawal and could be recovered from the responsible officers; and whether the police inquiry and representations made to the Court required action by the DGP. The Court did not determine guilt on the matrimonial allegations, cancellation of bail or the validity of a continuing LOC.

5. Ratio / Findings : The originating police showed no continuing need for the LOC or risk of flight after the petitioner had surrendered, obtained bail, appeared regularly and secured permission to travel. The State was represented in the trial proceedings by its prosecutor, and the OM imposed review and communication duties on the originating agency. It could not simply await notice or rely on the short interval between the order of 19 September and the proposed departure. The restraint on 20 September violated Article 21 and, because the journey was for work, Article 19. Subsequent travel did not undo that violation. Closure of the LOC made prospective quashing academic. The disciplinary record called by the Court showed no substantial action after the show-cause notices and revocation of suspension despite the officer's non-cooperation. The transfer of the inquiry to Katni had no explained jurisdictional basis when every material event had occurred in Jabalpur. The Court found the State's account of serious disciplinary action misleading and intended to protect the officer.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the writ petition. It directed the State to deposit Rs 5 lakh compensation in the Registry within one month for withdrawal by the petitioner, and to recover the amount from the salaries of Shabana Parvez and the erring Jabalpur SP. The petitioner remained free to bring a civil suit for damages. In default of deposit, the Registrar General was to initiate recovery and register a contempt petition under Article 215 and Sections 10 and 12 of the Contempt of Courts Act. The DGP was to review whether the identified Jabalpur and Katni officers required action under criminal or service law and submit a report by 5 March 2025. He was also to institute a formal departmental inquiry against Parvez through an officer of at least SP rank who had never served in either district, and conclude it within six months. The DGP had to decide the departmental responsibility of the SPs who authorised or failed to review the LOC, with a reasoned decision under the OM requirements. A copy of the order was to be placed in the service books, with a report of compliance within one month. These directions for review and inquiry did not themselves convict the officers or decide the underlying IPC/Dowry Act trial.

Headnote :- Quashing — FIR detail - Following State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, the Court held that Section 482 does not permit scrutiny of the allegations as at a criminal trial. An FIR need not describe every incident in detail if its allegations, taken at face value, disclose a cognizable offence. The wife alleged specific demands for property and costly goods, assaults, strangulation, threats and mental harassment. The Court therefore rejected the husband's objection that the FIR lacked sufficient detail.

Cruelty — Section 498-A IPC - The Court held that cruelty is not confined to harassment over an unfulfilled dowry demand. Grave wilful conduct endangering a woman's health falls within a separate limb of the provision. In any event, the FIR also alleged specific demands. The Court therefore found that the allegations disclosed the ingredients required for prosecution at this stage.

Territory — continuing mental cruelty - Applying Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, the Court held that the mental trauma caused by matrimonial cruelty may continue after a woman takes shelter at her parental home. The wife alleged that physical and mental abuse had compelled her to live with her parents and that her distress continued there. On those allegations, Jabalpur police could register and investigate the case even though much of the alleged conduct had occurred in Pune or Hyderabad.

Preliminary inquiry — Section 154 CrPC - Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, as explained in CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2021, permits a preliminary inquiry in illustrative categories where the circumstances warrant it. Such an inquiry is not invariably mandatory or an accused's entitlement. Where the information clearly discloses a cognizable offence, the police must register the FIR. Applying that principle, the Court held that the omission to conduct a preliminary inquiry did not invalidate this FIR.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The applicant and the complainant married in April 2016. She alleged that her husband and mother-in-law subjected her to mental harassment after the marriage. According to her, the husband demanded a flat, car and costly electronic and household goods, assaulted or strangled her, and threatened divorce and abandonment. They lived at different times in Pune and Hyderabad. She stated that physical and mental abuse had forced her to return to her parents in Jabalpur, where the separation and threats continued. She also asked the police to prevent his feared departure abroad; the Court did not decide that passport-related request. Crime No. 108/2021 was registered at Mahila Thana, Madan Mahal, Jabalpur, under IPC Sections 498-A, 506 and 34 and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4. The husband sought quashing under Section 482 of the FIR and the subsequent charge-sheet proceedings. He contended that the allegations lacked sufficient detail, that the alleged cruelty was not connected with dowry, that Jabalpur police lacked territorial jurisdiction and that no preliminary inquiry had been held.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, was applied for the rule that an FIR need not be an encyclopedia and that Section 482 does not permit scrutiny as at trial. Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo, Sangeeta Agrawal, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha were also listed as supporting the limits on quashing. The Court quoted Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, on mental cruelty continuing after a woman takes shelter at her parents' home, and applied it to uphold Jabalpur's territorial competence. It cited its own Amar Singh v. Vimla for the same principle. Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P.,

(2014) 2 SCC 1, required registration where the information discloses a cognizable offence, while permitting a limited inquiry where the circumstances warrant one. CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2021, analysed Lalita Kumari and later decisions, including Managipet, Yashwant Sinha and Charansingh, in the context of corruption allegations. That discussion explained that the need for a preliminary inquiry depends on the facts, is not invariably mandatory or an accused's right, and concerns disclosure of an offence rather than the ultimate truth of the allegations. The High Court applied that principle to the matrimonial FIR. It did not treat the corruption examples as creating a mandatory requirement of inquiry in this case.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the request for quashing. Section 154 requires registration when the information discloses a cognizable offence. IPC Section 498-A covers both grave wilful conduct and harassment connected with a dowry demand; a demand is not indispensable to the former, and the complaint alleged demands as well. IPC Sections 506 and 34 and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4 were among the provisions invoked, but were not independently analysed. The Court upheld territorial competence on the alleged continuing consequences of cruelty at the parental home, applying Rupali Devi. It did not adjudicate any separate passport provision.

4. Issues : Whether the allegations in the FIR were sufficiently specific to disclose cognizable cruelty without an appraisal as at trial; whether an unfulfilled dowry demand is necessary in every case of cruelty; whether Jabalpur police could investigate when the earlier marital acts occurred in other cities but the complainant alleged continuing mental harm at her parental home; and whether the absence of a preliminary inquiry invalidated this matrimonial FIR.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court found that the FIR alleged specific demands and repeated forms of harassment. The FIR did not have to state every date or detail, and Section 482 did not permit the Court to resolve those disputed matters as at trial. The Court also rejected the contention that Section 498-A applies only to harassment over dowry. It identified the independent limb concerning grave wilful conduct and noted that the FIR alleged specific demands in any event. Applying Rupali Devi, it held that residence with parents compelled by physical and mental abuse could perpetuate mental cruelty at Jabalpur. The allegations therefore supported registration and investigation there. CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi explained that the need for an inquiry in Lalita Kumari's illustrative categories depends on the circumstances and that any such inquiry is confined to ascertaining whether a cognizable offence is disclosed. The omission to hold it did not invalidate this FIR, which disclosed a cognizable offence. These conclusions concerned a prima facie case for prosecution; they did not establish that the alleged acts had been proved.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application to quash Crime No. 108/2021 and the subsequent proceedings. The Jabalpur investigation and charge-sheet remained undisturbed. The order did not decide guilt, adjudicate the complainant's request for seizure of the passport, or finally determine any objection to trial jurisdiction on evidence.

Avijit Sharma v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 9662/2022, 14/03/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Look out circular — originating agency — continuing review and deletion - Under the MHA Office Memorandum of 22.02.2024, the originating agency must review an LOC periodically, seek immediate deletion when the person is no longer wanted, communicate relevant court orders urgently and respond promptly when the person is detected at a checkpoint. An LOC does not expire automatically. Jabalpur police left the investigation-stage LOC in force after the petitioner had responded to the Section 41-A notice, appeared before the trial court, obtained bail and secured permission to travel abroad. The Court held that using that LOC to stop him at Hyderabad airport was unjustified. As the LOC had been deleted by 27.09.2024, no further order quashing it was required.

Constitution — Articles 21 and 19 — foreign travel - Satwant Singh Sawhney, Maneka Gandhi, Satish Chandra Verma, Puttaswamy and Francis Coralie Mullin explain the protection of travel, personal liberty and dignity, subject to lawful and proportionate restrictions. Read together, the trial court's orders of 29.07.2024 and 19.09.2024 permitted the petitioner's journey to the USA. Any alleged breach of bail conditions had to be taken before the court; it did not justify police reliance on an LOC that should have been withdrawn. The restraint on 20.09.2024 violated Article 21 and, because the journey was for work, Article 19. Subsequent travel did not undo that violation.

Article 226 — public-law compensation and state recourse - Applying Rudul Sah, Bhim Singh, D.K. Basu and Nilabati Behera, the Court directed the State to deposit Rs. 5 lakh in its Registry within one month and preserved the petitioner's right to seek damages in a civil suit. The State had to recover the payment from the salaries of the former SHO and the erring Jabalpur SP. Failure to deposit would require recovery proceedings and registration of a contempt petition. The order did not record an existing finding of contempt or a recovery already completed.

Police accountability — LOC and departmental process - The Court directed the DGP to examine supervisory responsibility, institute a departmental inquiry against the former SHO through an appropriately ranked officer from outside the two districts, consider proceedings against the superintendents and submit a report by the specified date.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Avijit Sharma faced trial in a matrimonial case at Jabalpur under Sections 498-A, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3–4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, arising from Crime No. 108/2021 at Mahila Thana. A notice under Section 41-A CrPC was served on him in Hyderabad. After the charge-sheet was filed, he appeared, obtained bail and faced framed charges. His bail required court permission before leaving India. He applied in RCT No. 964/2022 for a work-related journey to the USA. Read together, the Magistrate's orders of 29.07.2024 and 19.09.2024 permitted the journey and contemplated his return and attendance before the court. At about 02:00 on 20.09.2024, immigration officials at Hyderabad stopped him from boarding because an LOC issued by Jabalpur police remained active, despite his production of the court order. He stated that he was given neither a copy nor the particulars of the LOC and missed his flight. The State later asserted that he travelled the next day. After notice in the writ petition, the Jabalpur SP requested the Bureau of Immigration on 26.09.2024 to close the LOC; the Bureau confirmed deletion on 27.09.2024. The State also claimed to have begun disciplinary action against former SHO Shabana Parvez. The High Court called for the departmental record. At the January 2025 hearings, the SP initially failed to produce it. The record, when produced, showed exchanges of show-cause notices and revocation of suspension without completion of an inquiry. The proceedings were said to have shifted to Katni, although the LOC and criminal case arose at Jabalpur. The LOC itself was not produced for detailed examination.

2. Precedents — Considered : K.S. Puttaswamy (Privacy, nine Judges) v. Union of India, (2017) 10 SCC 1, was quoted on privacy as a fundamental right connected with Articles 19 and 21, and on substantive and procedural fairness. The Court drew on its requirements of legality, a legitimate State purpose and proportionality, while recognising that privacy and other liberties are not absolute. Francis Coralie Mullin v. Administrator, Union Territory of Delhi, (1981) 1 SCC 608, explained life under Article 21 as a dignified human existence, protecting human faculties, movement and self-expression even where lawful restraint operates through fair procedure. Satwant Singh Sawhney v. D. Ramarathnam, AIR 1967 SC 1836, held that foreign travel falls within personal liberty and cannot be denied except through procedure established by law. Maneka Gandhi v. Union of India, (1978) 1 SCC 248, was cited as confirming that protection and fair procedure. Satish Chandra Verma v. Union of India, Civil Appeal No. 3802/2019, 09.04.2019, described foreign travel as an important human right and held that pending departmental proceedings alone did not prevent a service member's family visit abroad. The Court also reproduced the Bombay High Court's decision on LOCs in Viraj Chetan Shah. It recorded that the Supreme Court had issued notice in the challenge to that decision and, pending consideration, required the litigants to obtain permission from the High Court before travelling abroad. That interim order was not treated as a final Supreme Court endorsement of the Bombay ruling. These authorities supplied the constitutional basis for examining the continued LOC after this petitioner had obtained bail and permission to travel.

For redress, Sebastian M. Hongray v. Union of India, (1984) 3 SCC 82, illustrated exemplary monetary relief for agony and oppression where release or ordinary process was insufficient. Bhim Singh v. State of J&K, (1985) 4 SCC 677, held that release did not erase a malicious deprivation of liberty and awarded compensation for State misconduct. Saheli v. Commissioner of Police, (1990) 1 SCC 422, placed the initial liability for police wrongdoing on the State, while leaving appropriate recovery from responsible officers through the proper process. People's Union for Democratic Rights v. Police Commissioner, (1989) 4 SCC 730, similarly awarded compensation and permitted later recovery from officers after an opportunity to show cause. Rudul Sah v. State of Bihar, (1983) 4 SCC 141, recognised the constitutional court's power to compensate unlawful detention instead of making the Article 21 guarantee ineffective by ordering release alone. D.K. Basu v. State of W.B., AIR 1997 SC 610, distinguished public-law compensation for an established Article 21 violation from private-law damages, excluded sovereign immunity as a defence to the constitutional remedy, and preserved separate criminal and civil remedies. State of Maharashtra v. Ravikant S. Patil, (1991) 2 SCC 373, retained the State's liability to pay compensation, removed the officer's direct personal liability, and held that an adverse service entry could not be made without proper process. Nilabati Behera v. State of Orissa, (1993) 2 SCC 746, explained strict public-law liability for infringement of fundamental rights as distinct from damages in tort. It permitted the State to seek indemnity from wrongdoers and required compensation suited to the facts, rather than a fixed tariff. The High Court applied the shared principle of constitutional redress to the unjustified airport restraint; it did not treat the custodial-death facts in several of those decisions as the facts of this case.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 supplied the writ jurisdiction and power to award monetary redress. Article 21 protected personal liberty, dignity and travel; Article 19 was invoked for the asserted employment journey, and Article 14 formed part of the interrelationship between rights discussed in Puttaswamy. These rights remained subject to fair and lawful restrictions, including the operative bail condition requiring court permission to travel. Service of the Section 41-A CrPC notice, completion of investigation, filing of the charge-sheet, appearance and bail were relevant to assessing any continuing risk of flight. Clause 6 of the MHA Foreigners Division's OM of 22.02.2024 governed the LOC mechanism. It required approval by a specified senior originating officer, including an SP, and reasons for an LOC concerning a cognizable offence; placed legal liability on the originating agency; required quarterly and annual review and an immediate deletion request when the person was no longer wanted; and required prompt communication to the Bureau of court orders and changes in the action to be taken. At an immigration checkpoint, the court order concerning the LOC required confirmation through the originator. That verification requirement made the originator's failure to communicate material. The order referred to the Passports Act and Foreigners Act as background, but identified no particular provision of either as the power used for this LOC; the CrPC itself contains no LOC provision. Article 215 and Sections 10 and 12 of the Contempt of Courts Act concerned only prospective enforcement if the State failed to deposit compensation. The IPC matrimonial offences and the Dowry Prohibition Act were background charges whose merits were not decided.

4. Issues : Whether deletion of the LOC after notice in the writ petition made the entire claim academic, or whether the airport restraint on 20.09.2024 remained a completed constitutional wrong; whether an investigation-stage LOC could justify stopping a bailed accused who had court permission to travel, without review or a demonstrated continuing purpose; whether the Magistrate's two orders, read together, permitted travel despite imprecise wording in the later order; which agency had to monitor the LOC and communicate changes urgently to immigration; whether compensation under Article 226 and later State recourse were justified; and what accountability inquiry should follow the uncompleted departmental process and its transfer. The underlying matrimonial trial and any challenge to the original LOC proforma, which had not been furnished, were not decided.

5. Ratio / Findings : Deletion of the LOC by 27.09.2024 made a further quashing order unnecessary, but did not remove the need to examine the restraint seven days earlier. Avijit had received the Section 41-A notice, appeared after the charge-sheet, obtained bail and secured the trial court's permission to travel. The Court read the orders of 29.07 and 19.09 together and rejected the objection based on the absence of an express formula granting permission. A suspected breach of bail conditions could be raised before the court through an application for cancellation. The State conceded that immigration had stopped him because of the LOC, rather than through any process concerning a breach of bail. Puttaswamy's requirements of lawful, necessary and proportionate restraint, together with the travel-right decisions, governed the Court's assessment. On these facts, continued interception without a continuing purpose was unjustified. Clause 6 of the 2024 OM required the originator to review the LOC periodically and urgently communicate court orders, changes in action and deletion requests to the Bureau. The absence of automatic expiry required active review; it did not justify keeping the restraint indefinitely. The police had not performed those duties as the case progressed. The Court held the Jabalpur originating agency legally responsible, while recognising immigration's practice of confirming court orders. It found that refusing departure on 20.09.2024 violated Article 21 and, because the journey was for work, Article 19. Travel on a later date could not cure the completed violation. The departmental record contradicted the State's claim of meaningful disciplinary action. The Court also questioned the transfer of the inquiry to Katni when the events and disciplinary authority were at Jabalpur. Those findings supported review by the DGP and a fresh departmental inquiry. Applying the constitutional compensation decisions, the Court directed the State to pay first, with recovery from the officers' salaries to follow, while preserving a separate civil remedy. It had not yet found anyone guilty of contempt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the writ petition. As the Bureau had deleted the LOC, no further quashing order was made. The State was directed to deposit Rs. 5,00,000 compensation in the High Court Registry within one month of the order, for Avijit to withdraw, and to recover that amount from the salaries of former SHO Shabana Parvez and the erring Jabalpur SP. If dissatisfied with the award, he could institute a civil suit for further damages. If the State failed to deposit the amount, the Registrar General was to initiate recovery and register a contempt petition under Article 215 and Sections 10 and 12. The DGP had to review the conduct of the named current and former senior officers, decide whether criminal or service proceedings were required, and submit a report by 05.03.2025. He was also to institute a departmental inquiry against Shabana Parvez through an officer of at least SP rank who had never been posted in either Jabalpur or Katni, and give a reasoned decision on whether the relevant superintendents also required an inquiry. The departmental inquiry was to be completed within six months. A copy of the order was to be placed in the service books of the identified officers, with a report within one month.

Headnote :- Complaint — locus and society statute - Dhanraj N. Asawani v. Amarjeetsingh Basi, Criminal Appeal No. 2093/2023, and State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, support the general rule that anyone may report alleged criminal wrongdoing to the authorities unless a special law bars that course expressly or by necessary implication. The dispute between rival committees did not prevent Shishir Khare from complaining about alleged embezzlement of society funds. No provision of the Society Registrikaran Adhiniyam was shown to exclude that criminal process.

Magistrate — Section 156(3) and complaint route - Refusal to direct police investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC did not require dismissal of the application. The Court held that the Magistrate's only course was then to proceed with the complaint by recording the statements of the complainant and witnesses under Sections 200 and 202. Cognizance could be taken through that procedure.

Civil and criminal remedies — society assets - Under Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, criminal action is not barred merely because the allegations disclose the ingredients of both a civil dispute and a criminal offence. The specific allegations of forged authority and misappropriation of bank, fuel and student funds were not defeated by the rival management suits or an available remedy for accounts. The Section 482 applications were dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Two applications under Section 482 were decided together, principally on the facts of M.Cr.C. No. 6453/2017. Rival groups disputed the membership, presidency and management of the Chanakya Kautilya educational society and its college. Properties had been pledged as security for a State Bank loan. Proceedings before the Registrar questioned the committees and membership; a civil suit concerning control and an injunction was also in issue, and the application for interim relief had been rejected. Shishir Khare complained that Anshuman Tiwari, Awadesh Narayan Tiwari, Pushyamitra Mishra and others had used forged resolutions and authority to sign for the society to operate bank accounts, withdraw large sums, divert fuel coupons and society vehicles, and misappropriate student and laptop funds. These were allegations, not established findings. A rival cheque-dishonour complaint against Khare's daughter and the other disputes were relied on by the applicants to allege retaliation. The Magistrate declined the request for police investigation under Section 156(3), recorded statements of the complainant and witnesses under Sections 200 and 202, and on 20 August 2016 took cognizance of offences under IPC Sections 420, 409, 467 and 120-B. The applicants challenged that order on the grounds of the complainant's disputed status as an office bearer, the availability of civil remedies, mala fides and the procedure adopted by the Magistrate.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, rejected the argument that a cooperative-societies statute automatically excludes general criminal law. The Court applied that principle in this society dispute. Dhanraj N. Asawani v. Amarjeetsingh Mohindersingh Basi, Criminal Appeal No. 2093/2023, explained CrPC Section 4 in detail and held that ordinary criminal procedure can be displaced only expressly or by necessary implication. It treated the auditor's and Registrar's reporting obligations under the Maharashtra cooperative statute as positive duties, rather than an exclusive right to initiate criminal proceedings, and contrasted enactments containing express bars. Its discussion of A.R. Antulay recognised the general rule that anyone may initiate a prosecution. The Court applied that general principle without treating the different State statutes as identical. Meera Yadav, a decision of the Madhya Pradesh High Court, was cited for the same principle that criminal jurisdiction is not excluded without a statutory bar. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, supplied the rule that civil and criminal proceedings may coexist where the allegations disclose the ingredients of both. The applicants relied on Bhajan Lal to allege mala fides, but the Court found that the complaint alleged criminal conduct and did not quash it merely because of the parallel cheque case.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC concern the requested direction for police investigation and the alternative procedure of examining the complaint; Section 190 governs cognizance. Section 4 CrPC provides the ordinary criminal procedure, subject to any procedural exclusion under a special statute. Sections 409, 420, 467 and 120-B IPC were the offences of which cognizance was taken. Other allegations of forgery, threats and misuse appeared in the complaint, but their ingredients were not finally adjudicated. The Madhya Pradesh Society Registrikaran Adhiniyam governed registration and committee disputes; no provision excluding criminal proceedings or restricting who could report an offence was identified. The complaint under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act was a separate rival proceeding and did not bar this case.

4. Issues : Whether Khare's disputed status as an office bearer deprived him of standing to initiate an IPC complaint; whether refusal of the Section 156(3) request prevented the Magistrate from proceeding under Sections 200 and 202; whether society-registration proceedings or civil remedies for accounts excluded criminal cognizance; and whether the alleged retaliatory motive and rival litigation justified quashing under Section 482 before trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Registrar's decisions called the validity of both rival governing committees into question; neither side's claim to office established who controlled the society. Nevertheless, a person reporting suspected wrongdoing could set the criminal law in motion, and the statute imposed no exclusion. The Court held that, after refusing the requested Section 156(3) order, the Magistrate's only course was to proceed with the complaint by recording statements under Sections 200 and 202. The procedure adopted was therefore valid. The complaint contained specific allegations of forged documents and diversion of funds and property, rather than merely a disagreement over management. Under Amit Kapoor, the presence of civil elements did not by itself bar criminal proceedings. The asserted retaliatory motive and the applicant's age did not justify quashing when the allegations in the complaint were taken at face value. These findings at the threshold did not establish embezzlement or forgery.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed both connected applications under Section 482. The Magistrate's order taking cognizance and the complaint proceedings remained in force. The Court made no final determination of society governance, accounts or criminal guilt.

Headnote :- Limitation — continuing matrimonial cruelty - Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, recognises that mental trauma continues at the parental home after a woman is driven from her matrimonial home by cruelty. The FIR lodged in February 2024 alleged that she had been expelled in October 2017 and continued to live with her parents because the demand for Rs. 10 lakh and a car remained unmet. Taking those allegations at face value, the Court rejected the limitation objection based on the maximum sentence of three years under Section 498-A.

Quashing — rival divorce account - XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, and CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, preclude the High Court from resolving contested allegations as though conducting a trial under Section 482. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognises a limited exception for public documents or documents whose veracity is not disputed by the complainant. The divorce pleadings and the husband's earlier complaints apprehending false implication did not establish that the specific FIR allegations were false. Their credibility was left for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Awadh Narayan Saxena, his wife, their son and daughter-in-law, and the complainant's husband sought quashing of Crime No. 113/2024 at Nowgaon, Chhatarpur, under IPC Sections 498-A, 323, 506 and 34 and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4. The complainant alleged that, after her marriage in April 2017, the applicants demanded a further Rs. 10 lakh and a car, harassed and assaulted her, and expelled her on 26 October 2017. They allegedly retained her belongings and refused to allow her to return unless the demand was met. She attributed the delay in lodging the FIR until February 2024 to social pressure and said that she had remained with her parents. The applicants argued that the maximum punishment of three years under Section 498-A made the FIR time-barred. They also alleged differences between her divorce petition and the FIR and relied on the husband's earlier police complaints expressing apprehension of false implication.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, explains that mental distress caused by matrimonial cruelty may continue at the parental home even after the physical acts cease. The Court applied that principle to reject the limitation objection at the threshold and cited its own decision i*n Amar Singh v. Vimla* to the same effect. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, cautioned against deciding contested questions of coercion and credibility during investigation under Section 482. S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das (including the caution in Bhajan Lal), Gourishetty Mahesh, M. Srikanth, CBI v. Arvind Khanna and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh reinforced the need to exercise the quashing power sparingly and to avoid a detailed evaluation of disputed evidence. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognised that public documents or defence documents whose veracity is not disputed by the complainant may be considered in an appropriate case. Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo, Sangeeta Agrawal, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha were also listed as authorities taking a similar view.

3. Statutes considered : Section 498-A IPC was the principal alleged offence of cruelty. IPC Sections 323, 506 and 34 and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4 were also invoked in the FIR. Section 482 CrPC provided the inherent power to quash proceedings. The applicants based their limitation objection on the maximum punishment of three years under Section 498-A. The Court rejected it on the basis of the alleged continuing mental cruelty, taking the FIR allegations at face value.

4. Issues : Whether an FIR lodged years after the alleged last physical assault was barred by limitation on its face despite allegations of continuing separation following a dowry demand; whether the High Court could compare the wife's divorce pleadings with her criminal allegations to assess credibility; and whether the husband's earlier apprehensions of false implication made the FIR inherently unreliable.

5. Ratio / Findings : According to the FIR, the woman had been expelled from her matrimonial home and continued to live with her parents because the applicants refused to keep her unless she brought the demanded money and car. Applying Rupali

Devi, the Court held that the continuing mental trauma gave rise to a fresh cause of action each day and rejected the limitation objection without taking evidence. It assessed the allegations at face value under Section 482 and declined to decide whether the account in the divorce petition or the FIR was true. The husband's earlier police complaints apprehending false implication raised matters of defence and did not prove that the FIR was false. The Court left those factual questions for trial and made no final finding on guilt or credibility.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 to quash Crime No. 113/2024. Investigation and prosecution could continue, with the factual defences left open.

Awadh Narayan Saxena and Ors. v. Shalini Saxena and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 10414/2024, 14/03/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Investigation — arrest discretion - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, applying M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explains that the power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously, according to the needs of the investigation. Registration of an FIR for a cognizable offence does not automatically require arrest or a charge-sheet. Section 482 cannot be used to dictate those steps or to issue prejudicial directions against an accused without hearing that person. The informant's request for a direction to arrest was refused.

Investigation — prompt completion - Section 173(1) CrPC requires investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. Although the Court declined to supervise how the investigation was conducted, it directed the investigating officer to complete the investigation into IPC Sections 376/506 and submit the appropriate final report in accordance with law. Whether to file a charge-sheet or a closure report depended on the evidence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ayushi Shrivastava's complaint resulted in registration of Crime No. 500/2019 at Police Station Padav, Gwalior, alleging offences under IPC Sections 376 and 506. In an application under Section 482 CrPC, she complained that the police had taken no further action and had not arrested the accused. The Court's reasons identify the relief sought as directions for arrest and investigation. It did not adjudicate any case diary or disputed evidence concerning the incident. The Court distinguished a request to dictate police decisions on arrest and charging from the duty to complete the investigation already registered.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was extensively quoted and applied to reject judicial directions prescribing arrest, seizure or a charge-sheet during an ongoing investigation. It adopted M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, on the discretion to arrest under Section 41 and the effect of arrest on personal liberty. The quoted passage also discussed Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, which required an opportunity of hearing for persons affected by judicial orders directing drastic investigative action. The High Court applied that authority's rule against supervising the investigation, but separately applied Section 173(1) to the complaint of delay.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC confers a limited inherent power, rather than a general power to supervise the police. Section 41 CrPC permits arrest on cognizable information but does not make it automatic. Section 173(1) requires completion of the investigation without unnecessary delay; applying that mandate, the Court required the appropriate final police report. IPC Sections 376 and 506 were the offences alleged in the FIR and were not examined on their merits.

4. Issues : Whether the informant could obtain a High Court direction compelling arrest of the alleged offender or requiring a predetermined charge-sheet; and whether the lack of progress justified a direction under Section 173(1) to complete the investigation while preserving the police's lawful discretion.

5. Ratio / Findings : D. Venkatasubramaniam rejects the view that arrest, seizure and a charge-sheet must follow every investigation. It also cautions that judicial interference without reasons or a hearing may affect the person's liberty and reputation. The Court therefore refused to direct arrest and did not prescribe the result of the investigation. Nevertheless, under Section 173(1), the police had to conclude whether an offence was made out and submit the appropriate final report without unnecessary delay. The direction required prompt completion in accordance with law; it did not require a charge-sheet or establish the truth of the complaint.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the application under Section 482 by directing the investigating officer to complete the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law. It did not order arrest or the filing of a charge-sheet. Ayushi remained free to make a further application concerning any grievance to the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior, who was to consider it in accordance with law.

Ayushi Shrivastava v. Superintendent of Police and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 51341/2019, 07/09/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- POCSO — age proof - Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, gives priority to available school records of a child victim's date of birth under the prescribed documentary hierarchy. State of Chhattisgarh v. Lekhram, (2006) 5 SCC 736, and Murugan v. State of T.N., (2011) 6 SCC 111, explain the admissibility and evidentiary weight of entries under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, including the relevance of their source and corroboration. Here, the school register made before the dispute, the headmaster's certificate and family evidence established that the prosecutrix was born on 12 January 1998 and was 15 years and 21 days old at the time of the incident.

Child sexual offence — marriage and consent - The appellant's notarized deed did not prove that a marriage had been performed according to the rites he claimed. Citing Independent Thought v. Union of India, (2017) 10 SCC 800, on the marital exception in Section 375, the Court held that the minor's alleged consent was immaterial. The Court also found that the marriage had not been proved and separately relied on POCSO in upholding the conviction.

POCSO — applicable law and corroboration - POCSO came into force on 14 November 2012, before the incident in February 2013. The objection based on the later IPC amendment therefore did not affect the conviction under Section 6. The prosecutrix's testimony was supported by her recovery with the appellant and the FSL findings. The ten-year sentence was affirmed, with no separate sentence under IPC Section 376 in view of Section 71 IPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Babalu appealed against the judgment dated 19 March 2015 in Sessions Trial No. 33/2013, convicting him under IPC Sections 363, 366 and 376 and Section 6 of POCSO. The trial court imposed seven-year terms for the kidnapping-related offences and ten years under POCSO, with fines. It imposed no separate sentence under Section 376. The prosecutrix went missing on 2 February 2013 after leaving home, and her mother lodged a missing-person report. The prosecutrix testified that the appellant had called her to his shop through a friend, threatened her with a knife, taken her through several cities, purported to marry her in Delhi and repeatedly had sexual intercourse with her. Her mother and brother gave evidence about her age. A school headmaster proved an admission register and a certificate recording her birth as 12 January 1998. Medical examination showed that her hymen had ruptured and healed; the FSL found human sperm on her vaginal slides and clothing. The defence asserted that she had travelled voluntarily and relied on a marriage deed executed in April 2013. It challenged the school evidence of age, relied on the later commencement of the 2013 IPC amendment and sought reduction of sentence. After counsel repeatedly failed to appear, a legal-aid amicus argued the appeal; the original counsel later filed written arguments.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, applied the documentary hierarchy in the then Juvenile Justice Rule 12 to determine a child victim's age. Under that hierarchy, an available certificate from the school first attended took priority over medical estimation. State of Chhattisgarh v. Lekhram, (2006) 5 SCC 736, held school registers admissible under Section 35 of the Evidence Act, without treating every entry as conclusive, and assessed the parents' evidence. Murugan v. State of T.N., (2011) 6 SCC 111, explained that the weight of official entries made before a dispute may depend on the source of the information and corroboration. Mukarrab v. State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210, cautioned against determining age solely by an imprecise ossification test. The Court applied these principles to the register proved by the headmaster and the corroborating witnesses. Independent Thought v. Union of India, (2017) 10 SCC 800, was cited to reject the claimed marital exception concerning a girl under 18. The appellant relied on State of H.P. v. Mango Ram, (2000) 7 SCC 224, for leniency, but the Court did not reduce the sentence.

3. Statutes considered : Section 6 of POCSO provided the sentence for aggravated penetrative sexual assault; the Act came into force on 14 November 2012. IPC Sections 363 and 366 concerned the taking of the child, Section 376 concerned rape, and Exception 2 to Section 375 was invoked for the claimed marital defence. Section 35 of the Evidence Act concerned the school-register entries. CrPC Section 313 governed the appellant's statement, and Section 374 provided the appeal. The defence relied on the Criminal Law Amendment Act coming into force on 3 February 2013, but POCSO was already in force before the incident.

4. Issues : Whether the prosecutrix was under 18 on 2 February 2013 despite the school entry not identifying the source of its date-of-birth information; whether her alleged consent or the notarized marriage deed could defeat the IPC and POCSO sexual-offence convictions; whether the later 2013 IPC amendment affected the conviction under Section 6 of POCSO; and whether the evidence and sentence justified interference in appeal.

5. Ratio / Findings : The admission register made before the dispute and proved by the headmaster, the school certificate, the mother's and brother's evidence, and the prosecutrix's unchallenged statement about her age established that she was born on 12 January 1998. She was 15 years and 21 days old on the date of kidnapping. On the evidence as a whole, the objection that the source of the school entry was not stated did not create reasonable doubt about her minority. The appellant's deed did not prove a Hindu marriage. Citing Independent Thought, the Court treated the minor's consent as legally immaterial and accepted her account of threats and sexual intercourse. Her recovery with the appellant, his admission that they had travelled to Punjab and the FSL finding of human sperm corroborated her account. POCSO had come into force in November 2012, which answered the objection to the prosecution under that Act for the incident in February 2013. The Court affirmed the IPC and POCSO convictions and the ten-year sentence. That sentence was the statutory minimum applicable to the POCSO offence; the authority cited for leniency did not result in a reduction.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and upheld the convictions, imprisonment and fines imposed on 19 March 2015. No separate sentence under Section 376 was added to the sentence under Section 6 of POCSO, in view of Section 71 IPC.

Babalu v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 243/2015, 09/08/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Murder appeal — In an appeal under Section 374(2) CrPC against conviction under IPC Section 302, the postmortem evidence of multiple gunshot wounds and haemorrhagic shock established homicidal death, although the doctor had not expressly described it as homicidal. Three eyewitnesses identified the appellant as the shooter. Their differences about beer, companions and the route did not affect the central account, and their relationship with the deceased was no ground by itself to reject their evidence. Applying Namdeo, (2007) 14 SCC 150, and Guru Dutt Pathak, (2021) 6 SCC 116, the Bench held that failure to examine additional or independent witnesses did not automatically justify an adverse inference where the evidence already given was convincing. Under Yogesh Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, failure to prove motive was immaterial when trustworthy direct evidence established the crime. Rameshbhai Mohanbhai Koli, (2011) 11 SCC 111, supported reliance on convincing recovery evidence from the investigating officer despite hostile seizure witnesses. The memoranda and FSL report corroborated the account of the firearm's use. The Bench found guilt proved beyond reasonable doubt, affirmed the life sentence, fine and property-disposal order, and rejected the appeal.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : At a village ceremony on 14 April 2013, Babburaja Singh Gurjar took Ranveer Singh alias Naatiraja away on a motorcycle. Prosecution witnesses stated that they followed and saw him fire a country-made gun at Ranveer near Mota-Kanchanpur. Ranveer died from gunshot wounds to his chest and elbow. The police registered Crime 153/2013 alleging offences under IPC Section 302/34 and Arms Act Sections 25/27. They collected spent cartridges and soil, arrested the appellant and, on the basis of his memorandum, recovered a 12-bore Katta, a cartridge and a motorcycle. The Additional Sessions Judge, Pichhore, convicted him under Section 302 and sentenced him to life imprisonment with a fine of Rs 5,000 and a default stipulation.

2. Precedents — Considered : Namdeo v State of Maharashtra, (2007) 14 SCC 150, was quoted for the rule under Section 134 of the Evidence Act that the quality of evidence matters, rather than the number of witnesses. Guru Dutt Pathak v State of UP, (2021) 6 SCC 116, explained that failure to examine independent witnesses is not fatal where the eyewitness evidence is convincing. Yogesh Singh v Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, held that failure to prove motive does not justify rejecting otherwise credible direct testimony. Rameshbhai Mohanbhai Koli v State of Gujarat, (2011) 11 SCC 111, supported reliance on convincing recovery evidence given by the investigating officer even where seizure witnesses had turned hostile.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 302 and 34 and Arms Act Sections 25 and 27 were the provisions invoked in the FIR. The appeal under CrPC Section 374(2) concerned the murder conviction. Section 134 of the Evidence Act governed the objection about the number of witnesses examined.

4. Issues : In Criminal Appeal 6341/2021 under CrPC Section 374(2), the Division Bench considered whether the death was homicidal and whether the appellant had committed murder. The defence disputed the eyewitnesses' presence and questioned their credibility as relatives of the deceased. It also challenged the medical description of the death, the failure to prove motive, the non-examination of independent witnesses, the hostility of seizure witnesses, the lack of fingerprints and the recovery. The appeal concerned the conviction and sentence under Section 302, rather than a separate Arms Act conviction.

5. Ratio / Findings : PW13's postmortem evidence showed firearm wounds to the chest and left elbow, fractures and shock caused by bleeding. The injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and there was no evidence of suicide or accident. PW1, PW2 and PW11 identified the appellant as the person who fired the shots. The Bench assessed their differences about beer, companions and the route in light of the two-year interval before their examination and their strong agreement about the shooting itself.

The relationship of PW1 and PW11 with the deceased was not, by itself, a reason to reject their otherwise credible evidence. PW2's differences on peripheral matters did not affect his identification of the appellant or account of the shooting. PW17's evidence of the arrest, memorandum and firearm recovery was supported by exhibits P/16–P/19 and FSL P/23, which the Bench treated as corroborating the use of that weapon in the incident. The absence of fingerprints did not defeat that evidence on this record. The FIR was prompt and named the appellant. The eyewitness, medical and forensic evidence together proved murder beyond reasonable doubt; failure to prove motive separately did not displace the reliable direct evidence.

The Court assessed the materiality of contradictions and the quality of the evidence. It did not require a fixed number of witnesses, reject relatives' evidence merely because of their relationship, or discard convincing recovery evidence from the investigating officer solely because seizure witnesses had turned hostile. Where reliable direct evidence proves the act, failure to prove motive is not decisive. These principles did not relieve the prosecution of its burden of proof, which the Bench found discharged on the corroborated evidence in this case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court affirmed the conviction under IPC Section 302, the sentence of life imprisonment, the fine of Rs 5,000 with its default stipulation, and the trial court's order for disposal of the property. It rejected the appeal and directed that a copy of the judgment and the original record be sent to the trial court.

Headnote :- Criminal proof — rape allegation and reasonable doubt - The prosecutrix described the appellant pressing her neck, but did not testify that he had raped her, even when recalled. The first FIR contained no allegation of rape. The later complaint, material conflicts in the witnesses' accounts, uncertainty about when the genital injury occurred and the doubtful FSL material did not establish that the appellant had raped her. Applying Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, the Court set aside the convictions under IPC Section 376(2)(f) and POCSO Sections 3/4. The child's unconsciousness and medical findings suggesting a possible sexual assault did not establish the appellant's responsibility beyond reasonable doubt.

Witness credibility — core contradictions - The witnesses' accounts differed materially about the first disclosure, the child's consciousness, whether her clothes had been changed and the room where she was found. Those conflicts affected the allegation of the sexual offence. By contrast, the child's original report and testimony consistently identified the appellant as the person who had pressed her neck. The Court therefore upheld the Section 323 IPC conviction and the three-month sentence.

POCSO — sexual intent and proof - Sections 3 and 7 require proof of the sexual acts they respectively define; Section 7 also requires sexual intent. On this record, proof that the appellant had pressed the child's neck established neither penetration by him nor sexual intent. The Court set aside the POCSO conviction on the cumulative defects in proof. Its decision did not lay down a rule requiring corroboration in every case.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bablesh appealed against the judgment dated 20 September 2014 in Sessions Trial No. 105/2013. The trial court had convicted and sentenced him under IPC Sections 452, 376(2)(f) and 323 and POCSO Sections 3/4, with concurrent terms that included ten years for the sexual offences. A child aged approximately eight years said that the appellant came to her home on 19 January 2013 and pressed her neck until she lost consciousness. The FIR lodged on 20 January recorded trespass, hurt and intimidation, but no rape allegation. Her father introduced that allegation in a later written complaint. Medical examinations on 20 and 21 January recorded abrasions on her neck and some genital findings. The child did not allege rape in her trial testimony or when recalled at the prosecution's request under Section 311 CrPC. The trial court nevertheless inferred from the medical findings that she had been raped while unconscious. The defence challenged that inference, improvements in the accounts and the reliability of the forensic evidence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, was quoted and applied on the prosecution's burden of proof, reasonable doubt as understood by a prudent person, and the distinction between minor discrepancies and contradictions affecting the core of a witness's account. The Court did not reject testimony merely because the witnesses were related to the child. It assessed the particular contradictions against the first disclosure and the medical record.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Section 376(2)(f) concerned the alleged rape of the child, Section 452 the alleged house trespass, and Section 323 the proved assault on her neck. POCSO Section 3 defines penetrative sexual assault, punishable under Section 4. The Court also reproduced Section 7 to distinguish physical contact with sexual intent from ordinary hurt, although the trial conviction under review was under Sections 3/4. CrPC Section 311 permitted recall of the prosecutrix and her father, and Section 374 governed the appeal. Evidence Act Sections 3, 145 and 155 appeared in the Supreme Court passage adopted on proof and contradictions.

4. Issues : Whether partial rupture of the hymen and the child's unconsciousness justified inferring that the appellant had raped her, despite her testimony, the first FIR, uncertainty about the date of injury and the conflict with the FSL report; whether the inconsistencies were material; whether entry into the house and sexual intent were proved; and which of the convictions could be upheld.

5. Ratio / Findings : The child consistently described the appellant pressing her neck, but did not say that Bablesh had raped her, even when recalled. The doctor who examined her on 21 January could not attribute the genital injury to 19 January and had found no blood when preparing the slide. The FSL report, however, recorded blood and sperm; the trial court had itself found that report doubtful. The witnesses gave conflicting accounts about the child's clothes, her first disclosure, how long she remained unconscious and access to the room. Considering the record as a whole, the Court found material doubt and rejected the inference that the appellant must have raped her while she was unconscious. The discrepancies led it to infer that an attempt may have been made to fabricate evidence; it did not determine any separate offence of fabrication. The child said that the appellant had pressed her neck while she was sitting on a platform outside the house, so house trespass was not proved. Her evidence and the FIR proved the neck assault, but no sexual intent was shown, and penetrative sexual assault by the appellant was not proved.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court partly allowed the appeal and set aside the convictions under IPC Sections 376(2)(f) and 452 and POCSO Sections 3/4. It affirmed the conviction under Section 323 IPC, three months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1,000, with 15 days' simple imprisonment in default of payment. The appellant had already served the substantive three-month term and was directed to be released immediately if not required in another case.

Headnote :- Non-registration of FIR / remedy — The applicant sought directions under Section 528 BNSS for the police to investigate her complaint and register an FIR. The Court dismissed the application, leaving her free to approach the Magistrate by complaint under CrPC Section 200 / BNSS Section 223. Aleque Padamsee, (2007) 6 SCC 171, and Divine Retreat Centre, (2008) 3 SCC 542, distinguish the police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence from the remedy when police fail to act. Divine Retreat Centre preserves exceptional Article 226 intervention where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse and non-compliance with the prescribed procedure require it. Sakiri Vasu, (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe, (2016) 6 SCC 277, explain recourse to the SP under Section 154(3) and the Magistrate under Section 156(3) CrPC, including directions and monitoring to ensure proper investigation, subject to the Magistrate's prima facie satisfaction. The MP Division Bench's Shweta Bhadauria distinguishes Lalita Kumari's registration rule from an entitlement to routine mandamus, while recognising the established exceptions to the rule of alternative remedy. The Court did not decide the merits of the complaint or whether it disclosed a cognizable offence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Babli Bais filed MCRC 456/2025 under Section 528 BNSS, stating that the police had not registered an FIR on her complaint. She sought a direction for investigation and registration of an FIR against the persons she had complained about. State counsel relied on her remedy before the Magistrate.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, affirmed the police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence, but directed complainants to the remedy under Sections 190/200 CrPC when police failed to act. It distinguished the question decided in Ramesh Kumari. Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, recognised exceptional Article 226 intervention where mala fide investigation, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with the prescribed procedure require it, while directing ordinary complaints of police inaction to the Magistrate. Its quotation of Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre and AIIMS Employees' Union explained inquiry into a complaint and the power to direct investigation. Sakiri Vasu v State of UP, (2008) 2 SCC 409, explained recourse to the SP under Section 154(3) and to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, applied Sakiri Vasu and explained the Magistrate's powers, on prima facie satisfaction, to direct or monitor a proper investigation. The MP Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria v State of MP distinguished Lalita Kumari's ruling on the police duty from a right to bypass alternative remedies, while recognising the Whirlpool exceptions.

3. Statutes considered : The applicant invoked the inherent power under Section 528 BNSS. The CrPC framework reproduced by the Court included Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200. In its operative order, the Court identified the complaint remedy under Section 200 CrPC / Section 223 BNSS.

4. Issues : Whether the High Court should direct the police to register an FIR on this application despite the ordinary procedure for addressing police inaction. The proceedings concerned non-registration of an FIR, rather than charges, a final report or adjudication of the truth of the complaint.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying the cited decisions on the statutory remedy before the Magistrate, the Court dismissed the application and gave the applicant liberty to pursue that remedy. It did not examine whether the allegations disclosed a cognizable offence.

The police duty to register an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence is distinct from the remedy available when police fail to perform that duty. In an ordinary case of non-registration, the complainant seeks redress through the statutory remedies before superior police officers or the Magistrate. The cited decisions preserve exceptional constitutional intervention where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse and non-compliance with the prescribed procedure justify it; that assessment depends on the particular facts. The dismissal here was procedural and did not determine the underlying complaint.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application with express liberty to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC / Section 223 BNSS for redress.

Babli Bais v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 456/2025, 20/01/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Murder — Section 300 thirdly — Under Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, the prosecution must prove that the particular bodily injury was intentionally inflicted and was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. The latter inquiry is objective; a separate intention to kill need not be proved under this clause. The Court affirmed the conviction under Section 302 IPC where eyewitnesses described repeated stabbing with a knife, the abdominal wounds damaged the bowel and blood vessels, and death resulted from shock and haemorrhage. The contention that there was no prior enmity did not alter the result.

Evidence — related witnesses — Relationship with the deceased called for careful scrutiny of the testimony, rather than its automatic rejection. The direct accounts given by the deceased's wife and brother-in-law were consistent with the medical and other evidence, and the defence did not establish a basis for false implication. The auto driver, who was not examined, had transported the deceased and was not an eyewitness. The Court also treated the relatives' accounts of seeing the accused holding and stabbing the deceased as establishing the last-seen theory.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bablu alias Virendra appealed against the judgment dated 31 March 2009 in Special Sessions Trial No. 121/2007, which convicted him of Pooran Ahirwar's murder under IPC Section 302 and sentenced him to life imprisonment and a fine of Rs 5,000, with one year's rigorous imprisonment in default. On 1 October 2007, Pooran left home after a neighbour called him. His wife, Meerabai, and brother-in-law, Mahesh, went in search of him and stated that they saw Bablu holding and stabbing him. They took Pooran to hospital, where he was declared dead. The post-mortem recorded several wounds caused by a sharp object, including abdominal injuries, and attributed death to shock and haemorrhage. A knife and clothing were recovered, and the seized articles were sent for FSL examination. The defence disputed the eyewitness accounts, motive and consistency with the medical evidence, and pleaded sudden provocation.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, was adopted for the four-part inquiry under Section 300 Thirdly, which distinguishes the intention to inflict the proved injury from the objective question whether it was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. The Court reproduced Arun Nivalaji More, Anda, Mahesh Balmiki, Pulicherla Nagaraju, Sangapagu Anjaiah, Kanhaiyalal and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao on distinguishing murder from culpable homicide by considering the weapon, the part of the body injured and the surrounding circumstances. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak was reproduced on a sudden fight under Exception 4. Jayabalan v. UT of Pondicherry, Seeman v. State and Jodhan v. State of M.P. were applied to require careful scrutiny of related witnesses' evidence rather than its wholesale rejection. Ramreddy Rajeshkhanna Reddy, Hatti Singh and State of U.P. v. Satish were quoted on the last-seen theory. In this case, the wife and brother-in-law said that they directly saw the attack; the Court also treated their accounts as establishing last-seen evidence.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 299, 300 Thirdly, 302 and 304 governed the classification of the homicide. The judgment also discussed Section 3(2)(v) of the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, although the trial court's conviction table and the operative relief concerned Section 302 alone. The Court recorded the parties' caste status and inferred a caste-related motive from that status and the abusive language used during the attack; the conviction affirmed was under Section 302 IPC. CrPC Section 374 provided appellate jurisdiction, and Section 161 concerned the statements recorded during investigation.

4. Issues : Whether Pooran died homicidally from an intentional knife attack by Bablu, and whether the injuries and circumstances amounted to murder rather than a lesser form of homicide despite the pleas of sudden provocation and absence of prior enmity. Whether the wife's and brother-in-law's evidence could be relied on despite their relationship to the deceased and the non-examination of independent witnesses. Whether the deceased's Scheduled Caste status motivated the attack.

5. Ratio / Findings : The doctor identified multiple ante-mortem injuries caused by a sharp object, including deep abdominal wounds, ruled out the suggested fall on broken glass, and attributed death to bleeding and shock. The knife could have caused those wounds. Meerabai and Mahesh gave direct accounts of Bablu stabbing the deceased, supported by the medical and forensic evidence. Their relationship to the deceased did not justify rejecting their testimony, no basis for false implication was established, and the non-examination of an auto driver who was not an eyewitness did not undermine their accounts. On the proved repeated stabbing and fatal wounds, the Court affirmed the conviction for murder under Section 302, applying Virsa Singh's analysis of Section 300 Thirdly. The Court also inferred a caste-related motive from the deceased's status and the abusive language used during the attack. It affirmed the conviction under Section 302.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and confirmed the Section 302 conviction, life imprisonment, fine of Rs 5,000 and the stated default sentence. The appellant was to be informed of the result through the prison superintendent. A copy of the judgment, together with the trial court record, was to be sent back immediately.

Headnote :- Kidnapping — taking and enticement — S. Varadarajan v. State of Madras, (1965) 1 SCR 243, does not require allegations under IPC Sections 363 and 366 to be quashed merely because a minor states that she left voluntarily. As explained in Anversinh @ Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat, reliance on that decision requires the minor's knowledge and capacity to understand the full import of her actions, voluntary abandonment of her guardian's care, and absence of assistance or inducement by the accused. Whether Bablu enticed the girl to travel with him was disputed. The FIR could therefore not be quashed under Section 482 CrPC.

Child marriage assertion — prima facie stage — The girl was below 17 both when she left home and when the subsequent marriage affidavit was executed. Citing Independent Thought v. Union of India, (2017) 10 SCC 800, the Court rejected the claimed marriage as a ground for ending the prosecution. It did not determine guilt under POCSO Sections 7/8.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bablu applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash the FIR in Crime No. 331/2016 at Tyonda police station for IPC Sections 363 and 366 and POCSO Sections 7/8. The girl, aged about sixteen at the time, left home on 15 November 2016 and travelled with him to Ahmedabad. He relied on her statement, made after her recovery, that she had left voluntarily. He also claimed that they had married in a temple, relying on an affidavit dated 19 November 2016, and that they had children. A birth certificate concerning a child subsequently born was produced. The State submitted that whether he had enticed the girl was a matter for trial.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant invoked S. Varadarajan v. State of Madras, (1965) 1 SCR 243, in support of his voluntary-departure defence. The Court followed Anversinh @ Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat, Criminal Appeal No. 1919/2010 (12 January 2021), which distinguished taking from enticement and explained the minor's knowledge and capacity, voluntary abandonment of guardianship, and absence of accused inducement as conditions for reliance on Varadarajan. Independent Thought v. Union of India, (2017) 10 SCC 800, was cited concerning sexual relations with a wife below 18. The Court treated the disputed question of enticement as material at the prima facie stage.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 363 and 366 concerned the kidnapping and abduction-related allegations. Section 376 was discussed in relation to the claimed marriage. POCSO Sections 7/8 remained among the recorded FIR allegations. CrPC Section 482 provided the jurisdiction to consider quashing.

4. Issues : Whether the girl's asserted voluntary travel necessarily excluded taking or enticement and justified quashing. Whether the alleged marriage and subsequent childbirth brought the criminal proceedings to an end. Whether the FIR disclosed prima facie allegations warranting prosecution.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted that the girl was below 17 when she left home and when the later marriage affidavit was executed. Whether Bablu had assisted or induced her departure remained disputed; her statement that she travelled voluntarily did not establish the absence of enticement required for reliance on Varadarajan. Applying Anversinh, the Court held that guilt under IPC Sections 363 and 366 could not be ruled out at that stage. The claimed marriage did not alter her minority, and Independent Thought was invoked in that context. The Court found prima facie material warranting prosecution, without resolving the disputed facts or determining ultimate guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application and declined to quash the FIR.

Bablu v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 30855/2021, 27/07/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Criminal proof — suppressed genesis and defence injuries — The injured complainant and his wife admitted that the appellants had also suffered injuries and that he faced a cross-prosecution for assaulting them. The prosecution's failure to explain those injuries and the origin of the clash was therefore material. Applying Bhagwan Sahai v. State of Rajasthan, (2016) 13 SCC 171, the Court drew an adverse inference on the whole record. As the prosecution had not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the appellants were the aggressors, their convictions under Section 324/34 IPC were set aside.

Witnesses — injured account and omissions — The injured witness's presence at the scene did not resolve the material omissions about the weapons and the cause of the encounter, or the inconsistency in his wife's account of witnessing the assault. Those defects were assessed together with the unexplained injuries to the other side. The conclusion did not rest on the complainant's criminal history alone.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Babu and the other appellants challenged their conviction dated 6 June 2008 in Sessions Trial No. 69/2008 under IPC Section 324 read with Section 34. They had been sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 500, with one month's rigorous imprisonment in default. The prosecution alleged that members of Babulal Kori's family attacked Jagdish on the night of 7 December 2007 with an iron angle, a knife, lathis and stones. His wife, Meena, lodged the FIR. The doctors recorded injuries to his scalp, face and limbs, some caused by a sharp object; the X-rays disclosed no bone injury. Jagdish and Meena admitted that Babulal, Reshma and Nanhi Bai had also been injured and that Jagdish faced a pending Section 307 cross-case for assaulting them. As counsel for the appellants did not appear, the Court examined the record and heard the State.

2. Precedents — Considered : Bhagwan Sahai and another v. State of Rajasthan, (2016) 13 SCC 171, was quoted and applied. It explains the adverse inference and benefit of doubt arising where the prosecution suppresses the origin of the occurrence and fails to explain material injuries to the accused. The reproduced passage distinguishes a free fight, in which a witness may not reasonably be expected to observe and explain injuries inflicted at different places, from the facts before the Supreme Court. The High Court assessed the cross-injuries and testimony in this appeal before applying the principle.

3. Statutes considered : The appealed conviction was under IPC Section 324/34. The FIR also referred to Sections 323, 294, 427 and 506-B, while the formal charges were under Sections 294, 324/34, 506-II and 427; the conviction challenged in appeal was Section 324/34. The pending Section 307 cross-case was relevant to the competing account but was not adjudicated in this appeal. CrPC Section 374 governed the appeal, and Section 161 concerned the earlier witness statements used to establish omissions.

4. Issues : Whether the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that the appellants were the aggressors when their injuries and the origin of the cross-assault remained unexplained. Whether Jagdish's and Meena's testimony reliably proved the alleged assault with common intention.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical evidence established that Jagdish was injured, but did not show who began the confrontation. He admitted the cross-case, omitted details of the alleged weapons and motive from his police statements, and had gone near the appellants' house without a satisfactory explanation in the prosecution account. In cross-examination, Meena placed her arrival after Jagdish was already lying on the ground, contrary to her claim that she had seen the assault. The other witnesses provided no reliable independent account. Some appellants had also been injured, but the prosecution did not explain how. Applying Bhagwan Sahai to the record as a whole, the Court found that the origin of the incident had been suppressed and that the prosecution had not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the appellants were the aggressors. It did not decide Jagdish's guilt in the separate case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal appeal, set aside the conviction and sentence dated 6 June 2008, and acquitted the appellants. Their bail and surety bonds were discharged. The office was directed to send a copy of the judgment with the trial court record for necessary information and compliance.

Babu and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 1273/2008, 19/01/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act — Section 19 residence — sham family transfer — The husband received a share in the house under a 1984 partition. After Premwati applied for residence protection on 01.08.2011, his attorney sold that share on 12.06.2012 to the son of a co-applicant. The timing and family relationship were undisputed; the trial court also found that the applicants remained in possession. On that record, the Court upheld the finding that this sale was a sham intended to defeat relief under the DVA. It maintained the order prohibiting obstruction of Premwati's and her daughter's peaceful residence.

Domestic Violence Act — Sections 2(a), 3, 12 and 19 — pre-act conduct — Economic abuse includes deprivation of resources and restrictions on access to a shared household. Premwati's marriage remained subsisting. V.D. Bhanot, Saraswathy, Shalini and Krishna Bhattacharjee support consideration of conduct before the 2005 Act and protection for a wife who had formerly shared a household. The contrary view in Devkaran could no longer defeat maintainability. The challenge under Section 482 was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Premwati alleged abuse, exclusion from the family house and failure to maintain her and her unmarried daughter. She applied under Sections 12 and 19 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005 against her husband, Devi Lal, and relatives including Babulal. The relatives replied that proceedings under Section 125 CrPC had begun in 1985 and that she had not visited the house since then. They relied on the separate shares created by the 1984 partition and alleged that Devi Lal had sold his share and was now living with her. Devi Lal did not appear in the DVA proceedings and was proceeded against ex parte. The JMFC examined the partition dated 17.04.1984, under which Devi Lal received a share. He had given a power of attorney to co-applicant Hetram on 06.01.2004. Premwati filed her DVA application on 01.08.2011, but Hetram sold Devi Lal's share to Dharmendra, a co-applicant's son, only on 12.06.2012, for Rs. 4 lakh. The JMFC found that the family transaction was intended to defeat the residence claim and restrained interference with Premwati's and her daughter's peaceful residence. The Additional Sessions Judge dismissed the relatives' appeal on 27.02.2013. They then invoked Section 482 CrPC, relying on the sale and contending that the alleged acts preceded the DVA.

2. Precedents — Considered : Krishna Bhattacharjee v. Sarathi Choudhary, (2016) 2 SCC 705, was quoted to require a sensitive and thorough examination at the threshold under the beneficial and affirmative 2005 Act. Courts should examine the legally relevant facts before dismissing an aggrieved woman's petition on a formal maintainability objection. V.D. Bhanot v. Savita Bhanot, (2012) 3 SCC 183, was applied on the temporal and residence questions: conduct before commencement may be considered on a later Section 12 complaint when granting Sections 18–20 relief, and a wife who formerly lived with her husband in a shared household is not excluded merely because she no longer did so when the Act came into force. The judgment refers to the protective constitutional purpose under Articles 14, 15 and 21 and the provision of an effective and expeditious civil remedy. Saraswathy v. Babu, (2014) 3 SCC 712, quoted and endorsed Bhanot on prior conduct, rejected a High Court's refusal to consider pre-Act behaviour, and applied Section 3's broad definition of domestic violence. Shalini v. Kishor, AIR 2015 SC 2605, likewise applied Bhanot and Saraswathy where a domestic relationship and threatened loss of residence supported relief under Sections 12, 19 and 20. The Court applied those decisions to reject the relatives' timing objection. The applicants relied on the contrary pre-Act view in the Madhya Pradesh coordinate-bench decision Devkaran v. Sanjana Bai; the High Court expressly held that it was no longer good law in view of the intervening Supreme Court decisions.

3. Statutes considered : Section 2(a) DVA defines an aggrieved woman in a domestic relationship who alleges domestic violence. Premwati remained married to Devi Lal; no divorce had been granted. Section 3 defines domestic violence broadly, including verbal and emotional abuse and economic abuse through deprivation of resources, alienation of property which the woman is entitled to use, and exclusion from a shared household, assessed in the overall circumstances. Section 12 provided the application procedure and Section 19 the residence relief actually granted. Sections 18 and 20 appeared in the Supreme Court's discussion of protective and monetary remedies. The Act's preamble and constitutional rights under Articles 14, 15 and 21 informed its beneficial interpretation. The Section 125 CrPC proceedings from 1985 were part of the relatives' pleaded history and did not displace the DVA residence claim. Section 482 CrPC provided the route for challenging the affirmed residence order, rather than the underlying residence right.

4. Issues : Whether the relatives could resist Section 19 residence protection by relying on a sale of the husband's partition share after his wife had sought DVA relief, where the purchaser was a family member and the trial court found an intention to defeat her claim. Whether Premwati's alleged long absence and the pre-2005 conduct meant that she was no longer an aggrieved person or that the Sections 12/19 proceedings were not maintainable. How the subsisting marriage, Section 3 economic abuse and the Supreme Court decisions on a formerly shared household affected those objections. The proceedings did not determine a stranger purchaser's independent title or fix final maintenance.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected the relatives' reliance on the sale in light of the sequence of events. The partition had allocated a portion to Devi Lal. Premwati applied in August 2011, and Hetram used a 2004 power of attorney to transfer the share in June 2012 to Dharmendra, the son of an applicant. The timing and relationship were undisputed, while the trial court found that the family remained in possession. Those circumstances supported the finding that this particular sale was a sham intended to defeat the Act and could not defeat the residence order. The Court then considered the Act's protective purpose and Section 3's definition of economic abuse, including restrictions on household resources and access. Premwati remained Devi Lal's wife in a subsisting domestic relationship; the earlier Section 125 litigation or past separation did not categorically bar her application. Bhanot established that pre-Act conduct and a formerly shared household could be relevant to a subsequent application under Section 12 and relief under Sections 18–20. Saraswathy and Shalini reinforced that interpretation, while Krishna Bhattacharjee required a careful and sensitive threshold inquiry. Devkaran's contrary local view therefore could not govern. The Court rejected the maintainability objection and found no error in the residence order or its appellate affirmation. Its Section 3 analysis addressed economic abuse and the subsisting domestic relationship; it did not separately assess damages, maintenance or criminal punishment for pre-Act conduct.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 petition filed by Babulal and the other applicants. The JMFC's order under Section 19 prohibiting obstruction of Premwati's and her daughter's peaceful residence, affirmed by the Additional Sessions Judge on 27.02.2013, remained in force. The Court did not grant a new ownership decree, determine final maintenance or impose punishment for a pre-Act offence.

Babulal and Others v. Premwati, M.Cr.C. no. 2528/2013, 06/12/2016, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Public servants — Sanction — Section 197 CrPC requires a direct and reasonable connection between the alleged act and official duty. Even an excessive act may be protected if that connection exists; holding office or merely asserting self-defence does not establish it. Here, the forest officials' delayed counter-FIR omitted the alleged tree cutting, both spot maps placed the incident on a public road, and the gunshot and forensic evidence contradicted their later account. Applying Amrik Singh, Devinder Singh and K. Kalimuthu, the Court found prima facie no official-duty nexus and upheld cognizance without sanction. Guilt remained for trial.

Closure report — cognizance — A Magistrate may reject a police closure report and take cognizance. Bhagwant Singh protects the informant's opportunity to be heard; it does not give the accused a right to examine the informant at that stage. Nupur Talwar does not require detailed reasons for taking cognizance. The revision was dismissed, with a direction to decide the trial on its evidence, uninfluenced by the High Court's prima facie observations. The executive circular's effect on FIR registration was expressly left open.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Baburam and other forest officials challenged the CJM, Sheopur's order of 6 January 2017 rejecting a police closure report and taking cognizance under IPC Sections 302, 307, 147, 148 and 149. Jahir and Islam were shot on 28 August 2012; Islam died later that day. The complainant's FIR, lodged at 8 a.m., alleged that the officials fired without provocation while the men were searching for buffaloes. The officials' counter-FIR, lodged at 5:30 p.m., alleged an attack on the patrolling party and firing by SAF personnel in self-defence. A magisterial enquiry supported the officials' account. They claimed protection under Section 197 CrPC, relied on a government circular requiring an enquiry before a complaint against forest personnel could be entertained, and contended that the complainant's statement had to be recorded before cognizance. The complainant's side disputed the forest-patrol account and maintained that the incident occurred on a public road.

2. Precedents — Considered : Amrik Singh v. State of Pepsu, AIR 1955 SC 309; Shambhoo Nath Misra v. State of U.P., (1997) 5 SCC 326; Devinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2016) 12 SCC 87; Choudhury Parveen Sultana v. State of W.B., (2009) 3 SCC 398; and K. Kalimuthu v. State, (2005) 4 SCC 512, explained the reasonable official-duty nexus and the protection available even for excess where that nexus exists. The applicants relied on D.T. Virupakshappa and Omprakash for sanction in cases of police excess or self-defence. The Court distinguished that factual premise: the present material did not prima facie connect the firing with official duty. Bhagwant Singh v. Commissioner of Police, (1985) 2 SCC 537, concerned the informant's opportunity to be heard on closure, rather than an accused's right to cross-examine the informant. Nupur Talwar v. CBI, (2012) 11 SCC 465, supported the conclusion that detailed reasons were unnecessary at cognizance.

3. Statutes considered : Section 197 CrPC was invoked as a bar to cognizance without sanction; Sections 397 and 401 governed the revision. The police closure report was described as one under Section 169. Section 154 arose in the discussion of the executive circular, but the Court left open whether executive instructions could restrict the police power to register an FIR. IPC Sections 302, 307, 147, 148 and 149 were the offences taken cognizance of; no conviction was recorded.

4. Issues : Whether the firing by forest and SAF personnel was prima facie reasonably connected with official duty and therefore required prior sanction. Whether the later magisterial enquiry and police closure report prevented cognizance. Whether the accused could insist on examination of the complainant before cognizance. Whether the executive circular prevented registration of an FIR.

5. Ratio / Findings : The forest party lodged its FIR more than ten hours after the incident and after Islam's death, whereas the complainant reported promptly. Its first account mentioned neither tree cutting or freshly cut wood nor attackers armed with firearms. The police found no freshly cut timber, both spot maps placed the incident on a public road, and the physical evidence showed that Islam had been shot from behind at a distance. Against those circumstances, the Court treated the later self-defence account as an afterthought and found prima facie no reasonable connection with official duty. It upheld cognizance without deciding guilt. The accused could not use the informant's right to be heard to demand cross-examination before cognizance, and the CJM's rejection of the closure report was affirmed. Whether the circular could restrict FIR registration under Section 154 remained open.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision and affirmed the cognizance order dated 6 January 2017. It directed the trial court to decide the case strictly on the evidence at trial, uninfluenced by the High Court's prima facie observations, and to conclude the delayed trial within one year from the date of this judgment.

Headnote :- Evidence — related and inimical witnesses — Relationship does not by itself establish an interest in securing conviction. Previous enmity may supply a motive for the offence as well as a basis for false implication, requiring careful scrutiny of the account. Applying Bhagwan Jagannath Markad, State of U.P. v. Kishanpal, Sudhakar, Vijendra Singh and Anil Rai, the Court accepted the axe-assault account of eyewitnesses naturally present in their fields. Deep head and chest wounds corroborated it. Hardas's omission to describe every blow, when examined seven years later, did not undermine identification or render his evidence inconsistent with the medical findings. The Section 302 conviction was upheld.

Sentences — Section 427 CrPC — The appellant's two existing life sentences had already been directed to run concurrently. On his application, the Court applied the same analogy to the subsequent life sentence in this case. It directed concurrent running with those terms while affirming the sentence itself.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Baiju appealed the judgment dated 31 March 2009 in Sessions Trial No. 226/2001, which convicted him under IPC Section 302 for Badri's murder and sentenced him to life imprisonment, a fine of Rs 500 and two months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The prosecution alleged that Baiju attacked Badri with an axe in the fields on 18 April 2001. Badri's brothers, Hardas and Ramswaroop, claimed to have witnessed the assault; his widow, Kapoori, saw Baiju fleeing. Badri had previously been convicted of killing Baiju's father, and the families were hostile. Other co-accused had been acquitted in 2004. Baiju had absconded and was tried separately after his arrest. He disputed the witnesses' reliability and the consistency of their accounts with the medical evidence, alleged false implication, and sought concurrency with the life sentences imposed in two other trials.

2. Precedents — Considered : Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, guided the distinction between material and minor discrepancies and the assessment of related witnesses. State of U.P. v. Kishanpal, (2008) 16 SCC 73; Sudhakar v. State, (2013) 5 SCC 435; and Vijendra Singh v. State of U.P., (2017) 11 SCC 129, were quoted and adopted on the difference between relationship and an interest in conviction, the natural presence of witnesses, and careful scrutiny of their evidence. Anil Rai v. State of Bihar, (2001) 7 SCC 318, was applied to enmity as a circumstance capable of explaining both the crime and false implication. The direction for concurrent sentences followed the analogy of an earlier order in Baiju's separate appeal.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Section 302 governed the murder conviction; the Court regarded life imprisonment as its minimum sentence. Section 374 CrPC provided the appeal, and Section 427 was invoked for concurrent running of the sentences. IPC Section 148 and the other alleged group offences did not produce a separate conviction identified in the impugned disposition. IPC Section 364A and MPDVPK Act Sections 11/13 concerned the two earlier trials and were relevant here only to sentence administration.

4. Issues : Whether the related and inimical witnesses reliably identified Baiju as the axe assailant despite the discrepancy about the number of blows and the co-accused's acquittals. Whether the medical findings supported their account. Whether the life sentence in this case should run concurrently with his other life sentences.

5. Ratio / Findings : The deep incised wounds to the head and chest, including a brain-deep injury, established homicidal death. Hardas and Ramswaroop were naturally present in their fields and described the axe attack; Kapoori saw Baiju leaving the scene. Their relationship to Badri and the families' mutual hostility required careful scrutiny. Cross-examination disclosed no material infirmity, and the medical findings supported Ramswaroop's account of multiple blows. Hardas's failure to recall every blow after seven years did not make his evidence inconsistent with those findings. The Court found Baiju's identity and murderous assault proved. It treated the earlier killing of his father as a motive, while remaining alert to the possibility of false implication, and upheld the Section 302 conviction. For sentence administration, it applied Section 427 by analogy to the earlier order directing that his two existing life sentences run concurrently.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the criminal appeal, affirming the Section 302 conviction and life sentence, together with the stated fine and default term. It directed that this life sentence run concurrently with those in Sessions Trials 24/2004 and 18/2006. Baiju remained in custody to serve the remaining sentence on that basis. He was to receive a copy of the judgment free of cost, and the Registry was to send a copy with the record immediately to the trial court for information and compliance.

Baiju v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 477/2009, 04/10/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Deepak Kumar Agarwal, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Witness contradictions — last seen — The prosecution sought to identify Baiju through the claim that he had taken the victims away. None of the three witnesses had mentioned that circumstance in their Section 161 CrPC statements. One admitted that his account was hearsay; the other two acknowledged first giving the account in court. Applying S. Govindaraju and V.K. Mishra, the Court examined the omissions, the witnesses' admissions and the investigating officer's evidence. It found the claimed last-seen link untrustworthy and set aside the conviction.

Circumstantial and forensic proof — missing links — The firearm deaths were proved to be homicidal, but that did not identify the killers. The alleged letters naming them were not produced and their authorship was unproved. A rifle seized earlier in another case had no established ballistic connection with these murders. Those materials could not supply the failed identity link. The Court acquitted Baiju of both murders and the associated offences, and criticised the trial court for ignoring cross-examination.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Baiju alias Vijay Singh appealed the judgment dated 2 June 2010 in Special Sessions Trial No. 161/2002. He had been convicted on two counts under IPC Section 302/149 read with MPDVPK Act Section 13 and under IPC Section 148. The life terms and two-year rigorous terms were concurrent; each recorded conviction carried a fine of Rs 500, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. Kartar Singh and Punjab Singh were found shot dead on 11 September 2002. A letter was reportedly found with each body, claiming that a dacoit group had killed them for informing the police. Baiju was arrested five years later. A .315 rifle already seized by another police station was formally retrieved for this case. Three trial witnesses claimed that he and an associate had earlier taken the men away, while the defence challenged their accounts as material improvements made for the first time in court.

2. Precedents — Considered : S. Govindaraju v. State of Karnataka, (2013) 15 SCC 315, was applied to distinguish trivial discrepancies from omissions affecting the core of the prosecution case. The Court applied V.K. Mishra v. State of Uttarakhand, (2015) 9 SCC 588, on the limited use of Section 161 statements under Section 162 CrPC and the method of confronting a witness with, and proving, a prior statement under Section 145 of the Evidence Act. The Court examined the actual admissions and the investigating officer's account. It found that the questioning of Balkar, Tahsildar and the officer about the particular omission was inadequate, but held that their general admissions about the omitted allegations substantially met the requirement in the circumstances of this case.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal. Sections 161 and 162 governed the police statements, and Section 145 of the Evidence Act governed contradiction by a prior written statement. The convictions under IPC Sections 302/149 and 148 and MPDVPK Act Section 13 were set aside. Arms Act offences appeared in the charge history.

4. Issues : Whether the last-seen witnesses proved that Baiju was one of the perpetrators of the two firearm murders. Whether the omissions in their earlier statements had been duly established and defeated reliance on their trial accounts. Whether the alleged letters or the retrieved rifle independently connected him with the crimes.

5. Ratio / Findings : The autopsies established homicidal gunshot deaths, but did not identify the assailants. Sultan admitted in cross-examination that he had not seen the victims being taken away and had learnt of it from another person. The allegation was also absent from his police statement. Balkar and Tahsildar acknowledged first giving their supposed eyewitness accounts in court, and the investigating officer confirmed that no such account had been recorded. After examining how the omissions had been put to the witnesses and proved, the Court held that the sole last-seen circumstance was untrustworthy. The alleged letters were not produced and their authorship was unknown; the seizure memos could not prove their contents. The rifle had already been seized in another case, and no ballistic report linked it with these murders. No reliable circumstance connected Baiju with the crimes. The Court also criticised the trial court for relying on examination-in-chief without assessing the cross-examination.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal appeal and set aside all convictions and sentences in the judgment dated 2 June 2010. Baiju was to be released immediately if not required in another case. He was to receive a copy of the judgment free of cost, and the trial record was to be returned with a copy for information and compliance.

Baiju v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 704/2010, 07/01/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Deepak Kumar Agarwal, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- NDPS Act — Section 37 — Undertrial detention and trial delay — After rejection of his earlier application on merits, the accused had remained in custody for about ten months over an alleged seizure of 6.564 kg of ganja.

The prosecution conceded that no witness had appeared on seven listed dates. The Court considered the second bail application solely on detention and lack of trial progress. Despite the Bureau's reliance on Mohit Aggarwal, it held that Section 37 did not authorise indefinite custody without progress in the prosecution, and noted detention-based bail to a co-accused. Bail on a Rs. 1 lakh bond with surety was conditional: the order would automatically lose effect if any witness had appeared on 06.09.2022.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bajrang Lal Sharma was arrested on 14.11.2021 in Crime No. 06/2021 of the Central Narcotics Bureau, Gwalior, for alleged offences under Sections 8 and 20 of the NDPS Act, following an alleged seizure of 6.564 kg of ganja. His first bail application under Section 439 CrPC, M.Cr.C. No. 10257/2022, was rejected on merits on 28.03.2022. In this second application, he relied on about ten months' custody and the absence of prosecution witnesses on 03.03, 24.03, 27.04, 11.05, 06.06, 11.07 and 16.08.2022. Later order sheets had not been supplied, but his lawyer said that he personally attended the trial and knew of the subsequent nonappearances. The Bureau's counsel conceded that no witness had appeared on those dates. Bajrang's counsel also relied on bail granted to co-accused Panchuram Saini on 13.05.2022 on the ground of detention, and submitted that there was no risk of flight or tampering. The Bureau opposed bail under Section 37 and cited a recent Supreme Court decision. Evidence was listed for 06.09.2022, but the applicant's counsel did not know whether a witness had appeared that day.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Bureau relied on Narcotics Control Bureau v. Mohit Aggarwal, Supreme Court order dated 19.07.2022 in SLP (Crl.) Nos. 6128–29/2021, for the Section 37 bail restriction. The High Court expressly declined to reconsider its earlier merits rejection dated 28.03.2022. It noted its order dated 13.05.2022 in M.Cr.C. No. 23980/2022 granting Panchuram Saini bail on the ground of detention. Aparna Bhat v. State of M.P., Supreme Court Criminal Appeal No. 329/2021, 18.03.2021, was invoked only for sending the complainant intimation of the bail grant.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC provided jurisdiction for the successive regular bail application. Sections 8 and 20 of the NDPS Act were the alleged offences; the Court did not decide the merits of possession or quantity classification. The Bureau invoked Section 37 as a bar to bail. The Court held that it did not answer the distinct circumstances of prolonged custody, repeated nonappearance of prosecution witnesses and no trial progress. Its statement that Section 37 would not apply was made in that detention-based context. The operative conditions governed the bond, surety, court appearances and consequences of a bail jump.

4. Issues : Whether Section 37 could justify continued custody after an earlier merits rejection when the undertrial had spent about ten months in jail and prosecution witnesses had repeatedly failed to attend. What weight should be given to detention-based bail already granted to a co-accused. Whether a witness had appeared on 06.09.2022, a fact unknown at the High Court hearing but decisive of whether this bail order could take effect. The merits of the NDPS charge remained outside consideration, and the order's effect depended on attendance that day.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court considered the second application on detention, without reopening the merits. The Bureau's counsel conceded that no witness had appeared on the earlier dates. Bajrang had remained in jail for roughly ten months with no trial progress. The Court reasoned that, even if the prosecution could prima facie show that he might have committed the NDPS offence, the Act did not authorise keeping an undertrial in custody indefinitely without advancing the trial. On these facts, Section 37 did not answer the continuing lack of progress. A co-accused had already received bail on the detention ground. The Court did not find the ganja allegation proved or decide whether Bajrang would reoffend. Since evidence was listed for the hearing day and attendance was unknown, the court below had to check whether a witness had appeared before releasing him. Appearance of a prosecution witness on 06.09.2022 would automatically make the order ineffective.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the second regular bail application on a personal bond of Rs. 1 lakh with one surety in the same amount, to the satisfaction of the trial or committal court, for appearance on the dates fixed. Before release, the court below had to verify that no prosecution witness had appeared on the date of the order. If a witness had appeared that day, the order would automatically lose effect. Otherwise, it would remain effective until the end of trial, becoming ineffective upon a bail jump. Intimation of the bail grant was to be sent to the complainant.

Bajrang Lal Sharma v. Central Narcotics Bureau, M.Cr.C. no. 41761/2022, 06/09/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Matrimonial offence — FIR after divorce proceedings — A wife's efforts at reconciliation can explain a delay in reporting cruelty. A divorce petition does not bring separate criminal proceedings to an end, even when both arise from the same facts. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court held that the sequence of divorce proceedings and the FIR did not, by itself, establish a counterblast where the wife had made specific allegations of dowry demands and cruelty.

Charge — relative's asserted alibi — The sister-in-law relied on separate residence and an asserted dental practice in Indore. Those matters did not establish an alibi at the stage of framing charges in the face of a specific allegation that she had beaten the wife. Applying M.E. Shivalingamurthy and the related authorities, the Court held that material giving rise to grave suspicion could support a charge after limited sifting. Proof of the allegations and the defence remained for trial.

Precedent — per incuriam — The Court held that the coordinate Bench decision in Abhishek Pandey was per incuriam on the divorce-notice issue because it had overlooked Pratibha. That treatment was confined to the issue before the Court. The charge order was affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Balkrishna Devda and the other relatives sought revision of the JMFC's charge order dated 3 February 2021 in Criminal Case No. 4/2021. The charges were under IPC Sections 498-A, 294, 323/34 and 506-II and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4. The wife alleged that she married Aditya Devda on 17 April 2019 and that he and his relatives thereafter demanded a four-wheeler, beat her and abused her. Her account included a confrontation at her parental home in June 2020. The defence contended that the FIR dated 2 November 2020 was delayed, followed the divorce notice and petition, and falsely implicated a sister-in-law who lived and practised dentistry in Indore.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was applied to reject the contention that delay during reconciliation efforts or divorce litigation automatically barred independent criminal proceedings. On that issue, the Court held that the coordinate Bench decision in Abhishek Pandey @ Ramji Pandey v. State of M.P. was per incuriam because it had overlooked Pratibha. It also cited Meera v. State of M.P. M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. CBI, (2020) 2 SCC 768, Soma Chakravarty v. State through CBI, (2007) 5 SCC 403, State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, (2020) 2 SCC 290, and State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, (2017) 3 SCC 198, were adopted for the requirement of material supporting grave suspicion, the limited sifting permitted at charge and the prohibition on a roving inquiry into the defence.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 498-A, 294, 323/34 and 506-II and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4 were the charges framed; no conviction was recorded. CrPC Sections 397 and 401 governed the revision. In discussing limitation under Section 468 CrPC, the Court noted that fewer than three years had elapsed between the marriage and the FIR. CrPC Sections 227/228 appeared in the quoted Supreme Court decisions explaining the test for framing a charge.

4. Issues : Whether the sequence of divorce proceedings and the delay in reporting established that the FIR was a counterblast. Whether a relative's separate residence and proposed alibi defeated a specific allegation before trial. Whether the material supporting the charges raised the required suspicion. Whether the coordinate Bench ruling governed the issue despite having overlooked the Supreme Court decision.

5. Ratio / Findings : The FIR specifically alleged a demand for a four-wheeler as dowry and beating by named relatives. Efforts to reconcile the marriage could explain why the wife had not reported the matter immediately. Divorce proceedings and criminal liability remained separate. The sister-in-law's rent note and unproved claim to be practising dentistry did not establish an alibi at the charge stage; the allegation against her was specific, rather than wholly general. Applying the requirement of material supporting strong suspicion, the Court found no error in the JMFC's order. Credibility and guilt remained for trial. It treated Abhishek Pandey as per incuriam only on the divorce-chronology issue because that decision had overlooked Pratibha.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision and affirmed the charge order dated 3 February 2021.

Balkrishna Devda and Ors. v. State of M.P. and Ors., Cr.R. no. 2045/2021, 11/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Rape — historical age threshold — For the conduct in September 2006, Section 375 Sixthly IPC made intercourse with a girl under sixteen rape, irrespective of consent. The Court accepted the school records and the evidence of the source of the admission entry, supported by radiology, as proving that the prosecutrix was born on 16 July 1991 and was 15 years and two months old. Her asserted consent was therefore immaterial to the 2006 charge. Her account and recovery from the appellant's house supported the conviction. The under-sixteen threshold was that of the law applicable at the time.

Sentence — modification — The Court affirmed the convictions under Sections 363, 366 and 376(1), but reduced the ten-year terms under Sections 366 and 376(1) to seven years each. It considered the minimum rape sentence then applicable and the appellant's age. The Section 363 term remained unchanged. The modified order specified the fines and default sentences, and the substantive terms were to run concurrently.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ballan alias Manoj appealed against the judgment dated 24 January 2008 in Sessions Trial No. 47/2007. He had been convicted under IPC Sections 363/34, 366/34 and 376(1)/34 and sentenced to seven, ten and ten years respectively. The prosecutrix went missing after leaving for stitching classes on 18 September 2006. The police later recovered her from Ballan's house at Dabra. She stated that she had been taken away on a promise of marriage, raped at the appellant's sister's house in Morena and then confined in his house at Dabra. The defence disputed her minority, suggested consent and sought a reduction in sentence. The co-accused Chhote Singh's appeal had abated after his death.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court directly assessed the school, family and radiological evidence of age and applied the statutory text then in force.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Section 375 Sixthly, as applicable in 2006, made consent immaterial where the girl was under sixteen. Section 376(1) governed the rape conviction and then prescribed a minimum term of seven years. Sections 363 and 366 concerned the taking and abduction-related offences; Section 34 appeared in the trial court's formulation of the convictions. CrPC Section 374 governed the appeal. Although the judgment was delivered in 2019, it assessed the 2006 occurrence under the statutory age threshold then applicable.

4. Issues : Whether the school and medical evidence proved that the prosecutrix was under sixteen in September 2006, making consent legally immaterial. Whether the convictions for the sexual offence and the taking-related offences could stand. Whether the ten-year terms should be modified.

5. Ratio / Findings : The principal proved the admission registers and a mark sheet recording the prosecutrix's date of birth as 16 July 1991. Her father testified that he had supplied the date from the hospital birth certificate when enrolling her. The parents' account of their marriage and the births of their children was consistent with that date. Radiology assessed her age as above 15 and below 16½. The Court found that she was 15 years and two months old at the time of the incident. Under Section 375 Sixthly as it then stood, consent was immaterial below sixteen. The prosecutrix identified Ballan and described intercourse; her recovery from his house supported her account. The Court affirmed the convictions. It reduced the terms under Sections 366 and 376(1) after considering his age and the sentencing range, while leaving the Section 363 sentence unchanged.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court partly allowed the criminal appeal and maintained the convictions. It reduced the terms under Section 366 and Section 376(1) to seven years' rigorous imprisonment each, with a fine of Rs 5,000 and five months' rigorous imprisonment in default for each offence. The Section 363 sentence remained seven years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1,000, with one year's rigorous imprisonment in default. All substantive terms were concurrent. If the appellant remained in jail, he was to serve the remaining sentence. If he had furnished bail, his bail bonds stood cancelled and he had to surrender immediately before the trial court to serve the remaining sentence.

Headnote :- Section 313 CrPC — FSL report received after examination of the accused — The trial court should have put the later finding of human blood on the accused's clothes to him for explanation. It should not have rejected that circumstance in advance merely because blood grouping was inconclusive. As the accused had received no opportunity to explain it, the High Court excluded the human-blood circumstance. Fifteen years after the trial, it declined to remand the case solely to supply that opportunity.

Child witness — Injured survivor — Sole testimony — The six-year-old injured eyewitness was tested for understanding, cross-examined and observed by the trial judge. State of H.P. v. Prem Chand, (2002) 10 SCC 518; Prakash v. State of M.P., (1992) 4 SCC 225; Dharamwati v. Jaibir, 1990 Supp SCC 275; Suryanarayana v. State of Karnataka, (2001) 9 SCC 129; and State of Rajasthan v. Chandgi Ram, (2014) 14 SCC 596, required careful scrutiny of competence, truthfulness and the possibility of tutoring. They imposed no absolute requirement of corroboration. The Court applied those principles and accepted the child's account of what she had seen, despite her acknowledgment of what her grandparents had also told her.

Injured witness — Natural reaction — Ramvilas v. State of M.P., (2016) 16 SCC 316; State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324; and Chandrashekhar v. State, (2017) 13 SCC 585, supported giving special weight to an injured witness whose presence was established, subject to scrutiny for major contradictions. A frightened child's failure to shout during the attack did not, by itself, make her eyewitness account false.

Section 161 CrPC — Delay in recording the statement — The survivor's statement in September about the July attack was accepted after the investigating officer explained her unconsciousness, memory problems and continuing treatment. Applying Prithvi (Minor) v. Mam Raj, (2004) 13 SCC 279, which explained Mohd. Khalid, the Court assessed the cause of the delay and the credibility of the account. Delay did not require automatic exclusion.

Ocular and medical evidence — Sabbal injuries — The incised, punctured and blunt wounds were medically compatible with the different surfaces of a pointed iron sabbal. The presence of those different kinds of wounds did not, by itself, establish another assailant or discredit the child's account.

Discovery — Concealed articles in an accessible place — Applying Yakub Abdul Razak Memon v. State of Maharashtra, (2013) 13 SCC 1, which discussed Jeet Singh and Bharat Fakira Dhiwar, the Court accepted the significance of the disclosure-led recovery of clothes hidden among tent-house goods. Other persons' possible access to the premises did not, by itself, negate the accused's knowledge of the concealment. The FSL finding of human blood nevertheless remained excluded because it had not been put to him under Section 313.

Section 31 CrPC — Multiple life sentences — The statutory default of consecutive terms does not permit life sentences to be served successively in an unworkable order. Applying O.M. Cherian v. State of Kerala, (2015) 2 SCC 501, and Muthuramalingam v. State, (2016) 8 SCC 313, and noting Kuldeep v. State of Haryana, (2018) 18 SCC 652, and Gagan Kumar v. State of Punjab, (2019) 5 SCC 154, the Court maintained the convictions for two murders and attempted murder but directed the life terms to run concurrently.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ballu appealed under Section 374 CrPC against the Shivpuri Sessions Court's judgment dated 30 April 2007 in Sessions Trial 192/2006. He had been convicted on two counts under Section 302 IPC for killing Ruksana and her son Sameer, also called Shahrukh in the judgment, and under Section 307 IPC for attacking her daughter Aarju. The trial court imposed life imprisonment under Section 302 and Section 307 but gave no direction for concurrency. The appeal had earlier been withdrawn to seek remission. It was restored on 15 December 2021.

On 5 July 2006, Bhaiyyan, Ballu's brother and the victims' husband and father, returned home with Banti. He found the door bolted from outside and the children injured on a balcony. Sameer died; Ruksana was found dead elsewhere on the premises, while Aarju survived. The initial FIR also recorded Ballu's statement that he had seen Ruksana alive at about 4:45 p.m. The police recovered two sabbals and bloodstained material from the scene. After Ballu's disclosure, they recovered his shirt and trousers from among tent-house goods. The autopsies recorded fatal head trauma with incised, punctured and blunt injuries; Aarju's medical record showed several head wounds. The prosecution examined sixteen witnesses, including the injured child, and the defence examined two. Ballu disputed the child's competence and reliability, suggested tutoring by her maternal grandparents and challenged the delay in recording her police statement. He argued that the different kinds of wounds indicated more than one attacker. He also challenged the use of an FSL report received after his Section 313 examination and sought concurrent life sentences. The State maintained that guilt had been proved beyond reasonable doubt.

2. Precedents — Considered : On child testimony, State of H.P. v. Prem Chand, (2002) 10 SCC 518, concerned a child who coherently identified a known uncle despite searching cross-examination. The Court used that decision by analogy when assessing Aarju's first-hand account. Prakash v. State of M.P., (1992) 4 SCC 225, rejected an assumption of tutoring based on youth alone. Dharamwati v. Jaibir, 1990 Supp SCC 275, gave weight to the trial judge's observations of an eight-year-old's demeanour and answers when rejecting speculative tutoring. Suryanarayana v. State of Karnataka, (2001) 9 SCC 129, permitted reliance on a solitary child eyewitness after close scrutiny of cross-examination and the absence of material infirmity. It treated corroboration as a matter of prudence rather than an absolute condition; the quoted discussion also referred to Panchhi and other child-witness decisions. State of Rajasthan v. Chandgi Ram, (2014) 14 SCC 596, quoted State of M.P. v. Ramesh on competence under Section 118 Evidence Act, understanding, cross-examination and evidence of tutoring. It also quoted Shivasharanappa on reliable child testimony and desirable, though non-mandatory, corroboration. The Court applied these principles to the trial judge's contemporaneous observations and Aarju's answers. For an injured witness, Ramvilas v. State of M.P., (2016) 16 SCC 316, required strong grounds to reject the evidence. State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324, explained that injury assured the witness's presence, while major contradictions still required consideration. Chandrashekhar v. State, (2017) 13 SCC 585, quoted Brahm Swaroop on the same evidentiary consideration. The Court applied those authorities to Aarju's documented head injuries while still examining credibility. Prithvi (Minor) v. Mam Raj, (2004) 13 SCC 279, discussed Mohd. Khalid and earlier delay cases and rejected an absolute rule that belated examination of a witness was fatal. The explanation and the testimony had to be assessed. That principle supported accepting the investigating officer's medical explanation for the delay in recording Aarju's Section 161 statement.

On recovery, Yakub Abdul Razak Memon v. State of Maharashtra, (2013) 13 SCC 1, considered Jeet Singh and Bharat Fakira Dhiwar. It explained why discovery of a hidden object at the accused's instance did not lose its value merely because others could enter the place. The Court applied that discovery principle, while excluding the FSL human-blood finding because the circumstance had not been put to Ballu under Section 313.

On sentence, O.M. Cherian v. State of Kerala, (2015) 2 SCC 501, explained the discretion under Section 31, the need to specify the order of consecutive terms and the impracticability of serving a fixed term after a life sentence or life sentences in succession. Muthuramalingam v. State, (2016) 8 SCC 313, explained the requirements of one trial and multiple offences under Section 31 and reaffirmed concurrency for multiple life sentences. Referring to Duryodhan Rout, it explained that life imprisonment ordinarily extends throughout natural life. Kuldeep v. State of Haryana, (2018) 18 SCC 652, and Gagan Kumar v. State of Punjab, (2019) 5 SCC 154, were also cited for possible concurrency where offences formed one transaction. The Court applied the life-sentence rule and corrected the trial court's failure to direct concurrency, without altering the findings of guilt.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 302 and 307 IPC governed the murder and attempt charges and convictions, assessed on the eyewitness, medical and other admissible evidence. Section 374 CrPC provided appellate jurisdiction. Section 313 CrPC required that any incriminating circumstance to be used against Ballu be put to him for explanation; the later report's finding of human blood had not been put to him. Although Section 293 CrPC made the FSL report admissible as such, it did not dispense with the opportunity required by Section 313. Section 161 CrPC concerned the timing of Aarju's police statement. Section 118 Evidence Act was discussed in the Supreme Court child-witness authorities on understanding questions and giving rational answers. The recovery analysis concerned the evidentiary significance of Ballu's disclosure and knowledge of the concealed clothes. Section 31(1) CrPC prescribed consecutive terms unless concurrency was directed, subject to judicial sentencing discretion. The reproduced subsection (2) dealt with aggregate imprisonment limits and when transfer to a higher court was unnecessary.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the fatal injuries established two homicides and whether the child survivor's testimony proved Ballu's participation despite her age, relationship, alleged tutoring and position as the sole eyewitness. (ii) Whether her medical condition plausibly explained the delay in recording her Section 161 statement, and whether her failure to raise an alarm undermined her account. (iii) Whether the incised, punctured and blunt injuries were inconsistent with a sabbal and indicated other assailants. (iv) Whether the FSL finding of human blood on Ballu's clothes, received after his Section 313 examination, could be used when the trial court had not put it to him; and what significance remained in the disclosure-led recovery. (v) Whether the two murder life sentences and the Section 307 life sentence should run consecutively because the trial court was silent, or concurrently under Section 31 and the Supreme Court's life-sentence decisions.

5. Ratio / Findings : The doctors established the homicidal head injuries of Ruksana and Sameer and the surviving child's head injuries. The trial judge questioned Aarju to test her understanding, noted her natural answers and recorded that seeing Ballu frightened her so much that her testimony had to stop. She later identified her uncle and described his assaults on her brother and herself. She distinguished her own observations from what her grandparents had also told her. Her acknowledgment of their statements required careful scrutiny, rather than automatic rejection. Applying the child-witness authorities to her capacity, demeanour and cross-examination, the Court found that she had not been tutored. Her proved injuries supported her presence at the scene. Her silence during an attack by a familiar adult did not carry the fixed adverse inference urged by the defence.

The investigating officer explained that, when he tried to record her account after discharge, she remained unconscious or suffered memory problems. Treatment continued, and the defence itself had asked about lingering dizziness. The Court accepted that explanation for the delay until 9 September and applied Prithvi's case-specific approach. On the alleged medical contradiction, it reasoned that an iron sabbal could cause blunt, punctured and incised wounds according to the surface used. The medical evidence therefore did not contradict the child's account on this record. Bhaiyyan's FIR and answers in cross-examination also placed Ballu at the scene around the relevant time, despite his omission of that fact in examination-in-chief.

The FSL report arrived after Ballu's Section 313 examination. The trial court treated the failure to determine the blood group as a reason to reject the report's evidentiary use and asked him no further question. The High Court held that human blood could have been a relevant circumstance even without grouping, but would not use it against an accused who had received no opportunity to explain it. After fifteen years, it declined to remand the case solely to put that question. Separately, the disclosure-led recovery of clothes hidden among tent materials remained significant under Yakub Abdul Razak Memon: Ballu located them despite other persons' possible access. The finding of guilt rested on admissible testimony and circumstances, without treating the FSL human-blood result as proof against him. The Court found both Section 302 counts and the Section 307 offence proved beyond reasonable doubt.

The trial court's silence ordinarily attracted consecutive sentences under Section 31(1). Applying O.M. Cherian and Muthuramalingam, however, the Court addressed the impossibility of serving one life sentence after another. It also considered the same-transaction authorities, Kuldeep and Gagan Kumar. It directed the life terms to run concurrently, without changing the convictions or converting life imprisonment into fixed terms.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal on the merits of the convictions for the two murders and the attack on Aarju, but partly allowed it on sentence. The life terms under Section 302 and Section 307 were to run concurrently. The Shivpuri trial judgment and sentence were otherwise affirmed. Ballu remained in jail to serve the remaining sentence. A copy of the judgment was to be provided to him immediately and free of cost. The trial record was to be returned immediately, with a copy of the judgment, for information and compliance.

Headnote :- Trial — Recall under Section 311 CrPC — A later lawyer's view that earlier cross-examination was inadequate does not, by itself, justify recalling witnesses. The Court applied State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Kumar Yadav, (2016) 2 SCC 402, and considered whether the accused had received a fair opportunity and whether prejudice had been shown, alongside the need to avoid delay and harassment of witnesses. It upheld the refusal to recall nine witnesses in the dacoity trial. It made no finding of professional misconduct against earlier counsel. Its discussion of separate professional remedies was conditional and did not decide such a claim.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ballu Khan applied under Section 482 CrPC to challenge the Special Judge's order of 4 April 2019 refusing to recall nine prosecution witnesses under Section 311 in Special Sessions Trial No. 35/2016. The pending charges were under IPC Sections 392 and 395 read with MPDVPK Act Sections 11/13. He alleged that earlier counsel had not cross-examined the witnesses at all and had failed to put important questions to Alakhram and Padam Singh Dhakad. He said that a lawyer at Gwalior had expressed that view after examining the deposition sheets. The State opposed recall on the ground that an opportunity had already been given.

2. Precedents — Considered : State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Kumar Yadav and another, (2016) 2 SCC 402, was quoted and applied. A change of counsel or general criticism of earlier representation does not, by itself, justify recall. The assessment must consider a fair opportunity for the accused, prejudice, the burden on victims and witnesses, and an expeditious trial. The quoted Supreme Court passage treated genuine physical or mental incapacity of counsel as a separate concern. No such incapacity was established in the present case.

3. Statutes considered : Section 311 CrPC governed recall; Section 482 concerned the High Court's inherent powers. IPC Sections 392 and 395 and MPDVPK Act Sections 11/13 were the underlying pending charges; the Court did not decide guilt. It mentioned recourse to the Bar Council for professional misconduct and a claim for compensation for loss caused by such misconduct. Those observations were conditional and did not determine any disciplinary violation or compensation claim.

4. Issues : Whether a later lawyer's criticism of the earlier cross-examination and the alleged failure to put questions justified recalling nine witnesses; and whether a fair opportunity had been denied or resulting prejudice had been shown.

5. Ratio / Findings : The applicant had engaged counsel and had been given a full opportunity of hearing. The Court would not infer that earlier counsel was incompetent merely because a later lawyer assessed the representation differently. No specific incapacity, denial of opportunity or concrete resulting prejudice was demonstrated on the grounds assessed. Applying Shiv Kumar Yadav, the Court found no basis to recall witnesses merely because counsel had changed. It also rejected the plea that the applicant should not suffer for counsel's fault, noting that he had taken no action against earlier counsel. If he considered that counsel had deliberately failed in his duties and committed professional misconduct, he could approach the Bar Council. If he considered that such misconduct would cause him irreparable loss, he could seek compensation against the lawyer. The Court described those remedies conditionally; it did not find professional misconduct or decide a claim for compensation. Recall could not be granted on that ground alone when a full opportunity had been given and had not been used.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. The refusal to recall witnesses under Section 311 remained in place.

Headnote :- NDPS — Quantity of a mixture and scope of the appeal — The trial court assessed the seized 15 grams of smack by its pure diacetylmorphine content, following E. Michael Raj. It convicted the appellant under Section 21(a) and acquitted him under Section 21(b). The High Court held that the notification of 18 November 2009 applied the quantity thresholds to the whole mixture, rather than its pure drug content, and that the trial court's reasoning was therefore incorrect. As the Section 21(b) acquittal had not been appealed, the High Court left it undisturbed. It affirmed the Section 21(a) conviction and sentence.

Forensic report — Sections 293 and 313 CrPC — The FSL report had not been formally exhibited, but it was admissible under Section 293 and had been put specifically to the appellant under Section 313. The Court read it in evidence. Together with the accepted evidence of the pocket seizure and sampling, it established the narcotic character of the seized material for the conviction under appeal.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ballu Savita appealed against the judgment of 27 June 2013 in Special Sessions Trial No. 16/2011. He had been convicted under Section 21(a) of the NDPS Act and sentenced to four months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 5,000, with one month's rigorous imprisonment in default. On 24 May 2011, the police recorded information about the sale of smack and informed the City Superintendent of Police. Near Birla Nagar overbridge, they searched the appellant after giving a Section 50 notice and obtaining his consent. They recovered 15 grams of smack from his pocket, along with a scale and phones. Two samples of five grams each were prepared; the FSL report identified diacetylmorphine. The trial court treated the pure content, at 16.87 percent, as a small quantity and acquitted him of the charged offence under Section 21(b). The defence challenged compliance with Section 50. The High Court also examined the report's non-exhibition and the basis for classifying the quantity.

2. Precedents — Considered : The High Court attributed the trial court's use of pure drug content to E. Michael Raj v. Narcotic Control Bureau, (2008) 5 SCC 161. It noted that the trial court had overlooked the later notification of 18 November 2009 governing the quantity of a mixture. It did not reopen the unappealed Section 21(b) acquittal or substitute a conviction in another quantity category. It accepted the prosecution evidence and declined to interfere with the conviction and sentence under appeal.

3. Statutes considered : The charge was under Sections 8/21(b) of the NDPS Act; the conviction upheld was under Section 21(a). The Section 50 notice and consent formed part of the search evidence. Notification S.O. 2941(E) of 18 November 2009 inserted the requirement to consider the whole mixture when applying the specified small and commercial quantities. Section 293 CrPC governed the forensic report's admissibility, Section 313 the accused's opportunity to respond to it, and Section 374 the appeal.

4. Issues : Whether the personal-search and recovery evidence, together with the FSL report, supported the Section 21(a) conviction despite the report not having been formally exhibited; whether the trial court had correctly classified the quantity by pure drug content rather than the whole mixture; and the scope for interference when the Section 21(b) acquittal had not been challenged.

5. Ratio / Findings : The searching officer described the prior information, Section 50 notice, consent, pocket seizure, weighing and sampling. His detailed cross-examination did not undermine his reliability. An independent witness also supported the recovery of 15 grams of smack. The FSL report was admissible under Section 293 and had been specifically put to the appellant under Section 313; the Court could therefore read it in evidence. The High Court rejected the trial court's quantity reasoning because the 2009 notification applied to the whole mixture. It left the Section 21(b) acquittal undisturbed because no appeal had challenged it. On the prosecution evidence, it found the Section 21(a) offence proved beyond reasonable doubt. It considered the four-month term already lenient and declined further interference.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal. It affirmed the Section 21(a) conviction and the sentence of four months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 5,000, with one month's rigorous imprisonment in default. The appellant was to be released after serving the jail sentence, if he had not already been released.

Ballu Savita v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 531/2013, 13/08/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Separate trials — Evidence confined to each record — Applying A.T. Maydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department (Criminal Appeal 1306/2021, decided 29.10.2021), the Court held that the evidence recorded afresh in the trial of Balram and Ramjilal, who had been absconding, could not be used in the appeal of Govind Das and Gudda, who had been tried earlier. The earlier-tried co-accused's appeal required a separate judgment.

Section 157 CrPC — Dispatch of FIR to Magistrate — The FIR was recorded promptly and received by the Magistrate the next day. That interval did not, by itself, establish that it had been ante-timed, particularly in view of the disturbance at the police station and the absence of demonstrated prejudice. The Court applied Pala Singh v. State of Punjab, (1972) 2 SCC 640; Mahmood v. State of U.P., (2007) 14 SCC 16, explaining Anil Rai and Alla China Apparao; and Jafel Biswas v. State of W.B., (2019) 12 SCC 560, discussing dispatch as an external check against interpolation and the authorities on prejudice. Nor did omission of the FIR number from forms with no field for that number prove fabrication.

Delayed examination of witnesses — Peripheral discrepancies — Applying Sadhu Suran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, the Court treated differences about whether the victim came on foot, by bicycle or by motorcycle, and an isolated recollection of time after roughly nine years, as peripheral. The witnesses were substantially consistent about the attack. The appellants' abscondence had caused much of the interval before trial.

Medical evidence — Time of death and rigor mortis — The doctor estimated that death had occurred three to twelve hours before the afternoon post-mortem. That interval included the reported assault at 11–11:30 a.m. The defence had not challenged the estimate. As the onset of rigor mortis depended on weather conditions, its presence alone did not establish an earlier death.

Section 302/34 IPC — Appeal — On the eyewitness and medical evidence recorded in their separate trial, the Court affirmed Balram and Ramjilal's convictions for the killing arising from the land dispute. It dismissed their appeal.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In January 2009, Krishna Bihari Singh Tomar reported that his family had purchased land from relatives of Govind Das and that hostility had followed the transaction. In his promptly lodged FIR and later testimony, he stated that his son Mohan Singh had encountered Govind Das, Gudda, Balram and Ramjilal near the field at about 11:30 a.m. on 18 January. He attributed a Baka blow to Gudda, a sword blow on the left wrist to Balram, a Katar blow on the left hand to Ramjilal, and a lathi assault to Govind Das. Mohan Singh was taken first to the Manpura primary health centre and then to the Shivpuri district hospital, where he was declared dead. The autopsy recorded deep incised injuries to the face, arm and head, and death from shock and haemorrhage.

Govind Das and Gudda had been tried and convicted earlier in Sessions Trial 106/2009. Balram and Ramjilal were arrested on 5 October 2016. A supplementary prosecution followed, and evidence was recorded afresh in Sessions Trial 106/2016. On 4 April 2019, the Additional Sessions Judge, Pichhore, convicted them under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC and sentenced each to life imprisonment and a fine of Rs 500, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default. Their appeal under Section 374 CrPC was heard alongside that of the earlier-tried co-accused, but the Bench kept the records separate. The appellants argued that rigor mortis indicated an earlier death; that missing FIR numbers and next-day receipt by the Magistrate showed an ante-timed FIR; and that delayed witness statements and differences about transport and time undermined the eyewitness account. They also relied on the change of investigating officer after a protest and on documents said to support their residence elsewhere. The State supported the convictions.

2. Precedents — Considered : A.T. Maydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department, Criminal Appeal 1306/2021, decided 29 October 2021, established that evidence recorded in one separate trial cannot simply be used for or against persons tried in another. The Bench applied that rule by leaving the earlier-tried co-accused's appeal for a separate judgment and deciding Balram and Ramjilal's appeal on the evidence recorded afresh in their trial.

Pala Singh v. State of Punjab, (1972) 2 SCC 640, explained that transmission under Section 157 keeps the Magistrate informed and enables supervision of the investigation. Where the FIR was actually recorded promptly and investigation began on that basis, delayed receipt alone did not defeat the prosecution in the absence of prejudice or another infirmity. Mahmood v. State of U.P., (2007) 14 SCC 16, discussed Anil Rai on that purpose. It distinguished extraordinary, unexplained delay from every delay and quoted Alla China Apparao on the meaning of 'forthwith': reasonable dispatch in the prevailing circumstances, without a universal rule requiring an explanation for every hour. Jafel Biswas v. State of W.B., (2019) 12 SCC 560, reviewed authorities including Daud Khan, Sheo Shankar Singh and Sandeep. Dispatch is an external check against ante-timing or interpolation and a public duty of the investigating officer, but the effect of delay depends on the explanation, the truthfulness of the evidence and demonstrated prejudice. The Court applied those principles to an FIR lodged within minutes and received by the court the next day, in the context of disorder at the station. It did not treat the authorities as giving general permission for late transmission.

Sadhu Suran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, distinguished minor deviations after a long interval between the occurrence and examination from major inconsistencies affecting proof of guilt. The Court applied it to peripheral differences in recollection in this delayed trial, taking account of the appellants' long absence. It also assessed the actual post-mortem estimate and the doctor's cross-examination.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal. Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC was the basis of the murder conviction on common intention, for which life imprisonment and fine were upheld. The Supreme Court authorities discussed Sections 157 and 159 CrPC in relation to transmission of the occurrence report and the Magistrate's supervisory role. Sections 174 and 175 CrPC appeared in the death-inquiry and notice documents. The absence of a field for the FIR number in the relevant forms informed the Court's rejection of the ante-timing objection. The Court observed that the signed Section 161 statement was hit by Section 162 CrPC; it did not adopt the statement's contents as substantive proof. Its existence nevertheless showed that witnesses were available and that the first investigating officer had failed to record their statements. The supplementary charge sheet included other IPC and Arms Act offences, but the appeal concerned the framed murder charge and conviction, without independent findings on those additional allegations. Ramjilal gave evidence in defence under Section 315 CrPC.

4. Issues : Whether evidence from Balram and Ramjilal's later separate trial could be used in the pending appeal of the two earlier-tried co-accused. Whether next-day receipt by the Magistrate, missing FIR numbers in the inquest-related documents, or allegations of police pressure and a changed investigator undermined the prompt lodging of the FIR. Whether the medical estimate and rigor mortis placed the death before the time alleged by the prosecution. Whether differences in recollection after nine years and delayed witness statements undermined the central accusation that Balram and Ramjilal had assaulted Mohan Singh, and whether their claimed residence in Jhansi established non-participation. Whether the Section 302/34 conviction and sentence required appellate interference.

5. Ratio / Findings : The doctor found fatal ante-mortem injuries caused by sharp weapons, including major head trauma, and rejected the suggested accidental collision with an iron board. His estimate of death three to twelve hours before the afternoon autopsy included the alleged late-morning assault. The defence had not challenged that estimated interval. The onset of rigor mortis depended on environmental conditions and did not, by itself, establish an earlier death. The complainant lodged the FIR within about twenty-five minutes and described the attacks by Balram and Ramjilal on the left hand. Other witnesses and the medical injuries supported the essential account. The Court distinguished the peripheral differences about walking, cycling or a motorcycle, and the recollection of the time of a Section 175 notice after a long interval, from a material contradiction identifying the attackers.

The first investigation had shortcomings. Despite the death, the initial officer did not promptly add the murder offence, and he failed to record the statements of certain witnesses who were available. There had also been agitation at the police station. The signed Section 161 statement was affected by Section 162. Those matters required scrutiny but did not make an otherwise promptly lodged FIR ante-timed. The report was dispatched on the date of the incident and received the next day. The inquest-related documents had no field for the FIR number. Under Pala Singh, Mahmood and Jafel Biswas, the timing of dispatch is a safeguard assessed with the actual recording and investigation, the explanation and prejudice; it does not operate as a mechanical rule requiring acquittal. The Court found no evidentiary basis to infer manipulation from those circumstances.

The defence relied on Aadhaar cards whose dates did not show whether they had been issued before the incident. The voter list was not produced, and ownership of a house in Jhansi was not proved. A witness stated that the appellants had moved after the incident; their arrest years later supported that account. The Court found that cross-examination had not discredited the material eyewitness evidence. It upheld the finding that Balram and Ramjilal had participated in the killing under Section 302/34. This judgment did not dispose of the separate appeal of the earlier-tried co-accused.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed Balram and Ramjilal's criminal appeal. It affirmed the conviction under Section 302/34 IPC and the sentence imposed in Sessions Trial 106/2016 on 4 April 2019: life imprisonment and a fine of Rs 500, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The appellants remained in jail to serve the balance of their sentence. A copy of the judgment was to be provided to them immediately and free of cost. The trial record was to be returned with a copy of the judgment for information and compliance. The earlier-tried co-accused's appeal was to be decided separately.

Balram and Ors. v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 5079/2019, 06/01/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Deepak Kumar Agarwal, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Judicial recusal — Earlier orders concerning a co-accused — In a repeat appeal under Section 14-A(2) of the SC/ST Act, the appellant's wife sought the Judge's recusal because he had passed adverse orders in a co-accused's bail proceedings. The Court noted that no bias directed against this appellant was alleged and that other co-accused had been granted bail on their individual records. Applying Indore Development Authority v. Manoharlal (order dated 23.10.2019, SLP (Cri.) 9036–9038/2016 as cited in the order), it held that opinions formed in earlier judicial proceedings do not, by themselves, disqualify a Judge. The question is whether the facts objectively support an apprehension that the Judge cannot decide impartially.

Recusal — Choice of Bench and judicial duty — The Court applied Indore Development Authority's discussion of judicial duty and the distinction between a reasoned objection of bias and forum hunting. It rejected the unsupported recusal application after the administrative transfer request had been closed with the Chief Justice's direction to file the application. It described the recusal application as contemptuous but declined to initiate contempt proceedings. The ruling did not exclude recusal on a properly established disqualifying interest or reasonable apprehension of bias.

Bail — Distinct identity and alleged trial delay — The Court distinguished the appellant from another accused of the same name. The FIR and witness statements nevertheless placed this appellant with the group, and the Court found a prima facie common object in the alleged fatal attack, other assaults and burning of a house. Anil Kumar Yadav v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 12 SCC 129, was cited for the limited observation that one year's custody in a murder case was not excessive in itself. Without the trial order sheets, the Court could not assess the asserted lack of progress. It dismissed the repeat bail appeal, with liberty to renew the delay ground on a complete record.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Balram was arrested on 7 June 2020 in Crime 108/2020 at Bahadurpur, Ashoknagar. He faced allegations under IPC Sections 307, 294, 147, 148, 149, 436 and 302 and Sections 3(2)(v), 3(2)(iv), 3(1)(r) and 3(1)(s) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act. His second repeat appeal under Section 14-A(2) challenged the Special Judge's order of 10 June 2020 rejecting bail; an earlier appeal had been withdrawn. The Court recorded that the complainant had been informed of the appeal under Section 15-A. The appellant's wife had first asked the Chief Justice, on the administrative side, to transfer the case. She alleged bias because the Judge had made observations against a principal co-accused. The case was adjourned while that request was pending. The Registrar later communicated the Chief Justice's direction to file the application, closing the administrative request. The wife then sought the Judge's recusal through I.A. 32935/2021. The Judge recounted his rulings concerning different co-accused. These included bail grants where there was no admissible material, rejection of Girraj Yadav's bail, and Supreme Court proceedings about Girraj's medical treatment. That history formed the background to the alleged apprehension of bias; it did not determine Balram's guilt. After rejecting recusal, the Court heard the appeal on its merits. Counsel explained that two persons named Balram Yadav were involved and that this appellant was not Girraj's father, who had been named in the initial narrative. The prosecution nevertheless alleged that the appellant later arrived with the group that attacked the complainant's family, killed his father, injured others and burned the house. The appellant argued that he had been implicated later and that custody since June 2020 and slow trial progress justified bail. He did not produce complete trial order sheets showing who was responsible for the delay.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court's principal authority on recusal was Indore Development Authority v. Manoharlal and others, decided on 23 October 2019, whose lengthy discussion it reproduced. That authority distinguishes a view formed in judicial proceedings from a personal or disqualifying interest. An adverse legal opinion does not, by itself, show an inability to decide fairly; allowing recusal merely on a litigant's unsupported demand would permit selection of the Bench. The reproduced discussion refers to the United States decision in Liteky on ordinary judicial rulings and remarks, as distinct from deep-seated antagonism; State of W.B. v. Shivananda Pathak on legal predisposition and judicial obstinacy; and Asok Pande on the master-of-roster principle. It also discusses Supreme Court Advocates-on-Record Association (Recusal Matter) on impartiality, interests and the Judge's own decision on recusal; Subrata Roy Sahara and R.K. Anand on resisting motivated Bench hunting; and Kamini Jaiswal on forum shopping and attacks on the Court. Those authorities and the foreign examples form part of the reproduced Indore discussion. The High Court applied the recusal principle to the objection based on earlier orders concerning a co-accused. The earlier Supreme Court orders in Girraj Yadav's medical-bail proceedings were recounted as part of that history, rather than as a rule governing Balram's entitlement to bail.

On bail, Anil Kumar Yadav v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 12 SCC 129, was cited for the limited proposition that one year's custody in a murder case was not excessive in itself. The Court considered the prima facie material against this appellant and the absence of trial order sheets before declining a contrary bail order. It did not lay down that one year's detention could never support bail.

3. Statutes considered : Section 14-A(2) of the SC/ST Act provided the appeal against the Special Judge's bail decision. Section 15-A concerned notice to the victim or complainant, and the Court recorded that notice had been given. The listed IPC and SC/ST Act provisions concerned alleged offences, not final findings of guilt. The bail assessment considered alleged membership of an unlawful assembly sharing a common object under Section 149 IPC and remained prima facie. Section 439 CrPC and Sections 82–84 CrPC, concerning another co-accused's proclamation, attachment and request for release of property, appeared in the procedural history. The recusal decision applied the principles of judicial impartiality and duty drawn from the cited cases. No separate contempt charge against the appellant's wife was adjudicated.

4. Issues : Whether earlier adverse rulings concerning Girraj Yadav gave this appellant an objectively sufficient basis to require the same Judge's recusal from his bail appeal after the administrative transfer request had been closed. Whether refusal to recuse in these circumstances would compromise impartiality, or whether recusal would permit a litigant to select the Bench through pressure. On bail, whether the distinction between this appellant and the other Balram removed the prima facie case; whether the FIR and statements still placed him with the attackers and their common object; and whether custody and alleged lack of trial progress justified a different order without trial order sheets showing responsibility for the delay.

5. Ratio / Findings : The wife's allegations did not assert bias directed against this appellant. They concerned earlier orders in Girraj's proceedings, while bail had been granted to other co-accused on the material in their individual cases. The Chief Justice had closed the administrative transfer request with a direction to file the application. Applying Indore Development Authority, the Court held that earlier judicial conclusions do not automatically make a Judge partial in a related case, and that a litigant cannot compel recusal to obtain a preferred Bench. The Judge's duty to decide impartially remains. A disqualifying interest or objectively supported apprehension of bias would require a different assessment. The Court found the present application unsupported and described it as contemptuous, but expressly declined to initiate contempt proceedings. That description concerned the application and did not establish criminal liability on the wife's part.

On bail, the Judge assessed the appellant as a person distinct from the other Balram Yadav. The FIR and statements nevertheless placed him with the co-accused after the confrontation. For the purpose of bail, the Court found prima facie that he had joined an unlawful assembly sharing its common object. It referred to the alleged death, other assaults and burning of the house without finally deciding whether they had been proved. Without complete trial order sheets, it could not determine whether the prosecution or any accused was responsible for the alleged delay. Custody since June 2020 did not, by itself, require bail in this murder case, having regard to the limited observation in Anil Kumar Yadav. Those conclusions were provisional bail findings, separate from the decision on recusal.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the repeat bail appeal under Section 14-A(2) of the SC/ST Act and rejected I.A. 32935/2021 seeking recusal. It did not initiate contempt proceedings. The appellant was granted liberty to renew his bail request with complete trial order sheets showing that neither he nor any other accused was responsible for the delay.

Headnote :- CrPC Section 439 / COVID-19 prison decongestion — Regular bail — In Re: Contagion of COVID-19 Virus in Prisons (Supreme Court orders of 23.03.2020 and 07.04.2020) addressed the need under Article 21 to decongest prisons through State High Powered Committees and ensure safe transit for released prisoners. The Committees were to select categories by reference to the nature of the offence, punishment, custody and other relevant factors; release was not automatic for every prisoner. Considering the allegations and the need to decongest prisons during the second wave, the Court granted individual bail on Rs 2 lakh cash surety and conditions. The application concerned five litres of allegedly unfit liquor, prior excise and gambling cases, more than three months' custody and the applicant's submission that trial would take time. The Court directed medical screening and transport arrangements. Bail was to continue until the conclusion of trial, subject to the stated termination conditions, without a decision on guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Balveer made a second application under Section 439 CrPC for bail in Crime 58/2021 at Pathariya police station, Vidisha, concerning alleged offences under Sections 34(2) and 49(a) of the Madhya Pradesh Excise Act. He had been arrested on 12 June 2021. His first application was rejected on 30 July, with liberty to apply again after a reasonable period of detention. That rejection took account of six other cases registered against him, including four under Section 34 of the Excise Act and one under the Public Gambling Act. Counsel submitted that only five litres of country-made liquor, allegedly unfit for human consumption, had been seized; that the applicant had spent more than three months in custody; and that the minimum sentence under Section 49-A(1)(d)(i) was two months. He submitted that trial would take time and offered to comply with stringent conditions, including cash surety. The State opposed bail on the ground that he was a habitual offender dealing in illicit liquor. The Court considered the submissions during the second COVID-19 wave and reproduced two Supreme Court orders on prison overcrowding and arrangements for released prisoners.

2. Precedents — Considered : In its order of 23 March 2020 in In Re: Contagion of COVID-19 Virus in Prisons, Suo Motu W.P. (C) 1/2020, the Supreme Court addressed prison overcrowding and infection risk in the light of Article 21. It directed each State or Union Territory to form a High Powered Committee comprising representatives of legal services, the home or prison administration and the prisons department. The Committee was to decide which classes of prisoners could be released on parole or interim bail, and for how long. The nature of the offence, prescribed punishment, sentence, severity and other relevant factors were left to the Committee; the example of offences punishable with seven years or less was illustrative. The High Court considered that decongestion direction when deciding this individual bail application. It did not identify the applicant as having an automatic right to release under a specified Committee category.

The Supreme Court's order of 7 April 2020 in the same matter concerned released prisoners left stranded during lockdown. The Union could issue directions, and the States or Union Territories were to arrange safe transit home or give prisoners the option of temporary shelter. Applying that order, the High Court directed medical assessment before release and local arrangements to take the applicant home if infection was not suspected or his test was negative. If he tested positive, he was to be sent to hospital for treatment. Aparna Bhat v. State of M.P., Criminal Appeal 329/2021, decided on 18 March 2021, was cited for sending notice of the bail grant to the complainant.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed the regular bail application, and the existing conditions under Sections 437 and 439 remained applicable. Sections 34(2) and 49(a) of the M.P. Excise Act concerned the alleged offences; Section 49-A(1)(d)(i) formed the basis of counsel's minimum-sentence submission. The Court did not finally determine the offence ingredients or sentence. Article 21 appeared in the Supreme Court's direction on public health and prison decongestion. The quoted safe-transit order also referred to possible directions under the Disaster Management Act, 2005; that reference concerned the arrangements contemplated by the Supreme Court.

4. Issues : Whether the second bail application warranted release after more than three months in custody despite prior excise and gambling cases, having regard to the quantity and alleged unfitness of the seized liquor, the expected duration of trial and COVID-19 prison overcrowding. How the Supreme Court's decongestion and safe-transit directions applied to this individual application and the arrangements following release, without deciding the merits of the prosecution.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court considered the parties' submissions and the allegations, without deciding the State's habitual-offender allegation or the applicant's defence on the merits. It also considered the need to decongest prisons during the second wave. The Supreme Court's direction under Article 21 left the selection of prisoner categories to each State or Union Territory's High Powered Committee. The High Court granted bail to this applicant on Rs 2 lakh cash surety and public-health conditions; it did not direct release of everyone charged with such offences. Its directions, based on the Supreme Court's order of 7 April, required examination by a competent doctor before release and testing if the doctor considered it necessary. If infection was not suspected or the test was negative, the local administration was to arrange transport home. A positive test required immediate hospital treatment. The automatic termination of bail, forfeiture of cash surety and return to custody operated on the specific defaults stated in the order, as set out in the Relief below.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the second application for regular bail on cash surety of two lakh rupees to the satisfaction of the Trial Court, Chief Judicial Magistrate or Remand Magistrate, whichever was available. The applicant was to undertake to follow all general or specific COVID-control instructions issued from time to time by the Central Government, State Government or local administration. Medical examination and, if the doctor considered it necessary, testing were required before release. If infection was not suspected or the test was negative, the local administration was to arrange his return home; a positive result required immediate hospital treatment. Breach of the COVID-control instructions would automatically end the bail order, and the local administration or police were to take him into custody immediately and return him to the same jail. He was also to supply a copy of the bail order to the police station with jurisdiction over his residence. The existing CrPC conditions remained applicable. Bail was to remain in force until the conclusion of trial, but would automatically end on a bail jump or breach of any stated condition. A single default in appearance before the Trial Court or registration of a new offence would automatically terminate bail and forfeit the cash surety without reference to the Court. Notice of the bail grant was to be sent to the complainant.

Balveer v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 45923/2021, 16/09/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- CrPC Section 311 — Recall of witness / Fair opportunity — A court may exercise its power to recall a witness where examination is necessary for a just decision, but must refuse where the sole intention is to delay proceedings or harass a prosecution witness. PW-3 had testified without supporting the prosecution, in the presence of the accused's local counsel, who declined to cross-examine him. Nearly two years later, the applicants claimed that their arguing counsel had not been informed. The Court found their explanation unconvincing and noted that they had taken no action over the alleged professional misconduct. An offer to pay costs did not justify recall merely to satisfy the accused. The Court affirmed the refusal to recall the witness. Counsel had relied on P. Sanjeeva Rao, Sudevanand and Natasha Singh for the general power under the provision.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Balveer Singh Tomar and the other accused filed a revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC against the First Additional Sessions Judge, Ambah's order of 10 December 2021 rejecting their Section 311 application in Sessions Trial 108/2016. Ramdhyan Singh Tomar (PW-3), a prosecution witness, had appeared and testified on 18 October 2019 without supporting the prosecution. The accused's local counsel, Ramadhar Sharma, was present and did not cross-examine him. The applicants said that they had expected the witness not to attend and had therefore not informed their Gwalior arguing counsel, Awadhesh Singh Bhadoriya. They alleged that the local counsel neither contacted nor consulted him when the witness appeared. According to the applicants, the arguing counsel discovered the absence of cross-examination when he attended on 24 September 2021 and applied with an affidavit to recall the witness. The State opposed the application. The applicants later offered to pay costs and compensate the witness in return for a further opportunity.

2. Precedents — Considered : Counsel for the applicants cited P. Sanjeeva Rao v. State of A.P., Sudevanand v. State through CBI, (2012) 3 SCC 387, and Natasha Singh v. CBI (State), (2013) 5 SCC 741, in support of the court's discretion under Section 311 to allow further examination necessary for a just decision. The High Court recognised that power, but stated that it must be refused where the sole intention is to delay proceedings or harass a prosecution witness.

3. Statutes considered : Section 311 CrPC permits examination or recall of a witness where the court considers it necessary for a just decision. The Court assessed the explanation for the missed cross-examination against that purpose and the orderly progress of the trial. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC provided the revisional jurisdiction over the trial court's order. The applicants' failure to approach the Bar Council over the alleged misconduct was considered when assessing the credibility and bona fides of their explanation for recall under Section 311.

4. Issues : Whether local counsel's decision not to cross-examine PW-3 while present in court, followed by the claim that arguing counsel learnt of the evidence almost two years later, established the need for recall for a just decision. Whether the offer of costs could overcome the delay and potential harassment, and whether the trial court's refusal warranted interference in revision.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court recognised its power under Section 311 to recall a witness where examination is necessary for a just decision. On this record, PW-3 had appeared and testified without supporting the prosecution, and the accused's counsel, who was present, declined to cross-examine him. The Court questioned how the applicants could have assumed that the witness would not attend. It also found their account unconvincing: they said that arguing counsel represented them, yet claimed that he remained unaware of the recorded evidence until September 2021. Their failure to approach the Bar Council over the local counsel's alleged misconduct led the Court to regard their explanation as an afterthought. It rejected the offer to pay costs and compensate the witness, stating that a trial could not be hampered by recalling a witness merely to satisfy the accused. In those circumstances, it found no ground to interfere with the trial court's exercise of discretion.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision and affirmed the order of 10 December 2021 rejecting the Section 311 application. It did not direct recall or accept the offer of costs as a basis for reopening PW-3's evidence.

Balveer Singh Tomar and Ors. v. State of M.P., Cr.R. no. 795/2022, 23/04/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Article 226 — Investigation / Discretion to arrest — Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, including its discussion of M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, the Court declined to direct arrest, prescribe a particular course of investigation or require a charge sheet merely because an FIR was pending. Arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and affects personal liberty and reputation. An investigation may also end in a closure report. The Supreme Court's discussion cautioned against coercive directions affecting persons who had not been served with notice.

CrPC Section 173(1) / BNSS Section 193 — Timely completion of investigation — The Court separately enforced the duty to complete an investigation without unnecessary delay. It directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation into the registered BNS crime as early as possible and take the steps required by law towards a final report. Whether that report should be a closure report or a charge sheet depended on the investigation. The direction did not require arrest or the filing of a charge sheet.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Balwant Singh Chauhan filed a petition under Article 226 before the Jabalpur Bench concerning Crime 347/2024 at Police Station Chhipawad, Harda. He submitted that the police had registered an FIR on his complaint under Sections 109, 115(2), 296, 351(2) and 3(5) BNS, but had neither arrested the accused nor completed the investigation. He sought a departmental inquiry against the station officers by an officer not below the rank of Additional Superintendent of Police; preservation and production of CCTV footage from the police station, Khirkiya government hospital and nearby area for 18 September 2024; appointment of an investigating officer at least of Additional Superintendent of Police rank or transfer to another State investigation team; and further appropriate relief. The Court considered the request for arrest and directions controlling the course and outcome of investigation separately from the statutory duty to complete it promptly. It did not adjudicate the guilt of any named accused or find that the officers had committed misconduct.

2. Precedents — Considered : In D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, the Supreme Court set aside a High Court order prescribing investigative steps, including arrest, seizure and filing a charge sheet, without reasons or a hearing for those affected. Investigation is a statutory police function and need not lead to arrest or prosecution. The authority requires caution in exercising inherent powers and does not permit a court to dictate an investigative outcome merely on allegations. Its discussion of M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explains that Section 41 CrPC gives the police discretion to arrest, having regard to the offence, available material and personal liberty; registration of an FIR does not make arrest automatic. The reproduced passage also cites Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on notice to persons likely to be affected by drastic judicial directions. Applying the investigation and arrest-discretion principle, the present Court declined to direct arrest or supervise the filing of a charge sheet. That limit on coercive directions operated alongside the duty to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided the jurisdiction for the requested writ relief. The FIR concerned BNS Sections 109, 115(2), 296, 351(2) and 3(5); the Court did not adjudicate their substantive ingredients. Section 173(1) CrPC, which the Court referred to together with Section 193 BNSS, requires investigation under the relevant chapter to be completed without unnecessary delay. The Supreme Court passage reproduced in the order discussed arrest discretion under Section 41 CrPC, the limits of Section 482 CrPC in that case, and the police power to file a charge sheet or conclude that no case was made out. Article 226 governed this petition; Section 482 was discussed in the cited Supreme Court case. The present Court did not order a particular arrest, transfer, preservation procedure or departmental finding.

4. Issues : Whether the complainant's grievance over non-arrest and the continuing investigation justified directions requiring arrest, investigation by a senior officer or a particular investigative course. Whether the investigating officer nevertheless had a statutory duty to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay and decide on the appropriate final report, and what limited direction could be issued without prejudging the evidence.

5. Ratio / Findings : Relying on D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Court refused to direct the arrest of the accused. Investigation is a statutory police function; an FIR does not make arrest, seizure or prosecution inevitable. The court should avoid prescribing particular investigative steps while the police assess the facts and evidence. Separately, Section 173(1) CrPC / Section 193 BNSS requires completion of the investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer must decide whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, either a closure report or a charge sheet, as early as lawfully possible. Requiring performance of that duty leaves the investigative decision and lawful steps to the police. The Court did not find police malice or adjudicate the CCTV and disciplinary grievances on the evidence. It left the petitioner free to raise his grievances before the Superintendent of Police.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the writ petition by directing the investigating officer to complete the investigation in Crime 347/2024 as early as possible and take the steps required by law. It refused to direct arrest or require a charge sheet. The operative relief did not appoint a specified senior officer, transfer the investigation, direct preservation of specified CCTV footage or impose departmental action. The petitioner remained free to apply to the Superintendent of Police, Harda, who was to consider the application in accordance with law.

Headnote :- Article 226 — Adult partners / Police protection — The petitioners relied on Lata Singh v. State of U.P., (2006) 5 SCC 475, and Shakti Vahini v. Union of India, (2018) 7 SCC 192. In the light of Sections 5 and 6 of the Special Marriage Act, the Court found that their Ghaziabad marriage certificate did not prima facie prove the marriage. Adults nevertheless have the right to choose to live together, and no one may threaten them merely because of that choice. The representation alleging parental threats gave no specific instance warranting immediate protection. If the petitioners later approached the authorities with specific incidents and the names of those involved, the police were to act in accordance with Lata Singh. The petition was dismissed.

Article 226 — Criminal complaint — The Court refused to require a hearing before registration of an FIR or restrain the woman's parents from lodging a complaint. Its direction on future threats was not to have any adverse effect on an FIR already lodged.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bandhana Sharma and the other petitioner sought directions under Article 226 for police protection of their life and liberty as a couple claiming to be legally married. They also sought protection for petitioner No. 2 and his family against allegedly false criminal implication at the instance of petitioner No. 1's family. They lived in Morena and relied on a marriage certificate issued at Ghaziabad, Uttar Pradesh. They asserted that they were adults, eligible to marry, and faced threats from the woman's parents. The State disputed compliance with the Special Marriage Act and pointed out that the representation to the Morena police identified no concrete instance of a threat. The Court examined the certificate and representations on the limited material before it in the writ petition.

2. Precedents — Considered : The petitioners invoked Lata Singh v. State of U.P., (2006) 5 SCC 475. The Court directed the police to act in accordance with that decision if the petitioners later reported specific threats and identified the persons involved. The petitioners also cited Shakti Vahini v. Union of India, (2018) 7 SCC 192, for protection against family hostility. The Court did not use either authority to treat the alleged threats as proved, accept the marriage certificate as valid or prevent lawful registration of an offence.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided the jurisdiction invoked. Under Section 5 of the Special Marriage Act, the Court noted that at least one party must have resided in the Marriage Officer's district for not less than 30 days before notice. It also referred to the transmission of notice under Section 6 to the Marriage Officer for the parties' place of residence where they lived outside that jurisdiction. The record showed neither the required stay nor transmission of notice, and the certificate appeared to have been issued on the claimed date of the ceremony. On that material, the Court found that the marriage had not been prima facie proved. This was not a final determination of matrimonial status. The petitioners did not explain any statutory basis for a hearing before registration of an FIR or for restraining the parents from lodging a complaint.

4. Issues : Whether the claimed marriage and alleged family threats justified immediate police protection. Whether the petitioners' right as adults to choose to live together warranted protection even though the marriage had not been proved. Whether a writ could require a hearing before registration of an offence or prevent a complaint against petitioner No. 2.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the material concerning Sections 5 and 6, the certificate did not prima facie prove the marriage. The petitioners were nevertheless adults entitled to live according to their own wishes, including in a live-in relationship. No one could violate their personal liberty or commit an offence against them merely because of that choice. Their representation made vague allegations. Counsel could not identify a specific threatening act or explain how the woman's father had communicated a threat. He conceded that her mobile was switched off and that no threat to the man had been conveyed on it. He also could not say whether her father had visited the matrimonial home to threaten them. The record therefore disclosed no ground for immediate protection. If the petitioners later gave specific incidents and named the persons involved, the authorities were to act under Lata Singh. The petitioners showed no legal basis for a hearing before registration of an FIR or an order preventing a complaint. The direction concerning future threats left any existing FIR unaffected.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the petition. It directed that, if the petitioners approached the authorities with specific incidents and the names of the persons involved, the respondents were to act in accordance with Lata Singh. That direction was expressly not to have any adverse effect on an FIR already lodged. The Court did not order a current police escort, declare the marriage valid, restrain a complaint or grant immunity from lawful investigation.

Headnote :- CrPC Section 439 — Advanced stage of trial / Examination of witnesses — Applying Virupakshappa Gouda v. State of Karnataka, (2017) 5 SCC 406, as quoted in Bhupat Singh, the Court held that examination of most witnesses and the resulting reduction in the risk of tampering cannot, by themselves, determine bail. The gravity of the accusation, prima facie support, likely punishment, risk of flight and interests of justice remain relevant. In this alleged dacoity-murder case, examination of 29 of 33 witnesses did not, by itself, justify release on the fourth bail application.

Successive bail / Parity — Bail granted to a co-accused does not compel the same result without consideration of the applicant's own material circumstances. Through Bhupat Singh, the Court relied on Dinesh M.N. v. State of Gujarat, (2008) 5 SCC 66, for the need to consider all relevant factors rather than an isolated circumstance. It also recorded the Supreme Court's dismissal of the SLP against the earlier High Court order.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Banti made his fourth application for bail under Section 439 CrPC after his arrest on 2 May 2017 in Crime 48/2017 at Gohad Chauraha, Bhind. The alleged offences were under Section 396 IPC, Sections 11/13 of the MPDVPK Act and Sections 25/27 of the Arms Act. He submitted that 29 of 33 witnesses had been examined, that the independent witnesses to seizure of the batteries had turned hostile, and that there was no likelihood of absconding or tampering with the evidence. He also relied on bail granted to co-accused Ramjeet Singh on 29 January 2020. The State referred to mobile-tower batteries allegedly recovered from him after they had been taken away following the killing of the chowkidar. The Court considered the progress of the trial, the allegations and the cited authority when refusing bail, without deciding guilt.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court reproduced its order in Bhupat Singh v. State of MP, MCRC 14129/2018 (11 May 2018), which held that examination of witnesses was not, by itself, sufficient for bail. That order relied on Virupakshappa Gouda v. State of Karnataka, (2017) 5 SCC 406, and its account of Chaman Lal, Prasanta Kumar Sarkar and CBI v. V. Vijay Sai Reddy. The factors discussed included prima facie support, the nature of the accusation, punishment, flight, witness influence and the interests of justice. The quotation also referred to Neeru Yadav on individual liberty and public interest, and Dinesh M.N. (S.P.) v. State of Gujarat, (2008) 5 SCC 66, on bail orders becoming vulnerable when they consider irrelevant material and leave relevant material out of account. These authorities provided the framework for considering bail; they were not findings about the evidence in Banti's trial. The comparison with co-accused Kaptan Singh Rawat and Mukesh Rawat concerned Bhupat Singh's case, rather than the Ramjeet Singh order relied on here. The Court recorded that SLP (Crl.) 5103/2018 against Bhupat Singh had been dismissed on 21 June 2018.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed the regular bail application. The alleged offences were under Section 396 IPC, Sections 11/13 of the MPDVPK Act and Sections 25/27 of the Arms Act. The Court considered their gravity and possible punishment without deciding the offence ingredients. As this was the fourth application, the prior bail context and the asserted change arising from examination of many witnesses were relevant to the request.

4. Issues : Whether examination of 29 of 33 witnesses, the claimed reduction in the risk of witness tampering and the co-accused's bail order justified release on this fourth application, despite the gravity of the allegations and the State's reliance on recovery of the batteries.

5. Ratio / Findings : A reduced possibility of influencing witnesses who have already been examined is relevant, but cannot replace consideration of the other factors governing bail. The Court applied the Supreme Court guidance reproduced through Bhupat Singh. The gravity of the alleged dacoity-murder, the applicant's circumstances and the advanced stage of trial remained material. The discussion of supportive eyewitnesses in the quotation concerned Bhupat Singh, rather than an express finding about Banti's witnesses. Bail granted to a co-accused did not determine the result of this application. The Court also recorded the earlier SLP dismissal. Since, on the applicant's own account, most prosecution witnesses had been examined, the trial was already at an advanced stage. That circumstance did not justify granting bail solely because much of the evidence had been recorded; the Court refused this application on the record before it.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the fourth application for regular bail.

Banti v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, M.Cr.C. no. 5999/2020, 18/02/2020, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- IPC Sections 375, 377 — Sexual allegations within marriage — Following Manish Sahu, the Court held that the alleged unnatural sexual acts by the husband with his wife during their subsisting marriage did not sustain the Section 377 allegation and quashed that part of the case. The reproduced coordinate-bench reasoning discussed Navtej Singh Johar in relation to consensual sexual conduct between adults of the same sex. The Court separately quoted Independent Thought on reading the marital exception to exclude wives below 18 years. Neither Supreme Court decision established the wife's consent in this case.

IPC Sections 498A, 323 — Cruelty / Dowry demand not essential — The wife alleged repeated acts against her wishes and physical assault when she resisted. Those allegations made out a prima facie case of cruelty under Explanation (a); a dowry demand was not essential. The Section 482 application was allowed only in part, and the allegations under Sections 498A and 323 survived.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Banti Jatav applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime 11/2024 at Sirol Police Station, Gwalior, under Sections 377, 323 and 498A IPC, and Sessions Trial 227/2024. A charge sheet had been filed. The Court expressly proceeded on counsel's representation that charges had not yet been framed. The complainant wife alleged that they married on 2 May 2023 and that marriage gifts were given. She alleged that, after drinking, the applicant repeatedly subjected her to unnatural sexual acts and assaulted and treated her cruelly when she resisted. Attempts by her family to persuade him and her complaints to Mahila Paramarsh Kendra had not resolved the matter. In her objection, she alleged that he repeated the conduct despite giving an undertaking. The applicant relied on the coordinate Bench's analysis of the marital exception to contend that Section 377 was not attracted. He also argued that the absence of a dowry demand defeated the Section 498A allegation.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court followed Manish Sahu v. State of Madhya Pradesh, MCRC 8388/2023 (1 May 2024), as the coordinate-bench basis for quashing the Section 377 allegation in the subsisting marriage. It reproduced that decision's discussion of Navtej Singh Johar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 1, on the invalidity of Section 377 insofar as it criminalised consensual sexual conduct between adults of the same sex. That Supreme Court holding concerned consensual conduct in that context and did not decide the wife's consent here. The extract also referred to the referral order and Umang Singhar v. State of MP. The Court separately quoted Independent Thought v. Union of India, (2017) 10 SCC 800, on prospectively reading down Exception 2 to Section 375 to exclude wives below 18, and on cognizance under Section 198(6) CrPC. The earlier Manish Sahu extract reproduced the former statutory 15-year formulation before that quotation. Those authorities concerned the sexual-offence question; the Court separately retained the cruelty and hurt allegations.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC provided the inherent jurisdiction invoked. Sections 375 and 377 IPC and the marital exception framed the sexual-offence question. The Court reproduced Section 498A IPC and both limbs of its Explanation. Under (a), cruelty includes wilful conduct likely to drive the woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. Limb (b) concerns harassment to force the woman or a person related to her to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment because either has failed to meet that demand. Section 323 IPC concerned the surviving assault allegation. Section 376B IPC appeared in the precedent extract but was not charged in this FIR; Section 198(6) CrPC concerned cognizance in the Supreme Court's quoted direction. The Court assessed whether the allegations sustained the challenged offences, without deciding their evidentiary truth.

4. Issues : Whether the alleged unnatural sexual acts with the applicant's legally wedded wife sustained an offence under Section 377 on the High Court's reading of the marital exception. Whether the absence of a dowry demand defeated the separate Section 498A allegation despite specific allegations of physical assault and cruelty, with Section 323 also included in the FIR.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying Manish Sahu, the Court held that the Section 377 allegation was not maintainable and quashed that offence. It separately rejected the argument that this conclusion defeated the cruelty case. Section 498A Explanation (a) does not require a dowry demand. On the alleged facts, repeated acts against the wife's wishes, accompanied by assault and physical cruelty when she resisted, fell within the statutory definition of cruelty. The specific allegations therefore sufficed to retain Section 498A, and the operative order also retained Section 323. These were findings on the sufficiency of the allegations, leaving their evidentiary merits for trial. Quashing the sexual offence did not establish that assault or cruelty had not occurred.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court partly allowed the application. It quashed the FIR and proceedings insofar as they concerned Section 377 IPC and upheld the FIR as to Sections 498A and 323 IPC. It did not acquit the applicant or finally determine the truth of the complainant's allegations.

Banti Jatav v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 32576/2024, 09/05/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Abetment of suicide / Recourse to a lawful complaint — A wife lodged an FIR alleging cruelty, withholding of property and dowry demands against her husband and in-laws on 6 May 2023. The police investigated and filed a charge-sheet. After the husband died by consuming poison on 25 May, the wife and her parents were prosecuted under IPC Sections 306/34 solely on the allegation that his distress over the earlier case, which he regarded as false, had led to his suicide. Applying Sections 107/306 and the Supreme Court guidance in Chitresh Kumar Chopra, Praveen Pradhan, Sanju, Gangula Mohan Reddy, M. Mohan, Kishori Lal, Amalendu Pal, Orilal Jaiswal and Ramesh Kumar, the Court held that abetment requires instigation or intentional aid, the requisite mens rea and a proximate active role established from the facts. Hypersensitivity alone does not establish abetment. Amit Kapur cautioned against a full assessment of the merits at the quashing stage; even accepting the present allegations, they disclosed no act of abetment. Kumar @ Shiva Kumar was also cited for the same law. The applicants' recourse to the police to report an alleged offence did not amount to abetment on this record. The truth of the cruelty allegations remained for the separate trial. The Court quashed Crime 295/2023, its charge-sheet and the ensuing Section 306/34 proceedings under Section 482 CrPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Beenu Lodhi married Manish Lodhi in June 2022. On 6 May 2023, she lodged a complaint at Rahatgarh, Sagar, registered as Crime 289/2023. She alleged that her husband and his parents abused and assaulted her, demanded Rs 5 lakh, a gold chain and a vehicle, withheld her stridhan and expelled her from the matrimonial home. After investigation, the police filed a charge-sheet under IPC Sections 498A, 406, 294, 506/34 and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Manish consumed poison and died on 25 May 2023. His father and other witnesses attributed the suicide to registration of the earlier case, which Manish regarded as false. Beenu and her parents were then accused under IPC Sections 306/34 in Crime 295/2023 at Suatala, Narsinghpur, and a charge-sheet followed. They sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC.

2. Precedents — Considered : Chitresh Kumar Chopra explained instigation as goading, provoking or encouraging an act. It permits an inference from a course of conduct, but requires an intention directed to the consequence. Praveen Pradhan emphasised that instigation must be inferred from the circumstances of each case and that assessment at the quashing stage remains tentative. Sanju and Kishori Lal explained the three forms of abetment under Section 107 and the necessary mental element. Gangula Mohan Reddy and M. Mohan required a positive, intentional act directed towards driving the person to suicide. Orilal Jaiswal and Ramesh Kumar cautioned against treating ordinary domestic discord and hypersensitivity as sufficient for abetment. Amalendu Pal required direct or indirect incitement and a proximate act. Amit Kapur discussed a tentative assessment at the threshold, rather than a final evaluation of the evidence. Kumar @ Shiva Kumar was cited as reaffirming the same law. State of Punjab v Iqbal Singh and the other authorities referred to within these quotations formed part of the background to those propositions.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 306 and 34 concerned the alleged abetment of suicide. The Court considered the definition of abetment in Section 107

IPC while exercising jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC. The earlier complaint concerned IPC Sections 498A, 406, 294, 506 and 34, and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act.

4. Issues : Whether a criminal complaint by the wife and her parents against the husband and in-laws, alleged to be false and followed by the husband's suicide, disclosed instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid under IPC Sections 107 and 306. Both sides accepted that lodging the earlier FIR was the applicants' only alleged act. The merits of the earlier cruelty and dowry case remained a separate question.

5. Ratio / Findings : Even taking the Section 306 FIR at face value, the applicants had invoked an available legal remedy. The police investigated the complaint and filed a charge-sheet. Reporting alleged cruelty did not, by itself, establish an intention to instigate suicide or a positive act of intentional aid. Whether the earlier allegations were true or false was for the trial in that case, after examination and cross-examination of the witnesses. The deceased's assertion that the case was false did not establish its falsity. His subjective response to its registration did not make the complainants liable for abetment on the alleged facts.

A complainant's lawful recourse to the police does not amount to abetment under Section 306 merely because the person accused in that complaint later commits suicide. There must be allegations satisfying Section 107 through instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid, together with the requisite mental element and connection to the suicide. The conclusion here rested on the parties' concession that lodging the FIR was the applicants' sole alleged act.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court held that no offence under IPC Sections 306/34 was made out and quashed Crime 295/2023 at Narsinghpur, its charge-sheet and all consequential proceedings. It did not quash or decide the separate Sagar case against the husband and in-laws.

Headnote :- Separate trials / Appellate record — Applying A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department (Criminal Appeal 1306/2021, 31 October 2021), the Court held that evidence led in the appellant's later trial could not be used in the appeals arising from the six co-accused persons' earlier trial, or vice versa. Their appeals were heard together but decided by separate judgments.

Related witnesses / Independent corroboration — Applying Rupinder Singh Sandhu, (2018) 16 SCC 475, Shamim, (2018) 10 SCC 509, Rizan, (2003) 2 SCC 661, and Mohd. Rojali Ali, (2019) 19 SCC 567, the Court scrutinised the evidence of the family members who were natural eyewitnesses. It did not discredit them merely because they were related to the deceased. Sushil and Matibar Singh recognised that prior enmity could provide a motive both for the offence and for false implication. Mahesh, (2008) 13 SCC 271, Nagarjit Ahir, (2005) 10 SCC 369, and Sadhu Saran Singh, (2016) 4 SCC 357, supported reliance on credible eyewitnesses despite the non-examination of nearby independent witnesses. Relying on Suresh Yadav (Criminal Appeal 1349/2013, 25 February 2022), the Court also rejected the contention that failure to intervene made an eyewitness unreliable.

Ocular and medical proof — Applying Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy, (2014) 12 SCC 457, Bhajan Singh, (2011) 7 SCC 421, Ramanand Yadav, (2003) 12 SCC 606, and Shamsher Singh, (2002) 7 SCC 536, the Court held that Amar Singh's lacerated wounds did not make the eyewitness account of a sword assault medically impossible. The blunt part or a blunted edge of the sword could have caused the wounds. Medical opinion must be considered, but a variance does not by itself displace oral evidence; that consequence arises when medical evidence completely rules out the oral account.

Witness variations — Applying Dharmendrasinh, (2002) 4 SCC 679, Dal Singh, (2013) 14 SCC 159, and Bhagwan Jagannath Markad, (2016) 10 SCC 537, the Court assessed the differing accounts of when the appellant exhorted the assailants. The incident occurred rapidly, and the natural variations did not undermine the substance of the witnesses' account. Material inconsistencies nevertheless require scrutiny under Evidence Act Sections 145 and 155.

IPC Sections 141, 142, 148, 149 — Applying Krishnappa, (2012) 11 SCC 237, Daya Kishan, (2010) 5 SCC 81, and Vinubhai Ranchhodbhai Patel, (2018) 7 SCC 743, the Court held that constructive liability requires proof of membership of an unlawful assembly and that the offence was committed in prosecution of its common object or was known to be likely in prosecution of that object. These matters may be inferred from the group's conduct; an individual blow need not be proved against every member. The appellant was unarmed, but her exhortation and continued presence in the armed group established her participation and shared common object. The Court upheld her convictions under Sections 148, 302/149 on two counts and 324/149.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhaggo Bai appealed under Section 374 CrPC against her convictions in Sessions Trial 87/2010 under Section 148 IPC, Section 302/149 on two counts and Section 324/149. A dispute over a water tanker on the previous evening was followed by an armed group's attack in front of Gangaram's house on 15 September 2009. Gangaram died soon after sustaining head wounds, and his son Amar Singh later died during treatment. Asha was injured. The appellant was alleged to have arrived unarmed and urged the group to kill them so that the dispute would end. She had absconded and was tried separately at a later stage, after six co-accused had been tried. Two juveniles faced separate proceedings. In her appeal, she challenged the reliance on related eyewitnesses, the absence of independent witnesses, the variance between ocular and medical evidence, the differing accounts of when she exhorted the assailants, and the finding that she was a member of an unlawful assembly despite having struck no individual blow.

2. Precedents — Considered : A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department (Criminal Appeal 1306/2021, 31 October 2021) required the evidentiary records to remain separate even when the appeals were heard together. On related and allegedly interested witnesses, the Court relied on Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475; Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509; Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661; and Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567. These authorities included the principle that kinship alone does not supply a motive for false implication. Sushil v. State of U.P., 1995 Supp (1) SCC 363, and Matibar Singh v. State of U.P., (2015) 16 SCC 168, guided the assessment of enmity as a factor that could operate either way. Mahesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 13 SCC 271; Nagarjit Ahir v. State of Bihar, (2005) 10 SCC 369; and Sadhu Saran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, supported the rejection of a categorical requirement for independent corroboration. Suresh Yadav alias Guddu v. State of Chhattisgarh (Criminal Appeal 1349/2013, 25 February 2022) addressed an eyewitness's failure to intervene. On the variance between ocular and medical evidence, the Court applied Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy v. State of A.P., (2014) 12 SCC 457; Bhajan Singh v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 421; Ramanand Yadav v. Prabhu Nath Jha, (2003) 12 SCC 606; and Shamsher Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 7 SCC 536. Dharmendrasinh v. State of Gujarat, (2002) 4 SCC 679; State of M.P. v. Dal Singh, (2013) 14 SCC 159; and Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, guided the assessment of material discrepancies. Krishnappa v. State of Karnataka, (2012) 11 SCC 237; Daya Kishan v. State of Haryana, (2010) 5 SCC 81; and Vinubhai Ranchhodbhai Patel v. Rajivbhai Dudabhai Patel, (2018) 7 SCC 743, set out the tests for membership, common object and constructive liability under Section 149.

3. Statutes considered : The appeal was brought under Section 374 CrPC. Section 299 CrPC had been invoked in the charge-sheet filed while the appellant was absconding. IPC Sections 141 and 142 defined an unlawful assembly and knowing membership. Sections 146 and 148 dealt with rioting and being armed, while Section 149 imposed constructive liability for offences committed in prosecution of the common object or known to be likely in prosecution of that object. The convictions were under Sections 148, 302/149 twice and 324/149. Evidence Act Sections 145 and 155 were discussed in the Supreme Court passage on discrepancies. The prosecution initially registered the case under Sections 302, 307, 147, 148 and 149; the appeal did not concern a new conviction under Section 307. In deciding the appeals, evidence from each separate trial had to be confined to the appeal arising from that trial.

4. Issues : Whether the evidence in the appellant's trial proved the two homicidal deaths and her participation beyond reasonable doubt; whether the family members who were natural eyewitnesses remained reliable despite the alleged enmity, absence of independent witnesses, delay in Asha's medical examination, differences in their accounts and differences in wound descriptions; and whether an unarmed person who exhorted the assailants shared the unlawful assembly's common object and incurred liability under Section 149 for the killings and hurt.

5. Ratio / Findings : The post-mortem and treatment evidence established that Gangaram and Amar Singh died from homicidal head injuries. Narayan, Ashok and Asha were naturally present outside their home. Their evidence required scrutiny and could not be rejected merely because they were related to the deceased. The earlier platform and water disputes could provide a motive either for the offence or for false implication and had to be assessed with the whole record. In the circumstances explained by the Court, the absence of independent neighbours, failure to intervene during the fierce attack and delay in Asha's medical examination did not undermine their otherwise accepted account. Amar Singh's lacerated wounds did not make an assault with a sword impossible: the blunt part or a dulled edge could have caused them. The Court did not require exact correspondence between medical evidence and the eyewitness account when the latter was not ruled out. Although the witnesses differed on whether the appellant exhorted the assailants before, during or after the rapidly unfolding assault, they consistently stated that she urged the killings. The Court also examined the police statement relied on by the defence. The group arrived armed after the earlier dispute and attacked the two victims. The appellant's exhortation and continued presence established her membership and shared common object. Section 149 did not require proof that she struck a blow. The finding rested on this trial's evidence; mere presence does not invariably establish a shared common object.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the convictions and sentence, including life imprisonment on the two Section 302/149 counts. It cancelled the appellant's bail bonds and directed her to surrender by 30 May 2022 to serve the remaining sentence. If she failed to surrender, the trial court could take coercive steps to secure her appearance. The connected appeals of the six co-accused were decided by separate judgments on their respective trial records.

Headnote :- POCSO child testimony / Corroboration — Applying State of H.P. v. Sanjay Kumar alias Sunny, (2017) 2 SCC 51, Dinesh alias Buddha v. State of Rajasthan, (2006) 3 SCC 771, and State of Punjab v. Gurmit Singh, (1996) 2 SCC 384, the Court held that a victim of sexual assault is not an accomplice and that her reliable testimony does not require corroboration as a rule. The trial court had checked the child's capacity to understand the proceedings. She identified the appellant and maintained her account in cross-examination. The absence of an FSL report concerning her blood did not displace that evidence. The medical findings, immediate disclosure and other witnesses provided additional support.

POCSO Sections 3, 4 / Intact hymen — Section 3 covered penetration to any extent and manipulation of the child's body so as to cause penetration. On the present record, the Court treated manipulation with an intention to penetrate as sufficient to constitute penetrative sexual assault. An intact hymen did not exclude that finding when the child's credible account was considered with the internal redness and swelling. The medical examiner's opinion that the symptoms suggested an attempt was assessed with the whole record, rather than treated as conclusively excluding penetrative assault. The Court affirmed the convictions under Section 4 POCSO and Section 376 IPC.

Sentencing / Child dignity — The Court refused to reduce life imprisonment to the ten-year minimum stated by the appellant for an offence under Section 4. It considered the father's assault on his young daughter and his proved prior conviction for a similar offence. State of M.P. v. Madan Lal, (2015) 7 SCC 681, informed its observations on the victim's dignity. A further alleged incident at Khurai was unsupported by evidence and was not treated as proved.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhagunta appealed under Section 374 CrPC against his conviction on 5 February 2014 under Section 376 IPC and Sections 3/4 POCSO. The trial court imposed life imprisonment and a fine under Section 4, with no separate sentence under Section 376. The prosecution alleged that he sexually assaulted his young daughter near a field or well. She returned crying, limping and bleeding and disclosed the incident to her mother. Heavy rain and flooding delayed the FIR until the next day. In her testimony, the child identified her father, described his acts and the bleeding, and denied the suggestion that she had been tutored for money. Her mother, brother and a neighbour described the prompt disclosure or visible blood. The medical examiner found internal redness and swelling and described the signs as suggestive of attempted rape. An ossification test estimated her age at eight to ten years, while the narrative described her as about seven. The appellant challenged the absence of the FSL blood report, relied on the intact hymen and sought a reduction of sentence.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Himachal Pradesh v. Sanjay Kumar alias Sunny, (2017) 2 SCC 51, explained that a credible complainant of sexual assault is not an accomplice and that corroboration is not routinely required. Her account must nevertheless inspire confidence, and the court may seek assurance if necessary. Dinesh alias Buddha v. State of Rajasthan, (2006) 3 SCC 771, and State of Punjab v. Gurmit Singh, (1996) 2 SCC 384, reinforced that approach. They cautioned against unrealistic rejection of a victim's account because of minor differences in behaviour, delay in reporting or shortcomings in the investigation. The Court applied these principles to the child's testimony and the challenge based on the missing FSL report. The present record also contained corroborative evidence. State of M.P. v. Madan Lal, (2015) 7 SCC 681, was invoked in sentencing in relation to the victim's bodily dignity.

3. Statutes considered : The appeal was brought under Section 374 CrPC. Section 376 IPC and POCSO Section 3 defined the offences, and Section 4 prescribed the punishment. The Court reproduced Section 3(a)–(d), particularly the provisions concerning penetration to any extent and manipulation to cause penetration. It held that an intact hymen did not by itself exclude liability. In seeking a reduction of sentence, the appellant relied on a ten-year minimum under Section 4 as stated in his submission. No separate sentence was imposed under Section 376. The victim was below 18 on both the testimonial and radiological accounts of her age.

4. Issues : Whether the child's evidence was reliable despite the absence of an FSL report concerning her blood, the intact hymen and the defence allegation of tutoring; whether the testimonial and medical evidence, considered together, established the statutory ingredients of penetrative sexual assault; and whether life imprisonment should be reduced to the statutory minimum stated by the appellant.

5. Ratio / Findings : The trial court first assessed the child's ability to understand the proceedings. Her evidence consistently identified her father, described the act and immediate bleeding, and withstood cross-examination. The Supreme Court principles governing sexual-assault testimony ruled out an automatic demand for external corroboration. The mother's account of the prompt disclosure, the evidence of the brother and neighbour, and the medical findings nevertheless provided assurance. Heavy rain explained the one-day delay in lodging the FIR. The Court read POCSO Section 3 as covering penetration to any extent or manipulation causing penetration. In applying it to this record, it treated manipulation with an intention to penetrate as sufficient to constitute penetrative sexual assault. It did not treat the intact hymen as conclusive when the child's reliable account and internal medical findings were considered together. Both convictions were upheld. On sentence, the father's assault on his young daughter and his prior conviction for sexually assaulting another child warranted life imprisonment. The Court noted that the witnesses' accounts of another offence at Khurai lacked evidentiary support and did not rely on them.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the convictions under Section 376 IPC and Section 4 POCSO, together with life imprisonment, the trial court's fine and the default term. The appellant remained in jail to serve the balance of his sentence. The request to reduce the sentence to ten years was refused. No separate sentence had been imposed under the IPC.

Headnote :- CrPC Section 482 — Threshold for quashing — Applying Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, and M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, the Court held that the uncontroverted allegations must be examined to see whether they disclose a prima facie offence. That examination cannot become a roving inquiry or a prediction of the ultimate conviction. M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, recognises intervention in clearly absurd or abusive cases, while CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, cautions against deciding disputed facts raised in defence. Here, the prosecutrix's later statements contained allegations against the applicant. The Court therefore refused to quash the FIR and proceedings.

FIR omission / Section 164 and supplementary Section 161 — At the initial Section 482 stage, the High Court could not reject the later allegations naming the applicant as false merely because he had not been named in the original written FIR. The alleged improvement and the credibility of the prosecutrix's later accounts required assessment at trial. The Allahabad decision cited by counsel was distinguished because it concerned appreciation of evidence after conviction.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhagwandas Sahu applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime 26/2021 at Kotwali, Datia, concerning alleged offences under Sections 376(2)(n), 342, 506 and 376D IPC. The prosecutrix's initial written FIR accused Raj Samuriya alias Lekhraj Ahirwar of sexual assault under threats to her family, followed by detention and repeated assault. It did not name the applicant. Her later statement under Section 164 and supplementary police statement implicated Bhagwandas in rape and threats. He contended that these additions were unreliable improvements, particularly because the prosecutrix had submitted a written report, so the omission could not be attributed to the police's recording of it. The State opposed an assessment of credibility in the exercise of inherent jurisdiction. The Court considered whether quashing was justified at that stage, without deciding the truth of the allegations.

2. Precedents — Considered : Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, set out the exceptional and cautious exercise of Section 482 powers, including the Bhajan Lal categories and the limits on assessing prosecution probabilities. Its discussion of Indian Oil, Saroj Kumar Sahoo and the later explanation of Madhavrao formed part of that framework. It did not establish a general requirement to predict conviction in every case. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, reiterated that proceedings may be quashed when the allegations, taken at face value, disclose no offence. M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, balanced exceptional intervention against absurd or harassing prosecutions with the need to avoid obstructing an inquiry. CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, disapproved deciding disputed defence facts in a Section 482 petition. The applicant's Allahabad High Court authority, Sandeep alias Kothari Upadhyay v. State (Criminal Appeal 1664/2013, 13 February 2014), was distinguished because it concerned appreciation of evidence after conviction rather than initial quashing.

3. Statutes considered : The Court exercised inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC. The later prosecution statements were recorded under Sections 161 and 164 CrPC; their evidentiary value was not finally determined. The alleged offences were under Sections 376(2)(n), 342, 506 and 376D IPC. The Court did not determine their individual ingredients or the applicant's guilt. The Bhajan Lal threshold concerned whether the uncontroverted allegations and accompanying material disclosed an offence, rather than whether each statement would withstand cross-examination at trial.

4. Issues : Whether the failure to name the applicant in the original written FIR prevented reliance on the later supplementary Section 161 statement and Section 164 statement when applying the Section 482 threshold; and whether the High Court could quash the case by treating those later allegations as false improvements before trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The inherent power to quash may be exercised when the uncontroverted prosecution allegations, taken at face value, disclose no offence or reveal a clear abuse of process. The preliminary proceeding cannot, however, become a roving inquiry into the facts. The prosecutrix had named and accused the applicant in her later statements. The High Court could not reject those statements merely because the original FIR was silent about him and then conclude that the case was baseless. The inconsistency raised by the defence was an evidentiary question to be assessed at the appropriate stage. A decision based on appreciation of evidence after conviction did not supply the standard for this preliminary review. The Court made no final finding on credibility or guilt; it held only that the record did not justify quashing.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application, leaving the FIR and consequential proceedings in place. The applicant's challenge to the later statements remained a matter for evaluation at trial in accordance with law.

Bhagwandas Sahu v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 31891/2021, 30/06/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Child witness / Last seen — Applying Bhagwan Singh v. State of M.P., (2003) 3 SCC 21, Suryanarayana v. State of Karnataka, (2001) 9 SCC 129, Digamber Vaishnav v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2019) 4 SCC 522, and State of Maharashtra v. Damu, (2000) 6 SCC 269, the Court scrutinised the child's capacity, reliability and susceptibility to tutoring. Corroboration is a matter of prudence rather than an invariable requirement. Leelawati's evidence that her mother left with the appellant was unchallenged and was supported by Girjabai. Leelawati did not claim to have witnessed the killing.

Last seen / Section 106 — Shailendra Rajdev Pasvan, (2020) 14 SCC 750, Mahavir Singh, (2014) 6 SCC 716, and Jagroop Singh, (2012) 11 SCC 768, guided the assessment of the short interval between the deceased being last seen with the appellant and her death. Ashok, (2015) 4 SCC 393, and Ramesh Vithal Patil, (2014) 11 SCC 516, explained the limited inference from facts within the accused's special knowledge after the prosecution establishes the foundational facts. Recovery of the body the next day, the eyewitness account and recovery of the concealed article strengthened the chain. Last-seen evidence alone was not conclusive.

Delayed eyewitness disclosure — Mahesh, (2008) 13 SCC 271, Ashok Kumar Chaudhary, (2008) 12 SCC 173, Sadhu Saran Singh, (2016) 4 SCC 357, and Ambika Prasad, (2000) 2 SCC 646, guided the assessment of witnesses' reluctance to report crime. Shyamlal Ghosh, (2012) 7 SCC 646, and V.K. Mishra, (2015) 9 SCC 588, required the explanation for delayed examination to be plausible and the evidence to be carefully scrutinised. Here, the Court accepted the explanation based on fear, subsequent travel for labour work, persuasion to speak and the course of the investigation, despite the witnesses' silence for four to five months.

Evidence Act Section 27 / Concealed recovery — Applying Bharat Fakira Dhiwar, (2002) 1 SCC 622, and Yakub Abdul Razak Memon, (2013) 13 SCC 1, the Court held that public access to a place does not invalidate discovery of a concealed article that is not ordinarily visible to others. The buried scarf was accepted in evidence despite the discrepancy between the red and green descriptions. The Court explained that discrepancy by the witnesses' distance from the incident and the twilight.

IPC Sections 302, 304 Part I — The medical evidence of asphyxia and the accepted prosecution evidence established intentional throttling. The Court held that this amounted to murder, upheld life imprisonment and rejected the request to reduce the offence to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhajju appealed under Section 374 CrPC against his conviction in 2004 under Section 302 IPC and sentence of life imprisonment. On 24 November 2002, he and Munnibai, who had been living with him, went towards the Parvati river with fishing gear. Her body was found the next day. The post-mortem showed asphyxia due to throttling, injuries to the neck and fractures of the hyoid bone and laryngeal cartilage. Fourteen-year-old Leelawati and Girjabai stated that they had seen the pair leave together. Maniram and Hardas stated that they had seen the appellant strangling Munnibai with a scarf and that he had threatened them. They did not disclose the incident until months later. A buried scarf was recovered following the appellant's disclosure. The defence challenged the timing of the child's and adult witnesses' accounts, the prolonged silence and the discrepancy in the scarf's colour. It also sought reduction of the offence to Section 304 Part I. The trial court had acquitted the appellant under Section 3(2)(v) of the SC/ST Act; that acquittal was outside the scope of his appeal against conviction.

2. Precedents — Considered : Bhagwan Singh v. State of M.P., (2003) 3 SCC 21; State of Maharashtra v. Damu, (2000) 6 SCC 269; Suryanarayana v. State of Karnataka, (2001) 9 SCC 129; and Digamber Vaishnav v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2019) 4 SCC 522, were considered on reliable child testimony and corroboration as a matter of prudence, with close attention to what the child had and had not witnessed. Shailendra Rajdev Pasvan v. State of Gujarat, (2020) 14 SCC 750; Ashok v. State of Maharashtra, (2015) 4 SCC 393; Mahavir Singh v. State of Haryana, (2014) 6 SCC 716; and Jagroop Singh v. State of Punjab, (2012) 11 SCC 768, guided the assessment of the interval in a last-seen case and the need for corroborative circumstances. Ramesh Vithal Patil v. State of Karnataka, (2014) 11 SCC 516, was relied on in applying Evidence Act Section 106 after foundational facts had been proved. Mahesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 13 SCC 271; Ashok Kumar Chaudhary v. State of Bihar, (2008) 12 SCC 173; Sadhu Saran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357; and Ambika Prasad v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2000) 2 SCC 646, concerned the reluctance of independent witnesses to come forward. Shyamlal Ghosh v. State of W.B., (2012) 7 SCC 646, and V.K. Mishra v. State of Uttarakhand, (2015) 9 SCC 588, guided scrutiny of delayed examination. State of Maharashtra v. Bharat Fakira Dhiwar, (2002) 1 SCC 622, and Yakub Abdul Razak Memon v. State of Maharashtra, (2013) 13 SCC 1, including the latter's discussion of Jeet Singh, explained recovery of concealed articles under Section 27.

3. Statutes considered : The appeal was brought under Section 374 CrPC. Section 174 governed the initial inquest, and Section 313 concerned the accused's explanation. Section 27 of the Evidence Act concerned discovery of the scarf. Section 106 concerned facts within special knowledge, after the prosecution had established the necessary foundation. IPC Sections 302 and 304 Part I framed the question of murder or the alternative classification. The charge under Section 3(2)(v) of the SC/ST Act had resulted in an acquittal at trial, which was not reversed in this appeal. The prosecution remained bound to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt; the accused's failure to explain did not replace that burden.

4. Issues : Whether the child's and adult witnesses' last-seen evidence, the delayed eyewitness accounts and recovery of the scarf established homicidal death and the appellant's responsibility for it; whether the delay and the discrepancy between the red and green descriptions of the cloth made the evidence unreliable; and whether the proved throttling attracted Section 302 or justified reduction to Section 304 Part I.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical evidence established death by throttling. The child's capacity had been tested, and her evidence that she had last seen the deceased with the appellant was unchallenged. She did not claim to have seen who killed her mother. Girjabai corroborated their departure together. Recovery of the body the next day and the post-mortem estimate established a short interval. On the circumstances proved by the prosecution, together with the eyewitness account, the Court applied the principles concerning facts within special knowledge. It also inferred that the appellant had failed to report the death and had absconded, while expressly noting that no witness had directly stated in examination-in-chief that he had gone missing. Maniram and Hardas explained their silence by fear and subsequent travel for labour work. The later investigating officer recorded their statements after receiving the case file, and no specific question about the delay had been put to him in cross-examination. The twilight, the witnesses' distance and their use of torchlight explained the discrepancy in the scarf's colour. The scarf had been concealed in the earth at the place disclosed by the appellant. Taken together, the evidence established his responsibility beyond reasonable doubt in the Court's assessment. Deliberate throttling showed both knowledge and intention to cause death, so the Court rejected the proposed classification under Section 304 Part I.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the conviction under Section 302, the life sentence, fine and default term imposed by the trial court. The appellant was directed to serve the remaining sentence. The acquittal under the SC/ST Act remained undisturbed.

Headnote :- IPC Section 498A — Non-dowry cruelty — Explanation (a) covers wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or health, whether mental or physical. It operates independently of the unlawful-demand harassment addressed by Explanation (b). The allegations of beating, confinement, stigmatising treatment, abandonment in a public place and continued exclusion disclosed a prima facie case against the close in-laws. The absence of a dowry demand did not require quashing.

Cruelty / Continuing mental effects — Applying Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, the Court considered the alleged mental cruelty continuing while the wife remained at her parental home. The reconciliation in 2019 did not resolve the allegations concerning conduct in 2020. On this preliminary record, the complaint could not be rejected merely because three years had elapsed.

Section 482 / Counterblast — Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, supported rejection of an automatic inference of retaliation merely because civil matrimonial or custody proceedings preceded the FIR. Those proceedings had ended following reunion, before the alleged later ouster.

Section 482 / Allegations against in-laws — The Court cited XYZ, S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das, M. Srikanth, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha, among other authorities, for the test based on uncontroverted allegations and the prohibition against a mini-trial. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, distinguished the position of distant relatives against whom no specific role was alleged from triable allegations against close family members. The parents-in-law faced specific allegations. Their application was dismissed without deciding the merits reserved for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bharat Bhushan Singhal and his wife, the complainant's parents-in-law, applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash the charge-sheet and Criminal Case 278/2023. The third applicant, the complainant's younger brother-in-law, died during the proceedings and his name was deleted. The complainant alleged beatings and confinement after her marriage in 2014, abandonment at a bypass in 2020 and continued separation from her daughter. She also alleged that her husband and father-in-law later came to her parental home and abused her, and that her husband struck her. The applicants relied on the absence of a dowry demand, a three-year delay and the husband's earlier proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights and child custody. They contended that the FIR was a counterblast to that litigation. Those proceedings had ended after the parties reunited in 2019. Later mediation ended when the husband and another person expressed no interest in further dates. The Court considered whether the allegations raised triable issues, rather than whether guilt had been proved.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court cited XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337; State of T.N. v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718; Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319; Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350; State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226; M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686; State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh (Criminal Appeal 709/2021); Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678; Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221; State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547; S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600; Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336; Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460; Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437; and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, collectively for the test based on uncontroverted allegations and the rule against a mini-trial. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was applied against an automatic inference that the FIR was a counterblast. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, addressed continuing mental cruelty after ouster. Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 5, was invoked on the limits of judicial directions concerning the manner of investigation. That issue arose incidentally from the applicants' earlier representations to the police. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted on the need for caution in proceeding against distant relatives without specific roles, and on triable allegations against close family members. The authorities cited within that quotation reinforced this distinction.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed quashing of the charge-sheet and pending case. Section 498A IPC and both limbs of its Explanation addressed cruelty independently of an unlawful demand and harassment connected with such a demand. Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act and Section 13 of the Guardians and Wards Act identified the earlier proceedings, which had been withdrawn and did not bar a later FIR. Article 226 arose in the Manohar Lal Sharma reference concerning control over investigation, although this application was under Section 482. There was no child-custody order, and the criminal court did not finally determine guardianship.

4. Issues : Whether the absence of a dowry demand and the three-year delay excluded an offence under Section 498A on the alleged conduct; whether the matrimonial proceedings withdrawn before 2020 made the later FIR a retaliatory counterblast; and whether the allegations against the two surviving close in-laws were sufficiently specific to withstand the limited review under Section 482.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court treated Explanation (a) to Section 498A separately from the unlawful-demand harassment covered by Explanation (b). The allegations of physical mistreatment and continuing mental harm were sufficient at this stage. Applying Rupali Devi, it considered the continued exclusion after the alleged ouster in 2020 when rejecting the objection based on delay. The matrimonial and custody proceedings of 2018–19 had ended after reunion; their timing alone did not discredit the later allegations. The applicants' earlier requests for police protection did not entitle them to dictate how the investigation should be conducted. There were specific allegations against the surviving father-in-law and mother-in-law. The caution against involving distant relatives without specific roles did not justify quashing those allegations. The mediator's report and the absence of a custody order formed part of the context considered by the Court. Its observations were expressly confined to review under Section 482, leaving proof and the defences for trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application, leaving the charge-sheet and criminal proceedings in place. It directed the trial court to decide the case according to law without being influenced by the High Court's prima facie observations. There was no final determination of custody, guilt or matrimonial status.

Bharat Bhushan Singhal and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 24551/2023, 24/01/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- CrPC Section 482 / BNSS Section 528 — Cross-FIR and mala fides — Applying Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, which discussed Bhajan Lal and R.P. Kapur, the Court held that quashing in exercise of inherent powers is exceptional. Where the report and supporting material disclose a cognizable offence, the informant's alleged hostility does not by itself justify quashing. The two FIRs gave rival accounts of the same altercation at the same time. The complainant's MLC recorded a contusion on the eyelid and abdominal tenderness. The Court could not decide who was the aggressor or reject his FIR merely because his wife had filed a cross-case and matrimonial proceedings. Enmity could provide a motive either for the offence or for false implication. The facts required assessment at the appropriate stage.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bharat Doneriya and a co-applicant applied under Section 482 CrPC / Section 528 BNSS to quash Crime 970/2022 at Kotwali, Morena, concerning alleged offences under Sections 323, 294 and 506 read with 34 IPC. The complainant alleged that his father-in-law and brother-in-law abused and beat him near the old Collectorate on 7 October 2022 at about 4:30 p.m. His medical examination recorded a left-eyelid contusion and abdominal tenderness. His wife, Bhavna, had also lodged Crime 969/2022, alleging that her husband abused and beat her at the same time and in the same vicinity. She had separately lodged a cruelty and dowry FIR and initiated domestic violence and maintenance proceedings against him. The applicants contended that his complaint was retaliatory. The Court considered the competing complaints without deciding who began or committed the assault.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicants invoked State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal, 1992 Supp (1) SCC 335, on malicious prosecution. That decision was also discussed in Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, which the Court applied. Renu Kumari summarised the exceptional purposes of Section 482, the categories in R.P. Kapur and the illustrative situations in Bhajan Lal. It distinguished an absence of legal evidence from a dispute about the reliability or weight of existing evidence. It also explained that the informant's alleged mala fides become secondary when the material discloses an offence and cannot alone justify quashing. The High Court applied that test in refusing to choose between the cross-FIRs. It did not hold that malicious proceedings could never be quashed.

3. Statutes considered : The application invoked Section 482 CrPC and Section 528 BNSS, as recorded in the order. The challenged FIR alleged offences under Sections 323, 294 and 506 read with Section 34 IPC. Bhavna's separate matters included Section 498A IPC, Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, Section 12 of the Domestic Violence Act and maintenance under Section 125 CrPC. These proceedings supplied the context of the parties' relationship and hostility; they did not create a legal bar to the challenged FIR. The Court did not determine the competing accounts concerning injuries.

4. Issues : Whether the complainant's FIR was shown to be false or malicious merely because his wife had filed a cross-FIR about the same time and place and had instituted criminal and civil matrimonial proceedings; and whether Section 482/528 permitted the High Court to decide at the threshold which account of the altercation was true.

5. Ratio / Findings : Both FIRs acknowledged that an incident occurred at about 4:30 p.m. on 7 October 2022. The complainant's MLC provided some support for his allegation of injury, while counsel could not establish whether the wife had been injured. The accounts conflicted on who was the aggressor. That disputed question could not be conclusively decided through fact-finding under Section 482. The parallel matrimonial cases showed hostility between the parties, which could provide a motive either for wrongdoing or for false accusation. Following Renu Kumari, the Court treated the alleged mala fides as secondary to the complaint's prima facie disclosure of an offence. It refused to quash the case, leaving the actual facts and culpability unresolved.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the quashing application. Crime 970/2022 remained for investigation or proceedings in accordance with law. The Court did not quash Bhavna's cross-FIR, decide either side's guilt or resolve the matrimonial matters. Bharat Doneriya and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 15280/2024, 19/02/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC / Matrimonial counterblast — The wife lodged her FIR on 22 September 2019, before the husband filed the cited divorce petition on 24 July 2023. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court rejected an automatic inference that matrimonial litigation made the FIR a counterblast. The later divorce decree did not by itself bring the prima facie criminal case to an end.

IPC Section 498A / Delay and mental cruelty at the parental home — Applying Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, the Court considered the alleged psychological harm continuing after the wife was driven out over dowry demands. The marriage in 2015 did not make the September 2019 report of continuing cruelty belated. Skoda Auto Volkswagen, (2021) 5 SCC 95, Ravinder Kumar, (2001) 7 SCC 690, and Mohammad Wajid (2023) were considered for the principle that delay in lodging an FIR does not by itself warrant quashing.

Section 482 / Close relatives — Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, distinguished vague, unsupported allegations against distant relatives from specific allegations of harassment that raised a triable case. The applicants had not produced the complete charge-sheet. The FIR itself alleged demands for money and a vehicle, and physical and mental cruelty by the husband and in-laws. Relying on XYZ, S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das, M. Srikanth, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, Kunwar Singh and related Supreme Court authorities, the Court applied the test based on allegations taken at face value. It declined to conduct a mini-trial or resolve the defence based on separate residence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bharat Madan, his parents and younger brother applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash FIR 966/2019 at Civil Lines, Rewa, and Criminal Case RCT/137/2021. The wife alleged that, after the marriage in December 2015, the applicants demanded Rs. 10 lakh and a car and subjected her to physical and mental harassment in Kanpur and Germany. She alleged that the demand was repeated during a visit to Rewa in January 2019 and that she had remained at her parental home since May 2019. She also described efforts at reconciliation and the applicants' retention of articles given at the marriage. The applicants denied the involvement of the in-laws, relying on their separate residence. They alleged that the FIR was belated and a counterblast to divorce litigation, and referred to a divorce decree passed in February 2024. The Court noted that the husband's cited divorce petition had been filed in July 2023, years after the FIR of September 2019. It also noted that the applicants had not produced the complete charge-sheet for the quashing application.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was applied in rejecting an automatic inference of a counterblast or a basis for quashing merely from divorce proceedings, reconciliation efforts or elapsed time. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was applied to mental trauma persisting at the parental home after separation caused by cruelty. The Court also cited Amar Singh v. Smt. Vimla (Criminal Revision 2376/2020, 22 June 2021) on compelled residence at the parental home. Skoda Auto Volkswagen (India) Pvt Ltd v. State of U.P., (2021) 5 SCC 95; Ravinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, (2001) 7 SCC 690; and Mohammad Wajid v. State of U.P., concerned the principle that FIR delay alone does not justify quashing. On the limits of review without a mini-trial, the Court quoted XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337; S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718; Ajay Kumar Das, (2011) 12 SCC 319;

Mohd. Akram Siddiqui, (2019) 13 SCC 350, including the narrow exception for undisputed or public documents; Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226; M. Srikanth, (2019) 10 SCC 373; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686; and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh (Criminal Appeal 709/2021). It then listed further authorities, including Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha, as expressing a similar view. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was applied to distinguish bare allegations against distant relations from a triable case based on specific alleged conduct.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the application. Section 498A IPC concerned the alleged cruelty, including dowry demands, exclusion from the matrimonial home and the continuing mental consequences. Section 125 CrPC maintenance and the divorce proceedings formed part of the background family litigation; they did not bar criminal prosecution. The Court did not finally decide which relative had participated, the reliability of the allegations or the evidentiary effect of the divorce decree at trial. The applicants had not produced the complete charge-sheet, limiting their attempt to show that there was no material against them.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR was a counterblast to matrimonial litigation; whether the interval between marriage and the FIR, or the wife's continued residence at her parental home, meant that the cruelty allegations raised no triable case; and whether the asserted separate residence of the close in-laws and the alleged generality of the accusations justified quashing after the charge-sheet had been filed.

5. Ratio / Findings : The counterblast argument failed on chronology: the FIR preceded the cited divorce petition by nearly four years. Pratibha also ruled out an automatic bar based on civil proceedings. The alleged course of dowry demands and exclusion from the matrimonial home since May 2019 disclosed a prima facie account of continuing mental cruelty under Rupali Devi. Mere delay in lodging the FIR did not extinguish that account. The in-laws' residence and the truth of the alleged acts were disputed. The applicants had not produced the full charge-sheet, while the FIR itself attributed demands and harassment to the family. At the threshold, those allegations were sufficient to distinguish the case from merely naming distant relatives without specific conduct. The Court would not weigh the defence or conduct a mini-trial under Section 482. Its decision was a prima facie assessment, not proof of guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. FIR 966/2019 and Criminal Case RCT/137/2021 continued. No applicant was acquitted, and no final finding was made on the wife's allegations.

Bharat Madan and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 26536/2024, 03/07/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Evidence Act Section 32(1) / dying declaration — Dr B.S. Jamhoriya recorded Meena Bai's responsive statement in question-and-answer form, Ex. P.13, despite her extensive burns. Applying Ramesh v State of Haryana, (2017) 1 SCC 529; Purshottam Chopra v State (NCT of Delhi), (2020) 11 SCC 489; Abdul Majid Abdul Rahman v State of Gujarat, (1976) 4 SCC 351; and Laxman v State of Maharashtra, (2002) 6 SCC 710, the Court held that the percentage of burns did not by itself establish incapacity to make a declaration. A separate certificate of fitness and recording by a magistrate were not indispensable; her fitness and the declaration's reliability had to be established from the evidence.

Sole basis of conviction — Jagbir Singh v State (NCT of Delhi), (2019) 8 SCC 779; Muthu Kutty v State, (2005) 9 SCC 113; and Vikas v State of Maharashtra, (2008) 2 SCC 516 required careful scrutiny of the declaration and satisfaction that it was trustworthy. Meena's declaration named her husband, Bali Singh, as the person who poured lamp oil on her and set her on fire. The absence of cooking materials, together with the kerosene findings, led the Court to reject the account of an accident. It assessed the declaration recorded by the doctor under the quoted principles of reliability.

Conduct and witnesses — Under Mritunjoy Biswas, (2013) 12 SCC 796, and Sujit Biswas, (2013) 12 SCC 406, abscondence was a circumstance to be assessed with the other evidence, rather than a sufficient basis for guilt by itself. Applying Paulmeli, (2014) 13 SCC 90, the Court relied on the dependable portion of hostile witness PW14's account. Applying Brahm Swaroop, (2011) 6 SCC 288, it held that minor omissions did not undermine the core evidence of the motorcycle demand.

IPC Sections 498A and 304B / charge — Applying Arun Garg v State of Punjab, (2004) 8 SCC 251, and Kaliyaperumal v State of Tamil Nadu, (2004) 9 SCC 157, the Court held that a person charged and acquitted under Section 304B could be convicted of cruelty without a separate 498A charge if that offence was proved. Both appellants' 498A convictions and Bali's 302 conviction were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meena Bai suffered extensive burns in her matrimonial home on 9 March 2009 and later died. In a question-and-answer declaration recorded by her treating doctor, Dr B.S. Jamhoriya, between 12:10 and 12:25, she stated that her husband, Bali Singh Lodhi, had beaten her, poured lamp oil on her and set her on fire. She said that she had had no quarrel with her in-laws. Her father-in-law, Bharat Singh, took her to hospital. The appellants maintained that she had been burnt accidentally while cooking and that they had been in the fields. A box shaped like a kerosene lamp was found at the scene, but there was no stove or half-cooked food. Kerosene was found on her body, and Bali had absconded. Relatives gave evidence of a motorcycle demand and cruelty, including a demand made directly by Bharat. The trial court convicted Bali under Sections 302 and 498A IPC and Bharat under 498A. Both challenged the decision. They had originally been charged under Section 304B, but no specific charge under 498A had been framed.

2. Precedents — Considered : Ramesh v State of Haryana, (2017) 1 SCC 529; Purshottam Chopra v State (NCT of Delhi), (2020) 11 SCC 489; Abdul Majid Abdul Rahman v State of Gujarat, (1976) 4 SCC 351; and Laxman v State of Maharashtra, (2002) 6 SCC 710 were applied to assess the fitness of a person with burns to make a declaration, the doctor's prompt recording of it, and the absence of an absolute requirement for a separate fitness certificate or recording by a magistrate. Jagbir Singh v State (NCT of Delhi), (2019) 8 SCC 779; Vikas v State of Maharashtra, (2008) 2 SCC 516; and Muthu Kutty v State, (2005) 9 SCC 113 supported conviction on a declaration alone where careful scrutiny established its reliability, coherence and voluntary nature, free from tutoring. The Court reproduced further authorities within those extended quotations, including principles concerning multiple declarations, and assessed the declaration recorded by the doctor. Mritunjoy Biswas v Pranab, (2013) 12 SCC 796, and Sujit Biswas v State of Assam, (2013) 12 SCC 406 treated abscondence as a circumstance to be considered with the other evidence, insufficient by itself to establish guilt. Paulmeli v State of Tamil Nadu, (2014) 13 SCC 90 addressed reliance on the dependable portions of a hostile witness's evidence. Brahm Swaroop v State of U.P., (2011) 6 SCC 288 distinguished minor omissions from discrepancies affecting the core of the prosecution case. Arun Garg v State of Punjab, (2004) 8 SCC 251, and Kaliyaperumal v State of Tamil Nadu, (2004) 9 SCC 157 were applied to uphold the Section 498A convictions without a specific charge, despite acquittal on the distinct Section 304B charge.

3. Statutes considered : Evidence Act Section 32(1) made Meena's statement about the cause of her death relevant. IPC Section 302 governed Bali's intentional burning of her, while Section 498A concerned the motorcycle demand and cruelty proved against both men. Section 304B concerned the distinct offence of dowry death. The cited Supreme Court decisions permitted conviction under Section 498A without a specific charge where that offence was established on the evidence led in the case charged under the other provision. Bharat was not convicted under Section 302, and the Section 304B charge did not result in a conviction.

4. Issues : Whether the 90–100% burns, the absence of a separate fitness certificate or recording by an Executive Magistrate, and the account of an accident made Ex. P.13 unreliable; whether a single trustworthy declaration could sustain Bali's murder conviction; how abscondence and the evidence of a hostile witness should be assessed; whether minor discrepancies undermined proof of the motorcycle demand; and whether the Section 498A convictions could stand without a separate charge.

5. Ratio / Findings : The doctor's contemporaneous questions and testimony established that Meena was responsive and fit to make the declaration. The Court held that, where a patient's condition was deteriorating, the doctor should record the declaration promptly rather than wait for a nearby magistrate. The extent of burns alone did not establish incapacity, and there was no basis to suspect tutoring or bias on the doctor's part. On reading the declaration as a whole, the Court found it coherent and consistent with the kerosene findings and the absence of cooking evidence, and rejected the account of an accident. Bali's abscondence was a supporting circumstance, insufficient by itself to establish guilt. The dependable portion of PW14's testimony remained usable despite her hostility.

Witnesses and police statements supported the core allegation of a motorcycle demand despite minor omissions. Bharat's taking Meena to hospital, and the absence of an allegation in the declaration that the in-laws had burnt her, did not displace the separate evidence of cruelty against him. Sections 498A and 304B create distinct offences with different ingredients. Applying Arun Garg and Kaliyaperumal, the Court rejected the objection to conviction without a specific charge on the evidence in this case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed both criminal appeals and affirmed the trial judgment of 31 March 2011. Bali Singh's sentence of life imprisonment under Section 302 and two years' rigorous imprisonment under Section 498A, to run concurrently, was maintained. Bharat Singh's sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment under Section 498A with fine was also maintained. Bali remained in jail. Bharat's bail bonds were cancelled, and he was directed to surrender by 5 May 2022.

Headnote :- Related and inimical witnesses — Ramashish Rai v Jagdish Singh, (2005) 10 SCC 498 required careful scrutiny of an inimical witness's evidence, without rejecting it merely because of enmity. Badruddin Rukonddim Karpude v State of Maharashtra, AIR 1981 SC 1223 addressed material improvements by interested witnesses. State of U.P. v Chet Ram, AIR 1989 SC 1543 permitted reliance on interested testimony that was consistent, cogent and corroborated. Applying these principles, the Court disbelieved the nephews, who had concealed their relationship with the deceased, materially changed their account and received no independent corroboration in a case involving established enmity over property.

Ocular contradictions — The FIR, lodged immediately after the incident, named only Kalyan and Rahul as eyewitnesses. Munna and Maharaj's later claims to have witnessed part of the incident conflicted with the FIR and the police statements. The nephews changed their account of running half a kilometre to the complainant's house to one of calling out to him. The claim that the witnesses lived nearby was contradicted by the spot map and Vinod PW3. These changes affected whether the witnesses could have seen the incident and arrived at the time they claimed.

Proof of murder — The transverse ligature mark and abrasions suggested strangulation, but the doctor accepted the possibility of hanging. The alleged noose was missing, and the seized rope was never compared with the ligature mark. The eyewitness account was untrustworthy and had no independent support. Guilt under Section 147/302 was therefore not proved beyond reasonable doubt. Both connected appeals were allowed, and all appellants were acquitted.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bharat Singh filed a separate appeal, while Murad Ali and the other co-accused appealed jointly against their convictions dated 29 November 2018 under Sections 147 and 302 IPC. They had been convicted of collectively strangling Vijay Singh with a noose and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment, life imprisonment and fines. The FIR, lodged promptly, stated that Vijay's nephews, Kalyan PW4 and Rahul PW9, had seen the incident and run to inform his brothers, Munna PW1 and Maharaj PW2. The accused disputed both the nature of the death and the credibility of the eyewitnesses. The families were related and had established disputes over the property where the incident was alleged to have occurred.

2. Precedents — Considered : Ramashish Rai v Jagdish Singh, (2005) 10 SCC 498 was applied to require diligent scrutiny of inimical testimony without rejecting it merely on that ground. Badruddin Rukonddim Karpude v State of Maharashtra, AIR 1981 SC 1223 was applied to material improvements by partisan witnesses. State of U.P. v Chet Ram, AIR 1989 SC 1543 recognised that consistent, cogent and corroborated interested testimony could be accepted. The Court found that those conditions were absent here; it did not treat relationship with the deceased as a ground for automatic rejection. It acknowledged the trial court's preference for credible eyewitness evidence over conflicting medical evidence, but found the eyewitness account untrustworthy.

3. Statutes considered : The convictions under IPC Section 147 and the murder provision, Section 302, were under review. The Court compared the FIR, police statements, spot map, inquest, seizure and postmortem evidence in assessing whether guilt was proved beyond reasonable doubt. It did not make a positive finding of suicidal hanging. It found uncertainty about how the death had occurred and held that credible evidence did not establish the alleged unlawful assembly and murder.

4. Issues : Whether the medical and rope evidence established homicidal strangulation; whether the two witnesses named in the FIR and the two who later claimed to be eyewitnesses had an opportunity to see the events they described; whether the concealment of kinship, established animosity and material improvements were reconcilable with the prompt FIR and the physical layout; and whether any independent evidence supported guilt.

5. Ratio / Findings : The postmortem recorded a horizontal ligature mark on the neck and abrasions suggesting a struggle, but the doctor accepted that hanging was possible. The inquest did not record the alleged noose. The seized rope had no recorded loop or knot and was not compared with the ligature mark. The FIR named only Kalyan and Rahul as eyewitnesses and stated that they had run roughly half a kilometre to Munna's house. Munna and Maharaj's later claims to have witnessed part of the incident were absent from the prompt FIR and the police accounts. Maharaj was questioned by the police 17 days later. The nephews changed their account to one of calling out and concealed that they were Meera's sons. Vinod's evidence and the spot map contradicted Munna's claim that he lived nearby. His description of an open scene also conflicted with the enclosure shown on the map. The established animosity required careful scrutiny of the evidence, and there was no independent eyewitness or circumstantial corroboration. The witnesses' accounts were rejected because they were materially unreliable, rather than merely because the witnesses were related.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed both criminal appeals, set aside all appellants' convictions and sentences under Section 147/302, and acquitted them. Brajmohan, who was in jail, was directed to be released immediately. Any fines deposited were to be refunded.

Bharat Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh & Murad Ali and Ors. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 9706/2018 & 1279/2019, 19/08/2026, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Anuradha Shukla, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- POCSO child status / age records — Jarnail Singh v State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263 extended the documentary priority under Rule 12 to determining a child victim's age. State of Chhattisgarh v Lekhram, (2006) 5 SCC 736, and Murugan v State of Tamil Nadu, (2011) 6 SCC 111 recognised the relevance of a school entry under Evidence Act Section 35, while permitting scrutiny of its source and evidentiary weight. Mukarrab v State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210 cautioned against mechanical reliance on ossification tests. The original school register recorded the prosecutrix's date of birth as 20 June 1998. She was below 16 at the time of the incident, and the approximate radiological assessment did not displace that record.

Kidnapping and consent — The mother permitted the prosecutrix to accompany the appellant only to Kacchi Street, not to Shivpuri or elsewhere. The minor's apparent willingness neither amounted to her guardian's permission for the further journey nor determined liability for the charged sexual offences. The convictions under Sections 363, 366, 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO were affirmed. The Court noted that no charge under Section 376(2)(i) had been framed.

Sentence — Applying IPC Section 71 and the minimum terms of seven years in force on the date of the offence, the Court reduced each of the separate ten-year terms for rape and the POCSO offence to seven years, with fines of Rs. 10,000 each. The sentences under Sections 363/366 remained unchanged. All sentences were to run concurrently.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bharti Jatav appealed against his convictions in Special Sessions Trial 26/2014 under IPC Sections 363, 366 and 376(1) and POCSO Section 4. On 31 January 2014, he accompanied the prosecutrix, ostensibly to buy ingredients in Kacchi Street. Her mother expressly limited the journey and told him not to take her to Shivpuri. He nevertheless took her to Shivpuri and other places. She described an assault at a lodge, restraint with a dupatta, threats and a further rape. The accused maintained that she was 19, had travelled voluntarily with her parents' permission, and that a marriage had been arranged. The trial court imposed terms of three and five years for the kidnapping offences and ten years each for rape and the POCSO offence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jarnail Singh v State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263 was applied to the priority of documentary evidence in determining a victim's age under the then applicable Rule 12 framework for juveniles. State of Chhattisgarh v Lekhram, (2006) 5 SCC 736, and Murugan v State of Tamil Nadu, (2011) 6 SCC 111 addressed the relevance of school entries under Evidence Act Section 35, their creation before the dispute, and scrutiny of the source of the information and its evidentiary weight. Mukarrab v State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210 explained why ossification provides an approximate estimate rather than conclusive proof of age. The High Court also quoted its decision i*n Rakesh Garg v State of M.P. (10 May 2019)* concerning an accused's voluntary testimony under CrPC Section 315 and Evidence Act Section 132. It assessed the appellant's unproved account concerning the marriage card as the evidence of a defence witness.

3. Statutes considered : Evidence Act Section 35 made the original school register relevant. Rule 12 of the JJ Rules 2007, as explained in Jarnail Singh, and Section 94 of the JJ Act 2015 concerned the priority of documentary evidence over a medical estimate of age. IPC Sections 363 and 366 concerned removal from lawful guardianship and the purpose of the abduction; Section 376(1) and POCSO Section 4 concerned the sexual offences. IPC Section 71 informed the modification of the overlapping punishments. Section 376(2)(i) was mentioned as an uncharged provision and was not substituted for the provision under which the appellant stood convicted. CrPC Section 374 provided the appellate remedy.

4. Issues : Whether the prosecutrix was a minor despite the uncertain radiological estimate and the challenge to the source of the school-register entry; whether limited parental permission and alleged willingness defeated liability for kidnapping or the sexual offences; whether the marriage card and the appellant's testimony as a defence witness created doubt; and whether separate ten-year terms for rape and the POCSO offence were justified.

5. Ratio / Findings : The original school register recorded the prosecutrix's date of birth as 20 June 1998. The entry predated the dispute, and the custodian explained that it was based on a transfer certificate. The Court found no reason to regard it as fabricated. It treated the radiological estimate of 16–18 as imprecise and broadly corroborative of the school record. The prosecutrix was below 16 on 31 January 2014, so her alleged consent was immaterial. Her mother had permitted only the visit to the nearby market, not travel to Shivpuri or farther. The marriage card was not proved through its maker or the appellant's mother, and the alleged marriage arrangement had not been put to the prosecutrix's parents. The Court also found the claim implausible in view of the appellant's custody. He had not proved that a marriage was arranged. The convictions were affirmed without deciding whether the prosecutrix had in fact consented or substituting an uncharged aggravated rape provision. At the date of the offence, the minimum term for each sexual offence was seven years. Referring to IPC Section 71, the Court considered a separate punishment unnecessary and reduced both overlapping terms, while directing that the sentences run concurrently.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court partly allowed the appeal on sentence alone and affirmed the convictions under Sections 363, 366, 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO. The sentences for the first two offences remained three and five years respectively. Each ten-year term for the sexual offences was reduced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment, with a fine of Rs. 10,000 on each count. All sentences were to run concurrently. If the appellant was still in jail, he was to serve the remaining sentence. If he had been released in the other case, his bail bonds were cancelled and he was directed to surrender.

Bharti Jatav v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 1004/2014, 14/08/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- IPC Section 498A / cruelty without a dowry demand — Explanation (a) covers wilful conduct of such a nature as is likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. It operates independently of the harassment involving unlawful property demands covered by limb (b). The specific allegations that the sister-in-law had assaulted the wife, threatened to burn her and her child, and repeatedly accused her of carrying her younger brother's child disclosed a prima facie case of cruelty.

Section 482 / specific allegations against an in-law — The Court applied Kans Raj v State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207; Monju Roy v State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693; Kahkashan Kausar v State of Bihar, (2022) 6 SCC 599; Geeta Mehrotra v State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741; and Preeti Gupta v State of Jharkhand, (2010) 7 SCC 667 for the requirement of clear and specific allegations against a relative. Here, the FIR attributed particular acts to the applicant within a recent period, rather than making an omnibus allegation against the family.

Disputed residence — The Aadhaar copy recorded address details as of December 2023. It did not establish that the applicant lived in Rajasthan when the FIR of August 2023 alleged that she lived near the matrimonial home in Jhansi. The Court left her disputed residence for determination at trial and dismissed the quashing application.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bharti Jha, the complainant's sister-in-law, applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Mahila Police Thana Shahdol FIR 46/2023 and the ensuing proceedings. The wife alleged matrimonial harassment after her marriage in November 2021, including dowry demands and violence by her husband. She separately alleged that the applicant had threatened to burn her and her daughter, visited frequently and assaulted her, repeatedly accused her of carrying a second child fathered by her younger brother, and insisted on a DNA test. The allegations concerned June–July 2023, shortly before the FIR of 1 August. The applicant relied on an Aadhaar copy to claim residence in Sri Ganganagar, Rajasthan, and invoked the rule against prosecuting in-laws on omnibus allegations.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kans Raj v State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207; Monju Roy v State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693; Kahkashan Kausar alias Sonam v State of Bihar, (2022) 6 SCC 599; Geeta Mehrotra v State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741; and Preeti Gupta v State of Jharkhand, (2010) 7 SCC 667 were cited together for the requirement of clear and specific allegations against relatives. Applying that caution, the Court distinguished the particular acts attributed to the applicant from the mere inclusion of family members' names.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the application to quash the FIR and subsequent proceedings. Section 498A IPC, Explanation (a), covers wilful conduct of such a nature as is likely to drive a woman to suicide or cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. Limb (b) covers harassment intended to coerce her or a person related to her to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment because such a demand has not been met. The applicant's own conduct could constitute cruelty without proof that she had demanded dowry. The allegations against the husband formed part of the background and were not treated as proof of the applicant's guilt.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR made only vague and general allegations against a relative; whether Section 498A required a dowry demand by this applicant; and whether the later Aadhaar address conclusively disproved her alleged residence near the matrimonial home when the FIR was lodged.

5. Ratio / Findings : The FIR attributed particular threats, assaults, accusations about the wife's character and pressure for a DNA test to Bharti Jha within a defined recent period. Those allegations satisfied the Supreme Court's requirement of specificity at the prima facie stage. The accusations and threats were capable of constituting mental or physical cruelty under the limb of Section 498A that does not depend on a dowry demand. The Aadhaar copy stated that its Rajasthan address details were current as of 2 December 2023, months after the FIR. No independent document proving residence had been filed, and counsel could not establish that the address had remained unchanged. On that material, the Court left the disputed place of residence for determination at trial. These were findings on whether the prosecution should continue, not proof that the alleged acts had occurred.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. FIR 46/2023 and the subsequent criminal proceedings were not quashed. The factual disputes remained open for adjudication at trial.

Headnote :- CrPC Sections 362 and 482 / review by a criminal court - Applying Adalat Prasad v Rooplal Jindal, (2004) 7 SCC 338, the Court held that the Magistrate could not recall or review the order dismissing the complaint. The High Court separately examined that dismissal in its inherent jurisdiction. The offer to supply the documents on the same day and counsel's undertaking to bear costs justified conditional relief, while the bar under Section 362 remained applicable to the Magistrate.

NI Act Section 138 complaint / supply of documents and case management - The complainant should supply legible documents on the respondent's first appearance or send them with the notice. The failure to do so despite eight opportunities, and the resulting delay, required a firm response. The Court granted one final opportunity to supply a complete set, subject to costs of Rs. 20,000 payable to the respondent. The dismissal would revive automatically if the complainant failed to appear, pay the costs or supply the papers by the specified date.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhaskar Publication and Allied Industries Private Limited filed Complaint Case 861/2018 under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act against Jai Hanuman Publicity. From 11 June 2019, the Magistrate repeatedly directed it to supply legible copies of the complaint documents to the respondent. After eight opportunities, the JMFC dismissed the complaint for non-prosecution on 19 March 2021. On the same day, counsel stated that the office file, misplaced during the COVID period, had been found and sought an opportunity to supply the documents. The Magistrate declined to recall the dismissal because of Section 362 CrPC. The subsequent revision was dismissed as not maintainable. In the Section 482 application, the complainant submitted that it should not lose its case because of counsel's lapse, and counsel offered to bear the costs of restoration personally.

2. Precedents — Considered : Adalat Prasad v Rooplal Jindal, (2004) 7 SCC 338 was expressly applied to the rule that a criminal court cannot review its own final order. The High Court did not recognise an exception permitting the Magistrate to do so. It examined the dismissal under its own Section 482 jurisdiction, taking account of the same-day application to supply documents and counsel's undertaking to pay costs. The contention that a litigant should not suffer for counsel's mistake was the applicant's submission. It was not an unqualified holding dispensing with the duty to supply the papers.

3. Statutes considered : NI Act Section 138 concerned the underlying cheque-dishonour complaint. CrPC Section 362 barred the Magistrate from reviewing the dismissal already pronounced. Section 482 enabled the High Court to examine that dismissal. The Sessions Court's rejection of the revision as not maintainable formed the procedural background. The High Court did not decide the merits of the cheque-dishonour claim or the respondent's defence.

4. Issues : Whether the Magistrate could reopen a dismissed criminal complaint on an application made the same day despite Section 362; whether the High Court should uphold dismissal for the prolonged failure to supply legible documents; and whether costs and strict service conditions could protect the respondent while permitting one final opportunity.

5. Ratio / Findings : The complainant had a duty to furnish a complete, legible set of papers on the respondent's first appearance or with the notice. Eight defaults and the resulting delay could not be condoned without consequence. Once the Magistrate dismissed the complaint, Adalat Prasad and Section 362 barred that court from reviewing its own order. The effort on the same day to supply the recovered file, counsel's acceptance of responsibility and the offer to bear costs provided a narrow basis for High Court intervention. The dismissal was set aside subject to payment of Rs. 20,000 to the respondent and supply of the complete set on the fixed date. Failure to appear, pay or supply the papers would automatically deprive the High Court's order of effect and revive the original dismissal. The relief was confined to the circumstances and strict conditions of this case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court set aside the JMFC's dismissal dated 19 March 2021. The complainant was given one opportunity on 25 March 2022 to deposit Rs. 20,000 as costs payable to the respondent and supply the complete complaint and documents. If the respondent's counsel did not appear, the complainant's counsel was to lodge the papers in court for service. Upon any of the specified defaults, the High Court's order would automatically lose effect and the dismissal would revive. The Section 482 application was disposed of.

Headnote :- Evidence Act Section 32(1) / fitness of a person with burns - Applying Purshottam Chopra v State (NCT of Delhi), (2020) 11 SCC 489, including its discussion of the Constitution Bench ruling in Laxman, the Court rejected the contention that 90–100% burns necessarily made a person incapable of giving a declaration. It separately rejected the claim that a superficial burn on the tongue prevented speech, on the medical evidence. The Magistrate's and attending doctor's evidence established that Lata was conscious and fit. Her declaration, Ex. P.6, was read back to her and identified both accused. The Court applied the principles governing reliability and fitness in cases involving burns.

Dehati nalishi as a dying declaration - Tomar proved that Ex. P.13 had been recorded on Lata's instructions while she was injured and described the burning that caused her death. It therefore independently qualified as a dying declaration under Section 32(1). The two proved statements, including Ex. P.6, and the recovered kerosene and ignition material established the murder despite the hostile witnesses. The reference to tracheal "secretion" did not support the suggested inference of accidental burning.

Unexhibited deceased statement - A separate statement under Section 161 CrPC was included in the charge-sheet file but was never exhibited. Its presence in the file did not permit its use against the appellants. The Court relied on the two proved statements concerning the cause of death under Section 32.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Connected Criminal Appeals 853/2009 and 18/2010 challenged the convictions and life sentences imposed on Bhikam/Bheekham Singh and Lata's husband, Suresh, under IPC Section 302 on 16 November 2009. Lata reported a continuing dispute over her husband's intention to transfer the house to Bhikam. She stated that, on 10 October 2008, both men had poured kerosene on her and set her on fire. Y.S. Tomar recorded her Dehati Nalishi, Ex. P.13. Naib-Tahsildar Mamta Shakya subsequently recorded the formal dying declaration, Ex. P.6, after obtaining a doctor's fitness certificate. Lata died the following day. Relatives turned hostile. The defence contended that her 90% burns, burnt tongue and poor vital signs made speech impossible, and suggested that the fire had been accidental.

2. Precedents — Considered : Purshottam Chopra v State (NCT of Delhi), (2020) 11 SCC 489 was quoted extensively and applied to assess the particular declarant's mental and physical capacity, voluntariness and reliability despite burns. It reproduced the Constitution Bench ruling in Laxman v State of Maharashtra that a doctor's certification is a safeguard rather than an inflexible legal requirement, and that a reliable, voluntary declaration may support conviction without corroboration. Purshottam's discussion of Dal Singh treated the survival of skin on a thumb despite extensive burns as a question of fact. The quoted survey also addressed infirm or conflicting statements and the need for careful scrutiny. Here, the doctor had certified fitness and attended the recording by the Magistrate. The Court relied on that specific evidence; it did not treat extensive burns as establishing either truthfulness or incapacity by themselves.

3. Statutes considered : Evidence Act Section 32(1) governed the two statements concerning the cause of death. CrPC Section 161 concerned another police-recorded statement which, although included in the charge-sheet file, was not exhibited and was not used against the appellants. IPC Section 302 was the offence charged and upheld. The investigation had resulted in a charge-sheet under Section 302/34, while the trial charge and the convictions affirmed on appeal were under Section 302. Section 374 CrPC provided for the appeals.

4. Issues : Whether death from burns was homicidal rather than accidental or suicidal; whether Lata could make a reliable declaration despite 90% burns, superficial injury to her tongue and poor vital signs; whether the Dehati Nalishi also qualified as a dying declaration; whether the unexhibited Section 161 statement could be considered; and whether the two proved statements established each appellant's participation beyond reasonable doubt.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical evidence established death from burns; whether the burning was homicidal, accidental or suicidal depended on the remaining evidence. The first-degree burns on the tongue were superficial and did not mean that it was charred or that speech was impossible. Nor did the 90% burn percentage by itself establish incapacity to speak. The Naib-Tahsildar observed that Lata was conscious and oriented, obtained the doctor's fitness certificate and read Ex. P.6 back to her. The doctor was present and denied that she had been unconscious. Applying Purshottam and Laxman, the Court found the declaration reliable. Tomar proved that Ex. P.13 recorded Lata's own account of the cause of her death, bringing it within Section 32. The unexhibited Section 161 statement was not used. The scene recovery included a kerosene container and matches. The postmortem recorded secretion in the trachea, not liquor; the suggested inference of liquor therefore did not establish accidental burning. The two proved statements named both men and established guilt beyond reasonable doubt despite the hostile witnesses.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed both appeals and affirmed the Section 302 convictions and life sentences. Suresh remained in jail. Bhikam's position following temporary bail was uncertain. If he had not surrendered after 90 days, the trial court was directed to issue a perpetual warrant for his arrest so that he could serve the remaining sentence. Bheekham Singh and Ors. v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 853/2009 & 18/2010, 05/10/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- SC/ST Act Sections 18A and 4 / FIR and neglect of duty - Section 18A dispenses with a preliminary inquiry before registration of an FIR. Section 4 concerns wilful neglect of specified statutory duties by a public servant who is not a member of a Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe, subject to the statutory procedure. Neither provision independently entitles an informant to bypass the CrPC complaint and Magistrate remedies by seeking a direct order under Article 226. The Court did not decide whether an atrocity or neglect of duty had actually occurred.

Article 226 / mandamus for FIR registration - Sakiri Vasu v State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409; Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171; and Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542 were considered for recourse to the Magistrate when the police fail to act. The exception quoted from Divine Retreat concerns rare cases of clear mala fide abuse of investigative power and noncompliance with Chapter XII. Even then, a writ court cannot dictate how the investigation is to be conducted. The MP Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria applied the alternative-remedy rule, recognised the Whirlpool exceptions and distinguished the statutory duty under Lalita Kumari to register an FIR from an entitlement to direct mandamus. No exception was established here. The writ petition was dismissed with liberty to pursue Sections 156(3), 190/200 CrPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bherolal submitted a written complaint to the SHO at Isagarh, Ashoknagar, alleging offences under the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act against four named persons. When no FIR was registered, he petitioned under Article 226 for registration in accordance with Section 18A and for disciplinary or penal action against the police personnel under Section 4. He submitted that the allegation of an atrocity and the statutory bar on a preliminary inquiry made it unnecessary to approach the Magistrate. The proposed accused had not been impleaded as respondents. The Court decided the question of the appropriate forum and statutory remedy without adjudicating the underlying complaint.

2. Precedents — Considered : Sakiri Vasu v State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171 supported recourse to statutory remedies rather than routine direct writ petitions for non-registration of FIRs. Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542 was quoted and applied: ordinary police inaction could be addressed before the Magistrate under Sections 190/200. Rare cases of clear mala fide abuse of investigative power and noncompliance with Chapter XII could justify appropriate intervention under Article 226, but a court could not prescribe the manner of investigat*ion*. I*n Shweta Bhadauria v State of M.P.*, WA 247/2016, the MP Division Bench held that mandamus could be declined where the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 had not been used, unless the recognised exceptions in Whirlpool Corporation v Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1 applied. It distinguished Lalita Kumari v Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, concerning mandatory FIR registration, from the question of bypassing statutory remedies to obtain a writ. The present Court applied that distinction.

3. Statutes considered : Constitution Article 226 conferred discretionary writ jurisdiction. SC/ST Act Section 18A(1)(a) removes the requirement of a preliminary inquiry before FIR registration, while Section 18A(1)(b) removes the requirement of prior approval for an arrest where necessary. Section 4 concerns wilful neglect of statutory duties, including FIR registration, by a public servant who is not a member of a Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe. It requires an administrative-enquiry recommendation for booking charges and provides for cognizance and directions for penal proceedings by the Special Court. CrPC Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 provide the ordinary avenues for escalation, an investigation order and a complaint. The Court did not decide which offence, if any, the underlying complaint established.

4. Issues : Whether Sections 18A and 4 permit a direct writ for FIR registration without first using the statutory remedies; whether the alleged police omission called for disciplinary action or a complaint under Section 4; whether an exceptional public-law ground justified intervention; and whether an order could be made when the proposed accused had not been impleaded.

5. Ratio / Findings : Section 18A removes a preliminary inquiry as a prerequisite to FIR registration, while Section 4 addresses wilful neglect of statutory duties. Neither provision makes police refusal or inaction an automatic basis for a direct FIR-registration writ under Article 226. The Supreme Court and Division Bench authorities required recourse to the Magistrate; the rare-abuse exception and the recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule had not been established. The Court observed that the informant could name a delinquent SHO as an accused in a complaint under Section 4 if the allegation was supported. It did not find the officer guilty or dispense with the procedure prescribed by Section 4. It also noted that the suspected accused had not been impleaded. The available remedy under Sections 156(3)/200 was sufficient to decline mandamus.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition with liberty to pursue the statutory remedies before the competent Magistrate. It issued no direction to register an FIR, prescribe the manner of investigation or take disciplinary action. It made no finding on the merits of the alleged atrocity.

Bherolal v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 15443/2022, 24/08/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- IPC Sections 96–97 / private defence not expressly pleaded - Applying Rizan v State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, and State of M.P. v Ramesh, (2005) 9 SCC 705, the Court held that a formal plea was unnecessary where the prosecution evidence itself disclosed an immediate need for defence. Under Evidence Act Section 105, the accused could establish the exception on a balance of probabilities through cross-examination or other evidence; the prosecution's burden of proof remained unchanged. Salim Zia v State of U.P., (1979) 2 SCC 648 confirmed the lower burden on the defence. Here, the deceased's son described the attempt to take back the money, the appellant's retreat and the ensuing pursuit.

Private defence / necessity and excess - Ramesh, Dharam v State of Haryana, (2007) 15 SCC 241, Buta Singh v State of Punjab, (1991) 2 SCC 612, and Bhanwar Singh v State of M.P., (2008) 16 SCC 657 required a practical assessment of imminent danger and the force used, rather than a detached arithmetical test. The right ends when the danger ends and cannot justify reprisal. Exceeding an existing right may attract Section 300 Exception 2. Here, throwing two stones during the pursuit did not exceed the right. The Section 304 Part II conviction was set aside, and the appellant was acquitted.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhersiya appealed against his conviction under IPC Section 304 Part II and sentence of five years' rigorous imprisonment for Bhuchariya's death after being struck on the head with stones during a money dispute on 22 December 1999. The trial court had acquitted him under Sections 294, 336 and 506-B. The deceased's wife, Idli Bai, alleged that Bhersiya had assaulted him over an unpaid account. In cross-examination, their eight-year-old son, Kasam PW9, gave a fuller account. His father and the appellant had gone together to sell Toor pulse. His father consumed liquor, repaid Rs. 1,900 and then tried to take the money back. The appellant ran towards a field, the deceased pursued him, and the stones were thrown there. That account materially differed from the site map, which placed the incident in the courtyard. Other witnesses attributed the stone-throwing to the appellant, while the medical evidence showed two skull fractures and fatal haemorrhage. Counsel disputed knowledge that death was likely and sought reduction of the conviction to grievous hurt. He did not argue private defence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rizan v State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, and State of M.P. v Ramesh, (2005) 9 SCC 705 were quoted and applied to the right of private defence disclosed by the record despite the absence of a formal plea. They addressed the burden under Evidence Act Section 105, reliance on prosecution evidence, necessity and proportionality. Salim Zia v State of U.P., (1979) 2 SCC 648 was separately cited for proof by a preponderance of probabilities, rather than beyond reasonable doubt, by an accused. Dharam v State of Haryana, (2007) 15 SCC 241, and Buta Singh v State of Punjab, (1991) 2 SCC 612 required force to be assessed in the circumstances of the moment, rather than weighed in golden scales. Bhanwar Singh v State of M.P., (2008) 16 SCC 657 distinguished the absence of any right of defence from the exceeding of an existing right, which could attract Section 300 Exception 2. The decisions reproduced within Rizan/Ramesh supported those principles.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 96 and 97 provide a complete defence for acts falling within the right of private defence of the person or property. The quoted Supreme Court passages discuss Sections 100–101 concerning the extent to which defence of the body may extend to causing death. Evidence Act Section 105 governs the accused's burden to establish the exception. IPC Section 300 Exception 2 concerns a different outcome where, in good faith and without premeditation, an existing right is exceeded and death is caused without an intention to inflict more harm than necessary for defence. Section 304 Part II was the conviction under appeal. Section 325 was counsel's proposed lesser alternative, rather than the final decision. CrPC Section 313 contained the appellant's account of retreating from the attempted seizure of his money. The acquittals on the other original counts remained undisturbed.

4. Issues : Whether Bhersiya caused the fatal injuries with stones; whether the money dispute and pursuit created an imminent threat to his person or money that justified private defence even though counsel had not expressly pleaded it; how, and to what standard, the accused could establish that exception; whether the two blows to the head exceeded the necessary force; and whether the proper result was to maintain the culpable-homicide conviction, substitute a conviction for grievous hurt, or acquit him completely.

5. Ratio / Findings : The child's account disclosed the deceased's intoxication, completed repayment, attempt to snatch the money and pursuit after Bhersiya ran away. The Court found that the police map's placement of the incident in the courtyard conflicted with the account of its occurrence in the field. Other witnesses and medical evidence established the injuries from stones and the death, but did not determine whether the statutory exception applied. Under Rizan and Ramesh, the Court could consider private defence on its own initiative from the prosecution evidence. The accused's burden was one of probability and could be met without calling defence witnesses. The appellant had first tried to avoid the confrontation by retreating. The pursuit and attempted seizure required immediate protection without recourse to state assistance. Assessing the confusion and available choices at the scene, rather than only the fatal result or the location of the injuries on the head, the Court held that throwing stones twice was not disproportionate and did not exceed the right. It therefore rejected both the trial court's Section 304 Part II conviction and counsel's proposed substitution under Section 325.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal appeal and set aside the Section 304 Part II conviction dated 20 January 2001, the five-year sentence and the fine. Bhersiya was acquitted of all charges. As he was on bail, his bail bonds were discharged.

Bhersiya v. The State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 187/2001, 13/09/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 439 CrPC / witness intimidation and monitored conditions - The applicant had obtained affidavits from the prosecutrix and her parents before their cross-examination, and bail had earlier been refused on that account. They later turned hostile. Applying Mahender Chawla v Union of India, (2019) 14 SCC 615, the Court found that the prosecution had failed to protect the witnesses. It granted bail on stringent conditions without deciding guilt. These included a cash surety of Rs. 3 lakh, twice-monthly police reporting and trial-court monitoring. Even a single default in court or police attendance, or registration of a new offence, would automatically end bail and forfeit the cash surety. Aparna Bhat v State of M.P., Criminal Appeal 329/2021 (18 March 2021), was applied to direct intimation of the grant of bail to the complainant. Bail was granted on these stringent conditions in the circumstances of this case.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhola Sakhwar made his third application for bail under Section 439 CrPC in Crime 60/2021, registered at Police Station Nagra, Morena, for offences under IPC Sections 363 and 366-A and POCSO Sections 16/17. He had been arrested on 29 June 2021. In seeking bail earlier, he had relied on affidavits from the complainant and her parents before their cross-examination. The first application was rejected. The second was withdrawn with liberty to apply again after a reasonable period in custody. The prosecutrix and her parents later turned hostile at trial. Relying on the earlier affidavits, the State submitted that he had pressured them. The Court considered the changed testimony together with the concern about pressure on the witnesses.

2. Precedents — Considered : Mahender Chawla v Union of India, (2019) 14 SCC 615, was cited and applied to witness protection. The High Court found that the prosecution had failed to protect the witnesses in this case. Aparna Bhat v State of M.P., Criminal Appeal 329/2021 (18 March 2021), was applied to direct communication of the grant of bail to the complainant. The order did not decide guilt or withdraw its observation that the applicant had pressured the witnesses.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed the application for bail. IPC Sections 363 and 366-A and POCSO Sections 16/17 were the alleged offences; their merits were not decided. The Court required a cash surety, twice-monthly attendance before the SHO and reports by the SHO to the trial court, and specified the consequences of noncompliance.

4. Issues : Whether the subsequent hostile testimony justified bail despite the earlier affidavits and the State's allegation of intimidation; whether the failure to protect the vulnerable witnesses required monitored bail conditions; and how the complainant should be informed of the grant of bail.

5. Ratio / Findings : The affidavits obtained before cross-examination had caused serious concern and contributed to the first refusal of bail. The Court stated that the applicant had been involved in pressurising the witnesses. The prosecutrix and her parents had now failed to support the prosecution case. Referring to Mahender Chawla, the Court expressly found that the prosecution had failed to protect them; it did not treat their hostility as proof of innocence. Without deciding the merits of the prosecution case, it exercised its discretion under Section 439 and granted bail subject to substantial cash security, regular police attendance, reports to the trial court and strict consequences for default. The reasoning and the amount of security related to the particular circumstances of this case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the third application for regular bail, without commenting on the merits. Release was subject to a cash surety of Rs. 3,00,000 to the satisfaction of the trial court or committal court and appearance on the dates fixed by the court. The applicant was to appear before the SHO, Police Station Nagra, Morena, on the 1st and 15th of every month until the trial ended. The SHO was to report compliance to the trial court by the 3rd and 17th of each month. The order was effective until the end of trial, subject to becoming ineffective upon bail jump. Even one default in appearance before the trial court or the SHO, or registration of a new offence, would automatically end bail and forfeit the cash surety without a further reference to the court. Intimation of the grant of bail was to be sent to the complainant. Two typed copies of the order were to be handed to the Public Prosecutor for communication to the Superintendent of Police, Morena, and the SHO, Police Station Nagra, Morena, for information and compliance.

Bhola Sakhwar v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 53063/2021, 28/10/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (131) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 125 CrPC / disputed disqualification of the wife - At the interim stage, the husband's photographs did not establish his allegations of an earlier marriage and a child. The wife had agreed to forensic and medical testing, but he withdrew his cooperation. The Court upheld the adverse inference drawn from his conduct without finally deciding marital status.

Interim maintenance / proof of current income - A school certificate recording pay of Rs. 8,000 in 2016–17 did not establish employment when the claim was made in August 2018. An unauthenticated pamphlet advertising dance classes did not prove earnings. Counsel cited Rajnesh v Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, in support of the request for an income affidavit.

Interim maintenance / voluntary salary deductions - The December 2019 Army payslip did not justify reducing the income assessed for maintenance by voluntary AFPP, AGIF or e-ticketing deductions that were not shown to be statutory. The Court held that only statutory deductions, rather than voluntary contributions, could be excluded in calculating take-home salary. It upheld maintenance of Rs. 10,000 and imposed revision costs of Rs. 20,000.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bholu challenged the Family Court, Gwalior, order dated 12 February 2021 granting Reshma Parmar interim maintenance of Rs. 10,000 per month in Section 125 Case 258/2018. He alleged that she had concealed an earlier marriage and a child and was living in adultery. She denied those allegations and said that the boy was her sister's son. He relied on photographs, a school certificate recording monthly pay of Rs. 8,000 in 2016–17, a pamphlet advertising dance classes and an Army payslip showing his net monthly pay as Rs. 24,576. She said that she was unemployed, alleged that the photographs were doctored and offered forensic, medical and DNA testing. She pointed to his salary of approximately Rs. 41,060. The High Court examined the Family Court order sheets dated 28 and 29 January and 12 and 17 February 2021 concerning the proposed tests and his failure to cooperate.

2. Precedents — Considered : The husband relied on Rajnesh v Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, to submit that the wife should disclose her income by affidavit. The Court recorded that submission. It decided the revision by examining the trial court's order sheets, the date of the old employment certificate, the lack of proof of dance-class income and the distinction between statutory and voluntary salary deductions.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 125 governed the maintenance claim, and Sections 397/401 governed revision of the interim order. The applicant alleged an earlier subsisting marriage or adultery, but marital status and the alleged disqualification were not finally tried in this interim proceeding. In assessing his ability to pay, the Court considered whether the salary deductions were statutory or voluntary. It also imposed costs in the revision and specified the consequences of nonpayment in this case.

4. Issues : Whether the wife's alleged earlier marriage, child and adultery were sufficiently established to deny interim maintenance; whether the 2016–17 school certificate and dance-class pamphlet established income when her claim began in August 2018; whether the voluntary AFPP, AGIF and e-ticketing deductions from Army pay justified treating Rs. 10,000 as excessive; and whether the Family Court's provisional order warranted interference in revision.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Family Court order sheets showed that the wife had agreed to examination of the disputed photographs and to medical testing, while the husband failed to cooperate. The High Court upheld the adverse inference drawn from his reversal of position. It considered his accusations apparently false and observed that making a false allegation against a spouse itself amounts to cruelty. These were findings on the material before it in this interim revision, rather than a final determination of marital status. The old school salary certificate did not establish that the wife was employed in the relevant year, and the unsupported pamphlet did not establish current receipts from dance classes. The December 2019 payslip included a voluntary AFPP contribution of Rs. 13,000 and other deductions not shown to be statutory. The applicant could choose to make those payments, but they remained part of his income for maintenance. Only statutory deductions could be excluded in calculating take-home salary. The Court found maintenance of Rs. 10,000 proportionate and no ground for interference in revision. It did not finally determine the alleged earlier marriage or the parties' future earning circumstances.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision and upheld interim maintenance of Rs. 10,000 per month. Bholu was directed to deposit Rs. 20,000 in revision litigation costs with the Registry within 15 days for payment to Reshma on her application. He was to submit the deposit receipt to the trial court by 4 April 2022. If the costs were not deposited within that period, the Principal Registrar was directed to register a contempt case, and the trial court was directed to strike off his defence.

Headnote :- Conviction appeal / absconding appellant — Applying Dhananjay Rai @ Guddu Rai, the Court decided the already admitted appeal on its merits despite the appellant's failure to surrender after parole. After dismissing the appeal, it directed the issue of a perpetual arrest warrant.

Homicide / death following delayed sepsis — Under Explanation 2 to Section 299 IPC, the assailant remained responsible where the sharp-force head injuries caused continuous coma and death from septic shock about seven months later. The possibility that better treatment might have prevented death did not break the medically established causal connection. Khokan was cited to show that death from septicaemia did not automatically bring the case under Section 304. Arjun Singh, Antram and Jagtar Singh were applied to the issue of causation.

Witness improvements / reliable remaining testimony — The son and wife's new assertion at trial that they had seen the assault was rejected as a material improvement. Applying Tomaso Bruno, Achhar Singh and Sohrab, the Court nevertheless accepted their consistent account of seeing the appellant flee with an axe, which they had given to the police.

Serology / conduct as circumstantial evidence — Human blood on the recovered axe remained corroborative even though its group could not be identified. Khujji distinguished Kansa Behera; Rameshbhai Mohanbhai Koli, Molai and Teja Ram were also applied. The Court considered the appellant's flight with a weapon from a gravely injured relative as relevant conduct under Section 8, together with the forensic evidence and his failure to explain the blood. It affirmed the Section 302 conviction and life sentence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhoop Singh appealed against the Morena Sessions Court's conviction dated 8 May 2012 under Section 302 IPC and sentence of life imprisonment. On 22 May 2010, Jagman Singh sustained multiple incised wounds to the head and face, including a bone fracture, and became unconscious. His son, Dhruv, and wife, Ganga, reached the scene and reported seeing the appellant, a close relative, run away with an axe. Jagman Singh remained in a coma despite treatment and died on 8 December 2010. The prosecution initially proceeded under Sections 307 and 326. The trial charge was altered to Section 302 after his death. The appellant later failed to surrender after parole, raising the question whether his already admitted appeal could be heard.

2. Precedents — Considered : Dhananjay Rai @ Guddu Rai (Supreme Court, Criminal Appeal 803/2017, decided 14 July 2022) was applied to require a decision on the merits of an already admitted conviction appeal despite absconding. The surrender rule applicable before admission was distinguished. Khokan v State of Chhattisgarh, (2021) 3 SCC 365, was cited to reject automatic application of Section 304 merely because death resulted from septicaemia. State of Rajasthan v Arjun Singh, (2011) 9 SCC 115, Antram v State of Maharashtra, (2007) 13 SCC 356, and Jagtar Singh v State of Punjab, (1999) 2 SCC 174, supported causation from the injuries despite delayed infection or the possibility of better treatment. Tomaso Bruno v State of UP, (2015) 7 SCC 178, Achhar Singh v State of HP, (2021) 5 SCC 543, and Sohrab v State of MP, (1972) 3 SCC 751, guided the separation of material improvements from trustworthy testimony. Khujji v State of MP, (1991) 3 SCC 627, distinguished the defence authority, Kansa Behera v State of Orissa, (1987) 3 SCC 480, concerning human blood whose group could not be identified. Rameshbhai Mohanbhai Koli, Molai and Teja Ram supported the contextual use of that forensic evidence. Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, supplied the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt and the principles for appreciating witnesses' evidence. The Court applied and distinguished those authorities in deciding this appeal.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 374 governed the conviction appeal. IPC Section 299 Explanation 2 treats a person who causes a fatal bodily injury as having caused death even if proper remedies and skilled treatment might have prevented it. Section 302 was the provision under which the murder conviction was affirmed. Evidence Act Section 8 made the appellant's flight with the axe relevant as subsequent conduct, while Section 3 informed the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt. The police initially proceeded under Sections 307/326; the trial court altered the charge after Jagman Singh's death. The finding of human blood was relevant to the chain of circumstances although its group could not be determined.

4. Issues : Whether an already admitted conviction appeal could be dismissed without a hearing on the merits because the appellant had failed to surrender after parole; whether the interval of about seven months, sepsis and alleged inadequate treatment broke the legal and medical connection between the head injuries and death; whether the son and wife's improved trial claim to have seen the blows required rejection of their original account of seeing the appellant flee; and whether human blood on the axe, despite the lack of blood-group identification, could corroborate identity when considered with the evidence of flight.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court heard the appeal on its merits despite the appellant's absconding. The initial medical findings, continuous coma and post-mortem opinion linked death from septic shock to the assault. The treatment records and family testimony did not support the suggested intervening neglect. Explanation 2 to Section 299 prevented the mere possibility of better treatment from absolving the assailant. The witnesses' new claim that they had seen the blows was a material contradiction and was discarded, but their earlier, consistent account of seeing the appellant flee with an axe was accepted. The recovery evidence established seizure of the axe, the FSL found human blood on it, and the appellant did not explain its presence. Failure to identify the blood group did not make that evidence worthless, although it did not conclusively match the blood to the victim. Flight alone might have an innocent explanation. Here, however, flight with a weapon from a gravely injured relative, considered in the setting of this case, was incriminating conduct under Section 8. The circumstances taken together proved beyond reasonable doubt that the appellant had committed the assault. The conviction rested on those circumstances, rather than on a rejected claim of directly witnessing the assault or on serology alone.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the Section 302 conviction, life imprisonment and fine of Rs. 5,000, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The trial court was directed to issue a perpetual arrest warrant so that the absconding appellant could serve the remaining sentence. A copy of the judgment was to be supplied to him immediately, free of cost.

Headnote :- Section 125 CrPC / divorced wife — Following Rohtash Singh v Ramendri, (2000) 3 SCC 180, a divorced woman who has not remarried remains a "wife" for the limited purpose of maintenance under Explanation (b) to Section 125(1). The bar based on refusal to live with the husband presupposes a subsisting marriage and did not defeat maintenance after the husband obtained an ex parte divorce decree. Captain Ramesh Chander Kaushal v Veena Kaushal, AIR 1978 SC 1807, was quoted through Rohtash Singh for the social-justice purpose of the provision.

Restitution and conduct — The ex parte decree under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act did not itself end maintenance. The husband withdrew its execution, and his own revision petition recorded that he had twice failed to take his wife home despite court directions. The Court rejected his claim of desertion and dismissed the revision. Monthly maintenance of Rs. 4,000 for the wife and Rs. 4,000 for the minor child remained in force. Neither the child's maintenance nor the amount awarded was challenged.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : By order dated 18 January 2018 in MJCR 17/2017, the Family Court, Guna, awarded monthly maintenance of Rs. 4,000 each to Bharti and the parties' minor child. The child's award was to continue until majority or further order. Bhoopendra Singh Gurjar challenged only his wife's maintenance in revision under CrPC Sections 397/401 and Family Courts Act Section 19(4). He had obtained an ex parte decree for restitution of conjugal rights under Hindu Marriage Act Section 9 and applied for execution on 19 February 2018, but later withdrew that proceeding. He filed a divorce petition under Section 13 on 13 August 2020 and obtained an ex parte divorce decree on 30 July 2024. He alleged that his wife was living separately without sufficient cause. She relied on his failure to take her home despite court directions.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rohtash Singh v Ramendri (Smt.) and others, (2000) 3 SCC 180, was quoted and directly applied. Under Explanation (b) to Section 125(1), a divorced woman who has not remarried remains a "wife" for maintenance, while the bar based on refusal to live with the husband without sufficient reason presupposes a subsisting marriage. The passage quoted from Rohtash Singh itself cited Captain Ramesh Chander Kaushal v Veena Kaushal, AIR 1978 SC 1807, for construing Section 125 in light of its social-justice purpose.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 125 and Explanation (b) to subsection (1) governed the wife's status for maintenance after divorce. The asserted bar under Section 125(4), based on living apart without sufficient reason, concerned a subsisting marriage. Hindu Marriage Act Sections 9 and 13 concerned the earlier restitution decree and the later divorce. CPC Order XXI Rule 32 concerned the execution proceeding that was withdrawn. CrPC Sections 397/401 and Family Courts Act Section 19(4) supplied revisional jurisdiction. The child's separate award under Section 125 was not contested.

4. Issues : Whether, after obtaining a divorce decree, the husband could deny maintenance under Section 125 because his former wife had not lived with him before divorce; whether the ex parte restitution decree established a disqualifying refusal; whether his own conduct in the restitution proceedings defeated his allegation of desertion; and whether there was any basis to disturb the wife's monthly amount when he had not challenged its quantum.

5. Ratio / Findings : Divorce ended the obligation to cohabit, but Bharti remained within Section 125's inclusive definition of "wife" for maintenance. Under Rohtash Singh, the restriction based on living apart without sufficient reason could not be applied to her after divorce. The husband's own revision petition recorded that he had been directed to take his wife and child home, had failed to attend on one date and had attended on another without taking them, citing illness. He then withdrew execution of the restitution decree. The Court found that this conduct did not support his allegation that she had deserted him and held that he could not take advantage of his own default. The wife's monthly amount of Rs. 4,000 had not been challenged.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision. The Family Court's monthly maintenance awards of Rs. 4,000 to the wife and Rs. 4,000 to the minor child remained in force; the child's award had not been challenged.

Bhoopendra Singh Gurjar v. Bharti and Ors., Cr.R. no. 1638/2018, 13/12/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Article 226 / accused's preferred investigation — An accused named in an FIR cannot insist that the police investigate from the perspective set out in his representation, choose the investigating agency or demand a hearing as a matter of course during investigation. Romila Thapar v Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, and Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626, were applied. The quoted authorities recognise exceptional constitutional directions where a mala fide exercise of investigative power is convincingly established. The Court refused the direction sought in this petition.

Judicial monitoring / supervision — Manohar Lal Sharma v Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, distinguishes monitoring to ensure progress and fairness from supervision that directs the investigation and the report under Section 173. The direction sought would amount to supervision. The writ petition was dismissed, leaving the petitioner to challenge the evidence at the lawful stages.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhupendra Ghoshi was named as an accused in Crime 240/2023 at Jaisi Nagar Police Station, Sagar, for alleged offences under IPC Sections 436, 294 and 34. He submitted a representation to the Superintendent of Police on 19 October 2022 seeking what he described as a fair investigation. In Writ Petition 21795/2024 under Article 226, he sought a mandamus directing investigation of his complaint. The order records only the appearance of the petitioner's counsel. It considered the scope of an accused's right to seek such a direction and did not decide the underlying arson allegation.

2. Precedents — Considered : Romila Thapar v Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was quoted at length and applied to the rule that an accused cannot choose the investigating agency or the manner of investigation. It also recognised the narrow scope for directions under Article 226 where a mala fide exercise of investigative power is convincingly established. The quotation included the Constitution Bench's caution about exceptional transfers to the CBI in State of West Bengal v Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571. Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626, was separately applied to the absence of an accused's right to a hearing or participation in investigation as a matter of course. The quoted passages drew on WN Chadha, Rajesh Gandhi, Sri Bhagwan Samardha and Narender G Goel. The High Court's Prabal Dogra order stated the same principle. Manohar Lal Sharma v Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, was directly applied to distinguish rare monitoring from directions controlling the investigative method or result.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 conferred writ jurisdiction, to be exercised with restraint during an ongoing criminal investigation. IPC Sections 436, 294 and 34 described the registered offences; their ingredients were not decided. In the cited authorities, CrPC Section 173(2) concerned the investigation report and the need for its independent assessment at trial, which judicial supervision could compromise.

Section 173(8) appeared in the quotation concerning further investigation. This petition did not decide the validity of a filed final report.

4. Issues : Whether an accused can obtain a mandamus requiring the police to investigate his representation or his preferred account; whether he has a right to participate in choosing the manner of investigation or the agency; and whether a superior court can supervise an ongoing investigation, as distinct from exceptional monitoring to secure fairness.

5. Ratio / Findings : An accused has no ordinary right to direct the investigation or obtain a court order requiring investigation from his preferred perspective. The quoted authorities preserve constitutional power to remedy sufficiently established mala fides or exceptional unfairness. They distinguish monitoring, which watches progress and independence in rare and compelling circumstances, from supervision, which directs investigative methods and conclusions and may influence or bind the trial court when it considers a report under Section 173. The High Court held that directing investigation from this petitioner's perspective would amount to impermissible supervision. It did not decide whether he had committed the alleged IPC offences. If he claimed false implication, he would have an opportunity to establish his innocence at trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. It issued no mandamus directing or supervising the police investigation.

Bhupendra Ghoshi v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 21795/2024, 17/08/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Investigation / directions to arrest or file a charge sheet — On the FIR informant's application invoking inherent powers, the Court declined to compel arrest of the named persons or direct a predetermined charge sheet. D. Venkatasubramaniam v MK Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was applied: a statutory police investigation may result in a charge sheet or a closure report. M.C. Abraham v State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, was quoted within that decision for the discretion to arrest and the caution required in exercising it. A direction to arrest and file a charge sheet would amount to impermissible supervision of investigation.

Prompt completion / lawful outcome — The Court quoted CrPC Section 173(1) and referred to BNSS Section 193, requiring completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. It directed early completion and the steps required by law, leaving the result to the investigating officer's lawful assessment. The applicant could take any grievance to the Superintendent of Police. The application was disposed of.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On Bhupendra Singh Gurjar's complaint, Atreta Police Station, Datia, registered Crime 61/2024 for alleged offences under BNS Sections 103, 109, 125, 351(2), 191(2), 191(3) and 190. He complained that the police had taken no further action and had not arrested the persons accused. In Miscellaneous Criminal Case 54959/2024, he invoked the High Court's inherent power under BNSS Section 528, seeking arrest, filing of a charge-sheet and prompt action. The Court did not examine the evidence relating to the alleged offences.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam and others v MK Mohan Krishnamachari and another, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was quoted and directly applied. The cited passages criticised mechanical High Court directions prescribing the recording of witnesses' statements, arrest, seizure and filing of a charge sheet during investigation. A police investigation may lawfully result in a charge sheet or a closure report. The quotation included M.C. Abraham v State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, on discretion to arrest and the need for caution rather than routine arrest upon registration of an FIR. It also quoted Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, in discussing notice to persons affected by coercive judicial directions in the earlier Supreme Court case.

3. Statutes considered : BNSS Section 528 was invoked for the High Court's inherent power. The BNS provisions listed in the FIR stated the allegations; their ingredients were not decided. The Court quoted CrPC Section 173(1) and referred alongside it to BNSS Section 193 for completion without unnecessary delay and the lawful police report that must follow. The precedent discussed CrPC Sections 41 and 482 in the earlier Code's setting. The present ruling concerned police discretion in investigation and the limits of directions under inherent powers.

4. Issues : Whether, at the complainant's request, the Court could direct arrest of the accused and filing of a charge sheet while investigation was pending; whether it could instead require prompt completion without prescribing a prosecution outcome; and what remedy remained for a grievance about continuing delay.

5. Ratio / Findings : Registration of an FIR begins a statutory investigation; it does not automatically require arrest or filing of a charge sheet. The investigating officer must assess the material collected and the need for arrest and submit the final report warranted by the investigation. A court direction to arrest and file a charge sheet would control the investigative method and result and would amount to supervision. The statutory duty to complete investigation without unnecessary delay nevertheless remains. The officer cannot keep the case pending indefinitely. The Court could therefore direct completion as early as possible and the steps required by law, without deciding whether an offence had been established. The Supreme Court passages about hearing affected persons concerned the earlier case; no such coercive direction was made here.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the application with a direction to the investigating officer to complete the investigation expeditiously and take the steps required by law. It refused directions for arrest and filing of a charge-sheet. The applicant remained free to approach the Superintendent of Police, Datia, with any grievance, to be considered in accordance with law.

Bhupendra Singh Gurjar v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 54959/2024, 20/12/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR non-registration / alternative remedy — The police must register information disclosing a cognizable offence. If they fail to do so, the ordinary remedy is a complaint before the Magistrate under CrPC Sections 190/200. The informant may also approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and then the Magistrate under Section 156(3) for registration or proper investigation. Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171; Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542; Sakiri Vasu v State of UP, (2008) 2 SCC 409; and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, were applied.

High Court direction — Shweta Bhadauria distinguished the police's statutory duty under Lalita Kumari from an entitlement to immediate mandamus without using the alternative remedies. Recognised exceptions permitting constitutional intervention remained intact. The Section 482 application was dismissed as not maintainable, with liberty to complain before the Magistrate. The merits of Bhura's allegations were not decided.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bhura filed Misc. Criminal Case 8712/2024 under CrPC Section 482, alleging that the police had failed to register an FIR despite multiple complaints. He sought a direction requiring the respondent officers to decide his complaint by a speaking order within a time limit, referring to an earlier order. The State submitted that he should approach the Magistrate under CrPC Sections 190 and 200. The Court considered whether an application for a direction to the police to register an FIR was maintainable.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted to distinguish the duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence from the remedy under Sections 190/200 when the police fail to act. Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was applied for the same Magistrate route and for rare intervention under Article 226 where investigative power is clearly abused mala fide. Its quotation from Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre explained the complaint procedure. Sakiri Vasu v State of UP, (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, were applied for recourse first under Section 154(3) and then under Section 156(3), including the Magistrate's power to direct and monitor investigation. The MP Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria v State of MP relied on the Whirlpool exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. It distinguished Lalita Kumari v Government of UP, (2014) 2 SCC 1, as addressing the police's registration duty rather than an automatic entitlement to a writ.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 154 governs registration of information disclosing a cognizable offence. Section 154(3) provides recourse to the Superintendent of Police, Section 156(3) permits an application to the Magistrate for registration or proper investigation, and Sections 190/200 provide the complaint and cognizance route. Section 482 was the inherent jurisdiction invoked; the Court declined to use it as a substitute for those ordinary remedies. The Supreme Court authority discussed exceptional intervention under Article 226 in cases of mala fide exercise of investigative power, although Bhura's application was under Section 482.

4. Issues : Whether repeated police failure to register an FIR justified a High Court direction in this application; which forum and statutory steps remained available to the informant; and whether the police duty under Section 154 alone displaced the requirement to use alternative remedies.

5. Ratio / Findings : The police must register information disclosing a cognizable offence. The Court did not decide whether Bhura's complaint disclosed such an offence. On police refusal or inaction, the informant could approach the Superintendent of Police and the Magistrate through the statutory remedies. If prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate may direct registration of an FIR or proper investigation and may monitor the investigation, but cannot personally investigate. A complaint under Sections 190/200 also remained available. The High Court found no case for directing registration and left Bhura to the Magistrate's remedy. The cited authorities preserved exceptional intervention under Article 226 for clear abuse of investigative power or recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The order did not separately assess those exceptions on Bhura's facts. Lalita Kumari was not treated as itself conferring an entitlement to immediate mandamus.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application as not maintainable for a direction to the police to register an offence, with liberty to approach the competent Magistrate under CrPC Section 200. It did not express an opinion on the merits of the alleged offence.

Bhura v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 8712/2024, 23/04/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- CrPC Section 391 / additional evidence in appeal — Photocopies of Gram Sabha and Van Adhikar Samiti recommendations, filed with a printed list of documents, were not duly admitted as additional evidence. There was no application under Section 391, showing their necessity for a just decision, no recorded reasons and no explanation for their nonproduction at trial. Since the appellate court had considered the documents, the revision court also examined whether they were material.

Indian Forest Act Section 26(1-j) / Forest Rights Act — Scheduled Tribe membership and pending recommendations did not by themselves establish status as a "forest dwelling Scheduled Tribe" under Forest Rights Act Section 2(c). The claimant failed to show that he primarily resided in the forest. On this record, the protection pending recognition under Section 4(5) did not defeat the conviction for encroachment. The conditional release under the Probation of Offenders Act, including the planting and return-of-possession conditions, remained undisturbed. The revision was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A forest beat guard found Bhuru cultivating and attempting to encroach on forest land in Kalyanpura Beat 270 on 22 July 2015. The JMFC, Jhabua, convicted him under Indian Forest Act Section 26(1-j) in October 2016 and granted conditional release under the Probation of Offenders Act. He was required not to repeat a similar offence during the next three years, to plant and tend at least fifty plants and to surrender possession of the forest land to the Forest Department. The Sessions Court dismissed his appeal. In criminal revision, he claimed that he was a forest-dwelling Scheduled Tribe member with a pending forest-rights proceeding and could retain possession under the 2006 Act. He had produced no supporting documents at trial. Photocopies of recommendations were later filed before the appellate court with only a list of documents.

2. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 391 permits a criminal appellate court to take additional evidence, or direct a subordinate court to take it, when the evidence is necessary and the court records reasons. It also provides safeguards for participation. Section 2(c) of the Scheduled Tribes and Other Traditional Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Act 2006 defines forest-dwelling Scheduled Tribes by primary residence in the forest and dependence on it for bona fide livelihood needs. Section 4(5) was invoked for continued possession pending recognition or verification. Section 26(1-j) of the Indian Forest Act 1927 supplied the encroachment offence. Relief under the Probation of Offenders Act had already moderated the sentence. CrPC Sections 397/401 governed the revision.

3. Issues : Whether photocopies filed in appeal with a document list, without an application or reasoned order under Section 391, could establish the claimed forest-rights facts; whether those documents, even if considered, established qualifying status under Section 2(c) and interim protection under Section 4(5); and whether the conviction or existing probation conditions called for revisional interference.

4. Ratio / Findings : Bhuru had neither applied to adduce additional evidence nor explained why he had not produced the documents at trial. Filing photocopies with a document list could not bypass Section 391. The Court nevertheless examined their effect because the lower appellate court had considered them. The recommendations did not show that he primarily resided on forest land or that his village lay in a forest area. Scheduled Tribe membership and possession of encroached forest land did not automatically establish forest-dweller status as defined by the Act. No forest right had yet been conferred. On this record, pendency of the process did not protect a claimant who had failed to establish eligibility. The Court applied CrPC Section 391 and Forest Rights Act Sections 2(c) and 4(5) to these evidentiary deficiencies. It examined the appellate record and the trial court's probation order; a recommendation for forest rights was not treated as a binding determination recognising them.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the revision and affirmed the conviction under the Indian Forest Act and the conditional probation order already granted. It made no independent order recognising or extinguishing forest rights in the separate administrative proceeding.

Headnote :- Homicidal death / burning after death — The post-mortem examination established death by asphyxia caused by compression of the trachea, ante-mortem blunt injuries and subsequent extensive burning. The burns did not establish an accidental death by fire. The burning formed part of the Court's assessment under Section 201.

Evidence Act Section 106 / death in the household — The husband and father-in-law were required to explain events especially within their knowledge in their home only after the prosecution had established homicidal death and the other incriminating circumstances. Babu alias Balasubramaniam v State of Tamil Nadu, (2013) 8 SCC 60; Tulshiram Sahadu Suryawanshi v State of Maharashtra, (2012) 10 SCC 373; and Trimukh Maroti Kirkan v State of Maharashtra, (2006) 10 SCC 681, were applied. Section 106 did not relieve the prosecution of proof beyond reasonable doubt. Absconding was assessed in context, with recognition that it could have an innocent explanation. The life sentences under Section 302 and concurrent terms under Section 201 were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bihari Singh and his son Hariom were convicted in Sessions Trial 113/2011 of murdering Jyoti, Bihari's daughter-in-law and Hariom's wife, and causing evidence of the crime to disappear. On 17 February 2011, a relative reported that Jyoti had been found burned in their home. The police recorded a death inquiry, collected material from the scene and investigated the family's conduct. The doctor found fatal compression of the trachea, ante-mortem blunt injuries to the head and extensive burns. The Sessions Court imposed life imprisonment under IPC Section 302 and a concurrent one-year term under Section 201. In Criminal Appeal 513/2012, the appellants challenged the chain of circumstances, relying on the hostile witnesses and absence of an eyewitness.

2. Precedents — Considered : Babu alias Balasubramaniam v State of Tamil Nadu, (2013) 8 SCC 60, was quoted and applied on Section 106 where the prosecution had first established the basis for finding homicide in a shared home. Its quotation from Tulshiram Sahadu Suryawanshi v State of Maharashtra, (2012) 10 SCC 373, preserved the prosecution's burden of proof. Tulshiram was also separately quoted on household circumstances and permissible inferences. Trimukh Maroti Kirkan v State of Maharashtra, (2006) 10 SCC 681, supported consideration of an unexplained household death and related conduct. The nested quotation also referred to Section 114 and Mir Mohammed Omar; those passages formed part of the cited authority rather than independent factual findings in this appeal.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 374 governed the appeal, and Section 174 the initial death inquiry. IPC Section 302 supplied the murder conviction. Section 201 concerned causing evidence of the offence to disappear with intent to screen the offender. Evidence Act Section 106 placed an explanatory burden on a person for facts especially within that person's knowledge; it did not reverse the prosecution's general burden. Section 114 appeared in the cited authority on inferences from human conduct.

4. Issues : Whether Jyoti's death was homicidal despite the burned condition of her body; whether the evidence proved beyond reasonable doubt that the two appellants had caused her death and destroyed evidence, despite the absence of eyewitnesses and several witnesses turning hostile; and when a death in their household required an explanation under Section 106.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical evidence established fatal strangulation and ante-mortem blunt injuries. The absence of inflammation at the burn margins supported the finding that the body was burned after death. This evidence, together with the household setting, family relationships and flight after the incident, formed the prosecution's foundation. Several neighbours and seizure witnesses did not support its case. Once the prosecution had established incriminating circumstances permitting a reasonable inference, the appellants' failure to explain events especially within their knowledge added weight under Section 106. The Court expressly recognised that Section 106 alone could not sustain a conviction and that a person might abscond from fear of false implication. It nevertheless held the combined circumstances sufficient to affirm the convictions under both Section 302 and Section 201.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal. For each appellant, it affirmed life imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000 under Section 302, and one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 500 under Section 201, with the default stipulations. The imprisonment terms were to run concurrently. The appellants, who were in jail, were to serve the remaining sentence. A copy of the judgment was to be sent to the jail, and a copy with the record returned to the trial court for information and compliance.

Headnote :- Article 226 / pending FIR — The informant's request for arrest of the accused and addition of two respondents to Crime 384/2024 did not permit the High Court to supervise the police investigation. D. Venkatasubramaniam v MK Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was applied. Its quotation from M.C. Abraham treats arrest as discretionary and cautions against automatic arrest upon registration of an FIR. The alleged involvement of the persons whom the informant sought to add was not decided.

Prompt completion — CrPC Section 173(1) and BNSS Section 193(1), as cited in the order, require completion of investigation without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer was directed to finish it as early as possible and take the steps required by law. No arrest or final-report outcome was prescribed. Any further grievance could be placed before the Superintendent of Police, Morena. The writ petition was disposed of.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On Bijendra Singh Jadon's complaint, Sabalgarh Police Station, Morena, registered Crime 384/2024. Alleging that the police had taken no further action, he filed Writ Petition 5898/2025 under Article 226. He sought arrest of the accused, addition of respondents 6 and 7 to the FIR, completion of the investigation and a decision on his representation. The High Court considered the limits of directions concerning investigation and the duty to avoid delay.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam and others v MK Mohan Krishnamachari and another, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was quoted extensively and applied against mechanical directions for arrest, seizure and filing of a charge sheet. Its discussion relied on M.C. Abraham v State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, for the police's discretion to arrest and the caution required in exercising it. It also quoted Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on notice before drastic directions affecting other persons in the earlier case.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 supplied the constitutional jurisdiction invoked. The judgment quoted CrPC Section 173(1), paired with BNSS Section 193(1), on completion without unnecessary delay and submission of a lawful police report. The quoted Supreme Court decision discussed CrPC Sections 41 and 482 in its own procedural setting. The order did not interpret any particular offence provision or decide whether respondents 6 and 7 were culpable.

4. Issues : Whether an FIR informant could obtain directions to arrest suspects and specify additional persons for investigation; whether early completion was legally required; and how prompt police action could be secured without dictating whether the final report should be a charge sheet or a closure report.

5. Ratio / Findings : Investigation is a statutory police function. Registration of an FIR does not by itself require arrest or guarantee a charge sheet. A judicial direction specifying persons to be arrested or determining their involvement would prescribe investigative steps and could prejudice the process. The investigating officer must nevertheless conclude the investigation without unnecessary delay and take the steps warranted by the evidence and law, including submission of the appropriate report. The Court gave that limited direction and left the informant free to pursue a grievance before the Superintendent of Police. Its refusal to dictate the investigation did not bar a later lawful arrest, inclusion of persons whose involvement was supported by the investigation, or filing of a charge sheet.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the writ petition. It directed the investigating officer to complete the investigation as early as possible and proceed in accordance with law. It did not order arrest or mandatory inclusion of respondents 6 and 7. The petitioner remained free to approach the Superintendent of Police, Morena, with any grievance.

Headnote :- Article 226 / direction to register an FIR — The Court declined mandamus to register the informant's complaint because statutory remedies, including recourse to the Magistrate, were available. Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, and Shweta Bhadauria v State of MP were applied. Constitutional power remains available in rare cases of clear mala fide abuse. Shweta Bhadauria distinguished the police's registration duty stated in Lalita Kumari v Government of UP, (2014) 2 SCC 1, from an automatic entitlement to a writ without using alternative remedies.

Complaint procedure — CrPC Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 provide recourse through the police hierarchy and the Magistrate. The quoted Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre passage describes the Magistrate's inquiry and cognizance options. Writ Petition 18815/2022 was dismissed with liberty to file a criminal complaint. The Court did not decide whether the alleged offence was made out.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bijendra Singh Rajput filed Writ Petition 18815/2022 under Article 226, seeking a direction to the Bhind district police authority to ensure that Gohad police took action against respondent 4 and registered his complaint as disclosing a cognizable offence. The State objected to maintainability because criminal procedure remedies were available. The Court considered whether the requested mandamus for registration of an FIR should be entertained.

2. Precedents — Considered : Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted on exceptional constitutional directions in cases of clear mala fide abuse and the informant's ordinary remedy before the Magistrate. Its quotation from Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v State of Maharashtra explained the complaint procedure under Sections 190/200. The MP Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria v State of MP, Writ Appeal 247/2016, was applied on alternative remedies and the distinction from Lalita Kumari v Government of UP, (2014) 2 SCC 1. The State also cited Sakiri Vasu v State of UP and Aleque Padamsee v Union of India; the Court itself reproduced Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria. The quoted Division Bench rule preserved the Whirlpool exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution was invoked for mandamus. CrPC Section 154 concerned the alleged duty to register an FIR, and subsection (3) provided recourse to the Superintendent of Police. Section 156(3) concerned a direction by the Magistrate to investigate. Sections 190 and 200 provided the complaint and cognizance procedure; Section 203 appeared in the quoted passage on dismissal of a complaint by the Magistrate. The Court did not adjudicate a substantive IPC offence.

4. Issues : Whether the High Court should entertain a direct writ for registration of an FIR despite adequate criminal procedure remedies; whether the police duty under Section 154 itself displaced the alternative-remedy rule; and which remedy remained available to the petitioner.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court applied the remedy framework in Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria. When the police fail to act, the informant may approach the superior police authority or the Magistrate and file a complaint before the competent court. The Magistrate may assess whether a prima facie offence is disclosed and follow the lawful course of inquiry, process, dismissal or investigation. The police's statutory registration duty, as described in Lalita Kumari, is distinct from an entitlement to bypass alternative remedies and obtain mandamus. The quoted authorities preserved constitutional intervention for clear mala fide abuse and recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The Court dismissed this petition because an efficacious alternative remedy by criminal complaint was available; it did not decide the complaint's merits.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition with express liberty to file a criminal complaint before the competent court.

Headnote :- Section 319 CrPC / additional accused — Strong and cogent evidence led in court, exceeding the suspicion sufficient to frame a charge but falling short of the satisfaction required for conviction, justified summoning Birbal despite his omission by the police. The complainant's examination-in-chief was sufficient; the Court need not await cross-examination. Hardeep Singh v State of Punjab, (2014) 3 SCC 92, as applied in Sagar v State of UP (2022), and Sartaj Singh v State of Haryana, (2021) 5 SCC 337, governed the decision. Parallel police enquiry / alibi — The DySP's independent alibi enquiry under Section 36, conducted alongside the continuing FIR investigation, had no legal status. Deepak @ Preetam Verma was affirmed by the Supreme Court in Surendra Singh Gaur by order dated 18 January 2022. The claimed hospital alibi required proper proof at trial and could not prevent action under Section 319 on this record. Rakesh, Jitender Kumar, Sk. Sattar and Mukesh addressed the principles concerning alibi and the prosecution's burden. Process / result — The trial order recorded that the applicant was absent and no application had been filed. In those circumstances, the arrest warrant was upheld. The revision was dismissed, the interim stay vacated and expedited trial requested.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Following a quarrel concerning a motor, Ram Lakhan's FIR of 1 November 2010 alleged that a group arrived in vehicles and fired at members of his family. It specifically attributed shots from a mouser gun to Birbal alias Pappu Dhakad, with injuries to Gajendra and Rekha. During investigation, a DySP conducted a separate enquiry and accepted hospital treatment as Birbal's alibi. The police omitted him from the charge sheet. In Sessions Trial 179/2011, the First Additional Sessions Judge, Sabalgarh, allowed the complainant's application under Section 319 on 14 October 2016 and summoned Birbal for IPC Sections 147, 148 and 307 read with 149. Birbal sought revision, relying on the police statements and his alibi. He also challenged the arrest warrant as premature.

2. Precedents — Considered : Hardeep Singh v State of Punjab, (2014) 3 SCC 92, supplied the Constitution Bench threshold under Section 319 and the rule permitting reliance on examination-in-chief. Sagar v State of UP, Criminal Appeal 397/2022, and Sartaj Singh v State of Haryana, (2021) 5 SCC 337, were quoted and applied on omitted accused and evidence led at trial. Sartaj Singh's quotation of S Mohammed Ispahani and Rajesh explained the distinction between the protest-petition and trial stages. The MP High Court ruling in Deepak @ Preetam Verma on parallel enquiries, affirmed by the Supreme Court in Surendra Singh Gaur, SLP(Crl) 1345/2019, by order dated 18 January 2022, was applied to the DySP's report. Rakesh v State of Haryana, (2001) 6 SCC 248, Jitender Kumar v State of Haryana, (2012) 6 SCC 204, Sk. Sattar v State of Maharashtra, (2010) 8 SCC 430, and Mukesh v State (NCT Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, supplied the principles on examination of witnesses and alibi. The Court also recorded the applicant's reliance on several other Supreme Court decisions.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 319 permits the extraordinary summoning of a person not already accused when evidence against that person appears during an inquiry or trial. Section 36 concerns the powers of superior police officers, but did not authorise a separate parallel investigation. The FIR and statements under Section 161 were assessed against the evidence led at trial, without a final determination of guilt. CrPC Sections 397/401 governed the revision. IPC Sections 147/148 and 307/149 identified the proposed charges; their ingredients were not finally adjudicated. The arrest warrant was considered in light of the trial order's recorded absence, rather than as an automatic consequence of Section 319.

4. Issues : Whether the complainant's examination-in-chief and the FIR justified action under Section 319 despite omission from the police report, the earlier Section 161 material and the DySP's alibi enquiry; whether the alibi could be finally accepted at that stage; and whether issuance of the particular arrest warrant, instead of summons, called for revisional interference.

5. Ratio / Findings : Hardeep Singh requires strong and cogent evidence led at trial, exceeding the probability sufficient to frame a charge but falling short of satisfaction that the evidence, if unrebutted, would lead to conviction. The Court need not await cross-examination, and the person added as an accused retains full trial rights. Here, the specific firearm allegations in the FIR and the complainant's examination-in-chief were sufficient. The DySP's independent enquiry was procedurally unauthorised. The Supreme Court had distinguished a circular consistent with superior-officer powers from an impermissible parallel enquiry. The hospital alibi remained open to proof by cogent evidence at trial. The prosecution's burden to prove its case remained; failure to establish an alibi did not itself prove guilt. The order did not finally determine Birbal's guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the revision and affirmed the order of 14 October 2016 summoning the applicant under Section 319 and issuing an arrest warrant. It vacated the interim order of 18 November 2016. The trial court was asked to make every endeavour to conclude the pending trial within one year of receiving a certified copy of the order.

Birbal v. State of M.P. and Ors., Cr.R. no. 1042/2016, 22/03/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (142) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC / premature determination of disputed facts — The FIR alleged forcible entry on land, public insult by caste name and threats. The accused's competing mutation entries and denial of the incident required evidence. Amit Kapoor v Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, the Bhajan Lal principles, CBI v Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of MP v Kunwar Singh (2021) were applied on the limits of quashing allegations taken at face value.

Civil title / alleged criminal acts — Mutation entries serve fiscal purposes and do not confer title or authorise forcible dispossession. The civil decree and competing claim to the land did not extinguish the separately alleged intimidation and caste humiliation.

SC/ST Act / public view — The FIR alleged specific caste words at a public place within public view, with named persons intervening. At the pleading stage, those allegations did not warrant quashing the proceedings under Sections 3(1)(r)(s) and 3(2)(va); guilt remained for trial. The five-day reporting delay, attributed to fear, did not itself justify quashing at that stage. The petition was dismissed with a direction that the threshold observations should not prejudice the trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bisan Patel and others sought quashing under CrPC Section 482 of Sausar Police Station FIR 223/2019, alleging IPC Sections 294 and 506 and SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act Sections 3(1)(r)(s) and 3(2)(va). The complainant, who traded in oranges, claimed possession of commercial land in Khasra 61/4 and a civil declaration of title. He alleged that the petitioners came twice on 13 October 2019: first to take forcible possession and later to use specific caste insults at a public place and threaten to bury him alive. Two persons intervened. He reported the incident about five days later, attributing the delay to fear. The petitioners denied that the incident had occurred and relied on mutation in their names and rejection of the complainant's mutation application.

2. Precedents — Considered : Munshiram v State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, Teeja Devi v State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, and State of Orissa v Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, were cited against interrupting a proper investigation. XYZ v State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, and State of Tamil Nadu v S Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, cautioned against a roving inquiry before investigation was complete. S Khushboo v Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, and Amit Kapoor v Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, addressed face-value ingredients, abuse of process and the overlap between civil and criminal wrongs. Amit Kapoor synthesised guidelines from an extensive list of cited decisions. Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, reproduced the Bhajan Lal and Indian Oil principles, distinguishing a purely civil wrong from facts also disclosing an offence. Mohd Akram Siddiqui described a limited exception permitting consideration of a public document or a document whose authenticity the complainant did not dispute; no defence document resolved the disputed incident here. CBI v Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of MP v Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021, reinforced that a Section 482 court cannot try disputed facts or require an encyclopedic FIR. The cited authorities supported that procedural standard.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 482 governed quashing. IPC Sections 294 and 506 concerned the alleged abuse and intimidation. SC/ST Act Sections 3(1)(r)(s) and 3(2)(va) were the alleged caste-based offences. The mutation entries and civil decree formed part of the background. The Court did not finally determine caste intent, presence within public view, possession or the credibility of the threats.

4. Issues : Whether the five-day delay in lodging the FIR and the rival mutation entries required quashing; whether the property dispute made the alleged threats and humiliation by caste name merely civil; whether the pleaded public setting and caste words were sufficiently specific for investigation or trial under the SC/ST Act; and what weight a Section 482 court could give to contested ownership and the defence denial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The mutation order produced by the petitioners themselves referred to the complainant's decree. Mutation entries served fiscal purposes, were not conclusive proof of title and did not authorise forcible dispossession. The alleged incident occurred only four days after mutation. Taken at face value, the FIR described an attempt to dispossess the complainant, specific caste insults in public view and threats, with named persons intervening. A title dispute could coexist with those criminal allegations. The FIR attributed the reporting delay to fear and consultation with family members. Applying the limited quashing standard, the Court declined to resolve the disputed documents or assess the likelihood of conviction. It expressly reserved the evidentiary findings for trial and directed that its observations be treated as non-conclusive.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 petition, leaving the FIR and ensuing proceedings intact. It directed the trial court to decide strictly on the evidence without being influenced by the High Court's observations at the quashing stage. Bisan Patel and Ors. v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 54287/2021, 23/02/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Article 226 / police non-registration — An informant alleging fraud of Rs. 4,12,759 could not obtain routine writ directions for registration of an FIR, immediate arrest and repayment while effective CrPC remedies remained available. Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was applied on the complaint remedy under Sections 190/200 and the exceptional constitutional power to address clear mala fide abuse. Shweta Bhadauria v State of MP applied the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 and distinguished Lalita Kumari v Government of UP, (2014) 2 SCC 1, as addressing the police's duty rather than an automatic entitlement to a writ. The petition was dismissed with liberty to file a criminal complaint. The merits of the alleged fraud and the claim for repayment were not decided.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bitthal Ahirwar filed Writ Petition 14677/2022 under Article 226, alleging that persons named in several representations had taken Rs. 4,12,759 from him. He sought police consideration of the representations, immediate registration of an FIR and arrests in terms of Lalita Kumari, repayment of the money and costs. The State relied on authorities concerning alternative remedies. The Court considered the proper remedy for his grievance.

2. Precedents — Considered : Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted and applied: the ordinary remedy for police failure to act on information is a complaint before the competent Magistrate under CrPC Sections 190/200. Constitutional directions under Article 226 for clearly established mala fide abuse remain exceptional. Its quotation from Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre explained the Magistrate's options of inquiry, process and dismissal. The MP Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria v State of MP, Writ Appeal 247/2016, was quoted and applied on the alternative remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200. It distinguished Lalita Kumari v Government of UP, (2014) 2 SCC 1, on entitlement to writ mandamus. Sakiri Vasu and Aleque Padamsee were cited by the State. The Court recognised the Whirlpool exception in the quoted rule.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 was invoked for writ relief. CrPC Section 154 concerns registration of an FIR, and subsection (3) provides recourse to the superior police authority. Section 156(3) empowers the Magistrate to direct investigation. Sections 190 and 200 provide the complaint and cognizance route. The Court did not decide the ingredients of an IPC fraud offence, the exercise of arrest powers on these facts or civil restitution.

4. Issues : Whether alleged police inaction on the fraud representations justified direct writ orders for registration of an FIR, arrest and repayment despite the available criminal complaint remedies; and whether reliance on Lalita Kumari displaced the ordinary alternative-remedy rule.

5. Ratio / Findings : The quoted authorities provide a remedy before the Magistrate when the police fail to register or act on information. The statutory duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence does not by itself entitle an informant to High Court mandamus before using those remedies. Exceptional constitutional intervention remains possible for a clear mala fide exercise of investigative power. Applying that distinction, the Court refused the writ and expressly left open a criminal complaint before the competent court. It did not decide whether the money had been taken fraudulently or whether any named person should be arrested or ordered to repay it.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition with liberty to file a criminal complaint before the competent court. It granted no direction for registration of an FIR, arrest, refund or costs.

Bitthal Ahirwar v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 14677/2022, 05/09/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- False evidence / Section 340 CrPC — After dismissing a suit based on a patta it found forged and considering the evidence of B.L. Mishra, a former Tehsildar, the civil court wrote to the Collector on 28 December 2012 seeking criminal action under IPC Sections 193, 467 and 468. Mishra sought removal of the strictures and quashing of the letter, contending that a preliminary enquiry under Sections 340/344 CrPC was mandatory. The High Court applied its earlier decision in Shambhu Singh Chauhan. The Supreme Court had affirmed its conclusion that a preliminary inquiry under Section 340 is optional, in Criminal Appeal 1239/2024 on 20 February 2024. The quoted authorities, including K.T.M.S. Mohd., Pankaj Chaudhary, Iqbal Singh Marwah, Pritish, Amarsang Nathaji and State of Goa v Jose Maria Albert Vales, distinguish prima facie satisfaction and expediency from guilt. A preliminary inquiry may be dispensed with if the existing material enables the court to form that opinion. The extensive discussion of merger, recall and Section 362 concerned the different case quoted. The writ petition was dismissed and the Collector directed to proceed; Mishra's criminal guilt was not decided.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Girjaprasad's civil suit concerning khasra 1675 was dismissed, remanded on appeal and dismissed again on 22 December 2012. The civil judge found patta Ex.P/1 forged and considered that B.L. Mishra, a former Tehsildar, had given false evidence. Mishra acknowledged that the issuing signature resembled his, but denied that it was his signature. On 28 December 2012, the judge wrote to the Collector, Chhatarpur, seeking criminal action under IPC Sections 193, 467 and 468. In WP 745/2013 under Article 226, Mishra sought quashing of the letter, restraint of further action and removal of the strictures.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court extensively reproduced Shambhu Singh Chauhan v State of MP, an earlier High Court decision concerning referrals for false evidence in a separate kidnapping appeal. The Supreme Court affirmed that ruling on 20 February 2024 in Criminal Appeal 1239/2024 on the point that a preliminary enquiry before action under Section 340 is optional and the court's opinion is not a finding of guilt. The quotation considered K.T.M.S. Mohd. and Pankaj Chaudhary on prima facie material and expediency in the interests of justice; Iqbal Singh Marwah on the effect upon the administration of justice; Pritish and Amarsang Nathaji on optional inquiry and the proposed accused's lack of a right to participate at that stage; and State of Goa v Jose Maria Albert Vales on the nonmandatory inquiry. In the quoted Shambhu matter, Kunhayammed and Khoday Distilleries concerned merger after an SLP; Mohd. Zakir and Sooraj Devi concerned the review bar under Section 362; and Vishnu Agarwal and Asit Kumar concerned recall. Those issues arose in the earlier matter's recall dispute. Dayal Singh appeared in the quotation concerning another investigation, rather than Mishra's patta.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution; CrPC Sections 195(1)(b), 340 and 344; and IPC Sections 193, 467 and 468 were considered. Section 362 CrPC appeared in the quoted discussion of review in the earlier matter.

4. Issues : Whether Sections 340 and 344 CrPC required a preliminary enquiry before the civil court's referral, so that the letter and observations should be set aside. The writ petition did not determine a criminal charge of perjury or forgery. Counsel advanced no other argument after the discussion of precedent.

5. Ratio / Findings : Section 340, read with Section 195(1)(b) CrPC, requires prima facie material suggesting a covered offence and judicial satisfaction that inquiry or prosecution is expedient in the interests of justice. The court may conduct a preliminary inquiry if necessary, but may dispense with it when the existing material enables it to form that opinion. This threshold decision initiates the process; it does not determine guilt. The quoted perjury authorities concern deliberate falsehood on a material matter, rather than every inconsistency.

Mishra's only developed procedural objection was answered by the Supreme Court's binding affirmance of Shambhu on the inquiry requirement. The High Court did not try the disputed signatures or make a fresh final finding of guilt under IPC Sections 193/467/468. It found no ground to interfere with the civil court's communication.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. It directed the Collector, Chhatarpur, to proceed on the civil judge's letter of 28 December 2012. The High Court office was to send a copy of the order immediately.

Headnote :- Injured and related witnesses — Kinship and the absence of independent bystanders did not require rejection of the testimony. Applying Himmat Sukhadeo Wahurwagh v State of Maharashtra, (2009) 6 SCC 712, and State of UP v Iftikhar Khan, (1973) 1 SCC 512, the Court carefully examined Ashish's MLC, his consistent account, the absence of proved enmity with Arun and the relatives' opportunity to witness the continuing assault.

Medical-ocular conflict — Fatal sharp-edged wounds were proved. The doctor's later categorical opinion that a sword could not have caused them rested on wound shapes not recorded in his report, and he had not examined the weapon. On these facts, the Court preferred the supported eyewitness account.

Forensic link — Human blood on the sword recovered from Arun corroborated the witnesses although its group was not determined. The seizure evidence withstood cross-examination. This was corroboration, rather than conclusive identification of the blood as the victim's. The surviving appellant Arun's convictions and sentences under Sections 302/34 and 324/34 were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Three appellants challenged their convictions in Sessions Trial 411/2012 for murdering Banti alias Naveen Datt Sharma and injuring Ashish Gupta. Dilip Singh and Bobby alias Manoj died while Criminal Appeal 1054/2013 was pending, leaving the appeal to proceed only against Arun Sharma. The prosecution alleged a daylight attack by Arun and his companions with swords and a stick. Ashish, an injured neighbour, and three relatives were examined as eyewitnesses. The defence challenged their familial interest and the absence of independent witnesses, the roughly four-day delay in recording some relatives' police statements and discrepancies in their accounts. It also relied on the doctor's view that a sword was unlikely to have caused the injuries, delayed dispatch to the FSL and the failure to identify the blood groups.

2. Precedents — Considered : Himmat Sukhadeo Wahurwagh and Ors v State of Maharashtra, (2009) 6 SCC 712, was applied on assessment of interested witnesses. State of UP v Iftikhar Khan, (1973) 1 SCC 512, required careful and prudent scrutiny without rejecting partisan testimony merely because it was so described. The High Court assessed the medical testimony, seizure evidence and forensic report on the record before it.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 374 governed the appeal against conviction; the defence also raised compliance with Section 157 CrPC. IPC Sections 302/34 and 324/34 were affirmed for murder with common intention and hurt with a dangerous weapon. The original trial included charges under Section 307, but the convictions actually affirmed were under Sections 302/34 and 324/34.

4. Issues : Whether the related and injured witnesses were credible despite delayed statements, minor contradictions and the absence of independent onlookers; whether the doctor's later assertion that a sword could not have caused the wounds displaced the eyewitness account; whether human blood of an undetermined group on the recovered weapon provided corroboration; and whether Arun's convictions and minimum life sentence should stand.

5. Ratio / Findings : Ashish's MLC proved his injury, and his evidence at trial materially agreed with the FIR. No significant contradiction or personal enmity with Arun was proved. The complaints about illicit activities concerned two other appellants, not Arun. The three relatives lived nearby and reached the scene while the assault continued. Whether they had been in the adjoining room or on the chabutra when they heard the cries did not affect their account of the assault. The post-mortem recorded nine wounds, including two fatal sharp-edged injuries. The report did not describe the wound shapes, and the doctor had not examined the weapon. His assertion in cross-examination almost a year later therefore lacked a sound basis for excluding a sword. Both the seizure witness and investigating witness proved recovery of the sword. Human blood on it corroborated the direct evidence, but did not establish a matching blood group or replace the eyewitness account. The Court affirmed guilt and the sentences. Its assessment rested on the proved seizure and corroboration.

6. Relief : The appeal survived only against Arun after the deaths of the other two appellants. The Hon'ble High Court dismissed his appeal and affirmed life imprisonment with a fine of Rs. 1,000 under Section 302/34 and one year's rigorous imprisonment with a fine of Rs. 100 under Section 324/34. A copy of the judgment was to be supplied to him through the jail, and a copy with the record returned to the trial court.

Headnote :- Regular bail / police confession — B.P. was alleged to be the occupant who escaped when police intercepted a car carrying liquor. The arrested co-accused named him, but there was no other substantive identification and no test identification parade. The State could not explain how the co-accused's police confession was admissible under Sections 25–26 of the Evidence Act. With the charge-sheet filed and no criminal history, the Court granted the first application for bail under Section 439 CrPC in Crime 45/2022 under Section 34(2) of the MP Excise Act, without commenting on the trial merits. Release required a personal bond of Rs 1 lakh and one surety for the same amount, with attendance before the Court as required. Bail would become ineffective if he jumped bail. Aparna Bhat was cited only for intimation to the complainant, not for a ruling on confession or this offence. The order was to be communicated to the Superintendent of Police, Morena, and the DGP because the Court criticised reliance on co-accused statements without collecting substantive evidence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In Crime 45/2022 at Police Station Saraichola, Morena, officers intercepted a car after receiving information from an informer. One person allegedly escaped, while another was caught with liquor. The arrested co-accused named B.P. as the person who had fled. No test identification parade was held. Counsel explained that the application had mistakenly given the arrest date as 22 February; B.P. had actually been arrested on 25 March 2022. The police filed a charge-sheet under Section 34(2) of the MP Excise Act.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aparna Bhat v State of MP, Criminal Appeal 329/2021, decided on 18 March 2021, was cited only for the direction to notify the complainant of the grant of bail.

3. Statutes considered : The co-accused's police confession could not be relied on as substantive evidence in this case in view of Sections 25 and 26 of the Evidence Act. State counsel could identify no basis for admitting it.

Section 439 CrPC governed the application for regular bail; Section 34(2) of the Madhya Pradesh Excise Act was the provision under which the charge-sheet was filed.

4. Issues : Whether the first application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC should be allowed when the only alleged link identifying the applicant was a co-accused's police statement, he had no criminal history and investigation was complete with the charge-sheet filed. The question concerned custody pending trial; it did not call for a verdict on guilt.

5. Ratio / Findings : No test identification parade had been conducted, and there was no other substantive evidence identifying the applicant as the person who fled. The Court criticised the practice of filing charge-sheets against co-accused persons solely on such confessional statements without collecting substantive evidence.

The filed charge-sheet, absence of criminal history, lack of a test identification parade and absence of substantive admissible evidence against the applicant together justified bail. The Court expressed no opinion on his ultimate guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the first application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC. The applicant was to be released on a personal bond of Rs. 1,00,000 with one surety for the same amount, to the satisfaction of the Trial Court/Committal Court, and was required to appear on the dates fixed by the concerned Court. The order would remain effective until the end of trial, but would become ineffective if he jumped bail. Intimation of the grant of bail was to be sent to the complainant. State counsel Shri Pramod Pachori was directed to supply the order to the Superintendent of Police, Morena, who was to communicate it to the DGP, State of M.P., to apprise him of the police's lack of knowledge of the law. A certified copy was to be issued as per rules. B.P. v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 18487/2022, 18/04/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Pending investigation / monitoring — According to the petitioner, no final report had been filed in FIR 65/2020 even after five years. Section 173(1) CrPC required investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay. The investigating officer was therefore directed to complete it and file either a closure report or a charge-sheet. Applying Manohar Lal Sharma v Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, the Court distinguished permissible monitoring of progress from supervision that directs the content of an investigation. It expressed no opinion on guilt and did not prescribe which final report should be filed.

Separate EOW grievance / magistrate — Aleque Padamsee, Divine Retreat Centre, Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe supported recourse to the Magistrate under Section 156(3) CrPC or Section 175(3) BNSS for police inaction. Section 210 CrPC or Section 233 BNSS could be considered if a parallel complaint was filed. The Court declined to act on oral personal accusations unsupported by specific sworn pleadings. It issued no direction to the ED or CBI, which had neither been approached nor impleaded. Allotment cancellation was left to the statutory remedy under Section 64 of the cooperative legislation. The petition was disposed of.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Brajesh Chandra Mishra appeared in person in Writ Petition 10000/2025 under Article 226 concerning the Yashoda cooperative, builders and municipal allotments. He sought compliance with a municipal order, removal of alleged encroachments and development of the layout, a status report on FIR 65/2020 at Police Station University, Gwalior, investigation by the ED or CBI into alleged financial wrongdoing, and cancellation of allotments. During argument, he alleged that respondent 13, Dr Atibal Singh Yadav, had removed municipal files. He also complained that no final report had been filed in the FIR under Section 292(c) of the MP Municipal Corporation Act and Section 120B IPC, although five years had passed since its registration on 14 February 2020. He referred separately to a complaint to the EOW.

2. Precedents — Considered : Manohar Lal Sharma v Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, was applied to distinguish monitoring in rare cases to secure prompt and fair progress from supervision that directs investigative opinion and may prejudice the trial. Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, and Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, explained the private-complaint remedy and the limits on writ directions for registration of an FIR. Sakiri Vasu v State of UP, (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, addressed recourse to the Magistrate under Section 156(3) and limited monitoring. In Shweta Bhadauria, the MP Division Bench distinguished Lalita Kumari's rule on the duty to register an FIR from entitlement to bypass statutory remedies, subject to the Whirlpool exceptions quoted there. The reproduced passages also referred to All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh, Minu Kumari and Lallan Chaudhary.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided writ jurisdiction. Section 173(1) CrPC required investigation to be completed without unnecessary delay; the final report could be a closure report or a charge-sheet. Section 156(3) CrPC or Section 175(3)

BNSS provided the suggested Magistrate remedy for the separate EOW grievance. Section 210 CrPC or Section 233 BNSS could be considered if a complaint and police investigation overlapped. Sections 190/200 and 154 were referred to in the cited precedents. Section 64 of the MP Cooperative Societies Act provided a remedy concerning allotments which the petitioner had not pursued; the allotment dispute was not decided. Section 292(c) of the MP Municipal Corporation Act and Section 120B IPC identified the offences in the existing FIR, rather than findings on their merits.

4. Issues : Whether the High Court could direct completion of an investigation said to have remained unresolved for five years without supervising its findings; whether alleged EOW inaction justified a direct FIR direction or investigation by a central agency; whether serious oral accusations without specific sworn pleadings could support personal findings; and whether cancellation of cooperative allotments should be sought from the statutory authority.

5. Ratio / Findings : The delay in FIR 65/2020 attracted the duty under Section 173(1) to complete investigation without unnecessary delay. The Court directed completion and filing of either lawful form of final report, without examining the merits or choosing the outcome, consistently with the distinction between monitoring and supervision in Manohar Lal Sharma. The separate EOW grievance could be taken to the Magistrate. No direction was issued to the ED or CBI because the petitioner had neither approached them nor impleaded them. His oral attribution of the removal or washing away of files to respondent 13 lacked specific sworn pleadings and could not support action. He declined the offered liberty to file a fresh petition with specific allegations. He had also not pursued the Section 64 cooperative remedy for cancellation of allotments. These rulings rested on the procedural position and the record before the Court; they did not determine whether the personal allegations were true.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the petition and directed the investigating officer in Crime 65/2020 to complete the investigation without further delay and file either a closure report or a charge-sheet. The petitioner was given liberty to approach the Magistrate on the EOW grievance under Section 156(3) CrPC or Section 175(3) BNSS. If such a complaint was filed, the Magistrate would be free to take notice of Section 210 CrPC or Section 233 BNSS. No investigation by the ED or CBI, personal finding against respondent 13, or cancellation of allotments was ordered.

Brajesh Chandra Mishra v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 10000/2025, 01/04/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Cruelty / quashing — The husband, mother-in-law, younger brother-in-law and unmarried sister-in-law sought quashing of Crime 794/2022 at Gotegaon, the charge-sheet and RCT 1324/2022 under Sections 498A, 323, 506/34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Although cohabitation was brief, the FIR and statements under Section 161 alleged a demand for Rs 2 lakh, mental and physical cruelty for dowry, expulsion from the matrimonial home, and the husband's act of pressing the wife's neck and threatening her. His earlier complaint and the conciliation statement did not conclusively disprove these allegations; the conciliation statement recorded improper treatment. Applying Taramani Parakh, (2015) 11 SCC 260, the Court distinguished specific accusations against close relatives from merely naming distant relations. Neeharika Infrastructure, (2021) 19 SCC 401, and the other cited Supreme Court decisions precluded a trial of credibility under Section 482. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui permitted consideration, in an appropriate case, of a public document or one whose veracity the complainant did not dispute. That exception did not resolve the disputed account here. The application was dismissed, leaving truth and guilt to trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Brajesh Jhariya (Mehra), the husband, and three close relatives applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime 794/2022 at Gotegaon, Narsinghpur, the final report and RCT 1324/2022. The judgment recorded the marriage date as 26 May 2022. The wife alleged harassment for dowry on her second visit, a demand for Rs 2 lakh, and the husband's scolding, pressing her neck and threatening her on 10 June, followed by her return to her parental home. The FIR was registered on 8 November 2022 under Sections 498A, 323, 506/34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The applicants relied on her total stay of six days, the husband's earlier complaint and the conciliation proceedings.

2. Precedents — Considered : XYZ v State of Gujarat, S. Martin, Ajay Kumar Das (reproducing Bhajan Lal), Gourishetty Mahesh, M. Srikanth, CBI v Arvind Khanna, Kunwar Singh and Neeharika Infrastructure were quoted on assessing allegations at face value and the limits on weighing defence evidence. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui recognised a narrow exception for a public document or a defence document whose veracity the complainant did not dispute. Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo, Sangeeta Agrawal, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha were cited as laying down similar law, without separate factual adjudication in this order. Taramani Parakh reproduced Kailash Chandra Agrawal and Kans Raj on the need for caution before proceeding against distant relatives without specific material. It also held that the matrimonial-cruelty allegations against the close family in that case raised matters for trial and could not be quashed at that stage.

3. Statutes considered : Section 498A IPC covers wilful conduct likely to drive a woman to suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to her life, limb or mental or physical health. It also covers harassment intended to coerce her or a person related to her to meet an unlawful demand for property or valuable security, or harassment on account of failure by her or that person to meet such a demand.

Sections 323, 506 and 34 IPC; Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act; and Sections 482 and 161 CrPC were also considered.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR and collected statements disclosed triable allegations of cruelty and dowry offences against the husband, mother-in-law, younger brother-in-law and unmarried sister-in-law, or whether the alleged counterblast, brief cohabitation and claimed omissions justified quashing. The Court described the alleged incidents as having occurred within a short span of four months.

5. Ratio / Findings : The FIR specifically alleged that the husband pressed the wife's neck and threatened to kill her, and that the other close relatives subjected her to mental and physical harassment for dowry. The statements under Section 161 repeated these allegations. Her statement at the Police Paramarsh Kendra described improper treatment. The husband's complaint showed that relations were strained; it did not establish that her allegations were false. In proceedings under Section 482, the Court could neither accept the disputed defence account nor insist that the FIR contain every factual detail.

Specific allegations against close relatives which, taken at face value, disclose cruelty or dowry offences cannot be rejected by accepting a disputed defence account about the length of cohabitation, a counter-complaint or conciliation. Quashing remains available to prevent abuse of process where the necessary ingredients are absent, but that ground was not made out here. The Court applied the distinction between close and distant relatives to the specific roles alleged.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. The FIR, final report and pending RCT were not quashed and remained in place. No finding of guilt was made.

Brajesh Jhariya (Mehra) and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 24583/2023, 05/08/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- POCSO / Section 482 — A minor alleged that a neighbour repeatedly harassed her and, after she refused his proposal, hugged her, pressed her breast and threatened her and her brother. Crime 121/2021 was registered under Sections 354, 354A and 506 IPC and Sections 7/8 of the POCSO Act. The applicant claimed that the report was retaliation for his complaint about her proposed child marriage. He also relied on phone location and CCTV to support his claim that he was working at a factory in Gujarat. The Court declined to determine these disputed defence facts at the quashing stage. The State cited Lalita Kumari, (2014) 2 SCC 1, on registration of cognizable allegations. Applying State of MP v Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021, the Court declined detailed scrutiny of the merits and left proof of the alibi to trial. The complaint, taken at face value, disclosed offences, and the application was dismissed. The Court made no finding on the truth of the assault allegation or the alibi.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The child complainant alleged that her neighbour Brajesh Singh had continuously harassed her, affecting her schooling. On 29 July 2021, while she was picking lemons in a field, he proposed marriage. She alleged that, when she refused, he hugged her and pressed her breast. He allegedly said that he alone would marry her and threatened that she would otherwise be killed. He also threatened to kill her brother if she disclosed the incident. Fear and concern for her reputation kept her from telling her mother immediately. After she disclosed it to her mother, an FIR was lodged in Crime 121/2021 at Nagra, Morena, under Sections 354, 354A and 506 IPC and Sections 7/8 of the POCSO Act.

In MCRC 47582/2021 under Section 482 CrPC, the applicant claimed that he had reported a proposed child marriage, that the Child Welfare Officer had intervened and that the girl had retaliated. He relied on an earlier complaint and asserted that, on the date of the alleged incident, he was working at a diamond factory in Gujarat. He offered his mobile location and CCTV footage in support.

2. Precedents — Considered : State counsel cited Lalita Kumari v Government of UP, (2014) 2 SCC 1, on registration of an FIR upon information disclosing a cognizable offence. The Court quoted and applied State of MP v Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021, decided on 30 June 2021, on the limits of Section 482: the Court cannot examine evidence in the detail required at trial, and an FIR need not contain every factual detail. The former supported the State's submission on registration; the latter governed the limits of scrutiny. Neither determined whether the applicant was present or absent.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 354, 354A and 506 IPC and Sections 7 and 8 of the POCSO Act were the provisions invoked in the FIR. Section 482 CrPC governed the request to quash it.

4. Issues : Whether the applicant's claims of retaliation and alibi could justify quashing the FIR, which disclosed cognizable offences on its face, without a trial of those disputed facts.

5. Ratio / Findings : The alleged touching, threats and continuing harassment disclosed cognizable offences if taken at face value. The earlier report of a proposed child marriage, the alleged grudge and the alibi raised disputed factual questions. The phone location and video could be proved through cogent and reliable evidence before the trial court; they could not be assessed and decided in proceedings under the inherent power. The order made no final determination of age under the POCSO Act or of credibility.

A disputed alibi and claim of retaliation cannot be treated as established in an application under Section 482 to quash a sexual-assault complaint that discloses cognizable offences on its face. The accused may lead evidence of that defence at trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court found no ground to quash the FIR and dismissed the application.

Brajesh Singh v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 47582/2021, 09/03/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Preliminary enquiry / corruption FIR — The accused applied under Section 528 BNSS to quash Crime 56/2026 under the BNS provisions on cheating and forgery and Section 13(1)(a) of the PC Act, contending that no preliminary enquiry had preceded the FIR. The Division Bench applied CBI v Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, (2021) 18 SCC 135, which considered P. Sirajuddin, the Constitution Bench decision in Lalita Kumari, Managipet, Yashwant Sinha and Charansingh. A preliminary enquiry may be appropriate in a corruption case, depending on its circumstances, but is not an invariable condition for registering an FIR. Its omission alone does not invalidate an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence. The other submissions raised a disputed claim of good faith under Section 2(11) BNS, for which due care and attention had to be established by evidence. Counsel withdrew the application with liberty to raise the available defences at trial, and it was dismissed as withdrawn. Neither guilt of corruption nor good faith was finally determined.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In MCRC 18225/2026, Brajesh Yadav applied under Section 528 BNSS to quash Crime 56/2026 at Dinara, Shivpuri, registered under Sections 318(4), 336(3), 338 and 340(2) BNS and Section 13(1)(a) of the Prevention of Corruption Act. Counsel first argued that a mandatory preliminary enquiry had not been held before registration of the FIR. He also advanced submissions on the merits.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Division Bench extensively quoted CBI v Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, (2021) 18 SCC 135. That judgment considered P. Sirajuddin's concern for a public servant's reputation; Nirmal Singh Kahlon's observations on the CBI Manual; the Constitution Bench ruling in Lalita Kumari on mandatory registration when cognizable information is received and the circumstances permitting an enquiry in corruption cases; the observations in the concurring opinion in Yashwant Sinha; Managipet's rejection of an accused's claim to a mandatory enquiry; and Charansingh's recognition of an appropriate enquiry before registration. It explained that the CBI Manual contains administrative instructions and cannot override the Code. These authorities were discussed within the quoted Thommandru judgment.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS governed the quashing application. The BNS provisions considered were Sections 2(11), 318(4), 336(3), 338 and 340(2), together with Section 13(1)(a) of the Prevention of Corruption Act. The quoted CBI Manual was administrative material.

4. Issues : Whether a preliminary enquiry was legally indispensable before registration of an FIR in a corruption case, and whether the applicant's merits and good-faith defence could be determined on disputed material at the quashing stage. The application was later withdrawn. The order addressed the preliminary-enquiry legal point and preserved trial defences without deciding the facts alleged in the FIR.

5. Ratio / Findings : Lalita Kumari and Thommandru permit a preliminary check where the circumstances require an assessment of whether a cognizable offence is disclosed, including in some corruption cases. They do not require an enquiry in every such case or permit a general assessment of credibility before an FIR is recorded. The absence of an enquiry therefore did not vitiate this FIR. As to the other submissions, good faith under Section 2(11) BNS required due care and attention to be proved on evidence. The Court could not accept the applicant's disputed defence merely on the pleadings.

The Court left all legally available defences open for trial. Its ruling did not bar a preliminary enquiry where the circumstances warranted one.

6. Relief : At counsel's request, the Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 528 BNSS as withdrawn, with liberty to raise the available defences at trial.

Headnote :- POCSO appeal / child and forensic proof — A boy aged approximately eight said that Brijesh Singh stopped him in a field and committed an anal sexual act. His mother said that she arrived and witnessed it. His brief account at trial was consistent in substance with his fuller statement under Section 161. No external or internal injury was recorded. FSL Ex.P/1, however, detected blood on the child's anal slides, swabs and underwear and on the appellant's undergarments, and human sperm on those child samples and the appellant's slide and undergarments. No cross-examination of the chemical examiner was sought to challenge the report. The Court held that the absence of visible injury did not displace credible eyewitness and forensic evidence, and that the mother's relationship alone did not discredit her. The age evidence was unchallenged, and Section 5(m) POCSO applied to a child below twelve. The convictions under Section 377 IPC and Section 6 POCSO were affirmed; no separate sentence had been imposed under Section 377. The ten years' rigorous imprisonment and Rs 50,000 fine under the Section 6 minimum applicable to the offence were upheld.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 25 September 2013, the child, said to be about eight, went to graze cattle with his sister. She returned and told their mother that he had stayed in Brijesh Singh's field. The mother went there and said that she witnessed an anal sexual act. She shouted, and the accused fled. The child received hospital treatment, after which FIR Crime 92/2013 was lodged on 27 September. The police seized clothing and biological slides and swabs. The Bhind Sessions Court convicted the appellant under Section 377 IPC and Section 6 POCSO for aggravated penetrative sexual assault under Section 5(m). It imposed sentence only under Section 6: ten years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 50,000, with rigorous imprisonment in default of payment.

2. Statutes considered : Section 377 IPC, Sections 5(m) and 6 of the POCSO Act, and Section 374 CrPC were considered. Section 161 CrPC arose in the discussion of the child's earlier statement.

3. Issues : In the appeal under Section 374 CrPC, the defence questioned the absence of independent witnesses, the mother's relationship to the child, alleged omissions in the child's testimony and the absence of visible injury. The Court also had to consider whether the sentence called for interference.

4. Ratio / Findings : PW1 described being stopped, undressed and sexually assaulted. His earlier statement under Section 161 gave more detail but was consistent about the central act; the Court found no material omission or contradiction. PW3 Sheela Bai said that she had witnessed the act, and no hostile relationship with the accused was established. The father, PW2, had not witnessed it; his evidence concerned what happened afterwards.

PW6 found no external or internal injury and collected the child's anal slides, swabs and underwear. PW4 medically examined the appellant. FSL Ex.P/1 detected blood on the child's anal slides, swabs and underwear and on the appellant's underwear. Human sperm was detected on the child's anal slides, swabs and underwear, and on the appellant's slide and underwear. The appellant did not seek cross-examination of the chemical examiner to challenge the report. The Court considered the forensic findings together with the eyewitness evidence. The absence of external injury alone did not defeat the prosecution. The mother's testimony was assessed for credibility and was not rejected merely because she was related to the child.

The mother put the child's age at about eight and was not questioned on that point. The proved act against a child below twelve fell within Section 5(m) POCSO. The Court affirmed the convictions under Section 377 IPC and Section 6 POCSO. It treated ten years as the minimum under Section 6 applicable to this offence and declined to reduce the sentence. No separate punishment was imposed under Section 377.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the judgment and sentence dated 10 February 2015 in ST 289/2013. The appellant was to serve the remaining prison term.

Headnote :- Successive bail / delay — The eighth application for bail under Section 439 CrPC in a prosecution for murder, attempt to murder and unlawful assembly relied on custody since 29 May 2018. The seventh application had been withdrawn. The hearing order sheets disclosed several causes of delay: failures concerning summons, unavailable Malkhana articles, COVID restrictions, absent witnesses, defence requests to defer or avoid cross-examination, and Special Public Prosecutor Hemlata Arya's refusal to examine a witness who was present. As defence counsel had materially contributed to the delay, the Court refused bail without deciding the merits of the charges. In view of the prosecutor's conduct on 3 March 2022, it directed that this case be withdrawn from her immediately. The Principal Secretary, Law, and the District Magistrate, Bhind, were to review her continuation, give her a full hearing before action and report by 18 May 2022.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Brijmohan Sharma was arrested on 29 May 2018 in Crime 49/2018, Bhind, under Sections 307, 302, 147, 148, 149 and 323 IPC. Charges were framed on 2 November 2018. His eighth application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC followed the dismissal of his seventh application as withdrawn on 24 February 2022. He relied principally on delay and claimed that he was not responsible for it.

The order sheets recorded unreturned summons, the failure to examine a witness who was present, unavailable Malkhana articles, absent witnesses and the COVID lockdown. The defence also sought to defer cross-examination until witnesses on the same issue had been examined. Counsel declined cross-examination on 20 December 2019 because he was busy in another case, declined to complete it at closing time in January 2020, and relied on illness and travel in February 2022. On 3 March, another court engagement and the end of working hours were cited. On 3 March, Anil Sharma and Subedar Khan were both present. Despite repeated requests from the trial court, SPP Hemlata Arya refused to have Subedar's examination-in-chief recorded until Anil's deferred cross-examination had taken place.

2. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed the bail application. The prosecution concerned Sections 307, 302, 147, 148, 149 and 323 IPC.

3. Issues : Whether the length of custody and slow progress of witness evidence justified successive bail in light of the actual responsibility for adjournments. A separate question concerned the Special Public Prosecutor's refusal to examine a witness who was present. The truth of the homicide charge was not determined in this order.

4. Ratio / Findings : The Court examined the hearing record and found that the defence had actively contributed to the delay. The delay relied on therefore did not justify bail. It criticised the SPP's refusal to examine the witness as a failure to cooperate with the trial court in progressing the case. The conclusion rested on the delays recorded in this case.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the eighth application for regular bail. It directed that the present case be withdrawn from the SPP immediately. The Principal Secretary, Law and Legislative Department, and the District Magistrate, Bhind, were to examine her conduct and review whether her continued appointment served the interest of justice. She was to receive a full opportunity of hearing before action was taken. A report was to be filed before the Principal Registrar within one month, latest by 18 May 2022. Two copies of the order were to be given to State counsel for communication to both authorities.

Headnote :- Cheque dishonour / cheating / double jeopardy — The prosecution alleged that the sellers received Rs 16.4 lakh for land, failed to execute a sale deed and issued two dishonoured cheques to repay the money. Counsel stated that, after conviction under Section 138 of the NI Act, the parties compromised before the High Court Lok Adalat and the money was repaid. In the application to quash the separate FIR and charge-sheet under Section 420 IPC, the Court applied Sangeetaben Mahendrabhai Patel v State of Gujarat, (2012) 7 SCC 621. For the same-offence bar under Article 20(2), Section 300 CrPC, Section 26 of the General Clauses Act and Section 71 IPC, identity of offence ingredients is material; factual overlap alone is insufficient. Section 138 and Section 420 differ in their requirements of intent and procedure, so the cheating prosecution was not barred merely by the earlier cheque case. Counsel then withdrew the application under Section 482 with liberty to seek compounding before the trial court under Section 320(2) CrPC. The High Court neither found the accused guilty of cheating nor compounded the offence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : According to the prosecution account summarised by counsel, Brijnandan Deewan and the other applicants agreed to sell land after receiving Rs 16.4 lakh. They did not execute the sale deed and issued two cheques to return the money; both were dishonoured. They were prosecuted and convicted under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. Counsel said that a subsequent compromise before the High Court Lok Adalat resulted in repayment. The separate case under Section 420 IPC in Crime 551/2014 at Gwalior Kila Gate led to this application under Section 482 CrPC.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court quoted and applied Sangeetaben Mahendrabhai Patel v State of Gujarat, (2012) 7 SCC 621.

Identity of the ingredients, rather than overlap in the factual allegations, governs the same-offence bar. Section 138 NI Act carries a statutory presumption that the cheque was issued to discharge an antecedent liability and does not require proof of fraudulent intent at the time of its issue. Cheating under the IPC has different ingredients and procedural requirements. The prohibition against punishing a person twice for an identical offence remains.

3. Statutes considered : The quoted judgment discussed Article 20(2) of the Constitution, Section 300 CrPC, Section 26 of the General Clauses Act and Section 71 IPC.

The proceedings concerned Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act and Section 420 IPC; Sections 482 and 320(2) CrPC governed the quashing application and the compounding remedy respectively.

4. Issues : Whether the conviction and compromise under Section 138 and the common transaction barred prosecution under Section 420 as double jeopardy, and whether repayment justified immediate quashing on compromise. The Court did not decide whether the alleged land transaction established the ingredients of cheating.

5. Ratio / Findings : The prior cheque conviction and repayment did not, by themselves, bring the separate Section 420 case to an end. The High Court did not determine the alleged dishonest inducement in the land transaction. After the explanation of double jeopardy, counsel chose to seek statutory compounding before the trial court under Section 320(2) CrPC.

The order did not quash the FIR or charge-sheet, compound the offence, convict the accused of cheating or require the trial court to allow a later application. The Lok Adalat settlement could support a request for compounding, which remained for that court to consider under the statute.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 as withdrawn, with liberty to apply to the trial court under Section 320(2) CrPC.

Headnote :- FIR-registration writ / alternative remedy — Buddhu Lal Patel, appearing in person, sought directions under Article 226 requiring Barela police to register a case under Section 108 BNS, seize his mobile recordings, obtain the postmortem report, record statements and act against officers responsible for delay. The Court dismissed the request for mandamus, with liberty to file a complaint before the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS. Aleque Padamsee, (2007) 6 SCC 171, recognised the police duty to register cognizable information but directed an aggrieved complainant to Sections 190/200. Divine Retreat Centre, (2008) 3 SCC 542, reserved exceptional Article 226 intervention for a clear case of mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse of power and non-compliance with criminal procedure. Sakiri Vasu, (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe, (2016) 6 SCC 277, explained the remedies before the SP and Magistrate. Shweta Bhadauria distinguished Lalita Kumari's rule on registration from a direct entitlement to a writ, subject to recognised exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule. The Court made no finding on the merits under Section 108 BNS or on police misconduct, and ordered no seizure of evidence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In WP 20779/2024, Buddhu Lal Patel alleged that Barela police had not registered a case under Section 108 BNS on his complaint. He sought seizure of the mobile-phone recordings in his possession, action over delay in obtaining the postmortem report and recording statements, and other relief. He appeared in person.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, distinguished mandatory registration on cognizable information from the complainant's remedy under Sections 190/200 CrPC when the police do not act. Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, preserved rare intervention under Article 226 for a clear mala fide exercise of investigative power, while ordinarily directing the informant to the Magistrate. Its references to Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre and AIIMS Employees' Union supported that proposition. Sakiri Vasu v State of UP, (2008) 2 SCC 409, identified recourse to the SP under Section 154(3) and to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reiterated the Magistrate's powers to direct and monitor investigation. The MP Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria referred to the Whirlpool exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule and distinguished Lalita Kumari's proposition on the police duty to register. Ramesh Kumari and the other decisions reproduced within Aleque were authorities in that quotation, rather than factual findings about Patel's complaint.

3. Statutes considered : The State relied on the complaint procedure under Section 200 CrPC, identified in the order as Section 223 BNSS.

Article 226 of the Constitution and Section 108 BNS were referred to. The cited authorities also discussed Sections 154(3), 156(3) and 190 CrPC.

4. Issues : Whether the High Court should direct registration of an FIR and specific investigative steps under Article 226 when ordinary statutory remedies for police inaction were available. The Court did not determine guilt or decide whether the alleged conduct met the requirements of Section 108 BNS.

5. Ratio / Findings : The petitioner had an efficacious complaint remedy before the Magistrate, so the Court declined to order registration of an FIR through an ordinary writ petition. It did not direct seizure of the phone, collection of the postmortem report or punishment of officers, and did not find the complaint false.

The police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence is distinct from the procedure available to a complainant alleging non-registration. The complainant may pursue the police-superior and Magistrate remedies. Exceptional intervention under Article 226 still requires an established ground recognised for departing from the ordinary remedy.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition with express liberty to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS.

Headnote :- Anticipatory bail / notarized marriage affidavit — In a case under Section 376(2)(n) IPC, the State relied on the notary register showing marriage and divorce affidavits executed about five weeks apart. The applicant claimed that the prosecutrix had borrowed Rs 50,000 and falsely accused him to avoid repayment. The Court held that notarization under Section 8 Notaries Act neither solemnizes a Hindu marriage nor dissolves it: a notary is not a Marriage Officer. For the bail decision, it treated the affidavits as a fraudulent assurance of marriage affecting the adult prosecutrix's consent, invoked IPC Section 375 Fourthly and refused bail under Section 438 CrPC. The Fourthly clause quoted in the order concerns consent given when the man knows he is not her husband and she believes he is another man to whom she is or believes herself lawfully married. The Principal Secretary/competent authority was directed to initiate proceedings against the notary under Section 10 Notaries Act. Documents were to be supplied within 15 days, a final order passed within four months after following the prescribed procedure, and a report made within five months, each period running from the order date. The order did not finally determine criminal guilt or disciplinary liability.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Bundel Singh Lodhi filed his first application for anticipatory bail under Section 438 CrPC in Crime 65/2021, registered at Tyonda, Vidisha, under IPC Section 376(2)(n). He claimed that the adult prosecutrix had received Rs 50,000 and falsely accused him of rape to avoid repayment; he also relied on her affidavit acknowledging receipt of the money. Reading her statement, the State opposed bail and submitted that notary M.K. Choudhary's register and the seized documents recorded a marriage affidavit dated 8 May 2018 and a divorce affidavit dated 15 June 2018.

2. Statutes considered : The Court explained that a Hindu marriage must be solemnized through the applicable rites, including saptapadi, or custom, or under an authorized statutory marriage process; executing an affidavit does not solemnize it. Divorce requires a decree of a competent court or a recognized custom. Section 8 Notaries Act authorizes functions such as attesting instruments and taking affidavits, but does not appoint a notary as a Marriage Officer or authorize solemnization or dissolution of marriage.

CrPC Section 438; IPC Sections 376(2)(n) and 375 Fourthly; Section 10 of the Notaries Act.

3. Issues : Whether the purported notarial marriage and divorce documents justified anticipatory bail in the rape investigation, whether they had any legal effect on marital status, and what action should follow against the notary. These questions arose at the bail stage, without a full trial of consent, the alleged loan or the sexual-offence charge.

4. Ratio / Findings : In deciding bail, the Court treated the marriage and divorce affidavits executed in quick succession as a fraud that led the prosecutrix to believe she was legally married. It considered her consent affected on that basis and invoked IPC Section 375 Fourthly.

Section 375 Fourthly, as quoted in the order, concerns consent given because the woman believes that the man is another man to whom she is or believes herself lawfully married.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the first anticipatory-bail application. It directed the Principal Secretary, Law and Legislative Department/competent authority to initiate proceedings against M.K. Choudhary under Section 10 Notaries Act. The investigating officer was to supply the two affidavits and a copy of the register to that authority within 15 days from the order date. A final administrative order was to be passed within four months, and the Principal Registrar informed within five months, both periods running from the order date. The authority had to follow the procedure prescribed by the Act and Rules before passing its final order. The Court did not itself remove the notary or finally determine his disciplinary liability.

Headnote :- Separate trial / identity and recovery / acquittal — Sagar Singh was abducted in November 2007 and later found murdered. Bunty was arrested in 2009 and tried separately from the earlier co-accused. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Division Bench considered only the evidence recorded in his own trial. The FIR named five people but said nothing about a stalled jeep. PW1 claimed to know Bunty, yet first alleged in court that he had pushed the jeep. Applying Baldev Singh and Shyamal Ghosh, the Court treated this significant omission from his Section 161 statement as a material contradiction. The test identification parade could not replace PW1's missing substantive account. The purse and belt recovery witnesses gave conflicting accounts of who saw the retrieval, the box and the persons present; the articles were also readily available. Their later identification at the police station did not cure the failure to prove possession. Under Matru and Bipin Kumar Mondal, two years' abscondence was a weak circumstance without independent supporting proof. Although homicidal death was established, Bunty's involvement in the abduction, conspiracy and murder was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The convictions and sentences under Sections 120B/364/302 were set aside, with immediate release unless he was required in another case. Following Suryabaksh Singh, the Court reviewed the record despite counsel's absence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Armed men abducted Sagar Singh in a Bolero from a tea shop in Katni on 17 November 2007. His body was found about ten days later on information supplied by a co-accused. The other accused were tried first. Bunty alias Shailendra alias Guddu was arrested on 27 November 2009, a supplementary charge-sheet was filed, and he was tried separately. On 27 January 2014, the Katni Sessions Court convicted him under IPC Sections 120B and 364, imposing ten years' rigorous imprisonment for each, and under Section 302, imposing life imprisonment. Each conviction carried a fine of Rs 1,000, with six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The sentences were concurrent. He appealed under Section 374(2) CrPC. Counsel did not appear. The Court appointed an amicus curiae twice, but the amicus also failed to appear at the final hearing.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court applied A.T. Mydeen v Assistant Commissioner, Customs to confine its assessment to evidence recorded in Bunty's separate trial, although connected appeals were heard at the same time.

Following Suryabaksh Singh v State of UP, the Bench examined the record itself and heard the State. Baldev Singh v State of Punjab and Shyamal Ghosh v State of WB explained that whether a significant omission amounts to a material contradiction under Section 162 CrPC depends on its context.

The Court quoted Matru v State of UP and Bipin Kumar Mondal v State of WB on the weak and context-dependent evidentiary value of abscondence. The two-year gap alone did not prove guilt.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 120B, 364 and 302; CrPC Sections 374(2), 161 and 162.

4. Issues : Whether Bunty's presence and role in the abduction were proved; whether the identification parade, alleged purse and belt recovery, and property identification were reliable; what weight his abscondence carried; and whether the admitted homicide could be attributed to him.

5. Ratio / Findings : FIR Ex.P5(c) named five other participants but did not mention Bunty or allege that the Bolero had to be pushed. PW1 Gaurav claimed to know Bunty and alleged in court that he had pushed the jeep, although this account was absent from his Section 161 statement, Ex.D1(c). PW3 could not identify Bunty as one of those who pushed it. The officer who recorded the FIR confirmed the omission, and PW11 turned hostile.

PW1 did not testify that he had identified Bunty in the TIP, although the officer who conducted it said that he had. The Bench held that a TIP was corroborative, not substantive evidence, and could not fill that evidentiary gap. It therefore did not decide the objection to the parade's venue.

The alleged recovery of the purse and belt from Bunty's home under memorandum Ex.P18 and seizure memo Ex.P19 lacked consistent first-hand evidence. PW12 could not say where the articles had been taken from and said that nobody was in the house. PW13 had not seen the box and said that the appellant was alone in the room when he retrieved the articles. PW14 said that the appellant's mother was present and the box was open. Similar purses and belts were readily available, and the alleged visiting card was not seized. The father later identified the articles at Kotwali, but only the belt identification memo was proved. That identification could not cure the failure to prove the initial seizure. PW9's autopsy evidence established a fatal head injury and homicidal death. That finding did not establish Bunty's involvement. There was no reliable eyewitness account linking him to the abduction, no last-seen evidence, no proved possession of incriminating articles and no complete circumstantial chain. Evidence from the earlier trial of the other accused could not be imported into his separate trial. The prosecution had not proved the charged conspiracy, abduction and murder beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal and set aside the convictions and sentences under IPC Sections 120B, 364 and 302. It acquitted

Bunty and ordered his immediate release unless he was required in another case. The record was to be sent to the trial court.

Bunty v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 778/2014, 04/09/2024, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Vishal Mishra, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Criminal-side writ — father of accused / exoneration / investigation control - The allegation that his son had been falsely implicated in Crime No. 61/2025 because of political rivalry did not entitle the father to seek the son's exoneration or directions prescribing how the police should investigate. The Court applied Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, which explains, by reference to Narmada Bai and Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt, that an accused cannot choose the investigating agency or dictate the investigation. Bringing the same claim through a next friend does not ordinarily confer a greater right. Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v. State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626, reinforced the limited role of a proposed accused during investigation. Its discussion of W.N. Chadha explains that prior hearing is not ordinarily required; the accused may challenge the material at trial.

Fair investigation — Article 226 / mala fides / exceptional intervention - Romila Thapar, referring to Divine Retreat Centre, also recognises that an aggrieved person may obtain appropriate directions under Article 226 if the Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. Under State of West Bengal v. Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571, the Constitution Bench requires sparing and cautious transfer to CBI in exceptional situations; bare allegations against the local police do not suffice. The High Court rejected the father's request under the principles limiting accused control and judicial supervision of investigation.

Court-monitored investigation — monitoring contrasted with supervision - The Court applied Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, to distinguish monitoring for fair and timely progress in rare, compelling cases from directing investigative methods or conclusions. Such supervision risks compromising the trial court's independent assessment. The requested supervisory direction was refused, and the writ petition was dismissed without deciding the son's guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Champalal Dhakad filed Writ Petition No. 12274 of 2025 under Article 226 of the Constitution. His son was implicated in Crime No. 61/2025, registered at Police Station Pohari, District Shivpuri, for an alleged offence under Section 376 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The petitioner claimed that political rivalry had led to false implication and sought a free and fair police investigation that would exonerate his son. The relief is described in paragraphs 2–3 and 5. The order records appearances by the petitioner's counsel and the State's Government Advocate. The Court considered whether the father could seek exoneration for his son and whether it could direct the manner of police investigation. It did not try the alleged offences or determine the son's guilt.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court extensively quoted and adopted Romila Thapar v. Union of India, 2018:INSC:912 : (2018) 10 SCC 753, on the limits of attempts by an accused to change the investigating agency, obtain court monitoring or pursue the same relief through a next friend. That judgment restates Narmada Bai v. State of Gujarat on the accused's lack of choice of agency and Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt v. Union of India on the absence of control over the manner of investigation or prosecution. It refers to E. Sivakumar v. Union of India for the rule that an accused is not entitled, as a matter of course, to be heard in a writ seeking impartial investigation. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala distinguishes impermissible midstream substitution of an investigator under inherent powers from appropriate Article 226 directions where mala fide investigation is established. State of West Bengal v. Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571, requires exceptional, sparing and cautious resort to CBI transfer for credibility, confidence, complete justice or fundamental rights; a party's bare allegation is insufficient. Romila Thapar also cautions against evaluating disputed investigative material at a preliminary stage and identifies later remedies, including bail, discharge and quashing, where legally available. The High Court applied the rule against accused control to the father's request and found no basis for an investigative direction.

The Court then quoted Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v. State of Gujarat, 2014:INSC:139 : (2014) 4 SCC 626, on the limited procedural role of a proposed accused. Its discussion of Union of India v. W.N. Chadha, 1993 Supp (4) SCC 260, explains that investigation and proceedings before issue of process do not ordinarily require prior hearing of the accused, who cannot choose the investigative method. Its references to CBI v. Rajesh Gandhi, (1996) 11 SCC 253, and Sri Bhagwan Samardha Sreepada Vallabha Venkata Vishwanandha Maharaj v. State of A.P., (1999) 5 SCC 740, distinguish decisions about the agency and lawful further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC from a claimed right of veto or hearing. Narender G. Goel v. State of Maharashtra, (2009) 6 SCC 65, reiterates that the accused may challenge the evidence at trial despite having no investigation-stage hearing as of right. These principles form part of the Supreme Court passage reproduced and relied on by the High Court. In Prabal Dogra v. Superintendent of Police, Gwalior, M.Cr.C. No. 10446/2017 (order dated 30 November 2017), the High Court had itself applied the rule that an accused has no say in the investigation.

Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary, 2013:INSC:839 : (2014) 2 SCC 532, distinguishes monitoring for fair and timely progress from supervision of investigative methods or the investigator's opinion. Supervision could compromise the trial court's independent assessment of the police report and evidence. The High Court applied this distinction to reject the requested supervisory control, relying on the principles quoted from that judgment.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution supplied the High Court's writ jurisdiction and the asserted basis for a fair-investigation direction. Appropriate constitutional intervention remains possible on a proper showing of mala fides or exceptional circumstances, although supervisory control was refused here. Section 376 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the alleged FIR offences. The quoted Supreme Court passages discuss Sections 173(2) and 173(8) CrPC on the police report and further investigation, and Sections 202 and 204 CrPC on attendance at an inquiry and issue of process. Those provisions explain the investigation-stage distinction; no application for further investigation or a hearing in complaint proceedings was before the High Court.

4. Issues : (1) Could the father seek his son's exoneration through his own writ petition by alleging political rivalry? (2) Could a person in the accused's position require the police or High Court to select a particular agency, method or conclusion during investigation? (3) Did the requested direction seek permissible monitoring for impartial progress, or impermissible supervision of investigative steps and conclusions? The validity of the FIR's penal allegations and the son's criminal liability were not decided.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court considered the father's authority to seek his son's exoneration and the limit on an accused dictating the investigation. Under Romila Thapar, even an accused ordinarily has no say in the choice of agency or manner of investigation; presenting the same demand through a next friend does not confer that control. Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki and the authorities reproduced within it reinforce the absence of a routine right to participate or be heard during investigation. These limits do not determine guilt: later judicial remedies and the opportunity to challenge the material remain subject to their own conditions. Applying those principles, the High Court held that the father could not maintain the requested exoneration claim for his son and that the accused could not demand a chosen investigative course.

The quotation from Romila Thapar preserves appropriate constitutional directions where mala fide investigation is demonstrated and the exceptional standard for transfer. In that quoted case, the Supreme Court found that vague allegations without specific material particulars did not establish mala fide exercise of investigative power. Here, the High Court held that the father could neither maintain the exoneration request nor demand a particular manner of investigation. It did not prohibit every fair-investigation writ or decide whether the accusation was true.

Finally, Manohar Lal Sharma distinguishes limited monitoring in rare, compelling circumstances from supervision of police methods and conclusions. Monitoring protects free, fair and timely progress without directing the assessment of evidence; supervision risks pre-empting the independent trial. The Court treated the requested direction as supervisory control and held that it lacked jurisdiction to supervise the investigation in that sense. Considering the circumstances as a whole, it found no basis for directing the police.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. It ordered neither exoneration nor a prescribed course of police investigation, court monitoring or supervision. The FIR remained subject to ordinary investigation and judicial process. The order made no finding of guilt, innocence or the merits of the alleged offences.

Champalal Dhakad v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 12274/2025, 15/04/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR registration — police duty / writ remedy / alternative process - Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was applied to distinguish the duty to register a cognizable FIR from the remedy when the police do not act: the ordinary remedy for police inaction is a complaint to the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, explained the approach to the Superintendent under Section 154(3), followed by an application to the Magistrate under Section 156(3) if the FIR remains unregistered or the investigation remains deficient. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, applied that route and recognised the Magistrate's power to ensure proper investigation if prima facie satisfied. Shweta Bhadauria, the Madhya Pradesh Division Bench authority, recognised that refusal of writ mandamus for failure to use alternative remedies is subject to the recognised Whirlpool exceptions. The Court also noted the petitioner's failure to implead the Lokayukt and its Special Police Establishment.

Complaint and investigation — magistrate's remedial powers - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, relied on Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre and AIIMS Employees' Union for the remedy of a complaint under Sections 190/200 when the police take no action. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe permit a Magistrate who is prima facie satisfied to order FIR registration or proper investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC, monitor the investigation and, if necessary, recommend a different investigating officer. The Magistrate does not personally investigate. The writ was dismissed with express liberty to approach a Magistrate under Section 223 BNSS.

Fair investigation — exceptional Article 226 power - Divine Retreat Centre recognised the High Court's power to issue appropriate directions in rare cases where mala fide abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII are clearly shown. Even then, the Court cannot prescribe how the police should investigate. The High Court noted the non-impleadment of Lokayukt and its Special Police Establishment and dismissed the writ with liberty to approach the Magistrate, without deciding the alleged offences or guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Chandra Kumar Kourav alleged corruption, misappropriation and embezzlement of public money by respondents 5 and 6 in relation to 54 construction works. He said he had complained to several authorities without action. An earlier Writ Petition No. 884/2021 had been disposed of on 4 July 2022, giving him liberty to approach the Lokayukt Organisation. He thereafter submitted a complaint dated 18 August 2022, recorded as received by the Lokayukt on 23 August 2022, and asserted that it too had not been acted on. In Writ Petition No. 20442 of 2024 he requested mandamus to respondents 1–4 for an inquiry into the 54 works and a report so that guilty persons could be punished, as well as disposal of the Lokayukt representation. The petition did not implead the Lokayukt or its Special Police Establishment, although the complaint of inaction concerned that body. The High Court heard the parties and examined the proper route for a person seeking police action on alleged cognizable wrongdoing; it did not adjudicate the corruption allegation or conduct a fact-finding inquiry.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, 2007:INSC:760 : (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted for the difference between the police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence and the procedural remedy for non-registration. It identified the complaint procedure under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC as the course for an aggrieved informant. Its quoted comparison explained that Ramesh Kumari v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2006) 2 SCC 677, concerned the police obligation, whereas AIIMS Employees' Union v. Union of India, (1996) 11 SCC 582, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768, Hari Singh v. State of U.P., (2006) 5 SCC 733, and Minu Kumari v. State of Bihar, (2006) 4 SCC 359, addressed the remedial course. The present Court relied on that distinction.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, 2008:INSC:341 : (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for exceptional Article 226 intervention where mala fide investigative action and a clear abuse and breach of Chapter XII CrPC are demonstrated; even then the court cannot instruct the police how to investigate, but can insist on compliance with law. The quotation from Gangadhar reproduced in that decision described the Magistrate's options after a complaint: inquiry, police investigation where appropriate, dismissal if no offence is disclosed, or cognizance and process on a prima facie case. An ordinary grievance of police inaction does not, by itself, justify a writ.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., 2007:INSC:1243 : (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted for the course of approaching the Superintendent in writing under Section 154(3) CrPC, followed, if necessary, by an application to the Magistrate under Section 156(3) for registration or proper investigation. The Magistrate may monitor the investigation. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, restated Sakiri Vasu, including the Magistrate's discretion to recommend a change of investigating officer without personally conducting the police investigation, and discouraged routine High Court writs that bypass this route. The High Court used these principles in declining direct intervention and granting liberty to approach the Magistrate.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (Division Bench, decided 20 December 2016), was applied for the ordinarily adequate remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC. Its quoted holding expressly preserves the four recognised exceptions associated with Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1; it also distinguishes the police duty discussed in Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, from entitlement to writ mandamus without using alternative routes. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari appear within the Division Bench passage.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution supplied writ jurisdiction and the petitioner's mandamus request. Section 154 CrPC governed police registration of cognizable information, with Section 154(3) offering an approach to the Superintendent when the police station does not act. Section 156(3) CrPC provided for an application to the Magistrate for a direction to register or investigate and, where appropriate, to monitor the investigation. Sections 190 and 200 CrPC supplied the private-complaint route; the quoted Divine Retreat passage also mentioned Section 203 and Chapter XV concerning inquiry, dismissal or process. Chapter XII CrPC was discussed as the police-investigation framework relevant to exceptional constitutional intervention. The operative order specifically granted liberty under Section 223 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023.

4. Issues : (1) Whether alleged inaction on the complaint about 54 public construction works warranted High Court mandamus for an inquiry, report, punishment or registration of a criminal case, especially when the Lokayukt and its Special Police Establishment were not impleaded. (2) What statutory recourse an informant has when information disclosing a cognizable offence is not registered or adequately investigated, and what the Magistrate may direct. (3) In what exceptional circumstances Article 226 directions could nevertheless be given despite ordinary remedies, and whether such a direction could prescribe the police's investigative method. The actual truth of the corruption and embezzlement allegations, and whether any FIR should ultimately issue on proper proceedings, were left open.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court noted the earlier liberty to approach Lokayukt and the subsequently received complaint, but found that neither Lokayukt nor its Special Police Establishment had been made a respondent. On the request for police action, it held that Article 226 was not the appropriate route to seek a direction for FIR registration on this record. Aleque Padamsee distinguished the police's legal obligation on receipt of cognizable information from the informant's remedial steps after inaction. The quoted Supreme Court authorities described statutory remedies: representation to the police superior under Section 154(3), an application under Section 156(3) where the FIR remains unregistered or proper investigation has not been conducted, and complaint jurisdiction under Sections 190/200. A Magistrate who is prima facie satisfied can direct or monitor proper investigation and recommend a change of investigating officer where necessary, while the police retain responsibility for conducting the investigation. The Court's refusal of this writ did not assess the underlying criminal allegations.

Divine Retreat Centre recognised the power to issue directions under Article 226 in rare cases of clear mala fide abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII. The Court may insist on lawful procedure, but cannot prescribe the method of investigation. The Division Bench statement in Shweta Bhadauria similarly recognises exceptions to the alternative-remedy principle. The Court noted the missing Lokayukt parties and dismissed the petition with liberty to approach the Magistrate. The Court did not say that the police may ignore cognizable information, or that the High Court is invariably powerless in every unusual case. The operative order expressly granted liberty under Section 223 BNSS.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. It granted Chandra Kumar Kourav liberty to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 223 BNSS, 2023. It did not direct respondents 1–4 or Lokayukt to conduct an inquiry, decide the representation, register an FIR, punish the private respondents or submit a report. The dismissal does not decide the merits of the alleged misuse of public money.

Chandra Kumar Kourav v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 20442/2024, 23/08/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Murder — Section 300 thirdly / injury intent / objective fatality - Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, was discussed for the four inquiries: proof of bodily injury, its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury, and its sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. A separate intention to kill is not required under the third clause. Arun Nivalaji More explained Section 299 culpable homicide, the Section 300 murder clauses and exceptions, and the intention/knowledge distinction underlying Section 304 Parts I and II. Anda v. State of Rajasthan, Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P. were considered for injury sufficiency, weapon, vital part, force and context; the offence cannot be classified automatically merely because a single blow was inflicted. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak was quoted on the cumulative requirements of a sudden fight under Exception 4. The medical evidence established that both deaths resulted from firearm injuries and the murder convictions were affirmed.

Unlawful assembly — Section 149 IPC / common object / non-shooter liability - Dani Singh v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 203, was applied for the distinction between mere presence and participation in a shared unlawful object: a separate overt act by each member is not always necessary, and the object may be inferred from coordinated conduct. Kuldip Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2011) 5 SCC 324, requires an express finding of the object and its unlawfulness; Mahadev Sharma v. State of Bihar was discussed on the relationship between charges under Sections 143, 147, 148 and 149. The Bench inferred the object from the preceding assaults and threats, the group's armed return, its surrounding of the victims, the exhortation and the gunfire, and maintained liability of those who did not themselves shoot. Counsel's reliance on Bunnilal Chaudhary was rejected on those facts.

Evidence — contradictions / hearsay / medical corroboration - Mallikarjun v. State of Karnataka, (2019) 8 SCC 359, and the principles in Sunil Kumar Sambhudaya Gupta and Raj Kumar Singh quoted in that decision require the Court to assess whether an inconsistency affects the core of the prosecution case, rather than reject the evidence for trivial omissions. The Bench acknowledged hearsay testimony and differences in Deepak PW4, Ravi PW9 and Arjun PW11 on presence and shooter attribution; it found that the remaining eyewitness account of an armed group and two killings was materially supported by Dr Parihar's autopsy evidence. Counsel cited Bawan Kumar and Suraj Mal in challenging the witness accounts. Jayaseelan was cited for delay in investigation not automatically displacing credible oral proof. The three connected appeals were dismissed and the convictions affirmed; bail bonds of appellants at liberty were cancelled and surrender directed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : This common judgment disposed of Criminal Appeal No. 1049/2011 by Chandrabhan, No. 102/2012 by Ravi and Santosh, and No. 160/2012 by Ashish and Ramprakash. All challenged the conviction and sentence in Sessions Trial No. 1/2007 conducted before the Special and Additional Sessions Judge, Datia. The trial court ordered concurrent sentences including life imprisonment for murder and compensation of ₹5,000 each to the legal heirs of Mahesh Chaurasiya and Munnalal Chaurasiya from the fine deposit under Section 357 CrPC.

The prosecution account began with a dispute at a Bhandara: Ghanshyam allegedly beat Ramrati, and the complainant's side then beat Ghanshyam. On 9 April 2006 the accused party allegedly confronted Deepak Chaurasiya, assaulted him and threatened to kill him after his uncle Mahesh intervened. There was another alleged assault on Ramrati and heated exchange at Mahesh's handcart. Around 7:30 p.m. a group returned on motorcycles, some armed with country-made pistols. According to the Dehati Nalishi, Ramprakash exhorted them, Rakesh shot Mahesh in the head, Ashish shot Munnalal in the chest when he intervened, and Ravi fired a further shot that missed. The deaths occurred at the spot. The original Dehati Nalishi at Crime No. 06/2006 led to FIR Crime No. 33/2006 under Sections 147, 148, 149, 302, 109 and 115 IPC and Sections 25/27 Arms Act. Eighteen prosecution witnesses testified. The accused denied the charges under Section 313 CrPC and examined no defence witness.

On appeal, counsel argued that complainant Deepak PW4 did not consistently support his first account, other witnesses were hearsay or contradicted police statements, and non-shooters could not be held liable under Section 149 merely by presence. The State relied on the armed group, shared purpose and medical findings. The record describes Deepak PW4 as claiming to have seen the assault but also admitting that he was absent at the exact moment; his initial account and testimony also differed on the identity of the shooters. Ravi Chaurasiya PW9 and Arjun PW11 described the group and shootings but faced omissions or differences on who fired and who had which weapon. Anil PW5, Hargovind PW12 and Vijay PW13 received information from others rather than witnessing the shots. Dr K.S. Parihar PW8 documented head firearm trauma with brain damage in Mahesh and a chest firearm wound involving lung and liver in Munnalal, both causing death through haemorrhage and shock. The Bench examined these evidentiary disputes along with the group's earlier conduct and the offence distinctions; it held that the discrepancies were minor and the evidence firm on material aspects.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, was used to explain Section 300 Thirdly's four inquiries: a bodily injury exists; its nature is objectively established; the accused intentionally inflicted that very injury rather than accidentally causing it or intending a different wound; and the wound was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. The last inquiry is objective and no separate intention to kill is necessary once the required intention to inflict that injury and its fatal sufficiency are proved. Anda v. State of Rajasthan, 1966 Cri LJ 171, likewise stressed that the injury must be sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeals 1078–1079/2005 (as cited), explained the progression from Section 299 to Section 300 clauses and exceptions and, if murder is excluded, the distinction under Section 304 between intention in Part I and knowledge in Part II. The Bench confined the Section 300 inquiry to Thirdly and stated that lack of an intention to cause death does not exclude that clause when the intentional bodily injury is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.

Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, rejected the categorical reduction of the offence in every death caused by a single blow. The weapon, the part of the body injured, the circumstances and the manner of assault determine the requisite intention and the offence. Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, listed non-exhaustive indicators including weapon, vital target, force, prior hostility, chance encounter, provocation, heat of passion, unfair advantage and number of blows. Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, treated the forceful crowbar blow to the skull, together with the weapon used, the part of the body targeted and the injury caused, as evidence of intention in its own factual setting. State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, considered the single-blow issue and Exception 4 through Arun Raj, Ashokkumar Magabhai Vankar and Leela Ram; Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, also warned against mechanically reducing the offence to Section 304 merely because there was a single injury and discussed Vedanayagam and Virsa Singh. These authorities informed the Bench's legal framework; the present case concerned separate gunshots in a group attack. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, was quoted on Exception 4's cumulative requirements of absence of premeditation, a sudden fight, heat of passion and absence of undue advantage.

Dani Singh v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 203, explained that mere presence is insufficient for Section 149 liability without a common object under Section 141, although an overt act by each member is unnecessary. The object may arise or change during an episode and members' knowledge may differ. Kuldip Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2011) 5 SCC 324, requires a clear evidentiary finding of an unlawful common object. Mahadev Sharma v. State of Bihar, (1966) 1 SCR 18, addressed how the ingredients of Sections 143 and 147 relate to a charge of rioting or a charge under Section 149. The Bench applied these principles to the concerted course of events and rejected the claim that the non-shooters could not be held liable; Bunnilal Chaudhary was a defence citation in the same argument.

For witness credibility, counsel cited Bawan Kumar v. State of M.P., AIR 1994 SC 1251, and Suraj Mal v. State (Delhi Administration), AIR 1979 SC 1408, on serious discrepancies and inconsistent statements. The Bench instead applied Mallikarjun v. State of Karnataka, (2019) 8 SCC 359, which quoted Sunil Kumar Sambhudaya Gupta v. State of Maharashtra, (2010) 13 SCC 657, and Raj Kumar Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2013) 5 SCC 722: trivial inconsistencies do not destroy the credible core of the prosecution case, but a material contradiction must be evaluated in the whole evidence. Jayaseelan v. State of Tamil Nadu, (2009) 12 SCC 275, was cited briefly to reject the contention that investigative delay alone defeats otherwise credible oral evidence. The Bench acknowledged the hearsay character of PW5/PW12/PW13 and relied on the other witnesses with medical corroboration.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 299, 300 (particularly Thirdly and quoted Exception 4), 302 and 304 IPC supplied the homicide framework. Sections 141, 148 and 149 IPC governed the alleged unlawful assembly, armed rioting and constructive liability for murder committed in prosecution of the shared object or known likely to occur. Sections 147, 109 and 115 IPC appeared in the original registered case, but the appellate reasoning and affirmed convictions were focused on Section 148 and Section 302 directly or with Section 149. Sections 25/27 Arms Act appeared in the account of the investigation, including firearm seizure and sanction material. Section 374(2) CrPC supplied appellate jurisdiction; Section 313 governed accused statements, and Section 357 concerned the trial direction for payment to heirs from fines.

4. Issues : (1) Whether two intentional fatal firearm injuries, established through medical and credible ocular evidence, supported the Section 302 murder convictions rather than a lesser Section 304 classification, and whether any sudden-fight or single-blow authority altered that result. (2) Whether at least five participants shared an unlawful object to attack and kill, making non-shooting members liable under Section 149, or whether the prosecution proved only presence and the individual actions of shooters. (3) Whether the inconsistencies and omissions in Deepak PW4, Ravi PW9 and Arjun PW11, together with the hearsay nature of PW5, PW12 and PW13, made the conviction unsafe, or whether the core account remained corroborated. (4) Whether the asserted delay in FIR or investigation defeated credible oral and medical proof. The appeals also required a precise disposition for each appellant's custody status.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench set out Section 299's three mental states and the additional Section 300 characteristics of murder, drawing on Virsa Singh and Arun Nivalaji More to reject the proposition that failure to prove an express intention to cause death necessarily reduces the offence where a fatal injury was intentionally inflicted. The Supreme Court authorities on single blows required an examination of the circumstances, rather than classification by the number of blows alone. Here the physician established separate fatal gunshot injuries to head and chest. The Bench found the account of those shootings in the remaining credible witness evidence sufficiently corroborated.

On Section 149, the Court identified the five-person and common-object conditions, then considered the entire course of conduct without requiring proof that every appellant had struck an identical blow. It relied on the morning assault and death threats, renewed confrontations, the armed arrival and surrounding of Mahesh, Ramprakash's exhortation, and the gunfire against Mahesh and rescuing Munnalal. Those circumstances were found to establish a common object and knowledge sufficient for group liability, notwithstanding the direct shooting roles attributed to only some participants. It rejected the proposition that absence of a separate strike by a non-shooter required acquittal.

As to credibility, the Bench reviewed Deepak PW4's claimed presence and cross-examination admission, the differing accounts of whether Rakesh or Ravi fired the shot at the head, and PW9/PW11 differences and police-statement omissions. It considered these differences minor in relation to the core account of the armed assembly and fatal shootings. It expressly recognised PW5, PW12 and PW13 as hearsay and relied on other witnesses together with medical evidence rather than those witnesses alone. The postmortems substantiated two homicidal deaths caused by firearm injuries but did not themselves identify a particular assailant. Invoking Mallikarjun, the Bench declined to reject otherwise credible evidence in its entirety because of immaterial variations. It also rejected the alleged investigative delay as insufficient by itself to overturn the reliable oral account. In the final assessment, it found no infirmity in the trial judgment and held that the prosecution had proved the appellants' guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the connected criminal appeals and affirmed the trial conviction and concurrent sentences. Chandrabhan, Ravi and Santosh, stated to be on bail, had their bail and surety bonds cancelled and were directed to surrender before the trial court to serve the remaining sentence. Ramprakash, on bail on account of age, received the same surrender direction. Ashish, reported in jail, was directed to remain in custody to serve the sentence. Copies were ordered to the jail authorities and trial court with the record for compliance.

Chandrabhan v. State of Madhya Pradesh; Ravi and Ors. v. State of Madhya Pradesh; Ashish and Ors. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 1049/2011 & 102/2012 & 160/2012, 13/05/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.
