5. Ratio / Findings : The Division Bench accepted that conviction is legally possible on a single related eyewitness if the evidence is coherent and reliable. Guided by Shivaji Sahabrao Bobade and the related-witness cases, it distinguished normal discrepancies from contradictions going to the witness's natural presence and the truthfulness of the prosecution account. Poonam's competing explanations of whether she went to school, accompanied Pooja shopping, returned home, or set off alone on a purchase were internal conflicts about why she was at the scene. Her later claim that her mother was present conflicted with the Dehati Nalishi's description of subsequent narration to family. Although the Court acknowledged that a kick can leave no visible mark, it found her further claim of falling on a hard surface without even a scratch troubling when considered with the rest of the evidence. In cross-examination she exculpated Bhanu without explaining the change from her earlier account. Applying Karunakaran and the Jagdish Prasad analogy, the Court found the changed co-accused account and other material inconsistencies made it unsafe to treat her as an entirely reliable solitary witness. The decision rested on those material inconsistencies, rather than simply on her relationship or any one trivial discrepancy.

Given that finding, the Bench looked for reliable corroboration. The mother had initially given a police statement indicating that she had not witnessed the incident, but claimed at trial to be an eyewitness, so her testimony could not perform the corroborative function claimed. The Court also noted that no independent resident or passer-by was produced for an episode at about 6 p.m. near a frequented road and inhabited locality, without a suggested isolated or dark setting. This was an assessment of the overall proof, not a universal legal demand for an independent passer-by in every case. No other reliable eyewitness was identified.

The investigating officer Vijay Kumar Vishwakarma (PW-10) testified about the recovery of a pair of blue jeans and a black jacket, allegedly concealed under the tiled roof in a polythene bag on information from Mahendra. The seizure memo Ex. P/9 noted bloodstains. The FSL report, Article C/3, recorded human blood on the two garments labelled F/1 and F/2. But the officer said nothing about their custody after seizure, safe transfer under intact seals or receipt by the laboratory. The dispatch documents C/1 and C/2 and report C/3 were marked after prosecution evidence had been declared closed, denying Mahendra an opportunity to cross-examine him about the custody chain and seals. Without proof of those links, the Court refused to give the positive report disproportionate weight. It did not say that scientific testing can never corroborate ocular testimony or that the report was automatically inadmissible. The account of recurring eve-teasing lacked sufficient detail and, even if accepted despite the cousin relationship, did not by itself establish a motive to murder. The unreliable sole eyewitness, inadequate corroboration, custody-chain weakness and insufficient motive left reasonable doubt; the Section 302 conviction was unsustainable.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. The Bench set aside Mahendra's Section 302 IPC conviction and life sentence and acquitted him. Because he was in custody, it ordered immediate release and directed a copy to the jail authority and a copy with the record to the trial court for compliance and information. Any fine already deposited was to be refunded. It did not remand for a fresh trial or disturb the separate acquittal of the other tried persons.

Headnote :- Article 226 / direction to arrest FIR-named accused — The petitioner alleged inaction in Crime No. 282/2019 under Sections 307/34 IPC and specified SC/ST Act provisions, and sought arrest of named persons and action against police officers. The Court applied D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, including its quotation of M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649: arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised with caution because it affects liberty and reputation; registration of a cognizable FIR does not automatically require arrest. Courts ordinarily must not dictate how police investigate or direct arrest, seizure and the filing of a charge-sheet, since the investigation may lawfully end in a charge-sheet or closure. The judgment quoted the Supreme Court's warning, drawing on Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, against drastic investigative directions affecting unheard persons; the present writ did not separately decide a notice dispute. The requested arrest direction was refused.

Section 173(1) CrPC / timely completion — Police discretion as to investigative steps does not authorize indefinite delay. The State said investigation was progressing and a final report would follow. The Court required the investigating officer to conclude it as early as possible without unnecessary delay, take necessary steps according to law, and submit an appropriate final report, whether closure or charge-sheet. No deadline or predetermined prosecution result was imposed. The petitioner could submit a grievance to the Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri, for consideration according to law.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mahesh Jatav petitioned under Article 226 of the Constitution in WP No. 16905/2019. On his complaint, Police Station Karera, District Shivpuri, had registered Crime No. 282/2019 for Sections 307 and 34 IPC and Sections 3(2)(5), 3(1)(dd) and 3(1)(dhd) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, as cited in the order. He said the police had neither arrested the persons named in the FIR nor concluded the investigation. He asked the High Court to require respondent authorities 1–4 to secure their arrest, direct respondent 2 to take strict action against officers 3 and 4 for inaction, grant other suitable relief and costs. The State's status report said investigation was proceeding without delay and, once complete, a final report would be submitted to the competent court. There was no judicial finding that the alleged persons were guilty, that the officers had acted unlawfully, or that the report's description of progress was false. The Court considered the complainant's request for a particular coercive step separately from the police's statutory obligation to conclude the investigation.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was extensively quoted and affirmatively applied. In the quoted Supreme Court decision, a High Court had prescribed witness recording, arrest, seizure, document scrutiny and filing of a charge-sheet, and required completion within six months. The Supreme Court treated judicial directions on the manner of investigation as an encroachment on the police domain, particularly when there was no articulated reason and affected persons had not been heard. It stressed that investigation need not culminate in arrest, seizure or prosecution; a lawful investigation may result either in a charge-sheet or in a finding that no case is made out. Although those passages discuss Section 482 CrPC powers in the earlier case, the present Court used their investigative-restraint principle in an Article 226 writ, without purporting to exercise Section 482 power itself.

The D. Venkatasubramaniam quotation reproduces M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, on Section 41 CrPC: in enumerated circumstances a police officer may arrest without warrant, but need not do so mechanically upon registration of a cognizable case. The officer may decide after some investigation whether arrest is necessary, exercising caution because arrest impinges on liberty, reputation and status; the alleged offence and persons concerned matter. The Court applied that principle in refusing a direction for compulsory arrest. The same Supreme Court passage quotes Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, for reasonable opportunity to be heard before a judicial order likely to have drastic effects on the person targeted by directed investigation. The present Court reproduced that warning as part of D. Venkatasubramaniam's reasoning; it did not independently adjudicate whether a particular accused was entitled to notice in this petition. The quoted case also stated the limited purposes of Section 482, but the present Article 226 writ was not resolved by treating that section as its jurisdictional source.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 supplied the petition's public-law jurisdiction. Section 41 CrPC, through the Supreme Court authorities adopted in the judgment, makes arrest without a warrant a discretionary police power in the statutorily enumerated circumstances, not a compulsory result of FIR registration. Section 173(1) CrPC expressly requires every investigation under the relevant Chapter to be completed without unnecessary delay. The Court applied it to require timely completion of the investigation and submission of the final report, whether a closure report or charge-sheet, rather than leave the matter pending indefinitely. Section 482 CrPC appears within the quoted Supreme Court discussion of a different High Court order; it was not the provision under which this writ was filed. Sections 307/34 IPC and the specified SC/ST Act provisions identify the registered case but their offence ingredients or special-statute arrest rules were not construed. The judgment did not direct that the eventual police report take a particular form.

4. Issues : Could a complainant obtain an Article 226 direction requiring police to arrest FIR-named persons or effectively dictate filing of a charge-sheet while investigation was pending? What effect did police discretion under Section 41 CrPC and the Supreme Court's restraint against directing investigative steps have on that requested relief? Did the refusal to dictate arrest leave a separate enforceable duty to conclude the investigation without unnecessary delay under Section 173(1), and what limited direction was warranted in light of the State's status report? The prayer for action against individual officers was raised, but the Court did not make a misconduct finding or order disciplinary proceedings.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court expressly refused the prayer to compel arrest. It adopted D. Venkatasubramaniam's distinction between a statutory police duty to investigate and judicial supervision of the manner of investigation or directions prescribing its outcome. As explained in M.C. Abraham within that authority, Section 41 permits but does not mechanically require arrest after an FIR; investigation may inform necessity, and the decision must be made cautiously because arrest seriously affects liberty and reputation. The same investigation might properly end without seizure or a charge-sheet. Directing arrest and charge-sheet filing in this writ would therefore substitute judicial directions for the police’s investigative judgment, rather than merely require the investigation to proceed lawfully. The quoted Supreme Court criticism of ex parte coercive directions and casual observations was part of this restraint, though the present Court made no separate factual ruling on notice to accused persons.

At the same time the Court quoted Section 173(1)'s command that investigations be completed without unnecessary delay. It said the investigating officer could not keep the matter pending and must reach a conclusion whether an offence was made out, then take lawful steps and submit the appropriate final report as early as possible. The State's status report represented that investigation was proceeding without delay; the order did not decide a contested chronology or fix a completion date. Its direction concerned prompt completion and statutory process, preserving the officer's choice between charge-sheet and closure according to evidence. No adverse finding against respondents 3 and 4 or separate order compelling official action was made.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court finally disposed of the writ petition. The Court refused to direct arrest or prescribe a charge-sheet, directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take steps required by law under Section 173(1), and stated that the petitioner could apply to the Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri, about any grievance for consideration according to law. It imposed no specific time limit, disciplinary sanction, costs, compelled arrest or predetermined final-report outcome.

Mahesh Jatav v. The State of M.P., W.P. no. 16905/2019, 03/09/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Criminal incapacity / child below seven — Section 20 BNS, corresponding to Section 82 IPC, provides that an act done by a child under seven is not an offence. Applicants 4 and 5 were described as about seven and three, but their age at the alleged act had not been verified. The Court ordered the investigating officer to verify each age at that time and immediately delete from the FIR the name of either applicant found to have been below seven at that time. It did not find that the applicant said to be seven qualified, determine either child's actual age, or quash the FIR against all applicants.

Alleged forged will / civil suit / quashing — The complainant and her elder sister challenged a Will produced by rival claimants in a pending civil suit and alleged that its photograph and thumb impression were not their father's and that it had been fabricated after his death. The applicants relied on the suit and a temporary injunction to seek quashing of the FIR under BNS Sections 318, 335, 336, 338 and 340. Applying Jagmohan Singh v. Vimlesh Kumar, SLP (Cr.) 9339/2021 (5 May 2022), the Court held that a civil plaintiff's burden to establish a Will's genuineness does not prevent criminal proceedings on an allegation of its fabrication. P. Swaroopa Rani v. M. Hari Narayana, (2008) 5 SCC 765, Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, and Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of W.B., (2002) 1 SCC 555, supported simultaneous processes and refusal to suppress a criminal case merely because the facts also have a civil character. The Court refused to quash on civil pendency alone and made no finding that the Will was forged.

Civil and criminal findings / differing proof standards — Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, (2010) 8 SCC 775, Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2009) 5 SCC 528, and the discussions of Iqbal Singh Marwah and K.G. Premshanker distinguish civil proof by preponderance from criminal proof beyond reasonable doubt. Findings in one proceeding do not automatically bind the other; previous judgments may nevertheless be relevant under Sections 40–43 Evidence Act and conclusiveness depends on Section 41 where applicable. Prem Raj v. Poonamma Menon (2 April 2024) and M.S. Sheriff explain the qualified preference for prompt criminal justice without an absolute rule that every civil action must stop. The pending suit did not displace this criminal inquiry.

BNSS Sections 175 and 223 / pre-cognizance — The JMFC's 24 December 2024 direction was under Section 175 BNSS before cognizance. Section 223(1)'s suspect-hearing contention did not apply to that investigative order; Section 175 does not prescribe a prior opportunity for the suspect. Judicial application of mind to the need for investigation remains required. The challenge to the order and FIR failed, subject to age verification and conditional deletion of any under-seven child's name.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Respondent 2 and her elder sister Mahadevi said their father Brij Bihari Kaurav died on 2 June 2023. Their names were entered in the revenue records after his death, and they claimed joint possession of his property. Aniruddh Pratap Singh and Shaurya Pratap Singh filed Civil Suit No. 288/2023 on a purported Will of Brij Bihari; the daughters appeared and obtained the plaint and Will. Respondent 2 alleged that the photograph and thumb impression were not her father's and that the Will was fabricated after his death to deprive the daughters of property. The allegations, including the purported timing and falsity, had not been finally proved. On her complaint the JMFC, Lahar, District Bhind, made an order on 24 December 2024 under Section 175 BNSS directing police to register an FIR. Police Station Alampur, Bhind, registered Crime No. 05/2025 for Sections 318, 335, 336, 338 and 340 BNS.

Mahesh Kaurav and other applicants invoked Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS to quash both the FIR and the Magistrate's order. They asserted that applicants 4 and 5 were minors aged approximately seven and three, invoking Section 82 IPC/Section 20 BNS. They also pointed to the pending Will suit, RCSA No. 288/2023, and the trial court's temporary injunction of 29 May 2024 to characterize the complaint as an improper conversion of a civil dispute into criminal process. Finally, they argued that Section 223 BNSS required an opportunity of hearing for the suspect before the Magistrate's order. The High Court considered four legal questions: criminal incapacity below the age of seven, coexistence of civil and criminal proceedings over the alleged forgery, the effect of civil findings on criminal proceedings, and the stage at which the Magistrate directed investigation. No trial of the Will's authenticity or the applicants' guilt was undertaken.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jagmohan Singh v. Vimlesh Kumar, SLP (Cr.) No. 9339/2021 (5 May 2022), was directly applied. Its quoted rule recognizes that a plaintiff who relies on a Will bears the civil burden of proving genuineness, but a civil defendant may nonetheless initiate a criminal proceeding alleging that the instrument was forged or fabricated. The present Court used it to reject the proposition that the Will suit and injunction by themselves made criminal registration impermissible. P. Swaroopa Rani v. M. Hari Narayana, (2008) 5 SCC 765, was quoted for the qualified ability of civil and criminal proceedings to run simultaneously; whether either should be stayed depends on the particular facts, not an automatic rule. The quoted passage also cites M.S. Sheriff, Iqbal Singh Marwah and an accountants' association case.

Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, (2010) 8 SCC 775, was quoted and adopted for independent civil and criminal findings. It reproduces Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, (2005) 4 SCC 370, on the different proof standards: preponderance in civil litigation, prosecution proof beyond reasonable doubt in criminal litigation, and ordinarily no automatic finality or binding force across the two. Kishan Singh explains that the earlier broad Karam Chand view giving primacy to civil-court findings cannot be treated as correct law, in light of the Constitution Bench in M.S. Sheriff and later K.G. Premshanker, and expressly preserves possible relevance of previous judgments under Sections 41–43 Evidence Act. The Court applied that qualified rule against the applicants' claim that the pending suit controlled the criminal case. It did not treat every civil judgment as irrelevant.

Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2009) 5 SCC 528, was quoted in substantial detail. It explains K.G. Premshanker v. Inspector of Police: a final previous judgment may be relevant under Sections 40–43 Evidence Act, res judicata may operate in civil suits between the same parties, Section 300 CrPC addresses repeat criminal trial after conviction or acquittal if conditions are satisfied, and a civil judgment on a common cause may be relevant but is conclusive only within the statutory ambit, notably Section 41. Relevance and its effect require case-specific determination; Section 43 excludes other judgments unless their existence is itself at issue or otherwise relevant. Syed Askari also discusses why Karam Chand's general statement that civil findings bind criminal courts and the view in V.M. Shah that civil findings supersede criminal findings are incorrect, and quotes Iqbal Singh Marwah on avoiding long delay in prosecuting alleged court-related forgery. The present Court adopted the independent-proceedings and evidence-specific qualification; it did not decide a concrete claim of conclusiveness of an already rendered civil decree here.

Prem Raj v. Poonamma Menon, SLP (Cr.) No. 9778/2018 (2 April 2024), was quoted for the reconciliation of older authorities. It discusses Karam Chand, K.G. Premshanker, Vishnu Dutt Sharma, Satish Chander Ahuja and Constitution Bench Iqbal Singh Marwah, reiterating that the different standards of proof mean that findings in one proceeding do not automatically bind the other. Its reproduction of M.S. Sheriff v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 SC 397, recognizes a general public-interest preference for timely criminal justice because a civil suit can last years, but explicitly states that no hard-and-fast rule controls and particular circumstances, including a nearly concluded civil case, can justify another course. The present Court relied on it as support for allowing the criminal process to continue without treating the pending civil case as an automatic bar; it did not order this civil suit stayed. Vishnu Dutt Sharma v. Daya Sapra, (2009) 13 SCC

729, was separately quoted by the present Judge for its references to Iqbal Singh Marwah's distinct standards and P. Swaroopa Rani's approach to simultaneous proceedings based on the facts of each case, not for a new fact-specific rule about this Will. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was used to reject an extraneous civil-pendency basis for quashing an FIR. The quoted decision held that a divorce case and an interval before complaint did not justify looking beyond the FIR to quash prima facie criminal allegations; the present case concerned a Will suit, not matrimonial cruelty, and the principle applied here was the independence of criminal process and the face-value inquiry. The quoted Bhajan Lal illustrations were not separately applied as a multi-part test here. Nandkishor Laxminarayan Mundhada v. Dwarkadas Murlidhar Mundhada, 2008 Cri LJ 990, a Bombay High Court authority, was cited for a forged-Will allegation falling outside a merely civil quashing category; it was supporting, not Supreme Court precedent. Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of W.B., (2002) 1 SCC 555, was quoted for the strong restraint against quashing at the initial stage merely because civil proceedings exist; its discussion of Trisuns Chemical, Rajesh Bajaj and Bhajan Lal explains that facts may have a civil profile and still disclose cheating or another criminal offence. The Court used it to reject automatic quashing, without deciding the charged BNS ingredients or the Will's authenticity. The M.S. Sheriff preference for criminal precedence, as quoted there, retains its express exceptional qualification and does not operate as an order staying the pending suit.

3. Statutes considered : Section 82 IPC and Section 20 BNS were treated as corresponding under-seven absolute criminal-incapacity provisions. The Court quoted Section 20: an act by a child under seven is no offence. The relevant age is at commission, so a presently asserted age of three or seven is not itself a final finding. It did not decide any separate provision concerning a child aged seven or older. Sections 318, 335, 336, 338 and 340 BNS are the FIR's deception/document offences; the order did not independently analyse each offence's ingredients or pronounce a final conviction. Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS supplied the pleaded inherent jurisdiction to challenge the FIR and Magistrate order. Section 175 BNSS was the source of the JMFC's pre-cognizance order directing investigation/registration; Section 223(1) BNSS was the applicants' proposed suspect-hearing provision, which the Court held inapplicable to this earlier stage. The Court nevertheless required the Magistrate to apply judicial mind to the necessity of a direction under Section 175. The judgment refers to Section 227 BNSS in describing the later cognizance/process stage; its legal holding here is the pre-cognizance distinction, without a separately developed Section 227 interpretation. Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, 1872, were considered through the Supreme Court authorities for when previous civil/criminal judgments may be relevant, and Section 41 for its limited conclusiveness; the Court did not apply one of those sections to a final civil adjudication in this still-pending suit. Section 300 CrPC appears within the quoted K.G. Premshanker discussion as a conditional bar on repeat criminal trial, not an issue decided for these applicants.

4. Issues : First, did the assertion that applicants 4 and 5 were seven and three establish an under-seven exemption for any act allegedly committed, and what age inquiry was necessary before retaining their names in the FIR? Second, did an existing civil suit, interim injunction and civil dispute over a Will preclude investigation of the daughters' separate allegation of fabrication under the BNS? Third, were civil findings automatically binding on criminal proceedings, or must differing proof standards and the Evidence Act's previous-judgment provisions be respected? Fourth, did Section 223(1) BNSS require a suspect hearing before the JMFC issued a Section 175 pre-cognizance investigation direction; did the Magistrate still need to apply judicial mind? The Court resolved those legal objections at the quashing stage, leaving the children's ages and alleged forgery for investigation and the merits of the Will dispute for the competent proceedings. It did not determine whether this civil suit should actually be stayed.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first read Section 20 BNS alongside Section 82 IPC. An act done by a child under seven is not an offence. Applicant 5 was described as about three and applicant 4 as about seven, but the relevant inquiry was each age when the alleged act occurred. The Court ordered the investigating officer to verify both and delete the name of either found to have been below seven then; it did not accept the assertion of age as conclusive or extend the provision to someone exactly seven. This conditional relief was person-specific and did not quash the case against adults.

The Court next rejected the pendency of the civil suit as a ground for quashing by itself. The daughters challenged the Will's alleged thumb impression and photograph and asserted post-death fabrication, allegations which, if true, have a criminal dimension irrespective of inheritance litigation. Jagmohan Singh distinguishes the civil plaintiff's proof of genuineness from the daughters' capacity to report suspected forgery. P. Swaroopa Rani recognizes that civil and criminal proceedings may continue simultaneously. Pratibha and Kamaladevi warn against quashing a prima facie FIR because an independent civil proceeding is pending or the facts also have a civil character. Nandkishor was consistent on a forged-Will allegation. The existing injunction did not constitute a final determination of authenticity or displace the police inquiry. The Court concluded that criminal registration was not unwarranted merely because Civil Suit No. 288/2023 concerned the same instrument. It did not decide if the allegations would ultimately be proved, identify which applicant created a false document, or finally establish each BNS element.

Separately, the Court examined why findings in civil and criminal proceedings do not automatically bind one another. The Constitution Bench principle in Iqbal Singh Marwah, repeated in Kishan Singh, uses different burdens: civil preponderance and criminal proof beyond reasonable doubt, with each record's evidence ordinarily evaluated independently. Syed Askari and K.G. Premshanker qualify this by requiring attention to Sections 40–43 Evidence Act: some final judgments may be relevant and Section 41 can make a limited category conclusive. This rejects both automatic binding force between the proceedings and an overbroad claim that every previous judgment is irrelevant. Prem Raj reconciles the older cases and M.S. Sheriff's public-interest preference for prompt criminal adjudication, but without making that preference a fixed requirement to stay this civil suit. Vishnu Dutt Sharma reiterated the independent, fact-sensitive approach. The present controversy involved a pending civil suit, not a final decree that the Court applied as conclusive proof; this legal discussion supported refusal to terminate the FIR at inception.

Finally, the Court addressed procedure. Counsel argued that Section 223 BNSS mandated an opportunity of hearing for the suspects before the JMFC's 24 December 2024 order. The Court identified that order as one under Section 175 BNSS, directing police investigation before cognizance rather than taking the later complaint-stage step. Since Section 175 does not provide for such a prior suspect hearing, Section 223(1)'s hearing rule did not invalidate this order. This did not make the order purely mechanical: the Judge expressly said judicial application of mind is required to determine necessity of a Section 175 direction. The Court found no ground for interference on the asserted hearing defect. The order did not further adjudicate whether other procedural preconditions were met or determine the Will's genuineness.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court finally disposed of the application challenging the JMFC’s 24 December 2024 order under Section 175 BNSS and Crime No. 05/2025; it did not quash the entire case. The civil-suit and Section 223 hearing objections failed. The investigating officer was directed to verify the ages of applicants 4 and 5 at the time of the alleged offence and immediately delete from the FIR the name of either found to have been below seven. Otherwise no case for interference was found. The Court did not order a stay of Civil Suit No. 288/2023, decide the Will's validity, convict anyone, or fix a timetable for the age verification.

Headnote :- Restored complaint / successive challenge / compliance summons — The JMFC took cognizance of Section 498-A IPC on 5 December 2016. A 20 June 2017 revisional order set it aside for a perceived lack of territorial jurisdiction, but a coordinate High Court Bench on 19 November 2019 set aside that revision and restored the complaint. Notice had been issued to the present applicants, who had engaged counsel, though counsel did not appear at final hearing. The JMFC's 28 December 2020 order issued fresh summons in compliance; it was not a fresh cognizance order. The later revision against it did not give rise to a fresh cause of action to reopen cognizance, and a renewed Section 482 attack on the 2016 order already upheld by the coordinate Bench was misconceived. The judgment itself also refers once to a 28 October 2020 summons; its procedural and operative references identify the challenged order as 28 December 2020.

Complaint cognizance / prima facie sufficient ground — Applying Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, the Court held that 'sufficient ground' in Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC means a prima facie case for process, rather than evidence sufficient for conviction. The quoted discussion of Chandra Deo Singh, Kewal Krishan and Mohinder Singh confines an inquiry under Sections 200/202 to determining whether process should issue; trial-level weighing and the accused's defence await trial, while intrinsically untrustworthy or self-contradictory preliminary material may justify refusal. The complaint and complainant's Section 200 statement disclosed Section 498-A IPC allegations sufficient to proceed. The quoted Section 202(2) witness-examination issue was not an independent contested ground here.

Later divorce / disputed defence — The complaint preceded both the divorce petition and the ex parte decree. A decree obtained on 25 April 2016 could not by itself absolve the applicants of liability for the alleged conduct complained of on 13 November 2014. Assertions about eight or nine days' cohabitation, delayed report, falsity and willingness to resume marital life could not be finally adjudicated at cognizance. The application was dismissed; guilt remained for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pramila Ahirwar filed a private complaint on 13 November 2014 alleging matrimonial cruelty under Section 498-A IPC. The JMFC at Bina, Sagar, took cognizance and issued summons against Mahesh Kumar and the other applicants on 5 December 2016 in RCT No. 401066/2016. The applicants' Criminal Revision No. 1/2017 succeeded on 20 June 2017: the Additional Sessions Judge thought that, even if the allegations were accepted, the cruelty occurred within Jabalpur District and the Bina JMFC lacked territorial jurisdiction. The complainant challenged that ruling in MCRC No. 11607/2017 under Section 482 CrPC. Notice was issued to the applicants on 18 July 2017 and they engaged counsel, though counsel apparently did not attend final disposal. On 19 November 2019 a coordinate Bench of the High Court held that the Bina JMFC also had territorial jurisdiction, set aside the revisional decision and restored the complaint before that Magistrate. The present judgment did not reanalyse the underlying territorial facts or alter that earlier adjudication. After restoration, the JMFC issued fresh summons on 28 December 2020. The applicants challenged that order in Criminal Revision No. 2/2021, decided by the Second Additional Sessions Judge, Bina, on 27 February 2024. They then filed this Section 482 application challenging the original 5 December 2016 cognizance order, the 28 December 2020 summons and the 2024 revision outcome. Paragraph 9 of the judgment also refers once to summons issued on 28 October 2020, an internal date variation; the orders identified in its opening and procedural account specify 28 December 2020 as the challenged fresh summons. Counsel argued that the complaint and statements, even if read in full, disclosed no Section 498-A offence. On merits the applicants said Pramila stayed in her matrimonial home only eight or nine days, delayed reporting, made false allegations, and that they were willing to keep her with dignity. They relied on a later ex parte divorce decree. The Court separated the maintainability of reopening earlier orders from an alternative prima facie assessment, and did not conduct a final trial of cruelty or credibility.

2. Precedents — Considered : The coordinate Bench's order in MCRC No. 11607/2017 dated 19 November 2019 was an earlier binding adjudication within the proceedings arising from the same complaint. It reversed the 2017 territorial-jurisdiction revision and restored the 2016 cognizance and complaint. The present Court treated its result as precluding the applicants from reattacking the already upheld 2016 order, and identified the later fresh summons as procedural compliance rather than renewed cognizance. It noted that the applicants had notice and representation in the earlier High Court matter notwithstanding counsel's apparent absence at disposal.

Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, was substantially quoted and applied. It interprets 'sufficient ground' in Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC as a Magistrate's prima facie satisfaction that proceedings should issue, not evidence sufficient for conviction. Its discussion of Chandra Deo Singh v. Prokash Chandra Bose, AIR 1963 SC 1430, preserves a proposed accused's defence for a later stage where prima facie material exists, while acknowledging that process can be refused if preliminary evidence is self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy. Kewal Krishan v. Suraj Bhan, 1980 Supp SCC 499, distinguishes the complaint and Section 202 preliminary inquiry from meticulous trial-like weighing, and notes that its screening standard differs from that applicable at the stage of framing charges. Mohinder Singh v. Gulwant Singh, (1992) 2 SCC 213, reiterates the limited Section 202 inquiry and reserves adequacy for conviction to trial. The present Court used these quoted principles to assess the complaint and Section 200 statement as disclosing a prima facie Section 498-A case, without ruling that the complainant's account was proved.

Shivjee Singh's quoted extract lists Ramgopal Ganpatrai Ruia, Vadilal Panchal, Nirmaljit Singh Hoon and Chief Enforcement Officer v. Videocon International Ltd. as supporting citations; the present Judge did not develop separate factual tests from each. The extract also discusses the Section 202(2) proviso in a Sessions-triable complaint: its 'shall' wording does not mean omission to examine every named witness on oath invariably deprives the Magistrate of jurisdiction where prima facie material remains, since 'all' refers to the complainant's material witnesses in context. This was part of the quoted Supreme Court reasoning, but no pleaded omission to examine specified witnesses or Section 465 prejudice question was independently decided in the present Section 498-A complaint.

3. Statutes considered : Section 498-A IPC was the alleged matrimonial-cruelty offence for which the JMFC had taken cognizance; the Court found that the complaint and Section 200 statement disclosed a prima facie case, without testing every statutory element at trial standard. Section 482 CrPC supplied the complainant's earlier High Court challenge and the applicants' present inherent-power application. The prior revision and later revision were part of procedural history, but the order did not construe a specific revision provision. Sections 200 and 202 CrPC frame the complaint statement and limited preliminary inquiry; Sections 203 and 204 concern dismissal or process on sufficient grounds, and Section 209 is included in Shivjee Singh's quoted discussion of that expression. The Court did not separately decide the procedure for an exclusively Sessions-triable case. Section 202(2) and Section 465 appear in the quoted Supreme Court extract on examination of witnesses and nonfatal procedural omission, but that was not an independent issue in this complaint. The later divorce petition and decree were relevant as chronology and a defence contention, not as a statutory extinguishment of Section 498-A exposure; the judgment did not interpret a particular divorce provision.

4. Issues : Could applicants use the JMFC's fresh summons after High Court restoration as a new order of cognizance and obtain a second revision or Section 482 reconsideration of the 2016 cognizance already restored by a coordinate Bench? Apart from that procedural bar, did the complaint and Section 200 statement satisfy the prima facie 'sufficient ground' standard to proceed on Section 498-A, or could the Court at this stage adjudicate contested assertions of falsity, brief cohabitation and delayed complaint? Did an ex parte divorce decree passed after the complaint retroactively absolve the applicants from the alleged prior offence? The original coordinate Bench's territorial-jurisdiction ruling was not reopened; the applicants' ultimate guilt and the complainant's credibility remained for trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court traced the original cognizance, its 2017 jurisdictional reversal and the 2019 coordinate Bench restoration. Once that Bench had set aside the jurisdiction-based revision and restored the JMFC complaint, the 5 December 2016 order stood upheld in this procedural chain. Fresh summons in December 2020 were a procedural consequence of restoration, not a fresh taking of cognizance. The Court therefore held that no fresh cause of action arose to seek revision of the fresh summons merely to attack the revived cognizance, and the present Section 482 application could not relitigate an order already upheld by a coordinate Bench. The fact that applicants' counsel apparently did not appear at final hearing of the prior High Court matter did not lead this Judge to disregard the notice and representation or reopen the earlier result. The ruling was confined to the identity and effect of these orders, not a general ban on all subsequent procedural objections.

On the alternative merits argument, the complaint had been lodged before the divorce proceedings: 13 November 2014 versus a divorce petition on 30 March 2015 and an ex parte decree on 25 April 2016. A later decree did not absolve the applicants of possible liability for the earlier alleged criminal acts. The applicants' claims about a brief matrimonial stay, delayed reporting, willingness to accommodate Pramila in the matrimonial home and factual falsity were matters requiring proof, not reasons for the Magistrate to pronounce the complaint untrue at the initial stage. Applying Shivjee Singh's rule, the Court required sufficient prima facie ground for process, not guilt beyond reasonable doubt; the complainant's

Section 200 statement and complaint met that limited threshold for Section 498-A. The quoted Supreme Court cases distinguish screening from meticulous weighing and preserve refusal in an intrinsically untrustworthy case, but the Court did not identify such a defect here. The alternative finding reinforced the refusal to interfere while leaving the merits open.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The 27 February 2024 revisional order and the JMFC's revived complaint/summons were left undisturbed. The Court did not quash the Section 498-A complaint, remit it, decide guilt or order an acquittal. The complainant's allegations remain subject to the appropriate trial process; no separate costs or further directions were ordered.

Mahesh Kumar and Ors. v. Pramila Ahirwar, M.Cr.C. no. 11836/2024, 08/04/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (426) Prev Next

Headnote :- Matrimonial FIR / earlier divorce petition / Section 482 CrPC - A husband's earlier Section 13 Hindu Marriage Act divorce petition did not, by its chronology alone, show that the later Section 498-A IPC and Dowry Prohibition Act FIR was a counterblast. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court treated civil and criminal proceedings as independent and considered the wife's attempted reconciliation before reporting; it evaluated the allegations against each accused instead of quashing merely because of civil litigation.

Relatives / omnibus accusation / role-specific scrutiny - Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, concerned proof and indiscriminate inclusion in dowry death litigation; Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, cautioned that distant relatives need specific role and material and that omnibus allegations against brothers and sisters differ from allegations against husband and parents. Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, 2013 (1) UC 155, applied the abuse-of-process response to vague accusations in its particular delayed-FIR setting. The present Court applied their caution, along with Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, on careful scrutiny of separately residing relatives, and Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, on particulars of each accused's acts. Although applicants 4–8 lived in the same village and could not be excluded simply by distance, and applicants 9–10 lived in other cities, the collective allegations of dowry harassment and refusal of entry specified no individual conduct by applicants 4–10. The FIR, charge sheet and consequential proceedings were quashed insofar as they concerned those applicants. Arnesh Kumar v. State of Bihar, (2014) 8 SCC 273, was quoted for concern about indiscriminate implication and arrest in matrimonial cases, not applied to decide an arrest procedure issue here.

Husband and parents / triable case / no mini-trial - Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, applying the Section 482 principles quoted from Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, distinguishes allegations that are absurd or disclose no offence from a triable case and forbids a threshold credibility trial. The Court applied that distinction to the specific allegation that parents 2–3 refused entry unless the dowry demand was met and the husband's particular assault, abandonment and refusal to keep the wife. Their quashing applications failed; the Court made a prima facie threshold decision, not a finding of guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mahesh Sahu (applicant 1) was the complainant's husband. Chhakulal and Shantibai Sahu (2–3) were his parents; Harisingh Sahu (4) an uncle-in-law; Ramesh and Pradeep Sahu (5–6) elder brothers-in-law; Vimla and Anita Sahu (7–8) their wives; and Asha and Neera Sahu (9–10) married sisters-in-law. The wife alleged marriage on 22 April 2015, ensuing physical and mental harassment linked to a ₹5 lakh dowry demand, and expulsion while pregnant about eight or nine months before her report. She gave birth at her parents' home. According to her account, a social Panchayat produced a reconciliation and the husband took her to Bhopal, where he again beat her and then left her in Indore without telling her the real position. Following another complaint and assurance against dowry demands and cruelty, he allegedly still refused to keep her. She said that on 11 May 2017 she was denied entry to his Bhopal home and told to go to Pachma; at Pachma, the remaining relatives collectively refused her entry unless she brought ₹5 lakh. The report and the Court's initial summary date the latter episode 22 May 2017, while paragraph 18 calls it 20 February 2017. The complainant reported the matter on 23 May 2017. Her Section 161 CrPC statement reiterated the FIR allegations. Crime No. 429/2017 at Basoda City, Vidisha, alleged Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act; the police filed a charge sheet. The ten applicants sought quashing of the FIR, charge sheet and criminal proceedings under Section 482 CrPC. They called the complaint a counterblast to the husband's previously filed Section 13 Hindu Marriage Act divorce petition, characterised the family allegations as vague, and supplied residence documents for applicants 4–10. The State relied on the allegedly collective Pachma refusal and ₹5 lakh demand as sufficient to prosecute all. The Court examined the allegations against the husband, parents and other relatives separately at the threshold, without deciding their ultimate truth.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was quoted for the independence of civil and criminal proceedings even if they arise from the same matrimonial facts. A divorce petition and attempts to return to the matrimonial home cannot alone justify quashing the criminal allegations through extraneous considerations. The Court applied it to reject the simple chronology-based counterblast argument and suggested the wife's pursuit of reconciliation could explain her later report; it still scrutinised each accused's pleaded role.

Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, was quoted from a dowry death context: involvement of every relation cannot be inferred from kinship or conjecture, and the overt acts of persons other than the husband require proof beyond reasonable doubt for guilt. The present Court used its caution against indiscriminate roping in of in-laws at the quashing stage, without treating its trial proof standard as the governing test for quashing after the charge sheet had been filed. Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, which itself referred to Kans Raj and Raja Lal Singh, (2007) 15 SCC 415, was quoted for a pragmatic distinction: the possibility of exaggerated inclusion requires specific role and supporting material before distant relatives are summoned, and omnibus allegations against brothers, sisters and others do not stand on the same footing as those against a husband or parents. The Court applied that differential scrutiny rather than holding that every relative is automatically exempt. The quotations' references to Raja Lal Singh and Kamesh Panjiyar were nested illustrations, not separately analysed holdings adopted in this case.

Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, 2013 (1) UC 155, was quoted for quashing allegations against relatives that were extremely general, lacked assigned roles and arose after an unusually long delay in that case. The Court used its role-specific abuse-of-process principle; it made no separate six-year-delay finding on this FIR. Arnesh Kumar v. State of Bihar, (2014) 8 SCC 273, was quoted for its description of the risks of indiscriminate inclusion and arrest in Section 498-A cases. The present decision used that caution in its scrutiny of relatives; no arrest, Section 41 CrPC compliance or statistical proposition was adjudicated. Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, was quoted for careful, circumstance-sensitive scrutiny, including the different complexion of allegations against relations living in other cities and rarely visiting the couple. The Court applied this to the married sisters living separately while still testing same-village relatives by the specificity of alleged acts. Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, required particulars of the offence and each person's role rather than a bare statutory recitation; its quoted result quashed a vague complaint against parents after the principal accused husband had died. The Court applied the need for particulars to applicants 4 –10, but did not transpose that case's different facts to the living husband and parents here.

Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted for the other side of the Section 482 boundary: proceedings can be quashed when allegations are absurd, disclose no case or show abuse, but a triable case cannot be rejected by deciding reliability of version and counter-version. It distinguished Neelu Chopra, Manoj Mahavir and Geeta Mehrotra on their facts and rejected an absolute rule of immunity for relatives. Taramani reproduced Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, on restrained quashing: examine whether uncontroverted allegations and prosecution documents prima facie establish an offence; avoid meticulous assessment, conviction forecasts and a full evidentiary inquiry; do not rely on an accused's external materials to negate a broadly disclosed offence; yet intervene for patent absurdity, fundamental defects or abuse of process as circumstances warrant. The present Court used this combined threshold to retain the case against the parents and husband while allowing role-specific relief for others.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC supplied the High Court's inherent jurisdiction to quash the FIR, police report and consequential prosecution for abuse of process or failure to disclose a triable offence, subject to the prima facie standard and the limits on conducting a mini-trial explained in the quoted authorities. Section 161 CrPC was the basis of the complainant's police statement, said to reiterate the FIR; the Court did not resolve witness credibility on that statement. Section 498-A IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the alleged cruelty and dowry offences for which the police filed the charge sheet; the Court assessed whether the pleaded demand-linked acts supported continuing the prosecution against each accused, without determining guilt, statutory ingredient proof at trial or the penalty. Section 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act identified the husband's divorce petition, a civil proceeding whose earlier filing did not automatically extinguish the criminal one. The quoted Amit Kapoor passage refers to Sections 228 and 173(2) CrPC to explain restraint at charge/quashing stage; no distinct charge-framing or report-defect question was decided here.

4. Issues : (i) Did the earlier divorce petition, by itself or with the alleged reporting delay, establish a retaliatory FIR requiring Section 482 quashing, or was the criminal allegation to be examined independently? (ii) Did the collective assertion of harassment and the Pachma demand/entry refusal particularise an offence by each of applicants 4–10, especially given the same-village location of 4–8 and separate city residences of 9–10? (iii) Were the pleaded acts of the husband's parents and the husband sufficiently particular and triable to resist quashing despite relief for the other relatives? The Court considered each at the pretrial threshold, leaving proof and credibility for the criminal court. No independent arrest-procedure issue was before it.

5. Ratio / Findings : On timing, the Court followed Pratibha: a civil divorce petition and a later criminal report can coexist because the two jurisdictions are independent. Filing after the husband initiated divorce did not ipso facto establish mala fides. The Court reasoned that the wife might have first tried to preserve her marriage and reported only when reconciliation appeared exhausted. It therefore rejected the blanket counterblast submission rather than declaring every alleged incident proved.

For applicants 4–10, the Court examined the allegations in the FIR and the corresponding Section 161 statement stage by stage. The initial assertion that all family members demanded ₹5 lakh and caused mental and physical harassment did not explain how these seven persons allegedly acted. The subsequent Bhopal/Indore allegations and assurances concerned the husband himself. The asserted Pachma refusal assigned a collective demand and denial of entry to all, without identifying a specific act by any of the seven. The Court acknowledged that applicants 4–8 lived in Pachma, so it could not infer an impossibility of daily interference from distance; nevertheless, same-village residence could not cure the absence of particulars. Applicants 9–10 were married and resident in different cities, sharpening the concern about omnibus inclusion. It applied the quoted Supreme Court cautions on indiscriminate implication, individual role and surrounding circumstances to hold that continuing Section 498-A and Dowry Prohibition Act proceedings against those seven on this material would be unwarranted. Their separate-residence documents were mentioned; the reasoning did not rest on a categorical rule that documentary residence necessarily defeats every complaint. The operative quashing relates to those accused alone.

For parents 2–3, the Court found a different pleaded position. Beyond initial demand-linked physical and mental harassment, they were alleged to have personally refused entry on 22 May 2017 and threatened to bar residence unless ₹5 lakh was brought. Its reasoning treated their relationship as parents and these allegations as materially different from the undifferentiated allegations against 4–10. Applying Taramani's triable-case threshold and the quoted Amit Kapoor restraint, it would not test reliability or choose a counter-version in Section 482 proceedings. For husband 1, the Court identified particular allegations of assault, expulsion during pregnancy, Bhopal mistreatment, leaving the wife in Indore after reconciliation and a further refusal to keep her despite an assurance. It found a prima facie case for the charged provisions and similarly refused quashing. This was an accused-specific threshold assessment, not a conviction or final finding that the dowry demand, cruelty or entry-refusal allegations were true.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court partly allowed the Section 482 application. The FIR in Crime No. 429/2017 at Basoda City for Section 498-A IPC and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4, its charge sheet and consequential criminal proceedings were quashed against Harisingh, Ramesh, Pradeep, Vimla, Anita, Asha and Neera Sahu (applicants 4–10); paragraph 23 calls them discharged. Quashing was refused for Mahesh, Chhakulal and Shantibai Sahu (applicants 1–3), against whom the prosecution may proceed subject to trial. No final view on their guilt or credibility was taken. There was no order as to costs.

Mahesh Sahu and Ors. v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 2070/2018, 05/12/2018, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (427) Prev Next

Headnote :- Criminal-side writ / investigation control / arrest discretion - In an Article 226 petition arising from Crime Nos. 75/2020 and 76/2020, the Court declined to direct arrest of accused police officers or prescribe the investigative outcome. It applied D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, including the M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, passage on Section 41 CrPC: police investigation and the necessity of arrest require discretionary judgment; neither a cognizable FIR nor a writ makes arrest or a charge sheet automatic. D. Venkatasubramaniam also cautioned against directions affecting unheard persons and mechanical directions concerning investigation, though no independent notice ruling was made here. No order for investigation by an officer of a specified rank or for proclamation was granted.

Witness protection / police security / threat during investigation - On the petitioner's account that implicated officers pressured and harassed him, the Court invoked Mahender Chawla v. Union of India, recognising nationwide operation of the Supreme Court-approved Witness Protection Scheme. It ordered adequate police protection for the petitioner and other witnesses, with the Inspector General and Superintendent of Police responsible for ensuring it. The order did not decide the truth of the threat allegations.

Investigation / Section 173(1) CrPC / unnecessary delay - The statutory duty to finish an investigation without unnecessary delay justified a direction to complete it as early as possible and take lawful next steps after assessing whether an offence is made out. The Court preserved the investigator's choice of lawful conclusion, while allowing a further grievance representation to the Superintendent of Police; no fixed deadline or predetermined charge sheet was imposed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The petitioner, Makhan Singh, asserted that his son had been killed by police officers. He said an FIR in Crime No. 76/2020 at Malanpur Police Station, Bhind, had been registered only with difficulty, and his writ relief referred to both Crime Nos. 75/2020 and 76/2020. The petitioner alleged that the implicated officers remained on duty, investigation was not progressing, and they had not been arrested. His Article 226 petition asked for investigation by an officer equivalent in level to a Superintendent of Police, directions to arrest the accused, a declaration that the accused were absconding or their treatment as absconders, initiation of proceedings under Sections 82–83 CrPC, and costs. He further alleged pressure from the officers to compromise and harassment, and said his representations to the Superintendent of Police, Bhind, and Inspector General of Police, Chambal Division Morena, had not secured protection for him and witnesses. These assertions were the context for relief, not judicial findings that the police killing, obstruction or threats had been proved.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was extensively quoted. The Supreme Court in that matter set aside a High Court order prescribing police steps such as statements, arrest, seizure and charge sheet without a reasoned basis and without hearing affected persons. It explained that investigation is the police's statutory sphere; evidence may justify a charge sheet or disclose no case, and a court exercising inherent power cannot casually dictate the manner or outcome of the investigation. The passage reproduced M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649: Section 41 CrPC permits arrest without warrant in specified circumstances but gives the officer discretion, exercised cautiously because arrest affects liberty and reputation; arrest need not follow immediately on registration even for a cognizable offence. The Court applied the investigation and arrest-discretion principles to reject the requested arrest direction and explain that commanding arrest or charge-sheet filing would supervise the investigation in this Article 226 writ, although D. Venkatasubramaniam itself concerned a Section 482 order. The quotation also referred to Divine Retreat

Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on hearing those affected before drastic investigation orders, and to the limits of Section 482. Those aspects formed part of the caution against judicial directions; the present Court did not decide a separate natural-justice challenge or exercise Section 482 jurisdiction.

Mahender Chawla v. Union of India, W.P. (Criminal) No. 156 of 2016, 2018 (15) Scale 297, was identified for the Supreme Court's approval and nationwide application of the Witness Protection Scheme. The Court applied that protective framework to order security for the petitioner and other witnesses after recording his complaint of compromise pressure and failure to obtain protection. The judgment does not reproduce the Scheme's eligibility categories, threat assessment procedure or particular measures, so no finding on those details was made.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution was the source of the petitioner's mandamus request concerning investigation, arrest and protection. The Court distinguished the limits of judicial direction of police investigative discretion from permissible protection and lawful-completion directions. Section 41 CrPC was discussed through M.C. Abraham's passage as a discretionary power to arrest, dependent on statutory circumstances and necessity rather than an automatic consequence of a reported cognizable offence. Section 173(1) CrPC was quoted directly: every investigation under the relevant Chapter shall be completed without unnecessary delay. The Court used it to require conclusion and appropriate lawful action, without choosing whether the report should be a charge sheet or a no-case outcome. Sections 82–83 CrPC were part of the petitioner's request for proclamation and attachment steps concerning alleged absconders; their preconditions were not interpreted or found satisfied, and no such process was ordered. Section 482 CrPC appears in the Supreme Court excerpt about a different High Court's inherent-power order; the present petition proceeded under Article 226.

4. Issues : (i) Could the High Court, on the petitioner's allegation of stalled investigation and non-arrest, direct arrest of police personnel, investigation by an officer of a specified rank, the filing of a charge sheet or steps under Sections 82–83 in the two registered crimes? (ii) Did the pleaded pressure on the complainant and witnesses call for protective directions under the Supreme Court-recognised Witness Protection Scheme? (iii) What direction could be given under Section 173(1) CrPC to end delay while preserving the investigating officer's duty to assess the evidence and decide the lawful result? The Court did not decide whether the accused committed the alleged killing, whether they had in fact harassed the petitioner, or whether the evidence ultimately warranted prosecution.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first considered the demand for arrest. By applying D. Venkatasubramaniam, it recognised that investigation is a statutory police task and that directing arrest and the filing of a charge sheet would amount to judicial supervision of investigative steps and result. M.C. Abraham's Section 41 reasoning, quoted within that judgment, explains why an FIR alleging a cognizable offence does not oblige immediate arrest: an officer must exercise discretion with caution, taking account of the offence, persons and information emerging from investigation, and the intrusion upon liberty and reputation. A judicial order should not decide that discretionary step in advance. The seriousness of the allegation made by the petitioner and the accused officers' continued service did not alter that legal limit in the Court's analysis. The requested arrest direction was therefore unavailable. The Court also did not direct investigation by an officer of a specified rank, declare the accused absconding, order proclamation or prescribe the filing of a charge sheet. The judgment does not separately analyse a legal test for officer rank or Sections 82–83, so the absence of those orders is stated as disposition, not a broad holding on all future applications.

The Court next addressed the distinct safety concern. It recorded the petitioner's account of pressure to compromise and harassment and his unsuccessful representations to the senior officers. Citing Mahender Chawla's nationwide Witness Protection Scheme approval, it directed adequate police protection to him and other witnesses. It placed responsibility on the Inspector General, Chambal Division Morena, and Superintendent of Police, Bhind, to ensure compliance. This was a protective public-law response to reported risk, not proof of a substantive offence or an arrest mandate.

Finally, the Court quoted Section 173(1) and treated its command against unnecessary delay as mandatory. The investigating officer could not leave the FIRs pending without concluding whether an offence was made out. It ordered completion as early as possible and steps required under law after that assessment. The Court thus directed timely completion according to law in response to the petitioner's concern about inaction, while leaving the evidentiary conclusion to the investigator. No particular six-month period or other calendar deadline was fixed. For later grievances the petitioner was allowed to apply to the Superintendent of Police, who was to consider them according to law.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the Article 226 petition. The Court refused to command the accused officers' arrest and did not grant the requested rank-specific investigation, abscondence declaration, Sections 82–83 process or predetermined charge sheet. It directed respondents to furnish adequate police protection to the petitioner and other witnesses under the cited witness-protection authority, with the Inspector General and Superintendent of Police responsible for ensuring it. The investigating officer was directed to conclude the investigation as early as possible without unnecessary delay and then take lawful steps; a further grievance could be made to the Superintendent of Police. A copy of the order was to be sent immediately to the two senior officers for information and compliance. No costs award or finding on the alleged killing was made.

Makhan Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 13859/2020, 25/09/2020, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (428) Prev Next

Headnote :- Closure report / offence-wise review / IPC and SC/ST Act - The Special Judge rejected the police closure report for Sections 147 and 427/34 IPC but accepted it for Section 294 IPC and Section 3(1)(x) of the SC/ST Act. As the complainant did not challenge acceptance of the closure report for the latter offences, the High Court confined its review to its rejection for the former offences. Allegations that the accused persons had pelted stones and caused damage of at least ₹50 to the house wall and doors provided a prima facie basis for an offence under Section 427; the applicants' reliance on contrary witness affidavits and their allegation of an ulterior motive were not finally assessed. The rejection of the closure report for the specified IPC offences was upheld.

Unlawful assembly / rioting / Section 34 IPC - Sections 141, 146 and 147 IPC require an unlawful assembly of at least five persons, a qualifying common object, and force or violence in prosecution of that object. On the allegations that five accused persons had pelted stones, the Court upheld cognizance of rioting and considered a separate invocation of Section 34 unnecessary at that stage. It observed that, if the evidence later showed that some accused were not involved, Section 34 might still be invoked against the remaining persons on proof of common intention. The order did not finally determine whether common object or common intention had been proved.

Cognizance / sufficient ground / no meticulous evidence weighing - Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, was applied to distinguish prima facie grounds for proceeding under Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC from the proof required for conviction. The quoted passages discussing Chandra Deo Singh, Kewal Krishan and Mohinder Singh permit refusal of process where the preliminary material is intrinsically untrustworthy, but prohibit turning the inquiry into a full trial. The applicants' reliance on disputed affidavits did not persuade the High Court to interfere with the Special Judge's order taking cognizance. The point concerning examination of witnesses under Section 202(2), discussed in the quotation, was not independently decided.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajkumar Sonkar alleged in a complaint under Section 200 CrPC that, on 17 July 2008, two accused persons stopped his son as he returned from school near Satyam Tower, insulted and intimidated him by referring to his caste, and assaulted him, causing bleeding and swelling around his lip and face. According to the complainant, his son returned home and reported the incident. The complainant went to Ranjhi Police Station. When he returned after obtaining treatment for his son, his wife allegedly reported that the accused persons had come to their home, pelted stones, used obscene language, insulted and intimidated them, and damaged a wall and doors. He named two persons who, according to him, had witnessed the later incident. The complaint alleged that the accused called them lowly and threatened to make it difficult for them to live. He complained of police delay and political influence and referred to an earlier writ directing the Superintendent of Police to act. The judgment did not treat those allegations as proved.

Police ultimately registered Crime No. 29/2013 and filed a closure report after investigation. On 23

March 2017, a Magistrate returned the report for presentation to the competent court. By order dated 22 September 2017 in MJC No. 599/2017, the Special Judge (SC/ST Act), Jabalpur, accepted the closure report for Section 294 IPC and Section 3(1)(x) of the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989, but rejected it for Sections 147 and 427 read with Section 34 IPC and took cognizance. Mala Chatterjee and the other accused challenged that rejection under Section 482 CrPC. They contended that witnesses named in the FIR had submitted affidavits to the investigating officer denying that any incident had occurred, that the complainant's criminal history and motive to settle scores discredited the case, and that, even if the closure report were rejected, the Special Judge should have sent the case back to a Magistrate instead of taking cognizance. The complainant had not challenged acceptance of the closure report for the other offences. The reasoned decision concerns the application by Mala Chatterjee and the other applicants.

2. Precedents — Considered : Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, was quoted and applied to explain 'sufficient ground' under Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC. The Supreme Court distinguished satisfaction that a prima facie case exists for issuing process from the sufficiency of proof for conviction. The quoted passage referred to a line of cases, including Ramgopal Ganpatrai Ruia, Vadilal Panchal, Nirmaljit Singh Hoon and Chief Enforcement Officer v. Videocon, in support of that standard; the High Court did not independently analyse those cases. The quoted discussion explained Chandra Deo Singh v. Prokash Chandra Bose, AIR 1963 SC 1430, as requiring process where prima facie evidence exists despite a possible defence, while permitting refusal where the complainant's material is self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy. It explained Kewal Krishan v. Suraj Bhan, 1980 Supp SCC 499, as limiting preliminary scrutiny under Sections 200–204 to a cursory assessment of prima facie evidence, without the meticulous weighing undertaken at trial, particularly in the context of cases triable exclusively by a Court of Session discussed in the quotation. Mohinder Singh v. Gulwant Singh, (1992) 2 SCC 213, reinforced that an inquiry under Section 202 determines whether process should issue, rather than guilt or the adequacy of evidence for conviction. The High Court applied these principles in declining to conduct a detailed evidentiary inquiry into the contrary affidavits at the stage of cognizance and the Section 482 challenge. The passage also reproduced Shivjee Singh's construction of the proviso to Section 202(2), including the qualification of 'all' by 'his' and the effect of not examining some witnesses. However, no ground concerning non-examination of witnesses was raised and separately decided in the present case.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 141, 146 and 147 IPC respectively define an unlawful assembly, provide for rioting where force or violence is used in prosecution of its specified common object, and prescribe punishment for rioting. The Court noted that there were five accused persons and allegations of collective stone pelting. Cognizance of mischief to property had been taken with the aid of Section 34 IPC. The Court considered a separate invocation of common intention unnecessary once cognizance of rioting had been taken at that stage, but recognised its possible relevance if the evidence later showed that fewer accused persons were involved. The alleged stone damage of at least ₹50 to the wall and doors provided a prima facie basis for Section 427 IPC. The closure report had been accepted for Section 294 IPC and Section 3(1)(x) of the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act; the merits of those offences fell outside the application because the complainant had not challenged that acceptance. The original complaint also mentioned other provisions of that Act, but the Court did not interpret them. Sections 200, 202–204 and 209 CrPC arose in the context of the complaint and issue of process and in the standard quoted from Shivjee Singh. The decision applied the distinction between a prima facie basis for cognizance and proof for conviction; it did not separately decide a dispute about examination of witnesses under Section 202(2). The applicants challenged the Special Judge's order under Section 482 CrPC, and the limited review concerned whether taking cognizance and rejecting the closure report warranted interference.

4. Issues : (i) Did the allegations in the complaint provide sufficient grounds to reject the police closure report and proceed under Sections 147 and 427 IPC, despite the defence reliance on affidavits denying the incident and an asserted ulterior motive? (ii) Did the allegation that five persons had pelted stones support cognizance of rioting, and was a separate invocation of Section 34 needed at that stage, given its possible relevance if the evidence later showed that fewer accused persons were involved? (iii) Did the Special Judge's decision to take cognizance, instead of sending the case concerning the rejected part of the closure report to a Magistrate, warrant interference under Section 482? The Court confined its analysis to the rejected part of the closure report. It did not reopen acceptance of closure for Section 294 IPC and the SC/ST Act offence or decide guilt.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court confined its review to the part of the order dated 22 September 2017 adverse to the accused, recording that the complainant had not appealed against or otherwise challenged acceptance of the closure report for Section 294 IPC and the SC/ST Act offence. In relation to the remaining offences, the Court identified specific allegations that stones had struck and damaged the wall and doors, causing a loss of ₹50 or more. Those allegations provided a prima facie basis for an offence under Section 427; the Court did not finally determine the amount of damage or the credibility of the allegations. The alleged group comprised five persons. The Court set out the minimum of five persons and the qualifying common object required by Section 141, the use of violence in prosecution of that object under Section 146, and the punishment under Section 147. Applying those provisions to the allegations of stone pelting by the group, the Court upheld cognizance of rioting.

The Special Judge's order referred to Sections 147 and 427 read with Section 34. The High Court observed that, once cognizance under Section 147 had been taken on the allegation of an assembly of five persons, a separate invocation of Section 34 was unnecessary at that stage. This did not finally exclude liability based on common intention: if the trial evidence showed that some of the five accused were not involved and should be acquitted, the remaining participants could be punished with the aid of Section 34, depending on the facts established by that evidence. The distinction concerned the stage of the proceedings and the alternative bases of liability; no final finding of liability on either basis was made.

In declining the requested reassessment of the affidavits and the alleged motive of the complainant, the Court applied the prima facie standard for issuing process stated in Shivjee Singh. The accused persons' denial and their account of what the witnesses had stated were not matters for meticulous assessment at the stage of cognizance. The quoted Supreme Court explanation retained the qualification that process may be refused where the preliminary material is self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy. The High Court found no basis to interfere with the Special Judge's rejection of the closure report and order taking cognizance. Although the applicants argued that the case should instead be sent to a Magistrate, the decision did not formulate a general jurisdictional rule on that procedure; the Court upheld the Special Judge's order on the grounds it examined. Proof of the alleged stone pelting and property damage, the credibility of witnesses and the individual liability of the accused on the surviving IPC counts remained matters for trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 and upheld the Special Judge's order dated 22 September 2017 in MJC No. 599/2017. Rejection of the police closure report and cognizance under Sections 147 and 427 IPC remained operative, subject to the Court's explanation that a separate invocation of Section 34 was unnecessary at that stage and might become relevant after evidence was recorded. The unchallenged acceptance of the closure report for Section 294 IPC and Section 3(1)(x) of the SC/ST Act was left intact. The judgment did not convict the applicants, revive the closed offences, direct remand to a Magistrate or grant separate relief.

Mala Chatterjee and Ors. v. Rajkumar Sonkar and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 18452/2018, 19/02/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (429) Prev Next

Headnote :- Police report / administrative circular / prior permission - The District Prosecution Officer allegedly returned a supplementary charge sheet on the ground that its classification as a 'sensational' case required clearance from Bhopal. In response to the Court's inquiry, the DGP affirmed that CrPC contains no such requirement of prior permission or intimation, that the Police Headquarters circular dated 2 February 2012 cannot override the Code, that clause 3 of the circular requires no IG (Coordination) permission, and that neither the DPO nor the investigating officer may withhold a report on that pretext. The Court treated the clarification and the circular dated 23 March 2022 as addressing the procedure that had delayed filing; it did not direct the police to reach any particular conclusion in their report or order an arrest.

Fair investigation / sensational classification / common diligence - The Court called on the DGP to explain how special attention to 'Chinhit Apradh' could be reconciled with the fair handling of other offences. It found the first supplementary explanation vague. The affidavit and circular dated 8 April 2022 clarified that all criminal cases require prompt and effective investigation. The Court held that the prosecution cannot classify one case as sensational and investigate it vigilantly while investigating another case involving similar allegations casually. It expected the police to follow the revised directions concerning service of witness summons, execution of warrants and repeated defaults by police personnel. The applicant then declined to press the matter further because his grievance had been redressed. The application was disposed of without a final finding on the alleged gunshot incident or a direction making arrest mandatory.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Malkhan Singh alleged that he had survived a gunshot injury inflicted at the behest of respondent 4. In an application under Section 482 CrPC, he sought a status report on the steps taken to arrest that respondent and an order for his arrest, stating that he feared for his life. The order did not determine whether the shooting had occurred as alleged or whether the accused was culpable. In its reply dated 11 February 2022, the State said that a supplementary charge sheet against the accused persons had been prepared and would be filed. On 23 February, the State's counsel reported, on instructions, that the investigating officer had attempted to file it, but the District Prosecution Officer, Gwalior, had returned it because the matter was classified as a 'sensational case' requiring permission from Bhopal. Counsel stated that it would be filed on 11 March. The Court questioned that classification and called for explanations from the DPO and DGP. In his reproduced affidavit dated 25 February 2022, DPO Praveen Dixit referred to the intimation requirement in the 2012 circular and stated that the report had been returned on oral instructions from a superior officer. He also stated that CrPC contained no requirement of prior permission in sensational cases.

By order dated 2 March 2022, the Court asked whether the DPO's return of the charge sheet complied with CrPC, whether the Police Headquarters circular dated 2 February 2012 could override the Code or required permission from the IG (Coordination), Crime Investigation Wing, and whether the DPO or investigating officer could withhold the report. It also questioned what the distinction between sensational and ordinary cases meant for diligence in investigation and prosecution. In his affidavit dated 8 March, the DGP stated that neither the statute nor the circular required permission or prior intimation and that withholding the report on that ground was impermissible. He nevertheless described special attention to 'Chinhit Apradh' as intended to secure prompt investigation of a high standard and effective prosecution, while denying that other cases could be handled lethargically. The Court sought further clarification on 14 March. In his affidavit dated 23 March, the DGP referred to circulars clarifying that no clearance was required, that all cases required full attention and prompt investigation, and that trial-court summons and warrants must be served or executed in time. The Court found that response vague as to the actual distinction between the categories and sought a more specific circular. On 8 April, the DGP stated that all crimes, however classified, must be investigated promptly and effectively. He also described directions on summons and warrants, securing the presence of police witnesses, and preliminary inquiries into repeated defaults by police personnel. The Court treated the new circular as correcting the error. Counsel for Malkhan then stated that the grievance had been redressed and that the applicant did not wish to proceed further.

2. Statutes considered : The application was made under Section 482 CrPC. The Court did not examine the matter as a conventional challenge seeking quashing; the original request for arrest-related relief led it to scrutinise the delay in filing the supplementary report and the police policy. Submission of the police report was governed by CrPC. The Court required the DGP to clarify the position and recorded his acknowledgment that no provision of CrPC required prior permission or prior intimation to the IG (Coordination) before a charge sheet could be filed. It did not identify a numbered provision governing submission of the report, fix a statutory filing date, compel a particular conclusion or decide the application of an arrest provision. The circulars dated 2 February 2012 and 29 December 2014 identified 'sensational' or 'Chinhit Apradh' cases. The circulars dated 23 March and 8 April 2022 clarified that clearance was not required and addressed prompt and effective investigation of all cases and compliance with summons and warrants. These police instructions were subordinate to CrPC; they were not statutes and could not create an additional statutory requirement of prior clearance. No offence provision governing the alleged gunshot incident was interpreted.

3. Issues : (i) Could a District Prosecution Officer return a prepared supplementary charge sheet and make its filing depend on permission from Bhopal or the IG (Coordination), or on prior intimation, merely because a police circular classified the matter as a sensational case? (ii) Could Police Headquarters require special attention to investigation and prosecution in sensational cases while allowing delayed or casual investigation of non-sensational cases involving comparable allegations? (iii) After the DGP's successive affidavits and clarificatory circulars, what relief remained to be considered on the applicant's original arrest-related request? The Court did not decide the underlying gunshot allegation, whether respondent 4 had to be arrested, or whether the evidence was sufficient to support the prepared supplementary charge sheet.

4. Ratio / Findings : The initial promise to file a supplementary charge sheet and the subsequent account of its return prompted the Court to question the administrative condition imposed on filing. The nine questions in its order dated 2 March expressly examined the DPO's action in light of CrPC and the 2012 circular. In response, the DGP stated that the Code required neither permission from nor intimation to the IG, that the 2012 circular could not override the Code, and that clause 3 imposed no such clearance requirement. Neither the DPO nor the investigating officer could withhold the report on that pretext. The Court considered that clarification together with the later affidavits and the clarificatory circular dated 23 March. The clarification accepted by the Court meant that classification as a sensational case could neither create an additional requirement before filing nor excuse delay. This addressed the claim that permission was required, without replacing the police assessment of the report warranted by the evidence with a judicial one. The Court's reasoning concerned its procedural orders, the DGP's sworn clarifications, the relationship between police circulars and CrPC, and the need for equal diligence in investigation. The DGP's affidavits and the reproduced circulars stated that prior clearance was unnecessary and that all criminal cases required prompt and effective investigation.

The DGP initially justified the category as a means of securing better and speedier investigation and effective prosecution and trial in grave cases, while maintaining that ordinary cases should not be handled lethargically. The Court required him to explain why the same standard of quality and promptness should not apply to the investigation of all offences. It found the supplementary response dated 23 March and the circulars vague: they stated that both categories deserved full attention without explaining the additional efforts previously claimed or their limits. The further affidavit and circular dated 8 April expressly clarified that sensational and non-sensational crimes alike must be investigated promptly and effectively. The Court then stated the governing principle: every offence affects both an individual and society, and the prosecution cannot use a classification to justify vigilant investigation of one offence and casual handling of another involving similar allegations. It stated that Police Headquarters had corrected its mistake. The circular also addressed effective execution of trial summons and warrants, attendance of police witnesses and preliminary inquiry into repeated failures by police personnel. The Court expressed the hope and belief that officers would comply and that adequate action would be taken in cases of repeated default to protect complainants and witnesses from avoidable harassment.

At the final hearing, the applicant's counsel stated that the grievance had been redressed and that the applicant did not wish to press the matter further. The Court disposed of the application on the basis of the affidavits and circulars, with an expectation that they would be followed in letter and spirit. It did not order arrest, determine whether respondent 4 had evaded the police, or decide criminal liability.

5. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court disposed of the application under Section 482 after the applicant stated that he did not wish to proceed further. The Court expected police personnel and investigating officers to respect the DGP's affidavits and follow all Police Headquarters circulars, including the clarification dated 8 April, in letter and spirit. It did not order arrest, finally determine the status of respondent 4, quash proceedings, convict anyone, require a particular charge-sheet conclusion, or award damages or costs. The judgment did not set a deadline for filing the supplementary report. It clarified that the report could not be withheld on the supposed requirement of prior clearance for a sensational case and that ordinary cases could not be investigated casually.

Headnote :- FIR registration / Article 226 mandamus / alternative remedies - Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, affirmed the police duty to register an FIR when information discloses a cognizable offence, but directed an informant aggrieved by police inaction to the complaint procedure under Sections 190/200 CrPC. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, identified recourse under Section 154(3), followed by an application to the Magistrate under Section 156(3), as the remedy instead of a routine writ petition before the High Court. In Shweta Bhadauria, the Madhya Pradesh Division Bench recognised the four exceptions to the alternative-remedy rule stated in Whirlpool and distinguished the police duty explained in Lalita Kumari from entitlement to writ relief. Applying these authorities, the Court dismissed the petition seeking action on a complaint, with liberty to file a complaint under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS. It did not decide whether the alleged offence had been committed.

Magistrate / police inaction / investigation and process - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, quoted Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768, on the Magistrate's powers to inquire into a complaint, direct police investigation on prima facie material, dismiss the complaint or issue process, as appropriate. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe further explained that, on prima facie satisfaction on an application under Section 156(3), a Magistrate can secure FIR registration and proper investigation, monitor the investigation and recommend a change of investigating officer, but cannot investigate personally. These procedures provided the available statutory remedies; the High Court did not itself order an investigation.

Exceptional writ / mala fide investigation / limited judicial direction - Divine Retreat Centre preserved intervention under Article 226 in the rarest cases upon a clear showing of mala fide use of investigative power, abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII, while prohibiting the court from directing how the police investigation should be conducted. The Court quoted that limitation and dismissed the petition by applying the authorities on ordinary statutory remedies. It did not declare writ jurisdiction categorically unavailable.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mamta Chourasiya stated that she had approached respondents 1–4 to register an FIR or act on her complaint against respondents 5–6 (Annexure P-8), but no action had followed. Her petition under Article 226 sought production of the complaint record, a writ of mandamus directing the official respondents to consider the complaint, and general further relief. State counsel opposed the writ on the ground that the petitioner had an efficacious remedy by way of a complaint before the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC, referred to in the judgment as Section 223 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023 (BNSS). The Court framed the question as whether a writ petition seeking a direction to the police to register an FIR was maintainable. It did not adjudicate the accusations against respondents 5–6.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted at length. It explained that the police must register an FIR where the facts communicated disclose a cognizable offence, but that police inaction is ordinarily addressed by a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. It distinguished the police duty discussed in Ramesh Kumari and Lallan Chaudhary from the procedural remedy discussed in All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh and Minu Kumari, thereby explaining the apparent conflict. The Court applied the principle concerning the statutory remedy in declining immediate writ relief; it did not determine whether Mamta's allegations, which were not reproduced, disclosed a cognizable offence. The direction concerning a request for government sanction in the quoted Aleque Padamsee passage related to that litigation and had no independent application in this case.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for two qualifications. It preserved the rare exercise of Article 226 power upon a clear showing of mala fide use of investigative power, abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII. Even then, a court may insist on observance of the prescribed process but may not direct how the police should investigate. It also directed an informant facing police inaction to the procedure under Sections 190/200 CrPC instead of a routine writ petition. Its quotation of Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, (2004) 7 SCC 768, explained that a Magistrate may inquire into a complaint, direct police investigation and a report on prima facie material, dismiss a complaint disclosing no offence under Section 203, or take cognizance and issue process when appropriate. The High Court relied on these principles to explain the available remedies and the limits of jurisdiction. The reference within that quotation to All India Institute of Medical Sciences provided supporting authority; it was not a separately analysed holding.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted for the remedy of approaching the Superintendent of Police in writing under Section 154(3), followed, if necessary, by an application to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On a proper application, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration and proper investigation and may monitor the investigation. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reiterated that recourse to the Magistrate should be preferred to an Article 226 writ petition and explained the burden that routine FIR petitions place on the High Courts. It further stated that a Magistrate who is prima facie satisfied may recommend a change of investigating officer and monitor the investigation, but cannot investigate personally. The Court applied these principles concerning the available remedies without itself ordering an investigation.

A Division Bench of the same High Court in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (20 December 2016), was quoted as permitting refusal of mandamus where the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, unless one of the four exceptions stated in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1, applies. It distinguished Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1: the police duty under Section 154 is distinct from the question whether an informant may bypass alternative remedies and seek a writ of mandamus. The Court followed that framework.

3. Statutes considered : The petitioner sought mandamus under Article 226 of the Constitution. The Court treated ordinary police inaction concerning a proposed FIR as a matter for the alternative statutory remedies, while preserving exceptional writ jurisdiction upon a clear showing of mala fide use of investigative power, abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII. Section 154 CrPC concerned the police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence, and Section 154(3) permitted a written approach to the Superintendent of Police. Section 156(3) permitted an application to the Magistrate for appropriate police investigation, including directions and monitoring upon prima facie satisfaction, as explained in the quoted Supreme Court passages. Sections 190 and 200 CrPC provided the alternative procedure of a private complaint and the Magistrate's cognizance and inquiry; the quoted precedent also referred to dismissal under Section 203 and the relevant stage for issuing process. The Court expressly referred to Section 223 BNSS as the corresponding current provision for the petitioner's proposed complaint. Chapter XII CrPC was cited in Divine Retreat's discussion of exceptional cases involving abuse of investigative power. No particular IPC/BNS offence was identified or decided.

4. Issues : (i) Was a petition under Article 226 seeking police registration of an FIR or action on Annexure P-8 an appropriate immediate remedy for the alleged inaction, given the available remedies before superior police officers and the Magistrate? (ii) What powers could the Magistrate exercise when the police declined registration or failed to investigate properly, and what could the High Court exceptionally do upon a clear showing of mala fide abuse of investigative power without taking over the investigation? (iii) Did the statement of the police duty under Section 154, including the rule in Lalita Kumari, dispense with consideration of alternative remedies? The Court decided only the procedural remedy. It did not adjudicate whether respondents 5 –6 had committed an offence or whether the police had actually breached their registration duty on facts disclosing a cognizable offence.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court distinguished the statutory duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence from the appropriate forum for addressing alleged police inaction. Aleque Padamsee expressly stated both principles and explained why decisions concerning police registration duties did not conflict with decisions directing an informant to the Magistrate. Under the framework stated in the quoted Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe passages, the aggrieved person may approach the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and, if the grievance remains unresolved, apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may require registration or proper investigation, monitor it and recommend a different investigating officer, while leaving the investigation itself to the police. Sections 190 and 200 provide a complaint procedure involving inquiry, issue of process or dismissal at the appropriate stage. The Court declined to entertain Mamta's petition in view of those remedies. It did not examine the facts of her complaint, which were not reproduced, to determine whether the proposed offence was cognizable or non-cognizable.

Divine Retreat qualified the ordinary rule without excluding Article 226 jurisdiction: in a rare case involving clear mala fide investigation, abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII, the court may insist on observance of the Code's procedure, but may not prescribe how the police should investigate. The Court cited that exceptional jurisdiction but dismissed the petition under the alternative-remedy framework. The Division Bench formulation in Shweta Bhadauria likewise permitted denial of mandamus for failure to use alternative remedies, subject to the exceptions stated in Whirlpool. It also explained that Lalita Kumari's principle concerning the duty to register an FIR did not itself confer an unconditional right to bypass alternative remedies. The petition was therefore dismissed because of the available procedural remedies; the dismissal did not reject the criminal complaint on its merits.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. It expressly gave the petitioner liberty, if she wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS for redress. It did not direct registration of an FIR, call for the record, order prosecution of respondents 5–6, change an investigating officer or award costs. The Court made no finding on the merits of the underlying complaint and prescribed no time limit or mandatory outcome for a future application to the Magistrate.

Mamta Chourasiya v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 30112/2024, 24/10/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Habeas corpus / minor recovered / custody - The minor was produced before the High Court and expressed a wish to stay with her mother. The Court permitted her to do so and later held that nothing further remained concerning her production and return. It nevertheless examined the police record of her recovery and issued directions concerning the officers' accountability for identified omissions, without deciding the alleged enticer's guilt.

Kidnapping and sexual offence / minority / claimed voluntariness - Applying Anversingh alias Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat, (2021) 3 SCC 12, the Court held that enticing a minor who then leaves home could disclose offences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC despite an initial account of voluntary departure. The later statement naming Sonu Ojha and describing his assurance of marriage and sexual relations called for investigative action. The Court referred to Section 375 IPC to state that a minor girl's consent to intercourse was immaterial. These assessments were made at the investigative stage. The medical report stated that sexual assault could not be ruled out; it did not establish guilt.

Police accountability / Section 166A(c) IPC / nominal FIR - After quoting the duty to record information under Section 154(1) about the sexual offences listed in Section 166A(c), the Court found that registration of an FIR against unknown persons, followed by inactivity, delayed recovery efforts, failure to inform the mother and lack of timely steps for medical examination were inadequate on the facts. It directed registration of an FIR under Section 166A(c) against the investigating officer and SHO, training for both officers, and a compliance report within 15 days. The direction to register an FIR did not establish criminal liability. The judgment uses Parmar in its discussion and Parihar in the operative direction for the investigating Sub-Inspector. It refers to Section 164 CrPC for the recorded statement and, later, for medical examination.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : X (mother of the minor) sought production of her minor daughter in a habeas corpus petition under Article 226 filed on 31 May 2022, together with action against private respondents 5 and 6. The Court sought a police status report on 2 June. The Court's later examination of the case diary indicated that investigative activity had begun only on 8 June, after the police learned of the pending writ petition. The diary was first opened and a team sent to Bhind on the basis of mobile location on that date. The girl was recovered on 9 June from a house associated with the adult mentioned in the diary and brought to Gwalior. The investigating officer reported that statements under Sections 161 and 164 CrPC had been recorded on the day of recovery. As it was late in the day, the girl was placed at a One Stop Center pending production before the Child Welfare Committee (CWC); on 10 June, the CWC ordered her continued placement there. The case diary showed neither notice to her mother nor an attempt to obtain a medical examination when she was recovered. On 13 June, the child was produced before the Court. She initially stated that she had left her mother voluntarily, rented accommodation in Bhind for ₹1,500 per month using ₹3,000 taken from home, and wished to stay with her mother. The Court permitted her to do so. A police representative stated that an FIR against unknown persons had been registered. A Town Inspector initially explained the lack of action against the landlord by saying that it was uncertain whether he knew that a minor was living there. Considering the police response inadequate, the Court summoned senior officers.

The SSP then personally monitored the matter and filed a status report stating that Sonu Ojha had enticed the minor, rented Madhav's room by presenting her as his wife with a child, and that both men had been arrested. According to the Court's review of the diary, the mother was first interviewed on 14 June. The girl declined medical examination and had not disclosed Sonu's name. In a later statement recorded on 19 June, she named him, referred to his promise of marriage, stated that she had left with him on 25 May, and described living with him as spouses and having voluntary sexual relations. She explained that her fear that he might not be arrested had influenced her earlier failure to name him and her reluctance to undergo examination. A medical examination following a renewed referral was reported as not ruling out sexual assault. The landlord stated that he had been in Gujarat and had learned of the recovery by telephone. His wife described Sonu bringing the girl and a child to the room. The diary contained no information about that child's identity or whereabouts. These were statements obtained during the developing investigation, rather than facts adjudicated at trial. The Court examined the omissions of the investigating Sub-Inspector and the Hazira Town Inspector/SHO and ultimately directed action against the officers. The judgment names the Sub-Inspector as Ragini Parmar in paragraph 6 and as Ragini Parihar in the operative direction in paragraph 21.

2. Precedents — Considered : Anversingh alias Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat, (2021) 3 SCC 12, was the only Supreme Court authority materially cited. The Court relied on it for the proposition that, where an accused entices a minor child who then leaves home, the facts can disclose offences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC. An account of voluntary departure does not, by itself, resolve the questions of minority and enticement. The Court applied that principle to the girl's later statement about Sonu's promise and taking her to Bhind, explaining why the investigator should not have remained inactive. The point that a minor's consent is immaterial under Section 375 was stated directly by the Court; it was not attributed to a developed holding in Anversingh.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution provided jurisdiction to secure the minor's production and return through habeas corpus. Sections 161 and 164 CrPC were referred to in connection with the statements recorded after her recovery. In paragraph 17, the judgment attributes the requirement of medical examination of a rape victim to Section 164; paragraph 7 separately refers to Section 164 in connection with the statement. The CWC proceedings and placement at the One Stop Center were procedural facts, rather than an interpretation of a named child-welfare enactment. Sections 363 and 366 IPC were invoked through Anversingh in relation to the alleged enticement and kidnapping of a minor. The Court relied on Section 375 IPC in treating the minor girl's consent to intercourse as immaterial. It quoted Section 166A(c) IPC, which concerns a police officer's failure to record information under Section 154(1) CrPC relating to specified offences, including the listed offences under Section 376 and related provisions. The Court relied on that provision in directing registration of an FIR against the officers following registration against unknown persons and the investigative omissions. It did not finally determine their mens rea or establish every statutory ingredient at a criminal trial.

4. Issues : (i) Once the minor had been produced and expressed her wish to live with her mother, what remained to be decided concerning habeas corpus custody relief? (ii) Could the police treat her initial account of voluntary travel and residence as ending the inquiry when she was a minor and later described enticement, an assurance of marriage and sexual relations? (iii) What did the diary disclose about the officers' response, notice to the mother, steps for medical examination, efforts to trace the named adult and unidentified child, and the adequacy of an FIR against unknown persons in light of the Court's analysis of Section 166A(c)? (iv) What directions concerning officer training, investigation and compliance were warranted? The Court did not determine the guilt of Sonu or the landlord, finally assess the girl's credibility, or convict the police officers.

5. Ratio / Findings : The initial purpose of the habeas corpus petition was fulfilled by the girl's recovery and production and by allowing her to go with her mother in accordance with her expressed wish. As she was a minor, the Court nevertheless examined the police response to her disappearance. Its review of the diary disclosed a delayed start after notice of the writ petition, failure to inform the mother after recovery, placement through the One Stop Center and CWC without contacting her, no early attempt at medical examination, and little further inquiry after the initial statement. The investigating officer conceded that she had taken no further step after producing the girl before the CWC. The SSP's subsequent supervision led to interviews of the mother, landlord and his wife, a later statement from the minor, medical examination and arrests. The Court regarded that sequence as grave negligence or dereliction of duty. It left open whether ignorance of law or outside pressure explained the conduct; it did not establish a corrupt motive. It also noted that the identity and whereabouts of the child seen with Sonu and the minor had not been investigated.

The girl remained a minor despite her statements that she had left voluntarily or had voluntary intercourse. Applying Anversingh to the later account that Sonu had enticed her with a promise of marriage and rented accommodation in Bhind, the Court held that offences under Sections 363 and 366 IPC could be made out. It relied on Section 375 in rejecting the minor's consent as a reason not to investigate a possible sexual offence. The medical report did not rule out assault, but did not establish it conclusively. The accounts of the landlord and his wife, the account of Sonu's marriage and child, and the arrests were recorded as developments in the investigation or inferences from the material, rather than final findings of criminal liability.

On the officers' accountability, the Court quoted the failure-to-record requirement in Section 166A(c) and the sexual offences it lists. It reasoned that merely registering an FIR against unknown persons and then ignoring the underlying circumstances did not fulfil the provision's purpose on these facts. It therefore directed the SSP to register an FIR against the investigating Sub-Inspector and the SHO. Paragraph 17 refers to medical examination under Section 164 without separately developing a statutory ratio on that reference. The Court considered that both officers needed training in handling a minor's case. Those directions were remedial measures, rather than a criminal sentence.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court disposed of the habeas corpus petition. By the order dated 13 June, the minor had been permitted to stay with her mother, and nothing further remained concerning production of the corpus. The Court directed that the Sub-Inspector be sent immediately to a police training center chosen by the DGP for at least one year, and that Town Inspector/SHO Manish Dhakad undergo six months' training before a field posting. It directed the SSP, Gwalior, to register an FIR under Section 166A(c) IPC against the investigating Sub-Inspector, named Ragini Parihar in the operative paragraph and Parmar elsewhere, and against Dhakad. A report concerning training and FIR registration was to be submitted to the Principal Registrar within 15 days. The Court did not convict anyone, award damages, conduct a trial for final adjudication of custody, find Sonu guilty or make a separate order for costs.

X (mother of the minor) v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 12520/2022, 21/06/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (432) Prev Next

Headnote :- POCSO abetment / counsellor / mandatory reporting - Sections 16–17 POCSO require instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid, which may include an illegal omission or facilitation before or at the commission of the offence. The offence must be committed in consequence of the abetment. Section 19(1) required a person with information to inform the Special Juvenile Police Unit or local police. The allegations were that a counsellor responsible for the safety of a minor with a mental disability knew of repeated abuse, saw the co-accused with the child, but merely asked him to stop and did not report the matter. On those allegations, the Court found a prima facie basis for abetment charges. It also stated that failure to report was separately punishable. It did not hold that every reporting failure was sufficient for liability under Section 16. Intent and causation remained matters for trial.

Charge framing / grave suspicion / limited sifting - Dilawar Balu Kurane v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 2 SCC 135, permits limited sifting and weighing of material under Section 227 CrPC. Grave suspicion that has not been properly explained supports a trial, whereas equally possible views giving rise to mere suspicion may warrant discharge. The Judge must neither act merely as a post office nor assess the evidence as at trial. Mauvin Godinho v. State of Goa, (2018) 3 SCC 358, explained the prima facie assessment of material concerning the essential elements without a roving inquiry. The Court also quoted Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, on not deciding the reliability of rival accounts where a triable case exists, while retaining the distinction that the authority concerned quashing in a matrimonial case. The later recording of statements implicating the counsellor did not warrant meticulous findings on credibility at the charge stage. The revision was dismissed. The judgment refers to the challenged order as dated both 10 August 2018 and 10 August 2021.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mamta Tiwari was a counsellor who inspected Ashram Shanti Niketan Balika Grih at Birla Nagar, Hazira, Gwalior, where a minor girl with a mental disability resided. According to the counsellor, the child told her that a man known as Jain Baba at the Ashram was repeatedly abusing her sexually. The investigation alleged that Mamta already knew of the abuse and, despite seeing the co-accused's conduct, took no protective or reporting action beyond asking him not to do it. These remained allegations to be tried, rather than final findings of fact. The Special Judge (POCSO Act), Gwalior, framed charges against Mamta under Sections 16 and 17 POCSO in Special Case No. 86/2019. The opening paragraph of the judgment describes the challenged order as dated 10 August 2018; paragraph 4 gives the date as 10 August 2021, and paragraph 6 again refers to 10 August 2018. Mamta challenged the charges in a criminal revision under Sections 397/401 CrPC. She denied the allegations and argued that the witnesses had not initially accused her. Only their supplementary statements alleged that she had seen Jain Baba's acts and merely asked him to stop. She contended that those later statements were an afterthought. The State supported the order framing charges.

2. Precedents — Considered : Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted for the principle that allegations which are absurd or disclose no offence, or proceedings constituting an abuse of process, may warrant quashing. Where a triable case exists, however, the court does not choose between rival accounts or determine their reliability at the threshold. The lengthy factual passage quoted from that authority concerned matrimonial cruelty and allegations against a husband and his parents. The High Court relied on the caution against prematurely deciding credibility when reviewing the POCSO charges. It did not apply the caution concerning allegations against matrimonial relatives to the present facts or decide a quashing petition under Section 482. The matrimonial narrative in the quotation formed no part of the facts of this case.

Dilawar Balu Kurane v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 2 SCC 135, was quoted on Section 227 CrPC. When considering charges, a Judge may sift and weigh material only to determine whether a prima facie case exists. Grave suspicion that has not been properly explained may justify a charge, while equally possible views giving rise only to some suspicion may justify discharge. The Judge must consider the broad probabilities and the overall effect of the evidence and documents, rather than merely repeat the prosecution case, but must not conduct a roving inquiry or weigh the evidence as at trial. The reference within the quotation to Union of India v. Prafulla Kumar Samal supported that test; the High Court did not separately analyse that case. This authority supplied the central standard for reviewing the counsellor's challenge.

Mauvin Godinho v. State of Goa, (2018) 3 SCC 358, was quoted on the prima facie standard for framing charges under Section 227. The material concerning all essential elements must be considered together for its probative value. It should make the relevant facts sufficiently believable or probable for a prudent person to act on the supposition that they exist, without an inquiry equivalent to a full trial. The Court applied this standard with Dilawar in declining to make a final finding on the reliability of the supplementary statements. The references to Sajjan Kumar, A. Arun Kumar and S. Selvi within the Mauvin quotation were supporting citations, rather than authorities separately analysed and applied in this judgment. None of these Supreme Court authorities supplied a POCSO-specific holding on non-reporting under Section 19; the application of those statutory provisions was the High Court's own.

3. Statutes considered : Section 16 POCSO defines abetment as instigation, conspiracy accompanied by an act or illegal omission, or intentional aid by an act or illegal omission. Its explanations address concealment of a material fact which a person is bound to disclose, facilitation before or at the commission of the act, and specified recruitment or movement of a child through coercive or deceptive means. The Court relied particularly on intentional facilitation in the context of alleged continuing abuse; it did not find the conspiracy or recruitment alternatives proved. Section 17 provides punishment for abetment where the act abetted is committed in consequence of it, requiring a causal connection to the instigation, conspiracy or aid. Section 19(1) POCSO imposed the obligation to inform the Special Juvenile Police Unit or local police of the alleged abuse. The Court described failure to communicate the information as required as a punishable offence carrying a term of up to six months, without identifying the separate punishment provision. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC provided revisional jurisdiction. Section 227 CrPC appeared in the quoted Supreme Court standards for framing charges, which the Court used to review the Special Judge's charge decision. The judgment did not identify the exact substantive POCSO offence allegedly committed by Jain Baba.

4. Issues : (i) Could the allegations that a counsellor responsible for a vulnerable child's safety knew of ongoing abuse, had seen it and deliberately failed to report it, merely asking the perpetrator to stop, disclose prima facie intentional aid under Sections 16 and 17 POCSO, rather than only an independent breach of the reporting duty under Section 19? (ii) Did the appearance of incriminating details in supplementary witness statements necessarily make those details an afterthought warranting discharge, or did that dispute about reliability require trial under the standard for framing charges? The Court did not finally determine whether the abuse had occurred, whether Mamta had actually witnessed it, her intent, the causal link to later offending, or the credibility of the witnesses.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court reproduced Sections 16 and 17 and discussed the reporting duty under Section 19(1) alongside the charged abetment. It treated the alleged counsellor role as including responsibility for the resident girls' safety. According to the prosecution, she learned of repeated sexual abuse of a minor with a mental disability and personally saw the co-accused with the child, but neither informed the designated police unit or local police nor took protective action, and merely asked the perpetrator to stop. The Court reasoned that, in the context of the alleged continuing acts, that conduct could amount to aid or facilitation sufficient for a charge under Sections 16 and 17. It also stated that failure to report was separately punishable. Its conclusion on abetment was a prima facie decision at the charge stage. Intentional aid under Section 16 and commission of the offence in consequence of the abetment under Section 17 remained substantive elements to be established at trial.

As to the supplementary statements, the Court declined to decide whether the later timing made them false. Dilawar's standard permits limited sifting, requires assessment of the overall probabilities and treats grave suspicion as sufficient to frame a charge. It allows discharge where there is only weak suspicion, but prohibits detailed appreciation of evidence. Mauvin similarly requires prima facie material concerning the essential elements of the charge, rather than assurance of conviction. Taramani's caution against deciding a triable case by assessing rival accounts reinforced that limited inquiry, although the facts of that authority were different. The alleged observation, knowledge, inaction and failure to report provided sufficient material for the charge at that stage. This did not establish the truth of every witness account, actual aid or causation. The Court therefore declined to interfere with the Special Judge's decision.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision. The charges under Sections 16 and 17 POCSO against Mamta Tiwari remained for trial. The Court did not convict her, adjudicate the separate non-reporting offence, alter the unidentified underlying offence against Jain Baba or direct a remand. It imposed no separate costs or conditions.

Mamta Tiwari v. State of M.P. and Ors., Cr.R. no. 2020/2021, 02/09/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Related witnesses / interested witnesses / credibility - Jayabalan v. Union Territory of Pondicherry, (2010) 1 SCC 199, requires cautious assessment of interested testimony. The court must look for consistency and must not view evidence with suspicion merely because the witness is related to the victim. Mohd. Rojai Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, distinguishes relationship from a direct or indirect benefit or a motive to falsely implicate the accused. Applying those principles, the Court accepted PW1–PW5's accounts of the exhortation and shooting as materially consistent and their presence as natural, despite minor variations. It assessed their evidence in light of cross-examination, the medical injury, recovery and ballistics. The mere presence of a relative who was a Head Constable did not establish manipulation of the investigation.

Common intention / Section 34 IPC / anterior concert and participation - Jasdeep Singh alias Jassu v. State of Punjab (Criminal Appeal No. 1584/2021, 7 January 2022) explained that the prosecution must prove common intention and conduct in its furtherance. Mere presence or a similar intention independently held by each accused is insufficient. Its discussion of Suresh, Lallan Rai, Chhota Ahirwar, Nand Kishore and Shyamal Ghosh addressed overt and covert acts, certain illegal omissions, shared intention and participation. Those nested quotations supplied the consolidated test; they were not treated as independent factual holdings in this case. Pandurang v. State of Hyderabad, 1955 SCR (1) 1083, required a prior meeting of minds while recognising that it may occur suddenly. Virendra Singh v. State of M.P., (2010) 8 SCC 407, required intention anterior to the act and participation, to be inferred carefully from the evidence. Chhota Ahirwar v. State of M.P., (2020) 4 SCC 126, held that a separate overt act is not mandatory, but acting in concert remains necessary. The Court applied those shared requirements to Man Singh's immediate exhortation followed by Narendra's fatal shot. It affirmed Man Singh's conviction under Section 302/34 alongside Narendra's conviction directly under Section 302.

Exhortation / evidentiary caution / murder with common intention - Through Bhoma Ram v. State of Rajasthan, 1987 WLN UC 128, the Court acknowledged the caution in Jainul Haque v. State of Bihar, AIR 1974 SC 45, that verbal exhortation is a weak form of evidence which requires clear, cogent and reliable proof. It explained that spoken incitement, when corroborated, can help establish shared intention. It cited Sandeep v. State of Haryana on an immediate exhortation followed by a fatal shot. PW1–PW5 consistently placed Man Singh's direction immediately before Narendra fired, and the medical and firearm evidence supported that sequence. The conclusion rested on proof in this case; it did not establish that every alleged exhortation automatically attracts Section 34.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On the morning of 15 August 2007, a quarrel arose between juvenile Ramautar, son of Man Singh, and Jeetu, son of Ramveer, on a village lane outside a baithak. Ramveer intervened and scolded Jeetu. According to the prosecution, Man Singh and his son Narendra arrived, and Man Singh and Ramautar exhorted Narendra, who fired a licensed mouser/315-bore gun at Ramveer, hitting his right chest. Ramveer fell unconscious and bled. Ramlakhan (PW1) and Aatar Singh (PW2) were near the baithak. Ramveer's daughter Preeti (PW3), wife Rammoorti Devi (PW4) and son Jitendra (PW5) described seeing the events from the roof and then reaching the scene. Ramveer was taken to Morena Hospital, where Dehati Nalishi Ex. P1 was recorded. He was referred to J.A. Hospital, Gwalior, where he died. A separate charge sheet concerning juvenile Ramautar was filed before the Juvenile Court. Narendra was tried for murder under Section 302 IPC, and Man Singh under Section 302 read with Section 34. The Second Additional Sessions Judge, Morena, convicted both on 14 March 2011 in Sessions Trial No. 204/2007. Each was sentenced to life imprisonment and a ₹1,000 fine, with a default stipulation. Both appealed under Section 374 CrPC. The defence claimed that Jeetu had molested Man Singh's daughter Roobi, causing villagers to gather, and that an unknown person had shot Ramveer. Roobi testified as DW1. The appellants questioned whether the related eyewitnesses were naturally present and credible. They relied on omissions and alleged discrepancies in the roles attributed to the accused, alleged suppression of a report made by Shyam Singh at a police post, the failure to examine independent villagers and the supposed influence of a relative who was a Head Constable over the investigation. They argued that evidence of verbal exhortation was weak and could not sustain Man Singh's conviction under Section 34. The State relied on consistent eyewitness accounts, an immediate shared plan, medical evidence and firearm recovery. The Court reviewed the testimony of sixteen prosecution witnesses. Dr. Anoop Gupta found an entry wound below the armpit, an exit wound, bleeding, charring and blackening. Dr. J.N. Soni's postmortem examination disclosed an ante-mortem thoracic firearm injury sufficient to cause death. He attributed the death to shock and haemorrhage and classified it as homicidal. A licensed gun attributed to Narendra was recovered from Bheem Singh's house following Narendra's memorandum. Two seizure witnesses were partly hostile, but admitted their signatures and aspects of the memorandum. Police witnesses supported the gun recovery, while Jitendra corroborated the seizure of the empty cartridge and other articles from the scene. FSL Ex. P22 linked firing to the gun, which was in working condition. The Court considered this material as corroboration, without treating it as a substitute for the specific inference required under Section 34.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jayabalan v. Union Territory of Pondicherry, (2010) 1 SCC 199, supplied the approach to interested testimony: assess it cautiously, look for consistency and do not reject it solely because the witness is closely related to the victim. Mohd. Rojai Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, distinguished a related witness from one who stands to benefit or has a motive arising from enmity to falsely implicate the accused. It required the evidence of a relative naturally present at the scene to be reliable, probable, cogent and consistent. Its embedded reference to Dalip Singh illustrated why a close relative would ordinarily not shield the true culprit and implicate an innocent person. The High Court applied those standards to PW1–PW5. It rejected their automatic exclusion on account of relationship and found no material contradiction; it did not presume their evidence true merely because of kinship.

Jainul Haque v. State of Bihar, AIR 1974 SC 45, was relied on by the defence to emphasise the weakness of oral evidence of exhortation. The Court did not quote that judgment directly or treat it as a universal bar. It quoted Bhoma Ram v. State of Rajasthan, 1987 WLN UC 128, which acknowledged Jainul Haque's requirement of clear, cogent and reliable proof of exhortation. That passage explained that spoken orders, encouragement, accompanying conduct and surrounding circumstances can establish shared intention under Section 34 or distinct instigation under Section 109, depending on the charge. The present conviction was under Section 302/34. The Court found the evidence of Man Singh's immediate exhortation sufficiently reliable. Bhoma Ram's reference to Jai Narain formed part of the quoted reasoning; the High Court did not separately examine that Supreme Court holding.

Jasdeep Singh alias Jassu v. State of Punjab, Criminal Appeal No. 1584/2021 (7 January 2022), was quoted extensively on the history and operation of Section 34. The principle applied was that this legal fiction imposes shared liability only upon substantial proof that the participants consciously shared a common intention at the same time and that a connected act was done in its furtherance. Mere presence and similar purposes independently held do not automatically suffice. A plan may form suddenly, and a connected contribution may be overt or covert or, in defined circumstances, take the form of a deliberate illegal omission. The prosecution bears the burden of proving common intention. Particular care is required where part of its evidence is disbelieved, and the distinction between the actual shooter and a participant remains legally significant. The passages quoted from Suresh v. State of U.P., (2001) 3 SCC 673, required an act connected with the offence, potentially including a deliberate omission; intention held in the mind alone was insufficient. Lallan Rai v. State of Bihar, (2003) 1 SCC 268, and Chhota Ahirwar v. State of M.P., (2020) 4 SCC 126, explained contemporaneous consensus and that a separate overt act by every participant is not invariably required. Nand Kishore v. State of M.P., (2011) 12 SCC 120, distinguished the criminal act, common intention and individual participation. Shyamal Ghosh v. State of West Bengal, (2012) 7 SCC 646, likewise distinguished intention and participation. These citations and the older Privy Council authorities appeared within the extensive Jasdeep quotation. The Court used their shared Section 34 framework rather than separately applying them to new factual disputes. The quoted history of Sections 32–39 did not raise separate statutory issues in this case.

Pandurang, Tukia and Bhillia v. State of Hyderabad, 1955 SCR (1) 1083, was directly cited to distinguish a prior meeting of minds, which may occur in an instant, from merely identical intentions held independently. Vicarious liability requires an act done in furtherance of the shared plan. Virendra Singh v. State of M.P., (2010) 8 SCC 407, was quoted both within Jasdeep and directly. It explained that Section 34 creates constructive liability rather than a distinct offence. Intention must precede the act, though it may develop on the spot. Participation may take different forms and must be inferred carefully from conduct; clear evidence is required of a shared purpose to commit a graver offence. Chhota Ahirwar was then directly applied for the principle that a separate overt act is not mandatory if concert and common intention are proved. It did not permit conviction on mere presence. Sandeep v. State of Haryana was cited for an immediate exhortation followed by the fatal shot supporting liability under Section 302/34. The High Court applied that close analogy in sustaining Man Singh's conviction.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC provided the route of appeal against conviction. Section 302 IPC governed Narendra's fatal shooting charge and murder conviction. Section 34 IPC supplied constructive liability for Man Singh. Where several persons commit a criminal act in furtherance of their common intention, each is liable as if he had done it, subject to proof of shared intention, participation and a connected act. The Court referred to Section 109 IPC in the Bhoma Ram quotation concerning abetment by instigation. Man Singh's affirmed conviction was under Section 302/34, without a separate conviction under Section 109. Sections 33, 32 and 37–39 IPC appeared in Jasdeep's quoted discussion of acts, omissions and different forms of shared liability; no separate charge under those provisions was decided. The investigation initially referred to Sections 307, 294 and 34 before the death. Those references formed part of the procedural history and were not convictions adjudicated on appeal. The juvenile's separate proceeding was noted without deciding his liability. The doctors' opinions on homicidal death and the FSL firearm finding were evidence relevant to causation under Section 302, rather than new statutory interpretations.

4. Issues : (i) Could PW1–PW5's related eyewitness accounts be relied on after close scrutiny, despite alleged minor inconsistencies and the possible involvement in the investigation of an officer related to them? (ii) Did Narendra fire the fatal shot, as the eyewitness, medical and firearm evidence indicated, or did the defence account of molestation and an unknown shooter create reasonable doubt? (iii) Did clear and credible evidence of Man Singh's immediate exhortation establish an anterior shared intention and participation in the murder under Section 34, despite the caution that evidence of verbal exhortation alone may be weak? (iv) Did the challenges to the seizure, the partly hostile evidence of two witnesses and the defence evidence affect the result? The Court determined criminal guilt on appeal on the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt and affirmed the existing sentences.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court examined the five principal eyewitness accounts without treating family ties as inherently discrediting. PW1 and PW2 said they were talking near the baithak. PW3–PW5 described their view from the roof, Man Singh and Ramautar's exhortation, Narendra's shot and the immediate aftermath. Cross-examination did not undermine that material sequence. Applying Jayabalan and Mohd. Rojai Ali, the Court treated natural presence and internally consistent, cogent testimony as decisive. The minor discrepancies were trivial; they did not contradict the fatal act or the alleged shared purpose. The Court separately considered the claim concerning the relative who was a Head Constable. Witnesses denied acting at his direction, and the Kotwar's acknowledgement of his presence when a panchnama was prepared did not establish manipulation. The failure to examine every independent villager did not lead the Court to reject otherwise reliable eyewitness evidence.

The medical and physical evidence supported the account of the shooting. The surgeon who first examined Ramveer described entry and exit wounds, bleeding, charring and blackening. The forensic doctor found an ante-mortem thoracic firearm injury sufficient to cause death and attributed the death to shock and haemorrhage. He gave the opinion that the death was homicidal. The FSL report supported firing from Narendra's firearm, which was in working condition. The investigating officer and police witnesses described the cartridge at the scene, the memorandum and the recovery of the licensed gun. Although Bheem and Bhanwar were hostile on parts of the seizure, their admitted signatures on the memorandum and the other testimony meant that the recovery evidence was not necessarily discredited. The Court found the principal medical, eyewitness and firearm evidence consistent with one another. No report had been lodged about the alleged molestation, and there was no independent account supporting that defence. The Kotwar denied that such an incident had occurred. The Court considered Roobi's testimony as DW1 to have been given to save her father and brother. That assessment concerned her evidence in this case; it did not establish that defence testimony is inherently less credible.

On Section 34, the Court distinguished Narendra's act of firing from Man Singh's constructive liability. Jasdeep, Pandurang, Virendra Singh and Chhota Ahirwar required more than shared anger or a family relationship. They required a common intention to kill before the shot, which could form on the spot, and Man Singh's participation in its furtherance. The Court found clear evidence of that connection in the consistent eyewitness accounts of his immediate exhortation, Narendra's responsive shot to the chest and their arrival and conduct. It answered the appellant's reliance on Jainul Haque through Bhoma Ram's caution that evidence of exhortation must be clear, cogent and reliable. It found the evidence met that standard and relied on the close analogy in Sandeep. Man Singh did not have to fire the shot himself, and a long-standing plan was not required. Paragraph 31 also recorded the Court's finding that an elaborate plan to kill the deceased appeared from the record. The findings of direct and constructive murder liability were beyond reasonable doubt, rather than merely prima facie.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the convictions and sentences imposed on 14 March 2011: life imprisonment and a ₹1,000 fine, with a default stipulation, on Narendra under Section 302 IPC and on Man Singh under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC. Man Singh's bail and surety bonds were cancelled, and he was directed to surrender immediately before the trial court to serve the remaining sentence. Narendra, who was already in jail, was directed to serve the remainder of his sentence. Copies of the judgment were to be sent to the concerned jail and, with the record, to the trial court for information and compliance. No remand, acquittal, sentence reduction or separate costs order was made.

Headnote :- Double jeopardy / pending regulatory penalty / no prior adjudication - Article 20(2) of the Constitution, Section 300 CrPC and Section 26 of the General Clauses Act did not bar an FIR merely because penalty proceedings under the Food Safety Act were pending. The applicant did not assert a previous criminal trial, conviction or acquittal, or an imposed penalty. The Court rejected his double-jeopardy objection at the threshold. It did not decide a hypothetical claim arising later in respect of the same offence.

Food Safety and Standards Act / IPC coexistence / no implied exclusion - State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, rejected the contention that a regulatory statute constituted a complete code excluding general criminal proceedings in the absence of a statutory bar. That decision concerned cooperative societies and corruption law. Applying its principle, the Court found that no provision had been identified in the adjudication, compounding and appeal scheme under Sections 68–71 of the Food Safety Act, 2006, which displaced investigation of the distinct allegations under Sections 420 and 272 IPC. Proceedings under food-safety Sections 51 and 26(2)(ii) could continue alongside them, subject to proof of their respective requirements.

Cheating / misrepresented milk quality / Section 482 threshold - The analyst reported milk fat of 0.4% against a minimum of 4.5%, and SNF of 8.2% against 8.5%. The sample was taken from an operating dairy. The Court reasoned that selling a substandard or adulterated product as pure and safe to unsuspecting customers could constitute cheating under Section 420 IPC. The operator claimed that the substance was residual sapreta which was not for sale. That claim, and the Court's observations concerning the absence of a notice or production licence, did not justify deciding disputed facts on the quashing application. Dishonest representation, inducement and an actual transaction were not finally established.

Adulteration / sale-purpose inference / IPC Section 272 - On the FIR and the circumstances in which the sample was taken, the Court found it premature to accept that the substance stored in the milk shop was residual sapreta which was not for sale. In the absence of a displayed qualification, its presence there could prima facie support an inference that it was intended for sale. The Court refused to quash the Section 272 allegation, leaving the substance's nature, intended use and the elements of the offence to be proved through the appropriate process. It did not hold that every substandard sample or mere possession in a shop establishes the offence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 18 November 2020, a Food Safety Officer raided Manish Milk Dairy, operated by Manish Gupta, and took a sample of material described as milk kept for sale. The Food Analyst reported that it was substandard: milk fat was 0.4% against a stated minimum of 4.5%, and solids-not-fat (SNF) was 8.2% against 8.5%. Crime No. 13/2021 was registered at Police Station Bairad, Shivpuri, for cheating under Section 420 IPC, food adulteration under Section 272 IPC and offences under Sections 51 and 26(2)(ii) of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006. Manish contended that the sampled substance was 'sapreta', a residue left after preparing other milk products, and was not intended for sale. He stated that separate proceedings under the food-safety framework were pending before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and relied on the Act's adjudication, penalty, compounding and tribunal mechanisms. He argued that the Act was complete in itself and that parallel IPC prosecution fell outside its scheme and amounted to double jeopardy. His application under Section 482 CrPC sought quashing of the FIR. The Court heard his counsel. His explanation of the product and the prosecution's allegation that it was meant for sale remained disputed, rather than established facts.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Madhya Pradesh v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, was quoted in rejecting the contention that the regulatory enactment was a complete code. In that case, the internal remedies under the M.P. Cooperative Societies Act did not bar recourse to general criminal law, particularly where allegations under the Prevention of Corruption Act and of conspiracy to cheat were involved. Authorities concerning the conversion of civil disputes into criminal cases did not apply to the alleged fraud there. The present Court applied the narrower principle that regulatory remedies do not extinguish distinct IPC allegations without a demonstrated statutory exclusion. It neither treated the Food Safety Act as textually identical to the Cooperative Societies Act nor held that every quality violation automatically establishes cheating. No other Supreme Court decision was materially considered. The Court reasoned directly from the constitutional and statutory double-jeopardy provisions, without attributing that reasoning to an unmentioned case.

3. Statutes considered : Article 20(2) of the Constitution prohibits prosecuting and punishing a person more than once for the same offence. Section 300 CrPC concerns a previous trial by a competent criminal court ending in conviction or acquittal, subject to its stated qualifications concerning distinct offences, later consequences and the court's competence. Its explanation states that dismissal of a complaint or discharge is not an acquittal. The Court quoted the entire provision and held that a pending food-safety proceeding, without a previous judgment on the merits, did not satisfy the premise of the double-jeopardy objection. It also referred to Section 26 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, and rejected the asserted bar because the applicant had not been punished under the Food Safety Act. Section 482 CrPC provided for review of the FIR under the Court's inherent powers at a prima facie stage.

Sections 26(2)(ii) and 51 of the Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006, were the regulatory provisions mentioned in the FIR concerning the sample. The Court recorded the analyst's substandard measurements without finally determining each statutory ingredient. Counsel invoked Sections 68–71 concerning adjudication, compounding and the appellate tribunal. The Court held that this penalty framework contained no identified express bar to ordinary IPC investigation. In its reasoning on Section 420 IPC, the Court considered the dishonest presentation of an adulterated or substandard product to customers as pure and safe, subject to the prosecution proving deception and the other elements. It separately considered Section 272 IPC in light of the disputed claim that the material was not meant for sale. The inference from its presence in the shop was provisional, rather than a final determination of adulteration or an intention to sell. No separate licensing charge was analysed.

4. Issues : (i) Did pending but unresolved food-safety proceedings before the SDM attract Article 20(2), Section 300 CrPC or Section 26 of the General Clauses Act so as to bar registration or continuation of the IPC FIR? (ii) Did Sections 68–71 of the Food Safety Act establish an exclusive regulatory and penalty mechanism which prevented general criminal prosecution for the distinct alleged deception and adulteration? (iii) Could the FIR and analyst's findings, assessed at the Section 482 stage, support the alleged dishonest presentation to consumers under Section 420 and sale-directed adulteration under Section 272, or did the sapreta explanation dispose of both allegations without evidence? The Court was not deciding guilt or finally adjudicating food quality.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first distinguished parallel proceedings from previous jeopardy. Article 20(2) requires previous prosecution and punishment for the same offence. Section 300's bar concerns a completed trial by a competent court and a conviction or acquittal which remains in force, subject to its exceptions. The applicant did not claim that any food-safety penalty had been imposed, still less identify a completed criminal trial or a judgment on the merits. The pending SDM proceeding could not, by itself, bar a later FIR. The Court also found Section 26 of the General Clauses Act inapplicable to the circumstances pleaded. Its analysis was confined to that absence of a previous disposition.

The Court then examined the contention that the Food Safety Act was a complete code. Its adjudication, compounding and appeal provisions could address breaches of that Act, but counsel identified no provision barring general criminal law. Rameshwar supplied the analogy that a regulatory remedy could not be assumed to displace a distinct criminal allegation. The High Court distinguished the regulatory counts from the allegations of cheating under Section 420 and adulteration under Section 272, and held that the police could invoke the IPC alongside the 2006 Act. That conclusion permitted statutory coexistence; it did not establish that every quality violation necessarily satisfies either IPC offence.

On Section 420, the Court noted the reported deficiency in milk fat and SNF and the fact that the sample was taken from an operating dairy. It reasoned conditionally that presenting a substandard or adulterated product as pure and fit for consumption, and selling it to unsuspecting consumers, could constitute cheating. It declined to decide on the quashing application the operator's claim that the substance was a residue not intended for sale. It observed that no indication that the material was not for sale had been shown, no licence to produce milk products had been produced and no explanation had been given for keeping the substance in the shop if it was not for sale. These were reasons to leave the allegation for proof. They did not establish that a particular buyer had been deceived, that a transaction had been proved or that dishonest inducement had been conclusively established.

As to Section 272, the claim that the material was not intended for sale remained disputed. From the shop setting and the absence of a notice, the Court inferred prima facie that the sampled substance was meant for sale and was not sapreta as claimed. That assessment did not finally determine the substance's classification or purpose under Section 482. The analyst's report described the sample as substandard, and the judgment also referred to adulterated products. The Court refused quashing at a prima facie stage without finally adjudicating the Section 272 offence. Both IPC allegations and the food-safety counts remained to be tested through the ordinary process.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application and refused to quash FIR Crime No. 13/2021 under Sections 420 and 272 IPC and Sections 51 and 26(2)(ii) of the Food Safety and Standards Act. A copy of the order was directed to be sent to the Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri, and the Bairad SHO for placement in the police case diary. No conviction, penalty, final determination concerning sapreta or milk quality, or separate costs order was made.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC / cognizable FIR / early investigation - Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, and XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, were reproduced on the cautious exercise of inherent power, the importance of police evidence-gathering and the impropriety of a roving inquiry before investigation. Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, requires reasons for interference which are grounded in the facts. Applying their common threshold, the Court found that the informant's account of abuse, threats and physical assault disclosed cognizable offences requiring investigation. It did not determine the truth of that account or the ingredients of an unspecified anticipated charge under a special statute. Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, was invoked for registration of an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence, rather than for deciding between the rival accounts.

Quashing standards / exceptional intervention / no mini-trial - S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, Varala Bharath Kumar v. State of Telangana, (2017) 9 SCC 413, and Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, were surveyed on protecting a legitimate prosecution while allowing intervention where allegations taken at face value disclose no offence, are absurd, encounter a legal bar or constitute an established abuse. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, reinforced that the inquiry is governed neither by rigid categories nor by an assessment of credibility. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, explained the prima facie ingredients test on the prosecution record, the overlap between civil and criminal liability and the limited relevance of special features in civil disputes. The Court found no ground to quash the cognizable FIR in this case.

Counter-blast / rival account / informant's motive - The applicants' account in their FIR concerning the same incident, including alleged assaults on applicant No. 1 and his sister and a threat of false implication, could not be accepted as true in order to quash the informant's FIR, which disclosed cognizable offences on its face. Applying its earlier Vijay Singh Jatav decision and the caution concerning an informant's alleged mala fides in Renu Kumari and the quoted Padal Venkata Rama Reddy survey, the Court left the rival versions to be tested by evidence. It declined to decide who had initiated the violence. An accusation of retaliation alone did not establish a malicious proceeding of the kind contemplated in Bhajan Lal on the material presented.

Defence material / contested facts / narrow exception - CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, disapproved findings on minute disputed defence facts under Section 482. Amit Kapoor likewise confined the inquiry to prosecution material. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognised exceptional consideration of a public document or one whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. The Court applied the general rule in paragraphs 23–28 because accepting the applicants' case would require choosing between competing FIR allegations. It identified no document falling within that exception and left credibility and guilt to the ordinary process.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 21 September 2023, at about 12:30 p.m., a mason went to the Gram Panchayat office in Katangikala to seek processing of his bill for constructing a platform. According to the FIR account placed before the Court, applicant No. 1, a Gram Rojgar Sahayak, abused him, referred to his caste, refused to process the bill and assaulted him with fists and blows. The complaint alleged that applicant No. 1's sister joined in, used caste language and slapped him. It also alleged that the applicants threatened to kill him and that applicant No. 1 tried to use a chair. The Sarpanch and others were said to have intervened. These remained reported accusations whose truth the Court did not determine. The order described registration of Criminal Case No. 460/2023 at N.K.J. Katni police station under IPC Sections 294, 323, 506 and 34. Its account of the caste-related allegations did not itself specify a charge under the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act in that FIR.

The applicants gave an opposing account of the same time and place. Their counsel stated that applicant No. 1 was completing Ladli Laxmi Yojana forms when the Sarpanch and others demanded that he fill in all the women's forms, abused him and struck him with a chair and a rod. His sister was also beaten, and he was threatened with false implication. They described the informant's FIR as a counter-blast and sought its quashing under Section 482 CrPC. They also apprehended a later charge-sheet under the SC/ST Act, but did not identify the particular anticipated offences in their application. The judgment recorded their submissions and the Court's analysis. It did not resolve either account on evidence, record a completed investigation or make a trial finding.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Judge cited and reproduced a broad survey of Supreme Court decisions before applying their common constraints under Section 482. Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, treated quashing before a proper investigation as premature unless continuation would amount to an abuse of process. Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, stressed the police's statutory power to investigate an offence which appears cognizable on the FIR, with rare intervention where the prosecution is malicious and vexatious. State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, quoted Swapan Kumar Guha on collecting material to prove a disclosed offence and Jeffrey J. Diermeier on the three purposes and cautious limits of inherent jurisdiction. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, reversed premature quashing where disputed allegations of coercion and blackmail required investigation and the High Court had conducted a roving inquiry. Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, required the quashing court to state the relevant facts and explain interference by reference to the governing principles. The Court used this group of decisions to define restraint during investigation. The facts quoted from those cases were not treated as facts of the panchayat dispute.

S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, reproduced the Bhajan Lal categories concerning allegations which disclose no offence on their face and established malicious prosecution. It also referred to Medchl Chemicals, Zandu Pharmaceutical Works and Shakson Belthissor as instances of exceptional protection against an untenable complaint. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, separately surveyed the principles for quashing charges under Sections 397/482: a prima facie factual foundation and basic ingredients, inherent improbability, express legal bars, the balance between the accused's liberty and legitimate investigation, avoidance of detailed evidence assessment or external defence material, and careful consideration of predominantly civil allegations. Its quoted explanation treated Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia's special civil-dispute considerations as limited in scope; it did not permit assessment of the likelihood of conviction in every case. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, added Bhajan Lal's caution against arbitrary quashing or an inquiry into reliability. State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, balanced intervention to prevent abuse with the need to allow a genuine prosecution to proceed, leaving ordinary evidential reliability to trial. These authorities formed part of the Judge's survey. Their exceptional grounds remained available in principle, but none was found established here.

Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, stated the ordinary bar on assessing an accused's defence documents. Citing Yin Cheng Hsiung, Bhajan Lal and Harshendra Kumar D., it recognised an exception for a public document or one whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. The present order identified no such document and did not adjudicate the applicants' competing account. Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, explained the exceptional and discretionary character of Section 482, alternative statutory remedies, the Bhajan Lal categories and Indian Oil's protection of a complaint with a factual foundation despite imprecise pleading. It also addressed the possibility that a civil transaction may constitute a crime and why Madhavrao does not generally authorise predictions of conviction. State of Orissa v. Saroj Kumar Sahoo, P.P. Sharma, Indian Oil and Madhavrao appeared within that quoted Supreme Court exposition; the High Court did not separately analyse those cases. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, reiterated that allegations which genuinely disclose no offence when accepted at face value may be quashed. M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, protected against absurd, inherently improbable or harassing allegations while cautioning against frequent premature interference. The High Court did not find that the complainant's allegations fell within those exceptions.

CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, disapproved detailed findings on disputed facts under Section 482 after cognizance had been taken; the accused's defence was for trial. Varala Bharath Kumar v. State of Telangana, (2017) 9 SCC 413, stated the exceptions concerning face-value ingredients and mala fides under Article 226/Section 482, while prohibiting an inquiry in the guise of appeal or revision or the stifling of a legitimate prosecution. Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, cautioned against assessing incomplete evidence by the prospect of conviction and treated an informant's alleged mala fides as secondary where a cognizable FIR exists. The additional cases listed within that quotation were not separately examined in this order. The High Court then relied on its own Vijay Singh Jatav v. State of M.P., MCRC No. 18651/2020 (11 January 2022), for the narrower proposition that an alleged counter-blast must be tested on evidence and cannot, by itself, justify quashing an FIR which discloses an offence on its face. Finally, it cited Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, in applying the duty to register an FIR where the complaint prima facie discloses a cognizable offence. Taken together, these precedents supplied a limited threshold inquiry; they did not independently determine either side's account of the panchayat incident.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, supplied the jurisdiction to seek quashing of the FIR. The Court recognised inherent power to prevent abuse or secure justice, but ordinarily not to determine guilt, compare rival police accounts or assess reliability before investigation where the FIR discloses a cognizable offence. The quoted Supreme Court passages also discussed Article 226, Section 397 revision, Sections 156(1) and 155(2) on cognizable and non-cognizable police investigation, Section 173(2) reports and Section 228 charge framing. Those were comparative doctrinal contexts. The present application was under Section 482, and no separate relief under the other provisions was decided.

The FIR was described as invoking IPC Sections 294, 323 and 506, read with Section 34, for alleged abuse, assault, threats and common intention. The Court did not finally determine each offence's ingredients or each applicant's liability. Although caste references formed part of the allegations, the applicants only apprehended future SC/ST Act charges and specified no such charged provision. The Court did not determine whether that Act applied. The Lalita Kumari principle concerned the threshold for recording cognizable information; no separate claim concerning a refusal to register an FIR was before the Court.

4. Issues : (i) Did the informant's FIR, taken on its own terms at an early stage of investigation, disclose cognizable offences so that collection of evidence should be left to the police, subject to the exceptional grounds under Section 482? (ii) Did the applicants' opposing account of the same incident and allegation of a retaliatory counter-blast establish a ground for quashing without resolving disputed facts? (iii) Could the Court prefer defence material supplied by the accused or determine which version was correct, and was there any document within the narrow exception or any established abuse? (iv) Was a sufficiently specified SC/ST Act charge before the Court for determination? The Court decided the first three issues at the threshold and noted that the fourth was unspecified. It did not determine any possible later charge.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first set out the Supreme Court's limits on premature quashing. Where FIR allegations accepted at face value disclose a cognizable offence, investigation should normally proceed so that the police can collect evidence. A court exercising Section 482 powers does not predict the result or conduct an abbreviated trial. Inherent jurisdiction nevertheless permits protection against allegations disclosing no offence, inherent improbability, a legal bar or sufficiently established malicious abuse. The Judge applied the extensive precedent survey to the applicants' request in paragraphs 22–29; it did not produce a separate holding on every hypothetical category. On the FIR account, the alleged public abuse, blows, slap, attempted chair assault and threats arising from payment for masonry work disclosed cognizable wrongdoing. This threshold conclusion did not prove the occurrence or finally classify each allegation in law.

The applicants claimed that applicant No. 1 and his sister had been beaten by the complainant's side and that the impugned FIR was retaliation for their own account. The Court held that choosing between those accounts would require a factual determination beyond Section 482. Its earlier Vijay Singh Jatav ruling left an alleged counter-blast to be tested by evidence before the trial court. The Supreme Court survey's caution that an informant's alleged mala fides are not independently decisive reinforced that conclusion. Demonstrated abuse could still justify intervention in a suitable case. Here, however, the applicants supplied a disputed rival account, rather than a basis for holding that the informant's allegations disclosed no offence on their face. The Court therefore neither accepted the complainant's credibility nor found the applicants' defence untrue.

Nor could the Court use the accused's disputed assertions to determine who assaulted whom. Amit Kapoor and CBI v. Arvind Khanna prohibit detailed appraisal of defence evidence in an ordinary quashing inquiry, while Mohd. Akram Siddiqui recognises a narrow exception for public or undisputed documents. The order identified neither a document within that exception nor a finally established fact which disposed of the FIR. The defence remained to be tested during investigation and trial. The applicants referred to possible future SC/ST Act allegations without specifying the relevant offences in their application. The Court made no independent finding on their ingredients or on whether a later charge-sheet could lawfully include them. Having found cognizable allegations, it applied Lalita Kumari's registration principle and declined to stop the investigation.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the applicants' Section 482 application and refused to quash Criminal Case/FIR No. 460/2023 at N.K.J. Katni for the specified IPC offences. It made no determination of the truth of either side's account or of a prospective SC/ST Act charge, and imposed no special conditions or costs. Investigation and any ensuing proceedings could continue according to law.

Headnote :- Alibi / Section 11 Evidence Act / burdens of proof - Vijay Pal v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2015) 4 SCC 749, and Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1997) 1 SCC 283, explain that an alibi is evidence of presence elsewhere which is relevant under Section 11 because it is inconsistent with the alleged presence at the scene. It is not an IPC exception. The prosecution must first prove presence and participation. An accused relying on absence must then provide positive, strict proof, while retaining the benefit of any reasonable doubt. Sk. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, (2010) 8 SCC 430, further states that failure to establish an alibi does not itself prove the prosecution case. The Court applied those qualifications to the claimed travel to Leh and Ladakh and the challenge to the FIR's identification of Manish son of Shivlal. Neither factual defence was established in the Section 482 proceeding; guilt was not determined.

Quashing / face-value allegations / mob incident - Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, and the cited S. Martin passage cautioned against stopping a cognizable investigation to assess the merits of the evidence. Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, required reasons linked to the facts. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, and CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, set out the exceptional grounds concerning allegations taken at face value, legal bars, inherent improbability and abuse of process. They did not authorise a trial of the defence at the quashing stage. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognised a narrow exception for a public or undisputed document; the order identified no such document. State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021 (30 June 2021), specifically rejected meticulous scrutiny of evidence and any requirement that the FIR be an encyclopedia. Applying the survey, the Court found that the named participant's alleged presence in the coercive procession and the reported attacks on police personnel and property disclosed offences at the threshold. Identity, alibi and the statutory charges remained for proof.

Quashing dismissal / arrest protection / Section 438 CrPC - M/s Neeharika Infrastructure Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeal No. 330/2021 (13 April 2021), was applied against routine, unexplained directions prohibiting arrest or coercive steps after refusal to quash, because such orders impair lawful investigation. The quoted passage also recognised exceptional, reasoned interim protection during a pending petition, the fact that arrest does not follow every FIR and the separate anticipatory-bail remedy under Section 438. The Court dismissed the Section 482 application and held that no interim protection from arrest could be issued after declining interference. It did not determine whether a separate anticipatory-bail application would satisfy its conditions.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 2 April 2018, a procession of members of a reserved category protesting provisions of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act passed through Lahar, Bhind. The FIR described roughly 300 persons pressuring shopkeepers near Lohiya Check Bazar to close their shops for a Bharat Bandh. Police allegedly told the crowd that compulsory closure was unlawful and tried to restrain and disperse it. A stone thrown from the crowd was said to have struck the SHO's back. According to the complaint, members of the crowd then pelted the police station with stones, damaging public property and injuring constable Anil Tomar below an eye. The FIR named Manish son of Shivlal among the participants. These were prosecution allegations, not established findings of guilt or of any particular act by this applicant. Crime No. 123/2018 at Lahar police station invoked IPC Sections 353, 332, 336, 147, 148 and 149 and Section 3 of the Prevention of Damage to Public Property Act, 1984. The subject of the protest was background; no SC/ST Act offence was adjudicated.

Manish Kumar Kartroliya sought quashing of the FIR under Section 482 CrPC. His counsel asserted that he had travelled to Leh and Ladakh and was absent from the scene. He also argued that the FIR did not establish that Manish son of Shivlal referred to him rather than a namesake. Alternatively, he sought protection from arrest if quashing was refused. The State opposed the application, pointing out that both his name and his father's name appeared in the FIR and that the alibi required cogent defence evidence. The applicant identified no other Manish son of Shivlal. Asked about the limits of Section 482, his counsel asserted that the Court had unlimited power to protect a person's dignity. The Court determined the threshold application, rather than a trial or a separate anticipatory-bail request.

2. Precedents — Considered : Vijay Pal v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2015) 4 SCC 749, was relied on for the burden and timing of an alibi plea. It reproduced Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1997) 1 SCC 283, which the Judge also quoted separately. Binay places alibi within Section 11 of the Evidence Act as a fact inconsistent with alleged presence, rather than as a statutory exception. In a prosecution for inflicting injury, the prosecution must first satisfactorily prove presence and participation. Only then must the accused's positive evidence of presence elsewhere exclude presence at the scene with strict certainty. Defence evidence of sufficient quality may still raise a reasonable doubt, and the prosecution's burden is not reduced. Vijay Pal referred to Gurpreet Singh, Sk. Sattar and Jitender Kumar as reiterations. The Judge also independently quoted Sk. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, (2010) 8 SCC 430, for rigorous positive proof of alibi and the qualification that its failure cannot itself establish guilt. The Court applied that law in declining to accept an unproved travel claim on the FIR-quashing record. It did not receive trial evidence on the plea.

The Court then reproduced Supreme Court authorities on quashing as part of its own reasoning. Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, disapproved premature quashing without proper police investigation unless continuation would abuse the process. Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, protected investigation of a prima facie cognizable offence, subject to rare intervention in malicious and vexatious cases. State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, quoted Swapan Kumar Guha on gathering evidence of a disclosed offence and Jeffrey J. Diermeier on the three purposes and cautious, non-arbitrary exercise of Section 482. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, identified the error in resolving disputed coercion and settlement facts before investigation. The short 'S. Martin (Supra)' passage likewise criticised an assessment on the merits before investigation was complete. Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, required reasons linked to the facts and precedent. These passages supported the Court's refusal to determine the asserted travel and identity at the initial stage.

S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, reproduced Bhajan Lal's exceptions for allegations which disclose no offence on their face and manifest mala fides, alongside the safeguards against untenable complaints in Medchl Chemicals, Zandu Pharmaceutical Works and Shakson Belthissor. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, set out the limits on quashing charges under Sections 397/482: an uncontroverted prosecution foundation, basic ingredients, extreme improbability or an express bar, careful balancing of liberty and prosecution, exclusion of external defence material and no meticulous prediction of conviction. Its quotation explained the civil-dispute context of Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia and the limited role of special features; it did not generally authorise an inquiry into the merits. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, stressed sparing exercise and the absence of an FIR-credibility trial. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognised a narrow possibility of considering a public defence document or one whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. No such document was identified as accepted here. State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, protected against both an abusive complaint and an accused's attempt to cut short a legitimate prosecution.

Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, was reproduced extensively on the discretionary power to secure justice, alternative remedies, the Bhajan Lal categories, Indian Oil's approach to pleading with a factual foundation, civil/criminal overlap and the limited relevance of Madhavrao's special civil-dispute features to predicting conviction at a preliminary stage. The many cases within that survey did not constitute independent factual determinations by the Judge. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, affirmed quashing where the prosecution case, taken at face value or uncontroverted, disclosed no offence. M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, retained protection against inherently absurd or harassing proceedings while warning against routine premature interference. CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, rejected findings on disputed facts and detailed appraisal of the defence under Section 482. In paragraph 9, the Judge drew these principles together: ordinarily there can be no roving inquiry, while an uncontroverted account which genuinely discloses no offence may be quashed. State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021 (30 June 2021), then supplied the directly relevant caution that an FIR need not be an encyclopedia and its material must not be examined as though the Court were trying the case. The Court applied those principles to the procession and police-station allegations without finally determining personal liability.

On the separate request for arrest protection, the Court applied M/s Neeharika Infrastructure Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeal No. 330/2021 (13 April 2021). The quoted judgment distinguished exceptional, reasoned interim orders in a properly pending quashing case from blanket directions against arrest or coercive steps, particularly after dismissal. Such directions could obstruct police investigation and custodial inquiry. Arrest did not inevitably follow an FIR, and anticipatory bail was available under Section 438 CrPC. Asian Resurfacing and Hema Mishra were discussed within the Neeharika quotation concerning delay, reasoned stay orders and the sparing use of Article 226 for relief before arrest. Those other settings were not separately decided in this case. The Court refused to use the failed quashing petition to protect the applicant from arrest.

3. Statutes considered : Section 11 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and its illustration concerning presence elsewhere supplied the relevance of an alibi. The Court treated the accused's evidentiary burden as heavy once the prosecution had discharged its initial burden of proving presence. The prosecution still had to prove its case independently beyond reasonable doubt, and sufficiently credible defence evidence could entitle the accused to the benefit of a reasonable doubt. Section 482 CrPC governed both the quashing request and the distinct request for interim protection, with factual examination restricted at that stage. Through Neeharika, Section 438 CrPC was identified as a separate remedy for apprehended arrest; no application under it was adjudicated here. The quotations also mentioned Article 226 and CrPC Sections 155(2), 156(1), 173(2), 228 and 397 in explaining related limits. No separate claim under those provisions was decided.

The registered offences were IPC Sections 353 and 332, concerning alleged force or injury against police discharging their duty; Section 336, concerning danger to safety; Sections 147 and 148, concerning rioting and alleged armed rioting; and Section 149 (common-object liability). Section 3 of the Prevention of Damage to Public Property Act, 1984, was also invoked. The Court found only that the uncontroverted account of the procession, police assault and station damage prima facie disclosed an offence. It did not conduct a trial-stage examination of every ingredient or determine this applicant's liability on each count. The Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Act was the reported subject of the procession, rather than a charged offence in this FIR.

4. Issues : (i) Could a suspect named in the FIR obtain quashing under Section 482 by asserting that he was in Leh and Ladakh or was a different person, without evidence establishing alibi or misidentification? (ii) Did the FIR allegations of coerced market closure, stones directed at police and damage to the police station disclose offences at the face-value threshold, while leaving the applicant's individual participation and the charged ingredients for later proof? (iii) After refusing quashing, could the Court nevertheless direct that the applicant not be arrested, or should relief before arrest be considered through the appropriate statutory route and the narrow standards governing reasoned interim protection?

5. Ratio / Findings : The FIR named Manish son of Shivlal. The applicant disputed identification but identified no other Manish with that father's name. The Court placed on him the burden of establishing that the person named in the FIR was not himself. His further claim that he was away in Leh and Ladakh could not be conclusively tested on counsel's assertion alone. The Judge applied Vijay Pal, Binay Kumar Singh and Sk. Sattar on positive, strict proof of presence elsewhere after the prosecution establishes presence, while retaining the prosecution's separate duty to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt. Refusal to accept the alibi at this preliminary stage therefore neither proved presence at the scene nor turned rejection of a defence into proof of guilt. Its precise effect on identification and participation remained for evidence.

In assessing the FIR, the Court did not determine whether every crowd member had committed every alleged act. For the limited quashing inquiry, it accepted the allegations of attempted compulsory shop closure, disregard of police requests, a stone from the crowd injuring the SHO, and a subsequent attack on the station which injured a constable and damaged property. Those allegations prima facie disclosed a cognizable offence. The named participant's denial, travel claim and identity challenge did not mean that the uncontroverted prosecution account disclosed no offence. The Supreme Court survey supplied both the limited grounds for intervention and the prohibition on trying disputed facts. Kunwar Singh reinforced that an FIR need not contain every evidential detail. The Court found no justification for Section 482 interference, without determining guilt under the IPC or the public-property statute.

Finally, the Court considered arrest protection separately from quashing. Neeharika permits an exceptional, reasoned interim direction in a suitable pending matter within strict limits, but disapproves routine blanket protection, especially where the challenge itself fails. Such protection can impede investigation and possible custodial questioning. Registration of an FIR does not, however, require arrest in every case, and Section 438 provides a distinct remedy where its conditions are satisfied. After declining interference under Section 482, the Court held that no interim order protecting the applicant from arrest could be issued and refused the alternative request. It did not determine the merits of any future bail application.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed MCRC-39483-2021, leaving Crime No. 123/2018 at Lahar, Bhind, to proceed under the specified IPC and public-property provisions. It neither quashed the FIR nor directed non-arrest, and imposed no further condition in the operative order. Identity, alibi, individual participation, guilt and any properly presented Section 438 request remained for the appropriate lawful forums.

Manish Kumar Kartroliya v. State of M.P. and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 39483/2021, 05/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- IPC Sections 375 and 377 / amended sexual-act definition / cohabiting spouses - The Court compared Section 375 before and after the 2013 amendment. It held that the amended clauses (a)–(d) encompass specified penetration and other sexual acts described as unnatural. It read Exception 2, which its order quoted as applying where the wife was not under fifteen, as excluding a husband's sexual acts with his wife from rape during a valid, subsisting marriage while they lived together. It referred to Section 376B for spouses living separately. On that statutory reasoning, the Court held that the wife's allegations of unwanted acts did not disclose an offence under Section 377 against this husband, even if accepted at face value, and quashed the FIR.

Section 377 / navtej singh johar / consent and Constitutional limit - The referring order in Navtej Singh Johar v. Union of India, (2018) 1 SCC 791, framed the constitutional question concerning consenting adults. The Constitution Bench decision, (2018) 10 SCC 1, invalidated Section 377 insofar as it criminalised consensual same-sex conduct between adults, upheld liberty, equality, dignity and private intimate choice, and overruled Suresh Kumar Koushal. The present Court considered consent ordinarily necessary to take adult conduct outside Section 377, but applied its separate analysis of the marital exception to the accused husband and wife. Navtej did not itself decide the position of non-consensual marital acts or confer general immunity for non-consensual conduct. The Court found support in the coordinate Bench decision in Umang Singhar v. State of Madhya Pradesh.

Section 482 CrPC / scope of decision / Section 506 - Accepting the wife's FIR account at face value for the threshold inquiry, the Court found that no offence under Section 377 arose on its interpretation of the law. It did not decide the husband's claim that the delayed second report was an afterthought. The operative order quashed Crime No. 377/2022 and the applicant's criminal prosecution as a whole. The Court made no factual finding that the allegations were false or that the wife had consented.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Manish Sahu and respondent No. 2 married on 18 May 2019 according to Hindu rites. She alleged physical and mental harassment by her in-laws over dowry and said that she had lived at her father's home since 14 February 2020. A separate cruelty trial was pending. In her later complaint, she said that, on the night between 6 and 7 June 2019, after returning to the matrimonial home following marriage, her husband subjected her to 'unnatural sex' and repeated the conduct on other occasions. She alleged that he threatened to divorce her if she told anyone, which was why she had omitted the allegation from her first report. She further alleged that, after a Family Court date on 18 July 2022, he threatened to repeat the conduct if she met him. She told her mother about the earlier acts and reported them to the police on 24 August 2022. These remained the complainant's allegations, rather than proved events or judicial findings about actual consent. The FIR was first registered at zero number at Kotwali, Narsinghpur, then transferred to Kotwali, Jabalpur, where it became Crime No. 377/2022 under IPC Sections 377 and 506. The petition referred to the pending Sessions Trial No. 642/2022. The husband sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC. His counsel argued that Section 377 did not criminalise the alleged acts between spouses and challenged the later report as an afterthought because the wife had omitted those allegations from her first complaint. Counsel for respondent No. 2 opposed the asserted marital exemption for unnatural sexual acts and noted that a charge-sheet had been filed. The wife alleged that the parties had separated by February 2020. The sexual acts on which the Court based its analysis were alleged to have occurred in 2019, while they were living together; the later Family Court threat did not specify a new sexual act during separation. The order did not identify the wife's age, make a finding on the evidence about consent, or resolve the merits of the earlier cruelty case.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court first reproduced the referring order in Navtej Singh Johar and Others v. Union of India, Ministry of Law and Justice, (2018) 1 SCC 791. The challenge to Section 377 was confined to consenting sexual acts between adults; carnal intercourse with animals and acts involving children fell outside that referred question. The order recorded the need for a larger Bench to reconsider Suresh Kumar Koushal v. Naz Foundation because consent, privacy and constitutional protection were at issue. The present Judge used the referral to frame the consent question and did not treat it as a final decision decriminalising an act.

The Court then quoted the Constitution Bench decision in Navtej Singh Johar and Others v. Union of India through Secretary, Ministry of Law and Justice, (2018) 10 SCC 1. The quoted paragraphs addressed the unconstitutional application of Section 377 to consensual conduct between adults of the same sex. They discussed sexual orientation and explained how dignity, autonomy, privacy, liberty, equality and equal citizenship protect intimate choices. The Bench overruled Koushal on that point. The High Court inferred that consent would ordinarily take intimacy between adults of the same or different sexes outside Section 377, and recognised the corresponding importance of non-consent. The Supreme Court's constitutional holding was specifically framed around consenting same-sex adults; the reproduced passage did not purport to decide the position of non-consensual acts within marriage. The High Court reached its further conclusion through its own reading of IPC Section 375 and Exception 2, rather than through a direct ruling in Navtej on these marital circumstances.

The Judge also cited the coordinate Bench decision in Umang Singhar v. State of Madhya Pradesh as supporting the result on Section 377 in a marital setting.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC provided the inherent jurisdiction to quash a prosecution that, on the Court's interpretation, disclosed no offence under Section 377 even if the complainant's factual account was accepted. The Court compared the earlier form of IPC Section 375 with the definition introduced by the 2013 amendment. It noted that clauses (a)–(d) included several forms of penetration by the penis, an object or another body part, and oral contact, subject to the provision's listed circumstances and explanations about consent. The Court specifically reasoned that penile penetration of the mouth, urethra or anus was included after the amendment.

The order reproduced Section 375 Exception 2 with wording that referred to a wife not under fifteen years of age. It treated that quoted marital exception as applicable during a subsisting marriage while the spouses lived together, and referred to Section 376B as governing sexual acts with a wife living separately, whether by judicial separation or otherwise. The Court interpreted IPC Section 377 by reference to Navtej and Section 375. IPC Section 506 was listed in the FIR for the alleged threat. The earlier cruelty matter and dowry allegations formed the background; they were not counts adjudicated in this proceeding.

4. Issues : (i) Did an FIR alleging repeated unwanted sexual acts by a husband against his wife while they lived together in a valid marriage disclose an offence under Section 377, given the 2013 expansion of Section 375 and the marital exception as read by the Court? (ii) What bearing did Navtej's Section 377 holding concerning consenting adults have on the complainant's allegation of non-consent, and did that holding itself determine the marital allegation? (iii) Did the omission of the allegation from her earlier complaint and the timing of the later report require a factual finding of fabrication? The Court decided the statutory question under Section 377, treated Navtej as relevant but not as the sole statutory basis for its conclusion, and expressly declined to decide the afterthought claim. The petition's prayer for relief encompassed the FIR, which also listed Section 506.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court began with the 2013 changes to Section 375. It considered acts involving the mouth, urethra and anus to fall within the expanded definition of rape, then asked whether the marital exception excluded those same categories of acts when committed by a husband against his wife during cohabitation. It read the quoted Exception 2 as covering sexual intercourse or sexual acts with his wife where she was not below the age stated in that exception, and referred to Section 376B as the contrasting provision for separated spouses. On the Court's construction, the wife's alleged lack of consent did not create liability for rape in that cohabiting-marriage setting, and the acts could not instead be prosecuted under Section 377. The application was therefore decided as a question of law, taking the allegations at face value. The Court did not determine whether any particular sexual act had occurred or had been consensual.

The Navtej referral and Constitution Bench passages addressed the constitutional protection of consenting adults and the invalidity of penalising consensual same-sex intimacy. The Judge stated that consent ordinarily takes adult acts outside Section 377, while absence of consent would ordinarily matter. The Judge reached a different conclusion for this husband by reading the amended Section 375 definition together with the marital exception, and found support in the coordinate Bench reference to Umang Singhar. The conclusion rested on that separate reasoning: the quoted Supreme Court decision did not itself hold that non-consensual marital acts were lawful.

Having held that Section 377 did not apply to the allegations as understood, the Court expressly declined further consideration of whether the later complaint was frivolous or an afterthought because of its timing. It made no credibility finding based on the wife's omission from her first report. In paragraphs 20–22, the Court concluded that the accusation, taken at face value, did not disclose an offence under Section 377 and quashed Crime No. 377/2022 and the applicant's prosecution. The FIR and petition also listed Section 506 for threats. The operative order applied to the prosecution as a whole; it neither laid down a separate rule concerning the alleged threat nor found the allegations false.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Section 482 application and quashed FIR Crime No. 377/2022 at Kotwali, Jabalpur, and the criminal prosecution of Manish Sahu arising from it. The petition described the prosecution as pending in Sessions Trial No. 642/2022 and listed IPC Sections 377 and 506. The order directed no remand and imposed no condition. It awarded no damages or costs and made no finding about the separate cruelty trial. The reasoned holding concerned Section 377; the operative order did not exclude the listed Section 506 count from the quashing.

Manish Sahu v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 8388/2023, 01/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (438) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 528 BNSS / early FIR quashing / police investigation - The Court applied the Section 482 CrPC authorities to the petition under the corresponding inherent-power provision of the BNSS. It quoted Neeharika Infrastructure Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, on the police duty to investigate an FIR that discloses a cognizable offence on its face, the exceptional power to stop an investigation that discloses no offence or abuses the process, the prohibition on a mini-trial of the allegations' genuineness, and the principle that an FIR need not be an encyclopedia. In paragraph 7, the Court collectively cited XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337; S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718; Ajay Kumar Das, (2011) 12 SCC 319; Mohd. Akram Siddiqui, (2019) 13 SCC 350; Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226; M. Srikanth, (2019) 10 SCC 373; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686; Kunwar Singh (30 June 2021); Munshiram, (2018) 5 SCC 678; Teeja Devi, (2014) 15 SCC 221; Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547; S. Khushboo, (2010) 5 SCC 600; Sangeeta Agrawal, (2019) 2 SCC 336; Amit Kapoor, (2012) 9 SCC 460; Padal Venkata Rama Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437; and M.N. Ojha, (2009) 9 SCC 682, for that common rule of restraint. It did not reproduce or separately apply each ratio. On the FIR account, the alleged group assault, injuries and threats disclosed a case for investigation; this was not a finding of guilt.

Alibi / photographs / positive proof - Vijay Pal v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2015) 4 SCC 749, and Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1997) 1 SCC 283, explain alibi as a matter of relevance under Section 11 of the Evidence Act. They require positive, strict proof that the accused was elsewhere, after the prosecution has satisfactorily established presence at the scene. Sk. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, (2010) 8 SCC 430, makes clear that a failed alibi never substitutes for prosecution proof beyond reasonable doubt. Applying these authorities, the Court declined to infer Prince's absence from photographs allegedly placing him 40–50 kilometres away. His factual defence remained open for proper proof; it could not be established on the Section 528 application by merely looking at the photographs.

Cross-FIR / filing sequence / aggressor - The fact that the applicants' FIR was lodged at 10:49 a.m. and the respondent's at 14:58 did not by itself prove that the latter was retaliatory. The later FIR described police referral, medical examination and hospitalisation before reporting. Photographs produced by the applicants showed an encounter, including an image that counsel conceded showed Ashu holding the opposing man's collar, but could not establish who initiated the violence. Even if the incident were treated as a free fight, liability would depend on each participant's own acts. Applying the test of taking the allegations at face value without a mini-trial, the Court declined to identify the aggressor or quash Crime No. 652/2024.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : According to the FIR in Crime No. 652/2024 at Morar, Gwalior, the complainant and his brother-in-law Suraj Pal were sitting outside their home on 24 November 2024 at about 8:30 a.m. Their neighbours, Manish Shivhare, his nephew Anshu or Ashu, and Prince, allegedly came there because of old enmity. The complaint alleged abuse, a push that caused Suraj Pal to fall, kicks and blows, bleeding from his head, a bite by Manish near the right shoulder, and threats to kill if a report was made. It named the complainant's brother Sunil and neighbour Saligram Kankar as witnesses who intervened. It stated that the police sent the injured man to District Hospital, Morar, where he was admitted, before the complainant returned to report the incident. The FIR alleged offences under Sections 296, 115(2), 118(1), 351(3) and 3(5) of the Bharatiya Nyaya Sanhita, 2023. These remained allegations, rather than final findings about any individual's conduct or the classification of injuries. The applicants sought quashing of the FIR and any trial proceeding under Section 528 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023. They relied on their own FIR in Crime No. 651/2024, lodged at 10:49 a.m. that day, whereas the complainant's report was recorded at 14:58. According to the applicants, their neighbours accused them over the removal of a roadside platform by a municipal team the previous day, then abused and assaulted them. They alleged a stick blow to Manish's forehead and an injury to his shoulder. They said that, despite their request for a fair investigation, the police pressed them to compromise. They also relied on photographs to assert that applicant No. 3, Prince, was 40–50 kilometres away. Counsel conceded that one image produced by the applicants showed Ashu and Shivkumar Baghel holding each other's collars. The order spells the second applicant's name as Anshu in the FIR narration and Ashu in the photograph discussion. The Court examined the competing allegations for the limited purpose of deciding whether to quash the FIR; it did not conduct a trial of either account.

2. Precedents — Considered : In paragraph 7, the Court grouped sixteen Supreme Court citations in support of a common rule under Section 482 CrPC/Section 528 BNSS: proceedings may be quashed at the threshold only if the uncontroverted prosecution allegations disclose no offence. The Court does not decide the accused's defence, and the informant's alleged motive becomes secondary where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. It listed XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337; State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718; Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319; Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350; State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226; M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686; State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021 (30 June 2021); Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678; Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221; State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547; S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600; Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336; Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460; Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437; and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682. The present order stated only their shared test and did not reproduce individual passages or make separate holdings based on their particular facts. The order relied on the listed authorities for that common proposition; it did not separately analyse their unquoted ratios.

Neeharika Infrastructure Private Limited v. State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, was quoted at length and applied. The quoted summary recognised the police's statutory right and duty to investigate cognizable offences, the ordinary rule against judicial interference at the initial FIR stage, and the prohibition on an inquiry into the allegations' reliability. It also recognised exceptional, carefully exercised quashing where the allegations disclose no offence or non-intervention would cause a miscarriage of justice. An FIR need not state every detail while investigation is ongoing. If the investigation reveals no substance, the police may submit an appropriate report to the Magistrate. The passage distinguished the police's fact-finding role from the court's power to prevent abuse of process, and stressed that 'rarest of rare' in this procedural context differs from the capital-sentencing standard. The present Court applied these principles in declining to choose between the two assault accounts on the basis of photographs or reporting times. Neeharika's nested references to R.P. Kapur, Bhajan Lal and Khwaja Nazir Ahmad formed part of its quoted background; this Judge did not independently analyse them.

On alibi, the Court quoted Vijay Pal v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2015) 4 SCC 749, for the burden of positive proof that follows satisfactory prosecution proof of presence. Vijay Pal reproduced Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1997) 1 SCC 283, which the present Judge also quoted separately. An alibi concerns a fact about the accused's presence elsewhere that is inconsistent with presence at the scene and is relevant under Section 11 of the Evidence Act; it is not an IPC exception. Once the prosecution establishes presence, strict proof that the accused was elsewhere must exclude the possibility of presence at the scene. Defence evidence may nevertheless raise a reasonable doubt, and the prosecution retains its independent burden of proof. Sk. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, (2010) 8 SCC 430, was quoted for positive proof and the essential qualification that failure of an alibi never by itself proves guilt. Gurpreet Singh and Jitender Kumar appeared within the quoted Supreme Court discussion; the present Judge did not separately apply those cases to distinct issues. The Judge used these principles to leave Prince's photographic alibi for proof in evidentiary proceedings, without pronouncing it false.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS was expressly invoked to seek quashing in December 2024. In applying the new Code's inherent-power provision, the Judge explained the established limits under Section 482 CrPC; the references to the two provisions did not signify two applications by the parties. The Neeharika quotation referred to CrPC investigation provisions and the relationship between police duty and judicial power. The quoted alibi authorities discussed Section 11 of the Indian Evidence Act to explain the relevance of facts placing the accused elsewhere and the sequence of evidentiary burdens.

The impugned FIR alleged offences under BNS Sections 296 (abusive conduct), 115(2) and 118(1) (hurt allegations, including the alleged manner), 351(3) (threat), and 3(5) (common intention), as listed in the judgment. The Court treated the alleged assault and threat as disclosing a cognizable offence on their face for the purpose of deciding the quashing application. It neither made a final medical classification of the injuries nor established every element of each count or collective liability. The applicants' earlier FIR set out their own factual account, but the Court did not decide its charges or the result of its prosecution.

4. Issues : (i) Did the complainant's FIR disclose a cognizable offence on its allegations for the purposes of Section 528 BNSS, despite the conflicting same-day FIR, photographs and complaint about the fairness of the police? (ii) Did the photographs said to place Prince 40–50 kilometres away establish an alibi at this stage, or did that defence require positive evidence in the appropriate proceeding, with the prosecution's ultimate burden intact? (iii) Did the earlier timing of the applicants' FIR prove that the later report was a retaliatory counter-blast, or did the later report's police and hospital sequence and the images leave the identity of the aggressor to be determined on evidence? The Court decided the threshold question and declined to determine individual guilt, the completeness of the police investigation or ultimate credibility.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying Neeharika and the collectively cited quashing authorities, the Judge considered whether the impugned FIR, taken at face value, disclosed an offence. The inquiry was not which side would succeed after witnesses, photographs and medical material were tested. The alleged assault by three neighbours, head injury and bite, medical referral, intervening witnesses and death threat met that limited threshold. The Court could not conduct a mini-trial or determine the genuineness of the rival allegations in the Section 528 proceeding. It did not thereby find that the injuries were finally proved or that each applicant had committed every charged offence.

Prince's claim that he was away from the scene was also disputed. Merely looking at the submitted photographs could not establish his whereabouts at the material time. The cited alibi authorities require positive, cogent proof in the proper evidentiary sequence, while preserving the prosecution's independent burden to prove presence and participation beyond reasonable doubt. The Court's refusal to quash on the basis of the photographs was not a final finding against Prince's defence.

In considering the counter-blast allegation, the Judge looked beyond the sequence in which the police recorded the reports, without accepting either FIR as true. The applicants' FIR was lodged at 10:49 a.m. and the respondent's at 14:58. The latter, however, stated that the police first sent the injured Suraj Pal for hospital care and that he was admitted before the complainant returned to report the incident. The applicants' photographs showed an actual confrontation. The conceded image of Ashu holding the opposing man's collar showed his involvement in an encounter, but did not by itself identify the initial aggressor or fully establish each person's acts. The Court stated that, even in a free fight, each person would be responsible for his own acts. It rejected the applicants' claim that the later FIR was a counter-blast and declined to adjudicate who initiated the clash. It expressed no view on the findings at a later trial or on every aspect of the alleged police pressure to compromise.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. It declined to quash Crime No. 652/2024 and any consequential proceeding on the grounds urged under Section 528 BNSS. It made no final finding about the rival Crime No. 651/2024, Prince's whereabouts or any applicant's culpability. The order gave no independent direction for investigation and imposed no conditions or costs.

Manish Shivhare and Others v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 52314/2024, 19/12/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Attempt to murder / Section 307 IPC / intent and act distinct from wound result - State of M.P. v. Harjeet Singh, (2019) 20 SCC 524, drew on R. Prakash, Mohan and Jage Ram to explain that Section 307 requires the requisite intention or knowledge together with an overt act. Intention is assessed from the weapon, words, motive, target, severity and surrounding circumstances; grievous or life-threatening harm or a wound on a vital part is not essential. State of M.P. v. Kanha, (2019) 3 SCC 605, and State of M.P. v. Saleem, (2005) 5 SCC 554, were separately quoted for the distinction between the act and its result, including the principle that a simple injury does not by itself exclude Section 307. The High Court found the trial judge's reliance on the absence of great force incomplete in the context of an abdominal knife blow and an attempted second blow. It nevertheless left the acquittal undisturbed: the State had not appealed it and, after nineteen years, the Court considered that no useful purpose would be served by a show-cause notice. The conviction remained under Section 324, rather than Section 307.

Injured witness / undocumented history / Section 324 conviction - The doctor who prepared the MLC stated orally that the patient had described an unknown knife assailant. The MLC contained no such account, the injured witness had not been confronted with it, and the other testimony did not support the claimed hospital inquiry. The Court accepted the injured complainant's identification, the supporting eye-witness account and the treatment record, and affirmed Manish Bhadoriya's responsibility for the knife wound under Section 324. This was a finding on the evidence in the case. It did not disturb the Section 307 acquittal, which the State had not appealed, or the Arms Act acquittals.

Sentence / long appellate delay / conditional fine - Section 324 prescribed no minimum term. Taking account of the absence of any cited criminal history, twelve days already spent in custody and more than nineteen years since the incident, the Court replaced the one-year rigorous-imprisonment sentence with the period already undergone and increased the fine from ₹1,000 to ₹15,000. The fine had to be deposited by 29 February 2024; otherwise the trial court's jail sentence would revive. The Court affirmed the conviction, cancelled the bail and surety bonds and allowed the appeal only to that extent.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 10 December 2004 at about 11:30 p.m., Shailesh Saraswat was returning home with friends when he stopped at a paan shop near a medical store. According to the prosecution, Manish Bhadoriya abused and threatened him and his family, pushed him and, as Shailesh tried to leave, stabbed him in the abdomen with a knife. Bystanders allegedly prevented a second blow. Shailesh told his wife Shalini and brother-in-law Avinash, who took him for treatment. Avinash lodged a Dehati Nalishi. The police later seized a knife, and a charge-sheet alleged attempted murder under Section 307 IPC and offences under Arms Act Sections 25/27. This was the prosecution's account of the incident; the High Court examined the identity and injury evidence in the appeal against conviction.

At trial, the prosecution examined the injured Shailesh (PW-2), treating doctor Dr. Ashutosh (PW-1), Shalini (PW-3), Avinash (PW-5), eye-witness Raja Shukla (PW-9) and others. The defence examined Dr. P.K. Jain (DW-1), who had prepared the MLC. On 28 June 2006, the Sessions Judge, Bhopal, in Sessions Trial No. 25/2005, acquitted the appellant of the Section 307 and Arms Act charges but convicted him under Section 324 IPC. The sentence was one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000, with a stated default term of three months' rigorous imprisonment. The State filed no appeal against the Section 307 acquittal. Manish appealed against his conviction and sentence under Section 374 CrPC. His counsel chiefly sought a sentence limited to the period already undergone after about nineteen years, referring to his twelve days in custody and the absence of a minimum sentence under Section 324. The State opposed the appeal but acknowledged that it had not appealed the Section 307 acquittal.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Madhya Pradesh v. Harjeet Singh, (2019) 20 SCC 524, was quoted for the requirement under Section 307 of intention or knowledge that the act may cause death, coupled with an overt act. The passage drew on R. Prakash v. State of Karnataka, (2004) 9 SCC 27, to distinguish the accused's act from its result: a bodily wound capable of causing death is not essential, although the injury may help establish intention. It drew on State of M.P. v. Mohan, (2013) 14 SCC 116, for the principle that hurt need not be inflicted on a vital part, and on Jage Ram v. State of Haryana, (2015) 11 SCC 366, for factors including the weapon, words, motive, body part and severity. The present Court stated the governing principle in paragraph 16 and quoted this collection in paragraph 17 when questioning the trial judge's reliance on the absence of great force. It did not use these authorities to convict this appellant under Section 307.

State of M.P. v. Kanha alias Omprakash, (2019) 3 SCC 605, was also quoted independently for the principle that grievous or life-threatening hurt is not essential. Intention may be inferred from the wound and surrounding circumstances, including the weapon and severity. State of M.P. v. Saleem alias Chamaru, (2005) 5 SCC 554, was quoted at greater length to explain that a simple or minor injury alone does not require acquittal under Section 307. The requisite intention or knowledge, coupled with an overt act, is sufficient even if no fatal result follows. Its references to Balram Bama Patil, Girija Shankar, R. Prakash and Sarju Prasad supported that point within the quotation; they were not separate factual rulings by this High Court. The High Court applied the common legal test in identifying the incomplete premise concerning the injury and force, but declined to issue a fresh show-cause notice because the Section 307 acquittal had not been appealed and considerable time had passed. No sentencing precedent was cited. The decision on the term and fine rested on the absence of a statutory minimum and this appellant's circumstances.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC provided the route for the appeal against conviction. The attempted-murder charge under Section 307 IPC required intention or knowledge and an overt act in the relevant circumstances. The Supreme Court authorities rejected treating the wound's capacity to cause death or its location as an indispensable ingredient. The High Court's legal discussion did not reinstate that charge. Section 324 IPC governed the affirmed conviction for voluntarily causing hurt with a dangerous weapon. The Court relied on the knife injury and noted the absence of a minimum term of imprisonment, which permitted consideration of a sentence limited to the twelve days already served, with an enhanced fine. The operative order did not reclassify the wound as a Section 307 offence. The appellant had been acquitted of the trial charges under Arms Act Sections 25/27, and those charges were not revived. The original sentence and its conditional replacement remain distinct: the judgment directs revival of the trial court's jail sentence if the enhanced fine is not deposited in time.

4. Issues : (i) Did the appellant cause Shailesh's knife wound, or did the defence doctor's oral assertion that the patient had described an unknown assailant undermine identification, although the MLC recorded no such statement and the injured witness had not been confronted with it? (ii) What was the correct legal test under Section 307 where the trial court had acquitted partly because the knife injury lacked great force, and could this appellant's unappealed acquittal be revisited in his conviction appeal after nineteen years? (iii) Was the Section 324 conviction sustainable, and did his age at the offence, the absence of any reported criminal history, twelve days in custody, the absence of a mandatory minimum and the long pendency of the appeal justify replacing the remaining term with the period already served, subject to an increased fine?

5. Ratio / Findings : The treating doctor described profuse bleeding from a stab wound in the lower abdomen, urgent ultrasound and exploratory surgery, removal of accumulated blood, no injury to internal organs, stable vital signs and satisfactory recovery. The defence MLC stated that bleeding prevented assessment of the wound's depth. Dr. Jain's later oral assertion that the patient had described an unknown assailant had no corresponding entry in the MLC. Counsel had not put that account to the injured witness in cross-examination. Shailesh did not say that the claimed MLC inquiry had occurred at Jai Prakash Hospital, and Shalini said that no such inquiry had been made by a doctor at the 1250 hospital. Shailesh's account as the injured witness and Raja Shukla's eye-witness identification supported the finding that Manish caused the wound. Shalini and Avinash had learned of the incident afterwards, and another prosecution witness turned hostile. The Court affirmed the Section 324 conviction and did not accept the undocumented oral history as a reliable contradiction.

The Court explained the legal limit of the trial judge's reasoning under Section 307. The depth of a single wound, the force used or the absence of injury to a vital organ cannot alone determine whether an act was done with intent to kill. Harjeet Singh, Kanha and Saleem require the mental element and an overt act, with the injury and surrounding circumstances serving as evidence. The allegation of an abdominal knife blow and an interrupted second attempt provided the context for that legal observation. However, the State had not appealed the acquittal and the incident was nineteen years old. The Judge considered that no useful purpose would be served by issuing a show-cause notice to the appellant concerning the Section 307 acquittal. The legal explanation therefore resulted in neither a new conviction nor a finding that every element of Section 307 was proved. The Arms Act acquittals also remained undisturbed.

On sentence, the Court considered that the appellant was 25 at the time of the 2004 incident, the prosecution had not alleged any criminal history, he had already served twelve days in prison, more than nineteen years had passed and Section 324 prescribed no minimum term. It relied on those circumstances to reduce the remaining jail term. The Court increased the fine to ₹15,000 and required payment by 29 February 2024. The modified custodial sentence depended on that payment; otherwise the jail sentence imposed in 2006 would revive automatically. The Court did not acquit the appellant or erase his conviction. It considered the passage of time together with the offence, custody already served and statutory sentencing range, rather than treating delay as a universal ground for release.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal only to the extent of modifying the sentence. It affirmed the Section 324 IPC conviction, held that the twelve days already undergone were sufficient imprisonment, increased the fine from ₹1,000 to ₹15,000, and required payment by 29 February 2024. If payment was not made in time, the trial court's jail sentence would revive. The Court left intact the Section 307 acquittal, which the State had not appealed, and the Arms Act acquittals. It cancelled the bail and surety bonds and directed transmission of the judgment and record to the trial court for compliance. The order prescribed no new standalone term of imprisonment if the enhanced fine was paid.

Headnote :- FIR / police inaction / alternate magistrate remedy - Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, distinguished the police duty to record information disclosing a cognizable offence from an entitlement to a writ compelling registration. An informant may invoke CrPC Sections 190 and 200 before the competent Magistrate. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, likewise directed a complainant alleging ordinary police inaction to the Magistrate. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, explained recourse to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), followed, if necessary, by an application under Section 156(3) for registration or proper investigation. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reaffirmed the Magistrate's power to secure and monitor proper investigation, rather than treating Article 226 as the routine first remedy. The Madhya Pradesh Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria recognised exceptions to restraint based on an alternate remedy, but the present Court found no basis for an exception on these facts. It dismissed the petition seeking action on representations, with liberty to approach the Magistrate under BNSS Section 223. It did not decide the merits of the complaint.

Investigation / accused's say / exceptional correction - The Court relied on Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, for the rule that an accused cannot select the investigating agency or dictate the manner of investigation, including by demanding court monitoring. The quoted discussion preserved exceptional Article 226 intervention where investigative power was shown to have been exercised mala fide, and required sparing use of the power to transfer investigation to CBI. Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v. State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626, supported the absence of a routine right to participate or receive a prior hearing during investigation. Its extended quotation of W.N. Chadha and other cases did not constitute separate adjudications in the present order. Divine Retreat Centre explained that, even in the rare case warranting constitutional intervention, the court may insist on lawful process but cannot direct how the police investigate. The Court refused the requested senior-officer inquiry and directions concerning the ongoing Kareli matters. It neither found the alleged mala fides established nor decided the criminal accusations.

Court monitoring / supervision / trial independence - Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, distinguished monitoring progress and fairness in rare, compelling cases from supervising investigative methods or shaping the report under Section 173(2), which could prejudge the trial. Applying that distinction, the Court held that directing the investigating agency to use a particular method would amount to supervision and declined to interfere. It ordered no court-monitored inquiry.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mankunwar Bai Jatav petitioned the Madhya Pradesh High Court at Jabalpur under Article 226. She asserted that the police had not inquired into complaints made by her and her husband to several authorities, including the Superintendent of Police, Narsinghpur. She sought directions to the State and police respondents to entertain their complaint against the private respondents and take action. She also sought production of the records of Kareli Police Station Crime No. 434/2024 under Section 25 of the Arms Act, dated 16 May 2024, and Crime No. 533/2024 under IPC Sections 420/380, dated 16 June 2024. She requested appointment of a senior police officer to inquire into her complaint and the timing and manner of the two cases concerning her husband. Her prayer questioned the chronology of complaints dated 4 and 14 May, registration of the Arms Act matter on 16 May, and an arrest or registration sequence involving 16 June. These were her assertions and requests, rather than facts found by the Court. Paragraph 2 of the order refers to the first crime as No. 434/2023, whereas the reproduced prayer refers to No. 434/2024. The State argued that a writ seeking FIR registration was ordinarily not maintainable because the petitioner could file a complaint before the Magistrate under CrPC Section 200, identified in the order with BNSS Section 223. The Judge treated the petition as seeking both action on representations and scrutiny of investigation in the two registered crimes. The Court did not adjudicate the merits of the complaints or either reported offence. It considered the proper forum and permissible scope of directions at the investigative stage.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted at length. It recognises the police's statutory duty to register an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence. If the police fail to do so, however, the aggrieved person may file a complaint before the Magistrate under CrPC Sections 190 and 200; the existence of the police duty does not itself determine entitlement to a writ. The quoted judgment reconciled earlier authorities on the duty with those on the complainant's remedy. The present Court relied on that distinction in declining direct writ relief, without deciding whether this petitioner's accusations were true. All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh, Minu Kumari, Ramesh Kumari and Lallan Chaudhary appeared within the Supreme Court quotation; they were not independently applied to the present facts.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, supplied two qualifications. The quoted paragraph 42 directed an informant alleging ordinary police inaction to the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200. Paragraph 41 preserved rare Article 226 directions where investigative power was shown to have been exercised mala fide and a clear case of abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII required intervention. Even then, the High Court could insist on lawful process but could not dictate investigative technique. The present Court relied on both propositions to reject routine management of investigation through a writ, without denying the constitutional power in every case. The reference to Gangadhar formed part of Divine Retreat's explanation.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted for the sequence of a written approach to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), followed, if necessary, by an application to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). The Magistrate can secure registration of an FIR or proper investigation and monitor the investigation. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, restated that a Magistrate who is prima facie satisfied may order registration or proper investigation and monitor progress. If necessary, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to the superior police officer, but does not personally investigate. The institutional reason was that routine Article 226 petitions for FIR registration or investigation would displace the ordinary Magistrate mechanism. The High Court relied on these cases in leaving the petitioner to that mechanism; it neither ordered registration nor decided whether the Magistrate would grant her application. In Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016, decided on 20 December 2016, the Madhya Pradesh Division Bench recognised that mandamus may be denied where the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, subject to the Whirlpool exceptions. It distinguished the police duty under Lalita Kumari from an automatic entitlement to a writ. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari appeared within that Division Bench passage.

Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was quoted for the rule that accused persons cannot select an investigating agency, dictate its methods or insist on court-monitored investigation as of right. Its discussion preserved Article 226 relief for demonstrated mala fide investigation and treated transfer to CBI as an exceptional constitutional measure requiring caution, rather than a routine response to allegations against local police. The facts concerning named accused and political ideology belonged to that Supreme Court case. The present Court applied the restraint on choosing the agency or method in rejecting the requested oversight. Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt, E. Sivakumar and the Constitution Bench decision in Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights appeared within the Romila Thapar quotation; they were not separately applied to the evidence in this petition.

Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v. State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626, was reproduced on the limits of a proposed or actual accused's participation during investigation and the absence of a routine entitlement to a prior hearing before investigative directions. It quoted W.N. Chadha to explain that investigation collects material rather than adjudicates against the accused, and Rajesh Gandhi on the absence of a right to select an agency. It also discussed further investigation and the opportunity to challenge evidence at trial. The present order decided neither a separate natural-justice application nor an actual CBI transfer. It relied on the quoted authorities for the narrower rule that an accused has no say in the method of investigation. Prabal Dogra v. Superintendent of Police, M.Cr.C. No.10446/2017, decided on 30 November 2017, was cited as a local High Court statement of the same rule, without further discussion of its facts.

Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, was quoted separately. It distinguished rare judicial monitoring of progress, fairness and freedom from external interference from supervision that tells investigators what to do. Such supervision risks influencing the police opinion and compromising the trial court's independence. The present Court adopted that distinction and held that a direction to investigate in a particular manner would amount to impermissible supervision. It did not institute monitoring or equate the Magistrate's statutory monitoring power in Sakiri Vasu with judicial direction of how evidence should be gathered.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution provided the basis for the writ petition. The Court treated extraordinary relief to compel routine FIR registration or direct investigation as constrained by the available criminal-process remedies. Through Divine Retreat Centre and Romila Thapar, it also acknowledged exceptional intervention for demonstrated abuse or mala fides. CrPC Section 154 imposes the duty to register information revealing a cognizable offence, while Section 154(3) provides written recourse to a superior police officer. On an appropriate application, Section 156(3) permits the Magistrate to direct registration or proper investigation and monitor it. Sections 190 and 200 provide the complaint and cognizance route discussed in Aleque Padamsee and Divine Retreat Centre. The quoted authorities also discuss Chapter XII investigation and Section 173(2) reports to explain the respective police and court roles; no final-report challenge was decided here. The State and Court referred to BNSS Section 223 as the contemporary Magistrate complaint route, and the operative order expressly gave liberty to approach the Magistrate under that section. Section 25 of the Arms Act and IPC Sections 420/380 identify the two crimes whose records or investigation were mentioned in the petition. No offence ingredients, guilt or validity of either registration were adjudicated.

4. Issues : (i) Where an informant alleges police inaction on representations, can the High Court direct FIR registration or inquiry under Article 226 without recourse to the statutory Superintendent of Police and Magistrate remedies, and was there any exceptional basis for direct intervention here? (ii) Could the petitioner obtain a senior-officer inquiry and High Court scrutiny or directions concerning how the two Kareli crimes were investigated, given the rule that a suspect or accused cannot choose the agency or method and the reserved power to correct mala fide abuse? (iii) What distinguishes permissible rare monitoring of fair progress from impermissible supervision of investigative steps? The order did not decide whether the complaints disclosed an offence, whether the husband committed either reported offence, or the merits of any eventual Magistrate application.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first distinguished the police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence from a litigant's entitlement to writ mandamus. Under Aleque Padamsee and Divine Retreat Centre, an informant aggrieved by ordinary police inaction must use the Magistrate complaint mechanism. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe show that the Magistrate has effective powers where registration is withheld or investigation is inadequate. Subject to prima facie satisfaction, Section 156(3) permits directions for registration, proper investigation and monitoring. The Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria recognised exceptions to restraint based on an alternate remedy, but the present Court found no circumstances warranting intervention. The representations and request for action did not lead the Court to decide the merits of cognizability. The petitioner remained free to approach the concerned Magistrate under BNSS Section 223.

As to the second aspect, the Court treated the requests for a senior police officer to examine the sequence of the husband's complaints, arrests and two case registrations, and for scrutiny of the investigative record, as attempts to influence ongoing investigation. Relying on Romila Thapar, Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki and Prabal Dogra, it held that an accused cannot prescribe the agency or method of investigation. The petitioner also asserted her position as a complainant. The quoted Divine Retreat Centre principle states that neither an interested accused nor an informant may select the agency. The order did not establish mala fide exercise of police power or a rare case of clear abuse warranting exceptional Article 226 intervention. Its dismissal therefore did not amount to an evidentiary endorsement of the police or a decision against the petitioner on the merits.

Finally, the Court applied Manohar Lal Sharma. In rare, compelling circumstances, monitoring may ensure fair and timely progress while leaving evidence gathering and the police opinion under Section 173(2) to investigators. Directing a particular inquiry or method would instead supervise the investigation, risk prejudicing the eventual trial and exceed the judicial role. The relief sought on this record would have required such directions, and the Court found no basis to interfere. It did not order monitoring, transfer the investigation, quash either crime or decide a complaint against any respondent.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition, with liberty to Mankunwar Bai Jatav, if she wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under BNSS Section 223 for redressal. It issued no direction to register an FIR, consider the representations in a specified manner, appoint a senior officer, produce the two crime records, or alter or monitor the ongoing investigations. The liberty did not predetermine the Magistrate's satisfaction or the outcome of any criminal matter.

Mankunwar Bai Jatav v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, W.P. no. 19888/2024, 14/08/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- PC Act / sanction / appellate failure of justice - State of Maharashtra v. Mahesh G. Jain, (2013) 8 SCC 119, explained sanction as an administrative decision based on prima facie satisfaction. The prosecution must prove a valid sanction through a reasoned order or evidence of the material considered by the authority; the court does not review it as a merits appeal or adopt a hypertechnical approach. Mohd. Iqbal Ahmed v. State of A.P., AIR 1979 SC 677, and State of Rajasthan v. Tarachand, AIR 1973 SC 2131, identified those alternative modes of proof and the prosecution's burden. Nanjappa v. State of Karnataka, (2015) 14 SCC 186, distinguished the Special Judge's ability to reject a prosecution lacking valid sanction from the restriction under Section 19(3)–(4) on appellate reversal without an actual failure of justice, taking account of when objections were raised. Here, the sanction dated 26 July 2016 set out the case in detail. PW-1 produced the record and proved the signature; no timely objection to proof through that witness or failure of justice was shown. The Court found application of mind and rejected the objection while affirming the conviction.

Hostile witness / corroborated admissible portions - Birju v. State of M.P., (2014) 3 SCC 421, Selvaraj v. State, (2015) 2 SCC 662, Podyami Sukada v. State of M.P., (2010) 12 SCC 142, and Ramesh Harijan v. State of U.P., (2012) 5 SCC 777, were relied on for careful scrutiny of relevant, admissible portions of hostile testimony that may support either side, with corroboration. Hostility does not justify either rejecting the entire testimony or accepting it automatically. Although Yogesh Kushwaha and his father Dara Singh resiled from their earlier accounts, Yogesh admitted voluntarily signing the complaints, transcript, trap papers and sealed articles. He also admitted his Lokayukta visits, travel with the team and entry into the Patwari's house. Panch and officer evidence supported those acts; the account involving an unidentified 'Netaji' was inconsistent. The Court rejected his retraction on the corroborated points, without treating signatures alone as irrefutable proof of every document's allegation.

Trap / returned notes / circumstantial receipt - Hazari Lal v. State (Delhi Administration), (1980) 2 SCC 390, recognised that receipt of gratification may be proved by a closely connected chain of circumstances without direct evidence of handover. It distinguished recovery unsupported by reliable surrounding circumstances. Here, the ₹3,000 marked notes were recovered from the complainant after he reported that the appellant had returned them. The appellant's hand wash was positive, the other washes were controlled, the serial numbers matched and the FSL reported positive solutions. The Court rejected a handshake explanation and inferred contact and receipt from the trap evidence taken together; it did not say recovery from the accused's pocket was necessary or that a positive wash alone proved every PC Act element.

Demand / inferential proof / pending reference - M. Narsinga Rao v. State of A.P., (2001) 1 SCC 691, explained factual inference under Evidence Act Section 114 from established surrounding circumstances, its rebuttable nature and the caution against building one discretionary presumption on another. Neeraj Dutta v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2019) 14 SCC 311, referred to a larger Bench the disputed question whether guilt could be inferred without the complainant's evidence or direct evidence of demand. The High Court stated that existing precedent remained in force pending that reference. It considered the signed demand complaints and transcript, trap contact and return, appellant's refusal to provide a voice sample, and the pending partition matter together and found the ₹3,000 demand established. The appellant submitted that the recorded conversation was not played in court and that no scientific evidence identified his voice. The Court's conclusion rested on the circumstances taken together in this case; it did not hold that Section 20 alone could supply proof of demand.

Voice sample / adverse inference / recorded conversation - Ritesh Sinha v. State of U.P., (2019) 8 SCC 1, recognised a Magistrate's power, in the statutory setting then before it, to direct a person to provide a voice sample for criminal investigation. It expressly declined to decide a privacy issue that had not been argued. The appellant refused the investigator's written request dated 26 February 2015 by his reply of 4 March. The Court drew an adverse inference, considered the complainant-signed transcript and the trap circumstances and found demand; this did not scientifically identify the voice in the recording or amount to a ruling on a newly issued Magistrate order in this case.

PC Act / official capacity / giver's belief - Chaturdas Bhagwandas Patel v. State of Gujarat, (1976) 3 SCC 46, construing former IPC Section 161, held that actual power to grant a favour is unnecessary where a public servant holds out an ability to help and induces the giver to act on that belief. The Court used this principle in applying PC Act Sections 7 and 13(1)(d)/13(2): the Patwari had prepared the partition papers, including an unequal proposal relying on affidavits; the Tahsildar had not yet decided the matter and the complainant continued to approach the Patwari. The defence that the Patwari had no remaining role therefore failed. His actual unauthorized steps and the giver's belief were both assessed; no final civil partition was determined.

Section 20 / foundational proof / rebuttal - The Court quoted the PC Act provision creating a rebuttable presumption where acceptance or obtaining of an undue advantage is proved in a Section 7 trial. M. Narsinga Rao distinguished factual inference establishing receipt from the subsequent statutory effect. The Court found demand and acceptance on combined evidence and rejected an absolute rule requiring direct complainant testimony. The presumption does not arise from a bare accusation or dispense with proof of the foundational receipt, and the judgment did not make Section 20 a freestanding presumption for Section 13.

False evidence / Section 340 CrPC / threshold complaint - K.T.M.S. Mohd. v. Union of India, (1992) 3 SCC 178, and State (NCT of Delhi) v. Pankaj Chaudhary, (2019) 11 SCC 575, required a prima facie case of a qualifying offence and a separate assessment that an inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. Inconsistency does not mechanically justify prosecution. Amarsang Nathaji v. Hardik Harshadbhai Patel, (2017) 1 SCC 113, and State of Goa v. Jose Maria Albert Vales, (2018) 11 SCC 659, recognised that a preliminary inquiry is optional where the court can form the required prima facie opinion; Pritish v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 1 SCC 253, did not require a would-be accused's hearing before that decision. On its view of Yogesh and Dara Singh's contradictory testimony and the partition circumstances, the Court directed the trial court to make a complaint. It made no final finding of guilt for false evidence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Manmohan Singh Jatav was the Patwari for a Shivpuri village. Dara Singh, after the death of his mother Binia Bai, sought partition/mutation of approximately 0.61 hectares involving his sisters Ram Bai and Vidhya. A Section 178 Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code application was filed on 7 October 2014. The Tahsildar required a Patwari partition proposal; Manmohan submitted the Fard Batwara/Batankan on 23 December. The proposed allocation gave Dara about 0.41 hectares and the sisters 0.20 between them, on the basis of affidavits, although the sisters had not personally appeared before the Tahsildar. The Tahsildar had yet to decide the matter and ultimately rejected the Fard on 20 January 2015.

These revenue details became significant to the defence assertion that the Patwari had nothing left to do, and to the Court's inference concerning the alleged earlier payment and the belief that the Patwari could help.

Dara's son Yogesh submitted a written complaint to the Special Police Establishment (Lokayukta), Gwalior, on 24 December 2014, alleging the Patwari demanded ₹20,000 for map/partition work, had received ₹8,000 and sought ₹12,000 more. The prosecution arranged for the complainant to approach the Patwari with a recorder. Its case was that the conversation on 26 December confirmed the demand. A signed transcript and copies were prepared with a Section 65-B certificate. A trap on 30 December used ₹3,000 in recorded serial-number notes treated with phenolphthalein. Yogesh entered the Patwari's house. On his signal, the trap party caught the appellant. The appellant's hand wash turned pink while the pre-trap and team control washes did not change colour. The money was recovered from Yogesh. At the scene, he reportedly said that the appellant had returned it after detecting powder or noticing the signal. The note numbers matched. FSL tests of the solutions were positive. The original recorder used on the trap day was later reported blank. The defence said that the incriminating audio was not played and the writer of the transcript was not examined. The appellant later declined a request to give a voice sample in writing.

After investigation and a sanction dated 26 July 2016, the Special Judge (Prevention of Corruption Act), Shivpuri, in Special Case No. 06/2016 convicted him on 19 March 2021 under Sections 7 and 13(1)(d) read with 13(2) of the 1988 Act. It imposed three years' rigorous imprisonment and ₹5,000 fine under Section 7, five years and ₹7,000 fine under the Section 13 count, with respective default terms of three and four months' imprisonment. The substantive sentences were concurrent. He appealed against the conviction and sentence under CrPC Section 374. He argued sanction lacked demonstrated application of mind, Yogesh and Dara turned hostile, no direct demand was proved, no notes were found on his person, hand contact came from a handshake, the recording was unproved and the Tahsildar alone could decide partition. The State relied on voluntary signatures, corroborating panch and trap witnesses, the hand-wash sequence and the pending revenue work. After addressing the conviction, the Court also considered whether the hostile father and son should face a Section 340 CrPC complaint for false evidence.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Maharashtra v. Mahesh G. Jain, (2013) 8 SCC 119, was quoted on the prosecution's obligation to prove a valid administrative sanction based on relevant material. That consideration may appear on the face of the order or be established by other evidence. The court does not review the adequacy of the material as a merits appeal or give undue weight to minor technicalities. Nanjappa v. State of Karnataka, (2015) 14 SCC 186, distinguished Section 19(3)'s appellate or revisional non-interference absent failure of justice from the Special Judge's own power to reject proceedings lacking valid sanction; Section 19(4) requires consideration of whether the objection should have been raised at trial. Mohd. Iqbal Ahmed v. State of A.P., AIR 1979 SC 677, required proof of the facts and satisfaction by the original sanction itself or evidence aliunde. State of Rajasthan v. Tarachand, AIR 1973 SC 2131, placed that burden on the prosecution but regarded a factually detailed sanction as sufficient without separately examining the decision maker. Tarachand's discussion of a Privy Council authority and Madan Mohan Singh formed part of its quoted reasoning. The High Court applied these four authorities to the detailed order, the record and PW-1, and the belated objection. It found both application of mind and the absence of appellate failure of justice; it did not assume that every defect was harmless.

Birju v. State of M.P., (2014) 3 SCC 421, states that admissible relevant portions of hostile evidence may support either side. Selvaraj v. State, (2015) 2 SCC 662, cautions that hostility during cross-examination does not necessarily displace corroborated evidence supporting the prosecution in examination-in-chief, and that reasonable doubt must arise from the evidence. Podyami Sukada v. State of M.P., (2010) 12 SCC 142, requires corroboration by reliable evidence as a matter of prudence before a conviction rests on hostile testimony. Ramesh Harijan v. State of U.P., (2012) 5 SCC 777, was quoted for careful scrutiny of admitted signatures on a memo and the need to separate dependable portions from embellishment. The Court applied the common rule to Yogesh's admissions and the corroborating panch and officers, and rejected the unspecified ‘Netaji’ narrative. It did not treat the father's hostile statement as affirmative proof of every bribe allegation.

Hazari Lal v. State (Delhi Administration), (1980) 2 SCC 390, was quoted at length for proof of receipt by circumstantial sequence, Evidence Act Section 114's permissible inference and the then statutory corruption presumption once receipt is established. It distinguished Sita Ram and Suraj Mal: bare recovery with unreliable substantive proof does not establish voluntary acceptance, but recovery together with reliable surrounding facts may. The High Court applied this reasoning to the different recovery circumstances here. The notes were found with the complainant after their reported return, but the positive wash and trap sequence indicated the appellant's contact with them. The Supreme Court's specific thrown-notes facts were not attributed to this Patwari.

M. Narsinga Rao v. State of A.P., (2001) 1 SCC 691, explained the meaning of 'proved' under the Evidence Act and the drawing of rebuttable factual inferences under Section 114 from proved primary circumstances. It cautioned against building one discretionary inference on another. It described how marked notes plus context may show voluntary receipt even where bare possession might admit planting. The High Court invoked it in considering the appellant's submission that possession had no legal significance without direct complainant evidence of demand. Neeraj Dutta v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2019) 14 SCC 311, was quoted for the referral to a larger Bench of whether inferential guilt under Sections 7 and 13 can be drawn without the complainant's direct or primary demand evidence. That referral was not treated as a final resolution; the Judge stated that existing rulings continued to apply unless displaced. These were the authorities and the procedural position discussed in this 2022 judgment.

Ritesh Sinha v. State of U.P., (2019) 8 SCC 1, recognised a Magistrate's power to order a voice sample for investigation in the CrPC setting then before it. The Supreme Court did so through judicial interpretation and Article 142. Its quoted passage expressly refrained from deciding a privacy question not argued. The Court cited it after reading the appellant's written refusal of an investigator's request, drew an adverse inference and combined that with the signed transcript and trap evidence. The discussion did not establish that a Magistrate had compelled a sample in this case or that Ritesh Sinha itself authenticated the recording. Modern Dental College, Gobind and K.S. Puttaswamy appeared within the quoted Supreme Court passage, not as separately applied privacy rulings here.

Chaturdas Bhagwandas Patel v. State of Gujarat, (1976) 3 SCC 46, interpreted former IPC Section 161: a public servant may receive gratification by holding out an ability to help, even without actual power or intention to grant the official favour, where the giver acts on that belief. The Court applied that logic to the Patwari's perceived continuing part in the partition matter; it also found that he had himself accepted and prepared papers without authority. It did not purport to decide the sisters' title.

K.T.M.S. Mohd. v. Union of India, (1992) 3 SCC 178, explained the cautious assessment under Section 340: a prima facie case of an offence affecting a court proceeding and a separate finding that inquiry is expedient in the interests of justice. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Pankaj Chaudhary, (2019) 11 SCC 575, articulated the same two preconditions and cautioned that contradiction alone does not establish intentional falsehood; it reproduced Amarsang Nathaji and Iqbal Singh Marwah's concern for impact on administration of justice. Amarsang Nathaji v. Hardik Harshadbhai Patel, (2017) 1 SCC 113, was then quoted independently for the principles that a preliminary inquiry is unnecessary where the court can otherwise form the prima facie opinion and that a complaint does not follow automatically. State of Goa v. Jose Maria Albert Vales, (2018) 11 SCC 659, reaffirmed that inquiry is optional and mentioned appeal and ensuing Magistrate procedure under Sections 341 and 343. Pritish v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 1 SCC 253, held the would-be accused has no right to participate before the court decides expediency. The High Court applied these authorities, expressly dispensed with a further preliminary inquiry and prior hearing, and directed a trial-court complaint against two witnesses, without adjudicating their guilt. Authorities nested within these quoted passages were not separately applied to the facts.

3. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 374 provided the route for the appeal against conviction. PC Act Sections 7 and 13(1)(d) read with 13(2) were the charges and convictions concerning the 2014 conduct for demand/receipt of illegal gratification and corrupt or abusive procurement of a pecuniary advantage. Section 19(1) requires previous sanction; subsections (3)–(4) regulate appellate reversal or stay for sanction defect, requiring actual failure of justice and consideration of when the objection should have been raised. The Court applied those provisions to the sanction order in evidence; it did not merely treat them as curing an absence of proof. Section 20 was quoted as a rebuttable presumption on proved acceptance or obtaining of undue advantage in a Section 7 (or 11) trial; the quoted provision concerns offences under Sections 7 and 11. Evidence Act Section 114 governed discretionary factual inference from proved circumstances; a Section 65-B certificate was described in the preparation of the audio material. The appellant submitted that the conversation was not played in court and that no scientific evidence identified his voice. Ritesh Sinha was cited on a Magistrate's power under the then CrPC to direct a voice sample, in the discussion of the appellant's refusal. The partition file arose under Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code Section 178 and supplied factual context for the claimed favour and the Patwari's role; the Court's remarks on affidavits and registered relinquishment explained its view of the proposed unequal division, rather than a final civil decree. CrPC Sections 195(1)(b) and 340 governed a court complaint for a qualifying offence affecting administration of justice, requiring a prima facie case and expediency; Section 340 permits, but does not always require, a preliminary inquiry and provides for a written complaint to a Magistrate. Quoted Sections 341 and 343 concerned appeal and later Magistrate procedure. The operative direction neither entered a final perjury conviction nor determined the witnesses' guilt under a particular IPC section.

4. Issues : (i) Did the sanction record and PW-1 establish a valid Section 19 sanction, and did the belated objection that the decision maker had not been examined demonstrate an actual failure of justice in the appeal? (ii) Could corroborated portions of hostile complainant and father evidence, trap paperwork and independent testimony be used, and did the marked-note return and positive wash prove actual contact rather than a handshake? (iii) In the absence of supportive direct complainant testimony and a recording played in court or scientifically matched to the appellant's voice, could demand and acceptance be proved by the cumulative circumstances, refusal of a voice sample and applicable factual/statutory inferences? The order acknowledged the reference to a larger Bench on inferential proof. (iv) Did the Patwari's assertion that only the Tahsildar could order partition negate a corrupt favour when his proposed partition work and the giver's belief remained relevant? (v) After the appeal decision, did the two witnesses' alleged false evidence justify a Section 340 complaint, a further preliminary inquiry or a prior hearing? These are separate from any later adjudication of the witnesses' guilt or the sisters' civil entitlements.

5. Ratio / Findings : On sanction, Arvind Sapate (PW-1) produced the record, identified the sanctioning authority's signature and denied that sanction had been issued without examining the papers. The 26 July 2016 order was detailed. The appellant never objected at trial to proving sanction through this witness or asserted that the decision maker had to testify because application of mind was challenged. Under Mahesh G. Jain, Iqbal Ahmed and Tarachand an order setting out the relevant facts may establish that they were considered; Nanjappa and Section 19(3)–(4) required actual failure of justice for appellate reversal, with attention to the delay in raising the objection. The Court affirmatively found application of mind and rejected the objection in the absence of such failure.

Yogesh admitted his signatures on the two complaints, transcript, multiple preparatory and trap panchnamas and sealed solution articles. He also admitted visiting Lokayukta and travelling with its party to the appellant's house, and acknowledged a conversation about partition. His courtroom assertion that an unidentified political 'Netaji' orchestrated everything provided neither a name nor a coherent explanation for those trips. It also conflicted with Dara's evidence that Yogesh had not accompanied him to the Tahsil, as Yogesh claimed. His account of telling officers that he had paid no bribe because none was demanded itself showed awareness of the purpose of the trap. Panch witnesses Anand Naik and R.P.S. Kushwaha described verification and trap steps; officers described the signal, washes, marked notes and recovery. The Court held that the shadow witness's inability to hear the conversation or see the payment did not weaken the prosecution case because he remained outside the house. Applying Birju, Selvaraj, Podyami and Ramesh Harijan, the Court accepted only portions corroborated by other material, while the father and son remained hostile.

The trap evidence placed the tainted notes initially with Yogesh; after he came out and signalled, the appellant's fingers produced a pink wash, unlike the earlier control washes, and the matching notes were taken from Yogesh. Team witnesses recounted Yogesh's immediate statement that the appellant gave them back on detecting the trap, and the laboratory found the solutions positive. The Court rejected Yogesh's trial explanation that a handshake accounted for the contact. It inferred that the appellant had handled the notes, though none were seized from his pocket, in the context described in Hazari Lal. The complaint and transcript signed by Yogesh set out the earlier ₹20,000 demand, ₹8,000 payment and subsequent ₹12,000 balance. The Court found that a ₹3,000 instalment had been demanded. The appellant submitted that the recorded conversation was not played in court and that no scientific evidence identified his voice. The investigator proved the appellant's written refusal to provide a voice sample, from which the Court drew an adverse inference in its discussion of Ritesh Sinha. Its inference depended on the circumstances taken together; it did not reason that a bare positive test or mere possession conclusively proved the necessary demand. M. Narsinga Rao informed the use and limits of factual inference, while the Court expressly acknowledged the Neeraj Dutta referral without purporting to resolve it. Section 20's quoted rebuttable presumption was considered in the same discussion; the Court found the foundational facts independently and did not separately extend the statutory presumption to Section 13.

The partition record defeated the claim that the appellant's involvement had ended. The Tahsildar had asked for Patwari papers; the appellant accepted affidavits from sisters who did not attend before the Tahsildar and submitted an unequal Fard. The proposed 0.41 hectares to Dara and 0.20 to the sisters together was rejected in January 2015, after the trap. The Court regarded that conduct as an unauthorized favour in return for the alleged earlier ₹8,000. It considered the son's visit evidence of his belief that the Patwari could still help. Chaturdas shows that the absence of actual final legal competence does not defeat liability for corrupt receipt where the public servant holds out an ability to assist. The Court upheld guilt beyond reasonable doubt on both counts. It declined to interfere with the sentence in light of the attempt to deprive the sisters and improper papers; that was the Court's criminal appeal assessment, not a binding partition decree.

On its own motion, the Court considered whether the two hostile witnesses should face proceedings for false evidence. It stated that Section 340/195 required a prima facie qualifying offence and a separate assessment of expediency in the interests of justice. A preliminary inquiry was optional once sufficient material was already before the court. Under Pritish, their participation was unnecessary before the Court decided to make a complaint. The Court attributed the father's anger to the failed excessive-share plan and found their retraction sufficiently serious to direct the trial court to lodge a complaint. The Court expressly stated that proceedings under Section 340 reflect a prima facie opinion and do not record the accused's guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the Special Judge's 19 March 2021 conviction and concurrent three-year and five-year rigorous-imprisonment terms with the ₹5,000 and ₹7,000 fines and trial default terms. The appellant, in jail, was to serve the remaining sentence; a free copy of the judgment was to be furnished promptly. Separately, the trial court was directed to make a complaint under CrPC Section 340 concerning Yogesh Kushwaha (PW-2) and Dara Singh (PW-3) for alleged false evidence. The record and judgment were to return to the trial court for information and compliance. No perjury conviction was entered in this appeal, and no final finding on partition entitlement was made.

Case Sr. no. (442) Prev Next

Headnote :- Negotiable Instruments Act / corporate cheque / director's vicarious liability - Himanshu v. B. Shivamurthy, (2019) 3 SCC 797, held that a director who signs a cheque on a company's behalf cannot be prosecuted alone under Section 138 if the company, as drawer, is not made an accused. Service of the statutory demand notice on the company is a separate requirement under the proviso to Section 138. In that case, the failure to serve notice could not be cured by subsequently adding the company as an accused. The Court applied that rule because the complaint stated that Mukesh Chandra Virmani's ₹13 lakh settlement arose from his investment in Navniketan Builders Pvt. Ltd., and the cheque was issued in the company's name and signed by Manoj Gupta as its director. Notice was issued only to Manoj, and the company was not made an accused. The complaint therefore could not proceed against him on the basis of vicarious liability. The Court rejected the respondent's contention that the transaction was personal on the basis of the complaint and the cheque.

Section 482 CrPC / legal threshold / premature postponement - The Magistrate deferred the objection that the company had not been made an accused until the conclusion of trial. The revisional court affirmed that decision, taking a prima facie view that the transaction was personal. The Court held that the company's liability, its identity as the drawer, and the absence of a demand notice to it and its arraignment as an accused were ascertainable from the complaint and the existing record. The objection raised a pure question of law concerning maintainability under Sections 138 and 141 and could be decided without awaiting the conclusion of trial. Both courts committed material illegality by postponing that decision. The High Court set aside both orders and dismissed the complaint, although no one appeared for Manoj at the hearing.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh Chandra Virmani filed a complaint under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act in 2006. According to the complaint, he had invested in Navniketan Builders Pvt. Ltd. Professional differences then arose between him and Manoj Gupta. The complaint stated that they agreed to settle his accounts: the goods held by the company would remain with Manoj, who would pay ₹13 lakh to Mukesh in respect of his investment. A post-dated cheque for that amount was dishonoured for insufficient funds. Mukesh sent Manoj a registered demand notice dated 14 December 2005. Manoj allegedly refused to receive the registered notice but accepted the notice sent by UPC. On examining the trial court record, the High Court found that no notice under Section 138 had been issued to the company. The cheque was issued in the company's name and signed by Manoj as its director. The Court rejected the respondent's contention that the settlement concerned Manoj's independent personal debt, relying on the investment pleaded in the complaint and the company's identity as the drawer.

Manoj appeared before the Magistrate in Criminal Case No. 800018/2006 and applied for dismissal of the complaint. He contended that the company, as the principal drawer of the cheque, had neither been made an accused nor served with a demand notice, and that he could not be prosecuted alone under Section 141. The JMFC, Shivpuri, rejected his application on 5 March 2020, deferring the objection until the conclusion of trial. The 6th Additional Sessions Judge, Shivpuri, affirmed that order in Criminal Revision No. 46/2020 on 18 February 2021. The revisional court observed that the complainant would bear the consequences of omitting the company and took a prima facie view that the transaction was personal. Manoj invoked Section 482 CrPC to challenge both orders and the complaint. No one appeared for him at the High Court hearing. Mukesh's counsel supported the concurrent orders, alleged that Manoj had evaded service for about ten years, and argued that evidence should be recorded before maintainability was decided. The High Court heard counsel and examined the complaint and the lower court record.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court considered Himanshu v. B. Shivamurthy, (2019) 3 SCC 797. The passage quoted from that decision held that a complaint against a director who had signed a cheque for and on behalf of a company was not maintainable unless the company was arraigned as an accused. It also held that, in the absence of a demand notice to the company and compliance with the proviso to Section 138, the company could not be added as an accused at that stage. That ruling concerned a company's cheque signed by its director and the director's vicarious liability. The High Court followed and applied Himanshu because the pleaded ₹13 lakh liability arose from an investment in the company, the cheque was issued by the company and signed by Manoj as its director, and the trial court record showed that notice had been issued to him alone. The omission of the company as an accused and the failure to issue notice to it were separate defects. The lower courts' procedural decisions were under review.

3. Statutes considered : Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act governs cheque dishonour in respect of a legally enforceable liability and contains the requirement of a demand notice. The Court found that the company was the drawer and that the statutory notice had been issued only to Manoj. Section 141 provides for the vicarious liability of persons such as directors for an offence committed by a company. Applying Himanshu, the Court held that prosecution of the company as the principal accused was necessary on these facts. The order describes Manoj's application as one under Section 141 and the complaint as one under Section 138. The High Court exercised its inherent power under Section 482 CrPC to set aside the lower courts' orders postponing the maintainability objection and to dismiss the complaint for the absence of the company as an accused and the failure to issue notice to it. The proceedings before the Magistrate and the revisional court formed part of the procedural history.

4. Issues : (i) Did the complaint and the cheque disclose a liability of the company or a personal liability of Manoj, and could he be prosecuted alone as its director when Navniketan Builders had neither been served with the demand notice under Section 138 nor made an accused? (ii) Did the objection raise a pure question of law concerning maintainability that was apparent from the complaint and the record, or could the Magistrate and the revisional court postpone its decision until after recording evidence on the view that the settlement might be personal?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court read paragraphs 2 and 3 of the complaint as showing that the ₹13 lakh liability arose from Mukesh's investment in the company and the settlement of his accounts. Although the goods held by the company were to remain with Manoj, the cheque was not issued in discharge of his separate personal liability. It bore the company's name and was signed by him as its director. The lower court record showed that the statutory demand notice had been addressed only to Manoj. Applying Himanshu, the Court held that the company, as the drawer, was the principal accused and that the director could not be held vicariously liable in its absence. The failure to issue notice to the company was a further statutory defect. The Court therefore rejected the revisional court's prima facie view that the transaction was personal and the respondent's contention that omission of the company merely exposed the complainant to the risk of an adverse result at trial.

The facts relevant to this question of maintainability were ascertainable from the complaint, the cheque and the notice record. Both lower courts committed material illegality by postponing the objection until after the conclusion of trial. Despite the applicant's nonappearance, the High Court considered the legal defect after hearing Mukesh's counsel. It applied Himanshu to the facts that the company had drawn the cheque, had not been issued a statutory demand notice and had not been made an accused.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application under Section 482. It set aside the JMFC's order dated 5 March 2020 in Criminal Case No. 800018/2006 and the 6th Additional Sessions Judge's order dated 18 February 2021 in Criminal Revision No. 46/2020. It dismissed Mukesh's complaint against Manoj under Section 138. The Court did not remand the matter for a trial-stage ruling or add the company as an accused.

Manoj Gupta v. Mukesh Chandra Virmani, M.Cr.C. no. 12084/2021, 31/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Multiple cheated victims / separate transactions and FIRs - Narinderjit Singh Sahni v. Union of India, (2002) 2 SCC 210, held that each depositor's agreement constituted a separate transaction where the parties and terms differed. State of Punjab v. Rajesh Syal, (2002) 8 SCC 158, held that cases involving different persons allegedly defrauded could not be treated as one transaction by invoking Sections 218 or 220 CrPC. The Court adopted the Delhi High Court's decision in State v. Khimji Bhai Jadeja, Cr. Reference No. 1/2014, decided on 8 July 2019. That decision required separate FIRs and reports for distinct investor transactions and distinguished this requirement from the limited possibility of a joint trial under Section 219, to be considered at the stage of framing charges. Here, the allegations concerned gram supplied by several traders, with about ₹4 crore remaining unpaid. One trader could not be treated as the sole complainant and the others merely as witnesses. The police should have registered separate FIRs. However, since charge-sheets had already been filed against the co-accused, the Court declined to direct registration of fresh FIRs. No final decision on joinder of trials or sentence was made.

Compounding / proper forum / all victims - Section 320(2) CrPC requires permission of the court before which prosecution for the compoundable offence is pending. No prosecution by way of an appeal or revision was pending before the High Court. Investigation against Manoj Kumar Goyal remained pending under Section 173(8) because he had not been arrested and seizure had not been effected, while the co-accused were facing trial. Once each trader's transaction was held to be distinct, the named complainant's affidavit could not suffice for all the victims. Photocopies of other affidavits asserting repayment did not constitute affidavits by each victim in support of the Section 320 application.

The Court declined to exercise its power under Section 482 to grant the statutory permission available from the trial court, having regard to the petitioner's non-cooperation and the incomplete supporting material. It observed that he could apply to the competent trial court for compounding the compoundable offences.

Section 482 / settlement and stage / investigative evasion - Narinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 6 SCC 466, distinguished the High Court's inherent power to quash proceedings from statutory compounding. It required a cautious assessment of the gravity of the offence, its impact on society, settlement of the entire dispute, the prospects of conviction and the stage at which settlement was reached. The discussion of Section 307 formed part of the quoted authority; the present FIR alleged different offences. The petitioner's two earlier petitions under Section 482 had been dismissed while further evidence could still emerge. He did not disclose the conditional anticipatory-bail order requiring a deposit of ₹75 lakh and appearance before the investigating officer, or establish compliance with it. The Court drew an adverse inference of non-compliance and found that his non-cooperation had prevented arrest and seizure. The co-accused were facing trial, the allegations involved cheating several persons of about ₹4 crore, and no complete, verified settlement was before the Court. In these circumstances, the Court refused to quash the proceedings on the basis of compromise and held that the alleged offence affected society at large. The Court did not determine guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Crime No. 158/2016 was registered at Police Station Ganj Basoda City, Vidisha, for offences under Sections 406, 420 and 409 read with Section 34 IPC. The allegations concerned gram supplied by traders to Priya Traders and Ashutosh Enterprises, for which about ₹4 crore allegedly remained unpaid. The FIR named Manohar Lal Parikh, Chiraunji Lal Parikh and Devendra Garg. Manoj Kumar Goyal was not named in it but was implicated during investigation, including through a co-accused's statement under Section 27 of the Evidence Act that the gram had been stored in his godown. Charge-sheets had been filed against some co-accused, who were facing Sessions Trial No. 200239/2016. Investigation against Manoj remained pending under Section 173(8) CrPC because he had not been arrested and the property had not been seized. These were allegations and statements about the investigation, rather than findings of criminal liability in the Section 482 proceedings.

Manoj first sought quashing in M.Cr.C. No. 11136/2017. A Division Bench dismissed that petition on 5 February 2018 as premature because further incriminating material might emerge. He obtained anticipatory bail in M.Cr.C. No. 14485/2018 on 4 May 2018, subject to depositing ₹75 lakh, appearing before the investigating officer by 4 June, furnishing a ₹2 lakh bond with local sureties and cooperating in the investigation. He subsequently sought deletion of the deposit condition but then undertook to pay and requested an extension of time. The order dated 18 May extended the time and provided for refund with the specified interest if he was acquitted. The present petition did not disclose that bail history or establish compliance with the conditions. His second quashing petition, M.Cr.C. No. 35886/2018, was dismissed on 19 November 2018 because investigation remained pending and compromise had not been properly advanced as the ground for quashing.

The present, third petition under Section 482 sought quashing of the FIR and the consequential proceedings. Manoj contended that settlement of the commercial dispute with the complainant and the other traders made further prosecution futile. He referred to a compounding application, I.A. No. 320/2019, under Section 320(2). Only he and the named complainant filed affidavits in support of that application; photocopies of affidavits attributed to 21 victims, containing identical statements, were annexed. The complainant had been served and was represented earlier but did not appear at the hearing. Counsel for the State argued that each trader's transaction was distinct and that all victims should be impleaded. He also relied on the stage of investigation and Manoj's non-cooperation. When asked about the bail proceedings and his appearance before the investigating officer, Manoj's counsel declined to address those matters and invited a decision on the petition and the photocopied affidavits. The Court examined its records of the earlier petitions and the conditional bail orders. The sample affidavit stated that Manoj had compensated the declarant for the loss, that no balance remained due and that no action against him was sought. The Court noted the absence of documentary or bank records showing repayment and held that the photocopies could not be treated as affidavits by each victim in support of the application.

2. Precedents — Considered : In Narinderjit Singh Sahni v. Union of India, (2002) 2 SCC 210, a three-judge Bench of the Supreme Court considered deposits induced by financial companies. It held that each individual agreement was a separate transaction because the parties, amounts and periods differed. In State of Punjab v. Rajesh Syal, (2002) 8 SCC 158, another three-judge Bench rejected consolidation of distinct fraud cases involving different persons under the proviso to Section 218 CrPC or the concept of the same transaction under Section 220. The proviso to Section 218 did not authorise a Magistrate to have cases pending before different Magistrates transferred to that Magistrate for a joint trial. Applying those decisions, the Court held that the transactions of the different gram traders could not be treated as one transaction or their distinct claims subsumed in one complainant's prosecution and settlement. The quoted Supreme Court passages concerned separate agreements or alleged frauds involving different victims.

In State v. Khimji Bhai Jadeja, Delhi High Court Cr. Reference No. 1/2014, decided on 8 July 2019, the Court held that each induced investor's deposit required a separate FIR where the complaint disclosed a cognizable offence, followed by a separate report. It distinguished that requirement from the limited possibility of trying up to three qualifying offences together under Section 219 CrPC, to be considered at the stage of framing charges. Its discussion of sentences under Section 31 and multiple trials was reproduced. The Madhya Pradesh High Court adopted the principle that the transactions were separate and held that the police should have registered separate FIRs. It declined to direct fresh registration because charge-sheets had already been filed against the co-accused. No question of sentence arose in the present petition.

Narinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 6 SCC 466, was quoted extensively to distinguish compounding under Section 320 from the High Court's inherent power under Section 482 to quash proceedings after settlement, including proceedings for some non-compoundable offences. The latter power must be exercised cautiously to secure justice or prevent abuse of process. Relevant considerations include the private or societal nature of the harm, the gravity of the offence, settlement of the entire dispute, whether the prospects of conviction were strong or remote, and the timing of settlement. Investigation, the early stages of evidence, an advanced trial and proceedings after conviction call for different assessments. The discussion of Section 307, grave violence and offences by public servants belonged to the Supreme Court's statement of the governing principles and did not describe the allegations in the present FIR. The Court applied the considerations of stage and societal impact to allegations of fraud against several traders and to an accused whose non-cooperation had prevented completion of the investigation against him.

The Division Bench's dismissal of M.Cr.C. No. 11136/2017 and the order in M.Cr.C. No. 35886/2018 were earlier orders in the same investigation. The first declined premature quashing because further evidence might emerge. The second also held the request premature while investigation remained pending and compromise had not been properly advanced as the ground for quashing. Those orders were relevant because the investigating agency had still been unable to arrest Manoj or seize the relevant material. The anticipatory-bail and extension orders were examined as part of his litigation history.

3. Statutes considered : The petition invoked the High Court's inherent, discretionary power under Section 482 CrPC to quash the FIR and proceedings. Section 320(2) permits specified IPC offences to be compounded, by the specified persons, with permission of the court before which prosecution for the offence is pending. Section 320 also identifies who may compound and provides that composition has the effect of acquittal. No compounding was permitted in this case. Manoj contended that offences under Sections 406 and 420 IPC were compoundable with permission and that no offence under Section 409 was made out. The Court refrained from deciding the allegations in detail and did not finally determine that contention or the compoundability of each alleged offence. Section 173(8) CrPC concerned the further investigation pending against him after charge-sheets had been filed against the co-accused. Section 438(2) concerned the conditions of anticipatory bail, including cooperation; failure to comply with those conditions and furnish bail was material to the exercise of discretion under Section 482. Sections 218, 219 and 220 CrPC were considered through Rajesh Syal and Khimji Bhai Jadeja in relation to separate offences and limited joinder at the stage of framing charges. The text concerning sentencing under Section 31 appeared in the quotation from the latter decision and was not applied in the present petition. Sections 406, 420 and 409 read with Section 34 IPC were the alleged offences; the Court refrained from a detailed determination of criminal liability. Section 27 of the Evidence Act arose in the background account of a co-accused's statement; its admissibility against Manoj was not decided.

4. Issues : (i) Did the separate transactions with the numerous traders require each trader to be treated as a victim of a distinct offence, rather than treating one as the complainant and the others merely as witnesses in a consolidated FIR, and what direction was appropriate after charge-sheets had been filed against the co-accused? (ii) Could the High Court grant permission under Section 320(2) when no prosecution of Manoj was pending before it, investigation against him remained pending, and all the separately affected victims had not filed proper supporting affidavits? (iii) Should the Court exercise its wider power under Section 482 to quash proceedings on the basis of compromise, having regard to the earlier dismissals as premature, the trial of the co-accused, Manoj's undisclosed and apparently unfulfilled anticipatory-bail conditions, his non-cooperation in investigation and the impact on several victims? The Court did not determine guilt.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying Narinderjit Singh Sahni and Rajesh Syal, together with the Delhi High Court's reference decision, the Court held that each allegedly cheated trader's transaction was distinct and required a separate FIR. Registration of a consolidated FIR could not reduce the other victims to witnesses while treating only one trader as the complainant. The Court nevertheless declined to direct fresh registration because charge-sheets had already been filed against the co-accused. The limited possibility of a joint trial for up to three qualifying offences under Section 219 was to be considered at the stage of framing charges. It did not permit the investigating agency to treat all the traders as witnesses to one transaction. Since each victim was a complainant in respect of a separate transaction, one complainant's compromise could not suffice for all the victims. Section 320(2) requires permission of the court before which prosecution is pending. No prosecution by way of appeal or revision was pending before the High Court. Manoj had not surrendered or joined the investigation, which remained pending under Section 173(8); the pending trial of the co-accused did not make the High Court the competent forum for his compounding application. Only his affidavit and that of respondent No. 2 supported the application. The annexed photocopies containing identical statements attributed to 21 traders could not be treated as affidavits by each victim in support of the present application. Although all victims could be directed to be impleaded, the Court declined to quash the proceedings on compromise because investigation remained incomplete owing to Manoj's non-cooperation and the other circumstances considered by it.

The Court examined the undisclosed bail history. Its order dated 4 May 2018 had made anticipatory release conditional on a deposit of ₹75 lakh and appearance before the investigating officer; the order dated 18 May extended the time. Manoj neither disclosed those orders nor established compliance, and his counsel declined to address the Court's inquiry. The Court drew an adverse inference of non-compliance. Arrest and seizure had not been effected, further evidence could still emerge, and the co-accused were facing trial. Applying Narinder Singh, the Court considered that the stage of investigation and the societal impact of the alleged cheating of several persons of about ₹4 crore did not justify quashing on compromise while Manoj remained away from investigation. Relying on the statements in the photocopied affidavits that he had refunded the traders' money, the Court rejected as false his assertion that he had no connection with the co-accused's acts. In view of the earlier Division Bench's refusal to quash and his continuing non-cooperation, the Court refrained from examining the allegations in detail and declined quashing on the settlement material and procedural circumstances before it. The Court did not determine the authenticity of the claimed refunds or examine their accounting.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the third petition under Section 482 seeking quashing of the FIR. It granted no permission to compound and, despite holding that the transactions required separate FIRs, issued no direction for fresh registration. The investigation against Manoj and the trial of the co-accused were left to proceed according to law. The Court directed that a copy of its order be sent to the Director General of Police, Madhya Pradesh, for necessary instructions to investigating officers to follow Narinderjit Singh Sahni, Rajesh Syal and Khimji Bhai Jadeja. It also directed that a copy be sent to the 2nd Additional Sessions Judge, Vidisha, in Sessions Trial No. 200239/2016 for information. No finding of guilt or order cancelling the earlier conditional bail was made.

Manoj Kumar Goyal v. State of M.P. and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 15521/2019, 09/07/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Criminal revision / merits despite concession / supervisory restraint - Nagpal Traders v. Devinder Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 431, expressly agreed with Jeetu, as quoted in that decision, that a conviction must be examined on merits even when counsel does not challenge it and seeks only a reduction of sentence. State of Maharashtra v. Jagmohan Singh Kuldip Singh Anand, (2004) 7 SCC 650, explained that the appellate powers conferred by Section 401 aid supervision under Section 397. They do not confer a second appellate jurisdiction for a minute reappraisal of the evidence, although overlooked material evidence or perversity may justify interference. Sheonandan Paswan v. State of Bihar, (1987) 1 SCC 288, similarly confined revision to scrutiny of legality, propriety and regularity, without substituting a fresh factual conclusion. Akalu Ahir v. Ramdeo Ram, AIR 1973 SC 2145, described the extraordinary power to correct grave injustice or serious legal infirmity. The Court examined the record despite counsel's concession. It found no perversity in the concurrent findings concerning impersonation of a co-owner and a fraudulent sale of her land, and affirmed the conviction under Section 467 IPC. Jeetu and Duli Chand were referred to in the quoted Supreme Court authorities. They were not separately applied as fact-specific rulings concerning these parties.

Compromise / non-compoundable forgery / sentence - The compromise under Section 320 CrPC during the appeals resulted in acquittal of the applicants under Sections 419, 420 and 423 IPC. They were also acquitted under Section 468 on merits, but their conviction under the non-compoundable Section 467 remained. The appellate court had already reduced the sentence from three years' rigorous imprisonment to one year, with a fine of ₹2,000. The applicants and co-owner Kalia were related and had compromised. However, the sale deed had been executed in 2004 by presenting Narayani as Kalia, and the prosecution and appeals continued for years before compromise was sought in February 2021, six years after the trial court's conviction. The application did not disclose terms showing reconveyance of the land or payment of compensation at its current market value. The Court expressed uncertainty about possible pressure on Kalia, without finding that coercion had been proved. It held that no further leniency was justified, refused to reduce the sentence to the period already undergone and maintained the one-year term. The applicant on bail was directed to surrender; the others were to serve their remaining imprisonment.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Kalia and Ramprakash jointly owned land bearing survey No. 308, measuring about 0.96 hectares. According to the prosecution, Ramprakash arranged a sale deed dated 19 March 2004 conveying Kalia's share by presenting Narayani as Kalia. Ramgopal, who died during the appeals, was the beneficiary. Manoj Kumar Sharma and Vinod signed as witnesses. The FIR was lodged on 25 May 2004 and the charge-sheet was filed on 31 December 2004. On 4 November 2015, the JMFC, Pohari, convicted the applicants in RCT No. 587/09 under Sections 419, 420, 423, 467 and 468 IPC. The High Court examined the evidence within the limits of its revisional jurisdiction.

Four connected appeals, Cr.A. Nos. 405, 400, 409 and 396 of 2015, were heard by the VIth Additional Sessions Judge, Shivpuri. On 10 February 2021, the compromise application under Section 320 CrPC, based on the parties' family relationship, was partly allowed and the applicants were acquitted under Sections 419, 420 and 423. Sections 467 and 468 were non-compoundable, and the appeals concerning those offences were heard on merits. By judgments dated 19 March 2021, the appellate court acquitted the applicants under Section 468, affirmed their conviction under Section 467 and reduced the sentence from three years' rigorous imprisonment to one year, with a fine of ₹2,000 and two months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The connected revisions, Cr.R. Nos. 1210 and 1128 of 2021, were heard together on admission. Counsel for all applicants declined to challenge the conviction on merits and sought reduction of the remaining sentence to the period already undergone on the basis of compromise. The Court nevertheless examined the findings supporting conviction before considering sentence. Ramprakash, the applicant in Cr.R. No. 1128, was on bail; Manoj Kumar, Vinod and Narayani were in jail.

2. Precedents — Considered : Nagpal Traders v. Devinder Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 431, was quoted for the obligation to examine a conviction on merits even when defence counsel does not challenge it and confines submissions to sentence. In that decision, the Supreme Court expressly agreed with Jeetu that merely recording the absence of a challenge to conviction and then adjusting sentence defeats the judicial function. The High Court followed that principle by examining the conviction despite counsel's choice not to contest it. Jeetu was discussed in the quoted passage from Nagpal Traders. It was not separately applied to these parties.

State of Maharashtra v. Jagmohan Singh Kuldip Singh Anand, (2004) 7 SCC 650, explained the relationship between Sections 397 and 401. A revisional court may exercise appellate powers to assist its supervisory examination of correctness, legality, propriety and regularity, but cannot act as a second appellate court and reappraise the entire record. The decision identified overlooked material evidence as a possible ground for interference. It quoted Duli Chand to explain that the record may be examined for evidence supporting concurrent findings and for perversity, without routinely reassessing the facts. Sheonandan Paswan v. State of Bihar, (1987) 1 SCC 288, arose from proceedings concerning withdrawal under Section 321 and was quoted for the limited purpose of revisional scrutiny. Akalu Ahir v. Ramdeo Ram, AIR 1973 SC 2145, described revision under the earlier Code as an extraordinary, discretionary power to correct grave injustice or serious legal infirmity, rather than an appeal in disguise. Applying those limits, the Court examined the sale-deed evidence and the concurrent findings for perversity and found none.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 397 and 401 CrPC governed the High Court's revisional scrutiny of conviction and sentence after the appeals. The jurisdiction was supervisory and did not permit a fresh determination of the facts as an appellate court. Section 320 governed the partial compromise during the appeals, which resulted in acquittal under Sections 419, 420 and 423 IPC. Sections 467 and 468 IPC were treated as non-compoundable. The applicants were separately acquitted under Section 468 on appeal; Section 467, concerning forgery of a valuable security or a qualifying document, remained the sole conviction under review. The appellate sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment, a fine of ₹2,000 and two months' rigorous imprisonment in default was maintained. The compromise of the compoundable offences did not extinguish the Section 467 conviction or entitle the applicants to a further reduction of sentence.

4. Issues : (i) Could the High Court consider only the requested reduction of sentence because counsel did not challenge the conviction, and to what extent could it examine the concurrent findings concerning the sale deed in revision under Sections 397 and 401? (ii) After the compoundable offences had been resolved and the applicants acquitted under Section 468, did their family relationship with the complainant and the compromise of February 2021 justify reducing the already reduced one-year sentence under Section 467 to the period undergone, having regard to the impersonation, deprivation of land, delay and undisclosed terms concerning restoration or compensation? The Court made no finding that coercion had occurred.

5. Ratio / Findings : Applying Nagpal Traders, the Court held that counsel's decision not to challenge conviction did not dispense with judicial examination of its merits. Jagmohan Singh, Sheonandan Paswan and Akalu Ahir confined that examination to legality, propriety, overlooked material evidence or perversity, rather than a second appeal on facts. On examining the lower court record, the Court found support for the concurrent findings that Ramprakash, a co-owner, had conveyed Kalia's share by having Narayani impersonate her. Manoj Kumar and Vinod had witnessed the deed, and Ramgopal, who had since died, was its beneficiary. The Court found no perversity and affirmed the conviction under Section 467. It did not make a fresh determination of each witness's credibility or disturb the earlier acquittals.

The Court then considered the request for a further reduction of sentence. The appellate court had already reduced the original three-year term of rigorous imprisonment to one year. The deed involving impersonation had been executed about seventeen years before the revision. The prosecution and trial continued until conviction in 2015; appeals were filed that year, but the compromise application was made only on 10 February 2021. The Court regarded the compromise as belated rather than evidence of early remorse. It noted that Kalia had been deprived of her share of the land and subjected to prolonged proceedings. Although the compromise reflected a resolution between relatives, the application did not disclose its terms or establish whether the land had been reconveyed or compensation paid at the current market rate. The Court referred to possible pressure on Kalia as an uncertainty, not a proved fact. Having regard to the fraud, the delay and the reduction already granted, it refused to reduce the sentence to the period undergone.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed both revisions at admission. It affirmed the appellate judgments dated 19 March 2021 and the conviction under Section 467 IPC, with one year's rigorous imprisonment, a fine of ₹2,000 and the stated default term. The prior acquittals on partial compounding and the acquittal under Section 468 remained undisturbed. Ramprakash's bail bonds were cancelled, and he was directed to surrender immediately before the trial court to serve the remaining sentence. Manoj Kumar Sharma, Vinod and Narayani, who were in jail, were to serve their remaining sentences. The Court directed that the applicants receive a free copy of the judgment and that the lower court records be returned immediately for compliance.

Manoj Kumar Sharma and Others v. State of M.P., Cr.R. no. 1210/2021 & 1128/2021, 01/09/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (445) Prev Next

Headnote :- FIR / prompt first version / evidentiary corroboration - Nanhey v. State of U.P., (1973) 3 SCC 317, Krishnan v. State, (2003) 7 SCC 56, Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, 1993 Supp (3) SCC 91, State of U.P. v. Harban Sahai, (1998) 6 SCC 50, Dahari v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 256, Kirpal Singh v. State of U.P., (2010) 3 SCC 347, and Satpal Singh v. State of Haryana, (2010) 8 SCC 714, were quoted for the evidentiary value of prompt, detailed reporting in checking subsequent fabrication and supporting witness presence. Questions of delay and credibility depended on the circumstances. Shyam Kumar reported that Manoj Sen, whom he knew, had fired the shot at 11:15 p.m. He lodged the FIR at 11:25 p.m. The police station was about one furlong from the scene. The Court relied on that timing to support the two eyewitness accounts. It also examined the challenges to those accounts and the independent forensic evidence, without treating the FIR alone as conclusive proof.

Related eyewitnesses / acquaintance and prior hostility - Dahari required careful scrutiny of a related witness's evidence but permitted reliance on a cogent and truthful account. Manga alias Man Singh v. State of Uttarakhand, (2013) 7 SCC 629, held that family relationship alone did not discredit otherwise reliable eyewitnesses. The injured-witness examples in that decision were not facts of the present case. Shyam was the deceased's brother, and Sangram knew the parties. The defence questioned their credibility by referring to property and insurance interests, the deceased's criminal history and Sangram's earlier prosecution. The Court accepted their explanations of presence and their accounts of the shooting, supported by the prompt FIR, the postmortem findings concerning the chest wound and the ballistic evidence, notwithstanding the suggested interests. The Court did not establish a general presumption in favour of related witnesses.

Night identification / familiar assailant / actual scene - Ramesh v. State by Madhugiri Police, (2010) 15 SCC 49, held that the identification of a known accused by his neighbours need not be disbelieved solely because the light was weak. The rural setting in that precedent provided an analogy, rather than evidence of the lighting at the present scene. The incident occurred at Manoj's own shop, and the place of occurrence was undisputed. Some shops in the narrow market were open, the witnesses knew him, and no power failure was alleged. On those facts, the Court rejected the contention that the shooter could not have been identified at about 11:15 p.m., without laying down a general minimum-light rule.

Ballistics / medical and eyewitness convergence - The doctor described a single chest-entry wound caused by a shot fired at close range, ruptures of the heart and liver, and a bullet recovered from the body. The .315 pistol, the fired cartridge and the live round seized after Manoj's arrest were examined. The FSL report attributed the fired cartridge to the seized pistol and found that the barrel marks on the bullet recovered from the body matched that weapon. The Court treated this evidence as substantial independent corroboration of Shyam and Sangram and affirmed the convictions under Section 302 IPC and Sections 25(1-B)(a) and 27 of the Arms Act. The defence challenged the proof of proper custody after seizure; the Court relied on the recovery and the FSL report in finding the eyewitness accounts corroborated.

Witness number / two unexamined FIR witnesses - Yanob Sheikh v. State of West Bengal, (2013) 6 SCC 428, explained that the prosecution's burden of proof beyond reasonable doubt requires evidence of sufficient quality, rather than any fixed number of witnesses, quoting Namdeo and Bipin Kumar Mondal. S.P.S. Rathore v. CBI, (2017) 5 SCC 817, also held that credible eyewitness testimony need not be rejected merely because not every bystander was examined. Manga stated that relationship alone did not discredit reliable witnesses. Balveer and Laxman were named in the FIR but were not examined. After scrutinising the accounts of the two witnesses who testified and the corroborating evidence, the Court accepted their testimony. The non-examination of Balveer and Laxman did not require an adverse conclusion in these circumstances.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : At about 11:15 p.m. on 25 March 2011, Rammohan Tiwari, his brother Shyam Kumar Tiwari, Laxman Purohit and Balveer Thakur were walking back after a visit to Anand Belpatri. Near the supermarket in Datia, they passed Manoj Sen's shop. According to the prosecution, Manoj, who was known to them, fired one shot from a .315 country-made pistol at Rammohan's chest. The FIR also referred to two unidentified companions, one of whom threatened onlookers. They were never traced, and only Manoj was tried. The alleged motive was a debt of ₹30,000 owed to Rammohan. Shyam promptly went to Police Station Kotwali, about one furlong from the scene, and his FIR was recorded at 11:25 p.m., ten minutes after the alleged shooting. The police inspected the scene, prepared a map, seized blood-stained and plain earth, and sent the body for postmortem examination. The doctor found a chest-entry wound at the sternum, fractures, ruptures of the heart and liver, and a bullet lodged near the thoracolumbar vertebra. He estimated that the shot had been fired from within six feet and attributed death to the firearm injury. Manoj was arrested on 28 March. The police recorded a memorandum and recovered a .315 pistol, a fired cartridge lodged in it and a live round from his house. An armourer and the FSL examined the articles, and permission to prosecute under the Arms Act was obtained. The FSL report attributed the fired cartridge and the bullet recovered from the body to that pistol.

On 17 November 2011, the Sessions Judge, Datia, convicted Manoj in Trial No. 87/2011 under Section 302 IPC and Sections 25(1-B)(a) and 27 of the Arms Act. The respective sentences were life imprisonment and a fine of ₹5,000, with three months' simple imprisonment in default; one year's imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000, with one month's imprisonment in default; and three years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000, with one month's imprisonment in default. The sentences were to run concurrently. In the appeal under Section 374 CrPC, the defence challenged identification at night, Shyam's interest as the deceased's brother and possible false implication, the failure to examine Laxman and Balveer, and the lack of proof of proper custody of the seized pistol. The State supported the conviction. The appellate Bench examined the medical evidence, eyewitness accounts, FIR, seizure and ballistic evidence. Shyam's extensive cross-examination covered the visit and route, the deceased's past criminal cases, possible property and insurance interests, his connections with Sangram and the FIR's reference to unidentified men. Sangram was questioned about his route, observations, acquaintances and an earlier murder prosecution that had ended in acquittal. These suggestions were considered as challenges to credibility and were not accepted as proved facts establishing an alternative shooter.

2. Precedents — Considered : Nanhey v. State of U.P., (1973) 3 SCC 317, treated the prompt and detailed FIR, in the absence of material showing police bias, as inconsistent with the contention that a false account had immediately been fabricated. Krishnan v. State, (2003) 7 SCC 56, stated that almost immediate reporting reduced the opportunity for deliberation. Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, 1993 Supp (3) SCC 91, treated a prompt murder FIR as the first version against which prosecution testimony could be checked, with support from the medical evidence. State of U.P. v. Harban Sahai, (1998) 6 SCC 50, regarded prompt and detailed reporting as reassuring about the informant's truthfulness. Dahari v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 256, treated the prompt report following travel to the police station as supporting the eyewitnesses' presence. It also required careful scrutiny of related witnesses while permitting reliance on trustworthy evidence. Kirpal Singh v. State of U.P., (2010) 3 SCC 347, was quoted for corroboration by a promptly lodged FIR that was not ante-timed, in the circumstances of that case. Satpal Singh v. State of Haryana, (2010) 8 SCC 714, explained the risk of afterthought and embellishment where delay remained unexplained, referring to Madhusudhan Rao in the quoted passage. The High Court applied these evidentiary principles to Shyam's FIR, lodged within ten minutes, without treating timing alone as necessarily establishing the truth of the prosecution case; it also considered the remaining evidence. Dahari's caution concerning related witnesses also informed the credibility assessment. The cases mentioned within Dahari's quoted passage were not individually applied.

Ramesh v. State by Madhugiri Police, (2010) 15 SCC 49, rejected the assumption that neighbours who knew the accused could not identify him in weak evening light. The quoted reasoning considered their familiarity with him and the local visual conditions. In Reference (Suo Moto) v. Manoj, CRRFC No. 8/2019, decided on 28 July 2021, a coordinate Bench similarly discussed identification by familiar villagers from a person's gait or build in poor light. The Court applied the principle of recognition of a familiar person to the present circumstances: a partly open urban market, witnesses who knew Manoj, his own shop and no alleged power failure. The Court did not decide the identification of a stranger or establish a general rural-versus-urban vision test.

Yanob Sheikh v. State of West Bengal, (2013) 6 SCC 428, reaffirmed the prosecution's burden of proof beyond reasonable doubt and the principle that evidence must be weighed rather than counted. Its quotations from Namdeo and Bipin Kumar Mondal explained that Section 134 of the Evidence Act does not prescribe a fixed number of witnesses. S.P.S. Rathore v. Central Bureau of Investigation, (2017) 5 SCC 817, held that truthful, consistent and confidence-inspiring eyewitness testimony may suffice without examining every bystander. Manga alias Man Singh v. State of Uttarakhand, (2013) 7 SCC 629, rejected a challenge based merely on the eyewitnesses' relationship with the deceased. In that decision, the witnesses' own injuries and the medical evidence supported their accounts. The present Court applied the principle concerning relationship, rather than treating those injured-witness facts as facts of this case. The further list of seven cases appeared within the quotation from Manga. Applying these authorities, the Court declined to reject Shyam and Sangram merely because two named companions were not called, after examining the witnesses' accounts and their corroboration.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC provided the appeal against conviction. Section 302 IPC concerned the conviction for intentional murder, for which the Court stated that life imprisonment was the mandatory minimum sentence. Although the charge-sheet had referred to Section 34 and unidentified companions, the trial charges and the operative conviction concerned Manoj personally. Section 25(1-B)(a) of the Arms Act concerned the seized country-made firearm, and Section 27 concerned its use. Both convictions were affirmed with the existing concurrent sentences and fines. The decision turned on identification and proof of the shooting, rather than a separate interpretation of those Arms Act provisions. Section 134 of the Evidence Act appeared in the quoted discussion in Yanob Sheikh concerning the number of witnesses. The Court recorded the memorandum and seizure and relied on the FSL findings as corroboration. The FIR, lodged within ten minutes, was also considered as corroborating evidence.

4. Issues : (i) Was Rammohan's death homicidal and caused by a firearm, and did Shyam and Sangram reliably identify Manoj as the shooter despite the late hour, alleged poor light, relationship or acquaintance, suggestions of false implication and minor discrepancies? (ii) What corroboration did the prompt FIR, medical findings concerning the bullet's course, seizure and FSL findings connecting the cartridge and bullet to the pistol provide, having regard to the alleged lack of proof of custody? (iii) Did the failure to examine two other persons named in the FIR undermine proof beyond reasonable doubt despite the evidence of the witnesses who testified? (iv) If conviction was upheld, was any change of sentence permissible, particularly under Section 302? The Court did not identify or convict the two unknown companions.

5. Ratio / Findings : The postmortem findings of a close-range chest-entry wound, damage to the sternum, heart and liver, and a bullet retained in the body established a homicidal death caused by a firearm. Shyam identified Manoj, whom he knew, as standing just outside his own shop and firing a single shot from a few feet away as the group passed. He explained the visit to a relative and his presence with Rammohan. In his separate account, Sangram stated that he was behind the group and saw the shot; his movements and acquaintance with the parties were examined in cross-examination. The Court considered the attempts to discredit the witnesses in the light of the surrounding circumstances.

Relationship alone did not justify rejecting their evidence.

The FIR was lodged at the nearby police station about ten minutes after the shooting. The Supreme Court authorities explained why prompt and detailed reporting reduces the opportunity for deliberation and supports the informant's presence. Here, the FIR corroborated the oral evidence rather than replacing it. The place of occurrence at Manoj's shop was undisputed, some businesses in the market remained open, no power failure was alleged, and the witnesses already knew Manoj. Applying Ramesh by analogy, the Court found recognition plausible in those circumstances. The seizure witness and the investigating officer described the recovery of the .315 pistol, a fired cartridge and a live round from Manoj's house after his arrest. The FSL report connected the fired cartridge with the seized pistol and found that the barrel marks on the bullet recovered from the body matched that weapon. The defence questioned the proof of custody; the Court relied on the recovery and the FSL findings as corroboration. The medical and forensic evidence together strongly supported the eyewitness accounts. Although Balveer and Laxman were named as present, they were not examined. Yanob Sheikh and S.P.S. Rathore required assessment of the quality of the evidence rather than the number of witnesses, while leaving the burden of reliable proof on the prosecution. The Court found Shyam and Sangram credible, with support from the prompt FIR and forensic evidence. The absence of the other two witnesses therefore did not leave a decisive gap in proof in this case. The prosecution proved the appellant's guilt beyond reasonable doubt on the murder and Arms Act charges. The Court stated that life imprisonment was the minimum sentence under Section 302 and found no ground to alter the concurrent sentences imposed at trial. No separate adjudication concerning the unidentified persons or alleged alternative shooters was made.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal. It affirmed the conviction and sentence dated 17 November 2011: life imprisonment and a fine of ₹5,000 under Section 302 IPC; one year's imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000 under Section 25(1-B)(a) of the Arms Act; and three years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000 under Section 27. The sentences were concurrent, with the stated default terms of simple imprisonment. Manoj, who was in jail, was to serve the remaining sentence. The Court directed that he immediately receive a free copy of the judgment and that the record be returned to the Sessions Judge, Datia, for compliance. No relief was granted concerning the two untraced persons.

Manoj Sen v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 20/2012, 07/07/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Police inaction / inherent application / magistrate complaint remedy - Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, recognised the police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence, while distinguishing that duty from an informant's entitlement to an immediate judicial direction. An aggrieved informant may proceed under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, held that an informant should ordinarily approach the Magistrate when the police take no action. It preserved rare intervention under Article 226 for demonstrated mala fide abuse, without permitting the Court to dictate the method of investigation. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, explained the remedies under Section 154(3) before the Superintendent of Police and Section 156(3) before the Magistrate for registration of an FIR or a proper investigation, including monitoring. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reaffirmed that course. Upon prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer to superior police officers but cannot investigate personally. Shweta Bhadauria, a Division Bench decision of the Madhya Pradesh High Court, distinguished the police duty in Lalita Kumari from an entitlement to bypass alternative remedies, subject to the stated exceptions. Applying those principles, the Court dismissed the Section 528 BNSS application seeking action within two weeks and left Manoj Sharma free to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS. It did not examine whether his unspecified complaint disclosed a cognizable offence or adjudicate an exceptional-abuse claim on developed facts.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Manoj Sharma applied to the Madhya Pradesh High Court, Gwalior Bench, under Section 528 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita. He sought a direction requiring the respondent to take cognizance of his complaint expeditiously, within two weeks. Counsel explained that the police had not registered an FIR despite his complaint. The order does not describe the underlying incident, proposed offence, date of complaint, persons accused, any previous approach to a superior police officer or supporting material. The Court framed the question as whether an application seeking a direction to the police to register an FIR was maintainable. The State opposed the application and submitted that the applicant could approach the concerned Magistrate if the police took no action. The Court considered the forum and remedy, rather than the merits of the undisclosed complaint.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted at length for the distinction between the police duty to register an FIR when the facts disclose a cognizable offence and the complainant's remedy before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC if the police fail to act. The Supreme Court reconciled its earlier decisions on police duty with those addressing the informant's subsequent remedy and expressly reserved the merits of the allegations before it. The Court in the present case adopted that distinction; it did not find that Sharma had in fact shown a cognizable offence. All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh, Minu Kumari, Ramesh Kumari and Lallan Chaudhary appeared within the quotation from Aleque Padamsee. They were not independently applied to an identified offence in this order.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for the ordinary remedy of approaching the Magistrate under Sections 190/200 when the police take no action. It also recognised a narrow exception under Article 226 where an investigating officer acts mala fide and a clear case of abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII warrants rare intervention. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the statutory process but cannot dictate how the police should investigate. The Court quoted that exception as part of the governing authorities. The passage from Gangadhar reproduced within Divine Retreat explained the Magistrate's alternatives on a complaint, including inquiry, police investigation or dismissal, according to the prima facie assessment.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted for the remedy of applying in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3). If that course does not secure registration of an FIR or a proper investigation, the informant may apply to the Magistrate under Section 156(3). The Magistrate may order registration or a proper investigation and monitor it. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reaffirmed that an aggrieved informant should ordinarily approach the Magistrate rather than invoke Article 226. Upon prima facie satisfaction, the Magistrate may require a proper investigation, monitor its progress and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to superior police officers. The Magistrate cannot investigate personally. The High Court used both authorities to explain the available remedy under the criminal procedure, without holding that the Magistrate must grant this applicant any particular order.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016, decided on 20 December 2016, is a Division Bench decision of this High Court. The quoted passage permits refusal of mandamus to register an FIR where the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, subject to the exceptional alternative-remedy categories in Whirlpool. It distinguished Lalita Kumari's ruling on mandatory police registration from an entitlement to an immediate writ direction. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari appeared within that quotation; they were not independently applied to the facts of this complaint. The judge cited the Division Bench decision in dismissing the Section 528 application while preserving the remedy before the Magistrate. Although the quoted Supreme Court cases frequently address Article 226 and the CrPC, the present order dismissed an application under Section 528 BNSS with liberty to approach the Magistrate.

3. Statutes considered : The applicant invoked the inherent jurisdiction under Section 528 BNSS. The Court held that an immediate direction to the police to register an FIR was not appropriate in this application when the concerned Magistrate could be approached. It expressly granted liberty to make a complaint under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS. The quoted authorities referred to Section 154 CrPC for the duty concerning information disclosing a cognizable offence and subsection (3) for recourse to the Superintendent of Police; Section 156(3) for Magistrate-directed registration or a proper investigation; and Sections 190/200 for the complaint and cognizance procedure. Article 226 and Chapter XII CrPC appeared in the discussion of exceptional writ intervention in Divine Retreat and the Division Bench decision. They were part of that comparative discussion, rather than the jurisdiction invoked in this case. The operative order expressly identified Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS as the available complaint remedy.

4. Issues : Could Manoj obtain a High Court direction under Section 528 BNSS requiring the police to act on his complaint or register an FIR within the short period requested, when ordinary remedies for police inaction were available before superior police officers and the Magistrate? The Court did not decide the contents or legal sufficiency of the complaint, order registration of an FIR, determine the Magistrate's likely disposition or make a finding of mala fide investigation.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court distinguished the police duty from the choice of judicial forum. Aleque Padamsee recognises the duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence but directs an informant complaining of police inaction to the Magistrate's complaint procedure. Divine Retreat preserves a narrow exceptional constitutional power where clear mala fides and abuse are shown, while excluding ordinary judicial management of police investigation. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe explain the effective remedies within the police hierarchy and before a Magistrate who may, on suitable material, secure registration or a proper investigation and monitor it. Shweta Bhadauria explains that mandatory police registration does not automatically entitle an informant to a direct writ of mandamus before using alternative remedies, subject to exceptions. On the bare assertion that the police had not registered an FIR, the judge found that Manoj could approach the Magistrate and dismissed the inherent application with liberty. The operative order granted liberty to seek redress before the concerned Magistrate. The decision concerned the proper forum; it did not permit police refusal or reject the merits of any eventual complaint.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. Manoj Sharma was given liberty, if he wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS for redress. The Court did not direct registration of an FIR, impose a two-week deadline, order an investigation or predetermine the Magistrate's decision.

Manoj Sharma v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, M.Cr.C. no. 45827/2024, 15/04/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Territorial jurisdiction / Gwalior property transactions / CrPC Sections 177–179 - Sunita Kumari Kashyap v. State of Bihar, (2011) 11 SCC 301, explained the ordinary place of inquiry and trial, offences spanning local areas and the place where consequences ensue under Sections 177–179. Applying that territorial reasoning to the challenge to Sirol police investigation, the Court held that the alleged sham sales of Gwalior flats and shops through deeds executed in Gwalior gave the local police jurisdiction. The company's Noida office and the assertion that decisions were taken there did not make Noida the exclusive location. Even on that assumption, each police station within whose area part of the offence occurred could investigate it. The ruling determined jurisdiction on the allegations; it did not establish fraud.

Companies Act and IPC / concurrent penal provisions / Section 26 General Clauses Act - The applicant conceded that no Companies Act provision excluded the applicability of the IPC. State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, rejected the contention that the cooperative-societies remedy was exclusive in the absence of a bar. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Sanjay, (2014) 9 SCC 772, was quoted for its prima facie view that there was no complete IPC bar in the special-statute setting considered there. State of Maharashtra v. Sayyad Hassan Sayyad Subhan, Criminal Appeal No. 1195/2018 decided 20.09.2018, explained that another statute's penalties do not by themselves prohibit prosecution under the IPC where its ingredients are satisfied. Applying those principles, the Court rejected the contention that the IPC proceedings for alleged cheating, forgery, breach of trust and conspiracy should be quashed merely because Companies Act offences were also invoked. Section 26 permits the applicable prosecutions but prohibits punishment twice for the same offence. The ruling did not establish guilt.

Companies Act Section 430 / civil-court bar / criminal jurisdiction - Section 430 excludes civil-court jurisdiction in the specified Tribunal matters. Its express reference to civil courts could not be extended by implication to criminal courts. A jurisdictional bar requires specific language and must be strictly construed. The Court rejected this separate ground for quashing the FIR and sessions proceedings.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Manoj Shrivastava applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime No. 27/2017 at Police Station Sirol, Gwalior, and the consequent proceedings in S.T. No. 437/2017 before the Ninth Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior. The FIR cited Sections 420, 467, 409 and 120-B IPC read with Sections 166 and 188-B of the Companies Act, as printed in the judgment. Complainant Rajiv Shrivastava alleged that Assotech C.P. Infrastructure Pvt. Ltd. developed the Windsor Hills residential township in Gwalior and entrusted the applicant with its flats, villas and shops. According to the complaint, the applicant and named co-accused arranged the sale of 36 flats and shops to co-accused at low prices. Those purchasers then resold the properties to bona fide purchasers at higher prices. The consideration was allegedly not deposited in the company's account and was diverted to the bank accounts of the applicant and his family members. These were accusations recorded from the FIR, rather than findings that fraud had been committed. The judgment recorded that some co-accused were shown as absconding in the charge-sheet. It also referred to the rejection of three bail applications and the Supreme Court's dismissal of SLP (Criminal) No. 5987/2018 on 30 July 2018. Those bail orders were not treated as findings of guilt or as an independent test for quashing.

At admission, the applicant argued that the company's registered office was in Noida and its decisions were taken there, so Sirol police lacked territorial jurisdiction. He also argued that prosecution could proceed only under the Companies Act, rather than for the cited IPC offences, referring to Sections 439, 436, 441, 442, 435 and 445. His third contention was that Section 430's exclusion of civil-court jurisdiction impliedly excluded criminal courts as well. The State submitted that the township and sale deeds were in Gwalior and that the Companies Act contained no provision excluding the IPC. The complainant's counsel stated that the applicant had approached the National Company Law Tribunal but had subsequently withdrawn those proceedings.

2. Precedents — Considered : Sunita Kumari Kashyap v. State of Bihar, (2011) 11 SCC 301, was quoted on Chapter XIII CrPC, particularly Sections 177–179. Ordinarily, an offence is inquired into and tried by the court within whose local jurisdiction it was committed. Section 178 covers uncertainty about the place of commission, offences committed partly in different areas, continuing offences spanning areas and offences consisting of several acts in different areas. Section 179 also permits inquiry or trial where a legally relevant consequence ensues. The Court applied that territorial reasoning to the alleged Gwalior sales, deeds and diversion connecting the offence with Sirol. The Supreme Court passage concerned the venue of inquiry and trial; the present Court used it to reject the objection to investigation by Sirol police. Even if decisions had been taken at Noida as asserted, that would leave several connected locations rather than exclude Gwalior.

State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, was quoted for rejecting the contention that the M.P. Cooperative Societies Act constituted an exclusive criminal code when it did not bar general criminal law, particularly when Prevention of Corruption Act charges were involved. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Sanjay, (2014) 9 SCC 772, was quoted for its prima facie view that there was no complete and absolute bar to IPC prosecution where the alleged conduct also fell within a special statute and the IPC offences were penal and cognizable. State of Maharashtra v. Sayyad Hassan Sayyad Subhan, Criminal Appeal No. 1195 of 2018 decided 20 September 2018, was quoted for the principle that penalties under the Food Safety and Standards Act did not by themselves preclude IPC prosecution. The passage also referred to Hat Singh on Section 26 and double jeopardy, and to Sanjay in the mining-statute context. The Court applied the common principle of non-exclusion to the Companies Act argument, supported by the applicant's concession that the Act contained no provision excluding the IPC. The three reproduced passages did not concern Companies Act decisions. The Court rejected the contention that prosecution could proceed exclusively under the Companies Act. Hat Singh appeared within the Sayyad Hassan quotation and was not separately analysed in the present order.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to seek quashing of the FIR and sessions proceedings. The IPC charges identified were under Sections 420, 467, 409 and 120-B; the Court did not decide the evidentiary merits or whether the individual ingredients of those offences were proved at trial. The judgment recorded Sections 166 and 188-B of the Companies Act as part of the FIR. The applicant relied on Sections 439(1)/(2), 436(1)/(2), 441, 442, 435 and 445 to contend that prosecution could proceed only under that Act, but his counsel conceded that no Companies Act provision excluded the applicability of the IPC. Section 430 expressly excludes civil-court jurisdiction over matters which the Tribunal or Appellate Tribunal is empowered to determine and restrains related injunctions. The Court refused to read 'civil court' as 'criminal court'. Section 26 of the General Clauses Act permits prosecution and punishment under either or any of two or more enactments where the same act or omission constitutes offences under them, but prohibits punishment twice for the same offence. Sections 177–179 CrPC appeared in the court-venue discussion quoted from Sunita Kumari Kashyap, which the Court used to support its conclusion on Gwalior's territorial jurisdiction.

4. Issues : First, did the alleged Gwalior transactions give Sirol police territorial jurisdiction despite the company's Noida office and the assertion that decisions were taken there? Second, did the Companies Act provisions invoked by the applicant exclude IPC prosecution for the alleged conduct and justify quashing at this stage? Third, did Section 430's bar of civil-court jurisdiction over Tribunal matters impliedly extend to criminal courts? The Court did not try the truth of the alleged scheme, determine the correct value or ultimate destination of the consideration, decide the liability of the absconding co-accused or adjudicate the withdrawn Tribunal proceeding.

5. Ratio / Findings : On territorial jurisdiction, the Court noted that the Windsor Hills site was in Gwalior and all the impugned sale deeds had been executed there. According to the FIR, the purported first sales at prices far below the scheduled price and the subsequent sales at higher prices were central acts of the alleged scheme; the consideration was allegedly not paid to the company. The alleged conduct therefore had a substantial connection with Sirol/Gwalior. The registered office's location alone did not make Noida the exclusive forum. Even assuming that a relevant decision had been taken at Noida, the Court reasoned that each police station in whose area part of the offence occurred could investigate it. The Court used Sunita Kumari Kashyap's explanation of Sections 177–179 concerning court venue across local areas to support that conclusion and rejected the first objection. This assessment concerned the alleged location of the offence at the quashing stage, rather than a final finding that the transactions were fraudulent.

On the coexistence of penal provisions, the applicant's counsel fairly conceded that the Companies Act did not expressly exclude the applicability of the IPC. Section 26 of the General Clauses Act permits prosecution under overlapping enactments while prohibiting punishment twice for the same offence. Rameshwar, Sanjay and Sayyad Hassan provided analogical support for the principle that a special statute does not, by itself, exclude otherwise applicable general criminal law in the absence of a bar. The Court therefore rejected the argument that only the penal provisions of the Companies Act could be invoked against the accused, excluding the identified IPC charges. The conclusion allowed the IPC allegations to proceed; it did not permit double punishment or determine that every charge would necessarily be proved.

On Section 430, the Court applied the express exclusion of civil-court jurisdiction. It declined to extend that wording to criminal courts or to treat it as implicitly excluding the applicability of the IPC. If the legislature had intended to exclude criminal jurisdiction, it could have made an express provision. Exclusion of jurisdiction must be specific, is strictly construed and cannot be presumed. The separate argument based on Tribunal and civil-court jurisdiction therefore failed. The withdrawn NCLT proceedings mentioned by counsel were not a merits adjudication displacing that reasoning. No other argument was advanced.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. It refused to quash Crime No. 27/2017 at Police Station Sirol or the proceedings in S.T. No. 437/2017 before the Ninth Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior. It made no finding of guilt, acquittal or final determination of the evidence, and gave no direction concerning the absconding co-accused or the withdrawn Tribunal proceeding.

Manoj Shrivastava v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 31088/2018, 20/09/2018, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Investigation control / suspected accused / disputed signatures and expert referral - Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was quoted for the principle that an accused cannot select the investigating agency or dictate the manner of investigation or mode of prosecution. Its discussion of Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt and E. Sivakumar concerned those limits. Its discussion of Divine Retreat Centre distinguished agency selection from appropriate intervention to secure a fair process under Article 226 where mala fide exercise of investigative power is established. The High Court applied the principle against accused-controlled investigation to a Section 482 CrPC request for FSL examination of signatures attributed to the applicant on transaction documents during the pending investigation under Sections 420/406 IPC. In its own Prabal Dongra decision, the Court had explained that a defence claim of false implication alone neither establishes bias nor entitles an accused to insist that the police investigate from his preferred standpoint. Here, no bias was alleged against the investigating officer. The applicant had not stated whether he was a company director when the duplex agreement was made, and directing the requested expert examination would amount to supervising the investigation. The Court dismissed the application but preserved his opportunity to challenge authenticity if a charge-sheet relies on the signatures and to seek a handwriting-expert reference from the trial court at the appropriate stage. It did not find that the signatures were genuine.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Manoj Shrivatava applied under Section 482 CrPC for forensic examination of signatures attributed to him on certain documents in Crime No. 08/2020 at Police Station Sirol, Gwalior, concerning alleged offences under Sections 420 and 406 IPC. According to the complaint narrated in the order, Kavita Agarwal booked duplex No. B-5, measuring 1,700 square feet, on 9 November 2013. She paid Rs. 5 lakh in advance and Rs. 40 lakh on 26 December 2013 with bank finance. The remaining Rs. 8 lakh was to be paid on execution of the sale deed. She dealt with project manager Keshav Upadhyay and was promised possession within two years. She complained that possession and execution of the sale deed were delayed despite repeated approaches. She later learned that the duplex had been sold to Jitendra Bhadoriya, who had put a tenant in possession. She alleged that the company had misappropriated Rs. 45 lakh despite having received more than 85 per cent of the price, while she continued to repay the bank. Her husband's dialysis and her transfer to Gwalior were recorded as part of the complaint history, rather than issues adjudicated by the Court. She sought registration of an FIR against Upadhyay and the applicant, whom the complaint described as a partner in the company. None of those allegations was found proved in this interlocutory order.

The applicant stated that he had neither met nor negotiated with the complainant and had received none of her payment. He said that other persons were the company's signatories and that he was only a former director. According to his account, he was summoned by the police on 28 August 2020 through a notice under Section 91 CrPC. He was shown an allotment letter and a tripartite agreement and asked whether the signatures were his. He denied the signatures, alleged forgery and sought examination by the FSL or a competent authority. The Court noted that he had not disclosed whether he was a director on 9 November 2013, the agreement date. The earlier anticipatory-bail order in MCRC No. 19795/2020 had directed extreme police steps only when necessary and if he failed to cooperate. The direction recorded in this judgment concerned extreme police steps. At the hearing, the Court asked counsel to address whether a suspected accused had any right to control a particular investigative step. The State opposed judicial supervision while the investigation remained pending.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court directly quoted paragraphs 24–27 of Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753. That passage reproduced Narmada Bai v. State of Gujarat on the rule that an accused cannot choose the investigating agency, and Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt v. Union of India on the absence of an accused's right to dictate the manner of investigation or mode of prosecution. Several further cases were named in the latter quotation but were not independently examined here. E. Sivakumar v. Union of India concerned the absence of an accused's entitlement to a hearing as a matter of course when a CBI investigation was ordered in that case. The discussion of Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala cautioned against using inherent jurisdiction as a general means of replacing the investigator and stated that neither an accused nor an informant may choose the agency. It also recognised appropriate directions under Article 226 at an aggrieved person's instance if the investigating officer acts mala fide. The High Court used the combined limits in Romila Thapar to assess the requested handwriting examination; it did not hold that courts could never correct demonstrably mala fide investigation. The nested cases supplied the content of the Romila quotation. The present judgment neither separately decided their distinct factual disputes nor appointed an investigating agency.

The Court also quoted its own Prabal Dongra v. Superintendent of Police, Gwalior and State of M.P., MCRC No. 10446/2017, order dated 30 November 2017. That decision distinguished a fair investigation from one directed towards the accused's preferred defence. It required concrete allegations of bias, mala fides or extraneous influence before directing investigative conduct and refused supervision under Section 482 merely because an accused claimed false implication and sought investigation from a particular viewpoint. A further passage quoted from Prabal Dongra concerned that case's FIR, an officer who had not been joined, a medical report and questions for trial. Those were features of the earlier case, rather than events in Shrivatava's duplex matter. The present Court applied the narrower point that no bias had even been alleged against this investigating officer and that authenticity could be disputed later. Prabal Dongra's emphatic formulation concerning proof of taint was reproduced. The present decision rests on the absence of a bias allegation and does not determine the standard for every future petition seeking a fair investigation.

3. Statutes considered : The applicant invoked the inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC. He sought a direction during the pending investigation into offences under Sections 420 and 406 IPC, rather than an evidentiary ruling after charges. Section 91 CrPC appeared in his account of being shown the company documents and denying the signatures. The Romila quotation discussed inherent jurisdiction and Article 226 as distinct settings. It recognised appropriate constitutional intervention for mala fide investigation but did not convert the present Section 482 application into an Article 226 writ petition. The Court preserved the applicant's opportunity to challenge authenticity and apply to the trial court if the prosecution relies on the alleged signatures after filing a charge-sheet.

4. Issues : Does a person suspected in an ongoing IPC investigation, who denies that certain transaction documents bear his signatures, have a right to a direction under Section 482 requiring the police to send them to a handwriting expert while the investigation is pending? In support of that request, had he identified bias or mala fides on the investigating officer's part that would justify interference with investigative discretion? The Court did not decide whether he had signed the documents, whether the complainant's allegations established cheating or breach of trust, or whether a future trial-court application for expert examination should ultimately be granted.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court treated the applicant as a suspected accused seeking a particular investigative technique for his defence. The Court noted his admission that he was a former director, but he had not stated whether he held that position on 9 November 2013. The disputed signatures were part of his defence; forgery had not been established on the present record. Romila Thapar supplied the principle that an accused cannot dictate the agency or manner of investigation. Prabal Dongra applied a corresponding limit to requests that the police investigate from the accused's preferred viewpoint. Although the cited material recognises exceptional correction of proved mala fide exercise of investigative power, the applicant alleged no bias against this investigating officer. The Court considered that directing immediate FSL examination would amount to supervising the pending investigation and refused that particular direction. It neither found the questioned signatures genuine nor barred later forensic examination. If a charge-sheet alleges that the allotment letter and tripartite agreement bear his signatures, he may challenge their authenticity in his defence and apply to the trial court for a handwriting-expert reference at the appropriate stage. The judgment also recorded the earlier anticipatory-bail direction concerning extreme police steps. Its comments on counsel seeking an unnecessary adjournment were incidental observations on case management, rather than a separate legal issue decided in the application.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC. It did not direct the police to send the documents to the FSL or prescribe the next investigative step. The applicant's opportunity to challenge the alleged signatures and seek expert examination before the trial court, if a prosecution case relying on them is filed, was expressly preserved. The trial court's decision was not predetermined.

Manoj Shrivatava v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 18636/2021, 16/02/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (449) Prev Next

Headnote :- Limitation / private complaint / CrPC Section 468 - The complaint alleged IPC Sections 420 and 468 (each carrying up to seven years) and Section 467 (carrying up to life imprisonment). Section 468 CrPC prescribes no limitation period for an offence punishable beyond three years; the Court rejected a statutory time-bar to the 2013 complaint concerning the 2002–03 transactions. This ruling is separate from the complaint's delay as a matter of credibility.

Delay / quashing / disputed facts - Skoda Auto Volkswagen (India) Pvt. Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2021) 5 SCC 95, was applied for restraint against testing disputed allegations at the initial stage or quashing proceedings merely because an FIR or complaint was delayed. Ravinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, (2001) 7 SCC 690, explained that the law fixes no time for lodging an FIR. Prompt reporting assists investigation and reduces the opportunity for fabrication, but does not guarantee truth; genuine causes may explain delay. Mohammad Wajid v. State of U.P., AIR 2023 SC 3784, likewise held that delay alone was insufficient to quash an FIR. Applying those principles to the private complaint, the Court refused to terminate the proceedings solely because it had been filed belatedly, without deciding the credibility of the evidence.

Cheating / two registered conveyances of same flat - The applicant's registered deed of 2002 conveyed first-floor Flat No. 10. His deed of 2003 purported to sell the same described unit to the complainant after he had lost title to it. He claimed that the first deed mistakenly described a ground-floor flat as a first-floor flat, but no registered correction had been made. The Court found a prima facie case of cheating under Sections 415/420 IPC on the second sale. The question of bank-loan default and subsequent eviction was independent of the issue concerning the deed.

Forgery / specific declarations in later deed - Mohammed Ibrahim v. State of Bihar, (2009) 8 SCC 751, was relied on by the applicant for the proposition that lack of title alone does not make a deed forged. In response, the Court relied on the second deed's affirmative declarations that the seller had authority to sell and that the identified flat had never been sold or otherwise encumbered, despite the earlier registered deed. It found the allegations under Sections 467/468 IPC sufficient to proceed. This was the Court's particular prima facie treatment of the facts, rather than a general rule addressing every element of forgery.

Co-accused acquittal / applicant absent from their trial - The acquittal of two co-accused while the applicant was absconding did not require discharge or quashing of the proceedings against him. No basis was shown for treating evidence taken in his absence as binding in his case. The Court did not review the reasons for the co-accused's acquittals and left the applicant to face his own trial on the prima facie allegations. The Section 482 application was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Manoj Shukla, one of the builders of residential premises under the Indira Awas Yojana in Bara, Rewa, applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash the private complaint, its registration order dated 17 October 2013 and S.T. No. 128/2019 pending before the Eleventh Additional Sessions Judge, Rewa. A registered deed dated 1 June 2002 conveyed first-floor Flat No. 10 to Ramesh Singh Kalchuri. On 7 February 2003, the applicant and co-accused executed a deed in favour of respondent complainant Pratibha Mishra for the same described first-floor Flat No. 10. The later deed declared that the seller had authority to sell, that the flat had not previously been sold, otherwise transferred or encumbered, and that it was free from encumbrances. The complainant said that she was given possession, but Kalchuri later asserted his earlier registered purchase and demanded that she vacate. She obtained a certified copy of the 2002 deed.

The complaint further alleged that, under an initial financing arrangement, she paid instalments to Shukla. He arranged for her to sign blank bank forms and told her that an account would be opened. She continued paying him. False financing papers were allegedly created in connivance with a bank manager. She disputed taking the bank loan, yet the bank later had the flat vacated over loan repayment. Those financing allegations remained unproved in this order. She said that her police complaints had produced no action and filed a complaint under Section 200 CrPC on 4 June 2013 alleging offences under Sections 420, 467 and 468 IPC. The applicant contended that the complaint was time-barred or unjustifiably late, that no offence was made out and the allegations were false, and that the 2002 deed mistakenly described a first-floor flat when he had actually sold a ground-floor flat. He also sought the benefit of the acquittal of two co-accused on 7 February 2022. He conceded that no registered instrument had corrected the first-floor description in the 2002 deed. He had absconded while the co-accused were tried. The High Court considered these contentions at admission, without conducting his trial.

2. Precedents — Considered : Skoda Auto Volkswagen (India) Pvt. Ltd. v. State of U.P., (2021) 5 SCC 95, was cited by the Court for the rule that disputed factual reliability or correctness cannot be determined at the initial quashing stage, and that delay in lodging an FIR or complaint cannot by itself defeat criminal proceedings. The Court used it to reject the applicant's belated-filing ground, rather than determine how long the complainant had known about the prior deed. Ravinder Kumar v. State of Punjab, (2001) 7 SCC 690, was invoked for its qualified explanation of FIR delay. There is no fixed statutory time for lodging an FIR; prompt reporting assists timely investigation and reduces the opportunity for concoction. A prompt FIR, however, is not an unreserved guarantee of genuineness, and genuine causes may explain delay. The Court applied that caution to the challenge to this private complaint; it did not find any particular explanation proved. Mohammad Wajid v. State of U.P., AIR 2023 SC 3784, was cited for the principle that delay in FIR registration alone is insufficient for quashing. These authorities address related questions. The Court's account of Ravinder Kumar retains the qualifications concerning both promptness and delay; these authorities do not decide the separate statutory limitation issue.

Mohammed Ibrahim v. State of Bihar, (2009) 8 SCC 751, was expressly relied on by the applicant to argue that execution of a sale deed by a person without ownership does not, by itself, amount to forgery. The Court recorded that submission and responded by referring to the later deed's declarations of authority, no previous sale and freedom from encumbrances, together with the earlier registered deed for the same described first-floor flat. The forgery conclusion was the High Court's prima facie application to the stated facts. The Court did not comment on the reasons for the co-accused's acquittals.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to quash the complaint, its registration and the pending trial. Section 200 CrPC provided the private-complaint procedure after the alleged police inaction. Section 468 CrPC prescribes limitation periods according to the maximum punishment; on the Court's reading, it prescribes none for offences punishable beyond three years. Section 420 IPC carries a maximum sentence of seven years, Section 467 may extend to life imprisonment, and Section 468 IPC may extend to seven years. Although both bear the number 468, the CrPC provision concerns limitation and the IPC provision concerns the alleged forgery offence; they are distinct provisions. The Court referred to cheating as defined in Section 415 IPC and punishable under Section 420, and found a prima facie case on the alleged second sale. It also held that the later deed's particular declarations could bring the conduct within Sections 467 and 468 IPC at the prima facie stage. The applicant mentioned Section 471 IPC in his submission summarising Mohammed Ibrahim, but the complaint and disposition concerned Sections 420, 467 and 468.

4. Issues : Was the Section 200 complaint barred by limitation under Section 468 CrPC, given the maximum punishments for the charged IPC offences? Separately, did the delay before the complaint, by itself, require quashing? Did the two registered deeds for the same described first-floor flat make out a prima facie case of cheating despite the asserted description error and the separate bank-loan dispute? Did the later deed's express ownership and no-prior-transfer declarations permit the forgery allegations to proceed notwithstanding the applicant's reliance on Mohammed Ibrahim? Finally, did the co-accused's acquittals in a trial held while the applicant was absconding automatically dispose of his prosecution? The Court did not determine ultimate title, whether the 2002 deed described the wrong physical flat, the genuineness of the bank papers, the applicant's guilt or the correctness of the co-accused's acquittals.

5. Ratio / Findings : On limitation, the Court compared the maximum punishment for each charged offence with Section 468 CrPC's three-year threshold. Sections 420 and 468 IPC each carried up to seven years, while Section 467 carried up to life imprisonment. No statutory limitation period under that provision therefore barred the complaint. On the separate contention of delay, the Court applied Skoda Auto Volkswagen to avoid a factual inquiry at the threshold and the principles in Ravinder Kumar and Mohammad Wajid that delay alone does not invalidate or extinguish a criminal accusation. It did not determine credibility merely from elapsed time. The statutory limitation and belated-filing objections were rejected for distinct reasons.

On cheating, the Court treated the first registered deed as conveying first-floor Flat No. 10 and the later deed as purporting to convey that same identified flat after the applicant had lost title to it. The Court found the second sale sufficient at this stage for cheating within Section 415 IPC and the alleged Section 420 charge. The claimed ground-floor error did not displace the registered description, particularly in the absence of a registered correction instrument. Even if the bank later evicted the complainant for loan default, that independent transaction did not answer the alleged earlier double sale. These were prima facie reasons for allowing the trial to proceed, rather than a conviction or a finding that all the payment allegations were true.

On forgery, the Court addressed the applicant's narrower contention that lack of ownership alone did not establish offences under Sections 467/468 IPC. It referred to clauses 7 and 11 of the later deed, which contained a claim of complete authority to sell and a declaration that the flat had never been sold, mortgaged, gifted, willed, transferred or otherwise encumbered. Read with the earlier registered sale of the same described flat, the Court said that those affirmative declarations brought the case within Sections 467 and 468. It therefore rejected absence of an offence as a ground for quashing. The ruling was confined to its stated facts and did not establish that every sale without title amounted to forgery.

As to the co-accused, the Court asked for a legal basis on which a judgment and evidence from a trial conducted in the applicant's absence could be used to discharge him. None was identified. The acquittal of the other two accused in 2022 did not automatically benefit him, and the Court declined to comment on the reasons for those acquittals. It found that the distinct prima facie allegations against Shukla warranted his own trial. Beyond that refusal, the Court did not lay down a general evidentiary rule governing every trial of an absent accused or the use or proof of evidence recorded in an earlier trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The private complaint, registration order and S.T. No. 128/2019 were not quashed, and the applicant was left to face the pending prosecution. The Court made no finding of guilt, did not disturb the two co-accused's acquittals and did not decide the independent bank dispute.

Manoj Shukla v. Pratibha Mishra and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 17913/2024, 08/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (450) Prev Next

Headnote :- Murder / Section 300 thirdly / homicidal injury - Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, was considered for the objective proof of a bodily injury and its nature, the intention to inflict the injury found, and the injury's objective sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. An intention to cause death itself is unnecessary under that clause once its distinct elements are established. Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeals 1078–1079/2005, explained the progression from Section 299 to Section 300, its exceptions and Section 304 Parts I/II. The Court accepted that the death was homicidal and resulted from gunshot injuries traversing the lungs. It credited the eyewitness account of Umesh's shot during the group assault and affirmed his Section 302 conviction and the other surviving appellants' Section 302/149 convictions. The judgment also recited Anda, Mahesh Balmiki, Pulicherla Nagaraju, Sangapagu Anjaiah, Kanhaiyalal and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao on intention, weapons, injury and the absence of a mechanical single-blow rule, and Dhirajbhai Nayak on Exception 4. It made no distinct single-blow or sudden-fight finding on these facts.

Unlawful assembly / common object / Section 149 IPC - Dani Singh v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 203, requires membership of an unlawful assembly and a shared unlawful object; mere presence does not establish guilt. A common object may form or change during events, and members may differ in their objects or knowledge. Kuldip Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2011) 5 SCC 324, requires an express finding of the unlawful object supported by evidence. Mahadev Sharma v. State of Bihar, (1966) 1 SCR 18, addressed the assembly and rioting ingredients implicit in Section 149 charges. On the substantive common-object issue, the Court found that five armed accused jointly seized, removed and attacked Raghvendra, with Umesh firing the fatal shot. These findings supported murder liability based on the common object and the Section 148 convictions. Bal Singh's appeal alone abated following his death.

Related eyewitnesses / careful scrutiny / quality of proof - Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, including its discussion of Darya Singh and Raghubir Singh, rejects the automatic exclusion of related witnesses but requires careful assessment of their presence, the probabilities and any infirmities. Independent corroboration is not mandatory in every case, and the probative quality of the evidence prevails over the number of witnesses. The Court accepted Rahul (PW5) and Vimlesh Devi (PW7) after cross-examination. It regarded their core account as medically supported despite their family relationship, minor omissions and five other witnesses turning hostile.

Hostile witnesses / remaining credible evidence - PW1, PW2, PW3, PW4 and PW6 did not support the case. Their hostility did not nullify PW5/PW7's credited account and the postmortem support; the Court relied on quality rather than a fixed number of eyewitnesses, without extracting an affirmative fact from the hostile depositions.

FIR delay / explanation and embellishment risk - State of H.P. v. Gian Chand, AIR 2001 SC 2075, and Tara Chand v. State of Punjab, AIR 1991 SC 63, require inquiry into the explanation for delay and the possibility of embellishment. Unexplained prejudicial delay may matter, but delay is not a ritual formula for rejection. The Court accepted that the witnesses went in fear to Raja Saheb at Machhand and reported the incident after the deceased's father returned. This explained the delay of approximately three hours. Both appeals were dismissed and the surviving convictions and sentences affirmed; no separate Section 307 conviction was recorded in the operative order.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : These connected appeals challenged the judgment of 22 December 2009 in Sessions Trial No. 155/2007, Bhind. Criminal Appeal No. 99/2010 was filed by Umesh Singh, who was convicted under IPC Section 302 and sentenced to life imprisonment and a Rs. 5,000 fine, and under Section 148 and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment and a Rs. 1,000 fine, with default stipulations. Criminal Appeal No. 37/2010 was filed by Manoj Singh and three others. They were convicted under Section 302/149 and sentenced to life imprisonment and a Rs. 5,000 fine each, and under Section 148 and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment and a Rs. 1,000 fine each, likewise with default stipulations. Bal Singh, appellant 4 in the latter appeal, died on 24 April 2021; his appeal abated. The Court decided the surviving appellants' appeals together.

The prosecution said that at about 8:30 a.m. on 17 November 2006, Umesh, Manoj, Upendra Singh, Bal Singh and Yashpal alias Kallu came to Rahul Singh's house in village Ahroli, Bhind. Umesh had a gun, Manoj and Upendra Singh had lathis, and Bal Singh and Yashpal alias Kallu had axes. They seized Rahul's approximately 17-year-old brother Raghvendra, moved him towards Suresh Singh's field, threatened Rahul and assaulted Raghvendra. Umesh allegedly fired at Rahul without striking him and later shot Raghvendra; the other members allegedly struck Raghvendra with weapons, kicks or fists. Rahul (PW5) and their mother Vimlesh Devi (PW7) were the principal eyewitnesses. Inspector L.P. Chanderiya recorded a Dehati Nalishi at the spot, followed by an FIR. The investigation included a postmortem, spot maps, the seizure of soil and clothing, weapon seizures and statements. The charge-sheet listed IPC Sections 302, 307, 147, 148, 149 and 201 and Arms Act Sections 25/27. The trial court framed charges under Section 148, Section 302 or alternatively Section 302/149, and Section 307 or alternatively Section 307/149 against Umesh, and under Sections 148, 302/149 and 307/149 against the others. The appellate judgment's stated convictions and final affirmance concern Sections 302 or 302/149 and 148; it does not record a separate Section 307 conviction.

The defence denied involvement, called Balwan Singh (DW1), asserted that unknown assailants had committed the offence, and challenged the reliability of the related witnesses and the medical corroboration. It argued that the interval of roughly two-and-a-half to three hours before the FIR allowed fabrication. Five prosecution witnesses did not support the case. The State relied on the two material eyewitnesses and the postmortem evidence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, was directly quoted on Section 300 Thirdly. The prosecution must first establish, objectively, the presence and nature of the bodily injury. It must then prove an intention to inflict that particular injury, rather than an accidental injury or a different intended injury. The final inquiry is objective: whether the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The prosecution bears the burden throughout. An intention to kill or knowledge of likely death is not an additional requirement of that clause. Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeals 1078–1079 of 2005, was quoted on the progression from culpable homicide under Section 299 to the clauses and exceptions of Section 300. It also distinguished Section 304 Part I, based on intention, from Part II, based on knowledge alone, when murder is not made out. These authorities framed the Court's legal discussion of homicidal death and murder. The Court found that the accused murdered the deceased in furtherance of their common object.

Anda v. State of Rajasthan, 1966 Cri LJ 171, explained the significance under Section 300 Thirdly of an intentionally inflicted injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, rejected the automatic exclusion of murder merely because there was one blow, emphasising the weapon, bodily site, force, manner and circumstances. Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, provided a nonexhaustive list of circumstances indicating intention. It warned against both unjustified conversion from Section 302 to Section 304 and unjustified classification of an offence as murder. Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, inferred intention from a forceful crowbar strike to the skull. State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, discussed the single-blow point through other decisions. Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, rejected mechanical classification based on the number of injuries and reproduced Virsa Singh's distinction between the intention to inflict the actual injury and its objective seriousness. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, was quoted on the cumulative requirements of Section 300 Exception 4: no premeditation, a sudden mutual fight in the heat of passion, no undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct, and combat with the person killed. These authorities appear in the Court's legal exposition; it did not find a single-blow episode or apply a sudden-fight exception to reduce the convictions. Decisions mentioned within Kanhaiyalal or Bavisetti were not independently applied to this fact pattern.

Hari Singh v. Sukhbir Singh, (1988) 4 SCC 551, was invoked in the discussion of IPC Section 307. It requires the intention or knowledge necessary for murder to be inferred from all the circumstances, rather than the resulting wounds alone. The judgment extensively recited Section 307 doctrine and some non-Supreme Court illustrations, but its final reasoning and operative disposition did not separately decide a Section 307 conviction.

Dani Singh v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 203, explained the requirement of an assembly of at least five persons with a shared unlawful object. Liability does not arise from mere presence, nor is proof of an individual overt act invariably required. The common object may form or be modified during events, and members may share it to different extents. Mahadev Sharma v. State of Bihar, (1966) 1 SCR 18, explained that the underlying assembly and rioting ingredients are implicit in Section 149 charges, so a separate Section 147 charge need not invariably be framed. Kuldip Yadav v. State of Bihar, (2011) 5 SCC 324, required a clear finding identifying the unlawful common object and supporting evidence. The Court used Dani Singh and Kuldip Yadav on the substantive common-object issue after finding a coordinated armed seizure, removal and attack; it did not treat mere proximity to Umesh as sufficient. Mahadev Sharma's separate point about charges was recited without a specific dispute about defective charges requiring its application.

Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, was quoted on the careful scrutiny of related or interested witnesses. Its discussion included Darya Singh's inquiry into presence, probabilities and infirmities, and the principle that the quality of evidence matters more than the number of witnesses, including the discussion of Raghubir Singh within that decision. The Court applied it to Rahul and Vimlesh, accepting their core testimony despite their relationship and other witnesses turning hostile. State of H.P. v. Gian Chand, AIR 2001 SC 2075, and Tara Chand v. State of Punjab, AIR 1991 SC 63, were directly invoked together. Delay in lodging the FIR calls for inquiry into the explanation and the risk of embellishment. A satisfactory explanation prevents delay alone from defeating the case, but unexplained delay with a real risk of fabrication may be fatal. The Court found the explanation satisfactory in this case: fear, the intervening visit to Raja Saheb, and reporting after the father returned.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 299 and 300 supplied the definitions of culpable homicide and murder. Section 300 Thirdly was extensively discussed, including the distinction between the intention to inflict the injury and its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. Section 302 was the murder punishment provision. Section 304 Parts I/II and Section 300 Exception 4 appeared in the legal discussion as possible different classifications, but the convictions were not converted and no sudden-fight defence was accepted. IPC Sections 141 and 149 required an unlawful assembly of at least five persons and a shared object or the requisite knowledge of a likely offence; Section 148 punished armed rioting. The Court affirmed Umesh's conviction directly under Section 302, the other surviving appellants' convictions under Section 302/149, and each appellant's conviction under Section 148. Section 307's attempt-to-murder elements were discussed at length because charges had been framed, but the judgment does not identify an appellate conviction under it or a separate operative disposition. The charge-sheet also cited IPC Sections 147 and 201 and Arms Act Sections 25/27, without recorded affirmed convictions under those provisions. CrPC Section 313 was used for the accused's statements; Evidence Act Section 27 appeared in the account of recovery memoranda.

4. Issues : Was Raghvendra's death homicidal, and did the accepted evidence sustain the murder convictions, including the legal significance under Sections 299–300 of intentionally inflicted fatal injuries? Did the prosecution prove a five-person unlawful assembly and a common object to commit murder, making the non-shooters constructively liable under Section 149 and sustaining the rioting convictions? Could Rahul and Vimlesh be relied on despite their relationship, contradictions, five other witnesses' hostility and the asserted gaps in medical corroboration? Did the interval before the FIR reasonably permit an inference of concoction, or was it satisfactorily explained? Although the introductory question and legal survey mention Section 307, the Court did not decide a distinct surviving Section 307 conviction in its operative analysis. The Court did not make a separate conversion to Section 304, find Exception 4 applicable, or resolve each quoted single-blow illustration as an issue in this multi-assailant case.

5. Ratio / Findings : PW8 Dr. Dinesh Kumar Gupta recorded an incised neck wound, neck and chest abrasions, a gunshot entry and exit through the right hand, and another entry through the right arm passing through the lungs, with a bullet recovered from the left chest. He attributed death to syncope associated with lung injuries and bleeding, and described the death as homicidal. Virsa Singh's four-step principle under Section 300 Thirdly and Arun Nivalaji More's framework for murder and culpable homicide informed the legal exposition. The Court did not convert the affirmed murder convictions on the basis of the single-blow or sudden-fight precedents it recited.

The Court credited Rahul (PW5) and his mother Vimlesh (PW7) after cross-examination as witnesses to the group's arrival, the taking of Raghvendra to the field and the deadly attack. Rahul identified Umesh with the gun, Manoj and Upendra with lathis, and Bal and Yashpal/Kallu with axes. He described Umesh firing towards him and the fatal assault, and denied the defence account that unknown persons had committed the offence. Vimlesh supported the essential narrative. Under Harbeer Singh, the family relationship required careful scrutiny but did not itself disqualify the witnesses. The Court treated some omissions and contradictions as nonfatal and found the core oral account supported by the postmortem and surrounding circumstances. Five other witnesses—PW1, PW2, PW3, PW4 and PW6—turned hostile. The Court assessed the quality of the two accepted eyewitnesses rather than counting witnesses, and did not rely on a specific inculpatory portion of the hostile evidence. The investigating officer admitted that he had not recorded a Rojnamcha Sanha after receiving information by mobile telephone. He said that he immediately reached the spot with police.

For Section 149, the Court stated that there must be at least five members and a shared unlawful object. That object must be discerned from the time and place of the gathering, the weapons and the collective conduct, rather than isolated individual acts. It found that five armed participants arrived together, seized Raghvendra, carried him to the field and attacked him, with Umesh using the gun. The Court applied Dani Singh and Kuldip Yadav to that sequence. It recited Mahadev Sharma's separate point about charges without making a distinct ruling on defective charges. It concluded that the murderous act was committed in furtherance of their common object. Umesh's direct conviction under Section 302, the others' Section 302/149 convictions and their Section 148 convictions were sustained. Bal Singh's death terminated only his appeal.

On the timing of the FIR, the incident was placed at around 8:30 a.m. and the FIR at about 11:30 a.m. Rahul and Vimlesh described their fear, their search for safety at Raja Saheb's house at Machhand, and their wait for the deceased's father before reporting. Under Gian Chand and Tara Chand, the delay required scrutiny of the explanation and possible embellishment, rather than automatic rejection. The Court accepted that sequence as explaining about three hours and declined to infer fabrication fatal to the prosecution. It found no failure of justice warranting appellate interference and approved the trial court's convictions and sentences. These findings rest on the particular evidence and do not make kinship, hostility of other witnesses or every reporting interval irrelevant as a general rule.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed Bal Singh's criminal appeal as abated because he had died. The criminal appeals otherwise failed; the convictions and sentences of 22 December 2009 in Sessions Trial No. 155/2007 were affirmed for the surviving appellants. Appellants on bail were directed to surrender immediately to serve their remaining sentences; those in jail were to be informed through the Jail Superintendent, and the records were to be returned to the trial court. The order did not announce a fresh Section 307 conviction or reduce the murder charges to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

Manoj Singh and Ors. v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 37/2010 & 99/2010, 10/11/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Cross-examination / defective trial order-sheet / exclusion of untested evidence - Hariom (PW10) gave eyewitness and seizure-related evidence, but the court adjourned for the day before defence cross-examination, which was deferred. Although the order sheet described him as examined and cross-examined, the record showed the accused had no opportunity to question him. The appellate Court excluded PW10's testimony against the appellant and assessed the remaining evidence; the erroneous notation could not replace actual cross-examination. Exclusion did not itself negate proof supplied by other witnesses.

Medical evidence / alternative mechanism without foundation - The first doctor accepted as a general possibility that broken bottle glass could cause such injuries, but no circumstance suggested that Neera had fallen on glass. Her MLC, X-ray and surgeon's evidence established multiple sharp injuries, abdominal penetration with exposed viscera, and amputation of her left little finger; the surgeon considered the abdominal wound dangerous to life. The Court found multiple stab wounds proved and accepted medical corroboration of the admissible eyewitness account, without treating an unsupported hypothetical as reasonable doubt.

Attempt to murder / intention from knife attack - Injured Neera (PW3), her mother (PW1), and cross-examined eyewitnesses PW12/PW13 were credited; witnesses who arrived later and those giving hearsay evidence were not substituted for direct proof. The immediate Dehati Nalishi, medical findings and blood-positive recovered knife reinforced the attack account. Multiple knife blows to neck and abdomen with dangerous penetration, other wounds and finger amputation supported an inference of intention to kill under IPC Section 307. The Court affirmed conviction notwithstanding the untested PW10 testimony, open-place knife recovery and omissions concerning prior marital conduct; it did not hold that serious injury alone always proves an intention to cause death.

Sentence / proportionality / victim harm - Shyam Narain v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2013) 7 SCC 77, explained sentencing by the offence's nature and manner, social and victim impact, proportionality, deterrence and opportunities for reform where appropriate, citing Jameel, Shailesh Jasvantbhai, State of M.P. v. Babulal and Gopal Singh within its passage. Raj Bala v. State of Haryana, (2016) 1 SCC 463, required a rational and proportionate exercise of discretion, citing further adequacy-of-sentence cases. Applying those principles to a separated husband bringing a knife and repeatedly attacking his wife on vital parts, with finger loss, the Court refused to reduce the sentence of ten years' rigorous imprisonment and affirmed the Rs. 10,000 fine. The rape victim in Shyam Narain's quotation was part of that authority, not this case.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Manoj appealed under Section 374 CrPC from the Sessions Judge, Ashok Nagar's 8 October 2015 conviction under IPC Section 307 in S.T. No. 15/2014, imposing ten years' rigorous imprisonment, a Rs. 10,000 fine and default imprisonment. Injured Neera was his wife, worked as an Anganwadi worker and lived with her mother

Kaushalya amid marital disputes and court cases. According to the prosecution, at about 2:45 p.m. on 8 November 2013, Manoj approached Neera and Kaushalya near the Anusuchit Jati Girls Hostel with a knife and repeatedly attacked Neera. She sustained a penetrating abdominal injury, cuts to her neck, arm and subcostal area, and amputation of her left little finger. On hearing her cries, witnesses arrived; the appellant fled on seeing them. Kaushalya conveyed information in a Dehati Nalishi at the government hospital about 3:20 p.m.; the FIR followed. Medical examination, surgery and X-ray documented the wounds. Police prepared a map, seized soil and clothing, arrested Manoj that evening, recorded a disclosure and seized a blood-stained knife from an open place accessible to the public; the FSL reported blood on it. The charge-sheet cited IPC Sections 307 and 326, but the framed charge and conviction were under Section 307. Manoj denied guilt and testified as DW1.

On appeal he challenged witness reliability and called the ten-year term excessive. The State relied on prompt reporting, several injuries including vital areas and finger loss. The Court examined the injured witness, her mother, medical witnesses, other claimed eyewitnesses and the procedural status of one witness whose cross-examination had not occurred. No acquittal or sentence reduction was granted. The precise default-imprisonment duration was not set out in the appellate judgment.

Shyam Narain v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2013) 7 SCC 77, was quoted at length for the social goal of punishment and a proportionate response to the gravity and manner of the offence and its impact on the victim and society, with deterrence and reform assessed in context. Its internal quotations of Jameel v. State of U.P., Shailesh Jasvantbhai v. State of Gujarat, State of M.P. v. Babulal and Gopal Singh v. State of Uttarakhand illustrated a proper sentence, adjustment to the facts, the aims of punishment and reasoned judicial discretion. The quoted case itself concerned a serious sexual offence against a child; the present Court took general sentencing principles, without treating the facts of that offence as analogous, and applied them to an attempted murder of a wife. Raj Bala v. State of Haryana, (2016) 1 SCC 463, was quoted for adequate, just and proportionate punishment according to gravity, manner, victim impact and rational rather than capricious discretion. Its nested references to State of M.P. v. Bablu, State of M.P. v. Surendra Singh and State of Punjab v. Bawa Singh were not independently analysed in this case. Both directly quoted authorities supported the Court's refusal to reduce the ten-year term after assessing the weapon, repeated attack, vital parts of the body and lasting injury; neither required a fixed sentence in every Section 307 case.

2. Statutes considered : CrPC Section 374 provided the basis for the appeal against the conviction and sentence. IPC Section 307 was the sole framed charge and affirmed conviction, despite the charge-sheet's Section 326 reference. The Court inferred an intention to cause death from the proved repeated stab/cut injuries to vital regions and circumstances; it did not separately convict under Section 326 or apply a presumption that any serious wound satisfies Section 307. Evidence Act Section 27 appeared in the account of Manoj's disclosure leading to knife seizure; the Court noted open public access and the FSL finding of blood on the knife and recorded the discovery circumstances. CrPC Section 161 arose from omissions about past marital conduct in Neera's police statement; it accepted her explanation that police had not asked about that history and found no material contradiction about the assault itself. For PW10, the Court excluded his testimony because he was never made available for defence cross-examination.

3. Issues : Could the appellant's Section 307 conviction survive when one apparent eyewitness, PW10, had never been cross-examined despite a contrary completion notation in the order sheet? Once his testimony was excluded, did the injured woman's account, admissible eyewitnesses and doctors prove the knife attack and the intention to cause death beyond reasonable doubt, in the face of a hypothetical broken-glass explanation, incidental omissions and seizure of the knife from an open place? Was ten years' rigorous imprisonment with a fine disproportionate to this particular attack? The Court did not decide a Section 326 conviction, a separate evidentiary rule on public-place recovery, or an alternative post-conviction relief.

4. Ratio / Findings : Dr. Santosh Raghuvanshi (PW7) recorded a deep stab wound to the left lumbar region with viscera protruding, further sharp cuts near the ribs, left arm and neck, and an amputated left little finger. Radiologist Dr. S.S. Chhari (PW2) corroborated the finger loss by X-ray; treating surgeon Dr. Pradeep Kayal (PW6) repaired the viscera and considered the abdominal injury dangerous to life. The initial doctor admitted that a fall onto broken glass might generally cause injuries, but no evidence suggested Neera had fallen in that way. The Court therefore found her multiple stab wounds proved beyond reasonable doubt. It distinguished a general medical possibility from an alternative explanation supported by the evidence. The Court excluded the untested PW10 testimony because the defence had no opportunity to cross-examine the witness. Its inference of intent under Section 307 depended on the evidence it identified.

Kaushalya (PW1) described the attack and immediate hospital reporting. Neera (PW3) directly identified her husband; the trial court had seen her missing finger and scars. She explained omissions in her Section 161 account about the appellant's earlier conduct by saying police did not ask those questions; the defence made no specific challenge to her account of the assault beyond a general suggestion, which she denied. Vikas (PW12) and Virendra (PW13), each cross-examined, supported the actual attack. Yogesh (PW4) reached after the assault and saw the appellant flee; Vishnu (PW5) and Rajesh (PW9) were hearsay for the assault. The Court did not elevate these latter persons into eyewitnesses. Hariom (PW10) gave apparently direct evidence of the assault and evidence concerning the recovery, but proceedings stopped at the end of court hours before the defence cross-examined him. The order sheet said he was examined and cross-examined, contrary to the underlying record. Because the accused never had that opportunity, the Court held PW10's testimony could not be read against him and assessed the other evidence without it.

The investigating officer described the disclosure, knife and blood-positive FSL result, acknowledging seizure from an open place with regular public movement. The Dehati Nalishi came about 35 minutes after the alleged attack. Considering the admissible eyewitnesses, medical corroboration and prompt complaint, the Court found it proved that Manoj had committed the repeated knife attack. From the number and location of blows to abdomen and neck, dangerous penetrating injury and amputation, it inferred intention to cause death, satisfying Section 307. The Court based its assault finding on Kaushalya, Neera, Vikas and Virendra, medical corroboration and prompt reporting.

On sentence, the Court noted Neera had separated after alleged cruelty and lived with her mother and minor child, while the appellant arrived carrying a knife and inflicted repeated wounds to vital regions with lasting finger loss. Shyam Narain and Raj Bala required proportionate sentencing sensitive to the manner of the offence and the harm to society and the victim, without substituting abstract mercy or severity for judicial assessment. On these facts the Court held ten years' rigorous imprisonment was not excessive and made no reduction. Its decision was a fact-specific exercise of sentence review, not a mandatory minimum of ten years for all attempts.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal. The 8 October 2015 judgment in S.T. No. 15/2014 was affirmed: IPC Section 307 conviction, ten years' rigorous imprisonment, Rs. 10,000 fine and the trial court's default-imprisonment stipulation. The appellant was already in jail and the Court made no further direction; he was to serve the sentence imposed.

Headnote :- Juvenile justice — Section 94 age inquiry — conflicting documentary dates - A Class 1 admission register and certificate proved by the school principal recorded the accused's birth as 08.12.1998 and Class 1 admission on 29.07.2004, while a later Class 10 mark-sheet recorded 09.03.2003. The mother produced the latter without explaining the change, when or under whose authority it was made. The Court found the earlier entry consistent with admission at about six and the later entry suspicious in light of the 2017 Class 10 examination and the age at Class 1 admission inferred from it. The Board had to make a reasoned finding as to which document was reliable instead of treating a documentary discrepancy itself as a ground to use medical estimation; the preference here depended on the proved records and their unexplained inconsistency.

Juvenile justice — Section 94(2)(iii) — medical age estimation as fallback - Where the documentary evidence specified in Section 94(2)(i) and (ii) of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 is available, ossification or another medical age test does not become the basis for determining age simply because competing records require evaluation. The dental and radiological opinions of 17–18 years were given undue weight when the first admission record was available. On that record the respondent was above 21 on the incident date, 01.08.2020. The Court quashed the Board's juvenility order and the appellate order affirming it, stopped the trial before the Board and directed transfer of the charge-sheet to the regular court for trial along with co-accused; it did not determine guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The criminal revision arose from a fatal assault alleged to have followed a dispute over earth falling on Gopal Sikarwar's field during construction of a mud road. According to the complainant Gabbar Singh's FIR of 01.08.2020, a group armed with lathis and farsas attacked his brother Padam Singh when he went towards his field that morning. The FIR attributed specific blows against Padam Singh and intervening relatives to different persons and also alleged that Tunda alias Vikas fired a firearm. These are the prosecution allegations explaining the gravity and context of the case, not findings of guilt in this age inquiry. Applicant Manvendra Singh was Gabbar Singh's son and Padam Singh's nephew; respondent No. 2 Satyabhan was sent by police to the Juvenile Justice Board because police treated him as a juvenile.

Gabbar Singh applied under Section 14 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015, saying Satyabhan was an adult and should face trial before the regular court with the others. On 09.11.2020 the Board in Case No. 123/2020 held that he was 17 years, five months and 22 days old on 01.08.2020 and directed trial before it. The 7th Additional Sessions Judge, Morena dismissed the challenge in Criminal Appeal No. 5/2021 on 01.02.2021. Manvendra brought this revision under Section 397 CrPC read with Section 102 of the 2015 Act. Counsel had indicated on 14.03.2022 that he would not press it, but the High Court rejected withdrawal because the age question involved important fact and law, considered suo motu cognizance and heard the matter. The respondent also sought deferral pending a Board report on any Section 15 order, while fairly conceding that such an order would not affect this revision.

The competing dates were 08.12.1998 in the Government Higher Secondary School, Pachekha Class 1 admission register and date-of-birth certificate, and 09.03.2003 in Satyabhan's Class 10 mark-sheet. Principal Kailash Chandra Sharma (PW1) produced the original register covering 2004 –2018, entry 1847, showing admission to Class 1 on 29.07.2004. He said entries were normally made in the course of school business and denied manipulation, while admitting he was not posted there when the admission occurred and that dates disclosed by parents had formerly been entered in school records. Satyabhan's mother Narmada (PW2) supported the 2003 date, said she delivered him at home and his father went for admission, and produced the Class 10 mark-sheet (Ex. P/4). She said she was illiterate and could not recall her other children's birth dates or identify the school; the High Court found no explanation for the change in the recorded date. Dr R.C. Mishra, on the basis of a dental X-ray, and radiologist Dr V.K. Som each estimated his age at 17–18 years. The applicant urged reliance on the first register and the sequence of documentary evidence under Section 94; the respondent defended the Board's use of the medical opinions because the documents disagreed.

2. Precedents — Considered : The applicant's counsel cited Ashwini Kumar Saxena v. State of M.P., (2012) 9 SCC 750; Ram Suresh Singh v. Prabhat Singh alias Chhotu Singh, AIR 2009 SC 2805; and Sanjeev Kumar Gupta v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2019) 12 SCC 370. Counsel also cited the coordinate Bench decision Vipin alias Chotu Bhadouriya v. State of M.P., 2020 (I) MPWN (SN) 3. The judgment records these as authorities supporting the applicant's submission about competing school records and resort to ossification. The Court's stated reasoning applies Section 94(2)(iii) and evaluates the school records and age evidence. The operative analysis is the Court's own application of Section 94(2)(iii) and appraisal of the evidence. No additional precedent is substantively considered by the deciding Judge.

3. Statutes considered : Section 94(2) of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 governs determination of age. The Court specifically relied on clause (iii), under which age is determined by an ossification test or another latest available medical test, conducted on the Board's or Committee's order, only in the absence of documents specified in clauses (i) and (ii). The school admission record was available, so the first task was to determine its reliability in the face of the later Class 10 mark-sheet; disagreement between documents did not dispense with that task or elevate a medical estimate above the statutory process based on documents. Section 14 was the provision invoked in the application to the Board; Section 102 was invoked with Section 397 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 for revision of the appellate and Board orders. Section 15's potential preliminary assessment was mentioned in a request to defer hearing; no Section 15 assessment or its merits was decided. The alleged assault and accompanying charges were background to the age and forum dispute, and the Court did not decide offence elements or criminal responsibility.

4. Issues : First, where the original Class 1 admission register and the later Class 10 mark-sheet gave incompatible birth dates, which record was credible on the evidence, and could the Board simply treat the conflict as a reason to adopt dental and radiological estimates? This required attention to the sequence in which the two dates were entered in the records and to what the witnesses could actually establish. Second, did Section 94(2)(iii) permit medical age determination when school documents of the specified kind were on record, and was Satyabhan under 18 on the incident date? Third, what orders concerning the finding of juvenility, the pending Board proceeding and trial forum followed if the lower courts used the wrong method? The proposed deferral for a Section 15 report was not material on the respondent's own concession. The Court did not decide the underlying assault allegations or any final guilt question.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the documents, the original school register and the principal's evidence supported a date of 08.12.1998 and admission in Class 1 on 29.07.2004 at approximately six years. The Court noted the principal had not personally been present at admission and had acknowledged the older practice of recording parents' disclosed dates, but nonetheless treated the original entry as a normal school record without demonstrated interpolation. The mother's later Class 10 mark-sheet, issued on 12.05.2017 and recording 09.03.2003, was not explained by evidence showing when, how or on whose authority the original school date had changed. The mother could not provide corroborating context; the father, who according to her arranged school admission and was also a co-accused in jail, was not called. The Court reasoned that, on the later birth date and the 2017 Class 10 examination, the inferred Class 1 admission age would have been about four, below the minimum of five it said the law permitted. It found the earlier admission date more convincing and the later mark-sheet surrounded by unexplained suspicious circumstances. The reliability finding rested on this comparison, rather than merely on how old the documents were or the order in which they were issued. On method, Section 94(2)(iii) made medical determination a fallback if the documentary categories in clauses (i) and (ii) were absent. The Class 1 admission record was before the Board. The dental and radiological opinions placing age between 17 and 18 could not serve as a substitute for resolving the evidentiary conflict between school documents. The Board and appellate court committed material illegality by giving undue importance to the ossification evidence and describing the documents as discrepant without deciding which was reliable under the Act. The High Court held Satyabhan was an adult, more than 21 on the occurrence date. It did not announce that all first admission records invariably prevail over matriculation records, nor did it decide how age must be determined if the statutory documents are genuinely absent. The Court rejected withdrawal, stating that an important question of fact and law was involved and that suo motu cognizance of the revision could be taken.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the revision. The High Court quashed the Juvenile Justice Board, Morena order of 09.11.2020 in Case No. 123/2020 and the 7th Additional Sessions Judge, Morena order of 01.02.2021 in Criminal Appeal No. 5/2021. It declared respondent No. 2 an adult, above 21 years of age on 01.08.2020, directed the Board to stop proceeding with his trial and transfer the charge-sheet to the regular court for his trial with the other co-accused. There was no determination of guilt, no remand for a fresh age inquiry, and no separate adjudication on any Section 15 assessment.

Manvendra Singh v. State of M.P. and Ors., Cr.R. no. 2609/2021, 28/04/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Abetment of suicide — Sections 306 and 107 IPC — instigation, intention and proximate conduct - Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, requires conduct from which purposeful goading or a reasonably certain incitement may be inferred, including a course of conduct leaving the deceased with no other option but suicide; words in anger without the intended consequence do not suffice. Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, makes intention and the circumstances decisive, with no rigid formula; Sanju alias Sanjay Singh Sengar v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371, and Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797, explain the three forms of abetment under Section 107—instigation, conspiracy and intentional aid—and the mens rea of instigation. Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., (2010) 1 SCC 750, M. Mohan v. State, AIR 2011 SC 1238, S.S. Chheena v. Vijay Kumar Mahajan, 2010 AIR SCW 4938, and Gurcharan Singh v. State of Punjab, (2017) 1 SCC 433, emphasise a positive intentional act pushing the deceased towards suicide; Amalendu Pal v. State of West Bengal, (2010) 1 SCC 707, requires scrutiny of direct or indirect incitement and proximity rather than harassment alone. State of W.B. v. Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73, cautions against attributing suicide to ordinary discord solely because of individual hypersensitivity. The Court used these principles to find that seeking return of money paid on an unfulfilled appointment assurance and the assertion of membership of a non-prohibited association did not, in its analysis, establish the applicants' abetment. The witness statements also alleged a death threat; the Court nevertheless held that no Section 306 offence was made out against these applicants.

M.P. Money Lending Act — Section 11 — character of the payment - On the prosecution account, applicants 1 and 3 had given money to the deceased because he represented that he could secure government computer-operator jobs; after the appointments failed, they sought its return. The Court held this was not money lent to him by the applicants and therefore did not make out the charge under the State money-lending enactment against them. This is a finding about the transaction alleged, without a general construction of all money-lending activities or a finding about other persons named in the suicide note.

Section 482 CrPC — quashing after charge-sheet — legal ingredients on the alleged facts - Praveen Pradhan, (2012) 9 SCC 734, and Amit Kapur v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, caution that the quashing or charge stage calls for a tentative view of the allegations, not a final assessment of the evidence; Amit Kapur allows instigation to be inferred from a course of conduct that leaves the victim no option, in the proper case. After obtaining the suicide note and considering the witness statements, the Court held the Section 306 and Section 11 ingredients absent on the allegations it analysed and quashed the FIR and proceedings only as to these applicants. It did not acquit or resolve the prosecution against other named persons.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Ateeq and his wife Sohlat were found dead in their room on the morning of 30.01.2017 after Ateeq did not respond to a family call and the door was broken open. His brother Mohd. Adnan reported that Ateeq was hanging and Sohlat lay on the floor; papers lay on a sofa. A merg inquiry and spot inspection followed. A multi-page suicide note referred to several persons and transactions. The note attributed to Deepak Khatik a Rs. 50,000 payment and a Rs. 3,00,000 demand connected with compromise of a Section 138 Negotiable Instruments Act case, and referred to a report by Guddibai Rajput. As to these applicants, it referred to money taken from applicants 1 and 3 upon an assurance of government computer-operator appointments, the failure of the appointments, demands for return, and threats. The suicide note refers to asserted Bajrang Dal membership and a threat to have him killed and his body disposed of. The judgment's summary of witness statements likewise records a visit on 29.01.2017 and an alleged threat that Ateeq would be killed if he failed to pay by the next day. These are allegations in the order, not findings that the threats were proved.

Police registered Crime No. 44/2017 at Dehat Basoda, District Vidisha under Sections 306 and 34 IPC and Section 11 of the M.P. Money Lending Act against the applicants and other named persons, including Deepak Khatik, Guddibai Rajput and Laxminarayan Namdev. Ateeq's brother Munabbar Ali stated that Ateeq had first killed Sohlat and then hanged himself, and explained that funds from applicants 1 and 3, routed through Brijesh Kushwah, were passed to a Bhopal contractor; the promised jobs failed after a CM Helpline complaint, repayment was pressed and Ateeq was distressed. Other brothers, Ateeq's son and niece gave similar Section 161 CrPC statements. The Court said the applicants' portion of the suicide note was corroborated by the witness accounts. Initially the note was absent from the case diary, so the High Court ordered its production on 02.04.2018 and reviewed it after the State supplied it. The police had already filed a charge-sheet.

The applicants sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC, saying that, even accepting the note and witness statements, a demand for the return of money taken on a failed and unlawful job assurance could not be abetment or money lending. The State and complainant argued that the demand was accompanied by a killing threat, distinguishing it from a simple repayment request. The complainant also stressed the invocation of Bajrang Dal; counsel conceded that association was not prohibited. The Court's final analysis concentrated on the repayment demand and asserted membership. The Court held that membership of a non-prohibited association did not itself establish abetment and that the applicants could demand repayment of money given on the failed job assurance.

2. Precedents — Considered : Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, supplied the Court's explanation that instigation involves goading, urging, provoking or encouraging the act. Express words urging suicide are unnecessary if the accused's acts, omissions or continued conduct create circumstances in which suicide appears the only option; the circumstances must show an intention to incite and a reasonably certain tendency to bring about the consequence. An angry utterance without intended consequence does not suffice. The High Court drew from it the need for active suggestion or stimulation, direct or indirect, in paragraph 23.

Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, distinguished the abettor's intention from the eventual act, rejected a fixed formula for circumstantial instigation, and noted that at quashing the court forms a tentative view rather than finally assessing the evidence. Its quoted references to State of Punjab v. Iqbal Singh, Surender v. State of Haryana, Kishori Lal and Sonti Rama Krishna were nested citations, not separate High Court analyses. Sanju alias Sanjay Singh Sengar v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371, identified the three forms of abetment under Section 107 and the necessary mens rea for instigation. Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797, was quoted separately for the same three forms of abetment and the relationship between abetment and a proved specific offence; the Court did not apply Section 109 independently. These decisions were considered in examining whether an offence under Section 306 was made out against these applicants.

Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., (2010) 1 SCC 750, and M. Mohan v. State represented by the Deputy Superintendent of Police, AIR 2011 SC 1238, were used for the mental process, clear mens rea and positive or direct act intended to push the deceased into suicide rather than an inference of causation based on distress alone. The quotation attributed to Gangula also addressed ordinary discord and hypersensitivity, as did State of W.B. v. Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73: the latter urged great care in assessing whether conduct actually induced suicide and warned against inferring abetment from ordinary petulance where an unusually sensitive person reacts by suicide. Those facts concerning domestic discord are precedent context, not facts of this financial dispute. Amalendu Pal alias Jhantu v. State of West Bengal, (2010) 1 SCC 707, required careful examination of direct or indirect incitement, active instigation or intentional facilitation and a positive act sufficiently proximate to the occurrence; mere harassment by itself is insufficient. Its longer quotation discussed the third clause and Explanation 2 of Section 107 in its own case. The High Court did not make a separate finding that these applicants intentionally facilitated Ateeq's suicide.

Amit Kapur v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, was quoted for the tentative approach at the stage of framing charges and the possibility that a continued course of conduct by the accused creates circumstances leaving no apparent option but suicide. Its internal discussion of Chitresh and Ramesh Kumar was an embedded Supreme Court quotation, not a separate High Court application of Ramesh Kumar. S.S. Chheena v. Vijay Kumar Mahajan, 2010 AIR SCW 4938, brought together case-specific assessment, intent to provoke, and the need for active conduct and mens rea. It quoted Orilal and Chitresh again, without generating independent additional High Court holdings; its own observation about an unusually sensitive deceased was tied to its facts. Gurcharan Singh v. State of Punjab, (2017) 1 SCC 433, reaffirmed S.S. Chheena's clear mens rea and active/direct-act formulation. Applying these authorities together, the Court concluded that the applicants' conduct, as it assessed it, fell short of instigation, and held that no Section 306 offence was made out against the applicants.

3. Statutes considered : Section 306 IPC penalises abetment of a suicide; Section 107 defines abetment through instigation, conspiracy with an act or illegal omission in pursuance, or intentional aid, with explanations concerning wilful misrepresentation/concealment and facilitation. Section 34 IPC was in the FIR as an allegation of common intention; the Court quashed the Section 306 read with Section 34 proceedings against the applicants. Section 11 of the M.P. Money Lending Act was invoked in the FIR; the Court resolved it by holding the money passed on a promised job placement was not a loan from applicants 1 and 3 to Ateeq. Section 482 CrPC provided the basis for exercising inherent jurisdiction to quash when the charged offences were not disclosed on the allegations examined, despite the charge-sheet. Section 161 CrPC statements supplied the prosecution narrative. The Negotiable Instruments Act Section 138 matter concerned a separately named person's transaction in the note, not an issue adjudicated against these applicants.

4. Issues : First, treating the applicants' attributed suicide-note contents and corroborating witness statements as allegations for the Section 482 inquiry, did demands to return payment made on failed job assurances, a visit the previous day, claimed association membership and the alleged threats amount to instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid under Sections 107 and 306 IPC? The parties differed over whether the alleged killing threat took the case beyond a simple repayment demand. Second, did receipt of money for the appointment assurance make applicants 1 and 3 lenders so as to disclose a Section 11 M.P. Money Lending Act offence? Third, after the charge-sheet, could the High Court quash the FIR and proceedings against the applicants on the ground that the allegations, taken at face value, did not disclose the legal ingredients of the offences, without deciding factual guilt or the cases of others named in the note?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court reproduced Sections 306 and 107 and a substantial sequence of Supreme Court decisions. It understood instigation as purposeful goading, urging or stimulation, whether by words, acts, omissions or a sustained course of conduct, involving an intentional role sufficiently connected with the suicide; evidence of distress or a person's reaction to a demand does not alone establish the defined abetment. Praveen Pradhan and Amit Kapur also guarded against replacing the preliminary inquiry with a final assessment of the evidence and allowed an inference based on the circumstances of the case rather than requiring explicit words inviting suicide. The Court accepted for present purposes that applicants 1 and 3 had paid Ateeq on his promise of government employment, the jobs had not materialised, applicants sought repayment, and a visit occurred one day before the deaths. It found they could seek their money back, even though it called the deceased's assurance and receipt of funds false and illegal. The complainant's point that applicants identified themselves as Bajrang Dal members did not, without more in the Court's analysis, establish abetment, especially when the association was conceded not to be prohibited. Thus it found no Section 306 offence against the applicants. The judgment had also recorded threats that Ateeq would be killed and the suicide note contains a stark threat to have him killed and his body disposed of. The Court did not attribute the separate note allegations against Deepak, Guddibai or Laxminarayan to these applicants. The alleged visit and death threat on 29 January 2017 remain part of the factual account. The conclusion on mens rea and proximity is confined to the allegations assessed in this case; it is not a categorical rule that debt-recovery threats can never support Section 306 IPC. On the State enactment, the Court distinguished money paid to Ateeq for his claimed ability to procure jobs from money lent to him. Because the underlying payment arose from that failed assurance, the Court held the applicants had not lent money and the Section 11 charge was not disclosed. On the exercise of Section 482, after calling for the actual suicide note and considering it with Section 161 accounts and the charge-sheet, the Court took the attributed allegations as its starting point but, on its assessment of those allegations, found that the necessary offence ingredients were not disclosed against these applicants. This was a decision on whether the allegations disclosed the offences, not a criminal trial, an acquittal on proved facts, or a universal bar to Section 306 where a repayment demand is accompanied by intentional coercion.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the Section 482 application. Crime No. 44/2017 at Police Station Dehat Basoda, District Vidisha under Sections 306 and 34 IPC and Section 11 of the M.P. Money Lending Act, together with subsequent criminal proceedings, was quashed against the applicants; the order states that they were discharged. Its wording expressly limits the quashing to the applicants and does not resolve proceedings against the other named accused. No compensation, costs, further investigation or merits finding about those persons was ordered.

Mayank Sharma and Ors. v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 3107/2018, 06/12/2018, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- M.P. Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam, 1990 — Section 5(b) — two conditions for externment - Arvind Singh alias Pappu v. State of M.P., 2017 (4) MPLJ 579, states that the authority must have reasonable grounds to believe that the person is engaged, or is about to engage, in the specified offences involving force or violence or the listed IPC offences. It must also form an opinion, supported by material, that witnesses fear for their person or property and will not testify in public. The Court required specific findings of statutory grounds; five registered cases plus a Section 110 CrPC proceeding, without material of current alarm or unwilling witnesses, did not satisfy them. Registration of cases does not itself prove witness fear.

Externment — stale antecedents — live link and public order - Three minor 2014 cases had ended in acquittals and were separated by seven years from two 2021 cases under Sections 294, 323, 506, 34 and 336 IPC. Rajjan Yadav v. State of M.P., ILR (2021) MP 1512, required consideration of the cases' nature, outcome, staleness and why removal was needed. The Court held the older matters lacked a live link and the later ordinary offences did not show harm to public order, as distinct from ordinary law and order, on the material presented. The authority's reliance on the number of cases did not supply the required reasons or material.

Article 19(1)(d) and 19(5) — extraordinary externment and reasonable restriction - Deepak son of Laxman Dongre v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeal No. 139/2022, decided 28.01.2022, described externment under the Maharashtra 1951 Act as an extraordinary interference with movement, home and possibly livelihood. It must be used sparingly, statutory satisfaction must rest on objective material, and the restriction must be constitutionally reasonable. The High Court used that principle in reviewing a one-year order covering Guna and five adjoining districts under the M.P. statute. Because the Section 5 grounds and current necessity were not established, the restriction did not satisfy the test of reasonableness; the District Magistrate's order and its appellate affirmance were set aside. The quoted Maharashtra provision was an analogy, not the enactment directly governing the petitioner.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The District Magistrate, Guna issued Mayank Sharma a show-cause notice under Section 8(1) of the M.P. Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam, 1990, alleging criminal activity since 2014 and proposing externment. The petitioner said he replied on 07.09.2021: Crime Nos. 75/2014, 168/2014 and 251/2014 had ended in acquittals, while Crime Nos. 101/2021 and 312/2021 falsely implicated him. The table of antecedents from the notice/order on page 2 lists the 2014 matters with offences including Sections 452 or 341, 323, 294, 506 and 34 IPC, the 2021 cases with Sections 294, 323, 506 and 34 IPC and Section 336 IPC respectively, and a preventive Section 110 CrPC entry. The petitioner also asserted that police had issued a character certificate referring to four acquittals and no pending criminal case, a description differing from his account of three 2014 acquittals. These positions are reported as his submissions; the High Court's own analysis treated the three old cases as acquittals and considered the two 2021 entries.

The petitioner alleged that the District Magistrate failed to consider his reply or allow him to lead evidence. On 27.01.2022 the Magistrate ordered him to leave Guna and five specified adjoining districts, Bhopal, Rajgarh, Shivpuri, Vidisha and Ashoknagar, for one year. The Commissioner, Gwalior Division, dismissed Appeal No. 5/Externment/2022 on 06.05.2022. In Writ Petition No. 12150/2022 under Article 226, Mayank sought to set aside both orders and appropriate other relief. He argued that old, minor, acquitted cases lacked a live connection with current necessity, the 2021 cases did not justify public-order action and there was no evidence that witnesses were unwilling to testify because of fear. He said he worked for Bajaj Finance. The State responded that five cases showed continuing criminal activity and respectable members of society feared giving evidence; the Court found no material showing that witnesses were unwilling to testify because of apprehension for their person or property. The Court set aside both orders for failure to satisfy Section 5 and the test of reasonableness.

2. Precedents — Considered : Arvind Singh alias Pappu v. State of M.P. and others, 2017 (4) MPLJ 579, a coordinate Bench decision, was quoted for the two cumulative requirements under Section 5(b):

reasonable grounds that the person is engaged or about to engage in specified violent or listed IPC offences, and the District Magistrate's opinion that witnesses will not come forward publicly through apprehension for person or property. The Court adopted that statutory structure and tested the material relating to the Guna order against it. It did not treat the existence of FIRs as a substitute for the second condition.

Deepak son of Laxman Dongre v. State of Maharashtra and others, Supreme Court Criminal Appeal No. 139/2022 decided 28.01.2022, was quoted at length. Under Section 56 of the Maharashtra Police Act, 1951, the Supreme Court reasoned that an externment order interferes with Article 19(1)(d) free movement and must be a reasonable restriction under Article 19(5); removal is extraordinary and should be used sparingly, since it may exclude a person even from family home or livelihood. Objective material must support the authority's subjective satisfaction that acts cause or are calculated to cause alarm, danger or harm or that the person is engaged or about to engage in specified offences. Under the statutory clause concerning witnesses unwilling to testify because of fear, the competent authority must record that satisfaction from material; a number of registered offences is not by itself enough. The High Court carried that analysis of personal liberty, the need for objective material and the exceptional nature of externment into review of M.P. Section 5, whose text it reproduced. The Court did not assert that Maharashtra Section 56 governed the petition directly. Deepak itself cited Pandharinath Shridhar Rangnekar for the exceptional nature of externment and strict hearing requirements under Maharashtra Section 59; this was a nested citation within the quoted passage, and the High Court did not separately decide the complaint about the hearing under the M.P. statute by applying Section 59.

Rajjan Yadav v. State of M.P. and others, ILR (2021) MP 1512, was cited from this Court's Principal Seat. It reiterated the statutory conditions and faulted an authority for failing to examine the nature, outcome and staleness of cases or explain why newer conduct required removal from multiple districts. The present Court used that reasoning to reject unexplained reliance on the number of old and new cases registered against the petitioner. Rajjan reproduced Kranti Associates (P) Ltd. v. Masood Ahmed Khan, (2010) 9 SCC 496, on the duty of administrative and quasi-judicial decision-makers to record cogent reasons based on relevant facts, constraining arbitrariness and enabling review. The lengthy Kranti passage was nested in the quoted Rajjan extract; the High Court required a supported statutory satisfaction under Section 5. The operative concern was that the Magistrate's satisfaction under Section 5 lacked supporting material and reasons.

3. Statutes considered : Section 8(1) of the M.P. Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam was invoked for the show-cause notice issued by the District Magistrate, and Section 5 supplied the substantive removal power. The Court reproduced Section 5: clause (a) addresses movements or acts causing or calculated to cause alarm, danger or harm to person or property; clause (b) addresses reasonable grounds for specified violence, IPC Chapters XII, XVI or XVII, or Sections 506/509 or their abetment, together with an opinion that witnesses are unwilling to testify publicly because they fear for their person or property; clause (c) concerns a different epidemic-disease situation involving an immigrant and was not invoked. Section 5 also allows directions concerning conduct or removal from the district and contiguous areas. The Court required the competent authority's grounds and satisfaction under the applicable clause to be supported by material and reasons. The antecedent IPC sections were background entries, not offences of which this writ court determined guilt. Section 110 CrPC was an entry concerning preventive proceedings relied upon in the criminal history, not proof that Section 5 was fulfilled. Article 226 supplied the writ jurisdiction. Articles 19(1)(d) and 19(5) framed the fundamental right of free movement and the requirement that a statutory restriction be reasonable. Deepak's Maharashtra Section 56 was an analogous precedent, not the applicable local Act.

4. Issues : First, had the District Magistrate identified objective grounds and recorded the required Section 5 satisfaction about current alarm, specified offending and, insofar as clause (b) applied, witnesses genuinely unwilling to testify from fear? Second, could the three minor 2014 matters ending in acquittals, after a seven-year gap, together with two 2021 ordinary cases and a preventive entry establish a continuing connection with the need to maintain public order sufficient to justify externment from six districts for one year? Third, did an externment of that breadth meet the constitutional reasonableness required by Article 19, and should the writ court set aside both the original and appellate orders? The petitioner also alleged that his reply was ignored and that he had no opportunity to lead evidence. The Court did not try the two newer FIRs or determine the correctness of the police character certificate.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court treated externment as an extraordinary restriction on movement, citing Deepak's Article 19(1)(d) and 19(5) reasoning. The District Magistrate's statutory satisfaction had to be based on objective material and specific reasons; the two conditions identified in Arvind Singh for Section 5(b) could not be replaced by a bare history of registration. The State asserted unwilling witnesses, but the Court found no material to show that witnesses would not come forward publicly through apprehension for their persons or property. Nor did it find material that Mayank's acts caused or were calculated to cause alarm, danger or harm to persons or property. This was a review of the preventive order.

The District Magistrate had relied on five cases and one preventive proceeding. The three 2014 cases were minor and had resulted in acquittals; after them there was a gap of seven years. The Court found they lacked a live link with the necessity for a 2022 externment. The two 2021 cases involved ordinary penal provisions, including abuse/hurt/intimidation and a Section 336 allegation. On the record here the Court distinguished ordinary law and order from public order and found no basis to say these registrations prejudiced public-order maintenance. The Court cited Rajjan Yadav on the need to consider the nature, outcomes and staleness of cases and explain the necessity of externment. The Court did not declare that any fixed period automatically renders every old case irrelevant, nor that a newer prosecution could never support externment with proper material.

Because neither a sufficient statutory finding under Section 5 nor a reasonable justification for this one-year order across Guna and five other districts was made out, the Court refused to approve the order. The Court required satisfaction under Section 5 supported by reasons and material, citing Rajjan Yadav's extract from Kranti Associates on the recording of reasons.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Article 226 petition. The High Court set aside the District Magistrate, Guna externment order dated 27.01.2022 and the Commissioner, Gwalior Division appellate order dated 06.05.2022. The one-year restriction covering Guna and the five named districts consequently ceased under those orders. The Court did not remand for a new decision, order damages, adjudicate the 2021 criminal cases, or make a separate operative ruling about the alleged denial of evidence opportunity.

Mayank Sharma v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 12150/2022, 12/07/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (455) Prev Next

Headnote :- FIR and earliest account — suppression of claimed report - The hospital intimations described an injured man in a fight, without naming his wife, although relatives later said they knew the assailant. Rajendra (PW2) claimed he telephoned police and Anguribai (PW1) lodged an earlier night report; the alleged report, station-diary record of the call and original merg statements were absent, and PW1 herself did not speak of lodging it. The Court distinguished a cryptic hospital message from a full FIR but found the claimed earlier report suppressed and questioned registration of the exhibited FIR only after the death inquiry. Its conclusion arose from the witnesses' accounts and missing records together, not from a rule that every hospital intimation is an FIR.

Recovery — accessible scene and contradictory chronology - The alleged discovery of a heavy bloodstained stone from under a dressing table on 02.05.2010, on the basis of Meena's disclosure, was not proved. Two witnesses said police produced Meena on the third day, whereas the officer placed the seizure and arrest on 02.05.2010. The room remained unsealed and open. The first inspecting officer said she saw no stone, while Rajendra placed it next to the earlier soil collection. The Court accepted Meena's Section 313 explanation that she was arrested in Bhopal as trustworthy and found the alleged seizure on her disclosure unproved; it did not prescribe an automatic exclusion for every unsealed scene.

Section 313 CrPC — defence suggestion and accused's contrary account - A cross-examination suggestion implied that Meena slept at the matrimonial house. The Court acknowledged that counsel's questions cannot be disregarded simply because they later prove inconvenient, but there was no proof that this suggestion came from her instructions. Her explicit Section 313 account of living in Bhopal, not visiting Vidisha and being arrested there had to be assessed with the whole record. The suggestion was not treated as a conclusive personal admission overcoming the serious prosecution defects.

Related witnesses — contextual credibility - Anguribai asserted an actual stone assault, Rajendra saw its aftermath and alleged flight, and Lalita described the preceding household events. Their family connection was not the sole basis for the credibility finding: pending divorce hostility, unexplained arrival with Meena's daughter and silence about that child after the alleged flight, failure to disclose the known assailant's identity at the hospital, suppression of the first report and false arrest account collectively discredited the household version. The prosecution failed to establish Meena's guilt beyond reasonable doubt; the Court stated that the household witnesses had to show how and in what circumstances Kamlesh died, and separately held that the prosecution had not proved Meena's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

Medical and physical evidence — claimed stone mechanism - The MLC and post-mortem established grave head injury and intracranial haemorrhage, but stitched wounds appeared at autopsy without a treatment sheet being produced or a hospital witness explaining them; the surgeon had not opened the stitches or measured depth. The Court saw no expected crush injury from the alleged 15–20 kg stone and held that medical evidence did not corroborate the eyewitness account of the assault and, on its evaluation, ruled it out. The bottle produced later was found to contain ethyl alcohol, consistent with evidence of Kamlesh's drinking rather than proof Meena drugged him; alleged bloodstained earth below a cemented floor and other investigative omissions reinforced reasonable doubt. These are case-record findings, not universal medical or seizure presumptions.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meena appealed under Section 374 CrPC from the Sessions Judge, Vidisha judgment of 06.07.2011 in Sessions Trial No. 219/2010 convicting her of murdering her husband Kamlesh Nagar under Section 302 IPC and sentencing her to life imprisonment, a Rs. 2,000 fine and six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. She denied the charge. The couple had been living apart during divorce proceedings, and Meena said she had lived at her parental home in Bhopal for three years. The prosecution case was that in the intervening night of 01/02.05.2010 she was in Kamlesh's family house in Vidisha, struck his head with a heavy stone and fled. A family member allegedly heard a fall or groan, saw the assault, alerted others and unbolted the mother-in-law's room, which had been secured from outside. Kamlesh was taken to Vidisha District Hospital unconscious around 03:30, referred to Hamidia Hospital, Bhopal and, according to the family, died en route; he was brought back and his death was intimated at 07:45. The earliest hospital papers described an injury in a fight and another used the name Kamlesh Gurjar, while the case identified the deceased as Kamlesh Nagar.

ASI Hemlata Solanki prepared the inquest, spot map and first soil seizure; FIR Crime No. 313/2010 for Section 302 was registered against Meena. Head Constable Rambabu Goswami then took over, recorded a purported memorandum, seized a bloodstained stone allegedly disclosed beneath a dressing table and arrested her on 02.05.2010. Lalita bai later produced a red bottle on 03.05.2010. Fourteen prosecution witnesses included Anguribai (PW1), her husband Rajendra (PW2), Kamlesh's mother Lalita bai (PW3), relatives Pradeep and Kuldeep, the examining doctor Sudhir Jain, post-mortem doctor K.M. Goyal and the police witnesses. There was no defence witness. The appellate defence challenged the reliability of the household witnesses and location of arrest, asserted suppression of an earlier FIR, contested the claimed discovery of the stone, and questioned the unexplained medical details. The State defended the conviction.

2. Statutes considered : Section 302 IPC was the sole offence of conviction and appeal; the Court assessed whether the prosecution proved Meena's participation in the homicidal head injury beyond reasonable doubt. Section 374 CrPC provided the basis for the appeal. Section 313 CrPC supplied her personal opportunity to answer incriminating circumstances: she denied presence at the matrimonial home before arrest and said she was arrested in Bhopal, an answer the Court compared with counsel's cross-examination suggestion and police chronology. The prosecution alleged recovery on the basis of Meena's disclosure; the Court tested whether the alleged disclosure and seizure were genuine on the record, against the witnesses' conflicting accounts and the condition of the scene. FIR, inquest, police diary and seizure records were evaluated as proof and investigative steps, not as a separate statutory violation with an independent remedy. The judgment did not determine a secondary poisoning offence from the bottle or charge another person with the death.

3. Issues : First, did the early hospital and police history, Rajendra's account of a phone call and his claim that Anguribai lodged an FIR show suppression of an earlier report and impair the later FIR's reliability? Second, was Meena genuinely arrested at the family house on 02.05.2010 and did her disclosure lead to an authentic recovery of the heavy stone, given the other witnesses' third-day account and the room's condition? Third, what evidentiary value did counsel's suggestion implying her presence have when considered alongside her contrary Section 313 answer, the unexplained circumstances of her arrival with her daughter and the absence of any account of the child after her alleged flight? Fourth, were the interested household witnesses reliable after the medical, documentary and physical contradictions, including the bottle, floor seizure and failure to search for her bloodstained clothing? Fifth, did the MLC, post-mortem and alleged stone mechanism establish that she committed murder beyond reasonable doubt, and what relief followed? The Court addressed the fatal head injury but the decisive question was identity and proof of the alleged assault.

4. Ratio / Findings : On the first report, the hospital's initial information recorded a fight and no identified attacker even though the family later claimed to have witnessed Meena's assault. Rajendra said he called police and was told to take Kamlesh to hospital before formal recording; he asserted Anguribai filed a report around 04:00–05:00 with Anand. Anguribai did not testify that she filed such a report, Anand was not examined, and the police produced neither the claimed night FIR nor a station-diary record of the call nor the original merg statements. The Court expressly recognized that a cryptic offence message is not necessarily an FIR, so the hospital paper itself was not automatically the original report. But it found, from the family's account and the missing records, that the prosecution suppressed Anguribai's original FIR, and questioned why the exhibited FIR was registered after the death inquiry if the attacker was known at the start. It treated non-disclosure as part of the cumulative loss of confidence in the prosecution’s account of how the incident arose, not merely a formal registration defect. The Court decided the appeal through the testimony, the documentary and medical record, the appellant's Section 313 answer and the beyond-reasonable-doubt standard.

The accounts of the arrest and alleged recovery were inconsistent. Anguribai and Lalita said police brought Meena on the third day; the investigating officer placed the memorandum at 17:25, stone seizure at 17:40 and arrest at 17:55 on 02.05.2010, yet Meena said in her Section 313 answer that she was arrested in Bhopal. The household witnesses had described her as fleeing after the assault, without any account of her daughter, and did not explain how she remained at or returned to the house for the asserted next-day arrest. The Court found her explanation that she was arrested in Bhopal trustworthy and the prosecution's account of the place and date of arrest wrong. The incident room had remained open and unsealed. The first officer said she inspected it closely and saw no stone; Rajendra nevertheless placed a stone close to the blood-soil collection from earlier that day, contradicting the account that its hidden location was discovered only on Meena's later disclosure. The 20-inch by 9-inch by 4-inch stone, said to weigh about 15–20 kg, was not satisfactorily connected to her by the seizure process. The Court therefore rejected the alleged recovery on Meena’s disclosure because of these particular inconsistencies and the opportunity to alter the accessible scene.

The court did not ignore that defence counsel had suggested Meena slept in Lalita's room. It said lawyers' questions can matter and should be framed competently; counsel's lapse cannot simply be erased. But no material showed Meena instructed the suggestion, and her personal Section 313 answer squarely denied visiting Vidisha before arrest. The Court weighed the overall record rather than deeming the suggestion a conclusive concession. Anguribai claimed a direct view of stone blows after hearing a fall or groan, whereas Rajendra described what she told him and seeing Meena run; Lalita spoke of dinner, a quarrel and the bolted room, not an observation of the head blows. Their kinship, co-residence and strained relations during the divorce furnished a possible motive for false implication, but the Court's adverse credibility judgment depended also on the unreported named assault at hospital, suppressed report, unexplained visit from Bhopal with a daughter, silence as to the daughter after the alleged flight and apparently fabricated account of arrest and recovery. The Court stated that the household residents bore a burden to show how and in what circumstances Kamlesh died, and concluded that the prosecution had failed to prove Meena's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

Dr Sudhir Jain's MLC documented two forehead lacerations, ear injury, cheek abrasion and unconsciousness, with a referral for neurosurgical care. Dr K.M. Goyal found stitched forehead wounds, a skull-base fracture, bilateral frontal subdural haemorrhage and death from coma due to intracranial haemorrhage, with the time since death recorded as within 24 hours; the injuries were ante-mortem. The Court did not deny the fatal head injury. It found serious gaps in reconciling the claimed assault: the MLC did not note first aid, the treatment sheet was missing, and Dr Sudhir Jain did not state that he applied stitches. No Hamidia witness was examined to establish that Kamlesh was brought dead. The autopsy doctor neither opened the stitches nor measured the depth of the injuries. He had not identified a crush injury that the Court considered expected from the claimed very heavy stone. It concluded on this medical record that the claimed stone assault described by the eyewitness was unsupported and, in its words, ruled out. That inference is confined to the testimony and wound details here, not a medical rule about every stone assault.

Other physical and investigative features compounded the doubt. Lalita's claim that Meena put something in Kamlesh's vegetable was not established as drugging: the FSL result for the bottle produced later showed ethyl alcohol, while relatives admitted he sometimes drank. The Court stated that the bottle must have been the deceased's and that the story of Meena mixing its contents into the vegetable was concocted. The seizure of bloodstained earth after removing a cement floor, rather than a sample of stained cement, was characterized as a police camouflage. The failure to make any attempt to find Meena's bloodstained clothes was unexplained. The assignment of investigation to a head constable when a senior SHO, SI and ASI were listed was also unexplained, though the Court did not state that rank alone invalidated the investigation. Taken with the report, arrest, recovery, witness and medical defects, the prosecution had not proved Meena committed the Section 302 murder beyond reasonable doubt; the Court considered false implication apparent.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. Meena was acquitted of Section 302 IPC, and the Sessions Judge's conviction and sentence of 06.07.2011 in S.T. No. 219/2010 were set aside. As she was in jail, the Bench directed immediate release if she was not required in another case, immediate free supply of its judgment to her and return of the trial record with a copy for information and compliance. It made no conviction finding against household witnesses or police personnel and ordered no separate inquiry or compensation.

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty — mother-in-law — specific allegations and omnibus-implication safeguard - Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, permits Section 482 quashing where allegations are absurd, disclose no offence or amount to abuse, and urges caution with generic allegations against relatives; where particular harassment allegations disclose a triable case, their reliability is a matter for trial. The complainant attributed car demands, dowry taunts and physical assault to Meera Chauhan personally, including conduct alongside her son in Jaipur. The High Court applied the distinction and declined to quash the FIR and charge-sheet as to this mother-in-law. It did not decide that the allegations were proved or that kinship alone sufficed.

Section 482 CrPC — counter-version and limited cheque observation - Taramani Parakh quoted Amit Kapur v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, for testing uncontroverted allegations at face value, sparing use of quashing power and avoiding a miniature trial of witness or defence reliability. Meera relied on her son's bank complaint and a Jaipur counter-FIR alleging a fraudulent Rs. 10 lakh cheque, but that investigation was pending; the first email did not deny his signature, though a later complaint did. The Court quoted Section 20 of the Negotiable Instruments Act and observed that a signed blank cheque could prima facie authorize completion of entries. It did not resolve whether this cheque was signed, delivered, valid or forged, and the counter-version did not nullify the specific cruelty allegations at the threshold. Nested comparisons in Taramani to Neelu Chopra, Manoj Mahavir and Geeta Mehrotra illustrated fact-dependent outcomes, not automatic immunity for relatives.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meera Chauhan, mother-in-law of respondent No. 2, applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime No. 336/2020 at Police Station Kotwali, Shivpuri, its charge-sheet and consequential proceedings. The complainant's FIR, as narrated by the Court, alleged that she married Meera's son Saurabh Singh Chauhan about ten years earlier. He worked in the Merchant Navy and spent periods at home between voyages. She said that, after her father provided Rs. 10 lakh cash, 20 tolas of gold and household articles by borrowing from relatives, Saurabh and his mother taunted her over insufficient dowry and demanded a car. On her saying her father could not afford it, they allegedly beat her and threatened removal from the matrimonial home. The complainant said her father later transferred a Vakeel Colony, Sheopur plot to Saurabh by registered deed; Saurabh built a house with a bank loan, yet the demands and mistreatment continued. These are allegations, not findings of guilt.

The FIR further attributed to Saurabh drunken assaults and, during a Jaipur episode after the complainant had visited her parental home, a car-money demand, a beating by him and Meera that allegedly caused grievous injuries, and a knife threat by Saurabh with Meera assisting. Relatives called Mahesh Nagar police after the complainant locked herself in a room; she said social pressure kept her from lodging a report then, and her father took her home. In September 2019 she sought funds for debts and maintenance; according to her, a Rs. 10 lakh cheque was issued to meet a construction-related loan, then payment was stopped after Saurabh asserted forgery. The FIR also narrated nonpayment and a Sheopur incident on 01.10.2020 involving Saurabh, police and neighbours, but those later acts were chiefly attributed to him rather than to Meera.

The petitioner claimed that references to her were vague and omnibus. Her counter-version was that Saurabh had complained to the bank of fraudulent withdrawal and, after a Section 156(3) application, a Jaipur FIR in Crime No. 39/2021 had been registered against the complainant. Counsel could not say the investigation had ended; the complainant's counsel said it remained pending and that she was on bail.

The Court examined the son's 21.01.2020 bank email. Counsel initially said he had sent it while in India, but the email said he was aboard a ship near China; counsel then accepted he was on the ship. Counsel also accepted that the first email did not deny the signature on the presented cheque, although a later Section 156(3) application did allege a signature issue. The Court noted that Meera had not addressed the complainant's construction-loan account or pleaded repayment. These observations tested the weight of the applicant's counter-version at the quashing stage; they were not final determinations of the Jaipur FIR, cheque authenticity or loan liability.

2. Precedents — Considered : Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was the material Supreme Court decision expressly quoted and applied. It states that proceedings may be quashed if the allegations are absurd, fail to make a case or constitute abuse, but a triable matrimonial complaint calls for trial of the version and counter-version. It urges care with omnibus allegations against relatives who may not be involved in the couple's affairs, while refusing to turn that caution into a fixed exemption where actual harassment and cruelty are alleged. The High Court used this precise distinction: Meera was alleged to have personally demanded a car, taunted and assaulted the complainant, so reliability and eventual proof could not be decided at the Section 482 stage. Taramani's own facts concerned harassment by a husband and his parents and a complainant separated from the matrimonial home; the present Court applied the legal framework to the detailed allegations before it, not those precedent facts as if they occurred here.

The reproduced Taramani passage quoted Amit Kapur v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, on the wide but carefully and sparingly exercised Section 482 power: test uncontroverted record allegations and basic ingredients prima facie; intervene in patently absurd, legally barred or abusive cases; do not marshal disputed material to predict conviction; a parallel civil claim does not by itself extinguish criminal ingredients; and prefer continuation where an offence is broadly disclosed. This exposition appears within the reproduced Taramani passage and supports its threshold approach.

Taramani also discussed Neelu Chopra, (2009) 10 SCC 184; Manoj Mahavir, (2010) 10 SCC 673; and Geeta Mehrotra, (2012) 10 SCC 741, as quashing decisions depending on their particular facts involving relatives or an absurd jewellery allegation. The High Court reproduced Taramani's explanation that those cases do not lay down an inflexible rule beyond the settled principles of quashing. The material effect was Taramani's caution against generic implication and its countervailing rule that concrete triable allegations proceed. No independent precedent was invoked to adjudicate the cheque-forgery case initiated on the counter-complaint.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 provided the basis for invoking inherent jurisdiction to seek quashing of the FIR, charge-sheet and later proceedings. The Court assessed whether the allegations, taken at face value, disclosed the legal ingredients of an offence, without conducting a mini-trial. The FIR recited alleged dowry demand, assault, threats and continuing cruelty; the judgment does not specify the IPC offence numbers. Section 156(3) CrPC was invoked in Saurabh's separate Jaipur complaint and resulted in registration of Crime No. 39/2021; that investigation was unresolved and did not itself establish the defence. Section 20 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881 was reproduced concerning a signed and delivered stamped paper left wholly blank or incomplete, prima facie authority to complete it subject to its amount and holder-in-due-course limitations. The Court expressed its observation about the practical effect of a signed blank cheque; it did not find as a fact that this particular cheque met every statutory condition, that it was validly delivered, or that the signature dispute was finally decided. The plot sale deed and house loan formed background, not a land-title or civil-debt adjudication.

4. Issues : First, did the complainant's specific allegations about Meera's car demand, dowry taunts, beating and participation in the Jaipur episode disclose a triable matrimonial criminal case, or were they only vague allegations against a relative that warranted Section 482 quashing? Second, could the son's bank email, later Section 156(3) complaint and still-pending Jaipur FIR about the Rs. 10 lakh cheque defeat the complainant's account at the quashing stage, particularly when the first email did not deny his signature and the debt/loan narrative was not addressed? Third, what did the Court's Section 20 observation add, and what matters had to remain for investigation or trial rather than become final factual findings in this petition? The Court did not determine actual cruelty, cheque forgery, who owed the loan or the outcome of the Jaipur case initiated on the counter-complaint.

5. Ratio / Findings : Taramani Parakh set out the governing limits. A court may terminate inherently impossible or legally insufficient allegations, and should scrutinize general allegations against family members; it may not decide which of two factually contested matrimonial versions is true where specific conduct supporting a triable accusation is set out. The FIR did more than identify Meera as Saurabh's mother: it attributed to her statements that the complainant's family gave inadequate dowry, a car demand, physical beating after refusal, and assistance or participation in the described Jaipur violence. The Court expressly called the allegations against Meera specific. It therefore found no basis to quash the FIR against her and left proof and reliability to the proper proceedings. It did not make a finding sufficient to sustain a conviction or separately decide the charge against Saurabh.

The counter-version did not change that threshold. Saurabh's bank email originated while he was on a ship, contrary to counsel's first description, and did not at first deny his signature on the cheque. A later Section 156(3) application asserted that issue, and the Jaipur FIR had been registered, but the investigation still remained open. The Court quoted Section 20 and stated that, if a blank cheque is issued with a signature, the payee may be presumed authorized to fill the remaining entries. It also noted the applicant's silence on the loan for house construction and repayment. The Court considered these matters when rejecting her threshold challenge to the complainant’s allegations at the Section 482 stage. It did not adjudicate that the disputed instrument was valid, that the complainant was exonerated in Jaipur, or that the statutory proviso concerning an incomplete stamped instrument had been finally satisfied.

The quoted Amit Kapur guidelines, through Taramani, also warn against conducting an evidentiary mini-trial, considering external defence material as conclusive or predicting an acquittal; a separate civil/financial issue may coexist with criminal allegations. The High Court's final paragraph turns on the specific allegations against Meera rather than on a broad pronouncement that any in-law allegation survives, and the quoted examples of other relatives' quashing were not mechanically extended to her.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The request to quash Crime No. 336/2020 at Police Station Kotwali, Shivpuri, the charge-sheet and all consequential proceedings was refused as to Meera Chauhan; the underlying prosecution could continue. The Court did not direct an outcome in Jaipur Crime No. 39/2021, decide the civil/cheque dispute, grant costs or declare the complainant's accusations proved.

Headnote :- Investigation — judicial restraint — no compulsory arrest or charge-sheet - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, explains that the police have a statutory duty to investigate, while courts ordinarily should not dictate particular investigative steps or a predetermined result; investigation may end in a charge-sheet or a finding that no case is made out. Its cited M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, treats arrest under Section 41 CrPC as a matter of police discretion to be exercised cautiously, not an automatic consequence of an FIR. The Court applied that principle to decline the complainant's requested directions that officers arrest the accused and file a charge-sheet in her cheating FIR. The quoted Divine Retreat Centre hearing concern addressed the danger of coercive orders against unheard persons, but this Court issued no such order or independent ruling on notice.

Section 173(1) CrPC — completion without unnecessary delay - The applicant said Crime No. 794/2023, registered on 04.08.2023, remained under investigation and her statement had not been recorded. The Court held that police could not leave it pending indefinitely: the investigating officer must decide whether an offence is disclosed and complete the investigation and lawful final report, whether charge-sheet or closure, as early as possible. The application was disposed of with a direction to conclude the investigation and take steps required by law; a grievance could be presented to the Superintendent of Police, Morena. No fixed date, arrest command or direction to reach a particular result was imposed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meera Gupta filed Miscellaneous Criminal Case No. 42215/2024 under Section 482 CrPC seeking fair investigation of Crime No. 794/2023 at Kotwali Morena, District Morena, for an alleged Section 420 IPC cheating offence. The FIR was registered on 04.08.2023. Her counsel stated that, even by the hearing on 13.11.2024, the investigation had not been completed and the complainant's own statement had not been recorded. She sought an order for speedy completion, arrest of the accused and filing of a charge-sheet. The Court considered the request for directions concerning completion, arrest and a charge-sheet. The High Court heard counsel and addressed what directions could lawfully be made. The Court directed lawful completion of the investigation without requiring an arrest or a charge-sheet.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, 2009:INSC:1132, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was quoted extensively and expressly applied. In that case the Supreme Court set aside a High Court order that had directed police to record statements, make arrests, seize property and file a charge-sheet as mandatory investigative steps, with no adequate reasons or hearing of those facing the coercive consequences. Police possess a statutory investigation duty, but ordinarily courts do not steer the manner of investigation or assume its outcome. A lawful investigation may warrant a charge-sheet or a conclusion that no case is made out. Section 482 power is limited to giving effect to Code orders, preventing abuse of court process and securing justice, exercised sparingly and with reasons; casual judicial observations can influence police action. The present Court used that ratio to refuse the requested mandatory arrest and charge-sheet while leaving the investigative decision with police. The Supreme Court's concern about unheard affected parties was part of the quoted authority's context; the present Court declined to direct arrest and filing of a charge-sheet.

Within D. Venkatasubramaniam, the quoted M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explained that Section 41 CrPC gives an investigating officer discretion, after assessing a cognizable allegation and circumstances, whether arrest is needed. FIR registration does not require mechanical arrest; arrest intrudes on liberty, reputation and status. The High Court's refusal of an arrest command adopted that aspect through the controlling D. Venkatasubramaniam passage, but it did not adjudicate whether an arrest here would independently be necessary. The quoted Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, required reasonable opportunity to be heard before judicial orders likely to affect persons drastically, particularly by directing investigation against them on an anonymous petition. This was nested precedent explaining why the Supreme Court disapproved the High Court order under challenge; the present matter did not turn on an actual anonymous petition or a separate notice ruling. No other cited authority was judicially analyzed.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 was invoked for the requested fair-investigation directions. The Court applied the limits stated in D. Venkatasubramaniam rather than treating inherent power as authority to manage every step of the police investigation. Section 173(1) CrPC was set out: investigation under the relevant Chapter must be completed without unnecessary delay. The Court interpreted that as an obligation to decide, through police investigation, whether the offence was made out and submit an appropriate final report, charge-sheet or closure, without unjustified delay. Section 41 CrPC appeared in M.C. Abraham's quoted explanation of arrest discretion, not as an order to arrest anyone here. Section 420 IPC identified the registered allegation, with no decision on its elements, proof or whether a final report must accuse anyone.

4. Issues : First, could the High Court, on the complainant's Section 482 request and while investigation remained pending, direct the officer to arrest proposed accused and file a charge-sheet in a Section 420 IPC FIR, thereby selecting investigative means and result? Second, did Section 173(1) impose a positive duty to bring the investigation to a conclusion without unnecessary delay, and what neutral direction could the Court make after an FIR of 04.08.2023 remained open according to the applicant? Third, what remedy was left for the complainant if a grievance persisted? No issue of whether accused had committed cheating, whether an arrest was factually justified, or whether the applicant's statement had actually been withheld by police was finally determined.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court separated process from outcome. The Supreme Court's D. Venkatasubramaniam decision forbids casual, unreasoned judicial instructions that displace the police's statutory assessment by mandating the recording of witness statements, seizure, arrest and the filing of a charge-sheet. It recognized that police might investigate and find a case for a charge-sheet or find no sufficient case; arrest is not automatic, as the nested M.C. Abraham discussion of Section 41 and liberty explains. A direction to arrest and file a charge-sheet here would amount to supervision of the investigation. The Court therefore did not grant those specific demands or decide credibility and ultimate prosecution. It did not use the quoted notice principle as a reason to declare any present order a nullity; that was a feature of the Supreme Court precedent.

At the same time, Section 173(1) forbids leaving an investigation pending without justification. The applicant's claim that more than a year had passed and her statement remained unrecorded supplied the setting, and the Court grounded its direction in Section 173(1)'s requirement of completion without unnecessary delay. It said the investigating officer must reach a lawful conclusion about whether an offence is made out, complete the investigation as early as possible and file the appropriate final report without delay. The phrase covers closure as well as charge-sheet. Its direction to take necessary lawful steps did not set a calendar deadline, require any arrest or predetermine the conclusion. The Superintendent of Police was identified as a route for a later grievance, to be looked into in accordance with law.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court finally disposed of the Section 482 application. The Court directed the investigating officer to conclude Crime No. 794/2023 as early as possible and take necessary steps under law, consistent with Section 173(1)'s requirement of completion without unnecessary delay. It declined to direct arrest or compulsory filing of a charge-sheet. If Meera Gupta remained aggrieved, she could apply to the Superintendent of Police, Morena for consideration in accordance with law. The order gave no fixed completion date, finding of cheating, damages, or coercive relief against unnamed proposed accused.

Meera Gupta v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 42215/2024, 13/11/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Limitation and reporting delay — A Section 498-A IPC FIR of 12.03.2021 concerning a marriage of 08.03.2019 was held within the three-year period discussed under Section 468 CrPC; the Court rejected a limitation-based quashing request. The Court also held that the alleged cruelty was continuous. Delay after an earlier complaint and after the husband's restitution petition was not by itself proof of a false counterblast. Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court recognized that a complainant may wait in hope of saving the marriage rather than immediately initiate a criminal FIR. The explanation was assessed at the quashing threshold, not as a finding of ultimate credibility.

Matrimonial cruelty — The complaint alleged a post-marriage demand for a car or Rs. 4 lakh, expulsion while pregnant, threats against return and continued residence with her parents. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was quoted and applied to the continuing mental impact of expulsion: Section 498-A cruelty can persist in the parental home despite cessation of physical acts at the matrimonial home. The quoted Supreme Court reasoning also discussed Section 179 CrPC; no independent territorial-jurisdiction issue was decided here. The Court held the specific allegations sufficient to resist quashing, without proving their truth.

Parallel matrimonial proceedings — The Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act restitution case and Section 125 CrPC maintenance application did not automatically defeat the criminal FIR. Following Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of W.B., (2002) 1 SCC 555, and Pratibha, the Court separated civil and criminal procedures and standards, and held that future restitution findings would not bind the criminal court. It rejected the suggested counterblast on this record.

Section 482 CrPC — State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, was applied: a court considering quashing should not conduct a meticulous comparison of the FIR and maintenance pleadings as if trying the case; an FIR is not expected to contain all evidence. Basic cruelty allegations also appeared in the maintenance application. With specific allegations against the six applicants, the Court dismissed their joint quashing application. It did not adjudicate guilt or collateral matrimonial proceedings.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The six applicants were the complainant's mother-in-law Meera Soni, father-in-law Chhotelal Soni, brother-in-law Pankaj Soni, his wife Rinki Soni, another brother-in-law Vikram alias Vicky Soni, and husband Neeraj Soni. They sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of Crime No. 52/2021 registered at Police Station Seondha, Datia under Sections 323, 498-A and 506/34 IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The complainant said that she married Neeraj on 08.03.2019, with Rs. 8 lakh and seven tolas of gold given at marriage. After Pankaj's accident, she alleged that family members complained that her father had provided insufficient dowry and demanded a car or Rs. 4 lakh. She said her father lacked the means, and that the demand was repeated to her brother during Diwali. She alleged expulsion from the matrimonial home with her brother while pregnant, withholding of ornaments, threats if she returned without fulfilling the demand, and a specific statement by Meera Soni that the complainant would not be allowed to remain in her matrimonial home if she gave birth to a girl. She resided thereafter with her parents. These were allegations recorded from the written complaint, not adjudicated facts; the judgment does not separately find that each applicant committed every pleaded act.

The applicants pointed to a written complaint dated 25.11.2019, paragraphs 3–5 of the complainant's Section 125 CrPC maintenance application, the interval before the FIR of 12.03.2021, and the husband's Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act restitution proceedings. They submitted that the FIR was false and filed as a counterblast after notice of that case. The State answered that the allegations disclosed cognizable offences, that the maintenance pleading was substantially consistent and that waiting for marital improvement was a plausible context. In a preliminary procedural matter, the applicants' counsel had previously said Pankaj had died and then sought recall because he was alive; the Judge sharply criticized the false statement and suspected adjournment or bench hunting. That admonition did not itself decide the FIR's legal sufficiency, and the application remained on the merits.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was quoted at length and applied in paragraph 10. The Supreme Court explained that Section 498-A IPC cruelty includes mental as well as physical harm: the fear, emotional distress and psychological effects of conduct driving a wife to shelter with her parents may continue there, even though physical abuse at the matrimonial house has stopped. Its quoted reasoning connected such consequences to Section 179 CrPC's place-of-consequence jurisdiction and described repeated cruelty at the parental home. The present Court took from it that the alleged cruelty here was continuous in considering the delay and the non-fulfilment of dowry demand. It did not decide a venue objection or make a finding that every alleged act occurred. The quote also contrasted the Domestic Violence Act's civil remedy with Section 498-A's criminal remedy; no relief under that Act was sought.

Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of W.B., (2002) 1 SCC 555, was quoted and applied to reject termination of criminal process because matrimonial civil litigation was pending. The Supreme Court distinguished the civil balance-of-probabilities standard from proof beyond reasonable doubt in criminal proceedings, and said a pending civil suit does not justify quashing or stopping the criminal case as a matter of course. Its embedded passage from M.S. Sheriff v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 SC 397, explained the ordinary precedence of prompt criminal adjudication and the absence of a hard-and-fast stay rule, with exceptional case-specific considerations possible. The present Court used the independence and non-binding character of civil findings; it did not order a stay, decide sequencing, or decide either collateral case. M.S. Sheriff was nested within the quoted authority, not separately applied to grant priority relief.

Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was also quoted and applied. It faulted quashing on an adverse inference from a wife's delayed FIR when the parties had attempted reconciliation, and held that a divorce petition and civil proceeding, despite common facts, do not alone terminate criminal proceedings under Section 482. A quashing court should not go beyond the FIR or rely on extraneous considerations. The High Court adopted those limits to reject the counterblast and delay arguments in this record. Bhajan Lal is mentioned within the reproduced Pratibha passage; the High Court applied Pratibha to the delay and counterblast submissions.

State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, order dated 30.06.2021, was quoted and applied directly to the maintenance-pleading comparison. The Supreme Court disapproved meticulous scrutiny of materials as if at trial during Section 482 review and explained that an FIR is not an encyclopedia. The Court therefore refused to resolve purported pleading differences in detail, observed that the basic cruelty allegation also appeared in the Section 125 application, and confined itself to whether the specific FIR allegations justified continuation. No other Supreme Court authority was independently analysed by the Judge.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC provided the basis for invoking inherent jurisdiction to quash the FIR; the Court applied the threshold constraints from Pratibha and Kunwar Singh, not trial proof standards for factual determination. Section 468 CrPC was invoked as providing a three-year limitation where the maximum sentence is three years. The Court compared the marriage date, 08.03.2019, with the FIR date, 12.03.2021 and found the allegations not time barred. The Court also held, applying Rupali Devi, that the alleged cruelty was continuous. Section 498-A IPC supplied the cruelty offence for which Rupali Devi's mental-cruelty reasoning mattered; Sections 323 and 506/34 IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act were alleged offences but their separate ingredients were not interpreted. Section 179 CrPC and the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act appeared in the quoted Rupali Devi discussion, without an independent territorial or civil-remedy ruling here. The wife's Section 125 CrPC maintenance application and the husband's Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act restitution proceeding were background to the delay and alleged counterblast, not determinations of those claims.

4. Issues : First, did the time between the marriage, earlier complaint and March 2021 FIR make the matrimonial allegations barred by limitation or so delayed as to justify quashing at the Section 482 threshold? Second, could the pleaded dowry demand, expulsion and continued residence at the parental home support Section 498-A cruelty in light of the Supreme Court's treatment of continuing mental harm? Third, did the husband's Section 9 petition and the wife's Section 125 pleading show the criminal FIR to be a false counterblast, or make civil findings binding on the criminal court? Fourth, could the High Court conduct a detailed comparison of the maintenance pleading and FIR, or infer falsity, to decide disputed facts at the Section 482 stage? The application required an assessment of legal sufficiency at the threshold; it did not call for a final determination of guilt, damages, restitution, maintenance or venue, or for findings on the evidence against each accused.

5. Ratio / Findings : On limitation, the Court described Section 468's three-year period for an offence with a three-year maximum sentence. Since the marriage was on 08.03.2019 and the FIR on 12.03.2021, it rejected the argument that the FIR's allegations were barred. Apart from that statutory ground, it refused to regard belated reporting as conclusive proof of malice: a wife may delay approaching police in hope that family behavior improves. Pratibha supplied a concrete Supreme Court example where reconciliation efforts explained a wife's reporting interval before a later matrimonial civil petition. The Court rejected this delay ground for quashing on the record, without deciding the ultimate truth of the complaint.

On cruelty, the allegations included a demand for a specified amount or a car, repeated demand to the complainant and her brother, expulsion while pregnant, threatened consequences of return without dowry and residence with parents. Rupali Devi explained that the mental and psychological consequences of conduct at the matrimonial house may persist in the parental home and can constitute continuing cruelty under Section 498-A even absent fresh physical acts there. The Court concluded that being forced to live at the parental home for non-fulfilment of alleged dowry demands could amount to cruelty. This was a legal basis for retaining the FIR, not a final finding that an identified relative made every alleged statement or that all charged offences were proved. It did not separately apply Rupali Devi to resolve Section 179 territorial jurisdiction.

On counterblast, the Court rejected the proposition that the husband's Section 9 restitution case invalidated a later FIR. Kamaladevi Agarwal explained the different purposes and standards of proof in civil and criminal proceedings and why civil pendency cannot mechanically quash a criminal case; the nested M.S. Sheriff discussion does not create a mandatory stay order in this judgment. Pratibha likewise treated a matrimonial civil petition and criminal complaint as independent despite overlapping facts. The Court said findings to be made in the restitution case would not bind the criminal court; the husband would still have to prove his own position there. The sequence in which the proceedings were filed and the anticipated civil findings, by themselves, did not establish a malicious counterblast, especially where a delay could be explained by hope of marital improvement. It made no adjudication in the restitution proceeding.

On the maintenance pleading and the sufficiency of the factual allegations, the Court read the Section 125 application sufficiently to note that its basic cruelty allegation was present. It declined to compare each paragraph meticulously with the FIR; Kunwar Singh bars trial-style evidentiary scrutiny at the Section 482 stage and recognizes that an FIR need not narrate every detail. The complaint's specific allegations against the family applicants supplied a sufficient threshold for the criminal process to continue as to all six. That conclusion did not settle credibility, individual criminal responsibility or the merits of charges. The earlier inaccurate statement about Pankaj's death drew an ancillary judicial admonition, but it neither extinguished the FIR nor became a test for its quashing.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the six applicants' Section 482 CrPC application and refused to quash the FIR in Crime No. 52/2021 alleging offences under Sections 323, 498-A, 506/34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. No part of the FIR was quashed for any applicant. The Court imposed no separate operative direction resolving the maintenance or restitution proceedings, finding guilt, determining limitation at eventual cognizance, or deciding territorial jurisdiction. The ruling leaves investigation and subsequent criminal adjudication to proceed according to law.

Meera Soni and Ors. v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 22116/2021, 07/03/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- MGNREGA good-faith protection — Section 30 of the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act protects the specified public servants and deemed public servants only in respect of acts done or intended to be done in good faith under the Act, rules or schemes. The Court reproduced the overriding provision in Section 28 and examined the protection claimed under Section 30. Applying the requirement of due care and attention in Section 52 IPC, the Court declined to extend protection to the petitioner, a Sarpanch, at the FIR stage. The National Level Monitor alleged payment of Rs. 0.91 lakh for a road that had not been built, effective control of Panchayat work by her son while she merely signed documents, and burning or partial burning of records sought by inspectors. The Court assessed those allegations and the immunity objection for the purpose of writ relief, without finally determining guilt.

Panchayat civil recovery and criminal process — Sections 89 and 92 of the Madhya Pradesh Panchayat Raj Avam Gram Swaraj Adhiniyam, 1993 provide for inquiry and civil recovery. No express exclusion, or exclusion by necessary implication, of the IPC or CrPC was shown. State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, rejected a similar contention that a statute was a complete code in the absence of a bar to criminal proceedings. Dhanraj N. Asawani v. Amarjeetsingh Mohindersingh Basi, Criminal Appeal No. 2093/2023, explained Section 4 CrPC and held that a special procedure displaces the Code only where exclusion is express or follows by necessary implication. In the absence of a statutory restriction on who may complain, cognizable offences may ordinarily be reported by anyone. Applying those principles, the Court rejected the contention that an inquiry into civil loss under the Panchayat Act had to be completed before registration of the FIR. The civil recovery claim remained undecided.

Article 226 control of an ongoing FIR — On the allegations in the FIR and the monitor's report, the disputed claims that the road existed, the records burned accidentally and the son had not taken over Panchayat work required investigation or trial. Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, XYZ v. State of Gujarat and Varala Bharath Kumar were relied on to explain the restraint required during an early investigation into a cognizable offence, while preserving the recognised exceptions where no offence is disclosed on the face of the allegations or the proceedings constitute manifest abuse. Under Renu Kumari, once cognizable allegations were disclosed, an unsupported accusation of mala fides against the informant was of secondary importance. That principle did not remove the exception for a manifestly malicious proceeding. The Court refused to quash the FIR against the petitioner or the administrative direction to register it, without finally deciding the disputed evidence.

Preliminary inquiry — Lalita Kumari, (2014) 2 SCC 1, requires registration of an FIR under Section 154 CrPC when information discloses a cognizable offence. In appropriate circumstances, a limited inquiry may ascertain whether such an offence is disclosed; it may not test the truth of the information. CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2021, reconciled the illustrative references to corruption cases with the absence of a mandatory right of the accused to an inquiry before registration. The Court held that failure to conduct a preliminary inquiry did not vitiate this FIR because cognizable allegations were disclosed. The other Supreme Court decisions discussed within the quoted CBI judgment supplied its context; they were not separate findings of corruption liability in this case. The writ petition was dismissed, and the interim protection dated 28.04.2022 was vacated.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meera Yadav, described in the judgment as the Sarpanch of Gram Panchayat Nadiya, brought Writ Petition No. 9743/2022 under Article 226 challenging a direction to lodge an FIR following a National Level Monitor (NLM) inspection and seeking protection against coercive action. The judgment's opening account dates the challenged direction 22.04.2022. An FIR was registered on 29.04.2022 while the writ petition was pending, and she amended the petition to challenge it. The NLM report alleged that Rs. 0.91 lakh had been recorded or used for a road that had not been built, that her son had effectively taken over Panchayat work while she merely signed documents, and that records sought by inspectors had been burned or partly burned, although the table itself had not burned. The Collector's communication dated 19.04.2022 called for a report against the implementing agency and persons responsible for maintaining muster rolls, valuation and payments. The petitioner contended that it did not name her, whereas the subsequent CEO communication named her for registration of the FIR.

The petitioner disputed all the substantive allegations. She maintained that the road had been built, no money had been embezzled, her son had not taken over her duties and the records had burned accidentally. She relied on Sections 28 and 30 of the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act, 2005 (MGNREGA) as protecting official acts done in good faith. She argued that an inquiry into civil loss and recovery under Sections 89 and 92 of the Madhya Pradesh Panchayat Raj Avam Gram Swaraj Adhiniyam, 1993 had to precede criminal action. She further contended that the Collector's direction was vague, no cognizable offence was disclosed, the FIR was malicious, and Lalita Kumari required a preliminary inquiry before registration. The State submitted that the recovery provisions did not impose a condition on registration of a criminal FIR and that good faith was disputed. The judgment does not specify the IPC offence numbers in the registered FIR. The matters described were allegations in the pleadings or investigation, not findings proved at trial.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, was quoted for rejecting the contention that the M.P. Cooperative Societies Act provided a complete remedial code where it contained no bar to the general criminal law, particularly when allegations under the Prevention of Corruption Act also arose. The Court applied that principle by analogy to the Panchayat Act's civil recovery machinery. It did not hold that the two Acts contained identical provisions or that a PC Act charge necessarily arose in this case.

Dhanraj N. Asawani v. Amarjeetsingh Mohindersingh Basi, Criminal Appeal No. 2093/2023, decided 25.07.2023, was reproduced extensively and applied. It explained Section 4(1) and (2) CrPC: IPC offences follow the Code, and offences under other laws also follow it subject to a special enactment regulating investigation, inquiry or trial. Displacement requires express exclusion or necessary implication, not a general claim that another statute is complete. In the cooperative-audit context, a duty on an auditor or Registrar to report irregularities did not prohibit another person from setting criminal law in motion; absent a statutory complainant restriction, crime is a matter of public concern and police retain an independent investigative duty. The quotation distinguished MCOCA's express prior-approval, rank and sanction safeguards from a mere positive reporting obligation, and explained a necessary-implication example under the Transplantation of Human Organs Act. It also referred to Lalita Kumari's FIR purpose, A.R. Antulay on complainant locus, Bhajan Lal's express legal-bar category, and other nested decisions. Those authorities were incorporated as Dhanraj's explanation of the test, not independently decided as MCOCA, organ-transplant or cooperative-law issues in this Panchayat writ. The High Court identified no express or implied bar in Sections 89 and 92 and rejected the petitioner's claimed civil precondition.

Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, explained that Section 482 should not ordinarily be used to prevent police investigation when the FIR allegations prima facie disclose a cognizable offence; rare cases of malicious and vexatious prosecution remain exceptional. State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, emphasised sparing intervention at an early stage, consideration of allegations at face value and the possibility of intervention for gross abuse. The Swapan Kumar Guha passage quoted within that decision explained the importance of collecting evidence through investigation. Its Jeffrey J. Diermeier passage identified the three purposes and limits of Section 482. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, disapproved a roving factual inquiry and premature quashing before serious allegations had been investigated. Varala Bharath Kumar v. State of Telangana, (2017) 9 SCC 413, stated the exceptions under Article 226 or Section 482 where the allegations disclose no offence or its ingredients, or the prosecution is manifestly malicious. It required cautious exercise of the power so as not to stifle legitimate proceedings. The Judge applied those directly quoted principles to the Article 226 petition; the proceeding was not reclassified as a Section 482 application. The petitioner's disputed explanations concerning the road and burning of records could not be tried at that stage.

Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was directly quoted and applied. Once information disclosing a cognizable offence has been registered, a bare allegation of mala fides against the informant is of secondary importance. When the facts are incomplete, the Court should not speculate whether conviction is likely; the material collected in investigation and the evidence at trial determine the case. The lengthy quotation listed earlier authorities on mala fides and referred to Janata Dal and Raghubir Saran on cautious exercise of inherent power. Those citations occurred within Renu Kumari and were not separately applied to decide additional issues. The Court rejected the unsupported allegation of malice in the present case, while leaving intact the exception for a manifestly abusive FIR described in Varala.

Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, was directly quoted for its conclusions under Section 154 CrPC. Information disclosing a cognizable offence requires registration of an FIR. Where disclosure is uncertain, a preliminary inquiry may ascertain only whether such an offence is disclosed, without testing the truth of the information. Illustrative categories, including corruption cases, may warrant inquiry according to the facts; diary entries and prompt, limited procedures for closure provide safeguards. The Court relied specifically on the duty to register and the limited purpose of inquiry, rather than any mandatory hearing before registration for this Sarpanch. CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2021, decided 08.10.2021, was quoted at length and applied to the claim that inquiry was mandatory. That decision considered P. Sirajuddin's concern for harm to the reputation of public servants, the illustrative corruption category in Lalita Kumari, and the later reasoning in Managipet. An inquiry that is permissible or desirable in some corruption cases does not give every accused a right to one or invalidate an FIR where reliable information already discloses a cognizable offence. The quotation also considered Nirmal Singh Kahlon, Yashwant Sinha, Charansingh, K. Veeraswami and examples from the CBI Manual. It distinguished investigation from an adjudicatory opportunity for a public servant to explain disproportionate assets. Those discussions formed part of the quoted reasoning in Thommandru. The present case concerned alleged misappropriation in rural works and handling of records, rather than adjudication of a disproportionate-assets charge, mandatory CBI Manual procedure or a right to explain matters before a charge sheet. The High Court applied the conclusion that failure to hold an inquiry did not automatically invalidate this FIR.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution was the jurisdiction invoked to quash the administrative direction and subsequent FIR and to restrain coercive action. The judgment repeatedly referred by analogy to the standards governing inherent power under Section 482 CrPC, but the proceeding did not become a Section 482 petition. Sections 28 and 30 MGNREGA were reproduced. Section 28 gives the Act and its schemes precedence over inconsistent law, subject to its provisos. Section 30 protects the listed programme officials or other deemed public servants only for acts done or intended to be done in good faith under the Act, rules or schemes. Section 52 IPC defines good faith by reference to due care and attention. The Judge applied that requirement to the claimed protection and refused immunity in view of the alleged conduct, without finally determining any charged IPC offence. Sections 89 and 92 of the Madhya Pradesh Panchayat Raj Avam Gram Swaraj Adhiniyam, 1993 provided the civil inquiry or recovery procedure relied on by the petitioner. They were held not to exclude the CrPC and IPC expressly or by necessary implication. Section 4(1)–(2) CrPC, quoted through Dhanraj, supplied the framework governing general and special procedures. Section 154 CrPC, discussed through Lalita Kumari and Thommandru, governed registration on disclosure of a cognizable offence and the limited role of preliminary inquiry. The other special enactments and provisions within the lengthy Dhanraj and Thommandru quotations supplied analogies or distinctions; they were not independently governing statutes in this petition.

4. Issues : First, did Section 30 MGNREGA protect the petitioner as Sarpanch on the basis that the reported acts were programme work done in good faith, and did Section 28 create an overriding bar? Second, did loss arising from Panchayat works have to be established and recovered under Sections 89 and 92 of the 1993 Adhiniyam before an FIR could be lodged, or did those provisions expressly or impliedly exclude criminal proceedings? Third, did the direction and FIR disclose a cognizable offence at face value, despite the general terms of the Collector's communication and the petitioner's competing account of the road, her son's involvement and damaged records? Fourth, did her allegation of malice justify quashing at the early writ stage? Fifth, did Lalita Kumari require a preliminary inquiry, and did its omission by itself invalidate this FIR? Whether misappropriation had actually occurred, the exact recoverable amount and criminal culpability following investigation were not finally determined in the writ petition.

5. Ratio / Findings : In considering protection, the Court read the good-faith condition in Section 30 with the requirement of due care and attention in Section 52 IPC. The NLM report alleged that Rs. 0.91 lakh was recorded as expenditure on an unbuilt road, that the petitioner acted as a nominal Sarpanch signing documents while her son controlled Panchayat operations, and that records sought by inspectors were partly burned. At that threshold stage, the Court found that the alleged acts did not represent work done in good faith under the MGNREGA scheme. It held that the petitioner was not entitled to protection under Section 30. It therefore rejected the statutory shield. The petitioner disputed the allegations. The conclusion justified refusal of writ protection at that stage; it was not a finding at trial that she had deliberately burned records or committed embezzlement.

On the relationship between the remedies, the Court applied Rameshwar and Dhanraj to examine whether the special State Panchayat statute expressly, or by necessary implication, barred reporting a cognizable IPC offence. Counsel identified no such bar. The availability of inquiry or recovery under Sections 89 and 92 did not by itself displace Section 4 CrPC or ordinary police powers. The Court stated that registration required disclosure of a cognizable offence and that, absent a statutory bar, anyone could set the criminal law in motion. The right of anyone to report cognizable information to the police, unless a statute provides otherwise, reinforced that conclusion. Civil recovery and criminal investigation could proceed according to their respective requirements. Neither civil liability nor criminal guilt was determined in this proceeding. In examining whether the allegations disclosed an offence, the Court distinguished the NLM material and FIR allegations from the petitioner's denials. Her proposed evidence that the road existed, her son had not assumed her functions and the records burned accidentally required investigation or proof. Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, XYZ and Varala explained why early intervention under Article 226/Section 482 is exceptional where a cognizable offence appears, while preserving intervention for legal insufficiency on the face of the allegations or demonstrated abuse. Taking the alleged expenditure on the road, unauthorised control of Panchayat work and condition of the records at face value, the Court found triable allegations and declined a roving inquiry or substitution of the defence account. The Section 482 precedents supplied a standard for considering the writ; they did not create a separate procedural disposal.

On malice, Renu Kumari prevented an unsupported allegation about the informant's motive from overriding information disclosing a cognizable offence before evidence had been collected. The Court treated the bare allegation of mala fides as secondary to that information and the subsequent evidentiary process. It did not hold that every proceeding proved to be malicious must continue: Varala permits extraordinary intervention where proceedings are manifestly motivated by vengeance. The alleged vagueness of the earlier administrative communication did not negate the specific NLM material and the later report naming the petitioner.

On preliminary inquiry, Lalita Kumari required registration where information discloses a cognizable offence and permitted a limited inquiry, depending on the facts, where necessary to ascertain such disclosure. It did not permit an inquiry into the truth of the information at that stage. Thommandru explained that the illustrative reference to corruption and the earlier concerns for protection of public servants do not make inquiry mandatory in every such case. Failure to conduct one does not by itself justify quashing where sufficient information disclosing a cognizable offence is available. The Court found such allegations here and held that a preliminary inquiry was not a necessary prerequisite; its omission did not vitiate the FIR. It did not adjudicate the CBI-specific or disproportionate-assets issues discussed within the quoted Thommandru judgment.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Article 226 petition. It refused to quash the direction to register the FIR or the FIR registered on 29.04.2022, and vacated the interim order dated 28.04.2022. The requested protection against coercive action therefore ceased. The judgment neither directed the filing of a particular charge sheet nor finally found the petitioner guilty. Investigation and any subsequent proceedings remained subject to law.

Meera Yadav v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 9743/2022, 26/09/2023, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (460) Prev Next

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty FIR — The mother-in-law sought Section 482 CrPC quashing of Crime No. 17/2015. The wife alleged a demand for a car or two bigha of land, confinement or restrictions on communication with her family, abuse, beating and threats by identified in-laws, alongside a disputed LPG-gas incident and the husband's conduct. On a face-value reading and by application of Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, the Court found a prima facie case against the applicant and refused to equate the complaint with bare, generalised allegations implicating relatives. This was a threshold decision, not proof of cruelty, common intention or other charged offences.

Section 482 test — The judgment directly considered Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, XYZ v. State of Gujarat, S. Khushboo, Amit Kapoor, Ajay Kumar Das, Mohd. Akram Siddiqui, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy, M. Srikanth, M.N. Ojha and CBI v. Arvind Khanna. The common principle applied from these authorities was that scrutiny at the quashing stage must be cautious: prima facie cognizable allegations should be investigated, and the Court should not conduct a trial, test disputed defence assertions or predict conviction. The quoted standards preserve quashing for a failure to disclose the ingredients of an offence, patent improbability in the allegations, an express legal bar or manifestly malicious abuse. Mohd. Akram recognized an exception for certain undisputed or public defence documents, but no such document controlled this application. S. Khushboo and Amit Kapoor also explained the balance between protecting an apparently innocent person and avoiding premature stifling of legitimate process.

Delayed FIR and divorce proceedings — The applicant called the wife's FIR an afterthought following her son's divorce petition and relied on lack of earlier complaint. Following Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court accepted that a spouse may wait in the hope that the marital relationship will improve, and civil divorce proceedings do not automatically end an independent criminal process arising from overlapping facts. No present proof of malicious institution displaced the specific FIR allegations. The application was dismissed; the FIR under Sections 498-A, 294, 506-B and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act was not quashed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meera, the complainant's mother-in-law, sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of Crime No. 17/2015 at Police Station Kotwali, Morena, registered under Sections 498-A, 294, 506-B and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The complainant married Meera's son Deepak on 31.01.2013. In her FIR of 04.01.2015, she said her family had spent substantial sums and given dowry at the wedding. She alleged that Meera, Meera's daughter and Meera's husband repeatedly taunted her and demanded a car or two bigha of land; she said Deepak left for Delhi shortly after marriage, her phone was taken, contact with parents restricted, she was abused, beaten and had her hair pulled. She further alleged that the LPG supply had deliberately been left open with the intention of killing her. She also alleged threats that she would not remain in the matrimonial home without the demanded property, hearing difficulty from assaults and the husband's involvement with another woman. She said she had initially refrained from reporting the matter to the police to preserve her marriage, but contact and reconciliation efforts failed. All of these are FIR allegations, not proved facts. The order did not separately decide the sister-in-law's liability or the husband's alleged relationship.

The applicant argued that the FIR failed to disclose an offence, was an afterthought or personal-vendetta counterblast to her son's divorce petition under Section 13(1) of the Hindu Marriage Act, and that the absence of an earlier police complaint showed that the allegations were false. The High Court heard counsel and evaluated the permitted Section 482 inquiry, using numerous directly quoted Supreme Court authorities. The Court assessed whether the allegations disclosed a prima facie case without deciding their factual correctness.

2. Precedents — Considered : Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, was quoted to caution against prematurely quashing an FIR before proper investigation, unless continuing investigation would be abusive. Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, directly explained that Section 482 ordinarily should not displace statutory police investigation of a prima facie cognizable offence, leaving exceptional malicious and vexatious cases. State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, was quoted through its adoption of Swapan Kumar Guha on the need to collect evidence before an offence can be proved and its Jeffrey J. Diermeier passage on the three purposes and sparing exercise of inherent power. The present Court applied the restraint on intervention at an early stage of investigation; it did not independently resolve the factual settings of those nested authorities. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, condemned a roving Section 482 inquiry into disputed allegations and a premature factual conclusion that had stalled investigation. Paragraph 10 refers to S. Martin ('Supra') and quotes its disapproval of an assessment made before investigation was completed. Together these decisions supported assessing the complaint at face value rather than weighing Meera's account of events.

S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, reproduced two relevant Bhajan Lal categories—a failure to disclose an offence on the face of the allegations and manifest mala fides or vengeance—and examples underscoring that an apparently innocent person should not be persecuted on the basis of a wholly untenable complaint. It recognized a narrow, reasoned abuse-of-process intervention rather than mechanical continuation of every FIR; Medchl Chemicals, Zandu Pharmaceutical and Shakson Belthissor were discussed inside its quotation, not separately applied to the facts here. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, furnished a long list of principles for Sections 397/482, principally in the charge-quashing setting: take uncontroverted record material at face value; do not conduct meticulous evidence appraisal or calculate conviction prospects; preserve legally established bars and manifest abuse; civil facts may also disclose a crime; and external defence material supplied by an accused ordinarily cannot displace the prosecution's factual foundation. Its list of prior authorities and the clarification that Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia is not universally applicable were inside the quoted passage. The present case concerned FIR quashing; charge-framing particulars were not separately decided. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, reiterated that the power must be exercised sparingly and relied on Bhajan Lal's prohibition on an inquiry into the reliability of the allegations.

Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, stated the usual refusal to appreciate an accused's defence or test the veracity of the documents relied on by the accused at the quashing stage, with a limited appropriate-case exception for an undisputed or public document. Yin Cheng Hsiung, Bhajan Lal and Harshendra Kumar D. were named in that quoted exception; no particular defence document was found to qualify here. State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, balanced avoiding a private complainant's harassment with preventing an accused from prematurely bringing a prima facie prosecution to an end; reliability remains for trial unless a failure to disclose an offence on the face of the allegations, a legal bar or sufficiently established malice supports exceptional intervention. Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, described Section 482's broad but discretionary ends-of-justice power, alternative-remedy considerations, Bhajan Lal's categories and nested discussions of Indian Oil, Madhavrao and State of Bihar v. P.P. Sharma. It expressly rejected a universal rule that a prediction that conviction is unlikely requires quashing in every case; neither an alternative-remedy objection nor a compromise was independently decided against Meera. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, restated the tests of whether the allegations taken at face value, or the uncontroverted material, disclose an offence. M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, required both caution against uncalled-for obstruction and intervention in genuinely absurd or harassing prosecutions. CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, disapproved a Section 482 order that decided contested defence and investigative facts in minute detail before trial. These authorities were individually quoted, but they addressed the common issue of scrutiny at the quashing stage; their varied factual contexts were not treated as independent findings in this matrimonial FIR.

Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was expressly invoked by the Judge in paragraph 21 as the comparison applied to the specific allegations against Meera. The Court concluded, in light of Taramani, that the allegations disclosed a prima facie case warranting prosecution against the applicant. Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was quoted and applied on delay and the claim that the FIR was a counterblast to the divorce petition. Its Supreme Court setting involved a wife trying reconciliation after departure from the matrimonial home before filing an FIR, with a divorce petition also pending. It rejected a mechanical adverse inference from that delay and recognized civil and criminal proceedings as independent even on overlapping facts. The present Court relied on that ratio in rejecting the argument that this FIR should be quashed because it followed a divorce petition; it did not find every alleged act true. Bhajan Lal's categories appear within the reproduced Supreme Court passages, including S. Khushboo and Padal Venkata Rama Reddy.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the jurisdiction invoked to quash the FIR and was interpreted through the quoted Supreme Court standards: intervention to prevent abuse and secure justice is wide but sparing; allegations are ordinarily read at face value without evaluating disputed defence evidence or predicting acquittal, while facial non-disclosure, legal bar and manifest abuse can warrant relief. Section 397 CrPC and Section 228 CrPC were discussed within Amit Kapoor's charge and revision context, not operative provisions for this FIR application. Sections 155(2), 156(1) and 173(2) CrPC appeared within the reproduced authorities' discussions of cognizable information, investigation, non-cognizable offences and the charge-sheet; no independent police-power or final-report dispute was decided. Sections 498-A, 294, 506-B and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act were the offences stated in the FIR.

The Court's specific evaluation concerned the facial allegations of dowry demand and cruelty as to Meera; its decision was that the allegations disclosed a prima facie case warranting prosecution. Section 13(1) Hindu Marriage Act governed the son's divorce proceeding, which was relied on in the argument about timing or motive; the divorce merits were not before this criminal court.

4. Issues : First, did the FIR, taken as pleaded, contain a specific factual foundation against the mother-in-law capable of constituting a prima facie criminal case, or was it facially insufficient? Second, how far could the High Court under Section 482 look into disputed factual correctness and defence assertions while police investigation or prosecution was still in progress, in light of the extensive Supreme Court jurisprudence on scrutiny at the quashing stage and its stated exceptions? Third, did delayed reporting after the son's divorce petition establish a mala fide counterblast justifying quashing despite the pleaded demands and assaults? The Court did not decide the truth of the LPG incident, medical condition, marital disputes, guilt of other relatives, charge-wise proof or the ultimate outcome of the divorce proceedings.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first assembled the restraints and safeguards in the Supreme Court quashing cases. Munshiram and Teeja Devi warned against replacing investigation into a cognizable offence with premature findings of fact under Section 482; Ujjal Kumar Burdhan and XYZ emphasized the need to gather materials and avoid a roving inquiry. S. Khushboo, Amit Kapoor, Ajay Kumar Das, Gourishetty Mahesh, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy, M. Srikanth and M.N. Ojha preserved the countervailing power to intervene for a failure to disclose the ingredients of an offence on the face of the allegations, absurd allegations, an express legal bar or a genuinely malicious use of process, but forbade routine credibility adjudication or prediction of conviction. The exception in Mohd. Akram for an undisputed or public document did not provide a basis for relying on any defence document in this case. CBI v. Arvind Khanna reinforced that contested defence detail belongs at trial. The Court thus reconciled the accused's protection from an untenable case with the complainant's and State's interest in a legitimate investigation. It applied a provisional test of legal sufficiency on the face of the allegations; this did not presume guilt or establish a rule that a matrimonial FIR cannot be quashed. The FIR contained more than a bare allegation implicating a distant relative. It specifically attributed car or land demands and forms of restraint, abuse and assault to Meera and other identified members, besides the disputed LPG and threat allegations. The Court said that, in light of Taramani Parakh, one could not say no prima facie prosecution case existed against the applicant. It held that the factual correctness of the allegations could not be examined at that stage. Its adverse ruling was as to this applicant's request to quash the FIR in its entirety.

The applicant's inference from the husband's earlier divorce petition and the absence of an earlier police complaint was insufficient on this record. The Court reasoned that the complainant may have hoped for marital improvement and approached police when reconciliation looked unlikely. It applied Pratibha's rejection of an automatic adverse inference from delayed reporting and its distinction between independent civil divorce and criminal proceedings. That reasoning addressed the timing objection without resolving competing marital accounts or ruling out a proven abuse claim in an appropriately supported case. As the allegations continued to disclose a prima facie case, the Court would not stifle the prosecution midway.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482. The High Court refused to quash Crime No. 17/2015, Police Station Kotwali, Morena, under Sections 498-A, 294, 506-B and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act. There was no partial quashing, discharge, finding of guilt, fact-finding remand or direction disposing of the civil divorce case. The contested allegations remain for the ordinary criminal process.

Headnote :- Prima facie attribution to each accused — The complainant sought interference under Section 439(2) with the anticipatory bail granted to her husband's parents. She alleged that her husband committed an unnatural sexual act and that the parents, after hearing of it, told her to comply with him. Counsel conceded no record showed the husband shared bedroom matters with them; no specific prior knowledge or instigation by them was identified. Jagjeet Singh v. Ashish Mishra, Criminal Appeal No. 632/2022, permits a bail court to consider prima facie reasonable grounds and the gravity of the offence without adjudicating the evidence in detail. The High Court held the Sessions Court could distinguish the husband's alleged Section 377 act from the parents' own alleged dowry harassment. It did not resolve guilt or negate the latter allegations.

Duration of pre-arrest protection — The Sessions Court had also referred to apparent non-compliance with Arnesh Kumar v. State of Bihar, (2014) 8 SCC 273, and Section 41A CrPC; the complainant did not show that the observation was erroneous. Her further contention that protection without a time limit was inappropriate led to a limited modification under Sushila Aggarwal v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2020) 5 SCC 1, which recognizes that a court may in suitable circumstances limit the duration of anticipatory bail. Protection of respondents 1 and 2 was upheld until filing of the charge-sheet. They must then seek regular bail, to be decided afresh without influence from the preliminary observations in either court's bail order. The ruling did not cancel their bail for misconduct or impose a universal rule that anticipatory bail expires when the charge-sheet is filed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meghna Agarwal applied under Section 439(2) CrPC concerning the anticipatory bail granted on 29.09.2021 by the First Additional Sessions Judge, Ganj Basoda, in Bail Application No. 402/2021 to respondents 1 and 2, Manju Bagadiya and the other parent of her husband, Anurag Bagadiya. The FIR alleged marriage on 20.01.2020, substantial dowry, further demands for an Audi car and Rs. 50 lakh, physical and mental harassment, beating allegedly by Anurag and Manju, jewelry retained by the in-laws and expulsion on 16.11.2020. Meghna also alleged that Anurag committed an unnatural sexual act on 05.08.2020 and threatened her, and that the in-laws, when subsequently told, urged her to accept his wishes. She reported to her mother on 21.09.2021 after a period during which she said she had sought to preserve her marriage. These remain FIR allegations; the disputed Section 377 act was attributed to the husband, not alleged to have been physically performed by his parents.

The Sessions Court found the alleged sexual act specifically against Anurag and treated the parents' response as a separate allegation; it regarded their principal accusation as dowry-related physical and mental harassment and noted apparent failure to follow Arnesh Kumar and Section 41A CrPC. Meghna argued that the response demonstrated the parents' consent and knowledge of the husband's act and later that an anticipatory-bail order without a time limit would allow the parents to avoid applying for regular bail at the charge-sheet stage. Her counsel conceded no record showed Anurag shared his private bedroom acts with his parents. The judgment disposes of this separate application concerning the two in-laws; it does not set aside or affirm the husband's bail order in another case.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jagjeet Singh and Ors. v. Ashish Mishra alias Monu and Anr., Criminal Appeal No. 632/2022, order dated 18.04.2022, was cited and applied for the distinction at the bail stage between a permissible prima facie assessment of reasonable grounds and the seriousness of the offence, and an extensive evaluation of evidence that may prejudice either side at trial. The High Court held that the Sessions Court's accused-specific observation about the absence of apparent parental knowledge or instigation of the alleged Section 377 act was of the former kind. The High Court did not adjudicate whether the husband's alleged sexual offence occurred or decide whether evidence after investigation could change the assessment.

Arnesh Kumar v. State of Bihar, (2014) 8 SCC 273, appeared in the Sessions Court's stated reason and was examined as part of the challenge. It concerns the proper exercise of arrest powers and notice under Section 41A in the relevant class of cases; the judgment did not reproduce its full test or make a separate finding about a particular officer's conduct. The petitioner could not explain why the lower court's observation about apparent non-compliance was wrong. Accordingly the High Court did not reject that reason, but its result did not turn on declaring that every Section 41A lapse automatically entitles the accused to anticipatory bail.

Sushila Aggarwal and Ors. v. State (NCT of Delhi) and Anr., (2020) 5 SCC 1, was invoked by the complainant and applied for the proposition that, depending on facts and circumstances, a court may set a limited duration for anticipatory bail. The High Court exercised that discretion to limit the grant to the period until submission of the charge-sheet. It then required a fresh application for regular bail and a decision unaffected by the provisional bail observations. The order does not quote Sushila Aggarwal's full treatment of the ordinary duration of Section 438 protection; this order is a case-specific limit, not a claim that all anticipatory bail expires upon charge-sheet.

3. Statutes considered : The complainant's application concerning bail previously granted was made under Section 439(2) CrPC; the order modified rather than wholly canceled it. Section 438 CrPC governed the parents-in-law's pre-arrest protection. Section 41A CrPC was invoked with Arnesh Kumar concerning police notice or arrest procedure, but the order did not establish which notice was served, resolve an illegal-arrest claim or expound the full Section 41/41A scheme. Section 377 IPC identified the separate unnatural-sex allegation against the husband; the High Court considered whether there was a specific allegation that could prima facie attribute knowledge and instigation to his parents, without deciding the act's occurrence or all ingredients. Dowry-related physical and mental cruelty allegations remained a separate reason to evaluate bail, but this order did not analyze the final elements or proof of Section 498-A IPC or other FIR charges. On filing of a charge-sheet, regular bail must be sought and assessed afresh according to law.

4. Issues : First, did the Sessions Court improperly assess evidence by separating the alleged Section 377 act by the husband from the two in-laws' later response, or was there a sufficient specific prima facie allegation of their knowledge and instigation? Second, was its reference to Arnesh Kumar and Section 41A shown to be legally or factually flawed on the present record? Third, should anticipatory bail for the parents remain in force without a time limit or be limited until the charge-sheet with a fresh regular-bail hearing? The Court did not decide the husband's alleged act, the parents' guilt of dowry harassment, the merits of a future regular-bail application or other respondents' bail.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court accepted that the complainant had alleged serious separate dowry harassment against the in-laws, but refused to attribute the husband's alleged private sexual act to them merely because they later told her to live according to his wishes. Her counsel could identify no record of prior communication about bedroom conduct and no particular allegation of knowledge and instigation. Jagjeet Singh permitted the Court, at the bail stage, to assess that attribution prima facie and consider the gravity of the offence without evaluating the evidence as it would at trial. The Sessions Court therefore had not impermissibly undertaken a detailed merits inquiry by making the prima facie distinction; the matter remained open to further investigation and proof. The complainant likewise did not show why the lower court's observation about apparent non-compliance with Section 41A and Arnesh Kumar was wrong, so the High Court did not overturn the grant on that ground. These findings did not erase or prove the dowry allegations.

The alternative submission about duration was accepted in part. Sushila Aggarwal permitted a time limit where warranted by the circumstances. The investigation was incomplete, and counsel had argued that the parents should be required to seek regular bail at the charge-sheet stage. The Court kept their pre-arrest protection in place until filing of the charge-sheet but required a new regular-bail application on its filing. That application would be independently considered, with no prejudice from provisional observations by either court. The Court neither treated charge-sheet filing as an event that universally ends anticipatory bail nor itself decided the future application.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the application under Section 439(2) by modifying the Sessions order dated 29.09.2021. Anticipatory bail for respondents 1 and 2 remained effective until filing of the charge-sheet; on that day they must apply for regular bail, to be considered afresh without influence from observations in the two bail orders.

Headnote :- Investigation and coercive directions — Mevaram Singh's son had made the complaint leading to Crime No. 671/2021. Mevaram sought proper investigation, arrest of suspects and filing of a charge-sheet; the suspected persons were not parties. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, the Court declined to direct particular investigative steps or predetermine the result under Section 482 CrPC. The Supreme Court passage explained the police's statutory duty to investigate, the discretion to arrest under Section 41 as explained in M.C. Abraham, the possibility of either prosecution or closure, and the danger of making coercive orders against affected persons without a hearing, as discussed in Divine Retreat Centre. Those latter decisions appeared within the controlling quoted authority; the Court did not independently invalidate an order for lack of notice or decide on the facts whether arrest was necessary.

Section 173(1) CrPC — The Court also held that investigation must be completed without unnecessary delay. It required the investigating officer to bring the investigation arising from the FIR to a lawful conclusion as early as possible, consider whether an offence was disclosed and file the appropriate final report, whether a charge-sheet or a closure report. The applicant could approach the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior with a later grievance. The application was disposed of with a direction to complete the investigation without predetermining its outcome, compelling arrest, fixing a date, finding guilt or mandating a charge-sheet.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mevaram Singh applied under Section 482 CrPC concerning Crime No. 671/2021 at Police Station Maharajpura, District Gwalior. The FIR followed a complaint by his son and was originally for Sections 323, 324, 294, 506 and 34 IPC; Section 326 IPC was later added. Counsel said the police had taken no further action and had not arrested the persons suspected. The applicant sought proper investigation, arrest of the absconding accused and presentation of a charge-sheet. The judgment does not set out the underlying altercation facts, the identities or responses of the proposed accused, the case diary, the investigative steps already taken or the reasons for any delay. The suspected persons were not impleaded. It therefore decided whether the requested directions could lawfully be made on the limited record, not whether any named suspect committed assault or whether police actually failed in a particular investigative task.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was reproduced at length and directly applied. The Supreme Court had set aside a High Court's unexplained direction under Section 482 requiring witness statements to be recorded, arrests and seizures to be made, and a charge-sheet to be filed during an investigation. It held that police have the statutory duty and corresponding sphere of discretion to investigate, while courts should not supervise the choice of every step or decide the outcome in advance. An investigation may disclose sufficient grounds for a charge-sheet or may disclose that no case is made out; arrest and property seizure do not inevitably follow FIR registration. Section 482 exists to give effect to Code orders, prevent abuse of court process or secure the ends of justice and must be used sparingly with reasons, especially where observations from a higher court could distort the investigation. This High Court applied that holding to reject Mevaram's demand for arrest and a charge-sheet, but did not forbid the officer from using lawful powers if evidence later warranted them.

Within D. Venkatasubramaniam, the quoted M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explained that arrest under Section 41 CrPC in a cognizable-offence investigation is a matter of police discretion to be exercised cautiously, rather than an automatic consequence of lodging a report. Liberty, reputation, the nature of the allegation and the persons involved bear on the need for arrest. The present Court adopted that reasoning through its controlling authority without conducting an independent hearing on the need for arrest. The same Supreme Court extract cited Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on an opportunity to be heard before orders with drastic consequences against affected persons. Here the High Court noted the suspects were not impleaded and made no coercive order against them. It did not decide that a particular order already issued was a nullity, or adopt Divine Retreat Centre's anonymous-petition facts as present facts.

3. Statutes considered : The application invoked the Court's inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC. The Court applied the limited role explained in D. Venkatasubramaniam and refused to take over investigation by dictating arrest or a charge-sheet. Section 41 CrPC appeared within the quoted M.C. Abraham discussion of discretionary arrest, not as an order to the officer to arrest or release a named person. Section 173(1) CrPC was expressly set out and applied: every investigation under the relevant Chapter is to be completed without unnecessary delay. The Court construed this as requiring the officer to decide if an offence was made out and submit an appropriate final report, whether a charge-sheet or a closure report, as early as possible. Sections 323, 324, 294, 506 and 34 IPC and the later addition of Section 326 were the FIR's alleged offence provisions; the order did not analyse their elements or proof, or determine the final charges.

4. Issues : First, could the applicant obtain a Section 482 order compelling police to arrest the suspected persons and file a charge-sheet in his son's FIR while investigation was pending, particularly when those persons were not before the Court? Second, notwithstanding judicial restraint over the outcome, did Section 173(1) require the officer to complete the pending investigation without unnecessary delay, and what lawful direction could the Court make without predetermining the outcome? Third, what avenue remained to complain of inaction? The Court did not decide the truth of the FIR, whether the added Section 326 charge was sustained, the suspects' defence or the necessity for an arrest on case-specific evidence.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court separated the police's duty to investigate from the result sought by a private applicant. D. Venkatasubramaniam demonstrated why an unreasoned High Court direction requiring arrest, seizure, the recording of particular witness statements and the filing of a charge-sheet would displace statutory police judgment, even though the Court may require lawful process. The nested M.C. Abraham passage underscored that Section 41 arrest is not mechanical and can affect liberty and reputation. The discussion of Divine Retreat Centre within the quoted authority concerned the need to hear affected persons. The suspects here had not been impleaded, and the Court refused coercive relief without declaring any existing order invalid for lack of a hearing. An investigation may lawfully end in a closure report as well as a charge-sheet, and the Court would not predetermine which. Thus it denied the specific arrest and charge-sheet demands without granting the suspects immunity from investigation or from future lawful process.

Section 173(1) nevertheless imposes a separate obligation to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay. The applicant's account of the investigation still pending in the 2021 FIR provided the factual setting, but the Court did not examine a detailed case diary or make a misconduct finding. It directed the officer to conclude the investigation promptly, decide whether an offence was made out and file an appropriate final report. The direction to take the necessary lawful steps did not predetermine the outcome and set no calendar deadline. A further grievance could be presented to the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior to be considered according to law.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court finally disposed of the application under Section 482. The investigating officer was directed to conclude the investigation in Crime No. 671/2021 as early as possible and take necessary steps required by law, including a lawful final report. The High Court refused to direct arrest of the unimpleaded suspected persons or to require a charge-sheet. Mevaram remained free to apply to the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior if a grievance persisted. There was no adjudication of guilt, fixed completion date or coercive order against proposed accused.

Mevaram Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 12195/2022, 06/06/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 498-A IPC — continuing mental cruelty after separation - Applying Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, the Court held that physical separation and the absence of recent overt violence did not necessarily end mental cruelty: alleged demands for a flat and car, earlier confinement and police rescue, and continuing allegations that she had run away with gold and money, alongside threats of divorce and loss of custody, could continue to traumatise the wife at her parental home. The High Court also referred to its Amar Singh v. Smt. Vimla ruling on compelling such residence. These were charge-stage allegations, not adjudicated guilt.

Sections 306/511 IPC — proximity of alleged continuing conduct to attempted suicide - The complainant survived after consuming sleeping pills. The framed charge was Section 306 read with Section 511, correcting counsel's misleading premise that the applicants had been charged for a completed suicide despite the complainant's survival. The Court found prima facie proximity between continuing mental cruelty, the report of intended second marriage, divorce and custody proceedings, and the attempt, despite about a year without physical cruelty. It did not independently expound all Section 107 abetment ingredients or convict any applicant.

Charge and quashing — grave suspicion and limited sifting - The Court applied M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. CBI, (2020) 2 SCC 768, distinguishing supported grave suspicion from mere suspicion and allowing limited examination of prosecution material without a roving merits inquiry or premature defence case. Soma Chakravarty v. State, (2007) 5 SCC 403, added that charge requires material and judicial attention to different accused categories, not unsupported suspicion. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, (2020) 2 SCC 290, supplied the inquiry into whether the material taken at face value discloses the ingredients of the offence and is capable of becoming evidence at trial; State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, (2017) 3 SCC 198, rejected the application of the final test of guilt. On the survivor's statement and attributed allegations, the High Court found grave suspicion sufficient to decline Section 482 interference with the existing charges, leaving guilt for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Misbhah-Ul Aijaz Nizami, his mother Shahin and sisters Farha and Iqra sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of FIR No. 182/2022, Police Station Ashoka Garden, Bhopal, and the ensuing prosecution. Sana Nijami married Misbah on 4 January 2018 and they had a daughter, about three years old at the time described in the order. The FIR account alleged that the four applicants demanded a flat and car and subjected her to cruelty soon after marriage. She had previously complained to the police. According to her subsequently recorded hospital statement, she had been confined at her matrimonial home and was rescued by police about a year before the later incident; she and the child then lived with her parents. She alleged that the family continued to disparage her among relatives as having run away with 15 tolas of gold and ₹2 lakh, although she said police had brought her home, and that divorce had been threatened earlier. These are the complainant's attributed allegations, not proved findings against particular relatives.

On or about 3 March 2022 she learned from a conversation involving her maternal uncle (Mousa) that her husband might marry again, she would be divorced and the family might seek custody of her child. Her reproduced statement says her maternal uncle had gone to discuss the relationship; the husband and his family reportedly refused to keep her and spoke of child custody and divorce. She said she felt profound mental distress, had taken sleeping pills, and remained troubled by the family. The statement gives 6 March 2022 as the date when she consumed the pills and was recorded at the hospital on 7 March 2022; the order's FIR account gives the date of the information reaching her as 3 March. Police had received information about hospitalisation and recorded her statement and a Section 161 statement. Timely treatment allowed her to survive. The Court referred to the hospital statement styled a dying declaration and said that, since its maker survived, it could be treated as a Section 164 CrPC statement; it did not conduct a fuller admissibility analysis.

The trial court's order of 3 September 2022 had framed charges under Sections 498-A/34 IPC, Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act read with Section 34 IPC, and Section 306 read with Section 511 IPC. Applicants' counsel had earlier suggested that Section 306 alone was charged despite the complainant being alive. On receiving the charge order, the High Court called this premise misleading and proceeded on the actual attempted-offence framing. Counsel then argued that, even if the FIR were taken at face value, the alleged offences were not disclosed; in particular, about a year without physical cruelty severed proximity to the attempt. The Court heard the application on admission and dismissed it.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., 2019:INSC:479, (2019) 5 SCC 384, was quoted and applied on Section 498-A. The quoted Supreme Court reasoning distinguishes physical acts in the matrimonial home from their continuing emotional and psychological effects when the wife has been driven to her parental home and fears return; cruelty includes mental suffering, and cessation of overt violence at the new location need not terminate that trauma. The High Court applied this continuity principle to alleged dowry-driven separation, previous confinement and rescue, ongoing imputations about valuables, and the renewed threats concerning marriage, divorce and the child. Rupali Devi was not a holding that separation or any unpleasant matrimonial dispute automatically establishes every ingredient of cruelty. The High Court also cited its own Amar Singh v. Smt. Vimla, Criminal Revision No. 2376/2020, decided 22 June 2021, for the proposition that compelling a married woman to live in her parental home amounts to cruelty. Its short reference was used to support the application of Section 498-A. M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. CBI, Bengaluru, 2020:INSC:6, (2020) 2 SCC 768, was quoted at length for the Section 227 charge/discharge inquiry. The Supreme Court extract allows the judge to sift prosecution statements and documents and consider broad probabilities and basic infirmities, but not to weigh probative value as at trial or conduct a roving inquiry. Where two reasonable views are possible, one giving rise only to suspicion rather than grave suspicion may justify discharge; strong or grave suspicion must be supported by some material. If the proposed prosecution evidence, even if fully accepted, could not show commission of the offence, there would be no sufficient ground to proceed. It also ordinarily confines the record at the charge stage to prosecution material and excludes the production of defence documents at that stage. The High Court applied the grave-suspicion and restraint principles when declining to decide the applicants' factual defence under Section 482. The quoted extract referred to P. Vijayan v. State of Kerala as an earlier synthesis and to State of J&K v. Sudershan Chakkar and State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi on defence material. They were nested support within the reproduced Supreme Court passage; the High Court did not separately compare their facts or decide a new question about defence documents.

Soma Chakravarty v. State, through CBI, 2007:INSC:551, (2007) 5 SCC 403, was independently quoted. The lower threshold for framing a charge requires a view based on the judicial assessment of material that the accused might have committed the offence, with final proof beyond reasonable doubt reserved for trial. It specifically cautions that a trial judge must consider the different categories of accused and find material for a prima facie conclusion; suspicion alone, without anything more, is insufficient. The High Court used this to support refusal of quashing on the allegations it recited against husband, mother and sisters, without holding that a shared family relationship proves common intention.

State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, 2019:INSC:1321, (2020) 2 SCC 290, was quoted on Section 227. The limited examination asks whether the prosecution facts, taken at face value, disclose the ingredients of the offence and give rise to grave suspicion; it does not assess veracity or likely conviction, and there must be material capable of becoming evidence at trial. That extract in turn invoked State of Bihar v. Ramesh Singh and Dipakbhai Jagdishchandra Patel. They explain strong suspicion founded on material and the requirement that the prosecution material be capable of becoming evidence at trial, but appeared within Shiv Charan Bansal rather than as independently applied fact-specific authorities here. The High Court treated that framework as supporting the existing charge rather than conducting a mini-trial.

State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, 2017:INSC:104, (2017) 3 SCC 198, was separately quoted on Section 397 review once a charge has been framed: the court asks whether material raises strong suspicion which, if proved at trial, could establish guilt, and must not demand a present conclusion of certain guilt. Although that extract addresses revisional interference, the High Court applied its distinction between the proof required at the charge stage and at trial in this Section 482 application. The judgment does not equate the two jurisdictions for every purpose. These four decisions on framing charges apply a prima facie threshold based on material, while Soma's accused-specific safeguard and M.E. Shivalingamurthy's mere/grave suspicion distinction retain independent significance.

3. Statutes considered : The applicants sought quashing of the FIR and proceedings by invoking the Court’s inherent jurisdiction under Section 482 CrPC. The High Court assessed the face-value prosecution material and charge order rather than conducting a full trial or deciding ultimate guilt. Sections 227 and 228 CrPC were addressed through the Supreme Court extracts as the charge/discharge threshold, with Section 397 appearing in Fatehkaran Mehdu's original revisional context; the High Court did not purport to dispose of a standalone Section 397 revision. The Court called the survivor's hospital statement capable of treatment under Section 164 CrPC and also mentioned a Section 161 police statement. The order did not state whether a magistrate recorded the hospital statement, set out a foundation under Section 32 of the Evidence Act, or decide its admissibility at trial.

Section 498-A IPC supplied the mental/physical cruelty issue. Sections 306 read with 511 IPC provided the basis of the charge of attempted abetment in light of her survival; the court assessed proximity of continuing alleged mental cruelty and the attempt, without independently stating a complete Section 107 instigation or intentional-aid test or finding mens rea proved. Section 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act formed part of the framed charges. The flat/car demand and family allegations explained the prima facie context, but the order did not separately analyse each statutory ingredient, identify exact acts of each relative for those provisions, or determine guilt.

4. Issues : First, did the applicants' premise that a charge under Section 306 IPC for a completed suicide had been framed despite the complainant's survival accurately describe the trial court's 3 September 2022 order? The actual provision was Section 306 read with Section 511. Second, could the alleged dowry-driven displacement and continuing disparagement and threats amount to mental cruelty under Section 498-A notwithstanding a year without alleged physical abuse, and did that ongoing conduct and the news about remarriage, divorce and custody bear sufficient proximity to the suicide attempt at this preliminary stage? Third, what threshold governed the Section 482 attack on charges under Sections 498-A/34, 306/511 and Dowry Prohibition Act Sections 3/4/34: whether prosecution material on its face supplied grave suspicion or whether counsel's objections required a roving assessment of proof and the probable defence? Trial guilt, individual culpability on full evidence, and the admissibility or final weight of the hospital statement were not decided.

5. Ratio / Findings : The charge order defeated counsel's initial suggestion of a charge concerning a completed suicide despite the complainant's survival; it in fact used Sections 306/511. The High Court did not quash on that misdescription. It read the complainant's account of flat/car demands, prior confinement and police rescue, separate parental residence, allegation that she had absconded with gold and cash, and threats concerning the marriage and child. Rupali Devi supplied the reason why cessation of physical cruelty at the former home does not necessarily sever the mental effects of dowry-related expulsion and abusive exchanges at the parental home. Amar Singh was added as supporting High Court authority. Here the alleged continuing accusations and threatened divorce/custody supplied further post-separation conduct. The Court expressly found, on those allegations, that mental cruelty continued even though there had been no physical cruelty for a year. That is a charge-stage application, not a final factual resolution of every disputed event. As to the attempt, the Court treated the newly conveyed plans for a second marriage, divorce and custody as particularly distressing in the setting of alleged continuing cruelty. It described this as the last precipitating blow and rejected the argument that there was no close proximity because the alleged mental cruelty had not stopped. This supplied the Court's prima facie nexus for retaining the Section 306/511 charge. The Court did not separately articulate the full elements of abetment under Section 107, particularise each applicant's intent, or resolve whether the proof ultimately sustains that charge. The named relatives were included on the basis of allegations attributing joint cruelty and dowry demands to them; family status by itself was not announced as enough.

On charge review, M.E. Shivalingamurthy, Soma Chakravarty, Shiv Charan Bansal and Fatehkaran Mehdu provided the applicable threshold: a court does not merely act as a post office for the prosecution and may examine the material to a limited extent, including whether, taken at face value, it could satisfy the ingredients of the offence; but it cannot conduct a roving examination of credibility, probative value or defence evidence. Bare suspicion without supporting material differs from grave suspicion permitting charge, and conviction needs proof beyond reasonable doubt. Soma requires attention to categories of accused. The High Court found prima facie material raising grave suspicion that applicants might have committed the charged offences and refused Section 482 interference. Its language is one of possibility and suspicion, not an adjudication that all three offence groups or all four applicants are guilty. The order's specific reasoning focuses on cruelty and the proximity to the attempt; it does not separately analyse all the ingredients of the dowry statute.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 at admission; the High Court found no case for interfering with FIR No. 182/2022 and the already framed charges. The prosecution therefore remained pending before the trial court. There was no quashing, alteration of charge, acquittal, bail ruling or final finding on the truth of the complainant's assertions. No additional condition, costs or separate direction appears in the operative order.

Headnote :- Private complaint — sufficient ground for process and limited preliminary inquiry - Applying Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, the Court treated 'sufficient ground' under Sections 203–204 CrPC as a prima facie basis to proceed, distinct from proof for conviction and from meticulous weighing at trial. The cited Supreme Court extract also described the limited inquiry under Section 202, the deferral of a plausible defence to trial, and the different standard for framing charges; its separate discussion of the Section 202(2) proviso on witnesses was not a disputed issue here. The complaint and Section 200/202 statements alleged diversion of MGNREGA well funds; an Assistant Engineer's report showed ₹1,55,000 recorded on the portal although no well was found, while bank records showed ₹75,000 credited to the complainant. The applicants' measurement book and relatives' affidavits did not resolve the prima facie discrepancy at this stage. The CJM's order taking cognizance of IPC Sections 420 and 120/34 was affirmed, leaving actual misappropriation and the factual defence for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Kamthua Pal, claiming possession and cultivation of his land for about fifty years, lodged a private complaint under Section 200 CrPC. He asserted that his family had dug an old well about fifteen years earlier without government benefit. He alleged that the Sarpanch, Secretary and Janpad CEO later drew around ₹2,50,000 under MGNREGA on the basis of a well on the land, although no new well had been dug or payment made to him. The complaint described a villager's information on 8 June 2020, complaints to the local authorities and CM Helpline, alleged pressure to withdraw, an allegedly forged affidavit from his children used to close the helpline complaint, and threats and an assault when he considered legal action. The judgment records that he obtained muster-roll details on 9 January 2020, a date preceding the June information in the same narrative; the High Court did not reconcile this chronology and the order does not resolve it. He maintained that the listed workers had not dug a well there. These were the complainant's assertions, not adjudicated facts.

The Chief Judicial Magistrate, Tikamgarh, recorded complainant and witness statements under Sections 200 and 202 CrPC, and by order dated 15 December 2022 in RCT No. 2282/2022 took cognizance of IPC Sections 420 and 120/34. Mithibai Ahirwar and other applicants challenged that order under Section 482 CrPC. Counsel argued that a Collector's inquiry had found the complaint false, that some money had been deposited in the complainant's account, that the well had not been entirely dug, that an Assistant Engineer had conducted an inquiry, and that withdrawals followed progress in the work, with none made before 2016. The High Court referred to the Assistant Engineer's report: a well was sanctioned on the complainant's khasra No. 293 on 28 November 2016; the MGNREGA portal reflected ₹1,55,000 in expenditure, yet no well was found on the spot. According to the villagers' account in the report, digging started in 2017 and reached earth level. The applicants' bank statement showed ₹75,000 in the complainant's account; those figures did not tally. A measurement book produced by them related to 2017. The complaint had alleged approximately ₹2,50,000, whereas the judgment's later account refers to an alleged withdrawal of ₹2,30,000. These figures describe different sources and assertions; the Court did not finally reconcile the amounts. Relatives' affidavits were raised as defence material. The dispute was whether the CJM could proceed on this record, rather than a determination at trial of fraud or actual expenditure.

2. Precedents — Considered : Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary and Others, 2010:INSC:355, (2010) 7 SCC 578, was the single Supreme Court decision independently selected and applied by the High Court. The quoted paragraphs explain 'sufficient ground' in Sections 203, 204 and 209 CrPC as satisfaction that a prima facie case exists against the proposed accused, not proof sufficient to convict. They distinguish a cursory preliminary view of the complaint and Section 200/202 evidence from meticulous evaluation and even from the standard for framing charges. The inquiry under Section 202 is confined to determining whether the allegations justify issuing process or dismissing the complaint; it is not a full-dress trial. Prima facie evidence calls for process despite a proposed defence, unless the complaint evidence is self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy. The present High Court applied this threshold to the complaint, witness statements, Engineer's report and expenditure discrepancy, and deferred resolution of the relatives' affidavits to trial. It did not hold that every discrepancy in the accounts itself establishes dishonest intention or conspiracy.

Within the Shivjee Singh passage, the Supreme Court attributed aspects of the rule to Ramgopal Ganpatrai Ruia v. State of Bombay, Vadilal Panchal v. Dattatraya Dulaji Ghadigaonkar, Chandra Deo Singh v. Prokash Chandra Bose, Nirmaljit Singh Hoon v. State of W.B., Kewal Krishan v. Suraj

Bhan, Mohinder Singh v. Gulwant Singh and Chief Enforcement Officer v. Videocon International Ltd. The quoted Chandra Deo explanation leaves a proposed defence for the proper stage while recognising self-contradictory or intrinsically untrustworthy complaint evidence; Kewal Krishan describes a cursory assessment and explains that the standard for framing charges differs; Mohinder Singh describes the scope of Section 202 as restricted and distinguishes issuing process from determining guilt.

The quotation from Shivjee Singh also considers the proviso to Section 202(2). Read with Chapter XV and Sections 226, 227 and 465, its apparently mandatory wording about witnesses does not automatically deprive a Magistrate of jurisdiction merely because not all named witnesses were examined on oath, provided a prima facie case exists; the complainant chooses the material witnesses. That was part of the long Supreme Court extract, but this proceeding contained no argument or finding about an omitted Section 202(2) witness.

3. Statutes considered : Section 200 CrPC governed the private complaint and the examination of the complainant; Section 202 governed the preliminary witness inquiry. Sections 203 and 204 CrPC, as explained through Shivjee Singh, distinguish dismissal for lack of sufficient ground from issuance of process when prima facie ground exists. Section 209 appeared in the quoted Supreme Court formulation but the High Court did not decide committal. The Section 202(2) proviso, Sections 226, 227 and 465 occurred in the authority's separate witness discussion and no procedural omission of that kind was alleged here. Section 482 CrPC was invoked to challenge the CJM's order and the High Court refused to interfere after finding no jurisdictional error. IPC Sections 420 and 120/34 specify the offences for which cognizance was taken; the judgment did not parse each ingredient, determine conspiratorial agreement or resolve individual liability. MGNREGA supplied the public works and portal context, not a separately construed offence or statutory defence in this order.

4. Issues : Did the complaint and preliminary material under Sections 200/202 disclose ‘sufficient ground’ for the CJM's order concerning IPC Sections 420 and 120/34, as distinct from proof adequate to convict? Did the Collector’s and engineering inquiries, partial credit to the account, 2017 measurement book and defence based on relatives’ affidavits defeat that threshold at the stage of Section 482? The High Court did not decide the correct final quantum, the actual source and destination of all funds, the genuineness of an affidavit, or the applicants' guilt. Although the quoted Supreme Court passage addressed Section 202(2) witness examination, that statutory proviso was not a live dispute in this application.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court first selected the preliminary standard from Shivjee Singh. Under Sections 203–204, the question is whether the accusation discloses a prima facie case for proceeding; a court must not demand proof sufficient for conviction or transform the Magistrate’s limited inquiry into a trial on the merits. The recognition of a defence does not require refusal of process where complaint evidence remains prima facie credible, and the lower court must not act mechanically on unsupported accusations. Counsel relied on competing factual accounts in support of the submission that the complaint was false.

On the actual record, the Court noted the alleged withdrawal against a pre-existing or incomplete well and that the applicants did not deny all withdrawal. The Assistant Engineer's material showed ₹1,55,000 uploaded as expenditure despite the absence of a well found on the site. The bank entry of ₹75,000 to the complainant did not tally with the uploaded expenditure. Those unresolved details, rather than a final audited calculation, provided a prima facie indication of misappropriation sufficient at this stage. A 2017 measurement book did not compel dismissal: the Court read the complainant's Section 200 statement and complaint as suggesting that measurements occurred after he started making allegations. Relatives' affidavits were matters for proof at trial. The Court did not independently find those affidavits forged, hold that no work had ever occurred, or establish the dishonest mental element of every applicant beyond reasonable doubt.

The limited decision was that the CJM had sufficient ground on the complaint and supporting material and committed no jurisdictional error in taking cognizance. The order applies the Supreme Court’s rule on issuing process to assess the challenged order taking cognizance; it does not separately resolve whether a summons issued on a particular day or add a new legal rule about the MGNREGA scheme. No final finding on the disputed amount, engineering history or conspiracy followed.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court affirmed the order of the CJM, Tikamgarh, dated 15 December 2022 in RCT No. 2282/2022 and dismissed the application under Section 482. The complaint prosecution for IPC Sections 420 and 120/34 remained in place. It did not acquit or convict the applicants, finally assess misappropriation, direct recovery, award costs or separately determine the factual defences.

Mithibai Ahirwar and Ors. v. Kamthua Pal, M.Cr.C. no. 61591/2022, 20/03/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Article 226 — FIR-registration mandamus and alternate remedy - Applying Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, the Court distinguished the police duty to register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence from the ordinary remedial course when the police fail: Sections 190/200 CrPC before the Magistrate. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, confirms that the ordinary remedy of an informant whose information prompts no police action lies before the Magistrate, but recognizes rare Article 226 intervention for a clear case of mala fide abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII, without dictating investigative steps. The Madhya Pradesh Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria explained that alternative remedies generally justify refusing FIR mandamus subject to established writ exceptions, and that the question of the police's duty in Lalita Kumari differs from entitlement to bypass statutory remedies. No such exception was shown on this record; the writ and associated representation prayer were dismissed, with no merits finding on the proposed BNS offences.

Police inaction — magistrate's statutory powers - Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, explained recourse first to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and then to a Magistrate under Section 156(3) for registration, proper investigation and limited monitoring if prima facie satisfied. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reiterated that the ordinary remedy is to approach the Magistrate rather than file a petition under Article 226. The Magistrate can direct a proper investigation and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer, but cannot personally investigate. The Court gave Mohammad Khan liberty to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS; it ordered no FIR or particular investigation and did not direct that the Supreme Court's analyses under the CrPC be retroactively converted to the new statute.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mohammad Khan brought Writ Petition No. 26366/2024 under Article 226, stating that he had approached the State and police respondents Nos. 1–4 for an FIR against private respondents Nos. 5–8 but had obtained no action. He sought a mandamus to decide representations annexed as P/2 through P/5, a further mandamus to register an FIR against the private respondents under appropriate Bharatiya Nyaya Sanhita provisions, costs and other suitable relief. The order does not recite what acts the proposed accused allegedly committed, the dates or contents of those representations, a specific cognizable offence, a reason for the police's refusal to act, or evidence of mala fides. The State contested the maintainability of the writ petition on the ground that Khan could file a complaint before the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS. The High Court framed the question whether an FIR-registration writ was maintainable in these circumstances. It decided the remedial route, not the truth of Khan's allegations or whether they disclosed criminal conduct.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee and others v. Union of India and Others, 2007:INSC:760, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was directly quoted. It accepts the police obligation to register an FIR when supplied facts disclose a cognizable offence. It then distinguishes that duty from the remedy available when the police fail to act: Sections 190 and 200 CrPC before the Magistrate. The Supreme Court distinguished the question of the police's duty in Ramesh Kumari from the question of the appropriate remedy addressed in All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union and Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, while discussing Hari Singh, Minu Kumari and Lallan Chaudhary in its reconciliation. The High Court adopted the remedy distinction to decline a direct writ compelling registration and leave open a complaint before the Magistrate, without deciding that the particular representations disclosed a cognizable offence. The Aleque Padamsee extract also mentions an unrelated sanction direction and a no-merits qualification from its own case; no sanction issue arose in Khan's petition. Those decisions are nested context within the quoted authority, not independent holdings by this High Court on the facts of those cases.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala and Others, 2008:INSC:341, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was separately quoted. Paragraph 42 reaffirms the Sections 190/200 route when police do not act, drawing on a quoted Gangadhar explanation of the Magistrate's options: inquire into a complaint, direct investigation where appropriate, dismiss under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, or take cognizance and issue process if prima facie material supports it. Paragraph 41 preserves intervention under Article 226 in a rare, clear case involving mala fide exercise of investigative power, abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII, with the court entitled to insist on compliance with the procedure under the Code but not dictate the particular manner of investigation. The High Court invoked both limbs; the order describes no fact making the exceptional limb applicable. It did not find that a writ can never issue under any circumstances.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of Uttar Pradesh and Others, 2007:INSC:1243, (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted independently. The sequence of statutory remedies it describes begins with a written Section 154(3) CrPC application to the Superintendent if the police station refuses registration; persistent non-registration or deficient investigation may then be taken to a Magistrate under Section 156(3). The Magistrate may direct FIR registration, order proper investigation and monitor compliance. The High Court used it to locate effective remedial powers with the Magistrate rather than the High Court in writ proceedings; it neither issued those directions itself nor adjudicated the sufficiency of Khan's material for relief under Section 156(3).

Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage and Others, (2016) 6 SCC 277, was separately quoted as a reaffirmation of Sakiri Vasu. It explains that a Magistrate who is prima facie satisfied can order registration or proper investigation, may recommend to the police superiors that the investigating officer be changed, and can monitor the investigation, but cannot personally investigate. It also explains the systemic reason for directing routine petitions about police inaction to that statutory forum rather than adding them to High Court writ lists. The present Court used that remedy principle. It did not order the police to change an officer in Khan's case.

The Madhya Pradesh Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P. and Others, W.A. No. 247/2016, decided 20 December 2016, was also directly quoted. It says mandamus under Article 226 may be denied when Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 remedies have not been pursued, subject to the four recognized Whirlpool Corporation alternative-remedy exceptions. It distinguishes Lalita Kumari's rule on the police's Section 154 duty from entitlement to bypass those remedies and obtain writ mandamus. The High Court applied that forum distinction, but the order does not describe or find the facts of any particular Whirlpool exception. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari appear within the Division Bench's analysis; this Court did not independently analyse their facts.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 supplied the public-law jurisdiction invoked for directions to police and State respondents. The Court treated alternative statutory remedies as governing the ordinary exercise of that discretion, while Divine Retreat Centre preserved rare exceptional intervention for clear abuse of investigative power exercised mala fide, with non-compliance with Chapter XII; no blanket removal of constitutional jurisdiction was decided. Section 154 CrPC concerns police registration upon cognizable information and Section 154(3) concerns recourse to a superior officer. Section 156(3) concerns registration or proper investigation directed by a Magistrate upon prima facie satisfaction, with limited monitoring. Sections 190 and 200 concern the private-complaint and cognizance route, expressly left open. The quoted Supreme Court passage also described Section 203 dismissal and issue of process after sufficient material, but the present case had not yet reached the stage of those decisions by a Magistrate. The High Court's operative order refers to Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS, 2023, as a possible route in September 2024. It did not analyse transitional applicability or map every CrPC provision in the quoted precedents to a corresponding BNSS provision. The prayer mentioned unspecified BNS provisions, but no offence ingredient was analyzed.

4. Issues : Could Khan obtain an Article 226 mandamus ordering registration of an FIR and decisions on police representations when he alleged police inaction but the statutory escalation, Section 156(3) application and private complaint routes were available? Did the acknowledged police duty to record cognizable information make a direct writ the ordinary remedy, and was there any identified rare abuse warranting exceptional writ control? What forum remained open after dismissal? The judgment did not decide whether the private respondents committed a BNS offence, whether a specific representation gave adequate cognizable information, or what result the Magistrate should reach.

5. Ratio / Findings : Aleque Padamsee framed the central distinction: the police must register if facts disclose a cognizable offence, but the informant's ordinary remedy for police inaction lies before the Magistrate under the statute rather than a High Court writ commanding an FIR. Divine Retreat Centre reinforced that forum rule while preserving Article 226 for a clear and rare case of mala fide abuse and non-compliance with Chapter XII; even then the High Court may enforce lawful process without taking over how police investigate. The Division Bench's Shweta Bhadauria added the ordinary alternative-remedy ground for denying mandamus and the possibility of established writ exceptions. Its explanation distinguishes Lalita Kumari's principle concerning the police's duty from a principle governing entitlement to a writ. On the limited record before it, the High Court identified no exceptional facts and did not test the underlying alleged crimes. The representations were included in Khan's prayer, but the order made no separate merits determination requiring authorities to decide P/2–P/5.

Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe explained what the alternative remedy provides. Section 154(3) provides recourse to the police superior; Section 156(3) lets the Magistrate, if prima facie satisfied, direct registration and proper investigation and monitor it within judicial limits. The complaint route under Sections 190/200 allows the Magistrate to consider the allegations and take steps authorised by the Code. That availability explained why the writ was dismissed with liberty to seek redress before the Magistrate under the order's reference to the CrPC and BNSS. The High Court did not itself instruct police to register an FIR, change an officer, make a particular inquiry or predetermine the Magistrate's assessment. The dismissal was a decision about the remedy and forum, not a factual exoneration of respondents Nos. 5–8.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. Khan remained at liberty, if he wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS for redress. The Court did not grant either requested mandamus, award costs, order an FIR, or decide whether the alleged private conduct was criminal. No merits ruling or exceptional writ direction was made.

Mohammad Khan v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 26366/2024, 06/09/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — police inaction, pending merg and complaint remedy - An applicant whose merg inquiry remained pending sought High Court directions that would effectively require registration of an FIR followed by the filing of a charge-sheet against suspected persons who were not parties. Applying the remedy for police inaction explained in Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, including the complaint route under Sections 190/200 CrPC and the limited exceptional power under Article 226 in a clear case of mala fide investigative abuse and Chapter XII non-compliance, the Court found that a complaint before the Magistrate was an efficacious remedy. It also used the Madhya Pradesh Division Bench's Shweta Bhadauria decision, which distinguishes the police's duty under Section 154 from entitlement to a writ in the ordinary course and preserves alternative-remedy exceptions. The present Section 482 application was dismissed with liberty to file a complaint; no FIR, arrest, charge-sheet or guilt finding was directed. Sakiri Vasu and Aleque Padamsee were cited by the State, while the Court directly reproduced Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria; no broader rule abolishing every exceptional High Court power was decided.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mohan Prasad Sharma brought Miscellaneous Criminal Case No. 23327/2022 under Section 482 CrPC in connection with merg inquiry No. 4/2022. His counsel said the police had not completed the inquiry and asked that the investigation be completed and a charge-sheet filed. The prayer asks the Court to allow the petition and direct action on his application and evidence concerning the proposed accused, including their arrest and submission of a challan by the police. The High Court read the prayer and counsel's submission together as effectively seeking registration of an FIR and thereafter a charge-sheet. It noted that the suspected persons had not been impleaded. The order does not give details of the underlying death or event, the applicant's relationship to any victim, what the merg file contained, the suspected persons' identities or response, or which cognizable offence was disclosed. The State argued that the ordinary remedy before the Magistrate made the request under Section 482 untenable.

2. Precedents — Considered : Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala and Others, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was directly reproduced and used. Its paragraph 42 directs a person complaining of police inaction to the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC rather than treating a writ as the ordinary route. Within it, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre described a Magistrate's complaint inquiry, a possible direction for a police investigation, dismissal under Section 203 if no offence appears, or cognizance and process on prima facie material. An All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union citation appears in that nested passage. Paragraph 41 preserves Article 226 directions in the rare clear case of mala fide investigative abuse and Chapter XII non-compliance, while forbidding a High Court from prescribing exactly how police must investigate. The present Court relied on the principles governing the remedy and judicial restraint to decline an order requiring an FIR followed by a charge-sheet; it did not find a mala fide officer or decide the contours of Article 226 on a separate writ petition.

The Madhya Pradesh Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P. and Others, Writ Appeal No. 247/2016, decided 20 December 2016, was separately quoted. It permits refusal of a mandamus directing registration of an FIR under Section 154 CrPC when the informant has not used Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 remedies, subject to the established Whirlpool Corporation exceptions. It also explains that Lalita Kumari concerns the police's FIR duty and does not itself entitle a person to a writ bypassing alternative remedies. This High Court invoked that forum analysis in the Section 482 setting; the order did not separately test a pleaded Whirlpool exception. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari appeared as explained within the Division Bench extract, rather than as Supreme Court decisions whose facts were independently analysed here.

The State's counsel also cited Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, in a list supporting non-maintainability. The Court did not separately quote, explain or apply their full tests in this order; their treatment of police inaction overlaps the rule directly reproduced from Divine Retreat Centre.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the provision conferring inherent power invoked to seek coercive directions in a pending merg matter. The High Court resolved this application on the availability of a complaint before the Magistrate, rather than deciding whether an FIR must be registered on a particular cognizable disclosure. Sections 190 and 200 CrPC governed the complaint and cognizance remedy explained in Divine Retreat Centre and expressly left open by the Court. Section 154 CrPC and Sections 154(3)/156(3) featured in the Division Bench's alternative-remedy framework. Section 203 and Chapter XII occurred in the quoted Supreme Court passage describing the Magistrate's preliminary assessment and rare intervention under public law in an investigation; no complaint dismissal, final police report or Chapter XII abuse was actually adjudicated here. The Court did not analyse an IPC offence.

4. Issues : Could an applicant under Section 482 obtain direct High Court orders effectively requiring an FIR and a charge-sheet while merg inquiry No. 4/2022 was pending, especially when the suspected accused were not impleaded? Was the available complaint process before a Magistrate an efficacious alternative that resolved the request? The court did not decide the death/inquiry facts, the sufficiency of any criminal accusation, arrest necessity, the proper content of a final police report, or whether police officials had acted mala fide.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court identified the substance of the request from the prayer and submission: although counsel spoke of completing the merg inquiry, the desired outcome was an FIR and charge-sheet against absent suspects. Divine Retreat Centre supplied the ordinary route when police fail to act: the informant may take material to a competent Magistrate under Sections 190/200, who has options under the Code, rather than obtain directions from the High Court controlling the outcome of the prosecution process. Its narrow Article 226 exception and investigative restraint were quoted, but the order records no finding of clear abuse or malice on this limited record. Shweta Bhadauria further supported recourse to police superiors and to the Magistrate under the statute while preserving recognized writ exceptions and distinguishing a duty to register from a right to a writ. The High Court applied these remedial propositions to find a criminal complaint to be an efficacious remedy and to decline the Section 482 application. It did not conduct an independent evaluation under Section 154 of whether the information disclosed a cognizable offence or determine that lawful police investigation could not later produce an FIR or charge-sheet. In formulating the question, the Court noted that the suspects had not been impleaded; its operative reason was the alternative remedy of filing a complaint.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482, with express liberty to lodge a criminal complaint before the competent court. No direct FIR registration, arrest, charge-sheet, fixed investigation deadline, costs or adverse finding against suspected persons was ordered. The Magistrate's later assessment and the lawful course of police action remained open.

Mohan Prasad Sharma v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 23327/2022, 09/05/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Dying declaration — fitness, exact recording and surrounding reliability - Khushal Rao v. State of Bombay, AIR 1958 SC 22, permits an otherwise reliable declaration to be the sole basis of conviction and rejects an invariable corroboration requirement, while demanding case-specific appraisal; a statement properly recorded by a Magistrate in the maker's words has greater evidentiary force. Uka Ram v. State of Rajasthan, (2001) 5 SCC 254, requires confidence in the maker's fitness, accuracy and absence of tutoring, even though Section 32 permits admission without an expectation of death; Lakhan v. State of M.P., (2010) 8 SCC 514, likewise allows sole reliance only on a true, voluntary declaration made by a person who is fit to give it; Nanhar v. State of Haryana, (2010) 11 SCC 423, requires a genuinely reliable, doubt-free account. Applying those limits, the Court rejected Ex. P.5: Ratan arrived unconscious, his later fitness was undocumented while his condition was deteriorating, the written requisition and material words were missing, and the recorder's, doctor's and officer's accounts of timing and content conflicted. No general prohibition on relying on magistrate declarations was imposed.

Poison murder — accused's link and complete circumstantial chain - Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, supplied both the four material circumstances in a poisoning case—motive, death from the poison, possession by the accused, and opportunity to administer it—and the five principles requiring fully established, conclusive links consistent only with guilt and excluding other reasonable hypotheses. The FSL finding of aluminum phosphide in viscera did not prove possession or administration by the appellants. After Ex. P.5 was rejected, no reliable evidence identified a supplier of the poison or sweet, the place where the sweet was adulterated, or a genuine witness to its administration; the delayed spot map and the sequence of events at the police station left the chain of evidence incomplete. IPC Sections 328/34 and 302/34 convictions were set aside.

Prosecution proof — withheld complaint and contemporaneous records - The investigating officer's denial of Mohar Bai's earlier complaint conflicted with his admitted inquiry and witness evidence. The complaint/inquiry record, written requisition to the Tahsildar, treatment and transit records, and vomit were missing, and the officers who escorted Ratan were not examined; medical fitness and the chronology remained unproved. The Court held that the initial prosecution burden was not shifted by the appellants' failure to seek the official requisition under Section 91 CrPC. These omissions materially undermined Ex. P.5 and the alleged sequence in which poison was administered, rather than creating an automatic acquittal rule for isolated irregularities.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mohar Bai, Lalaram and Khema appealed under Section 374 CrPC against an Additional Sessions Judge, Sironj judgment of 29 August 2008 in Sessions Trial No. 141/2007. Each had been convicted under IPC Sections 328/34, with seven years' rigorous imprisonment and a ₹1,000 fine (six months' default imprisonment), and under Sections 302/34, with life imprisonment and a ₹1,000 fine (six months' default imprisonment), to run concurrently. The prosecution alleged that, after a dispute involving Mohar Bai and Ratan Singh, the appellants gave Ratan tea and a peda containing poison at a bus stand. Ratan later became ill, was taken to the Community Health Centre, Lateri, referred to Hamidia Hospital, Bhopal, and declared dead there. The postmortem doctor found no external or internal injuries, suspected poisoning as the cause of cardiorespiratory failure and preserved viscera; forensic analysis detected aluminum phosphide. That medical result established a poisonous substance in viscera but did not itself identify who administered the poison.

Ratan's purported dying declaration, Ex. P.5, states that he had been at Lateri police station from noon concerning an inquiry and statement, met Mohar Bai and others around 5 p.m. at a bus stand, was offered tea, then a bitter peda by Lalaram, became dizzy, went to the police station and was taken by two police personnel who left him by the hospital gate. The order identifies the recorder as Tahsildar Ram Niwas (PW6) and states that Dr. Ghanshyam Sahu (PW8) gave fitness certificates at about 8:00 and 8:15 p.m. The Tahsildar did not put date or time on the declaration itself. The initial hospital message described an unconscious patient said to have consumed something. The first inquiry officer Ram Singh was not examined and the requisition he purportedly sent to the Tahsildar was not filed. Ratan's brothers Shanker Singh (PW1) and Chhotelal (PW4), among others, were examined; Chhotelal said he saw police personnel escort Ratan toward hospital and that Ratan remained unconscious. Naresh (PW5), a supposed witness to the incident, did not support prosecution.

The defence challenged Ex. P.5's authenticity, Ratan's consciousness and the disputed timing, saying Mohar Bai had first complained against Ratan for humiliation or assault and that he had been called to or held at the police station. It also disputed the plausibility of accepting food from the appellants during that quarrel, drew attention to a brother's evidence about dining practices based on caste, and questioned the absence of evidence tracing the sweet shop, purchase of poison or place where it was mixed with the sweet. The Court did cite a medical-jurisprudence description of phosphine gas released by aluminum phosphide and the purported bitter taste, but its credibility assessment was cumulative rather than a universal scientific finding that such a sweet could never be consumed. The State supported the conviction and said preserved vomit was unnecessary because poison was found in viscera. The appellate court examined whether the death was homicidal, accidental or suicidal and, decisively, whether these appellants had administered poison with the common intention alleged in the charges.

2. Precedents — Considered : Khushal Rao v. State of Bombay, AIR 1958 SC 22, was quoted in the Court's detailed assessment of Ex. P.5. Its six propositions reject any absolute requirement of corroboration before a dying declaration can alone support conviction, reject a general assumption that a dying declaration is weaker evidence, and require each declaration to be weighed in its own setting. A declaration properly recorded by a competent Magistrate in question-and-answer form, as far as practicable in the maker's own words, stands on a stronger footing than oral recollection; opportunity to perceive, mental capacity, consistency, promptness and tutoring remain critical. Here the recorder admitted omitting answers and using an account that conflicted with other witnesses. The Court applied the quality tests and rejected this document; it did not make corroboration a legal precondition.

Uka Ram v. State of Rajasthan, (2001) 5 SCC 254, was separately reproduced after the assessment of the trial record. The quoted Section 32 Evidence Act principle admits a deceased person's statement about the cause or transaction of death without requiring an expectation of death. Reliance on it still requires full confidence in its correctness because cross-examination is unavailable: the court must rule out tutoring, prompting, vindictiveness and imagination, and be satisfied about fitness, truth and voluntariness. If these conditions are met, a declaration can sustain conviction without corroboration. Corroboration is not required as a rule of law, though it may still be prudent. The High Court applied the caution, not an automatic exclusion rule, to the inconsistencies in the chronology, doctor/recorder evidence and possible police involvement.

Lakhan v. State of M.P., (2010) 8 SCC 514, was quoted for a related but qualified test: a true, reliable, voluntary declaration recorded when physically and mentally fit, free of tutoring or duress, can alone form the basis of conviction. Where there are multiple declarations, an officer's rank may favour a Magistrate's record only if there are no circumstances making its truth doubtful; the court must scrutinize doubtful or mutually inconsistent accounts in context. There was one disputed Ex. P.5 here, so the multiple-declaration preference did not mechanically make it reliable merely because a Tahsildar recorded it. Nanhar v. State of Haryana, (2010) 11 SCC 423, was likewise quoted for the need for an account that genuinely inspires confidence and is untutored and free from substantial doubt. The High Court applied these principles with their stated qualifications to reject Ex. P.5, observing that it appeared to be a created and concocted document; it did not find that every official recording is false.

Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, was quoted after the declaration was rejected. Its poison-murder analysis, drawing on a nested passage from Ramgopal, asks whether the deceased died of the poison, whether the accused had that poison, and whether the accused had an opportunity to administer it, with clear motive also material to the inference. Paragraph 165 lists motive, death by that poison, possession by the accused and opportunity as four circumstances to examine carefully. Its separate five golden principles require circumstances to be fully established ('must' rather than 'may'), consistent only with guilt, conclusive, excluding other reasonable hypotheses and forming a chain that leaves no reasonable ground consistent with innocence. The quotation nests Shivaji Sahabrao Bobade for the distinction between 'may be guilty' and 'must be guilty'; the High Court did not independently examine Shivaji's facts. The present Court applied both parts of Sharad: the toxicology result alone did not establish possession or administration by the accused and the remaining chain did not exclude a sequence of events in which poisoning occurred at the police station.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC was the appeal route for scrutiny of convictions and sentence. IPC Section 328 concerned administration of a harmful poison; Section 302 concerned murder; Section 34 extended the charged liability on common intention. The appellate court reversed both convictions for all three appellants because it was not proved that they had administered the poison and the chain of circumstances establishing guilt was incomplete; it did not separately decide conversion to a lesser offence or analyse an alternative theory under Section 304. Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act appeared through Uka Ram as the admissibility basis for a statement concerning cause or circumstances of death; admissibility did not settle its credibility. Section 91 CrPC appeared in the prosecutor’s argument that the accused could have sought production of the official requisition; the Court held the initial prosecution burden could not be shifted by their failure to make that request. No statutory presumption or burden reversal was invoked. The postmortem, FSL report, medical treatment papers, police diary and spot map were evidence examined, not independent statutory offence provisions.

4. Issues : First, did the official recording and fitness evidence make Ratan's alleged dying declaration a truthful, voluntary and reliable account, despite his admission to hospital in an unconscious condition, deteriorating signs, missing requisition and inconsistent witnesses? Second, could the prosecution prove the charged administration of aluminum phosphide in tea or peda by these appellants, as distinct from a finding that poison was in Ratan's viscera? Third, did the circumstantial chain—including motive, possession, opportunity, police and hospital chronology, witness testimony, suppressed records and medical gaps—exclude a reasonable alternative and prove guilt under Sections 328/34 and 302/34 beyond reasonable doubt? Fourth, what relief followed for the jailed and bailed appellants? The Court did not try any officer for custody wrongdoing or finally assign criminal liability for Ratan's death to a different actor.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first separated medical detection from the manner of death and the identity of the person who administered the poison. Dr. Vimla Prajapati (PW3) found no injury and described suspected poisoning; FSL Ex. P.16 established aluminum phosphide in viscera. But the allegation that the appellants had delivered it depended heavily on Ex. P.5. The Court applied Khushal Rao, Uka Ram, Lakhan and Nanhar as reliability, voluntariness and capacity safeguards, not a universal corroboration rule. Ratan was initially described as unconscious. Dr. Sahu asserted later recovery from memory but the contemporaneous intimation did not record it; his own evidence placed the decline in blood pressure, pulse and breathing, and the decision to refer Ratan, at roughly 7:45 p.m., before the claimed 8:00–8:15 p.m. recording, without recorded vital signs or a documented examination before and after. Chhotelal said Ratan remained unconscious. The Tahsildar said a sealed written request arrived at 7:30 p.m. but kept it in a personal file and did not produce it; the hospital intimation itself was prepared about 7:30. The recorder said the narrative was given in one go and recorded over 5–6 minutes; the doctor described slow questioning, stammering and 15 minutes. The recorder conceded omission of material patient answers about movements near the police station and the bitter peda. The officer's claimed hospital arrival and already completed declaration conflicted with the doctor's recorded times. The two constables said to have escorted Ratan and the preliminary inquiry officer were not examined. These matters and the surrounding concerns about the account of feeding Ratan made Ex. P.5 untrustworthy. The Court rejected it, observing that it appeared to be a created and concocted document. This finding rested on the total record, not one formal defect.

The Court also examined the dispute and investigative history. Officer J.P. Dangi (PW11) denied receiving Mohar Bai's report while acknowledging her visit and an inquiry into her dispute with Ratan; Shanker and other evidence supported the account that a report had been made and the police had summoned Ratan. The complaint, inquiry notes, her and others' recorded statements, and Ratan's statement were absent. The Court found material evidence suppressed, inferred that Ratan remained at the station and questioned the police version that he became ill elsewhere and voluntarily went to the hospital. Chhotelal saw two police personnel take him there; they were not called, there was no reliable record of when he left custody at the police station or was handed to medical staff, and the interval before recorded hospital notice and treatment was unexplained. The same officer’s later account of speaking to Ratan was neither recorded in a statement nor entered in the diary. The Court criticised the absence of the transport log, escort testimony, indoor register, drug administration records and purchase receipts; it could not verify the times of referral and death or reliably trace the medicines. Vomit after a hypertonic solution was not retained, which mattered to the sequence in which poisoning was alleged to have occurred notwithstanding the later viscera finding. The trial court had also declined without reasons to summon a drug register. The prosecutor's suggestion that accused could have demanded the Tahsildar requisition under Section 91 failed because the initial burden of proof lay on the prosecution. The Court drew serious case-specific credibility consequences from the aggregate omissions; it did not hold each missing record alone proved police guilt.

The other circumstances did not overcome the rejection of the declaration. The alleged provision of tea and peda arose amid an active dispute, and the Court found it implausible that Ratan accepted food in that setting, taking account of the brother's testimony about caste practices, alleged bitter taste and the quoted medical-jurisprudence property of aluminum phosphide. The prosecutor did not prove a sweet purchase, identify a shopkeeper, show acquisition or possession of poison by appellants, or establish where adulteration occurred. An alleged witness to feeding was hostile; the delayed spot map was prepared on information from a person not examined as an eyewitness. The Court expressly found these gaps after detailed cross-examination, rather than treating caste or a medical textbook as independent proof of an alternative cause. Under Sharad's poison circumstances and five principles governing circumstantial proof, motive alone, toxicology alone or mere opportunity could not establish guilt. The suppressed account of events at the police station and medical uncertainties left an alternative hypothesis; the Court stated its inference that Ratan was within police control and consumed poison at the station. That inference undermined the prosecution narrative underlying the charges but was not an operative criminal adjudication against police. The manner of poisoning, the responsible actor and precise death location remained unproved by the prosecution as a basis for convicting these appellants.

The Court therefore found that guilt had not been proved beyond reasonable doubt for each of Mohar Bai, Lalaram and Khema under both Sections 328/34 and 302/34. It did not merely reduce the sentence or convert murder to another offence. The same failure to prove administration of poison and to establish a complete chain of circumstances defeated the allegation of common intention against all three.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the appeal; the 29 August 2008 conviction and sentence in Sessions Trial No. 141/2007 were set aside, and all appellants were acquitted of every charge. Mohar Bai (appellant 1) and Khema (appellant 3), who were on bail, had their bonds discharged. Lalaram (appellant 2), who was in jail, was directed to be released immediately unless required in another case. The Registry was directed to send the judgment and record immediately to the trial court for information and compliance. The judgment made no compensation, recovery, or officer-prosecution order.

Mohar Bai and Ors. v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 692/2008, 28/09/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- POCSO / JJ Act — proof of child status at framing of charge - The husband's FIR described X as about twenty, but the school admission register and Headmaster's certificate produced by the prosecution stated a birth date of 20 December 2003; she was below eighteen in June 2021 on that material. The Court preferred the documentary route it set out from Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015, over an informal estimate, and rejected the applicants' challenge to the IPC and POCSO charges insofar as it rested on the claim that X was an adult. It cited Joginder Singh v. State of Haryana, (2014) 11 SCC 335, on the assessment of a victim's age. The age assessment was prima facie at the charge stage.

Kidnapping from lawful guardianship — minor's assent and accused's active role - Applying Anversinh alias Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat, Criminal Appeal No. 1919/2010, decided 12 January 2021, the Court treated a minor's consent as immaterial to the protection of guardianship under Section 361 IPC. The S. Varadarajan exception, as distinguished in Anversinh, requires that the minor be capable of appreciating the act, leave voluntarily and receive no inducement or assistance from the accused. Although X's statements under Sections 161/164 portrayed her as taking the initiative in seeking to marry applicant 1, he arranged her travel and accommodation and applicant 2 transported her without claiming that her guardian had consented; a prima facie kidnapping case remained. The quoted Supreme Court passage addressed Section 366, while the framed provisions were Section 366-A IPC and POCSO Section 11(vi) read with Section 18. The Section 397/401 revision against charges was dismissed on the basis that grave suspicion can justify framing a charge and that the Court must not conduct a mini-trial, without determining guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mohd. Amir Khan and another applicant filed Criminal Revision No. 2843/2021 under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC against the order dated 27 September 2021 passed by the Special Judge (POCSO Act), Mungaoli in Special Sessions Trial No. 39/2021 framing IPC Sections 363 and 366-A and POCSO Section 11(vi) read with Section 18 charges. The complainant husband reported his wife X missing after he stayed away overnight on 25 June 2021. He had initially described her as twenty. A later school record produced on 30 June indicated a birth date of 20 December 2003, making her about seventeen and a half in June 2021. The narrative describes a call from X to applicant 1 on 24 June and her departure around midnight after 25 June, while a later paragraph states that she went missing on 24 June; the Court does not resolve this date discrepancy.

In her accounts recorded under Sections 161 and 164 CrPC, X said she liked applicant 1, remained in contact after her marriage, asked him to take her for marriage and left the house voluntarily while relatives were asleep. Applicant 1 allegedly told her he would send applicant 2 to take her to Sagar and arrange a room before joining her. Applicant 2 took her there; when no accommodation could be arranged, she was directed to Bhopal, where applicant 1 allegedly took her by motorcycle and a room was arranged. She later returned by bus when he did not come and was found by police. She denied physical violation. These are accounts attributed to X's statements, not final findings on the exact conduct. The applicants argued that the husband's first estimate showed she was an adult and that her initiative and preference ruled out kidnapping or enticement and an offence under POCSO. The State opposed revision.

2. Precedents — Considered : The High Court cited Joginder Singh v. State of Haryana, (2014) 11 SCC 335, while addressing how to assess a victim's age, then reproduced Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015. The provision's hierarchy gives preference to available school or matriculation/equivalent documents, followed by a municipal or panchayat birth certificate. Only in the absence of both categories does it permit a medical age test ordered by the Committee or Board, subject to the fifteen-day proviso. The present Court applied this preference for documentary evidence to the school admission register and Headmaster certificate rather than the husband's informal age statement.

Anversinh alias Kiransinh Fatesinh Zala v. State of Gujarat, Criminal Appeal No. 1919/2010, decided 12 January 2021, was quoted and materially applied. The Supreme Court treated the voluntary companionship plea of a girl under eighteen as insufficient against Section 361 IPC because guardians hold the right to make protective decisions and the minor's own assent is legally immaterial. It carefully distinguished S. Varadarajan v. State of Madras: a kidnapping charge would not be made out on a truly unassisted voluntary departure only if the minor knew and was capable of understanding her acts, left voluntarily, and received no inducement or active assistance from the accused. The quoted Anversinh passage also explains enhanced Section 366 IPC punishment upon proof of kidnapping with the intention or knowledge of compelled marriage or illicit intercourse. This High Court used Section 361 and the distinction drawn in Varadarajan to find prima facie active assistance by applicant 1 and transportation by applicant 2. The actual framed provision was Section 366-A, while Section 366 appeared in the quoted authority. S. Varadarajan appeared within the Anversinh extract.

Applicants' counsel cited Satishchandra Ratanlal Shah v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 9 SCC 148, on the requirement to apply a judicial mind and the consequences for liberty when framing charges. The Court responded that roving inquiry and meticulous appreciation of evidence are impermissible and that grave suspicion supported by the material suffices.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 397 and 401 CrPC supplied revisional control over the Special Judge's charge order. Sections 161 and 164 CrPC identify X's investigation and recorded statements, whose trial weight was not determined. Section 94 of the JJ Act, 2015 was quoted and applied in giving preference to documentary evidence of age. IPC Sections 361 and 363 governed the question of taking or enticing a minor and the punishment for the kidnapping charge framed. IPC Section 366-A was charged; Section 366 appeared within the quoted Anversinh passage. POCSO Section 11(vi) read with Section 18 was among the framed provisions. The result is a prima facie charge determination, not final guilt.

4. Issues : Did the husband's FIR estimate of twenty displace the school records establishing prima facie that X was a child in June 2021? Did X's expressed willingness to leave and marry applicant 1 remove the essential taking or enticement when he arranged her relocation and applicant 2 escorted her without claimed guardian consent? Should the charge order be disturbed in revision under the threshold of grave suspicion rather than after a full assessment of credibility? Final proof of age and the applicants' guilt remained for trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first refused to treat an informal FIR age estimate as conclusive in the face of the school admission register and Headmaster's certificate produced. The documented 20 December 2003 birth date placed X below eighteen on the relevant June 2021 departure. It used the sequence for documentary evidence under Section 94 to support that preliminary conclusion.

X's own initiative did not resolve the question under Section 361. On the attributed statements, applicant 1 was in contact and arranged for applicant 2 to take her from the matrimonial home to Sagar, for her further travel and for accommodation in Bhopal; applicant 2 actually escorted her without suggesting that the in-laws or guardian had consented. Anversinh's rule makes a minor's apparent agreement insufficient, while the qualified rule in S. Varadarajan concerns an informed, truly unassisted voluntary departure. The Court found it impossible to say applicant 1 had absolutely no role in enticing her and rejected applicant 2's implied defence based on consent. Those were prima facie findings founded on prosecution material, not a final credibility judgment or a determination that every romantic contact with a minor is kidnapping.

The Court answered counsel's concern about the framing of charges by saying judicial assessment is required but a roving or meticulous merits inquiry is not; grave suspicion that an accused might have committed the offence can justify framing a charge. It found sufficient material to leave the framed IPC and POCSO charges for trial and refused revision.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the revision, leaving the Special Judge's 27 September 2021 order framing IPC Sections 363 and 366-A and POCSO Section 11(vi) read with Section 18 charges in place. No charge was quashed, altered or converted, and no bail or merits acquittal was granted. The underlying trial and all final proof issues remained open.

Mohd. Amir Khan and Ors. v. The State of M.P. and Ors., Cr.R. no. 2843/2021, 10/11/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR delay — matrimonial reconciliation and trial explanation - Applying Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court held that an interval after a wife leaves her matrimonial home does not, without more, make an FIR alleging dowry-related cruelty false or justify quashing under Section 482 where reconciliation may have been attempted. The explanation is for trial testing. Respondent 2 alleged ouster in January 2017 and a renewed demand at her parental home in January 2019; her February 2019 report was not rejected merely for the elapsed time.

Divorce petition — criminal case not extinguished by civil process - Pratibha also held that a husband's prior divorce proceeding and a later FIR do not automatically establish retaliatory abuse; civil and criminal proceedings can coexist on related facts, and divorce may explain why reconciliation ended. The High Court rejected the applicants' inference that the FIR was a counterblast because the divorce petition had been filed in October 2018. It did not adjudicate their factual defence.

Section 498-A IPC / Section 4 Dowry Prohibition Act — specific allegations and relatives - Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, warns against omnibus claims against uninvolved relatives while permitting trial on supported specific cruelty allegations. Its contextual distinctions from Neelu Chopra, Manoj Mahavir Prasad Khaitan and Geeta Mehrotra do not create automatic immunity for family members. The FIR alleged specific shared demands for car, money, gold and a house, abuse, threats of the husband's second marriage, and a January 2019 parental-home ultimatum by the husband and parents-in-law. The Court found allegations requiring trial, not final guilt.

Section 482 CrPC — face-value threshold and disputed defence - XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, and State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, caution against premature merits appraisal; Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, applies the framework in Bhajan Lal requiring sparing exercise of the quashing power; State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, balances abuse prevention and genuine prosecution; M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, states the ground for quashing where the allegations on their face disclose no offence; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, reject detailed findings on disputed defence facts; Taramani adds that the reliability of the version and counter-version must be assessed at trial. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, preserves a narrow exception for a public document or one whose veracity is undisputed. Applying these limits, the Court declined to try Iliyas's disputed alibi: his chart showed 20:00–08:00 duty, leaving the daytime on the date of the alleged visit potentially available for an approximately five-hour round trip. The application for quashing was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mohd. Iliyas, his mother Zahida Behum and his father Sheikh Ikrar sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of the charge-sheet for IPC Section 498-A read with Section 34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The complainant wife alleged all three repeatedly demanded an Innova car, ₹5 lakh, 100 grams of gold and a house in Katni, scolded and assaulted her when she objected, disparaged her complexion and threatened that Iliyas would marry again. She said they sent her to her parental home with her brother on 8 January 2017. At first her parents hoped matters would improve. She alleged all applicants came to her parental home at Dhanpuri on 6 January 2019 and renewed demands for the vehicle, money, house and gold/silver ornaments as a condition of taking her back. An FIR was registered on 21 February 2019. These are attributed allegations, not established acts.

The applicants denied cruelty. Counsel said the delay after departure was unexplained, a divorce petition had been filed by Iliyas on 26 October 2018 before the FIR, and the report was therefore a retaliatory counterblast. Later, counsel offered a duty chart to assert that Iliyas was at work on 6 January 2019 and could not have joined the alleged Dhanpuri visit. The Court decided whether the prosecution should be stopped at the threshold, not whether the charge-sheet would result in conviction.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, 2007:INSC:929, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was directly quoted and applied. The Supreme Court held that a High Court exceeded Section 482 by drawing a negative inference merely from a wife's reporting months after she left the matrimonial home while her family attempted reconciliation; a husband's intervening divorce filing did not itself terminate a criminal prosecution. Civil and criminal proceedings are distinct even if their facts overlap. The High Court should ask whether the complaint or FIR allegations taken at face value disclose a prima facie cognizable offence, not decide the matter from extraneous investigation reports or a contested defence. Here the Court used the analogy to reject the argument that the approximately two-year interval and prior divorce petition were automatic grounds for quashing, while leaving the complainant's actual explanation to cross-examination.

XYZ v. State of Gujarat, 2019:INSC:1199, (2019) 10 SCC 337, was quoted to condemn a Section 482 roving inquiry into disputed allegations and a settlement document allegedly procured by threat before investigation was complete. This Court used its rule requiring restraint at that stage of proceedings against weighing the applicants' denial; the allegations about intimate pictures and coercion in XYZ were not allegations in the present case. State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin and Others, 2018:INSC:284, (2018) 5 SCC 718, supplied the quoted warning against premature High Court assessment during incomplete investigation.

Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, 2011:INSC:655, (2011) 12 SCC 319, was quoted for the categories in Bhajan Lal, the absence of watertight guidelines, and the need for caution and sparing exercise of Section 482 without testing the reliability of FIR allegations or using inherent powers arbitrarily. State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, 2010:INSC:405, (2010) 11 SCC 226, was separately quoted at greater length. It locates credibility and likely conviction at trial while allowing quashing where even the allegations taken in their entirety at face value disclose no offence, a statutory bar exists, or sufficient material shows malicious vengeance. Courts must guard against needless vendetta but cannot use Section 482 to bring a legitimate prosecution to a premature end. The High Court applied the test based on taking the allegations at face value to the stated dowry and cruelty allegations and did not find a clear exception on the applicants' contentions.

Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, was quoted for an important qualification: ordinarily the accused's defence or defence documents are not examined when deciding an application for quashing, but an appropriate public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute may be considered, as recognized in Yin Cheng Hsiung, Bhajan Lal and Harshendra Kumar D. Those three are nested sources of the exception. The present duty chart was neither incontrovertible proof that his presence was physically impossible nor a basis for a trial of alibi; the Court did look at its stated shift before concluding the daytime journey remained possible.

M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, 2019:INSC:1172, (2019) 10 SCC 373, was quoted for the corresponding threshold for quashing: if the FIR or complaint allegations taken at face value, or the uncontroverted allegations with their supporting material, disclose no offence against the accused, quashing is justified. This Court held that this threshold was not met on the claimed demands and cruelty. CBI v. Arvind Khanna, 2019:INSC:1152, (2019) 10 SCC 686, was quoted to condemn Section 482 findings resolving minute disputed details after cognizance; the accused's defence must be tested at trial. State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709 of 2021, order of 30 June 2021, supplied the related prohibition on meticulous scrutiny and the caution that an FIR is not an encyclopedia. These authorities collectively supported refusal to adjudicate the applicants' false-report contention or travel evidence as conclusive.

Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P. and Others, 2015:INSC:221, (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted extensively. Its own paragraph 10 permits quashing for absurd allegations, absence of an offence or abuse but prohibits testing version versus counter-version where a triable case exists; it urges caution over omnibus matrimonial allegations against remote relatives. The judgment reproduced Taramani's long quotation of Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander: judicial caution; whether the record taken as a whole at face value discloses the ingredients of an offence; no conviction-level appraisal; an express statutory bar or a purely civil wrong may justify quashing; parallel civil claims do not alone bar criminal process; and accused external materials are ordinarily outside threshold review. It also reproduces Taramani's application to specific husband/parent harassment allegations and the distinctions it drew on the facts from Neelu Chopra, Manoj Mahavir Prasad Khaitan and Geeta Mehrotra, in which material against relatives was inadequate or the case absurd. The present High Court used those limits to treat allegations against the husband and his parents here as triable, without saying family membership alone makes a person liable or that the earlier cases establish fixed immunity for relatives. Amit Kapoor and the many decisions in its bracketed reference string are nested within the adopted Taramani extract.

In paragraph 18, the Court listed Munshiram, Teeja Devi, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo, Sangeeta Agrawal, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha as adopting a similar view.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC supplied the inherent jurisdiction over the charge-sheet. The Court asked whether the uncontroverted allegations disclosed a cognizable offence and rejected a roving inquiry into the correctness or credibility of the allegations or the defence of alibi; it recognized the established grounds based on failure to disclose an offence on the face of the allegations or exceptional abuse of process explained in its cited cases. IPC Section 498-A/34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the prosecuted provisions; the FIR's attributed demands, verbal humiliation, assault and renewed return condition furnished the preliminary factual basis. The husband's divorce petition was a civil procedural fact used in the counterblast argument.

4. Issues : Did the interval between the January 2017 separation and the February 2019 FIR, with an alleged January 2019 parental-home demand, warrant terminating the prosecution before trial? Did Iliyas's October 2018 divorce filing make the FIR a retaliatory counterblast or foreclose criminal proceedings? Did the specific allegations of dowry demands and cruelty by the husband and parents, taken at face value, make a triable Section 498-A/34 and Dowry Act Section 4 case notwithstanding Taramani's caution about omnibus allegations against relatives? Did Iliyas's night-duty chart establish a conclusive alibi on the record under Section 482? The Court did not determine the final credibility of either spouse, a completed divorce, a definitive travel history, or ultimate guilt.

5. Ratio / Findings : On delay, the Court reasoned that a wife may hope to save her marital relationship rather than report immediately after being sent away. Pratibha made it improper to draw a conclusive adverse inference from such an interval or from a civil divorce proceeding; any explanation offered must be tested by trial cross-examination. It found the nearly two-year interval no bar to continuing proceedings at this stage on this record. The FIR also alleged renewed demands in January 2019. The prior divorce filing did not show malicious retaliation as a necessary inference: the Court instead inferred that its filing marked the end of her hopes of reconciliation. That interpretation supported rejection of this ground for quashing. Civil and criminal processes may coexist.

On the allegations, the Court took at face value the asserted car, money, gold and house demands, humiliating language about appearance, assault, threat of second marriage, January 2017 departure and January 2019 condition for returning. Those were attributed to the three named applicants rather than simply based on their relationship. Taramani demanded care when allegations are omnibus and explained why cases against relatives not shown to be involved can be distinguished from allegations of concrete conduct requiring trial. The Court refused to decide whether the FIR was false, consistent with XYZ, Martin, Ajay Kumar Das, Gourishetty, M. Srikanth, Arvind Khanna and Kunwar Singh. Those authorities also preserve genuine grounds based on failure to disclose an offence on the face of the allegations, patent absurdity, a statutory bar or abuse of process; none was found established merely through the accused's contrary assertions. The order is a refusal to stop trial, not a finding that guilt under Section 498-A or the Dowry Act has been proved.

On alibi, the Court stated that the accused must establish it by cogent evidence beyond reasonable doubt. It treated whether his presence was physically impossible as a disputed question of fact, ordinarily for trial. The duty chart supplied by Iliyas showed a shift from 20:00 to 08:00, leaving the daytime of 6 January free. Accepting the State's approximate 140-km Katni–Dhanpuri distance and roughly two-and-a-half-hour travel each way, the Court considered a round trip possible before the night shift. Even the chart, if read on its terms, did not conclusively exclude his presence. The Court did not treat the contestable schedule and travel inference as a conclusive alibi at the Section 482 stage. The stated burden formulation and time estimate are the High Court's reasoning at the quashing stage; final evidence of actual attendance and the alleged visit remains open.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482, leaving the police charge-sheet under IPC Section 498-A/34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act to proceed. There was no quashing, discharge of any individual accused, costs, or final guilt ruling. The complainant's allegations and the applicants' alibi and other defences remained for trial.

Headnote :- Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC — antecedent forgery / court complaint bar - Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, 2005:INSC:129, (2005) 4 SCC 370, confines the court-complaint requirement for specified document offences to those committed after the document has been produced or given in evidence and while it remains in custodia legis; later filing does not turn an earlier forgery allegation into an offence requiring the court's own written complaint. The applicants did not assert fabrication in court custody. Their objection failed without deciding whether the will or any identified certificate was forged or whether the applicants committed forgery.

Civil and criminal process — forged property document / coexistence - Iqbal Singh Marwah distinguished the proof standards; M. Krishnan v. Vijay Singh, 2001:INSC:499, AIR 2001 SC 3014, rejected quashing a document-forgery complaint merely because a civil suit existed; Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of West Bengal, 2001:INSC:517, AIR 2001 SC 3846, likewise rejected civil pendency as a categorical bar. M.S. Sheriff v. State of Madras, 1954:INSC:32, AIR 1954 SC 397, favoured criminal precedence as a general expedient while disavowing a hard rule and recognising case-specific embarrassment; P. Swaroopa Rani v. M. Hari Narayana, 2008:INSC:299, (2008) 5 SCC 765, allowed simultaneous proceedings and fact-sensitive stay decisions. Applying those principles to the disputed mutation and claimed 1995 will, the Court refused to stop the criminal complaint simply because the controversy also had civil dimensions.

Prior civil findings — relevance and non-conclusiveness in criminal case - Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Administration), 2009:INSC:290, (2009) 5 SCC 528, and Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, 2010:INSC:509, (2010) 8 SCC 775, were applied for independent civil and criminal proof. Their quoted discussion of K.G. Premshanker preserves possible relevance under Evidence Act Sections 40–43 and Section 41's specified conclusiveness; it does not make every civil fact finding binding on the criminal court. Kishan Singh rejected the broad contrary Karam Chand statement and noted V.M. Shah's non-approval in light of the Constitution Bench M.S. Sheriff principle. The High Court rejected any requirement of prior civil adjudication but did not decide the effect of a particular final civil judgment.

Section 482 CrPC — prima facie threshold / no mini-trial - CBI v. Aryan Singh, Criminal Appeal Nos. 1025–1026 of 2023, decided 10 April 2023, was cited for the limited quash inquiry into sufficient material to proceed, not an advance determination that charges are unproved or that the complaint is malicious. Two conflicting death certificates gave 1984 and 1995, respectively, as the alleged testator's year of death, directly affecting the purported will dated 15 May 1995. The revisional remand for more evidence was held justified and had not been timely challenged; the later Magistrate order took cognizance and issued process for IPC Sections 467, 468, 471 read with 120-B. A negative police inquiry and alleged retaliatory cross-cases did not justify a Section 482 merits trial. The petition was dismissed and interim protection vacated; authenticity and guilt remain open.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A private complainant, Mohd. Amir Haseeb, accused Mohd. Iqbal Hafiz Khan and other applicants of cheating, forging and using documents and conspiracy in relation to 32.33 acres in Bhopal recorded in the name of Sarvari Begum. The complaint alleged that the applicants sought mutation on a purported will dated 15 May 1995 and that the will was forged. The judgment initially records her death as 31 August 1984, but later notes two conflicting death certificates: one gives that date, and the other gives 31 October 1995. These dates are the contents of competing documents, not judicial certification of either death date. If the former is genuine, a will executed in 1995 would be impossible; if the latter is genuine, the earlier death certificate could not be authentic. Given the incompatible dates, the High Court stated that at least one death certificate was forged. It did not identify which one, who was responsible, or whether the will itself was forged. The mutation proceeding itself was dismissed for want of prosecution on 7 February 2017.

The complainant initially applied under Section 156(3) CrPC. The Judicial Magistrate First Class did not order registration or investigation under that provision, treated the matter as a Section 200 private complaint, recorded the complainant's and witnesses' statements under Sections 200 and 202, and requested a police inquiry report. The police reported no offence. On 27 July 2018 the Magistrate dismissed the complaint. The complainant's Revision No. 442 of 2018 succeeded on 11 April 2019 before the 20th Additional Sessions Judge, Bhopal, who set aside the dismissal and remanded with an opportunity to adduce further oral and documentary evidence. The applicants did not challenge that remand at the proper time. On 1 August 2019 the Magistrate directed registration of the complaint, took cognizance and issued process for IPC Sections 467, 468 and 471 read with Section 120-B. The applicants then invoked Section 482 CrPC to challenge both the revisional and later Magistrate orders and to quash the complaint proceedings.

Their counsel submitted that Section 195 CrPC required a written complaint by the court because the supposedly forged document had been filed in court; the police had already examined the matter and found no crime; the property dispute was essentially civil; and the private complaint was a counterblast to an FIR alleging offences under IPC Sections 294, 327 and 506 and another Section 156(3) application alleging those and other offences against the present complainant. These were submissions, not findings on either set of cross-allegations.

2. Precedents — Considered : Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, 2005:INSC:129, (2005) 4 SCC 370, was the direct authority for Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC. The Supreme Court's temporal and custody distinction means that the enumerated document offence attracts the exclusive written court-complaint route when committed in respect of a document after its actual production or giving in evidence in a court proceeding, while it is in custodia legis. An alleged forgery committed before production may therefore be pursued through a private complaint even if the document is subsequently filed in court. The High Court expressly adopted and applied that distinction: there was no applicant assertion of forgery during court custody, so the claimed Section 195 obstacle failed. It also invoked Iqbal Singh Marwah for the separate proposition that civil and criminal standards of proof differ and one forum's findings are not simply final and binding in the other. The High Court did not treat the rule in Iqbal Singh Marwah as determining whether the disputed documents were in fact forged.

M.S. Sheriff v. State of Madras, 1954:INSC:32, AIR 1954 SC 397, was quoted for the general view that criminal proceedings should ordinarily receive precedence over civil proceedings because delayed prosecution risks faded memory and because conflicting decisions alone are not a proper reason to stop it. The very quoted passage disclaims a hard-and-fast rule: special circumstances and the likelihood of embarrassment may make a different sequencing just, including a civil matter or another criminal proceeding near completion. The High Court relied on this qualified coexistence principle rather than ordering a stay in either forum. M. Krishnan v. Vijay Singh, 2001:INSC:499, AIR 2001 SC 3014, was quoted extensively. In an alleged forgery/document-based acquisition case, that Supreme Court decision rejected a rule that pending civil litigation must first determine document genuineness before any criminal action. The criminal accusation must be independently proved; failure of proof permits discharge or acquittal at the proper stage, not automatic quashing on the basis of a civil suit. It contrasted proof beyond reasonable doubt in criminal proceedings with the preponderance of probabilities in civil proceedings and warned that an automatic bar based on a pending civil suit could encourage strategic litigation. The High Court applied this rule to the applicants' property-dispute defence without treating every civil disagreement as criminal.

Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of West Bengal, 2001:INSC:517, AIR 2001 SC 3846, was expressly cited for the procedural separation: a pending civil action, even before a court of higher status, does not by itself require quashing a criminal matter governed by CrPC. P. Swaroopa Rani v. M. Hari Narayana, 2008:INSC:299, (2008) 5 SCC 765, was quoted for simultaneous civil and criminal proceedings and a stay choice depending on the facts and stages. Its embedded references to M.S. Sheriff and Iqbal Singh Marwah supported that stated rule. The Court relied on those authorities to reject the contention that the dispute's civil character barred criminal proceedings. Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Administration), 2009:INSC:290, (2009) 5 SCC 528, was quoted on the separate question of civil judgments' effect. It explains that criminal cognizance requires prima facie satisfaction, that a stay depends on the nature and stage of the particular proceedings, and that a civil suit must be decided on its own evidence. Its reproduced K.G. Premshanker

v. Inspector of Police analysis says a prior final judgment may be relevant under Evidence Act Sections 40–43, with Section 41 conclusive where its conditions are met; res judicata may operate in civil litigation and Section 300 CrPC limits a second criminal trial after acquittal or conviction where applicable. Relevance and its extent require a case-specific inquiry rather than a global binding rule. The High Court used the non-automatic-binding principle.

Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, 2010:INSC:509, (2010) 8 SCC 775, was reproduced at length and treated as crystallising the relationship. It explains that the broad proposition in Karam Chand Ganga Prasad, that civil findings bind criminal courts, failed to account for the Constitution Bench's ruling in M.S. Sheriff; V.M. Shah's claimed civil precedence was doubted and not approved in K.G. Premshanker. It quoted the Privy Council's King Emperor v. Khwaja Nazir Ahmad for independent criminal appraisal and referred to P. Swaroopa Rani and Iqbal Singh Marwah for coexistence and distinct standards. The concluding rule is that factual findings in one proceeding ordinarily do not bind the other, while Evidence Act Sections 41–43 may make a particular earlier judgment relevant. The High Court adopted this qualified rule. Karam Chand, V.M. Shah, K.G. Premshanker, Vishnu Dutt Sharma and the Privy Council reference appeared within the reproduced Supreme Court analysis.

CBI v. Aryan Singh, Criminal Appeal Nos. 1025–1026 of 2023, decided 10 April 2023, was directly invoked in paragraph 27 for Section 482 restraint. The High Court described the Supreme Court rule as forbidding a mini-trial of whether charges are proved and focusing at this stage on prima facie material sufficient to require trial. It stated that alleged malice should be assessed at the conclusion of the trial, rather than through the weighing of competing factual accounts at the Section 482 stage. Applied here, the contradictory certificates and claimed will could not be resolved in favour of the applicants by preferring the negative police inquiry or retaliatory explanation in inherent jurisdiction.

3. Statutes considered : Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC was the substantive statutory bar argued: for its enumerated document offences committed in relation to a document in court custody, cognizance requires the concerned court's written complaint. The Court construed the time of the alleged offence, not mere later filing of a purportedly forged document, as decisive under Iqbal Singh Marwah. Section 482 CrPC supplied the applicants' inherent-jurisdiction route to challenge the revisional and Magistrate orders and the complaint; its limited preliminary inquiry excluded a trial of disputed authenticity or alleged retaliatory motive. Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC explain the initial police-investigation request, conversion to complaint, recording of statements and pre-process inquiry.

IPC Sections 467, 468 and 471 read with Section 120-B were the offences for which the Magistrate issued process, concerning alleged forgery, forgery for cheating, use of forged document and conspiracy. Section 420 and Section 34 also appeared in the original complaint, but the order describes the 1 August 2019 process under the narrower set and does not decide Section 420 or 34 liability. The separate cross-case sections were mentioned only as a retaliation submission. Evidence Act Sections 40–43, especially Section 41, arose through the quoted Supreme Court analysis of the relevance and sometimes conclusiveness of prior judgments. Section 300 CrPC appeared in the nested K.G. Premshanker passage about second criminal trial, not as a live double-jeopardy issue.

4. Issues : First, whether Section 195(1)(b)(ii) barred the private forgery complaint merely because the allegedly forged document was later presented to a court, when no fabrication after its entry into court custody was alleged. Second, whether the property mutation/civil character of the dispute, civil proceedings or possible civil findings compelled quashing or prior civil adjudication of document authenticity; and, distinctly, what relevance a prior judgment could have under the Evidence Act rather than categorical binding effect. Third, whether the revisional remand following a negative police inquiry was erroneous when two death certificates gave incompatible dates material to a 1995 will; and whether the applicants' belated challenge to the remand and the subsequent process warranted interference under Section 482 CrPC. Fourth, whether the complaint's alleged counterblast character, negative inquiry report and competing documents meant the forgery charges were unproved at the threshold, or only presented triable questions. The Court did not decide title, the genuine date of death, the will's authenticity, each applicant's participation or final guilt.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first observed that the applicants did not allege the document had been forged in custodia legis. Under Iqbal Singh Marwah, Section 195(1)(b)(ii) ordinarily applies when the specified offence is committed after a document is produced or given in evidence while in court custody. Where forgery was alleged to have occurred before the document entered court custody, its subsequent filing did not require a written complaint by that court. This rejected a cognizance bar only; the prosecution still had to prove the alleged offence.

For the revisional order, the Court compared the two dates on the certificates with the purported will's 15 May 1995 date. The Court concluded that at least one of the mutually inconsistent death certificates was forged. If Sarvari Begum died in August 1984 she could not have made a May 1995 will; if she died in October 1995, the 1984 certificate would be forged. This created a material unresolved issue, and the revisional court did not err in setting aside the earlier dismissal and offering the complainant more verbal and documentary evidence after the Magistrate's negative police inquiry. The applicants had not attacked that remand at the appropriate time. The High Court did not identify which certificate was forged or infer who prepared or used it from that contradiction alone.

The Court next rejected the notion that a mutation/civil dispute or civil suit automatically excludes prosecution for alleged fabrication. M. Krishnan and Kamaladevi Agarwal expressly disallow treating civil pendency as a quashing bar, Iqbal Singh Marwah preserves different proof standards, M.S. Sheriff prefers prompt criminal justice without a mandatory precedence rule, and P. Swaroopa Rani makes simultaneous proceedings and any stay dependent on circumstances. Civil cases are decided on the preponderance of probabilities; criminal cases require proof beyond reasonable doubt. Each forum decides on the evidence adduced before it. The Supreme Court material quoted in Syed Askari and Kishan Singh further prevents importing civil findings as final criminal determinations merely because property and parties overlap, while allowing statutory relevance under Evidence Act Sections 40–43 where a specific prior judgment meets their conditions. No particular final civil ruling or stay application was decided here.

Lastly the Court invoked CBI v. Aryan Singh's limited Section 482 test. The complaint and contradictory documentary dates supplied enough prima facie material to continue the process under Sections 467, 468 and 471 read with 120-B. The applicants' reliance on the police inquiry report, other cross-proceedings and claims of fabrication or retaliatory motive called for evaluation of conflicting evidence, not a declaration that charges had failed before trial. The Court therefore found no ground for interference under Section 482 CrPC. The order's threshold findings do not resolve the authenticity of the will or either certificate, the accused persons' intent, conspiracy, or eventual offence proof.

6. Relief : The High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The order vacated the interim order of 28 August 2019. The 11 April 2019 revisional remand and 1 August 2019 Magistrate cognizance/process order were not set aside, so the private complaint under IPC Sections 467, 468 and 471 read with 120-B could proceed. No civil suit was adjudicated or stayed, no applicant was convicted, and the judgment gave no further substantive directions or costs order.

Headnote :- Article 226 — police inaction / alternative remedy and exception - Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, 2007:INSC:760, (2007) 6 SCC 171, distinguishes the Section 154 CrPC duty to register cognizable information from the remedy when police default; the informant can invoke Sections 190 and 200 before a Magistrate. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, 2008:INSC:341, (2008) 3 SCC 542, ordinarily directs complainants to the Magistrate while preserving rare Article 226 intervention where mala fide investigative action, clear abuse of power and Chapter XII non-compliance are established; even then, courts cannot dictate the method of investigation. The Madhya Pradesh Division Bench Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. 247/2016, permits denial of mandamus for bypassing Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 unless a Whirlpool alternative-remedy exception applies, and distinguishes Lalita Kumari's police duty from writ maintainability. The Court identified no exceptional circumstances on the petition's stated account of police inaction. The writ was dismissed without deciding whether the underlying information disclosed an offence.

Magistrate — complaint and Section 156(3) remedy - Aleque Padamsee and Divine Retreat identify the complaint procedure under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. After examining the complainant, the Magistrate may order investigation, issue process or dismiss the complaint under Section 203, as the record warrants. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., 2007:INSC:1243, (2008) 2 SCC 409, adds a written Section 154(3) approach to the Superintendent of Police and a Section 156(3) application; on prima facie satisfaction the Magistrate may require FIR registration, proper investigation and monitoring. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, follows that alternative route, including a possible recommendation about investigating officer, but the Magistrate cannot personally investigate. The High Court expressly reserved Sohil's liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC / Section 223 BNSS, 2023; it did not adjudicate or grant relief under the other routes on these facts.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mohd. Sohil filed an Article 226 petition stating that he had approached police for registration of an FIR but received no action. The relief clause asked the High Court to direct the concerned authorities to decide his representation (Annexure P-02), order an investigation, and grant any appropriate further order. The order does not describe the alleged incident, proposed accused, date or text of the representation, particulars of the information given to police, or any written approach to the Superintendent of Police or Magistrate. These omissions limit any inference about the alleged offence, not the procedural question the Court chose to decide. State counsel contended that a direct FIR writ was not maintainable because Sohil had a Magistrate complaint remedy under Section 200 CrPC / Section 223 BNSS, 2023. The Court considered the writ and framed the issue as whether it should direct the police to register an FIR when the petitioner says no action followed his approach.

The order decides Sohil's petition on its stated facts and does not make a separate factual finding or award relief in W.P. No. 25169/2024.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, 2007:INSC:760, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted at length. Its Supreme Court passage accepts a statutory duty to register an FIR when police receive information disclosing a cognizable offence, but distinguishes the appropriate remedy for a police default. For police inaction, it identifies a complaint to the Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200 CrPC as the ordinary remedy instead of a writ commanding FIR registration. Aleque explains that Ramesh Kumari v. State (NCT of Delhi) concerns the police's duty upon cognizable information, whereas All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh and Minu Kumari address the complainant's procedural remedy. It also mentions Lallan Chaudhary as reiterating the duty; those cases are nested within Aleque's reconciliation and were not separately fact-analysed by this High Court. The direction concerning a government sanction request in Aleque belonged to that case's separate facts; it was not a direction made in Sohil's petition. The High Court adopted its remedial distinction, not a finding about Sohil's unidentified alleged offence.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, 2008:INSC:341, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for a qualified jurisdictional rule. It retains Article 226 power in rare cases where a clear mala fide exercise or abuse of investigative power and Chapter XII non-compliance justifies intervention at an aggrieved person's instance, while forbidding judicial prescription of how police should conduct the investigation; a court may insist on the Code's process. The following quoted paragraph places ordinary police inaction within the Sections 190 and 200 complaint remedy rather than routine writ jurisdiction. Through its quotation of Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, it describes the Magistrate's options on a complaint: examine, seek investigation where appropriate, dismiss under Section 203 if no offence emerges, or issue process on prima facie material. The High Court applied the usual remedy here; it did not find rare mala fide investigation on the sparse petition.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., 2007:INSC:1243, (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted to set out an additional statutory sequence. A person alleging failure to register under Section 154 may send a written application to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3); if registration or adequate investigation remains wanting, the person may seek a Section 156(3) order from the Magistrate. On such an application, the Magistrate may direct FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor compliance. This route is contingent on the Magistrate's lawful exercise of jurisdiction, not a command by this High Court that Sohil's FIR be registered. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant

Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, was quoted as applying Sakiri Vasu and explaining why routine FIR/investigation writs should be routed to Magistrates. It describes the Magistrate's prima facie satisfaction, ability to monitor investigation and, if necessary, recommend a different investigating officer; the Magistrate does not personally investigate. The passage's setting aside of a different High Court judgment and directions in that case were not orders made for Sohil.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., Writ Appeal No. 247 of 2016, decided 20 December 2016 (Gwalior Bench), was the local Division Bench rule adopted by the single Judge. It says mandamus to enforce Section 154 duty may be declined for non-use of Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 unless one of the four exceptions identified in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks applies. It separately states that Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P. addresses FIR-registration duty, not the entitlement to bypass alternative remedies and demand a writ. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari were mentioned within this quoted Division Bench formulation; the order did not independently examine which specific Whirlpool exception Sohil pleaded or perform a new statutory registration analysis under Lalita Kumari. The High Court relied on that distinction when dismissing the writ and preserving the Magistrate complaint remedy.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution was the jurisdiction invoked for mandamus. The Court treated alternative criminal-procedure remedies as the ordinary route, while the Divine Retreat and Shweta passages preserve exceptional writ intervention on appropriate facts; it did not hold that Article 226 jurisdiction is unavailable in every FIR-registration dispute. Section 154 CrPC provides the police-registration duty when cognizable information is received; subsection (3) permits the written supervisory approach described in Sakiri Vasu. Section 156(3) gives the Magistrate the power described in the quoted authorities to direct and monitor proper investigation on prima facie satisfaction. Sections 190 and 200 supply the Magistrate complaint and cognizance route that the Court expressly left open; Section 203's dismissal option and the issuance of process were explained by Gangadhar as quoted in Divine Retreat. These provisions were discussed as remedies and judicial options, not applied to decide the unspecified underlying offence.

The State's submission and final order expressly pair Section 200 CrPC with Section 223 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023. The judgment does not analyse their temporal application, any transitional saving, or the content of Section 223's provisos, so the pairing is recorded as the Court stated it without importing an unconsidered BNSS issue. No particular IPC/BNS offence or special statute was identified in the order.

4. Issues : Whether Sohil's assertion that police did not register an FIR justified an Article 226 mandamus to decide his representation, compel registration or command investigation despite alternative remedies; how the police's Section 154 duty differs from the informant's remedial forum; which Magistrate complaint or Section 156(3) avenues the cited Supreme Court authorities identify; and whether any exceptional ground for writ intervention was shown. The Court did not determine whether the undisclosed underlying facts constitute a cognizable offence, whether the police deliberately refused a legally sufficient complaint, or whether a Magistrate would eventually direct registration.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court treated maintainability of a direct writ for FIR registration as the central question. Aleque Padamsee established that the police's duty to register cognizable information is distinct from the route an informant should use when registration fails. Divine Retreat emphasized complaint under Sections 190/200 for simple inaction and preserved exceptional Article 226 power when a clear mala fide or abuse of investigative power is shown, while limiting judicial control of investigative technique. On Sohil's stated failure of police action alone, the Court did not identify such exceptional facts and declined writ intervention; it made no determination of the allegation's truth or legal classification.

Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe supplied the other remedial sequence: supervisory approach under Section 154(3) and, if necessary, Section 156(3) Magistrate consideration on prima facie material, including direction and monitoring of investigation. The nested Gangadhar discussion supplied the Sections 190/200 complaint process and the Magistrate's alternative outcomes. The Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria explained the alternative-remedy rule and its Whirlpool exceptions, while distinguishing Lalita Kumari's separate holding on the police duty to register an FIR. That authority supported dismissal of the direct writ without a categorical abolition of High Court jurisdiction. The Court's ultimate liberty specifically named Section 200 CrPC / Section 223 BNSS; no police-registration, representation-decision or investigation direction was granted.

6. Relief : The High Court dismissed the petition but expressly reserved Sohil's liberty, if he wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC / Section 223 BNSS, 2023 for redress. The Court did not compel respondents to decide Annexure P-02, register an FIR or investigate; it did not order a Section 156(3) application for him, impose a deadline, determine the suspected offence, or award costs.

Mohd. Sohil v. The State of MP and Ors., W.P. no. 25140/2024, 17/09/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Social-media group / administrator participation and public-order FIR - A minor member allegedly posted a 33-second false mosque-demolition video on a WhatsApp group with 127 members and urged it be made viral. The applicants, who described themselves as administrators and group office-bearers, admitted the video was fake but denied vicarious liability, asserted that a group IT head immediately corrected it, and said admins then lacked another member's deletion facility. The Court recorded no demonstrated message by the applicants themselves rebutting or opposing the false video. The State separately questioned whether the incomplete WhatsApp record established that the uploader had promptly deleted the post. The Court treated the applicants' possible shared object with the uploader as a matter for investigation, drawing an inference only for FIR registration. That inference remained preliminary; the Court did not hold that administrator status or silence alone conclusively proved criminal intent, common object or any religion-related offence.

Section 482 CrPC — ongoing investigation / exceptional early quashing - Vinod Raghuvanshi v. Ajay Arora, 2013:INSC:647, (2013) 10 SCC 581, cautions against stifling evidence collection midstream; Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, ordinarily reserves interference when a cognizable offence is disclosed, with exceptional malicious or vexatious prosecution. State of Telangana v. Managipet, 2019:INSC:1333, (2019) 19 SCC 87, holds that lack of preliminary inquiry does not itself vitiate a facially cognizable FIR and invokes Bhajan Lal's no-offence/mala-fide exceptions. State of T.N. v. S. Martin, 2018:INSC:284, (2018) 5 SCC 718, disallows premature assessment of a disputed explanation before investigation ends. State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, 2012:INSC:139, (2012) 4 SCC 547, tempers wide inherent power with restraint absent gross investigative abuse or facial absence. Counsel could not say whether a charge-sheet had been filed. The Court therefore assumed that investigation was pending, confined its review to the FIR allegations and dismissed the Section 482 application.

Quashing test — face-value ingredients / no mini-trial - Jitul Jentilal Kotecha v. State of Gujarat, 2021:INSC:718, (2022) 13 SCC 652, quotes Mahendra K.C. for assessing allegations as they stand, without a trial judge's credibility exercise. State v. M. Maridoss, (2023) 4 SCC 338, condemns an early mini-trial and reproduces Neeharika Infrastructure's balance: investigation normally proceeds; an FIR is not a complete evidence book; but facial absence of any offence and exceptional abuse remain valid quash grounds, within the R.P. Kapur/Bhajan Lal framework. The High Court applied those limits to the applicants' concession that the upload was false and the competing accounts concerning rebuttal and administrator participation. The Court did not decide who uploaded or endorsed it, whether a corrective message existed, or guilt on any specified section.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Moh. Shahid Ansari and other applicants invoked Section 482 CrPC in relation to an FIR arising from a 2020 video in the M-RSS Ghoghar (Rewa) WhatsApp group. The prayers sought quashing of the FIR and consequential proceedings, restraint against harassment, return of seized mobile phones and SIM cards, compensation, costs and other consequential relief. The judgment's later reasoning deals with the requested interference at the FIR/investigation stage; it does not make separate merits findings about the alleged seizures or compensation. Applicant 1 said he was convenor of an unregistered Muslim Rashtriya Swayam Sevak Sangh group, applicant 2 its joint convenor, and they were WhatsApp administrators with six others in a group of 127 members. Counsel said a 17-year-old member uploaded a 33-second video falsely claiming that a mosque in Allahabad, connected with a long-pending case, had been demolished by the Modi Government and urging the video to go viral. The FIR alleged the false and objectionable content intended to disturb harmony, promote religious enmity and insult religious feeling. These are FIR allegations, not proved offence elements.

The applicants acknowledged that the video was fake, but submitted that an IT-cell head named Shahid immediately posted a correction calling it fake and asking for deletion; administrators at that time allegedly lacked the technical ability to delete another member's upload. They argued that administration alone creates no vicarious liability and cited the Bombay High Court's Kishor v. State of Maharashtra and Delhi High Court's Ashish Bhalla v. Suresh Chawdhary. The State submitted that the applicants had not filed the complete WhatsApp messages to show that the uploader had promptly deleted the video. It urged the Court not to prevent investigation into the group's activities and membership. The State also noted unregistered status and minors' membership; those features did not become independently proved criminal elements in the Court's analysis. Counsel for the applicants could not tell the Court the investigation's status or whether a charge-sheet had been filed. The Court therefore stated that it would decide on FIR allegations on the assumption investigation remained pending.

2. Precedents — Considered : Vinod Raghuvanshi v. Ajay Arora, 2013:INSC:647, (2013) 10 SCC 581, was cited for the direct caution that an incomplete investigation should not be stifled before police collect evidence. The High Court relied on that caution to leave the administrators' possible participation for investigation rather than treat their alleged roles as proved. Teeja Devi alias Triza Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, was quoted for ordinary non-interference under Section 482 where FIR allegations prima facie disclose a cognizable offence, subject to rare circumstances in which a court is satisfied that prosecution is malicious and vexatious. The Court did not find that exceptional condition proved by admin-status and correction assertions alone.

State of Telangana v. Managipet, 2019:INSC:1333, (2019) 19 SCC 87, was quoted from a disproportionate-assets FIR setting. It says a preliminary inquiry may screen frivolous or motivated complaints, but is not a universal precondition once credible information prima facie discloses a cognizable offence. An FIR is not quashed merely for no such inquiry; complete face-value reading may still reveal no offence. The extract refers to State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal for facial absence of offence and manifestly malicious vengeance grounds. The High Court relied on the FIR-stage threshold and its exceptions, not on the corruption-specific facts of Managipet, when considering the video allegation. No missing preliminary inquiry in this case was independently established. State of T.N. v. S. Martin, 2018:INSC:284, (2018) 5 SCC 718, was quoted for rejection of a premature High Court assessment in its own cash-recovery and sale-agreement case; a disputed explanation should be tested at the appropriate later stage and investigation completed. The different cash facts were illustrative of the stage limit, not facts in this WhatsApp matter.

State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, 2012:INSC:139, (2012) 4 SCC 547, was quoted more fully. It treats Section 482 as broad but not arbitrary; early intervention is sparing, especially where facial allegations disclose an offence and no gross investigative abuse is shown. Its nested quotation of State of W.B. v. Swapan Kumar Guha explains the need to collect evidence once an offence is disclosed and makes disclosure fact-dependent. Its nested Jeffrey J. Diermeier passage identifies the Section 482 ends-of-justice, abuse-prevention and Code-order purposes and cautions against whim. The High Court applied the restraint against premature interference without excluding the recognised grounds of an FIR disclosing no offence or an exceptional abuse of process. It did not determine the facts of the authorities quoted within Ujjal Kumar Burdhan.

Jitul Jentilal Kotecha v. State of Gujarat, 2021:INSC:718, (2022) 13 SCC 652, was directly quoted for its reproduction of Mahendra K.C. v. State of Karnataka: the High Court takes complaint allegations as pleaded, neither adding nor subtracting facts, to see if offence ingredients are prima facie present, and does not assess veracity or conduct a trial based on later evidence. Mahendra K.C. is the nested source of this test. State v. M. Maridoss, (2023) 4 SCC 338, was quoted because the Supreme Court overturned quashing conducted as a mini-trial. Its lengthy reproduced Neeharika Infrastructure v. State of Maharashtra paragraph 13 outlines the police's statutory right and duty to investigate cognizable offences; rare, circumspect quashing; non-interference in credibility testing during ongoing investigation; incompleteness of an FIR as an evidence narrative; and continued jurisdiction to stop an FIR disclosing no offence or falling within recognised R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal exceptions. The phrase 'rarest of rare' in that discussion is expressly separate from the capital-sentencing standard. The High Court relied on that distinction to avoid deciding at the investigation stage the disputed correction, the alleged inability to delete another member's post and whether the applicants shared the uploader's common object. Neeharika, R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal were quoted within M. Maridoss; the present order did not conduct a separate fact analysis of their original cases.

Kishor v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Application (APL) 573/2016, decided 1 March 2021 (Bombay High Court), and Ashish Bhalla v. Suresh Chawdhary, CS(OS) 188/2016, decided 29 November 2016 (Delhi High Court), were cited by applicants' counsel for non-vicarious administrator liability. The deciding Judge recorded these submissions but did not quote, analyse or expressly distinguish their reasoning. They therefore cannot be presented as judicially adopted holdings of this order; the Court instead focused on a possible shared object from the unrebutted false message at the preliminary stage. The parties' dispute over whether the IT-cell message existed remained unresolved.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the applicants' quash route. The Court applied the face-value FIR and investigation-restraint limits, while the quoted Supreme Court cases recognise exceptional facial-absence, malicious-prosecution and abuse routes. The FIR's alleged promotion of religious enmity, harm to harmony and deliberate insult to religious feeling supplied the asserted criminal character. The order does not specify an IPC provision number for those allegations, charge-sheet sections, or the exact legal source for 'common object'; the judgment does not establish a more specific adjudicated charge. It likewise does not apply a WhatsApp or intermediary-liability statutory provision or decide whether administrator status creates a statutory vicarious offence. The Court applied Section 482 CrPC and the principles limiting interference with investigation of an FIR prima facie disclosing a cognizable offence. It did not undertake a BNS or BNSS transition analysis.

4. Issues : Whether the FIR could be stopped under Section 482 before its investigation or charge-sheet status was established; whether applicants' status as administrators and group office-bearers, a conceded false religiously charged video and absence of a demonstrated rebuttal permitted police investigation into shared object; whether counsel's assertion that an administrator posted a prompt correction and lacked member-post deletion tools could be accepted as conclusive defence at the FIR stage; and whether the material showed a facial no-offence or exceptional malicious-abuse ground for quashing. The Court did not decide the real uploader's criminal liability, the exact charge sections, a later charge-sheet's contents, the authenticity of all group messages, the technical deletion feature, or guilt of individual administrators.

5. Ratio / Findings : Because applicants' counsel could not identify whether a charge-sheet existed, the Court expressly proceeded on an assumption that investigation remained pending. It noted that the applicants themselves did not claim the uploaded video was true. Against the FIR allegation of a fake mosque-demolition clip urging circulation, it identified the administrator defence as the live question. Counsel asserted an IT-cell correction and inability to remove another's post; the State said the complete group record was missing. Paragraph 17 records the Court's contrary view that the applicants had not shown a message rebutting or opposing the fake video in the group. For the limited purpose of FIR registration, it inferred possible sharing of the uploader's common object by the applicants, leaving the actual existence of that object to the investigating agency. The Court said whether they actually shared it was for the investigating agency to ascertain. This remains a narrow, contested preliminary inference, not a settled rule that WhatsApp administrators are automatically vicariously liable for member content or that a failure to rebut conclusively establishes intent.

The Supreme Court authorities supplied the procedural consequence. Vinod Raghuvanshi and Teeja Devi cautioned against interrupting the statutory police task where cognizable allegations are facially present. Managipet did not make an independent preliminary inquiry mandatory, and S. Martin forbade accepting a disputed explanation as a conclusive ground to end investigation. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan preserved exceptional intervention while rejecting arbitrary, premature fact appraisal. Jitul Kotecha's Mahendra K.C. extract and M. Maridoss's Neeharika extract defined the face-value test, including the reciprocal ability to quash when the FIR itself reveals no offence or a clear exceptional abuse. Applying those limits, the Court did not resolve which admin knew of or endorsed the upload, whether the corrective message existed, or whether any later evidence would support offence ingredients. It found no present ground for Section 482 interference.

6. Relief : The High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The FIR and investigation were not quashed or restrained. The Court did not separately grant the prayer's consequential requests concerning harassment, seized mobile devices or SIM cards, compensation or costs. It did not find any applicant guilty or direct a charge-sheet. Its holding was limited to refusal of early inherent interference on the allegations and record described.

Moh. Shahid Ansari and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 44348/2020, 15/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Bail / dignity — slum residence and sex-work inference - At the hearing of the first regular-bail application under Section 439 CrPC, concerning allegations under Sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act and Section 370-A IPC, counsel invoked Budhadev Karmaskar v. State of West Bengal, Criminal Appeal No. 135/2010, order of 19 May 2022, for the Supreme Court's direction to formulate a rehabilitation policy for sex workers. Counsel asked the Court to presume compulsion from the applicant's slum address in Delhi. The Court rejected a categorical inference that a woman living in a slum enters sex work under compulsion. It declined to generalise about women's dignity, chastity or reasons for entering sex work on the basis of residence. On the contested travel and hotel-record material, the Court expressed only a prima facie bail-stage inference that participation might have been for 'pleasure' rather than under compulsion.

Section 149 IPC — conditional common object / unresolved charge - Counsel submitted that neither Section 34 nor Section 149 IPC had been invoked and that the applicant therefore could not incur liability under Section 370-A IPC for another person's conduct. The Court responded conditionally: if the applicant were proved to be a consenting participant in the alleged sex trade and to share a common object with the hotel owner, constructive liability under Section 149 IPC might arise. It expressly acknowledged ongoing investigation and uncertainty whether Sections 147–149 would be in any eventual charge-sheet. The Court did not determine whether an unlawful assembly of at least five persons had been proved, decide the other elements of Sections 149 and 370-A IPC, or make any final finding of guilt. The Court considered the case diary, disputed hotel entries and check-in account, the State's objections to the diabetes documents, and earlier refusals of bail to two co-accused. With the investigation continuing, it declined first bail. Pregnancy was asserted but did not lead to a separate statutory determination.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Moni sought first regular bail under Section 439 CrPC following arrest on 17 October 2022 in Crime No. 487/2022, Police Station Subhashpura, District Shivpuri, for Sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act and IPC Section 370-A. The prosecution alleged she was found in Hotel Mayur in Gwalior in circumstances connected with prostitution. Counsel maintained that she had travelled from Delhi for tourism and occupied room 215. Alternatively, he urged sympathetic consideration on the ground that, even if she had engaged in sex work, poverty had compelled her to do so to earn her livelihood. Counsel described a Delhi slum address, cash payment without receipt, pregnancy of three months and diabetes, and said the husband was present in court. He could not identify a hotel-register entry or exact arrival date. Those were competing submissions and asserted circumstances, not established facts.

The State opposed bail, arguing that the documents showed only the applicant's assertion that she was taking antidiabetic medicines, rather than a medical diagnosis. It also submitted that the recorded sugar readings did not indicate diabetes. It said she was from Delhi, shared a room with five women from different regions, and hotel records produced by a co-accused in M.Cr.C. 50567/2022 contained no information about her stay. Counsel's tourism and extreme-poverty accounts were challenged as inconsistent. In reply he conceded he could not specify when she reached Gwalior. Because the applicant had travelled before 17 October, the Court asked whether her husband had lodged a missing-person report in Delhi. Counsel answered that none had been lodged. From that answer, the Court inferred that her family knew of her alleged involvement in sex work. That was a bail-stage inference, not a finding reached after evidence was tested at trial. Earlier bail applications M.Cr.C. 50567/2022 and 53558/2022 of two co-accused, one the hotel owner's grandson, had been dismissed. The case diary was before the Court and investigation continued.

2. Precedents — Considered : Budhadev Karmaskar v. State of West Bengal and others, Criminal Appeal No. 135 of 2010, order dated 19 May 2022, was invoked by applicant's counsel for the Supreme Court's direction to formulate a policy for rehabilitation of sex workers. The High Court referred to that authority while considering whether Moni's alleged involvement was voluntary or compelled. The Court rejected counsel's proposed categorical inference and considered the hotel, travel and health submissions when deciding bail. It did not determine the applicant's criminal liability by applying that authority.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed the first regular-bail application. The Court considered the case diary and surrounding circumstances in determining bail, not guilt after trial. Sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act and Section 370-A IPC were registered allegations. The Court did not determine whether the ingredients of any registered offence were established. IPC Sections 34 and 149 were raised by counsel because they were absent from the currently registered offences; the Court discussed potential Section 149 constructive liability only if shared common object and underlying participation were later proved. It acknowledged the investigation had not ended and did not know whether IPC Sections 147, 148 and 149 would be charged. The Court made no finding that the requisite five-person unlawful assembly or the other statutory conditions for constructive liability had been proved.

4. Issues : Whether the case diary and competing accounts about hotel stay, travel, livelihood, health and pregnancy justified first regular bail; whether the applicant's slum address justified presuming that any participation in sex work was compelled rather than voluntary; and whether the omission of Sections 34 and 149 IPC from the registered allegations foreclosed a possible common-object basis of liability in relation to the offences under consideration. The Court did not finally determine consent, trafficking or proof of the registered offences. It also did not decide whether the asserted pregnancy or diabetes conferred an entitlement to bail, or whether investigators would add a common-object charge.

5. Ratio / Findings : Responding to counsel's Budhadev-based argument, the Court rejected an automatic connection between living in a slum and being compelled into sex work, expressly warning against general statements about women's dignity and chastity based on residence. It recognised that poverty might explain an individual's participation, but would not support a general presumption based on slum residence. Considering travel between cities and a hotel stay without a corresponding register entry, the Court expressed a prima facie view that participation might be for 'pleasure' rather than under compulsion. This was an inference for the bail application, not a final finding on consent or guilt.

On the particular record, counsel could not point to a register entry, receipt or arrival date; the State challenged the asserted diabetic diagnosis; and the Court asked whether her husband had lodged a missing-person report. From the absence of a missing-person report, the Court inferred family awareness; it made no trial determination of that fact. The Court rejected the contention that the omission of Sections 34 and 149 IPC from the registered offences necessarily excluded constructive liability. It stated conditionally that proof of consenting participation and a shared common object with the hotel owner could engage Section 149 IPC. Its conditional statement did not prove an unlawful assembly or substitute for charge-sheet and trial assessment. It expressly left open whether investigators would add Sections 147–149. With investigation ongoing and two related bail refusals already made, it found no case for release. The conclusion was confined to bail, without a finding of guilt.

6. Relief : The High Court dismissed the first application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC. Moni v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, M.Cr.C. no. 53700/2022, 16/11/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- First report / deliberated implication — accused-specific evidentiary effect - Five related witnesses stated that Darru first approached the police, but the initial information was not produced and the radio constable was not examined. Darru stated that his first report named Rajesh and Kallu as the killers. Binda, Dilip and Prem acknowledged deliberation before the later Dehati Nalishi named additional members of Rajesh's family. The medical findings disclosed no firearm injuries in the three persons allegedly injured by the other five appellants. Taken with the reporting defects, this undermined the allegations that Monu, Sonu, Kamlesh, Pejram and Mahesh were present and fired shots. It did not erase the earliest accusation and consistent proof against Rajesh.

Section 149 IPC — proof of membership and common object - Personal injury is not indispensable for constructive liability. Here, however, the alleged firing by five members of the asserted unlawful assembly was contradicted by medical certificates and material omissions and improvements in witness testimony. The Court declined to infer their participation from family relationship, group allegation or Rajesh's proved gunshot. All five were acquitted of rioting, the two murder counts, attempted murder and hurt. The alleged injuries to Prem, Dilip and Shyamveer were not proved to be firearm injuries sustained in this incident.

Related testimony / falsus in uno — sift truth by accused - Shakila Abdul Gafar Khan v. Vasant Raghunath Dhoble, (2003) 7 SCC 749, State of A.P. v. Pullagummi Kasi Reddy Krishna Reddy, (2018) 7 SCC 623, Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, and Yogendra v. State of Rajasthan, (2013) 12 SCC 399, hold that partial falsity does not invariably require rejection of the entire testimony when reliable portions can be separated. Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475; Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509; Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661; and Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567 distinguish a witness's natural relationship to the victim from an established motive to secure a false conviction; Leela Ram v. State of Haryana, (1999) 9 SCC 525; State of M.P. v. Dal Singh, (2013) 14 SCC 159; Babulal v. State of M.P., (2003) 12 SCC 490; Dinesh Kumar v. State of Rajasthan, (2008) 8 SCC 270; and Jeevan v. State of Uttarakhand, (2012) 13 SCC 598 demand careful scrutiny of core versus peripheral discrepancies. The Court rejected the account attributing indiscriminate firing to five appellants. It nevertheless accepted the related witnesses' identification of Rajesh as the person who shot Ravindra, supported by Darru's earliest disclosed report and the post-mortem findings. Binda's different attribution of the victim and later assertions about two shots did not require Rajesh's acquittal.

Ocular and medical evidence — distinct contradictions and fatal wounds - Bhajan Singh v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 421, and CBI v. Mohd. Parvez Abdul Kayuum, (2019) 12 SCC 1, give weight to credible eyewitness testimony unless medical findings exclude the possibility of the eyewitness account. The absence of firearm injuries in the three alleged victims undermined the prosecution's attribution of indiscriminate firing to the five appellants. Each deceased had one through-and-through fatal gunshot wound. The original account of one shot each remained medically possible despite some witnesses' later assertions of two shots in cross-examination. Downward tracks did not prove a shooter stood at a height.

Spot map / Section 162 CrPC — witness statements versus officer observation - Tori Singh, (1962) 3 SCR 580; Sant Kumar, (1974) 3 SCC 643; and State of Rajasthan v. Bhawani, (2003) 7 SCC 291, restrict witness-derived investigative marks under Section 162, while Rameshwar Dayal, (1978) 2 SCC 518, preserves personally observed features under Evidence Act Section 60. The investigating officer's stated firing distance of 64–66 feet came from information supplied to him, not from his own observation, and no witness was confronted with it for contradiction. That entry could not be treated as substantive proof to displace the eyewitness estimates of a shorter distance.

Weapon and independent witnesses — no automatic evidentiary failure - Gulab v. State of U.P., Criminal Appeal 81/2021, decided 9 December 2021; Rakesh v. State of U.P., (2021) 7 SCC 188; Nankaunoo, (2016) 3 SCC 317; and Yogesh Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, hold that recovery of the firearm is not indispensable where reliable eyewitness and medical evidence otherwise support conviction. Mahesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 13 SCC 271; Sarwan Singh v. State of Punjab, (2003) 1 SCC 240; and Sadhu Suran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357 reject automatic disbelief of otherwise credible eyewitnesses solely because no independent witness testified. The isolated house and reliable Rajesh-specific core supported that limited application, while the same principles did not save the disproved allegations against the five.

Murder / Section 304 — no sudden fight on an armed return - Lavghanbhai Devjibhai Vasava v.

State of Gujarat, (2018) 4 SCC 329, identifies the circumstances, weapon, vital target, provocation, mutual fight and heat of passion among the relevant factors. Following the earlier hand-pump quarrel, Rajesh and Kallu came armed to the complainant family's house. No fresh provocation or mutual fight was shown, and their shots caused fatal injuries. The Court rejected a Section 304 Part I conversion and retained the two murder counts.

Section 149 to Section 34 — charge substitution and actual prejudice - Mala Singh v. State of Haryana, (2019) 5 SCC 127, applies CrPC Sections 216, 386 and 464: failure of a Section 149 charge does not automatically preclude liability under Section 34 if the overlapping evidence establishes common intention and the accused has not been misled or prejudiced. Because common object and common intention are distinct requirements, substitution may otherwise cause prejudice. Its Willie Slaney, Lachhman Singh, Karnail Singh and Chittarmal extracts supply the qualified test. After the five acquittals, the Court maintained Rajesh's liability for both murders by substituting Section 302 read with Section 34 for Section 302 read with Section 149, on its finding of common intention with Kallu. His other convictions were set aside. Both life terms run concurrently. Kallu's separately tried appeal was reserved for a separate judgment, and Bablesh's appeal had abated on death.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The three connected criminal appeals arose from the First Additional Sessions Judge, Bhind's judgment dated 30 October 2010 in Sessions Trial No. 181/2009. Criminal Appeal 938/2010 was brought by Monu and Sonu Sharma, 940/2010 by Kamlesh, Pejram and Mahesh alias Pappu, and 1031/2010 by Rajesh. All six had been convicted under IPC Section 148, two counts of Section 302/149, Section 307/149 and three counts of Section 323/149; the murders drew life imprisonment and fine, with lesser terms and fines as stated by the trial court. Co-accused Kallu alias Brajesh was arrested later and tried on different evidence. His separate Criminal Appeal No. 710/2012 was heard simultaneously but reserved for a separate judgment. Bablesh's Appeal 951/2010 had abated on his death.

The prosecution's Dehati Nalishi described a dispute at a village hand-pump on 27 April 2008, during which Darru's water utensils were allegedly thrown away. According to the complainant Kaptan Singh, a group later came armed to the family's house; Rajesh fired at Ravindra and Kallu at Rai Singh, both of whom died, while the five present appellants allegedly fired indiscriminately and wounded Prem, Dilip and Shyamveer. Police registered Crime No. 10/2008. The investigation included post-mortems, a spot map, witness statements and arrests; the charge-sheet cited Sections 302, 147–149 and 294 IPC. The trial court framed the more specific counts. The defence pleaded false implication of Rajesh's extended family after consultation, missing first information from Darru, non-recovery of guns, no independent witness, disagreement between ocular and medical evidence, a disputed map distance, and sudden fight warranting Section 304 rather than murder. Prosecution supported the convictions.

Dr. R.N. Rajouria found one through-and-through fatal firearm injury in each deceased. Ravindra's left costal entry passed through ruptured abdominal organs including liver and kidney; Rai Singh's left chest entry passed through damaged lung and pleura. Both deaths were homicidal from gunshot haemorrhage and vital-organ injury. The doctor found no blackening or charring and placed the shots at more than approximately six feet. He could not determine from the downward track alone whether the shooter stood higher or the gun barrel pointed downward; the Court found no steep trajectory establishing an elevated firing position. The allegations against Monu, Sonu, Kamlesh, Pejram and Mahesh were different. They were not alleged to have shot the deceased, but to have fired at Prem, Dilip and Shyamveer. Dr. Kushwaha found blunt contusions on Prem and Shyamveer, and Dr. Dixit a healing thumb laceration and leg abrasion/contusion on Dilip; neither doctor accepted firearm or pellet injury for these three. Witness accounts of individual gunfire or gun-handle blows shifted and often omitted material details from earlier police statements. The Court assessed the evidence separately for Rajesh and for the five other appellants.

2. Precedents — Considered : Shakila Abdul Gafar Khan v. Vasant Raghunath Dhoble, (2003) 7 SCC 749, was quoted at length for the principle that falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus is not a mandatory rule of evidence. Courts must sift truthful, severable evidence from exaggeration; only when separating truth would require reconstructing a wholly new case from inseparable falsehood should the entire account be discarded. Its discussion distinguishes ordinary memory/observation discrepancies from material ones. State of A.P. v. Pullagummi Kasi Reddy Krishna Reddy, (2018) 7 SCC 623, makes the accused-specific consequence explicit: the same witness may be disbelieved as to acquitted persons and believed against another on credible material. Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, explains whole-testimony assessment, Evidence Act Sections 145/155 for genuine prior-statement impeachment, rejection of mere peripheral variations, and careful handling of related testimony. Yogendra v. State of Rajasthan, (2013) 12 SCC 399, likewise requires every effort to separate grain from chaff, reserving wholesale rejection for inseparable cases. The High Court applied these authorities to acquit the five appellants without disregarding the evidence it considered reliable against Rajesh.

Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, and Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, were quoted for the absence of any automatic credibility defect from kinship with the deceased. Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, explains cautious fact-specific scrutiny rather than a rule of corroboration, while its Dalip Singh and Masalti extracts reject a mechanical interested-witness label without foundation of motive to falsely implicate. Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, distinguishes a naturally related witness from one who has a benefit, enmity or other motive to secure a false conviction. It requires consistent, credible testimony despite the absence of any automatic defect arising from relationship. Leela Ram v. State of Haryana, (1999) 9 SCC 525, permits sifting trustworthy core from embellishment. State of M.P. v. Dal Singh, (2013) 14 SCC 159, distinguishes marginal elaboration from omissions materially affecting the core. Babulal v. State of M.P., (2003) 12 SCC 490, accepts credible relative testimony after careful appraisal. Dinesh Kumar v. State of Rajasthan, (2008) 8 SCC 270, and Jeevan v. State of Uttarakhand, (2012) 13 SCC 598, allow conviction of one accused after co-accused acquittal when residual testimony is cogent. The Court applied these principles while separately recognising that the evidence against five relatives had been materially discredited.

Bhajan Singh v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 421, explains that credible eyewitness evidence generally carries greater weight than medical opinion, but medical improbability remains relevant and evidence excluding every possibility of the eyewitness account may justify disbelief. CBI v. Mohd. Parvez Abdul Kayuum, (2019) 12 SCC 1, was quoted at greater length, reproducing Yogesh Singh, Sunil Kundu and Bastiram to emphasize the same limit; the Kapildeo Mandal example specifically concerns medically ruled-out firearm injuries. Here no firearm pathology supported the claimed shots into Prem, Dilip or Shyamveer, while fatal single entry/exit wounds remained compatible with the initial Rajesh and Kallu account despite later two-shot embellishments.

Tori Singh v. State of U.P., (1962) 3 SCR 580, and Sant Kumar v. State of Haryana, (1974) 3 SCC 643, were quoted for the Section 162 CrPC restriction on site-plan markings derived from witnesses' investigative statements, subject to their limited use for contradiction. State of Rajasthan v. Bhawani, (2003) 7 SCC 291, draws the same line between hearsay witness marks and personally observed features. Rameshwar Dayal v. State of U.P., (1978) 2 SCC 518, provides the important qualification: an officer's own direct observation in a map, inquest or seizure note remains admissible under Evidence Act Section 60, while witness-supplied investigative matter does not become substantive proof through the document. The Court applied this distinction to the stated firing distance of 64–66 feet: the information had been supplied to the officer and had not been put to the relevant witness for contradiction. Gulab v. State of U.P., Criminal Appeal 81/2021, decided 9 December 2021, was cited for non-recovery of a gun not discrediting corroborated eyewitness accounts of a gunshot death. Rakesh v. State of U.P., (2021) 7 SCC 188, explains that even a recovered gun shown not to match may be treated as non-recovery; actual recovery of the weapon used is not an indispensable condition of conviction. Nankaunoo v. State of U.P., (2016) 3 SCC 317, and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, similarly require the credible direct and medical record to be assessed without an automatic weapon-recovery veto. The Court applied the non-recovery principle to Rajesh's fatal shot, which it found proved by other evidence. Mahesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 13 SCC 271, Sarwan Singh v. State of Punjab, (2003) 1 SCC 240, and Sadhu Suran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, were quoted to reject an automatic failure from no independent witness if the available family eyewitnesses pass deep scrutiny, particularly where outsiders may be absent or reluctant. The High Court also relied on the isolated location shown by observed map features; it did not deem kinship a universal credibility guarantee.

Lavghanbhai Devjibhai Vasava v. State of Gujarat, (2018) 4 SCC 329, reproduced the factors from Dhirendra Kumar for distinguishing murder from culpable homicide: the circumstances, whether the weapon was carried or obtained at the scene, the target and force, mutual fight, provocation, previous enmity, heat of passion, undue advantage and cruel conduct. The Court used those factors to reject Rajesh's sudden-fight plea because he came armed later to the victims' house without new provocation, and the shots struck vital regions.

Mala Singh v. State of Haryana, (2019) 5 SCC 127, was quoted for appellate conversion of a charge from Section 149 to Section 34 IPC, read with CrPC Sections 216, 386 and 464. An omitted or altered charge does not automatically invalidate conviction unless it misled the accused and caused a failure of justice. Any substitution must rest on overlapping evidence establishing common intention without denying a fair defence. Its quoted Constitution Bench Willie (William) Slaney v. State of M.P. and the Lachhman Singh, Karnail Singh and Chittarmal line differentiate common object from prearranged common intention and permit substitution only when the same proof could have supported an alternative Section 34 charge without prejudice. Kantilal Chandulal Mehta was also quoted within Mala Singh on fair notice and opportunity. The High Court adopted this conditional rule after the five assembly acquittals and converted Rajesh's two murder counts to Section 302/34, without separately resolving Kallu's distinct appeal.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 148 and 149 IPC supplied the trial's rioting and unlawful-assembly liability framework. Membership and common object were not proved against the five acquitted appellants. Sections 302/149 on two deaths, 307/149 on alleged attempts, and 323/149 on three hurt allegations were the framed and convicted counts below. The High Court rejected the attempted-murder and hurt foundation and acquitted Rajesh of those counts and Section 148, while sustaining two murders under Section 302 read with Section 34 on its finding of shared fatal action with Kallu. Common intention under Section 34 differs from common object under Section 149. The reduction of proved participants below five did not dispense with proof of common intention. Section 304 Part I was urged as an alternative, but the Court rejected a sudden, unpremeditated fight. The original registration also mentioned IPC Sections 147 and 294, which were not independent operative convictions in this appellate disposition.

Section 162 CrPC restricted use of witness-derived investigative statements reproduced in a spot map, except for legally permitted contradiction. Evidence Act Section 60 preserved direct observation by the officer. Evidence Act Sections 145 and 155 were discussed through Bhagwan Jagannath Markad for confrontation and impeachment of material earlier inconsistencies. CrPC Sections 216, 386 and 464 were quoted through Mala Singh on altering a charge, appellate powers and a failure-of-justice/prejudice inquiry. The Court did not invoke those sections to authorise a new trial; it altered the murder finding in Rajesh's appeal.

4. Issues : Whether both deaths were homicidal, the downward bullet path compelled an elevated-shooter conclusion, and the non-firearm medical findings rendered the five appellants' alleged indiscriminate firing and assembly membership unproved; whether the omission of Darru's initial information and the later family deliberations affected the prosecution case against the five other appellants and, separately, against Rajesh; whether partially unreliable related eyewitnesses could still prove Rajesh's act after careful sifting; whether one fatal entry wound contradicted core eyewitness identification merely because some later accounts claimed two shots; whether the witness-supplied 64–66-foot firing distance recorded on the spot map was admissible as substantive evidence under Section 162 CrPC; and whether missing guns and independent witnesses mandated acquittal. The further issues were whether the fatal acts constituted murder or were reducible under Section 304 on a sudden-fight theory; whether the Section 307/149 and 323/149 counts survived; and whether the Section 302/149 murder findings could be maintained under Section 302/34 without impermissible prejudice after the unlawful-assembly theory failed. Kallu's separate appeal and Bablesh's abated appeal were not merits issues decided here.

5. Ratio / Findings : The autopsy evidence established two homicidal gunshot deaths and one through-and-through wound for each victim. The downward bullet track did not establish that either shooter stood higher; the doctor could not exclude a lowered barrel, and the Court also considered relative height. Against Monu, Sonu, Kamlesh, Pejram and Mahesh, the Court found a different evidentiary picture. Their alleged post-fatal indiscriminate fire supposedly wounded Prem, Dilip and Shyamveer, but the three MLCs did not disclose any bullet or pellet injury. Witnesses materially changed which person shot or hit whom, including unexplained omissions from police statements about gun-handle blows. Binda, Dilip and Prem admitted a family discussion before naming thirteen people in the Nalishi. Darru's first police information had not been produced and the radio constable was not examined; Darru himself said his earliest account identified only Rajesh and Kallu. The Court accepted the State's general proposition that causing personal injury is not essential to Section 149 liability. On the combined record, however, it found the presence and participation of those five appellants in an unlawful assembly with the requisite common object unproved. Their familial relationship to Rajesh and later naming could not fill those gaps; all their counts failed.

For Rajesh, the earliest disclosed names included him; the Nalishi and Kaptan, Dilip, Darru, Prem and Shyamveer consistently attributed Ravindra's shooting to him. Binda's different account of which victim Rajesh shot, and later assertions by some witnesses that two shots were fired, did not displace the initial account of one shot each. Each deceased had only one fatal entry and one exit, and the Court distinguished a mistaken counting of exit wounds from a medically impossible gunshot injury in the three other persons. Applying Shakila, Pullagummi, Bhagwan Jagannath, Yogendra and the related-witness line, it sifted reliable evidence against Rajesh from disproved allegations against five others. Kinship was not automatic disqualification; the particular material evidence was scrutinised. The distance entered in the investigating officer's map came from information supplied to him rather than his own observation; no witness had been confronted with that information for contradiction. Tori Singh, Sant Kumar, Bhawani and Rameshwar Dayal made that Section 162 content inadmissible as substantive proof while preserving observed features; the asserted 64–66 feet did not negate the core. Missing recovery of Rajesh's gun and no independent witness likewise were not automatic vetoes given credible direct and post-mortem proof and the isolated home. None of these rules restored the separate, medically defeated allegations against the five.

The earlier hand-pump altercation had ended before the armed men came to the complainant family's house. Rajesh carried a gun; the victims had not retaliated or joined a mutual fight; Ravindra's fatal injury and Kallu's alleged fatal shot to Rai Singh occurred at the house. Applying Lavghanbhai's contextual factors, the Court rejected heat-of-passion or sudden-fight conversion to Section 304 Part I and retained Section 302 on two counts. It did not prove the alleged attempts or hurt to Prem, Dilip, Shyamveer or Kaptan and acquitted Rajesh of Sections 307/149, 323/149 and 148. With the five other appellants acquitted and Section 149 unavailable on the Court's view, Mala Singh's fact-sensitive, actual-prejudice test allowed a Section 34 finding on substantially overlapping armed-attack facts. The Court stated that less than five persons does not bar Section 34 liability, then held Rajesh liable for both murders through common intention with Kallu. Kallu's separately tried appeal remained reserved for a separate judgment.

6. Relief : The High Court allowed Criminal Appeals Nos. 938/2010 and 940/2010 and dismissed Criminal Appeal No. 1031/2010. The 30 October 2010 conviction and sentence were set aside entirely for Monu Sharma, Sonu Sharma, Kamlesh, Pejram and Mahesh alias Pappu; they were acquitted of all charges, and their bail bonds discharged. Rajesh's criminal appeal was dismissed in the operative formulation, although his Sections 148, 307/149 and three Section 323/149 counts were expressly set aside and the two murder findings were altered from Section 302/149 to Section 302/34. His two life sentences and fines were maintained, with both life sentences running concurrently; he was to serve the remaining term. A free copy was to be supplied to Rajesh and the trial record returned. Kallu's Appeal 710/2012 was reserved for a separate judgment on its own trial evidence; Bablesh's Appeal 951/2010 had abated earlier. Those separate appeals were not decided on their merits in this common judgment.

Monu Sharma and Ors. v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 938/2010 & 940/2010 & 1031/2010, 31/01/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Deepak Kumar Agarwal, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR registration / cognizable information / separate remedy - Applying Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, the Court distinguished the police duty to register an FIR upon receiving information disclosing a cognizable offence from the remedy available when the police fail to do so. The quoted Supreme Court discussion identified Ramesh Kumari, (2006) 2 SCC 677, and Lallan Chaudhary, (2006) 12 SCC 229, as authorities on the police obligation. It distinguished the procedure for redress under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC, explained in All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, (1996) 11 SCC 582, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, (2004) 7 SCC 768, Hari Singh, (2006) 5 SCC 733, and Minu Kumari, (2006) 4 SCC 359. The High Court did not decide whether the applicant's allegations in fact disclosed an offence.

Magistrate's remedial powers / police inaction and investigation - The Court also considered Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on the Magistrate complaint route: after a complaint under Sections 190 and 200, Chapter XV inquiry may lead to investigation, dismissal under Section 203 if no offence appears, or cognizance and process where warranted. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, supplies the sequence of written approach to the Superintendent under Section 154(3) and, if registration or proper investigation remains wanting, recourse under Section 156(3); a prima facie satisfied Magistrate can direct registration and proper investigation and monitor it. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reiterates that remedy and describes the Magistrate's discretion to recommend a change of investigating officer while clarifying that the Magistrate cannot conduct the investigation personally. The Court used these authorities to identify the applicant's statutory alternative, without ordering a Magistrate to decide the accusation in a particular way.

High Court direction to register FIR / maintainability of Section 482 application - In an application under Section 482 CrPC alleging that police had not registered an FIR despite his complaint, the Court refused to direct registration and dismissed the application as not maintainable because a remedy before the Magistrate was available. The applicant retained liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS. No finding was made on the accusation's merits or the duty's application to its facts.

Writ mandamus / exceptional investigation oversight - Divine Retreat Centre preserves exceptional Article 226 directions in a rare, clearly established case of mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC, but does not permit the Court to dictate investigative methods. The Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P. treated unexhausted remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 as a ground to deny a mandamus for FIR registration subject to the stated Whirlpool exceptions, and distinguished the registration duty in Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, from automatic entitlement to such a writ. The Court referred to this qualified framework but neither found such exceptional circumstances nor made an order under Article 226.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Monu Sharma brought Miscellaneous Criminal Case No. 44128 of 2024 before the Gwalior Bench under Section 482 CrPC. He requested that the High Court obtain a status report on his application in Marg No. 18/2024, direct Police Station Vishwavidyalaya, Gwalior, to register an FIR against the persons accused, and require prompt action. Counsel said that, despite the applicant's complaint, the police had not lodged an FIR. The State opposed direct High Court relief and pointed to recourse before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The order contains no account of the underlying incident or the complaint's particulars, no account of any police response beyond the alleged inaction, and no finding that the information disclosed a cognizable offence. Having heard the parties, the Court considered whether it could directly order the police to register an FIR.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted at length. It distinguished the police's duty under Section 154 CrPC upon receiving cognizable information from the complainant's remedy under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC when police do not register an FIR. In reconciling earlier decisions, Aleque described Ramesh Kumari, (2006) 2 SCC 677, and the reiteration in Lallan Chaudhary v. State of Bihar, (2006) 12 SCC 229, as addressing police action upon cognizable information, whereas All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union v. Union of India, (1996) 11 SCC 582, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768, Hari Singh, (2006) 5 SCC 733, and Minu Kumari, (2006) 4 SCC 359, were identified for the route when that duty is not performed. The Court invoked this distinction in refusing a direct direction to register the FIR.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for two connected but distinct points. Article 226 intervention remains available in a rare and clearly established case of mala fide investigation, abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC. Even then, the High Court may require adherence to lawful procedure but cannot prescribe investigative methods. Ordinarily, when information to police draws no response, Sections 190 and 200 supply a complaint remedy rather than a writ. Within the quoted passage, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre explains the Magistrate's Chapter XV inquiry, possibility of referring a prima facie matter for Chapter XII investigation, dismissal under Section 203 if no offence appears, and cognizance and process where prima facie material warrants; it refers to the AIIMS Employees' Union decision. The present order uses this procedural alternative and does not purport to find a rare case or make investigation directions.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted for a further sequence: written request to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), followed if ineffective by an application under Section 156(3) to a Magistrate. Upon prima facie satisfaction the Magistrate may order FIR registration or proper investigation and monitor it. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, reiterated the preference expressed in Sakiri Vasu for the Magistrate remedy over an ordinary Article 226 petition. The quoted ruling also recognises that the Magistrate may, when necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer through the police superior and may monitor the investigation, but cannot personally undertake it. These passages informed the Court's refusal to act as the first forum; their examples of a registered but defective investigation did not become findings about this applicant's complaint.

The Court also relied on the Madhya Pradesh Division Bench's Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016, decided 20.12.2016. As quoted, it permits denial of mandamus to compel the Section 154 duty when alternatives under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, subject to the four exceptions it attributed to Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1. Shweta distinguished Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1: the latter's FIR registration duty did not decide entitlement to bypass alternative remedies for writ mandamus. The Court referred to Shweta on the availability of alternative remedies. This application was under Section 482 CrPC, and no Article 226 exception was separately decided.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the applicant's invoked High Court jurisdiction. Section 154 CrPC is the police registration duty discussed in Aleque and Shweta; Section 154(3) provides the stated avenue to the Superintendent of Police. Sections 190 and 200 CrPC govern approaching a competent Magistrate by complaint; Chapter XV CrPC governs inquiry into a complaint, and Section 203 permits dismissal where the inquiry reveals no offence warranting further action, as explained through Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre in the quoted Divine Retreat Centre passage. Section 156(3) permits a prima facie satisfied Magistrate to order registration or appropriate investigation and monitor it, as described in Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir. Chapter XII CrPC is the police-investigation framework referenced in the quoted exceptional writ discussion. Article 226 of the Constitution appears in those quoted precedents on exceptional public-law relief; no Article 226 petition was adjudicated here. In the operative liberty the Court mentioned Section 223 BNSS alongside Section 200 CrPC as a route to the Magistrate. No question about the transitional application of the CrPC and BNSS was adjudicated.

4. Issues : The principal issue was whether alleged police inaction entitled the applicant to a direct High Court direction for FIR registration under Section 482 CrPC or whether the available remedy before the Magistrate rendered such an application not maintainable. That question required distinguishing a police duty upon receipt of cognizable information from the forum and sequence for enforcing the duty. The Court considered the breadth of the Magistrate's remedial powers and the qualified Article 226 case law as reasons against routine direct High Court intervention. It did not decide whether the underlying allegations were true, disclosed a cognizable offence, justified any particular investigative step, or met an exceptional writ threshold.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court framed maintainability, not the truth of the applicant's accusation, as the decisive issue. Aleque Padamsee recognises that information disclosing a cognizable offence creates a police duty to register an FIR. It distinguishes that duty from the statutory remedy available to the complainant, so the duty alone does not require the High Court to direct registration in a Section 482 proceeding. In Aleque's account, the Ramesh Kumari line establishes what police must do, while the AIIMS Employees' Union, Gangadhar, Hari Singh and Minu Kumari line addresses the statutory Magistrate route after inaction. The Court placed the applicant's allegation of no FIR on the latter side of that distinction; no material in the order establishes the underlying offence's cognizability.

Divine Retreat Centre reinforced that the complaint route under Sections 190 and 200 can result, according to the Magistrate's inquiry and prima facie assessment, in investigative referral, dismissal or process. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe identified the further remedies under Sections 154(3) and 156(3) CrPC when registration is refused or an investigation is inadequate. Their discussion of Magistrate monitoring and a possible recommendation to change an investigator explains the remedy's practical reach; it is neither a High Court command in this case nor an entitlement to dictate police methods. The Court consequently found no basis for its own direction to register the offence.

As reflected in the quoted Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria decisions, exceptional intervention under Article 226 remains possible: clear mala fide investigation or abuse with Chapter XII non-compliance may justify a rare Article 226 direction, and Shweta recognises the stated Whirlpool exceptions to alternative-remedy restraint. Even such intervention cannot tell police how to investigate. Lalita Kumari's registration principle, as distinguished by Shweta, does not answer the separate writ-remedy question. The present Court did not find the exception facts, independently adjudicate Article 226, or decide any police official's culpability. It held that the application directly seeking FIR registration under Section 482 CrPC was not maintainable, and expressly preserved the remedy before the Magistrate.

6. Relief : The High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC as not maintainable. No FIR registration direction, police investigation order, or merits determination was made. The applicant was expressly left at liberty, if he considered an offence to have been committed against him, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS. The order imposes no deadline or conditions on that liberty and gives no direction predetermining the Magistrate's independent assessment.

Monu Sharma v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 44128/2024, 22/11/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (476) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC / matrimonial prosecution / no mini-trial - Taramani Parakh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, (2015) 11 SCC 260, was applied to distinguish allegations that are absurd or disclose no offence from a triable complaint, whose credibility cannot be decided by choosing between the prosecution version and a counterversion at the quashing stage. Its quotation of Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, requires cautious and sparing intervention. The High Court examines the uncontroverted allegations and prosecution record for a prima facie offence or patent abuse, without meticulously assessing the defence, the likelihood of conviction, or the admissibility or reliability of evidence. The present Court refused to determine the applicants' asserted separate residence, changes in workplace location and false implication on the applicants' version alone; those disputed matters require evidence and cross-examination. The further Supreme Court decisions cited in paragraph 11 were used for the same face-value test.

Section 498-A IPC / relatives / specificity of cruelty allegations - Taramani Parakh cautioned against proceeding mechanically on omnibus allegations against relatives who may not ordinarily be involved in the couple's affairs, while distinguishing Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, Manoj Mahavir Prasad Khaitan v. Ram Gopal Poddar, (2010) 10 SCC 673, and Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, on their different factual settings. Those decisions supply no inflexible immunity for in-laws. Here, the complainant alleged that the mother-in-law, father-in-law and elder brother-in-law were involved in repeated demands for money and a car, taunts, abuse, threats and her expulsion. The Court found those allegations specific and triable, rather than vague or omnibus. Meera v. State, Inspector of Police, (2022) 3 SCC 93, was cited on the seriousness of a woman's cruelty to a daughter-in-law, but did not establish guilt of the identified female relative. No final finding on the charged IPC or Dowry Prohibition Act offences was made.

Territorial jurisdiction / continuing mental cruelty at parental home - Applying Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, the Court explained that psychological distress caused by matrimonial cruelty which drove a wife from her home may continue at the parental home even if physical abuse does not occur there; its continuing psychological effect is relevant to Section 498-A IPC territorial jurisdiction. The High Court also cited Amar Singh v. Smt. Vimla for the proposition that compelling a married woman to live at her parental home amounts to cruelty. As the complainant alleged that she had been driven from the matrimonial home and was residing in Bhopal, the Court held that Mahila Thana, Bhopal also had territorial jurisdiction to investigate, notwithstanding the applicants' assertion that the principal events occurred in Bangalore. The ruling did not resolve the disputed facts, which remained for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mool Kawar Mehta and two other applicants invoked Section 482 CrPC in Miscellaneous Criminal Case No. 2964 of 2024 before the Jabalpur Bench, seeking to quash charge-sheet No. 01/2022 dated 04.11.2022, the related FIR and RCT No. 14430/2022 pending before a Judicial Magistrate First Class in Bhopal.

According to respondent 2's FIR, she married Hitesh Mehta on 25.11.2020 and thereafter experienced daily dowry-related taunts and ill-treatment by her husband and his family. She alleged inadequate food, demands for money although she had been paying half her salary from private employment to her in-laws, pressure to obtain Rs 7 lakh and a car from her parents, encouragement of her husband's demands by his relatives, abusive words and threats to her life, and a threat that he would remarry if she failed to bring money and a car. She said that her father attempted to persuade them and that she was eventually turned out of the matrimonial home. The Court recounted these as allegations, without deciding their truth or recording any finding of guilt. The applicants argued that the allegations against them were false and lacked sufficient particulars; they said the complainant had lived separately, her job shifted from Bangalore to Mumbai, she wanted her husband to leave Bangalore and his parents, and health problems in his family explained why he declined. They said she returned to Bhopal on 12.02.2022 without good reason and that the alleged principal acts in Bangalore could not properly found a Bhopal FIR. The medical and employment-related assertions formed part of the applicants' defence, not findings made by the Court. The High Court framed the dispute at the Section 482 threshold and asked whether a triable accusation and Bhopal jurisdiction existed without resolving disputed questions of fact.

2. Precedents — Considered : Meera v. State, Inspector of Police, (2022) 3 SCC 93, was cited in paragraph 9 on the seriousness of cruelty inflicted by a woman upon her daughter-in-law and the protective role expected of a mother-in-law. The High Court placed this after observing that the complaint was directed at a female relative as well, but it had not found any cruelty proved.

Taramani Parakh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted at length in paragraph 10 and provided the quashing principles applied by the High Court. Absurd allegations, failure to disclose an offence and abuse of process can justify quashing; a triable matrimonial complaint cannot be decided by choosing between complaint and counterversion or testing credibility before trial. Particular caution is warranted for omnibus allegations against relatives not generally involved in the couple's affairs. The quoted decision also discussed Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, whose enumerated guidance requires cautious and sparing Section 482 intervention, especially with a framed charge; the basic inquiry takes uncontroverted prosecution allegations and accompanying records as a whole and asks whether a prima facie offence, patent absurdity, inherent improbability, a statutory bar or abuse is shown. The threshold balance includes the accused's liberty and the complainant's right to prosecution; civil and criminal consequences can coexist, and an accused cannot establish non-disclosure of an offence merely by supplying external defence materials. Those principles preclude a full evidentiary inquiry into the likelihood of conviction or the admissibility or reliability of evidence, while preserving intervention necessary to prevent a patent miscarriage of justice.

In paragraph 15, Taramani Parakh distinguished Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, involving aged parents and allegations principally against a deceased husband; Manoj Mahavir Prasad Khaitan v. Ram Gopal Poddar, (2010) 10 SCC 673, involving an allegedly absurd jewellery-theft complaint from a relative during an earlier Section 498-A case; and Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, involving siblings of the husband after divorce. Taramani rejected turning those fact-bound quashings into an inflexible rule. The present High Court applied that caution to the complainant's concrete allegations against each relative, finding a case to be tried.

In paragraph 11, the High Court also cited XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337; State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718; Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319; Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350; State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226; M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686; State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, order dated 30.06.2021; Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678; Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221; State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547; S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600; Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336; Amit Kapoor, already discussed; Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437; and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682. The High Court cited these decisions for the proposition that proceedings may be quashed if the uncontroverted allegations do not disclose an offence. On its face-value reading, the High Court concluded that the FIR did disclose a cognizable offence.

Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was quoted for the physical and mental dimensions of cruelty under Section 498-A IPC and the continuing psychological injury a wife may experience at her parental home after being driven from the matrimonial home. Physical assaults need not recur there for the distress from earlier acts and humiliating words to persist. The High Court applied that reasoning to reject the Bangalore-only territorial objection and to recognise Bhopal police jurisdiction where the complainant resided after alleged expulsion. The High Court also cited Amar Singh v. Smt. Vimla, Criminal Revision No. 2376/2020, decided 22.06.2021, for treating the compelled stay at a parental home as cruelty.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC supplied the High Court's inherent-power quashing jurisdiction. The Court tested whether the allegations underlying the filed police report and FIR disclosed a triable offence without deciding the applicants' proposed evidence or external factual defence. Section 498-A IPC was central to the allegations of dowry-connected cruelty and to the territorial ruling about persistent mental suffering away from the matrimonial home. Sections 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, 1961, appeared as charges in the quashing prayer and FIR description. The charge-sheet, final report and pending proceedings before the Magistrate were the subject of the quashing prayer. Sections 228 and 173(2) CrPC occur within the quoted Amit Kapoor principles on charge-stage restraint and police reports.

4. Issues : First, did the allegations against the mother-in-law, father-in-law and elder brother-in-law describe particular conduct capable of constituting a triable matrimonial offence, or were they the vague, omnibus allegations against relatives for which the quashing cases require caution? Second, could the High Court decide in Section 482 proceedings the applicants' asserted separate residence, explanations for the spouse's Bangalore/Mumbai employment choices, alleged falsity and alternative reasons for her departure without evidence and cross-examination? Third, did the alleged earlier Bangalore conduct deprive Mahila Thana, Bhopal of territorial jurisdiction when the complainant said she had been driven to her parental home there and continued to suffer the impact? The Court addressed these issues only at the threshold, leaving the truth of the allegations and the culpability or guilt of each accused for trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : For the first two issues, the Court read the complaint as making specific dowry and cruelty allegations against the applicants, not a bare reference to their family relationship. It found that the demand for Rs 7 lakh and a car, taunts, ill-treatment, threats and asserted expulsion, when taken at face value, disclosed a cognizable accusation fit for trial. Taramani Parakh recognises quashing for patently absurd, offence-deficient or abusive allegations while warning against vague implication of peripheral relatives. It does not permit a full evidentiary inquiry at the quashing stage; its distinctions of Neelu Chopra, Manoj Mahavir Prasad Khaitan and Geeta Mehrotra show why other relative-quashing outcomes are not categorical immunity. The High Court treated the present allegations as particularised. The High Court cited Meera's observation concerning cruelty by a woman to her daughter-in-law, but did not determine guilt or sentence in these proceedings.

The applicants' alternative story that they resided apart, that the complainant wanted her husband to relocate, that illness explained his refusal, and that the allegations were false would be matters for determination after evidence is adduced. The Court said those issues could not be adjudicated in Section 482 jurisdiction and would need cogent evidence and cross-examination before the trial court. Taramani and its Amit Kapoor quotation preclude a mini-trial and the preference of an accused's disputed counterversion when the prosecution allegations disclose a prima facie offence. Paragraph 11's additional authorities were invoked collectively for the face-value rule. It therefore found no occasion to quash the pending charge-sheet or related proceedings, without determining whether any accused committed cruelty, criminal intimidation or a dowry offence.

On territorial jurisdiction, the Court rejected the submission that principal alleged events in Bangalore made Bhopal police action a misuse of procedure. Under Rupali Devi, cruelty may produce continuing mental trauma at the parental home after the wife is driven from the matrimonial residence. The Court treated the complainant's alleged expulsion and subsequent residence in Bhopal as sufficient at this stage for Mahila Thana, Bhopal also to investigate; Amar Singh was cited consistently. The holding depends on that alleged continuing impact and neither determines every disputed historical fact nor treats residence at the parental home, by itself, as an automatic basis of jurisdiction. With both the triable complaint and territorial objection resolved against the applicants, the limited Section 482 scope foreclosed interference.

6. Relief : The High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC. The FIR, charge-sheet No. 01/2022 dated 04.11.2022 and consequential RCT No. 14430/2022 remained undisturbed; The Court held that Mahila Thana, Bhopal also had territorial jurisdiction to investigate the allegations. No final finding of guilt was recorded. The applicants' factual defences remained open to be proved in the trial court under the ordinary process.

Mool Kawar Mehta and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 2964/2024, 26/02/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (477) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 376(2)(f) IPC / penetrative assault of a young child / proof - The Division Bench assessed together the evidence of the parents, the direct adult eyewitness Siyasharan, the defence witnesses and Dr Laghate. The mother saw the accused take the child away and bring her back; Siyasharan saw him committing the act with her in his house. The child returned crying and bleeding from the genital area, and the medical examination disclosed a hymenal tear and perineal laceration. The father did not witness the taking or assault; his hearsay evidence could be considered as corroborative evidence. The injuries established penetration, but its cause and the offender's identity had to be determined from the remaining evidence. The Court rejected the suggested fall and accidental insertion of wood in view of the pattern of injuries, the failure to put the wood account to the mother and weaknesses in the defence evidence. It held guilt proved beyond reasonable doubt under the then-applicable charge after examining that evidence, rather than presuming guilt from the medical injury alone.

Sexual-assault testimony / everyday expression / sensitive interpretation - Applying Annu @ Anoop Kumar v. State of M.P., Criminal Appeal No. 687/1994, decided 20.08.2008, the Court understood Siyasharan's expression “Bura Kaam” in context, without requiring a graphic description or the use of statutory terminology. The passage from Wahid Khan quoted in Annu favoured understanding regional expressions in the light of the evidence as a whole. The child did not testify; the direct description came from the adult witness. Sham Singh v. State of Haryana, (2018) 18 SCC 34, considered with State of Punjab v. Gurmit Singh, (1996) 2 SCC 384, and the passage from Raju v. State of M.P. quoted in it, rejects a mandatory requirement of corroboration where a prosecutrix's testimony is inherently reliable. It also requires careful scrutiny of the particular case for false implication and discrepancies of a fatal nature. The present Court assessed the evidence sensitively and in context, with direct adult testimony and independent medical findings before it.

Medical and forensic evidence / absent FSL report - A hymenal tear and perineal wound, without other external injury, supported penetration. The doctor and the Court nevertheless examined the suggested accidental causes. A fall would ordinarily cause other injuries. The account of accidental insertion of wood was not put to the mother and was inconsistent with the absence of external injury. The police had sent specimens for FSL examination, but no report was produced. The Court held that the omission was not decisive in view of the reliable direct and medical evidence on record. It also reasoned that an interrupted or partial act might not have resulted in discharge. Sham Singh's principle concerning corroboration was applied with the qualification stated in Raju.

FIR timing / sexual offence reporting - Applying Gurmit Singh, the Court held that stigma and concern for the victim may naturally explain an interval before a sexual offence is reported. In the present case, it found that the FIR was lodged within about two hours and found no evidence of antedating. The later receipt of a copy by the Court did not justify an inference of antedating, particularly when the officer had not been questioned about its transmission.

Related witnesses / interest and false implication - Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, and Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, were considered on the distinction between a close relationship and an interest in falsely implicating an accused. The latter two decisions require a foundation for alleged enmity and careful assessment of whether the evidence is credible and consistent. Kinship alone does not establish either truth or falsity. The alleged land dispute involving a maternal uncle was unsupported by documentary evidence and did not establish a motive for the parents or Siyasharan to implicate the accused falsely while shielding the actual offender.

Sentence / disposition - The Court upheld the conviction under Section 376(2)(f) IPC and the trial court's sentence of life imprisonment, a fine of Rs 10,000 and one year's rigorous imprisonment in default. It emphasised the seriousness of the assault on an infant and the need for deterrence. The appeal was dismissed. The appellant remained in jail to serve the remainder of his sentence; a free copy of the judgment was to be supplied to him and the trial record returned.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Moolchand appealed under Section 374 CrPC against the judgment dated 13.05.2010 of the Additional Sessions Judge, Seondha, District Datia, in Sessions Trial No. 46/2009. The trial court convicted him under the then-applicable Section 376(2)(f) IPC and sentenced him to life imprisonment, a fine of Rs 10,000 and one year's rigorous imprisonment in default. The charge-sheet referred to Sections 376 and 511 IPC, whereas the charge was framed, and the conviction affirmed, under Section 376(2)(f).

The child's father, anonymised as A, stated that the appellant took the child from the platform outside the family's home in the afternoon and brought her back about half an hour later. The mother, B, testified that she saw him take the child away and bring her back. The child was crying and bleeding from the genital area, and her underwear was stained with blood. Siyasharan, a relative and neighbour who was passing the accused's home, testified that he heard cries, entered the house and saw the appellant doing “Bura Kaam” with the child. He said that, after he intervened, the appellant left through another door and returned the child. In cross-examination, the father acknowledged that he had not seen the appellant take the child away or bring her back and had learned those facts from his wife. The doctor found a hymenal tear at the six o'clock position, perineal laceration and bleeding, without any other external injury. Clothes, slides, a shirt and nail clippings were seized and sent for forensic examination, but no FSL report was produced.

The defence disputed whether the expression “Bura Kaam” meant rape, relied on the absence of the FSL report, alleged a land-related motive for false implication and contended that the prosecution relied on relatives. Its witnesses, Kalyan Singh and Hari Singh, stated that the child was injured accidentally when a piece of wood entered her private part while she was playing. Other suggestions put to the mother and the doctor concerned a fall from the platform. The Court had to assess the prosecution and defence evidence to determine whether the injury resulted from rape or an accident.

2. Precedents — Considered : Annu @ Anoop Kumar v. State of M.P., Criminal Appeal No. 687/1994, decided 20.08.2008, is an earlier High Court decision quoted by the present Bench. It requires ordinary expressions such as “Galat Kam,” “Bura Kam” and “Ulta Kam” in an account of sexual assault to be understood in context. A witness need not give graphic particulars; accompanying direct or indirect evidence and circumstances may clarify the expression's meaning. The passage from Wahid Khan quoted in Annu emphasises regional ways of describing acts and the judge's duty to understand what a witness means, without insisting on statutory terminology. The present Court applied this approach to the adult eyewitness Siyasharan's testimony, the child's distress and injury, and the defence's own acknowledgement that penetration had occurred.

Sham Singh v. State of Haryana, (2018) 18 SCC 34, was quoted extensively on the sensitive but careful assessment of evidence of sexual assault. It explains that minor or immaterial discrepancies do not undermine an otherwise reliable account and that, where a prosecutrix's testimony inspires confidence, corroboration in material particulars need not be required as a rule. If the Court finds it difficult to rely implicitly on that testimony, it may look for other evidence lending assurance, without applying the standard of corroboration required for an accomplice. Sham Singh refers to State of Punjab v. Gurmit Singh and Ranjit Hazarika on these points. It also quotes Raju v. State of M.P., which cautions that these principles cannot be applied universally or mechanically. A false allegation can harm the accused, particularly where several accused are involved, and a witness's presence at the incident does not establish that every part of the account is accurate or free from embellishment. In the quoted passage, the Supreme Court stated that it had reassessed the material in the light of those principles. In the present case, the Court rejected the argument based on the missing FSL report after considering the direct adult evidence, medical findings and the defence's alternative explanation for penetration. The infant had not testified.

State of Punjab v. Gurmit Singh, (1996) 2 SCC 384, was also cited on the timing of the FIR. The quoted Supreme Court passage recognises that a complainant or family may hesitate to report a sexual offence because of stigma and concern for the victim and family. The present Court found that the FIR was lodged within about two hours and rejected the allegation of suspicious delay. It declined to infer antedating solely from the later acknowledged receipt of the copy sent to the Magistrate.

The Court cited Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, and Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, for the principle that a close relative is not inherently untrustworthy and ordinarily has no reason to shield the actual assailant by implicating an innocent person. Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, requires a factual foundation for a plea of false implication and careful scrutiny of whether the related witness's evidence is cogent and credible. Its quotation from Dalip Singh v. State of Punjab rejects a general distrust of relatives but recognises that a personal grudge may lead to an innocent person being implicated. Its references to Guli Chand, Vadivelu Thevar, Rameshwar, Masalti, Jagir Singh and Lehna support this assessment according to the facts of each case. Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, was quoted on the distinction between a related and an interested witness. An interested witness has a direct or indirect stake in the accused's conviction, arising from a benefit, prior enmity or another reason that supplies a motive for false implication. Kinship alone does not make a natural witness interested, although the evidence must still be tested for consistency, probability and reliability. Its references to Kalki, Amit, Gangabhavani, Ganapathi, Dalip Singh and Jayabalan supported that distinction. The Court applied these principles to the mother, father and Siyasharan and rejected the unsupported allegation of a land-related motive.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal against conviction and sentence. The conviction affirmed by the Bench was under Section 376(2)(f) IPC as applicable to the conduct in 2008. The investigation and charge-sheet were described as concerning Sections 376 and 511 IPC, but the appeal concerned conviction for the completed offence under the charge framed under Section 376(2)(f). The Court treated penetration, including possible partial penetration, as material to the offence of rape and considered whether the injury was caused by the accused or by an accident. It assessed the FIR and the medical and forensic investigative steps as part of the evidence.

4. Issues : The principal issue in the appeal was whether the prosecution had proved beyond reasonable doubt that the appellant raped the very young child by penetration. This required consideration of Siyasharan's everyday expression, the mother's direct observations, the father's indirect knowledge, the medical evidence and the defence of accidental injury from wood or a fall. The Bench also considered whether the missing FSL report left a material gap in proof; whether the interval of about two hours before reporting, or the later receipt of the FIR copy, indicated antedating; and whether family relationships or the alleged land dispute affected the witnesses' credibility. After deciding the question of conviction, it examined the propriety of the sentence of life imprisonment.

5. Ratio / Findings : In determining the occurrence and the offender's identity, the Bench distinguished direct from indirect knowledge. A admitted that he had not seen the appellant take the child away or bring her back. His repetition of B's account was hearsay that could be considered as corroborative evidence. B said that she saw the appellant take the child away and bring her back and immediately noticed that the child was crying and bleeding. Siyasharan described hearing cries from the appellant's house, entering it and seeing the appellant's act before the child was returned. The medical examination disclosed a hymenal tear, perineal laceration and continued bleeding, strongly consistent with penetration. Dr Laghate stated that penetration would not necessarily cause a labial laceration in a child of that age and explained why a fall would be expected to cause other injuries. The Court first recognised that medical evidence of penetration by a hard object did not, by itself, establish whether the injury resulted from rape or an accident. It then determined the cause of the injury and the offender's identity by assessing the eyewitness and defence accounts.

The Bench did not treat Siyasharan's expression “Bura Kaam” as a self-contained legal definition. It understood the expression in context. Applying Annu @ Anoop Kumar and its explanation of regional usage, the Bench did not require an explicit description of the physical details of the act. The witness's account, the child's immediate condition, the medical findings and the defence's assertion that penetration had occurred through wood clarified what was in dispute. The infant did not testify. The Court also emphasised sensitive recording of testimony in sexual-assault cases, avoiding unnecessary graphic detail.

The defence witnesses described accidental insertion of wood, but one could not state the date or month of the incident and was related to the appellant. The mother denied the suggestion that the child had fallen; the specific account involving wood was not put to her. The doctor found no external injury consistent with a fall. The Court also reasoned that a rough piece of wood would probably have injured the outer genital region, whereas the observed injuries were internal. The defence evidence acknowledged the mother's presence and the child's injury, but the Court found its accidental explanation unconvincing. No FSL report had been produced. The Court held that its absence was not fatal in view of the direct and medical evidence and the rejection of the alternative account. It referred to the possibility that the interrupted act had not resulted in discharge and to the stated inability to prepare a vaginal slide because of the child's age as reasons why a forensic result might not have been decisive. Sham Singh's principle against routinely requiring corroboration was invoked together with the warning in Raju that each case requires scrutiny and that false implication remains possible.

On timing, the Bench found that the FIR was lodged within about two hours of the incident. It found no basis for inferring antedating merely because a copy reached the Magistrate later. The head constable, who stated that the copy had been sent earlier, had not been questioned about the time taken for it to reach the Court. Gurmit Singh explained why a family might naturally deliberate before reporting a sexual offence, even if there had been some delay.

On credibility and motive, the Bench rejected the contention that the child's parents and Siyasharan were unreliable merely because they were related. Rupinder Singh Sandhu, Shamim, Rizan and Mohd. Rojali Ali require careful assessment of consistency and probability, with an evidentiary foundation for an alleged interest in falsely implicating the accused. They distinguish such an interest from kinship alone. The alleged land dispute concerned the child's maternal uncle rather than her parents. Although suggestions were put to the witnesses, the appellant produced no documentary evidence of the dispute. The Court did not rely on family status alone; it assessed the independently observed injury, B's account and Siyasharan's direct observations together. After considering the prosecution and defence evidence, it held guilt proved beyond reasonable doubt and affirmed the conviction under Section 376(2)(f).

The Bench then considered sentence. It emphasised the gravity of the rape of a child described as about one year old and the need for deterrence. It found no illegality in the trial court's sentence of life imprisonment and upheld it.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the judgment and sentence dated 13.05.2010 in Sessions Trial No. 46/2009. The conviction under Section 376(2)(f) IPC and the sentence of life imprisonment, a fine of Rs 10,000 and one year's rigorous imprisonment in default remained in force. The appellant was already in jail and was directed to undergo the remainder of his sentence. The office was directed to supply him with a free copy of the judgment immediately and to send the trial record, together with a copy of the judgment, to the trial court for information and compliance. There was no remand, acquittal, altered charge or separate relief for another accused.

Moolchand v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 443/2010, 06/12/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Murder — Section 300 thirdly — intended injury and sufficiency - Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, sets out four requirements. The prosecution must prove the bodily injury, its nature and the intention to inflict that particular injury. Whether the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death is then assessed objectively. A separate intention to cause death is unnecessary under clause Thirdly. The Court applied the framework of Sections 299–300 and upheld the conviction for murder by strangulation.

Homicide — Section 302 or 304 — single-blow factors and sudden fight - Arun Nivalaji More (Criminal Appeals 1078–1079 of 2005), Anda (1966 Cri LJ 171), Mahesh Balmiki ((2000) 1 SCC 319), Pulicherla Nagaraju ((2006) 11 SCC 444), Sangapagu Anjaiah ((2010) 9 SCC 799), Kanhaiyalal ((2019) 5 SCC 639) and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao ((2008) 15 SCC 725) were discussed on intention, knowledge and the circumstances governing conviction for murder or alteration of that conviction. A single injury does not automatically bring the offence under Section 304. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak ((2003) 9 SCC 322) requires every condition of Exception 4 to be satisfied, including a sudden mutual fight and the absence of undue advantage or cruelty. No factual foundation for a sudden fight was established in the present case, and alteration of the conviction to Section 304 Part I was refused.

General exceptions — Section 85 IPC — voluntary intoxication - The exception requires intoxication caused by an intoxicant administered without the person's knowledge or against his will, rendering him incapable of knowing the nature of the act or its wrongfulness. Voluntary drinking does not, by itself, excuse homicide. Basdev v. State of Pepsu, AIR 1956 SC 488, requires intention to be determined from the circumstances with due regard to the degree of intoxication; knowledge is attributed as if the accused were sober. The appellant failed to prove involuntary administration, and the Court rejected his plea of intoxication.

Evidence — child eyewitness — competence and corroboration - Competence under Section 118 depends on the ability to understand questions and give rational answers, rather than age alone. Rameshwar (AIR 1952 SC 54), Arbind Singh (1995 Supp (4) SCC 416), Panchhi ((1998) 7 SCC 177), Bhagwan Singh ((2003) 3 SCC 21), Ratansingh Dalsukhbhai Nayak ((2004) 1 SCC 64) and Golla Yelugu Govindu ((2008) 16 SCC 769) were considered on the need to guard against tutoring and to consider corroboration as a matter of prudence, subject to the circumstances. Reliable child testimony can sustain a conviction. The twelve-year-old daughter's consistent account of strangulation was supported by PW1 and PW2.

Evidence — homicidal death — medical and eyewitness assessment - The ante-mortem abrasions on the neck, the postmortem doctor's opinion that the death was homicidal and the child witness's consistent account supported the finding of death by strangulation. The defence disputed the cause of death and alleged a discrepancy in the scarf material. The Court affirmed the conviction after assessing the evidence before it.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Morari appealed against the judgment dated 24 December 2009 of the Additional Sessions Judge, Ambah, District Morena, in Sessions Trial No. 06/2009. He was convicted under Section 302 IPC of murdering his wife, Anguri Devi, and sentenced to life imprisonment, a fine of ₹1,000 and six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. According to the prosecution, on 17 September 2008 at about 9 p.m., Morari quarrelled with and assaulted his wife at home. Their daughter Priyanka cried out. Nephew Raghuveer Sakhwar (PW1) and Balveer Singh (PW2) entered and described Morari strangling Anguri with a scarf (safi). He then left the scene. A merg under Section 174 CrPC preceded registration of Crime No. 81/2008 under Section 302 IPC. After investigation, the case was committed for trial. The prosecution examined ten witnesses, including Priyanka (PW4), the investigation witnesses and Dr S.N. Mevafarosh (PW10), who conducted the postmortem. In his statement under Section 313 CrPC, Morari denied guilt and alleged that relatives seeking his agricultural land and house had tutored his two minor daughters. He examined no defence witness. On appeal, he relied on alleged omissions and contradictions in the evidence. He disputed the medical evidence concerning the cause of death, referred to the deceased's advanced pregnancy, and alleged a difference between the cotton scarf seized and the material sent for forensic examination. He also relied on the absence of motive or intention to kill, an alleged absence of eyewitnesses, and intoxication. He sought acquittal or alteration of the conviction to Section 304 Part I. The State supported the conviction. The High Court identified as its principal questions whether the death was homicidal, whether the offence amounted to murder and whether Section 304 Part I applied.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, sets out the requirements of Section 300 Thirdly. The prosecution must prove the bodily injury and its nature, the intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and the objective sufficiency of the injury to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. The burden remains on the prosecution throughout. The Court reproduced and applied the distinction between intending the injury and intending death. Its conclusion in the present case was expressed in terms of the neck injury, intention and the likely fatal consequence. Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra (Criminal Appeals 1078–1079 of 2005) explained the sequence of considering Section 299, the four clauses of Section 300 and its exceptions. Where the offence does not amount to murder, intention ordinarily attracts Section 304 Part I and knowledge alone attracts Section 304 Part II. Anda v. State of Rajasthan, 1966 Cri LJ 171, explained the high probability of death inherent in an injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and the relevance of the weapon and the site of injury. Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, rejected an automatic reduction of the offence merely because a single blow was inflicted. The weapon, site, manner of infliction and surrounding circumstances must be considered. Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, set out non-exhaustive factors bearing on intention, including the weapon, force, injury to a vital part, a chance occurrence or premeditation, prior hostility, provocation, sudden fight, undue advantage and the number of blows. Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, inferred intention on its facts from the weapon, the selection of the head as a vital part and the force of the injury. State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, also held that the number of blows is not decisive and discussed Exception 4 through quotations from Arun Raj, Ashokkumar Magabhai Vankar and Leela Ram. Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, emphasised the circumstances accompanying a single injury. It quoted State of Karnataka v. Vedanayagam, (1995) 1 SCC 326, and Virsa Singh on the need to distinguish the intention to inflict the particular injury from the seriousness of that injury. The Court discussed these authorities as part of the framework for distinguishing murder from culpable homicide not amounting to murder; it did not find that the present case involved a single blow. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, explained that Exception 4 requires a sudden mutual fight, absence of premeditation, heat of passion and absence of undue advantage or cruel conduct. All these conditions must be satisfied. The Court found no evidentiary foundation for the exception in the present case.

On intoxication, the Court referred to Mirza Ghani Baig v. State of Andhra Pradesh, 1997 (2) Crimes 19 (AP), where the conviction was altered on the particular facts involving intoxication and a subsequent attempt to rescue the victim. It did not treat that decision as controlling the present case. The Court discussed Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, (1920) AC 479, and other writings and decisions on the distinction between intoxication that prevents formation of a required specific intention and drinking that merely lowers inhibition. It relied on the Supreme Court decision in Basdev v. State of Pepsu, AIR 1956 SC 488. Voluntary intoxication does not prevent the attribution of knowledge, but intention must be inferred from the circumstances with due regard to the degree of intoxication. The Court rejected Morari's plea because the statutory requirement of involuntary administration had not been established on the evidence. Chet Ram v. State of H.P. and State of Orissa v. Kabasi were also cited for the proposition that voluntary drinking does not provide the exception under Section 85.

On the child witness, the Court quoted the Privy Council decision in Mohamed Sugal Esa v. The King, AIR 1946 PC 3, and the Supreme Court decision in Rameshwar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1952 SC 54, on corroboration as a matter of prudence rather than an invariable legal requirement. Arbind Singh v. State of Bihar, 1995 Supp (4) SCC 416, warned of the risk of tutoring and the need to seek corroboration, particularly where the evidence shows signs of it. Panchhi v. State of U.P., (1998) 7 SCC 177, rejected automatic exclusion of a child's testimony while requiring greater care in its evaluation. It treated corroboration as a matter of practical wisdom, referring to Prakash, Baby Kandayanathil, Raja Ram Yadav and Dattu Ramrao Sakhare. Bhagwan Singh v. State of M.P., (2003) 3 SCC 21, required special caution and supporting evidence in the circumstances of a particularly immature six-year-old witness. Ratansingh Dalsukhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 1 SCC 64, held that the assessment of a child's competence rests primarily with the trial judge, subject to appellate correction where the record shows error. It permits conviction on a child's sole testimony where careful scrutiny establishes reliability. Golla Yelugu Govindu v. State of A.P., (2008) 16 SCC 769, explained that Section 118 sets no fixed age limit: the test is the ability to understand questions and give rational answers. The Court applied these principles to PW4's consistent account, which was also supported by PW1 and PW2. Sidhartha Vashist v. State (NCT of Delhi), AIR 2010 SC 2352, was cited on the limits of judicial questioning under Section 165 of the Evidence Act. Sakshi v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 518, was quoted on measures for child victims of sexual offences and Section 273 CrPC. The discussion of Section 273 CrPC formed part of that reproduced passage.

3. Statutes considered : Section 299 IPC concerns death caused with the intention to kill, the intention to cause an injury likely to cause death, or knowledge that death is likely. Under Section 300, culpable homicide is murder where one of its clauses applies, unless an exception applies. Clause Thirdly concerns an intentionally inflicted injury that is objectively sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Exception 4 requires a sudden fight without premeditation, heat of passion, and the absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. Section 302 prescribes the punishment for murder. The appellant sought alteration of the conviction to Section 304 Part I; the Court also explained Part II where the offence does not amount to murder and knowledge alone is established. Section 85 IPC concerns involuntary intoxication that renders a person incapable of knowing the nature of the act or its wrongfulness, where the intoxicant was administered without his knowledge or against his will. Section 118 of the Evidence Act concerns the ability to understand questions and give rational answers. Section 165 governs the trial judge's power to ask questions, subject to its statutory limits. Section 174 CrPC arose in connection with the merg, and Section 313 governed Morari's examination. Section 273 CrPC was discussed in the reproduced Sakshi passage on the testimony of child victims of sexual offences.

4. Issues : (i) Did the prosecution establish that the death was homicidal and that Morari was responsible for strangulation with the scarf, despite his objections concerning the cause of death, witness accounts and scarf material? (ii) Did the proved assault and the requisite mental element constitute murder under Sections 299–300, punishable under Section 302, or did the alleged absence of intention, intoxication or sudden quarrel warrant application of Section 304 Part I? (iii) Was the exception under Section 85 established by evidence of involuntary administration and incapacity, and how did the degree of intoxication bear on intention? (iv) Was Priyanka competent and reliable as a child eyewitness under Section 118, after scrutiny for tutoring and consideration of corroboration?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted the postmortem doctor's evidence of ante-mortem neck abrasions, a forehead abrasion and his opinion that the death was homicidal; it noted that his evidence was unshaken in cross-examination. It treated the case as principally dependent on the child witness's testimony. PW4 said that her father strangled her mother with a scarf and identified him. The Court found her account unchanged in cross-examination and supported by PW1 and PW2, who had arrived at the house. It referred to these two adults as witnesses to the last-seen circumstances and also described them as eyewitnesses. Their supporting accounts and the appellant's abscondence were considered in determining identification and guilt. The Court referred to seizure and investigation witnesses in paragraphs 68–69.

The Court examined the distinction between culpable homicide and murder. It reproduced the requirements of clause Thirdly explained in Virsa Singh, the sequential classification in Arun Nivalaji More, and the Supreme Court's approach to determining intention and the effect of a single blow from the surrounding circumstances. On the evidence of strangulation with a scarf, fatal neck injuries and eyewitness testimony, it found the ingredients of murder established. It refused alteration of the conviction to Section 304 Part I because there was no evidence that the assault occurred on the spur of the moment or in the heat of an exchange of words, and no evidentiary basis for the proposed exception. The single-injury decisions explained the legal approach but did not govern the facts of this case.

On intoxication, the Court examined the express requirement under Section 85 that the intoxicant must have been administered without the person's knowledge or against his will. Voluntary drinking was insufficient to attract that exception. The appellant had not proved that another person administered the intoxicant without his knowledge. The Court considered Basdev's distinction between knowledge attributed as if the accused were sober and intention inferred from the circumstances with regard to the degree of intoxication. It rejected the claim under Section 85 and the request to alter the conviction to Section 304 Part I on the evidence before it.

On the child's testimony, the Court applied the functional test of competence under Section 118 and the Supreme Court's requirement of careful scrutiny for reliability and tutoring. It found Priyanka's account consistent and independently supported by the two adult witnesses. It also considered Morari's abscondence as one of the circumstances.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the jail appeal and affirmed the conviction under Section 302 IPC and the sentence of life imprisonment, a fine of ₹1,000 and six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. It refused alteration of the conviction to Section 304 Part I and the exception claimed on the ground of intoxication. Morari remained in jail. The Court directed that the result be communicated to him through the Jail Superintendent and that the trial record be returned with a copy of the judgment.

Headnote :- Evidence — common witnesses — acquittal of co-accused - Shakila Abdul Gafar Khan v. Vasant Raghunath Dhoble, (2003) 7 SCC 749; Kameshwar Singh v. State of Bihar, (2018) 6 SCC 433; Mahendran v. State of Tamil Nadu, (2019) 5 SCC 67; and T.G. Krishnamurthy v. State of Karnataka, Criminal Appeal No. 1265/2012 decided 17.08.2023, were considered. Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus does not apply in India as a mandatory rule; evidence insufficient against one accused may still prove another's guilt if trustworthy portions can be separated without reconstructing a new case. Ganesh's acquittal therefore did not itself require Moti Singh's acquittal; on independent scrutiny the prosecution evidence against him failed to prove his guilt.

Proof — defence witnesses — reasonable doubt - Defence witnesses stand on the same evaluative footing as prosecution witnesses. The partly torn internal register pages, divergent accounts of their damage, unexplained participation of nonmembers in a meeting outside the Panchayat building, the accused's contemporaneous countercomplaint and defence witnesses together undermined proof of assault and caste abuse. The prosecution failed to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt; all three convictions were set aside. These circumstances were considered cumulatively, without an automatic inference from any single discrepancy.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Moti Singh, the Up-Sarpanch of Gram Panchayat Bhiyantal, appealed under Section 374 CrPC from the Special Judge, Chhatarpur's judgment of 14 June 2002 in Special Case No. 57/2001. He had been sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment under Section 294 IPC, three months under Section 323 IPC, and one year under Section 3(1)(x) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989, with a ₹500 fine and one month in default on the special-statute count; substantive terms were concurrent. His co-accused Ganesh had been acquitted of all charges. The prosecution alleged that at a Panchayat meeting on 2 August 2000 Moti demanded the proceedings register, tore its pages, pushed or struck Sarpanch Chutua (PW1), and insulted Chutua and Panchayat Karmi Ramlal (PW4) by caste name. A complaint, FIR, seized register and medical examination followed; charges included Section 506 Part II IPC, but the appealed conviction did not. Eight prosecution witnesses and four defence witnesses were examined. Moti argued that acquittal of Ganesh on the witnesses' account made his own conviction untenable. The State opposed the appeal.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court relied directly on Shakila Abdul Gafar Khan v. Vasant Raghunath Dhoble, (2003) 7 SCC 749, for the absence in Indian law of a mandatory falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus rule. A lie or weakness in one part does not automatically destroy all testimony; the court must sift truth from falsehood, recognise ordinary discrepancies, and reject the whole account if inseparable falsity would require constructing a materially new prosecution story. Its quoted passage references Nisar Ali, Sohrab, Ugar Ahir, Zwinglee Ariel, Balaka Singh, Kalki, Krishna Mochi, Gangadhar Behera and Rizan as supporting or qualifying illustrations.

Kameshwar Singh v. State of Bihar, (2018) 6 SCC 433, similarly rejected the maxim as a rule of law or practice, required examination of a trustworthy residue and retained the benefit of doubt if serious suspicion survives careful appraisal. Mahendran v. State of Tamil Nadu, (2019) 5 SCC 67, reproduced Gangadhar Behera v. State of Orissa, (2002) 8 SCC 381: despite acquittal of other accused on some common testimony, conviction may survive if the residue proves a particular accused's guilt; the court must differentiate the cases and cannot reject all evidence mechanically. The nested passage also explains ordinary versus material discrepancy and the limit where truth and falsehood are inseparable; it cites Jagir Singh, Lehna, Gurcharan Singh and other earlier cases within that reasoning. T.G. Krishnamurthy v. State of Karnataka, Criminal Appeal No. 1265/2012 decided 17 August 2023, reinforced that Indian courts must separate chaff from grain rather than discard testimony merely because a co-accused was acquitted. The Court applied this shared principle by refusing Moti's automatic-acquittal submission, then scrutinised the particular evidence and ultimately acquitted him for failure of proof, not because Ganesh was acquitted.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the conviction appeal; Section 161 CrPC appeared in examining omissions from PW7's police statement. IPC Sections 294 and 323 and Section 3(1)(x) of the SC/ST Act, as applicable to the 2000 occurrence, were the convictions reviewed. Section 506 Part II IPC was charged but did not form part of the appealed conviction. The Court decided that the alleged abusive words and assault were not proved on the evidence. The requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt and non-mandatory status of falsus in uno controlled the appellate evidence assessment.

4. Issues : (i) Did Ganesh's acquittal on related testimony legally compel the acquittal of Moti, or was the evidence against each accused to be weighed separately? (ii) After that separate appraisal, did the prosecution prove Moti's alleged assault, obscene abuse and caste-based humiliation beyond reasonable doubt, taking into account the condition of the register, discrepancies among the witnesses, the countercomplaint and defence evidence?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first rejected the claimed automatic effect of Ganesh's acquittal. The four Supreme Court decisions establish that partial unreliability is a matter of evidentiary weight rather than a command to discard every part of a witness's statement. The factual basis and trustworthy residue as to each accused must be examined, while material contradictions and inseparable falsehood may defeat proof. Thus the appellant could not obtain acquittal merely because another accused had been acquitted.

In its own appraisal, the Court recounted Chutua's account of a dispute about the register, caste words, threats and a push or blows, including his denials of suggested Panchayat irregularities and assault on Moti. PW2 described torn pages occurring during a snatching scuffle, while PW4 described a fist blow and scuffle but did not give the same account of the register being snatched during writing; PW5's claimed presence was contradicted by PW4. PW7 admitted omissions in his Section 161 statement. The hardbound register showed only two partly torn internal pages concerning the meeting; the Court viewed this physical condition as suspicious against the shifting accounts of deliberate tearing or accidental damage in a snatching. The meeting was held at Raikwar Bhawan although the Panchayat had a building, and several attendees were not elected Panchas. The register also contained disputed resolutions, including a wage withdrawal connected to a well; the Court used this as context for the quarrel, not as a final adjudication of embezzlement or election of a Moharir. PW3 found no external injury on Chutua but recorded ear pain. Defence witness Ramsharan denied abuse and assault; the police diary and Moti's medical examination supported a contemporaneous countercomplaint, and Narayan Singh described objections to how resolutions were being recorded and an assault on Moti. The Court expressly held that defence witnesses cannot be evaluated on a lower footing. In combination, the evidence left reasonable doubt about the alleged abuse and assault; the Court held that the prosecution had not proved guilt rather than applying the falsus maxim or treating one document or medical detail as automatically decisive.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. The judgment and sentences of 14 June 2002 were set aside; Moti was acquitted of Section 294 and 323 IPC and Section 3(1)(x) SC/ST Act charges. His bail and surety bonds were discharged, he was no longer required in the case, and a copy of the judgment with the record was ordered back to the trial court. Ganesh's earlier acquittal was only background and was not altered.

Headnote :- Criminal appeal — absent appellant's counsel — decision on merits - Following Surya Baksh Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2014) 14 SCC 222, the Court proceeded to examine the record and appeal grounds after repeated nonappearance by counsel. Absence did not foreclose merits review: the Section 306 conviction was ultimately reversed.

Evidence — related or interested witnesses — scrutiny and hostility - Mahavir Singh v. State of M.P., (2016) 10 SCC 220; Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 6 SCC 418; Vijendra Singh v. State of U.P., (2017) 11 SCC 129; Raju v. State of T.N., (2012) 12 SCC 701; Jodhan v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 52; and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, were considered. Kinship alone neither discredits a witness nor invariably demands corroboration; genuine hostility or interest requires discerning scrutiny of intrinsic reliability and, in a proper case, supporting evidence. Raju qualifies any blanket classification of a natural relative as disinterested. The deceased's relatives established a loan, but their claim of complete repayment and further coercive demands did not withstand examination against available records.

Proof — alleged overpayment and further demand — available evidence — failure of proof - The transaction diary had not been proved or shown to concern this loan; the son who produced it and the purchaser were not examined, and the land-sale deed was not produced. With earlier hostility and a genuine underlying loan admitted, the prosecution did not prove repayment of the loan or the additional payment of ₹3,00,000 said to have preceded the allegedly unlawful demand for ₹2,00,000. The adverse inference and resulting doubt arose on this record, without creating a categorical documentary-corroboration requirement.

Abetment of suicide — Sections 107 and 306 IPC — instigation and loan recovery - Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605; Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734; Sanju v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371; Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., (2010) 1 SCC 750; M. Mohan v. State, AIR 2011 SC 1238; Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797; Amalendu Pal v. State of W.B., (2010) 1 SCC 707; and Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73, informed the requirements of intentional instigation or aid, a positive act or sufficiently linked course of conduct, and careful fact-specific assessment. The proved demand for return of the lender's own money did not show incitement of suicide; conviction under Section 306 was set aside.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Motilal appealed under Section 374 CrPC against the First Additional Sessions Judge, Dewas's conviction of 4 May 1999 in Sessions Trial No. 40/1998 under Section 306 IPC and sentence of five years' rigorous imprisonment, ₹2,000 fine and default imprisonment. The appeal was heard on its merits without appellant's counsel: the record showed counsel at the initial June 1999 listing, suspension of sentence and bail in July 1999 despite absence, and further nonappearance on 16 April and 2 August 2018. The Court relied on Surya Baksh Singh to examine the record rather than leave the appeal unresolved.

Kailashchand died on 30 May 1997 after consuming a poisonous substance. The police recorded a Section 174 CrPC merg, recovered sulphas tablets and material near the body, and charged Motilal and Yusuf alias Irshad with abetment of suicide. Their alleged harassment concerned money advanced by Motilal. The trial court convicted Motilal but acquitted Yusuf; that acquittal was not challenged and was mentioned only to understand the prosecution case against Motilal. Motilal's appeal asserted that he merely requested return of his loan, that family witnesses had earlier hostility and that a purported transaction diary did not prove any harassment or unlawful demand. The State said the debt was fully repaid, an extra ₹3,00,000 paid after a land sale and a further ₹2,00,000 demanded, driving Kailash to suicide. Earlier criminal litigation between the families was undisputed, including a case initiated on the report of Kailash's wife Laxmibai. The prosecution examined twelve witnesses; the accused called two defence witnesses. The doctor noted no external injury and described asphyxia; although an FSL report arrived during trial it was not exhibited. The Court inferred suicide from the scene, sulphas tablets and vomiting, while focusing the contested appeal on abetment.

2. Precedents — Considered : Surya Baksh Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, (2014) 14 SCC 222, supplied the approach to a conviction appeal repeatedly listed without the appellant's counsel: the High Court examined the record and decided the appeal on its merits.

On family testimony, Mahavir Singh v. State of M.P., (2016) 10 SCC 220, required close scrutiny of an interested witness for a credible ring of truth and cautioned that contradicted interested testimony is not usually conclusive. Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 6 SCC 418, discussed hostility shared by a relative, careful assessment of infirmities and the fact that independent corroboration is not indispensable merely because interested witnesses testify; its quoted Darya Singh and Raghubir Singh passages are limited to the witness assessment and proof context reproduced. Vijendra Singh v. State of U.P., (2017) 11 SCC 129, reproduced Hari Obula Reddy's rule that intrinsically reliable interested evidence may suffice without mandatory independent support, and contrasted a related natural witness with a genuinely interested witness by reference to Kartik Malhar. Raju v. State of T.N., (2012) 12 SCC 701, supplied a substantial qualification: relying on Basawan Singh's treatment of an interested trap witness, it described Kalki's narrow suggestion that a natural relative cannot be interested as too general; categories matter less than case-specific scrutiny, with extra care where relationship and hostility coincide. It also quoted Dalip Singh and Darya Singh against automatic exclusion or mandatory corroboration, and Waman's summary that kinship alone does not destroy consistent testimony. Jodhan v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 52, restated that family or partisan evidence can support conviction if reliable, but suspicious testimony or a demonstrated motive for false implication calls for careful appraisal and, in an appropriate case, material corroboration. Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, surveyed Dalip Singh, Piara Singh, Hari Obula Reddy and Ramashish Rai: enmity is double edged, potentially explaining both the offence and false implication, and no rigid exclusion arises merely from kinship. The present Court distilled these authorities to a test of evidentiary reliability; it did not find the family witnesses inherently incompetent but tested their asserted repayments and demands against the available proof and prior hostile litigation.

On abetment, Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, explained that instigation is goading, urging, provoking or encouraging; a particular form of words is unnecessary, and a sustained course of conduct leaving the deceased no apparent option can supply an inference, but there must be reasonably ascertainable incitement. Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, distinguished intended instigation from angry words and rejected a rigid formula for circumstantial inference; the cited passage also concerns tentative quashing-stage evaluation. Sanju alias Sanjay Singh Sengar v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371, required mens rea for instigation within Section 107's alternatives of instigation, conspiracy and intentional aid. Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., (2010) 1 SCC 750, required a positive act and clear mental process directed to abetment; it cautioned against attributing a hypersensitive suicide to ordinary discord without sufficient causal and intentional link. State of W.B. v. Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73, was quoted for the careful factual assessment underlying that caution, in its own domestic-cruelty setting. M. Mohan v. State, AIR 2011 SC 1238, similarly required a clear mens rea and an active or direct act intended to leave the deceased with no option but to commit suicide. Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797, articulated the three forms of abetment under Section 107 and the specific offence connection under Section 109. Amalendu Pal v. State of W.B., (2010) 1 SCC 707, required proof of direct or indirect incitement and a positive proximate act, and explained intentional aid under Section 107's third clause. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, was quoted for circumstantial instigation and the limit of tentative charge-stage review. Ghusabhai Raisangbhai Chorasiya v. State of Gujarat, (2015) 11 SCC 753, reproduced a separate Section 498A marital-cruelty example to show that a moral wrong alone is not necessarily the statutory cruelty driving suicide. The Court applied the shared standard under Sections 107 and 306 to a proven lender's demand for return of money, not a proved campaign of extortion after repayment.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal and Section 174 CrPC the initial death enquiry. IPC Section 306 requires a suicide and its abetment. Section 107 defines abetment by instigation, conspiracy with an act or illegal omission pursuant to it, or intentional aid; the Court focused on instigation, examining the mental element and actual conduct. Section 109 appeared in the reproduced Kishori Lal and Amalendu Pal passages. Sections 294, 323 and 506 Part II IPC concerned earlier litigation between the parties. Section 228 CrPC appeared inside the quoted Praveen Pradhan passage concerning a preliminary stage. The Court treated the deceased's transaction diary and the unproduced registered land-sale evidence as evidentiary issues in establishing the prosecution's premise of repaid debt and fresh unlawful demand.

4. Issues : (i) Could and should the conviction appeal be decided on its merits despite the appellant's counsel's repeated absence? (ii) Was Kailash's death suicidal on the available medical and scene evidence, and was there a distinct act of abetment by Motilal? (iii) Were family witnesses with previous adversarial history credible as to full repayment, additional payment after a land sale and a further coercive demand, given the unproved diary and absent sale deed or purchaser? (iv) Did the proven request for return of a genuine loan meet the Section 107 test of instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid so as to sustain Section 306 at the final conviction standard? Yusuf's unchallenged acquittal and earlier criminal case were contextual matters, not appeals decided here.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court followed Surya Baksh Singh to examine the appeal record notwithstanding counsel's nonappearance. It found Kailash's death suicidal: the doctor found no external injury and gave asphyxia as cause, though the postmortem report did not attribute it specifically to poison; the scene had sulphas tablets and vomiting, and homicide or natural death was not supported. The FSL report had not been exhibited, a qualification the Court acknowledged. Suicide still required separate proof of abetment by this appellant.

The Court accepted that Motilal had lent Kailash money. Applying the detailed related-witness authorities, it did not discard relatives' testimony merely for kinship. The earlier assault case and hostility required close appraisal of their assertions about repayment and later demands. The deceased's diary was produced but never proved or exhibited as a record of this transaction, and the son who produced it was not called. The land-sale deed was not produced and the purchaser was not examined to verify the asserted source of the extra payment of ₹3,00,000. Where a registered conveyance could have been produced and examined, the failure to produce that available evidence permitted an adverse inference on this record. With the fundamental fact of a loan accepted and the alleged repayments or overcharge unproved, the Court did not accept that the additional ₹2,00,000 demand was an extortionate demand after full discharge. It inferred a demand for the lender's own money. The central failure was proof of repayment and subsequent unlawful exaction.

Section 107's instigation limb requires a purposeful act or course of conduct capable of inciting suicide, though express exhortation is not the only form and the inquiry remains fact-specific. The Court considered the cited Supreme Court cases on mens rea, positive act, proximity and causation, while preserving the fact that some cited passages addressed domestic disputes or preliminary criminal stages. On the facts found, Motilal had asked for repayment of a genuine debt. The prosecution did not prove conduct which goaded, provoked, incited, urged or intentionally aided Kailash's suicide. Suicide following pressure to repay did not by itself convert legitimate recovery into abetment. The Court therefore held that guilt under Section 306 had not been proved beyond reasonable doubt and reversed the conviction. The decision is confined to the evidentiary premise and conduct established here.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. The conviction and sentence dated 4 May 1999 under Section 306 IPC were set aside; Motilal was acquitted. He was on bail, and his bail bond and surety bond were discharged. The unchallenged acquittal of Yusuf alias Irshad was left untouched. No retrial or modification of the unrelated earlier case was ordered.

Headnote :- Evidence — related and interested witnesses — natural presence, interest and reliability - Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475; Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509; Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661; and Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, were considered. Kinship or common caste alone does not establish a motive to falsely implicate; a concrete interest arising from hostility or another benefit and intrinsic inconsistencies require scrutiny. Four neighbours came naturally on hearing screams, but their observation of the appellant fleeing did not cure the doubts emerging from the prosecutrix's admissions and the disputed shawl account.

Proof — quality rather than number — limits on adverse inference from absent witnesses - Sarwan Singh v. State of Punjab, (1976) 4 SCC 369; Yanob Sheikh v. State of W.B., (2013) 6 SCC 428; Mahesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 13 SCC 271; Nagarjit Ahir v. State of Bihar, (2005) 10 SCC 369; Vijendra Singh v. State of U.P., (2017) 11 SCC 129; and Sadhu Saran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, distinguish unnecessary witness multiplication from withholding a genuinely material available witness. Section 134 of the Evidence Act imposes no numerical minimum; trustworthiness and the prosecution's burden control. Neighbours testified here, yet material defects in the testimony left reasonable doubt.

Sections 457 and 354 IPC — witness discrepancies and alternative inference supported by the evidence - The prosecutrix said the appellant grabbed her hand, tried to remove clothing and threatened her. Her reproduced cross-examination admitted his visits and her husband's suspicion and quarrels. Ramwati said two men caught the appellant, Shankarlal said only his shawl was caught, and Heera described a chase with the shawl inside the home. The Court considered a possibility of consent or false implication, did not find either proved, and found that guilt had not been proved beyond reasonable doubt. Both convictions and sentences were set aside; the earlier acquittal under Section 3(1)(11) of the SC/ST Act was not reversed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Motiram Bisen appealed under Section 374 CrPC from the Special Judge (SC/ST Act), Balaghat's judgment of 31 May 2008 in Special Sessions Case No. 9/2008. The trial court had convicted him under Section 457 IPC, with one year’s rigorous imprisonment, ₹500 fine and three months’ default imprisonment, and Section 354 IPC, with six months’ rigorous imprisonment, ₹500 fine and one and a half months’ default imprisonment. It acquitted him of the alternative Section 3(1)(11) SC/ST Act charge. The police charge-sheet had referred to Section 456 and Section 354 IPC and Section 3(1)(11), but the charges framed and the convictions challenged in appeal were under Sections 457 and 354.

The prosecution alleged that at about 9 p.m. on 2 January 2008 the appellant entered the prosecutrix Belabai's house from the rear, held her hand with an objectionable intention and said he would do “bura kaam.” She testified that he tried to remove her clothes and threatened to kill her when she shouted. Her husband Heera returned on hearing the screams; neighbours Ramwati, Sonu, Shankarlal and Lakhan gathered, and the appellant was reportedly seen running away. A shawl said to be his was seized. The FIR was lodged at 12:40 p.m. the following day, the stated reason for delay being the late hour. Police sent the Section 157 CrPC report to the Magistrate, arrested the appellant, sought the prosecutrix's medical examination and recorded statements. He pleaded not guilty and called no defence witness.

Lakhan (PW-1) did not see the incident and recounted what he heard from the husband and prosecutrix. Ramwati (PW-2) and Sonu (PW-3) heard screams and saw the appellant fleeing; Shankarlal (PW-4) described trying to catch him and obtaining his shawl. Heera (PW-5) said he chased the appellant for a distance. The prosecutrix (PW-6) was the direct source of the alleged hand-grabbing and attempted undressing. Radheylal (PW-7) recorded the FIR and Santosh (PW-8) investigated. On appeal, the defence asserted interested testimony, earlier enmity, a possible consensual encounter or false accusation, next-day FIR delay and a spot-map objection to rear entry. The State supported the conviction.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, was quoted for the proposition that relationship with the deceased does not alone make a witness untrustworthy and relatives are ordinarily unlikely to exonerate the true culprit in favour of an innocent person. Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, gave weight to natural family testimony while recognising the ordinary reason for a spouse or child not to shield the real offender. These are general credibility principles, not automatic validation of the present testimony.

Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, required a foundation for an asserted false implication and careful testing of related testimony for cogency. Its reproduced Dalip Singh discussion rejects a general corroboration requirement based merely on relationship or the witness's sex, but recognises that real enmity can create a reason to implicate another; each case remains fact-specific. Rizan referred in the reproduced passage to Guli Chand, Vadivelu Thevar, Masalti, Jagir Singh and Lehna; Masalti in particular rejects mechanical exclusion of partisan evidence while requiring caution. Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, distinguished a related natural witness from a genuinely interested person who gains from conviction or bears prior enmity and motive. Its reproduced discussion invokes Kalki, Amit, Gangabhavani, Ganapathi, Dalip Singh and Jayabalan to distinguish relationship from benefit and to require consistency, probability and cogency rather than either automatic distrust or uncritical acceptance. The High Court used these authorities to test the neighbours and prosecutrix, not to exclude them simply for family or caste affiliation.

Sarwan Singh v. State of Punjab, (1976) 4 SCC 369, explained the prosecution's choice of witnesses and the distinction between withholding an available, essential eyewitness and failing to multiply witnesses on minor or repetitive points; only the former may support a contextual adverse inference. Yanob Sheikh v. State of W.B., (2013) 6 SCC 428, held that the prosecution's beyond-reasonable-doubt burden concerns quality as well as quantity. It reproduced Namdeo's Section 134 Evidence Act rule that a solitary reliable witness may support conviction, while several witnesses may still fail, and Bipin Kumar Mondal's "weighed and not counted" reliability test. The latter qualification applied in the present case: several witnesses testified but their accounts did not establish guilt.

Mahesh v. State of Maharashtra, (2008) 13 SCC 271, addressed a reliable injured eyewitness and reluctance of strangers to testify; relationship or absence of independent witnesses is no automatic reason to reject otherwise credible evidence, but scrutiny remains. Vijendra Singh v. State of U.P., (2017) 11 SCC 129, assessed the non-examination of other witnesses by first considering the trustworthiness of the available evidence. Its reproduced Gian Chand and Takhaji Hiraji passages distinguish cumulative testimony from an available person who could unfold the genesis or fill a material gap; Dahari, Manjit Singh and Joginder Singh illustrate when adequate other proof prevents an adverse inference. Sadhu Saran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, rejects automatic failure for absent independent witnesses given public reluctance, conditional on trustworthy eyewitness evidence. These authorities explained why the four naturally present neighbours could be considered; they did not preclude the Court from finding their accounts materially inconsistent and the prosecution proof inadequate.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC provided the conviction appeal. IPC Section 457 concerned the house-trespass conviction and Section 354 the allegation of outraging the prosecutrix's modesty. The Court set both convictions aside because the prosecution's evidence did not establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Police had initially invoked Section 456 IPC as stated in the charge-sheet; the court framed charges under Section 457 instead, and the appeal concerned that provision. Section 3(1)(11) of the SC/ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act was an alternative trial charge ending in an acquittal and was not independently reinterpreted or revived on this appeal. Section 134 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 appeared in the Supreme Court's reproduced witness-number discussion: no particular number is necessary for proof.

4. Issues : (i) Did the neighbours' family or caste connections, the prosecutrix's relationship to Heera and the asserted prior hostility make their testimony inherently unworthy of reliance, or did the Court have to assess specific interest, natural presence and credibility? (ii) What weight should be given to the quantity of eyewitnesses and to the principle concerning unexamined independent or truly material witnesses where four neighbours did testify? (iii) Did the prosecutrix's cross-examination about the appellant's visits and her husband's suspicion, together with the conflicting accounts of capture, chase and shawl, leave reasonable doubt on the Section 457 and 354 charges?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court applied the Supreme Court's related-versus-interested distinction. Mere relationship or common caste did not taint the witnesses, and the neighbours' presence after screams between 9 and 10 p.m. was natural. Lakhan's account of the assault, however, was hearsay; Ramwati, Sonu and Shankarlal saw a fleeing person rather than the alleged hand-grabbing itself. Their testimony had to be assessed for consistency and any demonstrated motive for false implication, not simply counted.

The prosecutrix supported the allegation of a hand being caught, attempted disrobing and a threat. Her cross-examination was reproduced in paragraph 35; it admitted that the appellant visited her house and that her husband suspected her on that account, causing marital quarrels. The Court inferred a genuine possibility of a consensual encounter or false implication based on enmity. That was an alternative inference sufficient to create doubt, not a judicial finding that consent was actually proved. The Court then identified a material discrepancy: Ramwati said Shankarlal and Heera caught the appellant, Shankarlal said they managed to hold only his shawl, whereas Heera said he chased the appellant some distance and the shawl was with the prosecutrix inside the house. The disagreement went to pursuit and the physical item said to connect the appellant to the event. On the whole record, the prosecution failed to establish either charged IPC offence beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. The convictions and sentences under Sections 457 and 354 IPC in the Special Judge's judgment of 31 May 2008 were set aside and Motiram Bisen was acquitted of those charges. His bail and surety bonds were discharged; he was no longer required in this case, and the judgment with the trial record was directed back for compliance. The trial court's existing Section 3(1)(11) SC/ST Act acquittal was not converted into a conviction or separately reviewed.

Motiram Bisen v. The State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 1214/2008, 17/01/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Child sexual offence — testimony and dock identification - Sakshi v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 518, and Section 36 POCSO were invoked to protect a child from seeing the accused while testifying, while ensuring that the accused could hear the testimony and communicate with counsel. The two-year-old was not examined; the Court found that her conventional dock identification could not be demanded where adult eyewitnesses identified the appellant as the person who took the child and medical evidence established rape and injury.

Evidence — last seen, Section 106 and recovery - Teja v. State of U.P., (1956) 1 SCC 481, and Ravasaheb alias Ravasahebgouda v. State of Karnataka, (2023) 5 SCC 391, were considered. The child was taken in the presence of witnesses, and an FIR naming the appellant was lodged two hours later. About nineteen hours after the taking, she was recovered at a distant site on information given by the appellant. Her undergarment was also recovered on his information. With those foundational circumstances proved, his failure to explain when and how he parted company with her strengthened the inference. Section 106 did not replace the prosecution's burden of proof. The child survived, and the interval was considered together with the recovery evidence.

Forensic proof — absence of DNA report - Sunil v. State of M.P., (2017) 4 SCC 393, permits conviction without DNA when the remaining evidence is clinching. The substantially unchallenged medical report, eyewitnesses to the taking, the prompt FIR naming the appellant and the recovery evidence supported the conviction here. The appellant had not sought production of a potentially helpful DNA report at trial; its absence alone did not require acquittal.

Attempted murder — abandonment of a badly wounded two-year-old child - The Court inferred intent under Section 307 IPC from the appellant's deliberate removal of the two-year-old, the proved rape and injuries, and her abandonment overnight in distant roadside bushes, where her life was endangered. The conclusion was drawn from this entire sequence, and convictions under Sections 366, 376(2)(i) and (m), and 307 remained intact.

Sentence — child rape and concurrent terms - The Section 376(2)(i) life term, understood by the trial court as lasting for natural life, was reduced to twenty years of actual rigorous imprisonment without remission after considering the statutory sentencing range and absence of proved antecedents. The ten-year terms under Sections 366 and 307 and the fines remained unchanged. The substantive sentences were directed to run concurrently. On these facts, the absence of a separate sentence under Section 376(2)(m), which the State had not challenged, was not treated as an illegality. The offences remained distinct.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh Jatav filed Criminal Appeal No. 906 of 2017 against the judgment dated 6 February 2017 of the Fifth Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior, in Sessions Trial No. 530/2014. He had been convicted under IPC Sections 366, 376(2)(i) and (m), and 307. The trial court imposed ten years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹5,000 under Section 366, a single sentence of life imprisonment and a fine of ₹10,000 under the rape provisions, and ten years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹10,000 under Section 307, with default stipulations. The victim was two years old on 13 July 2014; the appellant knew her father. These aspects of age and acquaintance were undisputed.

The prosecution account was that the father and child were outside their house near a motorcycle with its key in the ignition. The appellant appeared to play with the child, took her in his arms, started the motorcycle and drove away. Her father and neighbour Indresh pursued without catching him. After a search, the father named the appellant in the Mohna police FIR, Ex. P/1, at about 8 p.m., two hours after the alleged taking. The child was recovered on 14 July at about 1 p.m. from bushes by A.B. Road near Nayagaon, far from home, on information given by the appellant; her undergarment was also recovered on his information. Medical report Ex. P/12, proved by Dr. Achla Sahaya (PW-8), documented rape and multiple bruises. Investigating officer Hemlata Agrawal (PW-10) testified to the information and recoveries. The appellant had met with a road accident and was examined at a primary health centre, but asserted that it was unrelated to a falsely attributed offence.

In the appeal, the appellant alleged a financial dispute with the child's father and false implication. He asserted that he had spent more than twelve years in custody and relied on the absence of a proved DNA report and the child's own identification testimony. He said he had been summoned from home and arrested. The State relied on the prompt named FIR, adult witnesses, the undisputed age of the victim and the medical evidence, and the absence of established hostility. The father (PW-1), Pradeep (PW-3) and Indresh (PW-6) witnessed the taking; the mother (PW-2) recounted the father's account. Minor uncertainty about signatures on investigative papers did not undermine the direct incident account, in the Bench's assessment. The suggested financial dispute was not particularised or proved, and no enmity with the independent witnesses was alleged.

2. Precedents — Considered : Sakshi v. Union of India, (2004) 5 SCC 518, was cited in paragraph 12 for the use of a screen or equivalent arrangement in trials concerning child sexual abuse so that the victim or witness need not see the accused. The Bench connected this to Section 36 POCSO's protection of a child from exposure to the accused during testimony, while preserving the accused's right to hear the testimony and communicate with counsel. It treated conventional dock identification by a two-year-old as an inappropriate demand, especially because her vocabulary was limited and adult witnesses identified the person who took her.

Teja v. State of U.P., (1956) 1 SCC 481, was discussed in relation to last-seen evidence, incriminating recoveries of the victim’s property at the accused's instance and an unsatisfactory explanation consisting of a complete denial. The Bench treated it as support for evaluating the appellant's silence after independent proof that he carried the child away and information given by him led to the recoveries. Ravasaheb alias Ravasahebgouda and Others v. State of Karnataka, (2023) 5 SCC 391, qualified the Section 106 inference: last seen coupled with recovery, temporal proximity and other proved factors may require an explanation. An incorrect explanation or failure to explain contributes to the inference only where the circumstances exclude reasonable competing hypotheses. Although Ravasaheb concerned a deceased victim, the child in this case survived; the Bench used the principle only with the direct taking, prompt FIR, medical proof and recovery roughly nineteen hours later, not silence alone.

Sunil v. State of M.P., (2017) 4 SCC 393, was cited for the proposition that the absence of DNA testing does not invariably preclude conviction where the remaining evidence is clinching. Applying it, the Bench rejected the asserted necessity of a proved DNA report because medical evidence of rape and injury, identification by the adult eyewitnesses who saw the taking, and the recoveries together provided strong evidence. The Bench also noted that the appellant had made no trial request to call for the report.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Section 366 concerned kidnapping for the purpose of sexual assault as found on the proven sequence. Section 376(2)(i) governed the conviction for rape of the child and the applicable sentencing range. The Bench stated that the provision permitted a minimum sentence of imprisonment for a definite term as well as imprisonment for the remainder of the convict's natural life. Section 376(2)(m) concerned rape causing grievous bodily harm, maiming, disfigurement or life endangerment; the Bench kept the distinct conviction but examined the absence of a separate trial sentence for it in light of the punishments already imposed for rape and under Section 307, and the absence of a State appeal on that issue. Section 307 governed the attempted-murder finding based on grave injury and abandonment.

Section 106 of the Indian Evidence Act concerned the circumstances in which the appellant parted company with the child, which were especially within his knowledge. The provision was applied after the prosecution had established the direct and recovery evidence. It was not an independent presumption dispensing with foundational proof. Section 36(1) and (2) POCSO was quoted: a Special Court ensures that a child testifying is not exposed to the accused while the accused can hear the child's statement and communicate with counsel; video conferencing, a single-visibility mirror, curtains or another device may be used. The Bench referred to it when considering identification by the child, although the judgment stated no POCSO charge or conviction. CrPC Section 388 concerned certification and transmission of the appellate judgment for compliance.

4. Issues : (i) Could the adult eyewitness account of the appellant taking this two-year-old, with prompt named FIR, medical findings and recovery on information given by the appellant, establish the kidnapping and sexual assault despite the child's absence from the witness box and lack of dock identification? (ii) Did the last-seen and recovery foundation call for an explanation under Section 106, and was the alternative financial-enmity account proved or reasonably supported? (iii) Did failure to prove DNA evidence require acquittal notwithstanding the other evidence? (iv) Did the serious injuries and abandonment in remote bushes support Section 307 intent, alongside rape and kidnapping? (v) Should the Section 376(2)(i) natural-life sentence be reduced within the statutory range, and did the absence of a separate Section 376(2)(m) sentence require intervention on this appeal brought by the appellant alone?

5. Ratio / Findings : The father, Pradeep and Indresh directly identified the appellant taking the child. A two-hour interval between the 6 p.m. occurrence and named FIR, and her next-day recovery with medical evidence of rape and bodily violence, provided a corroborating sequence of events. The independent eyewitnesses were not alleged to have a grudge; imperfect recall of paperwork signatures did not contradict their observations. The appellant neither specified nor supported the supposed financial dispute and produced no defence witness. The Bench treated the mother's account as derivative of her husband, rather than as another eyewitness account of the abduction.

At age two, conventional dock identification by the victim was not a required link where the adult evidence supplied identity and rape/injuries were not seriously challenged. Sakshi and Section 36 POCSO reinforced protected child testimony and the need to preserve the accused's ability to hear and consult counsel. Direct evidence of the taking, the timely FIR, recovery of the child and undergarment on information given by the appellant, the officer's materially unshaken cross-examination, and the medical report created the evidentiary foundation. Applying Teja and Ravasaheb, the Bench held that when the appellant parted company with the child and her physical condition at that time were matters especially within his knowledge, which he was required to explain. He offered none. His silence strengthened an inference of guilt founded on the other evidence; the Bench considered the combined circumstances sufficient to exclude the unparticularised false-implication hypothesis.

The Court inferred the purpose of sexual assault from taking the child away despite the pursuit and her condition when recovered, which showed that she had been raped. It inferred an intention to cause death from leaving a badly wounded two-year-old in distant roadside bushes overnight where her life was in grave danger. Sunil answered the objection concerning DNA evidence: there was no rule making DNA proof compulsory in every case, and the available evidence was clinching. The appellant had made no trial request to call for a report that he suggested could assist his defence.

On sentence, the trial judge's sentence of "life imprisonment" under Section 376(2)(i) did not specify its duration. Reading it with paragraph 51 of the trial decision, the Bench understood the sentence to mean imprisonment for the remainder of natural life. The Bench considered the permissible finite-term alternative and absence of proved antecedents, and reduced the term to twenty years' actual rigorous imprisonment without remission. The appellant asserted that he had completed more than twelve years in custody. The ten-year sentences under Sections 366 and 307 and the fines were considered proportionate. Section 376(2)(m) was distinct, but no separate sentence had been passed; considering the punishments already imposed for rape and attempted murder, and the absence of a State challenge, the Bench found no illegality requiring it to intervene.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court partly allowed the appeal solely in respect of the sentence under Section 376(2)(i), reducing the term of imprisonment for the remainder of natural life to twenty years of actual rigorous imprisonment without remission. All convictions under Sections 366, 376(2)(i) and (m), and 307 IPC were upheld. The other two ten-year sentences and the fines were not altered, and all substantive sentences were directed to run concurrently. The judgment was to be certified under Section 388 CrPC. A copy was to be sent to the jail authorities for delivery to the appellant, and the trial record was to be sent with a copy of the judgment to the trial court for compliance.

Headnote :- Police official — Section 197 CrPC — duty nexus, not office alone - The complaint alleged a late-night forcible entry and search, abuse, assault, removal to the station and damage. The Town Inspector relied on an account of patrolling and gambling, but produced no document showing registration of a gambling case or any warrant, and did not explain what had happened to the other alleged gamblers. D. Devaraja v. Owais Sabeer Hussain, AIR 2020 SC 3292, was distinguished because it concerned allegations of police atrocities in custody; Dr. S.M. Mansoori v. Surekha Parmar, (2023) 6 SCC 156, supported the conclusion that the alleged unauthorised entry and offences had no apparent connection with official duty at the initial stage. The Court denied pretrial protection on this record.

Sanction — provisional threshold decision — later trial inquiry - Section 197 protects acts falling within its scope that are done in actual or purported discharge of official duty; it does not protect every act of a public servant. The Section 482 challenge to cognizance and proceedings failed because the alleged entry and removal were not shown to be connected to a lawful operation. The trial court must decide the sanction question afresh at final hearing on evidence and documents, without being influenced by the High Court's preliminary observations. Trial was directed to finish within six months, with directions for frequent hearings and compliance with arrest warrants.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh Khamparia, described in the order as a Town Inspector, invoked Section 482 CrPC in Misc. Criminal Case No. 45626 of 2022 to quash the orders dated 7 February 2020 and 25 June 2022 of the Judicial Magistrate First Class, Harrai, and the entire complaint proceeding, RCT/9/2020. The Magistrate had taken cognizance of IPC Sections 323 read with 34, 294, 506 and 427. The applicant also sought discharge under Section 245 CrPC on the ground that the alleged conduct occurred in the discharge of official duty and required sanction under Section 197.

According to the complainants, the incident occurred on 12 September 2019 between about 11:30 p.m. and midnight, when the applicant, Constable Harsh Patel and four or five other police personnel forced entry into their house, abused them, searched cupboards and containers, scattered clothes and grain, tore the first complainant's clothes in a scuffle over her attempted video recording, seized a mobile telephone, assaulted and removed the second complainant to the police station and kept him there until about 4 a.m. They alleged damage of ₹40,000, deletion of the video before the telephone was returned, a retaliatory threat, and complaints to the Superintendent of Police, CM Helpline, women's commission and Inspector General. These were allegations in the complaint considered in the quashing proceeding, rather than findings after trial.

The applicant said he had been on regular patrol, encountered the second complainant gambling outside his house, brought him to the station and recorded the incident in a Rojnamcha. He cited D. Devaraja for the sanction defence and also complained that copies of complaints to superior officers had not been produced. The respondents disputed both points. When asked whether a case under the Public Gambling Act had been registered, the applicant's counsel had no document showing registration and sought an adjournment; the Section 245(2) application itself did not say a case was registered or account for any other gamblers. No search or arrest warrant was claimed. The High Court refused additional time, examined the connection with official duty on the existing record and dismissed the quashing petition while expressly leaving final reconsideration of sanction to the trial court.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Devaraja v. Owais Sabeer Hussain, AIR 2020 SC 3292, was advanced by the applicant for Section 197 protection. The High Court described that case as one alleging police atrocities while the complainant was in custody. It distinguished that context from the alleged unauthorised late-night entry into the complainants' home and removal to the police station, where no case or warrant had been shown.

Dr. S.M. Mansoori (Dead) through Legal Representatives v. Surekha Parmar, (2023) 6 SCC 156, was applied. As described by this Court, police personnel entered a home early without authority and allegedly committed offences; the Supreme Court held that such alleged acts could not at the initial stage be treated as actual or purported official duty requiring Section 197 sanction. It set aside a quashing order that had required sanction, while recognizing that a final view on the nexus could be taken after trial evidence. Applying that reasoning to the alleged entry and removal to the police station, for which no authority had been shown, the High Court found sanction unnecessary at the present stage and left the Magistrate to decide the question later on the evidence.

3. Statutes considered : Section 197 CrPC provides a prior-sanction bar on cognizance for specified Judges, Magistrates and public servants not removable except by or with government sanction when the alleged offence was committed while acting or purporting to act in official duty. The applicant sought discharge before the trial court under Section 245(2) CrPC; Section 482 provided the High Court’s limited power to examine the Magistrate’s orders and the pending complaint proceedings; the Court was not trying the allegations. Sections 323/34, 294, 506 and 427 IPC were the complaint offences of which cognizance was taken, not separately interpreted. The Public Gambling Act was invoked only in the applicant's explanation; the High Court found no registered case shown.

4. Issues : (i) Did the allegation of a police officer's forcible entry, search, abuse and removal of a resident bear a sufficient connection to actual or purported official duty to require previous Section 197 sanction before cognizance? (ii) Could the applicant's unparticularised patrol and gambling account, Rojnamcha assertion and request for time establish that connection or justify postponing its examination in the Section 482 proceeding when no gambling prosecution or warrant was shown? (iii) Was the sanction question finally settled at the threshold, or should the trial court decide it on the evidence at the final hearing of the complaint? The High Court was not determining whether the alleged assault, obscenity, threat and damage offences were ultimately proved.

5. Ratio / Findings : The operative nexus is between the alleged conduct and lawful or purported official function, not the status of the accused as an officer. The applicant's own discharge application said the second complainant had been found gambling on patrol and taken to the police station, yet did not claim registration of a gambling case or explain other supposed gamblers. Counsel could show no registration document and sought time only after inquiry from the Bench. The Court found no bona fide reason to defer the Section 482 review and inferred, for the purpose of deciding the sanction question at that stage, that no gambling offence had been registered. There was also no claim of executing an arrest warrant. Merely holding the post of Town Inspector did not authorise a search of a person against whom no case or search warrant had been shown. The alleged home entry and removal thus had no apparent official-duty link on the present record.

Devaraja concerned allegations arising in police custody and did not govern the alleged entry without authority in this case. Mansoori provided the applicable principle for the initial assessment of sanction. The Court held that Section 197 sanction was unnecessary at the initial stage, so the Magistrate's orders and complaint survived the Section 482 challenge. The trial court was instructed to decide whether sanction is required after evidence at final hearing, without being influenced by the High Court's observations and with regard to documents relied upon by the parties.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The Magistrate’s orders dated 7 February 2020 and 25 June 2022 and the complaint proceedings in RCT/9/2020 were not quashed. The trial court must determine Section 197 sanction independently at final hearing and conclude trial within six months; if necessary, it should hear the case from day to day and must not adjourn it for more than four days. If an accused police officer fails to appear, the Superintendent of Police, Chhindwara was made personally responsible for the immediate execution of the arrest warrant; if the Superintendent fails to execute the warrant, the trial court must immediately send a PUD to the High Court.

Headnote :- Section 197 CrPC — two conditions and provisional duty nexus - Centre for Public Interest Litigation v. Union of India, (2005) 8 SCC 202; State of H.P. v. M.P. Gupta, (2004) 2 SCC 349; S.K. Zutshi v. Bimal Debnath, (2004) 8 SCC 31; and Devinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2016) 12 SCC 87, were considered. Protection requires the prescribed employment and removal conditions to be satisfied, as well as a reasonable connection between the act and official duty. An act in excess of duty may still be protected if reasonably connected to it; an unrelated prohibited act is not. The forest permit prohibited digging up earth from forest land and using machinery, but both acts were alleged in the charge. Employment with SECL did not, on the existing record, establish employment in connection with the affairs of the Union. At the quashing stage the Court found that neither requirement was satisfied on the available material, while reserving both for determination after trial evidence.

Forest permission — supervisory delegation - The SECL manager's letter assigning crack-filling work to a subordinate did not automatically absolve him where the duties he described in his application included oversight of mine operations and no rule or instrument authorising delegation of that responsibility was shown. Alleged JCB excavation and collection of forest earth contrary to express permit conditions remained for trial.

Inherent powers — alleged bona fide location mistake - Mahmood Ali v. State of U.P. permits careful consideration of the surrounding record when vengeance or manifestly vexatious prosecution is plausibly alleged; Chilakamarthi Venkateswarlu, Akhil Sharda and Sunder Babu affirm the restriction against conducting a mini-trial under Section 482. The claimed proximity of forest land to the mining area, the contractor's alleged mistake and the asserted absence of mens rea required evidence. The permit conditions and the alleged excavation of a drain with a JCB precluded quashing.

Contradictions — materiality and assessment of the evidence as a whole - Mritunjoy Biswas, Shyamal Ghosh, S. Govindaraju, Sunil Kumar Sambhudayal Gupta, U.P. v. Naresh, Brahm Swaroop, Yogesh Singh and Ahmed Shah Khan Durrani distinguish normal variation from omissions or contradictions reaching the core. The alleged differences between the statements did not go to the root of the case; the High Court would not conduct a trial of credibility under Section 482. The trial court remains free to assess the evidence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh Kumar Sharma, then SECL Sub Area Manager/Deputy General Manager overseeing Rajendra and Khairaha mines near Shahdol, applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash forest-offence complaint POR No. 20078/2022 of 25 December 2022 and JMFC Budhar proceeding RCT No. 933/2023. He had worked in the area from June 2021 until 27 May 2023 and later transferred to NCL Singrauli. SECL had Forest Department permission from 2011, extended on 10 June 2022, to fill mining-related cracks as a safety measure. The permission expressly prohibited taking loose earth from forest land or using machinery. A contractor, Mohammad Ismail, had a 9 October 2021 work order and was also facing trial. The applicant's 17 June 2022 letter assigned implementation to the Mine/Colliery Manager and instructed compliance.

Forest officers sent repeated notices from 30 August 2022 into 2023; the applicant or successor responded with the permit, delegation and the mine manager's assertion that monsoon crack filling was urgent and compliant. The Forest Department alleged that contrary to the explicit conditions a JCB dug a drain in forest land to obtain loose earth. A POR named the applicant as accused no. 2 and the charge-sheet was accepted by the Magistrate on 20 December 2023. The proceeding referred to Section 26(1)(h) of the Forest Act. The applicant said his broad executive and employee-welfare duties and employment on the SECL payroll made him a public servant under Section 21 IPC entitled to protection under Section 197; he denied personal culpability after delegating the work. He argued proximity of forest and mine land could explain an honest mistake by the contractor without mens rea, invoked Mahmood Ali for close reading of the record, and attacked witness consistency. The State said the permit's two clear restrictions were breached. At argument counsel acknowledged both the restriction and the allegation of a JCB-dug forest drain. These were threshold allegations; guilt was not tried.

2. Precedents — Considered : Centre for Public Interest Litigation v. Union of India, (2005) 8 SCC 202, explained the purpose of Section 197: to protect officials from vexatious proceedings for acts reasonably connected to official duty, while preventing official status from being used as a cloak for objectionable acts. An excess committed while performing an act reasonably connected to duty can be protected. Its test asks whether failure to perform the act complained of could itself expose the official to a charge of dereliction of duty. State of H.P. v. M.P. Gupta, (2004) 2 SCC 349, reiterated the requirement of a connection with duty and explained the bar on cognizance where the statutory conditions are satisfied: it quoted P. Arulswami on the quality of the act, B. Saha's approach between an unduly narrow interpretation and unlimited protection, and Matajog Dobey's requirement that a claim of connection with duty be reasonable rather than fanciful. It also described initial strict identification of duty, followed by a liberal view of conduct once actual duty is established. S.K. Zutshi v. Bimal Debnath, (2004) 8 SCC 31, reiterated that colour of office protects an act reasonably related to duty, not an unrelated criminal act merely occurring during service, again quoting Matajog. Devinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2016) 12 SCC 87, emphasized the stage and material then available: the allegations are taken as alleged for the sanction inquiry, not tried for truth. Its reproduced Satyavir Singh Rathi and B. Saha passages and police-beating examples illustrate conduct outside duty; the examples from Atma Ram and Bhanuprasad appeared within the quoted passage and were not separately applied to the facts of the forest excavation. The High Court drew from these four authorities its qualified test, treated a permit violation as outside duty on the present charge-sheet, and expressly left status and nexus open after evidence.

Mahmood Ali v. State of U.P. was the applicant's principal Section 482 authority. Its reproduced passage directs closer examination of the surrounding record, rather than only the wording of a carefully drafted complaint, where abuse or personal vengeance is alleged, including materials collected during investigation. The Court considered that authority but did not treat it as permission to determine the disputed questions of proximity, mistake and mental state. Chilakamarthi Venkateswarlu v. State of A.P., (2020) 17 SCC 595, permits intervention for grave and clear injustice where no other provision of law offers relief, or where the ingredients of an offence are altogether absent, while forbidding assessment of the reliability of evidence; the references to Zandu Pharmaceutical Works, S.W. Palanitkar, Annamalai, Sharda Prasad Sinha, Nagawwa and Dharampal within that passage explained those limits and did not constitute separate findings on the present facts. State of U.P. v. Akhil Sharda, 2022 Cri LJ 4374, forbids a mini-trial and cautions against curtailing a wider prosecution on an isolated point. The quoted passage concerned an excise conspiracy; those facts were not findings in the present case. Sunder Babu v. State of T.N., (2009) 14 SCC 244, reproduced Minu Kumari's approach requiring inherent powers to be exercised sparingly and cautiously to prevent abuse or secure justice, without stifling a legitimate prosecution. The quoted judgment allowed the appeal and quashed the proceedings before it; the High Court nevertheless declined to quash the present proceeding. Applying these principles, the Court left the asserted forest/mine boundary mistake and mens rea to trial.

Mritunjoy Biswas v. Pranab, (2013) 12 SCC 796, requires a discrepancy to go to the root of the matter and create a serious doubt before it undermines the case. Shyamal Ghosh v. State of W.B., (2012) 7 SCC 646, elaborated that an omission under the Explanation to Section 162 CrPC "may" amount to a contradiction only if significant in context, requiring the testimony to be assessed as a whole rather than through isolated excerpts; it referred to Leela Ram, Rammi, Sunil Kumar Sambhudayal Gupta and Subhash on that point. S. Govindaraju v. State of Karnataka, (2013) 15 SCC 315, contrasted normal variations with contradictions materially affecting trial and cautioned that appellate review of credibility requires reasons. State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324, Brahm Swaroop v. State of U.P., (2011) 6 SCC 288, and Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, likewise require cautious evaluation of the whole account and do not discard it for trivial embellishments; the examples cited within Yogesh support that test. The High Court found no discrepancy going to the root of the case in the statements placed before it, but did not adjudicate ultimate trial credibility.

3. Statutes considered : Section 197(1) CrPC was the main sanction provision: previous sanction applies only to a specified protected public servant who is not removable except by or with government approval, for an act done or purportedly done in official duty; subsection (1)(a) concerns Union employment. The Court quoted the fuller provision including exclusions for enumerated IPC offences and armed-force clauses, but those were not operative here. The applicant's claim to be a public servant under Section 21 IPC was not treated as satisfying the separate employment and removal conditions under Section 197, especially since SECL is a company rather than the Central Government itself. These points were provisional at this stage.

Section 482 CrPC framed the challenge to POR and JMFC proceedings and the limits on resolving disputed facts; the Explanation to Section 162 CrPC appeared in the witness-omission authorities. Section 26(1)(h) of the Forest Act was the alleged forest offence identified in the notices; the express permit conditions and alleged JCB excavation supplied the context for refusing quashment. Counsel's argument about lack of mens rea and contractor mistake remained a defence requiring evidence.

4. Issues : (i) Did the applicant qualify for Section 197 protection as an SECL employee, and did alleged digging of forest earth with a JCB contrary to the permit reasonably relate to his actual or purported official duties? Were those answers final at the Section 482 stage? (ii) Could his delegation letter and lack of direct operation of the machinery automatically end his exposure as the manager tasked with mine oversight, absent an identified power to delegate? (iii) Did proximity of forest and mine land, contractor mistake, asserted absence of mens rea and perceived witness variations warrant quashing, or require trial evidence? (iv) How should the contextual review of the record described in Mahmood Ali where abuse is alleged be reconciled with the restriction against a mini-trial and the test for material contradictions in the other cited authorities? The Court was not deciding whether the forest offence or any individual's guilt was finally proved.

5. Ratio / Findings : Section 197 involves two separate prerequisites. The forest permission prohibited collection of earth from forest land and use of machinery. Counsel acknowledged those conditions and that the prosecution alleged excavation of a drain in forest land with a JCB contrary to them. Applying the Supreme Court's tests concerning a reasonable connection with duty, the distinction between an excess in duty and an independent wrong, and the stage of the proceeding, the Court held this alleged activity could not, on the present material, be treated as an act done in the actual or purported discharge of official duty. It also observed that an SECL employee was not, on the existing record, a Central Government employee under Section 197(1)(a), despite the applicant's Section 21 IPC claim.

The applicant had described his duties of overseeing mine operations, including approvals and supervision. He offered a letter assigning execution to a subordinate, but no governing instrument authorising delegation of that responsibility. The Court rejected the assertion that delegation by itself absolved him. It stated that unauthorised delegation coupled with failure to supervise would amount to negligence and would not relieve him of what it described as "vicarious liability". The disputed facts and the defence of mistake and absence of mens rea remained for trial. The proximity of the forest land to the mining area and the contractor's bona fide mistake were disputed factual matters, although counsel acknowledged that digging in forest land was alleged; the Court would not decide them by inspecting drawings at the Section 482 stage.

Mahmood Ali calls for contextual scrutiny where a prosecution is alleged to be vexatious or retaliatory. The Court nevertheless held that it could not conduct a mini-trial to determine the disputed facts in this case. Chilakamarthi, Akhil Sharda and Sunder Babu supported restraint where the alleged conduct could constitute an offence and factual defences require proof. The Court examined the witness statements and rejected the claim of a contradiction going to the root of the case, explaining through the eight direct Supreme Court discussions that normal variations do not vitiate a case; materiality depends on whether a discrepancy affects the core of the case when the evidence is considered as a whole. It left final credibility to trial. The continuing proceeding, rather than a finding of criminal liability, was the legal consequence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC to quash forest complaint POR No. 20078/2022 and RCT No. 933/2023. The prosecution before JMFC Budhar could proceed. The trial court remained free to decide, after recording evidence, whether the applicant qualified for protection under Section 197 and whether the act was connected with official duty, as well as the factual defence and guilt. The preliminary observations did not amount to a conviction.

Headnote :- Revision — concurrent findings in fatal road accident - Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar, (2019) 4 SCC 197, limits reappraisal of concurrent factual findings without perversity or a jurisdictional defect. The applicant's truck struck a stopped motorcycle from behind in a jam, running over its pillion rider. The motorcycle rider was not confronted with a sudden-entry theory, and another witness described high truck speed. The High Court found that the concurrent findings were neither perverse nor contrary to the record and affirmed the Sections 279 and 304-A convictions; the existence of a possible alternative account alone did not permit substitution of the High Court's own factual findings.

Sentence — Section 304-A IPC — deterrence and distinction from a case involving compensation - Sagar Lolienkar v. State of Goa, (2022) 1 SCC 161, involved a seven-month custody term and ₹3,00,000 compensation; no comparable compensation was deposited here. Dalbir Singh v. State of Haryana, AIR 2000 SC 1677, emphasised deterrent imprisonment for professional drivers whose rash driving causes death and cautioned against probation in that context. The absence of an intoxication allegation did not warrant reducing the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment for this heavy-vehicle collision during a traffic jam. The ₹500 fine and default term stood.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh Kumar sought revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC against the judgment dated 14 September 2021 of the Third Additional Sessions Judge, Guna, dismissing Criminal Appeal No. 63/2019. That appeal had affirmed the JMFC Aron judgment of 21 February 2019 in Criminal Case No. 665/2013. The trial court convicted him under Sections 279 and 304-A IPC, imposing one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹500, with one month's rigorous imprisonment in default, under Section 304-A. It imposed no separate sentence under Section 279, describing it as the lesser driving offence. The charge framed and affirmed was under Section 279 IPC.

The prosecution alleged that on 5 October 2013 Rakesh Singh (PW-1) stopped his motorcycle in a traffic jam near Kamneshwar Dhaba on the Aron–Guna route with Devendra Shrivastava riding pillion. The applicant's truck, MP09 GF 7624, struck it from behind; the pillion rider fell and the truck ran him over, causing immediate death. Bystanders stopped the truck and driver. Rakesh reported the event, leading to Crime No. 433/2013 under Sections 279, 337 and 304-A IPC. The investigation included postmortem, scene map, seizure of the truck from the applicant, arrest, mechanical inspection and witness statements. Nine prosecution witnesses testified; the applicant called none. The challenge in revision relied on part of the account given by Lalaram (PW-4) to suggest that Rakesh suddenly came into the road and was negligent. The State supported the two earlier decisions.

The applicant also sought a reduced sentence by relying on Sagar Lolienkar, in which seven months already undergone had been treated as the substantive sentence. The High Court considered the compensation paid and the circumstances of that case, addressed deterrence for a heavy-vehicle driver after a fatal collision, and left the one-year term unchanged. The applicant was in jail when the revision was decided.

2. Precedents — Considered : Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar, (2019) 4 SCC 197, was quoted for the restriction on a revisional court disturbing concurrent findings of fact in the absence of perversity. It also precluded reanalysis or reinterpretation of the evidence merely to reach another view. The reproduced passage referred to Southern Sales & Services v. Sauermilch Design, (2008) 14 SCC 457, to emphasise the need for a jurisdictional error, rather than ordinary disagreement on the facts, to justify revisional interference. Although the quotation mentions Section 482, the present Court applied the principle in a Sections 397/401 criminal revision and stated that the concurrent findings had to be perverse and contrary to the record before interference was warranted. It examined the PW-1/PW-4 submission enough to find no such defect, without undertaking a fresh appeal on facts.

Sagar Lolienkar v. State of Goa, (2022) 1 SCC 161, was cited by the applicant to support a sentence limited to time served, described as seven months. The High Court identified an important distinguishing fact: the offender there deposited ₹3,00,000 compensation, whereas the present applicant offered none.

Dalbir Singh v. State of Haryana, AIR 2000 SC 1677, was quoted extensively on the need to protect public safety through deterrent sentences when rash driving causes death, particularly where professional drivers operate vehicles throughout their working hours. It warned that routine leniency or probation can diminish the needed caution and discussed Section 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act for a Section 304-A road death. The High Court applied that deterrence principle in declining to reduce the one-year sentence for the truck striking a motorcycle during a traffic jam.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 397 and 401 CrPC governed revision and the limited grounds for interference with concurrent findings. Section 304-A IPC concerned causing death by rash or negligent driving; Section 279 IPC concerned rash driving on a public way and was a concurrent conviction without a separate sentence in the trial court's order. Section 337 IPC appeared in the initial FIR but not as an affirmed conviction. The Court considered a driver's duty of attention, impact from behind, traffic jam and high speed in sustaining the 304-A finding.

4. Issues : (i) Did the alleged sudden movement or negligence of the motorcycle rider reveal perversity in the concurrent findings that the truck driver caused the fatal collision by rash or negligent driving, permitting factual intervention in a Sections 397/401 revision? (ii) Should the one-year rigorous imprisonment under Section 304-A be reduced to the period already undergone by analogy to Sagar Lolienkar, where a seven-month term had been treated as sufficient, in light of the absence of compensation, lack of intoxication allegation and public-safety deterrence emphasized in Dalbir Singh? The revision did not re-open a distinct Section 337 charge or seek a new trial on the full evidence.

5. Ratio / Findings : Relying on Bir Singh, the Court stated that it could not replace the concurrent factual findings unless they were perverse and contrary to the record. The quoted authority also referred to revisional restraint in the absence of a jurisdictional error. PW-1 testified from personal knowledge that the truck hit his stopped motorcycle from behind during a jam, after which the truck ran over the pillion rider. The asserted sudden-entry theory was not put to PW-1 in cross-examination. Lalaram spoke of high truck speed. Even assuming an entry immediately before impact, the driver of a heavy truck still had to remain attentive and maintain control of the vehicle. No perversity was shown, so the Section 279 and 304-A convictions were affirmed without a new evidentiary trial.

On sentence, the Court treated safe passage on public roads and deterrence of professional drivers as central. It distinguished the reduction to time served in Sagar on the ground that ₹3,00,000 had been paid as compensation in that case; none had been offered here. There was no intoxication allegation, but the fatal rear-end collision during a traffic jam remained serious. Drawing on Dalbir Singh's deterrent reasoning, it declined any reduction of the one-year rigorous term and fine. The sentence was maintained on the facts of this collision and the comparison advanced by the applicant.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision in limine. The trial conviction and appellate affirmance under Sections 279 and 304-A IPC, the sentence under Section 304-A of one year's rigorous imprisonment, the fine of ₹500 and the default term of one month's rigorous imprisonment were upheld. The applicant, already in jail, was to serve the remainder; the records were ordered to be returned immediately to the courts below with a copy of the High Court judgment for compliance.

Mukesh Kumar v. The State of M.P., Cr.R. no. 1041/2022, 06/04/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Inherent powers — successive quashing challenge — genuinely changed circumstances - Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, West Bengal v. Mohan Singh, (1975) 3 SCC 706, allowed a later petition on a materially changed record after an earlier refusal without a decision on the merits, followed by a prolonged lack of progress in the prosecution. Bhisham Lal Verma v. State of U.P., 2023:INSC:955, and M.C. Ravikumar v. D.S. Velmurugan, SLP (Criminal) No. 12715/2022, decided 23 July 2025, preclude repeated Section 482 applications based on grounds that were available earlier, without imposing an absolute ban on a second petition; Section 362 prevents disguised review of a final order. The applicants had withdrawn fully argued charge revisions with limited liberty, then challenged the same charge-sheet under Section 482 on admissibility and hearsay grounds that had already been available. Six prosecution witnesses had testified, and the applicants had not produced complete trial order sheets showing a halt in the proceedings comparable to that in Mohan Singh. The subsequent application was dismissed on maintainability alone; the trial merits remained open.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh Swaroop Johri and co-applicants invoked Section 482 CrPC in Misc. Criminal Case No. 18259 of 2025 to quash the CBI prosecution in Sessions Trial No. 728/2014 before the Special Judge (CBI/Vyapam) and Fourth Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior. Applicant no. 1 had challenged the order framing charges in Criminal Revision No. 1865/2020; applicant no. 2 in No. 1916/2020. Those revisions sought to set aside charges and discharge the applicants under Section 227. After extensive argument on 17 October 2024, each applicant sought withdrawal with liberty to raise grounds before the appropriate court at the appropriate stage in accordance with law. The Division Bench granted that request and dismissed both as withdrawn, without a merits ruling.

The later petition asserted a change in circumstances and relied on Mohan Singh on the ground that the criminal trial had not concluded. The CBI disputed maintainability but offered no case citation despite requests. The applicants acknowledged that trial was underway and six prosecution witnesses had been examined. They did not submit complete trial order sheets showing that the prosecution had failed to progress despite cooperation by all the accused, or that no accused was responsible for the delay. The new petition challenged the admissibility of a co-accused's confession on the grounds that it had been recorded on oath, was not in question-and-answer form and had been recorded without a warning about its consequences. It also raised a hearsay objection to Vinay's account of his brother Vijay arranging a postgraduate seat for applicant no. 2, relied on the alleged death of a witness without producing a certificate, and invoked Sections 25–26 of the Evidence Act against police confessions that had not led to discovery. These were counsel's grounds, not merits findings by this Bench. The Court found all were based on the same charge-sheet and were available when charges and the revisions were argued.

2. Precedents — Considered : Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, West Bengal v. Mohan Singh, (1975) 3 SCC 706, concerned an earlier application under Section 561-A of the 1898 Code rejected without adjudication because factual questions needed evidence. A subsequent application was held maintainable after the criminal case had made no progress at all for about one and a half years. The present Court distinguished that case on the basis of the changed circumstances and complete lack of trial progress there: here the charge revisions were argued, withdrawn at the applicants' election when an unfavourable merits order was impending, and six trial witnesses had testified. The passage of time alone, without complete order sheets showing that neither the applicants nor any co-accused was responsible for the delay, did not establish circumstances comparable to Mohan Singh.

Bhisham Lal Verma v. State of U.P., 2023:INSC:955, was quoted for the principle that there is no absolute bar to a second Section 482 petition, but grounds already available cannot be raised in successive instalments. In that case a second challenge to the charge-sheet/cognizance followed an earlier petition limited to sanction, although the material predated the first petition. The reproduced discussion of Simrikhia v. Dolley Mukherjee, Sooraj Devi v. Pyare Lal and R. Annapurna explained the restriction under Section 362 on using inherent power to review final orders. The Madras High Court's observation in S. Madan Kumar that known grounds should not be withheld was quoted and approved in Bhisham Lal; the present Court used the principle to assess the applicants' unchanged charge-sheet grounds, not to say that withdrawal itself was a merits dismissal.

M.C. Ravikumar v. D.S. Velmurugan, SLP (Criminal) No. 12715/2022, decided 23 July 2025, held that the petitioner must show changed circumstances for a later quashing petition; a plea that was available but omitted earlier cannot provide a fresh basis for a petition merely because it is advanced later. It reiterated Bhisham Lal and Section 362, and reproduced the explanation in Simrikhia that Mohan Singh concerned different circumstances, together with the rule in Sooraj Devi that inherent power cannot be exercised contrary to an express bar in the Code. The Court adopted the qualified rule in considering a Section 482 petition filed after revisions against the framing of charges:

despite the different statutory provisions, the earlier revisions sought discharge and the later petition again challenged the sufficiency of the same prosecution material. The discussion of the property complaint in the reproduced judgment concerned Ravikumar; the present proceedings concerned the Vyapam trial.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC preserves the High Court's inherent power to prevent abuse and secure justice but cannot serve as repeated review of an unchanged earlier challenge. The review bar under Section 362 CrPC was discussed through Bhisham Lal and Ravikumar; the principle bears on successive petitions, while this particular earlier disposition was withdrawal rather than a merits adjudication. Sections 397 and 401 governed the prior charge revisions, and Section 227 the discharge relief sought there. The earlier Supreme Court Mohan Singh proceeding arose under Section 561-A of the 1898 Code, treated as the analogous inherent-power context.

4. Issues : (i) Did withdrawal of the earlier fully argued charge revisions with liberty to raise grounds later make this Section 482 petition maintainable even though it relied on the same charge-sheet and grounds then available? (ii) Did the examination of six prosecution witnesses, in the absence of complete order sheets or any demonstrated new event, distinguish the case from Mohan Singh, where the later petition followed a halt in the prosecution? (iii) Would allowing successive challenges on old objections circumvent the qualified rules on finality and abuse of process stated in Bhisham Lal and Ravikumar? The Court explicitly considered maintainability before merits and did not decide whether the confessions, hearsay or deceased-witness assertion would succeed at trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The first proceeding was not decided on merits; the applicants themselves withdrew after lengthy argument with liberty to raise the grounds before the appropriate court at the appropriate stage in accordance with law. That liberty was not an unconditional licence to repeat the same charge challenge under a new provision. The new Section 482 application and the earlier revisions both asked the High Court to decide whether the existing charge-sheet contained sufficient material for prosecution. The alleged confession defects, hearsay and other evidence objections existed when charges were framed and the revisions were argued. A claimed witness death was unsupported by a certificate in either the petition or trial court. No fresh material was shown. Formal reliance on Section 482 could not transform already available pleas into changed circumstances.

Mohan Singh was different because the first inherent-power refusal left facts for trial and the case then wholly ceased progressing for about eighteen months. Here six witnesses had testified, and applicants omitted complete order sheets needed to assess responsibility for any delay. Bhisham Lal and Ravikumar recognise that a second petition may be maintainable depending on the facts, but preclude raising available grounds in separate petitions and seeking review through inherent power. On this record the applicants had not established a new circumstance; entertaining the petition would reopen their earlier challenge to the charges and impede the ongoing trial. The Court therefore dismissed it as not maintainable. It did not rule that every second petition or every petition after withdrawal is barred, nor determine the contested CBI evidence or eventual guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application to quash Sessions Trial No. 728/2014 as not maintainable.

Mukesh Swaroop Johri and Others v. Central Bureau of Investigation, M.Cr.C. no. 18259/2025, 11/11/2025, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Pushpendra Yadav, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Cruelty — Section 498-A IPC — short residence and household witnesses - A wife is not required to remain in an allegedly abusive matrimonial home for a minimum period. Laxmibai's 30–35 days over four visits did not discredit her account of repeated ₹50,000 and motorcycle demands, assault, and a renewed demand during an attempt at reconciliation. Her brother and father supported her; independent witnesses were unlikely to have witnessed the conduct within the home. The husband had not put to these witnesses any suggestion that he had taken steps to bring her back. On this evidence the conviction stood.

Revision — concurrent factual findings - Following Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar, (2019) 4 SCC 197, Sections 397 and 401 CrPC do not allow substitution of factual findings unless the concurrent findings are perverse or contrary to law, or the court lacked jurisdiction to try the offence. The applicant established no such ground for interference with the concurrent Section 498-A findings. The revision was dismissed at admission and the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment and the fine of ₹1,000 were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh sought revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC against the decision dated 7 April 2022 of the Additional Sessions Judge, Pichhore, in Criminal Appeal No. 26/2017, which affirmed the JMFC Khaniyadhana judgment of 4 October 2016 in RCT No. 373/2015. He had been convicted under Section 498-A IPC and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000, with two months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The prosecution alleged that after marriage to Laxmibai on 26 May 2013 he and his father demanded ₹50,000 and a motorcycle and harassed her for nonfulfilment. The father-in-law died during the appeal; this revision concerned Mukesh's own conviction.

Laxmibai (PW-1) said that the harassment began soon after marriage. She was beaten, informed her brother Hariram, and later lived in her parental home at Kundanpur. She testified that the husband and his father reiterated the demand even when they came for reconciliation. In cross-examination she accepted that she had visited the matrimonial home three or four times, stayed about 30–35 days in all, and lived apart from 25 December 2014. Her brother Hariram (PW-2) and father Narayan Ju (PW-3) supported her account. The husband argued that her short stay could not sustain a finding of cruelty, the family witnesses were interested, no independent witness had testified, and reconciliation remained possible. The State responded that household conduct rarely has independent eyewitnesses and her account was trustworthy. The High Court examined those submissions and the limited revision standard.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court applied Bir Singh v. Mukesh Kumar, (2019) 4 SCC 197, and held that revision is not another factual appeal from concurrent findings and that an alternative or even erroneous view is not enough unless the findings are perverse or contrary to law, or the court lacked jurisdiction to try the offence. It applied that restraint after explaining why Laxmibai's short total stay did not make her evidence inherently unreliable and why corroboration by family members was unsurprising in a domestic dispute.

3. Statutes considered : Section 498-A IPC was the conviction provision for alleged matrimonial cruelty connected to the monetary and motorcycle demands and physical ill-treatment. The Court's finding concerned the evidence: a short stay did not make her account of ill-treatment during repeated visits unreliable. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC governed the High Court's revisional review. Interference with concurrent findings was limited to perversity, findings contrary to law or absence of jurisdiction to try the offence. The applicant's counsel could identify no provision requiring an ill-treated wife to remain in the matrimonial home. The Court considered the absence of efforts by the husband to bring her back when assessing the testimony.

4. Issues : (i) Did the complainant's approximately 30–35 days in the matrimonial home over several visits, and the mainly family testimony about domestic harassment, make the Section 498-A conviction unsustainable? (ii) Did the husband establish that the concurrent findings were perverse or contrary to law, or that the court lacked jurisdiction to try the offence, so as to justify admitting and allowing a revision under Sections 397/401?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court noted that the applicant's counsel could identify no provision requiring a wife to remain in the matrimonial home despite ill-treatment. Laxmibai described multiple visits and repeated demands and assault, including a demand renewed during a later reconciliation discussion. Her decision to return to her parental home after a total of 30–35 days therefore did not make her account unreliable. Her brother and father corroborated it. The absence of an independent witness was not decisive because the alleged conduct occurred within the home; the Court also noted that no suggestion was put to the witnesses of any effort by the husband to bring her back or any legal recourse for restitution of conjugal rights. These circumstances supported the credibility of her evidence. The applicant's conviction, recorded by the trial court and affirmed in appeal, was upheld.

Applying Bir Singh, the High Court could not reassess the same family testimony merely to substitute its own findings under Sections 397 and 401. The applicant did not show that the concurrent findings were perverse or contrary to law, or that the courts lacked jurisdiction to try the offence. Having found the wife's evidence credible and the argument based on her short stay unsound, the Court held the revision did not merit admission.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the revision. The appellate judgment of 7 April 2022 and JMFC judgment of 4 October 2016 were affirmed, leaving Mukesh's conviction under Section 498-A IPC, the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment and the fine of ₹1,000, with two months' rigorous imprisonment in default, in place.

Headnote :- Bail — witness credibility / prima facie inquiry - Satish Jaggi v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2007) 11 SCC 195, permits a prima facie assessment at bail that takes account of the nature and gravity of the offence, while reserving findings on the credibility and evidential value of prosecution witnesses for trial. In this seventh Section 439 application, alleged discrepancies in recorded testimony did not justify a final assessment of credibility that could prejudice the pending prosecution.

POCSO — proof of victim's age - Relying on the approach to age documents in Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, and referring to Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice Act, 2015, the Court held that the school record indicating minority at the time of the incident was not conclusively displaced for bail by the prosecutrix's asserted declaration at her 2018 marriage that she was 22.

Successive bail — custody and trial delay - Custody since 13 June 2018 and a renewed assertion of delay did not establish that the applicant was not responsible for the trial delay, because he again failed to produce the trial court's order sheets despite the earlier rejection of that contention for the same omission. On this record, and with the merits and age contentions unresolved at trial, the seventh bail application was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh moved his seventh application under Section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 in MCRC No. 28229/2020. He had been arrested on 13 June 2018 in connection with Crime No. 27/2017 at Police Station Aswar, Bhind, for alleged offences under Sections 363, 366 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code and Sections 3/4 of the Protection of Children from Sexual Offences Act. These were allegations in the pending prosecution, not findings of guilt in this bail decision. A previous application had been rejected on merits by order dated 25 September 2018 in MCRC No. 29669/2018. A further order dated 25 February 2020 in MCRC No. 8167/2020 had rejected the asserted trial-delay ground because the trial court's order sheets had not been produced.

By the present hearing, the material prosecution witnesses had testified. Counsel for Mukesh submitted that their evidence contained material discrepancies. Counsel also submitted that the prosecutrix married in 2018 and stated her age then to be 22, whereas the school record relied on by the prosecution indicated that she was a minor when the alleged incident occurred. The period of custody was also invoked as a ground for release. The Court heard the application finally by video conference on 21 August 2020 and considered whether those contentions justified bail at this stage.

2. Precedents — Considered : Satish Jaggi v. State of Chhattisgarh and Others, (2007) 11 SCC 195, was quoted at length in paragraph 4. The passage recognises that even for a non-bailable offence circumstances may justify bail, with the nature and gravity of the offence a primary consideration; the bail court may examine whether a prima facie case exists. It criticises an order that reached findings on prosecution witnesses' credibility and evidential value during an ongoing trial, in effect deciding the criminal charges before trial and risking prejudice to the prosecution. Reliability must be tested at trial. The High Court applied this distinction to the proposed inquiry into discrepancies in already-recorded material testimony: it declined to make a final assessment of credibility on the seventh bail application. The quoted passage permits a prima facie inquiry and recognises that, although the nature and gravity of the offence are primary considerations, the facts and circumstances may justify bail in a non-bailable offence. Findings on witness credibility remain for trial.

Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, was cited in paragraph 6 for applying the Juvenile Justice procedure for determining age to a victim of crime. That decision concerned Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Rules, 2007. In the present case, the High Court referred to Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 and treated the school record as indicating that the prosecutrix was a minor at the time of the incident. It left the effect of her asserted later declaration of age in other proceedings to the trial court.

The High Court's orders of 25 September 2018 and 25 February 2020 formed the procedural history of the case. The former denied bail on the merits; the latter had already rejected the same delay argument because the trial court's order sheets had not been produced.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC supplied the jurisdiction for a regular bail application, including this successive request. The Court addressed the permissible scope of assessment of witness evidence at bail and whether the custody-delay record supported release; the inquiry remained one of bail. IPC Sections 363, 366 and 376 and POCSO Sections 3/4 were invoked in the alleged kidnapping and sexual-offence prosecution. They were relevant to the gravity of the allegations and the significance of age, while the prosecution remained pending and guilt was not determined in the bail proceedings. Section 94 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 was identified for the relevance of documents to age assessment, with the school record contrasted against a subsequent age statement.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the bail court should resolve the credibility of material witnesses whose trial evidence had been recorded, in light of claimed discrepancies, or confine itself to the permissible prima facie appraisal. (ii) Whether the prosecutrix's asserted declaration of age 22 at a 2018 marriage displaced the school record indicating minority at the incident for purposes of the present bail decision, or required trial assessment. (iii) Whether the length of custody since June 2018 and alleged trial delay justified bail in a seventh application when trial order sheets had not been placed on record after the same omission had led to the rejection of an earlier contention based on delay. The Court was deciding bail, not guilt, the ultimate credibility of the witnesses or final age.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the alleged discrepancies in witness testimony, the Court applied the distinction in Satish Jaggi between a permissible prima facie inquiry at bail and a premature determination of the reliability and credibility of prosecution evidence. The material witnesses had testified, and counsel for the applicant relied on alleged inconsistencies in their evidence. Given the ongoing prosecution and the risk of prejudicial merits findings, the Court declined to make that final appraisal. The decision leaves the trial judge to test the credibility and reliability of the evidence, while permitting the bail court to consider the prosecution material for a prima facie assessment.

On age, the applicant relied on a later declaration of adulthood at the prosecutrix's reported 2018 marriage. The Court identified the school record as indicating that she was a minor when the alleged incident occurred and relied on the approach to age documents in Jarnail Singh and referred to Section 94. It did not treat the later statement as conclusively correcting the earlier school record.

On trial delay, the Court found that the necessary evidentiary basis for determining responsibility had not been supplied: Mukesh had not filed the trial court order sheets to show he was not responsible, despite the February 2020 rejection of the same contention for that reason. With the earlier merits refusal, the request for an assessment of witness credibility at bail, and the age question properly reserved, no ground for bail was shown on this record.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the seventh application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC.

Headnote :- Criminal revision — post-conviction surrender / exemption - Applying Vivek Rai v. High Court of Jharkhand, (2015) 12 SCC 86, the Court recognised that a revision under Sections 397/401 CrPC could be registered despite a High Court rule requiring surrender. Posting it for admission without surrender remained subject to the High Court granting exemption in an exceptional case under its inherent power. Deepak Sahu v. State of M.P., 2012 (3) MPLJ 534, was also cited on maintainability. Mullu's conviction under Section 379 had been affirmed, but his exemption application relied only on the asserted absence of a CrPC requirement to surrender and his earlier bail; he had neither supplied an exceptional reason nor surrendered after several adjournments. The Court refused exemption and dismissed the revision as not maintainable. The Court acknowledged that surrender could be exempted in an exceptional case, but found that no such case had been made out.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mullu Prajapati was convicted under Section 379 IPC by the Judicial Magistrate First Class, Bhander, in Criminal Case No. 334/2015 on 7 September 2018. The sentence was one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹1,000, with two months' further rigorous imprisonment in default. The First Additional Sessions Judge, Datia, dismissed Criminal Appeal No. 113/2018 and affirmed the conviction and sentence on 13 August 2021. Mullu then filed Criminal Revision No. 3174/2021 under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC on 26 November 2021. He had not surrendered after the appeal. The High Court addressed surrender and exemption without reviewing the merits of the conviction.

Counsel conceded that the applicant had not surrendered, but disputed the proposition that the Court could not entertain a revision without a surrender certificate. Relying on Vivek Rai, he submitted that the Court had discretion to exempt him from surrender and asked for time to surrender. IA No. 32509/2021 sought exemption, saying there was no CrPC mandate to surrender and that Mullu had remained on bail at trial and on appeal. It stated no circumstance explaining why exemption should be granted in this case. A separate IA No. 32507/2021 for exemption from surrender had been withdrawn at the 30 November 2021 listing. The Court granted time on 8 December to file a surrender certificate; the matter was adjourned again on 20 December and, on counsel's request, on 3 January 2022. As of the 18 January hearing he still had not surrendered.

The High Court considered how registration of a revision, the surrender rule for admission and the power to grant exemption in an exceptional case operate together. This was a question of custody after conviction and appellate affirmance.

2. Precedents — Considered : Vivek Rai and another v. High Court of Jharkhand through Registrar General and others, (2015) 12 SCC 86, was relied on, and paragraph 11 was quoted. The Supreme Court rule as the present Court understood it allows a revision under Sections 397/401 CrPC to be registered even where High Court rules prescribe surrender, since the rules cannot defeat the substantive revisional jurisdiction. The Court distinguished registration from posting a revision for admission without surrender. The quoted paragraph preserves an inherent power to grant exemption in exceptional situations on an application that makes out a case, having regard to its nature and circumstances; when exemption is granted and listing directed, the rule cannot preclude that exercise of jurisdiction. The High Court accepted that framework, then asked whether Mullu had shown any exceptional circumstance. It did not hold that the rule itself categorically eliminated revision jurisdiction, nor that exemption followed merely because trial and appeal bail had previously been granted.

Deepak Sahu and others v. State of M.P., 2012 (3) MPLJ 534, a coordinate Bench decision, was cited in paragraph 6 on whether a revision is maintainable when the accused has not surrendered.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 397 and 401 CrPC supplied the High Court's revisional jurisdiction over the affirmed criminal conviction. The judgment explains that a High Court procedural surrender rule does not conflict with or override that substantive jurisdiction and acknowledges an inherent judicial discretion, in exceptional circumstances, to exempt surrender so that the matter can be posted for admission. Section 379 IPC was the offence of conviction from which the question of surrender after conviction arose.

4. Issues : (i) Does failure to surrender after appellate affirmance prevent registration or listing for admission of a revision under Sections 397/401 CrPC, and how does the exception to the High Court's surrender rule operate? (ii) Did Mullu's application, based only on lack of an express CrPC surrender mandate and his previous bail status, show exceptional circumstances for exemption or more time in light of the months after the appellate order and repeated adjournments without surrender?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court relied on Vivek Rai in addressing counsel's argument about the effect of the High Court's surrender rule: a High Court surrender rule does not extinguish the ability to register a criminal revision or the High Court's inherent power to exempt surrender in a suitable exceptional case. The cited Supreme Court paragraph requires an application that makes out a case for exemption in light of the nature and circumstances of the matter before the court grants exemption and permits listing for admission. Deepak Sahu was noted as a coordinate Bench authority on maintainability without surrender. The Court acknowledged the power to register a revision and to grant exemption, and confined its inquiry to whether this applicant had made out an exceptional situation.

The application relied only on the assertions that the CrPC did not require surrender and that the applicant had been on bail during the trial and appeal. Neither assertion explained why an exceptional exemption from surrender should be granted after appellate affirmance. The Court also considered the timeline: the appellate decision was on 13 August 2021, the revision came on 26 November after more than 90 days, one exemption request was withdrawn, and adjournments in December and January gave opportunities to furnish a surrender certificate. Counsel still conceded non-surrender on 18 January. On those facts, the Court found no basis to exercise its extraordinary power to exempt the applicant from surrender.

Having found no exceptional circumstance warranting exemption from surrender, the Court declined exemption and dismissed the revision as not maintainable.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court declined to exempt Mullu from surrender and dismissed the criminal revision as not maintainable. The affirmed appellate conviction and sentence were not altered by this order.

Mullu Prajapati v. State of M.P., Cr.R. no. 3174/2021, 18/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (490) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 319 CrPC — trial evidence / heightened threshold - In a murder and assault prosecution, police had filed a closure report for Mukesh Singh Rawat, but the complainant Raghuveer Singh Rawat gave specific testimony in examination-in-chief after the trial against eleven other accused had begun. The Court applied Hardeep Singh: an additional accused may be summoned on strong and cogent evidence, stronger than the prima facie case required for framing a charge but without a finding of guilt or insistence on completed cross-examination. The testimony about his presence, assault with an iron rod and exhortation formed the basis for summoning him; the alibi material collected during investigation was insufficient to displace it.

Section 319 CrPC — closure report / distinct stages - The closure report remained pending before the Magistrate. The earlier unsuccessful revision concerned a Section 193 cognizance request made while further investigation was pending. By the time that revision was disposed of, the police had filed the closure report. The earlier revision did not prevent the trial court from later exercising Section 319 on the basis of evidence given before it. The trial court did not have to await a decision on the closure report, which lost effect after the valid summons under Section 319; under Brijendra Singh the reviewing court nevertheless had to evaluate reliable contrary investigative material and could not simply disregard it.

Electronic alibi — CCTV source / Section 65-B - The home DVR footage, photographs provided by Mukesh's wife and ATM recording did not conclusively establish that he was in Bhopal. No certificate was obtained from the custodian of the original DVR; the technician's certificate related only to the extracted footage. The ATM images did not identify the person who withdrew the money, and the forensic laboratory received a mobile phone in the packet listed as containing a pen drive. The possibility of altered timestamps, the lack of independent identification and corroborating travel and attendance records, and the mismatch of exhibits warranted caution at the stage of summoning. The Court did not finally declare fabrication or inadmissibility.

Alibi — threshold / trial autonomy - The accused must support a plea of alibi with cogent and reliable evidence; the police had exonerated Mukesh on material that the Court found insufficient to exclude his participation when assessed against PW-1's specific testimony. The Court made these observations only to assess whether summoning under Section 319 was justified. They did not resolve guilt, final admissibility or the ultimate prosecution burden. The revision was dismissed and the Sessions Judge instructed to adjudicate the trial without being influenced by these provisional findings.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Mukesh Singh Rawat sought revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC against the order dated 14 June 2022 of the Third Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior, in Sessions Trial No. 476/2021, summoning him as an additional accused under Section 319. The underlying Dehati Nalishi dated 26 May 2021 at 23:50 described a violent episode arising from prior enmity near the complainant's tube-well around 22:15. Poshan allegedly shot Ramnivas, who died; Bharat Singh was injured in an assault. The FIR and ensuing Crime No. 31/2021 named Mukesh among others, and the police charged eleven accused under Sections 302, 147, 148, 149, 294, 323 and 120-B IPC, while keeping the inquiry against Mukesh open under Section 173(8). The police later filed a closure report on the basis that the home CCTV footage placed Mukesh in Bhopal. While that report remained pending, the trial began against the charged accused, including Saroj Rawat.

Before the Section 319 application, the complainant had applied to the Sessions Court to take cognizance against Mukesh under Section 193. The trial court rejected that application in November 2021 because further investigation was still pending. On 29 April 2022 the High Court dismissed a revision of that rejection after the police had submitted a closure report. The High Court explained that, after considering objections, the Magistrate could accept the report, reject it and take cognizance, or order further investigation; a later remedy would be available if accepted. Meanwhile Raghuveer Singh Rawat (PW-1) gave examination-in-chief at the co-accused trial. The prosecution then applied for Mukesh to be added under Section 319, and the trial judge granted the application on 14 June. The closure report had not yet been adjudicated by the Magistrate.

Mukesh argued that the trial court should have awaited the closure result, the earlier revision prevented consideration of the closure report in the present proceedings, and the forensic and ATM material collected by the police established that he was elsewhere. He relied on Brijendra Singh, in which a summons under Section 319 was set aside for failure to consider reliable alibi material collected during investigation, and stressed that the threshold was higher than that for framing a charge. The State relied on specific witness accusations and observed that an FIR is not an encyclopedia. The complainant alleged police bias, challenged the dates and identification shown in the ATM and house footage, the certification of the source footage, the photographs, attendance and toll records, and the inconsistency between the listed and received forensic exhibits. Counsel's allegations of corrupt collusion and manipulation remained submissions, not established facts. The Court examined the available records because Brijendra Singh required consideration of the contrary investigative material rather than mere repetition of the trial court's conclusion.

2. Precedents — Considered : Hardeep Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 3 SCC 92, supplied the governing Section 319 test. The power is discretionary and extraordinary, and must be exercised sparingly. Strong and cogent evidence emerging before the court must support more than a mere possibility of involvement; the threshold is higher than the prima facie case required for framing a charge, but falls short of satisfaction that the evidence, if unrebutted, would lead to conviction. Examination-in-chief can qualify without completed cross-examination, and the words 'could be tried' do not authorize a finding that the person 'could be convicted'. The High Court applied that test to PW-1's testimony and expressly left the determination of guilt to the trial court.

Brijendra Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2017) 7 SCC 706, was invoked by Mukesh as an objection that police exoneration barred the summons. There the Supreme Court found the lower courts had ignored extensive reliable investigation indicating the proposed accused were 175 km away and had relied on testimony repeating the FIR account without evaluating the exculpatory record. This Court accepted the duty to consider credible contrary material, including a closure report in revision, but found the contrary material less persuasive here: the source, identification and timing of the CCTV footage, the identity of the ATM user, and the travel and attendance records raised unresolved doubts, while Raghuveer's court evidence specifically implicated Mukesh. Brijendra Singh did not hold that the pendency of a closure report legally barred Section 319, nor that every police alibi conclusively defeated a later summons based on evidence given in court. The earlier High Court revision about Section 193 cognizance was a procedural disposition at another stage, not a controlling merits determination under Section 319.

3. Statutes considered : Section 319 CrPC permitted the court to proceed against an additional person during an inquiry or trial when the evidence disclosed an offence for which that person could be tried with the existing accused; subsection (4) requires proceedings against the added person to begin afresh and witnesses to be re-heard. Section 193 concerned the earlier application for cognizance; those proceedings did not prevent the later exercise of Section 319 on the basis of evidence given at trial. Section 173(8) explained the continuing investigation against Mukesh and the police closure report, whose pendency did not suspend Section 319. Sections 397 and 401 supplied revisional jurisdiction. Section 161 statements, the FIR and police materials were context and corroborative or contrary material, not a substitute for evidence given by PW-1 before the trial court. Section 65-B of the Evidence Act arose in relation to the technician's certificate for the extracted footage and the absence of a certificate from the custodian of the original home DVR; the Court assessed the resulting weakness of the video alibi at this threshold rather than definitively excluding an exhibit.

4. Issues : The first question was whether an unadjudicated police closure report and the prior Section 193 cognizance revision prevented the Sessions Judge from exercising Section 319 after PW-1's examination-in-chief, and whether the revisional court could consider the closure material despite that earlier order. The second was whether the trial evidence, assessed alongside any reliable contrary material collected during investigation in accordance with Hardeep Singh and Brijendra Singh, was sufficiently stronger than mere suspicion or the prima facie case required for framing a charge to justify summoning Mukesh. The factual assessment included whether the house CCTV, ATM transaction, photographs, work roster, claimed travel and laboratory records conclusively placed him in Bhopal. The court had to preserve the accused's full trial opportunity and avoid deciding the contested alibi and culpability in advance.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court separated the procedural stages. The earlier Section 193 application had been refused while investigation was pending, and its revision was disposed of after a closure report was filed but before a Magistrate decided it. The later exercise of Section 319 was based on evidence recorded after the trial had begun. There was no statutory prohibition on acting while the closure report awaited the Magistrate. Once a valid summons under Section 319 was issued to the person concerned, the report lost effect and no further decision on it was required. The reviewing court could and should consider the material collected during investigation to test the strength of the evidence given before the court. Brijendra Singh required proper consideration of reliable exculpatory material. It did not prohibit the exercise of Section 319 merely because a closure report existed. PW-1's testimony before the court remained the primary basis for exercising Section 319; the Section 161 statements and closure material were considered in assessing that testimony.

The CCTV footage from Mukesh's home was seized from the DVR in his wife's possession on 7 June, after footage had been emailed to the police on 29 May. That delay left room for a possible timestamp alteration, although the Court did not finally find one. The technician Gaurav Pawar certified under Section 65-B only that he had not manipulated the part extracted from the DVR; the wife, as source custodian, supplied no certificate for the original footage. The wife also provided two identification photos; four additional comparison photographs were prepared from those photographs, without a fresh independently taken police photograph of Mukesh. The forensic lab found a person resembling him on home images, yet the foundation and authenticity of the comparison remained contested. The ATM images did not enable the laboratory to identify the person who withdrew the money, and the withdrawal shown by the bank was Rs 5,000 at 00:26 on 27 May, after the reported 22:15 incident; possession of a card and PIN would not prove which person used it. The exhibit memo described a pen drive as exhibit C, but the lab reported a mobile in that packet. The office roster scheduled work arrangements, but the Court noted that no attendance register had been seized to establish actual attendance. The complainant had also objected to the absence of biometric proof. The Court noted the absence of toll receipts supporting the claimed return from the village to Bhopal on 23 May; the complainant had also pointed to the absence of toll footage. These specific gaps undercut the claimed conclusive alibi and the police's conclusion exonerating him at the Section 319 stage, not necessarily each item's admissibility for the eventual trial. The Court also found support in Janki's statement for the complainant's account of an earlier assault at the police station. This observation, like the other factual observations, remained confined to the Section 319 inquiry.

In his examination-in-chief before the court, PW-1 identified Mukesh and attributed specific conduct to him, including an assault with an iron rod, placing his foot on injured Bharat's head, and exhorting Poshan before the gunshot. The FIR named Mukesh, and Section 161 statements gave detailed allegations; the Court noted that a prompt FIR need not catalogue every detail. After examining the alibi material collected by the police, the Court found that the trial testimony met the threshold of evidence stronger than that required for framing a charge, but short of that required for conviction. The Court affirmed the summons but emphatically confined its analysis of the closure report and PW-1 to the Section 319 question, saying it had addressed the detailed investigative record at counsel's insistence in view of Brijendra Singh. The Sessions Judge must decide the case solely on evidence properly coming before it without prejudice from this preliminary assessment.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision and affirmed the 14 June 2022 Section 319 order adding Mukesh Singh Rawat as an accused in Sessions Trial No. 476/2021. The Magistrate need not dispose of the pending closure report for him following that later order. The trial court was expressly directed to conduct the trial on its own record without being influenced by the revision's factual discussion.

Headnote :- Evidence — ocular and medical variance - Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy v. State of A.P., (2014) 12 SCC 457, Bhajan Singh v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 421, Ramanand Yadav v. Prabhu Nath Jha, (2003) 12 SCC 606, and Shamsher Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 7 SCC 536, were applied for the principle that credible oral evidence has qualified primacy. Medical evidence that makes the eyewitness account improbable is relevant to its assessment; that account may be disbelieved where the medical findings completely rule out its truth or are wholly irreconcilable with it. The sword blow attributed to Ashish was not necessarily incompatible with the lacerated wound on Dinesh's head; a blunt part or dulled blade might explain the wound, and the injured accounts were otherwise medically corroborated. The convictions under Sections 325/149, 324/149 and 323/149 IPC were affirmed.

Sentencing — probation by individual role - In a sudden water-tanker quarrel, the Court distinguished Chaman Bai's later arrival and assault on Ramsakhi's knee with a danda from the other appellants' attacks on heads with rods and sticks. It left every conviction intact, granted her conditional Section 4 probation with a bond and ₹5,000 Section 5 compensation, and refused sentence interference for appellants 1–4, requiring them to surrender immediately, and no later than 15 February 2024. Her failure to comply would revive the custodial sentence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A quarrel arose on 7 April 2012 near Ramprakash's home at a government water tanker. According to the prosecution, Munna claimed priority because he had called the tanker; Ramprakash objected that all could use it. Abuse followed, and a group of Munna's relatives arrived. The allegations attributed a sword strike on Dinesh's head to Ashish, rods and sticks to other participants, injuries to Ramprakash and Ramphal, and a danda strike on Ramsakhi to Chaman Bai. Pawan and Rekha were also said to be injured. The initial FIR at Ashoka Garden police station, Bhopal, invoked Sections 294, 307 and 34 IPC; investigation included medical examinations, clothing and earth seizures, arrests and weapon recoveries, and the charge sheet also referred to Sections 325 IPC and 25 of the Arms Act. The trial court framed charges under Sections 294, 323/149 and 307/149 for injuries to six named persons.

The prosecution examined 18 witnesses, including the injured family, other eyewitnesses, medical doctors and investigation witnesses. Ramprakash (PW-1) described the tanker dispute but accepted that he had become unconscious after sustaining injury and could not say who had assaulted him. Ramsakhi (PW-2) described armed participants and her own injury, but gave inconsistent answers in cross-examination about whether she had gone to fetch water. Dinesh (PW-3) and Ramphal (PW-4) recounted the occurrence, with cross-examination about their arrival and sight of the event. Rekha (PW-5), child Pawan (PW-6), Harnarayan (PW-7) and Dinesh Kumar Rathore (PW-8), a relative of the injured persons, spoke to the incident; Harnarayan was declared hostile only on limited seizure details. Other seizure witnesses and doctors testified, while PW-11, PW-15 and PW-16 were hostile. The defence called no witness. The appellate court noted that cross-examination had not effectively undermined the shared account.

Dr Shamim Ahmad's X-ray examinations showed a fracture of Ramphal's right clavicle, but no bony injury in Ramprakash, Dinesh or Ramsakhi. Dr Ameer Singh recorded scalp lacerations for Ramprakash, Ramphal and Dinesh and a bruise and swelling at Ramsakhi's right knee. He accepted that injuries could arise from a fall on a hard surface. The XI Additional Sessions Judge, Bhopal convicted the appellants in S.T. No. 579/2012 on 9 July 2015 under Sections 325/149, 324/149 and 323/149 IPC. The respective sentences were one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹200, with one month's rigorous imprisonment in default; six months' rigorous imprisonment; and a fine of ₹500, with one month's rigorous imprisonment in default. The sentences were to run concurrently. The Section 374 CrPC appeal was decided after examination of the record and hearing State counsel, as no one appeared for the appellants.

2. Precedents — Considered : Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy v. State of A.P., (2014) 12 SCC 457, was quoted on an apparent discrepancy between the use of an axe and an injury caused by a blunt object. The Supreme Court did not discard an injured eyewitness merely because he might not have seen which side of the axe struck, the edge might have been blunt, or the axe might have been reversed before the blow; his own injuries and corroboration by other witnesses supported his account. The High Court used that reasoning as an analogy for the possibility that a sword's blunt portion or dulled edge caused Dinesh's laceration. It did not claim to know the actual contact surface.

Bhajan Singh v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 421, quoted State of U.P. v. Hari Chand for the primacy of oral evidence unless it is totally irreconcilable with the medical evidence, and referred to Abdul Sayeed for the qualification: medical evidence rendering the ocular account improbable is relevant to evaluation, and if it rules out all possibility of truth, the ocular account may be disbelieved. Ramanand Yadav v. Prabhu Nath Jha, (2003) 12 SCC 606, similarly characterises medical evidence as opinionative and reserves an adverse inference for an injury specifically ruled out by the medical evidence. The High Court applied these rules with their qualifications, assessing whether the medical evidence completely ruled out the eyewitness account.

Shamsher Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 7 SCC 536, was quoted for the need to read a doctor's statements as a whole. A doctor's observation about a sharp-edged weapon could not be isolated from evidence that the same axe's blunt head or stick portion could cause the injury; the irreconcilable cases were factually different. This reinforced the High Court's refusal to discard Ashish's alleged sword blow solely because the head wound was lacerated. The court also referred to Modi's medical jurisprudence as an explanatory text on scalp wound appearances and blunt weapons, not as a binding judicial precedent. The Court considered these authorities together, applying their distinct examples and qualifications when assessing whether the eyewitness account and medical evidence could be reconciled.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC was the appellate route. The affirmed offences were Sections 325/149 (grievous hurt with constructive group liability), 324/149 (hurt by dangerous means with Section 149), and 323/149 IPC (simple hurt with Section 149). The earlier charges under Sections 307 and 294 IPC and the Arms Act allegation were distinct from the hurt convictions affirmed in this appeal. The clavicle fracture and wound findings mattered to the actual hurt convictions and sentences. Section 325 IPC had no prescribed minimum imprisonment, but the Court weighed the targeting of vital areas against sentence alteration.

Sections 4 and 5 of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1958, governed Chaman Bai's conditional bond and ₹5,000 compensation to Ramsakhi. The order requires her appearance and compliance with mandatory requirements by 15 February 2024, with the original jail term to revive on failure. The statutory probation route was applied to one appellant only; convictions remained affirmed.

4. Issues : (i) Whether eyewitness evidence assigning a sword blow to Ashish was so inconsistent with a lacerated, rather than expressly incised, wound on Dinesh's head that the prosecution account and group hurt convictions could not stand; the assessment also required considering other injured witnesses and medical corroboration. (ii) Whether sentence should be individually modified for Chaman Bai, who joined later and struck a knee with a danda, while the other four appellants had struck head areas, and what conditions, compensation and surrender directions should follow.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court found a consistent central narrative: Munna disputed public use of the tanker; the quarrel drew in armed participants; injured witnesses described blows and medical evidence recorded several head injuries and Ramphal's clavicle fracture. Cross-examination brought out darkness, unconsciousness, witness relationships and details of presence, but the Court regarded the attacks as sufficiently corroborated and found no material discrepancy rendering the testimony unreliable. Dr Ameer Singh's admission that the injuries could have resulted from a fall on a hard surface was recorded in the evidence; it was not treated as a specific medical exclusion of assault. The Court's central question was whether Dinesh's laceration made Ashish's sword blow impossible.

Applying the four Supreme Court authorities together, medical opinion must be used to test eyewitness reliability, yet an apparent discrepancy between the wound and the alleged weapon does not compel rejection where the medical findings leave a reasonable physical explanation open. A sword may strike with its blunt part or a blade may have become blunt; scalp-wound appearance may also be deceptive. The judgment offered these as possibilities, rather than as a proven account of how the injury occurred. Dinesh's head laceration therefore did not completely rule out the described blow. With the injured witnesses' accounts and the medical evidence accepted, the Court affirmed each appellant's Sections 325/149, 324/149 and 323/149 convictions. The rule retains the qualification that medical evidence may displace an eyewitness account where it completely rules out its truth or is wholly irreconcilable with it.

On sentence, the absence of a minimum Section 325 term did not require a reduction. The Court distinguished the other appellants' blows with rods or sticks on vulnerable head areas and refused to interfere with their sentences. Chaman Bai joined later, with a danda, and was implicated in a knee strike on Ramsakhi rather than the head attacks; the court noted that she was a woman and had not spent any time in custody, but its decision was grounded in the limited role and injury site as well. It affirmed her convictions and sentences, subject to the grant of probation under Section 4 on furnishing the bond required by the trial court, coupled with Section 5 compensation of ₹5,000 to Ramsakhi. Noncompliance would revive the custodial sentence. Probation was granted to Chaman Bai alone; all the appellants' convictions remained affirmed.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal insofar as it concerned appellants 1–4; their 9 July 2015 convictions and sentences were affirmed. Their bail and surety bonds were cancelled. They were directed to surrender immediately, and no later than 15 February 2024, failing which the trial court was directed to issue arrest warrants to compel them to serve their terms of rigorous imprisonment. Appellant 5 Chaman Bai's appeal was allowed only to the stated sentencing extent: convictions affirmed, conditional probation under Section 4, a required bond and ₹5,000 compensation to Ramsakhi under Section 5. Her bail and surety bonds were cancelled, she had to appear by 15 February 2024 and complete probation requirements, and failure would automatically revive the trial jail sentence. A copy of the judgment, along with the record, was directed to be sent back to the trial court for compliance. No conviction was set aside.

Headnote :- Writ mandamus — FIR and investigation / exceptional jurisdiction - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, recognises Article 226 intervention at an aggrieved person's instance in the rarest cases where investigative power has been exercised mala fide and abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII are clearly established. Even then, the High Court may insist on the Code's procedure but cannot direct how the police conduct the investigation. Shweta Bhadauria, W.A. No. 247/2016, applies the rule on alternative remedies subject to the exceptions in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1, and distinguishes the duty to register an FIR under Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, from an automatic entitlement to writ relief. Applying those authorities, the Court refused the requested mandamus to the officers, Lokayukta and EOW, and dismissed the writ with liberty to file a complaint.

FIR non-registration / inadequate investigation - Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, identify the ordinary statutory remedy of approaching the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) CrPC and, if necessary, the Magistrate under Section 156(3). On being prima facie satisfied, the Magistrate can order registration or proper investigation, monitor progress and, where appropriate, recommend a change of investigating officer; the Magistrate does not personally investigate. Those remedies supported refusal of an immediate Article 226 investigative direction, without deciding the complaint's criminal merit.

Private complaint — magistrate remedy - Divine Retreat Centre, with the quoted Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768 and AIIMS Employees' Union, (1996) 11 SCC 582, explains how a complaint may be initiated under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC after police inaction, and the Magistrate's subsequent choices concerning investigation, dismissal under Section 203, or cognizance and issue of process. The petition was dismissed with express liberty to Munnalal to file a Section 200 complaint; no offence, investigation outcome or issue of process was determined.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Munnalal Wadiwa petitioned the Jabalpur Bench under Article 226 of the Constitution in Writ Petition No. 3867 of 2024. He sought a writ of mandamus directing the Principal Secretary and Commissioner to investigate his complaint, Annexure P/3, and take action against the allegedly erring officials and contractors. It would also direct the Lokayukta, Director General of EOW and another respondent to investigate the complaint and register a criminal offence.

The State opposed this direct writ route, citing Sakiri Vasu, Aleque Padamsee, Divine Retreat Centre and the M.P. Division Bench's Shweta Bhadauria decision. It submitted that the petitioner had an alternative criminal complaint remedy under Section 200 CrPC rather than a writ compelling FIR registration. The Court heard the parties and reproduced pertinent precedent passages on police inaction, Magistrate supervision and exceptional writ intervention. The matter was decided on 22 February 2024 by dismissal with liberty to file a complaint.

2. Precedents — Considered : Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted in paragraph 4. Paragraph 41 recognises the power to issue appropriate Article 226 directions at an aggrieved person's instance where the High Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. It confines that power to the rarest cases in which abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII are clearly made out. Even then, the High Court may insist on observance of the Code's procedure but cannot direct how the police investigate. Paragraph 42 of Divine Retreat Centre states that an informant faced with police inaction may file a complaint under Sections 190 and 200. Within that passage, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768, is quoted to explain the Magistrate's inquiry, potential direction of police investigation before process, Section 203 dismissal and cognizance/process alternatives; All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union (Regd.) v. Union of India, (1996) 11 SCC 582, is identified there as support for not entertaining a direct writ in ordinary police-inaction cases. The present Court relied on this statutory remedy and the qualified scope of Article 226 when dismissing the petition with complaint liberty.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted directly in paragraph 5. If the police do not register an FIR under Section 154, an aggrieved person can write to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), then approach the Magistrate under Section 156(3) if registration or investigation remains unsatisfactory. The Magistrate may order an FIR, proper investigation and monitoring. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, quoted in paragraph 6, reiterates that the ordinary remedy is the Magistrate rather than an Article 226 writ even for deficient investigation after registration. It adds that on prima facie satisfaction the Magistrate may direct proper investigation and, where necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer and monitor progress, but cannot investigate personally. The stated reason was to prevent the High Courts from being overwhelmed by direct writ petitions seeking registration or investigation. The High Court applied these routes to Munnalal's requested directions; it did not command that a specific officer be changed or any FIR be entered.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (decided 20 December 2016), a Division Bench authority quoted in paragraph 7, states that a writ of mandamus compelling the police to perform their duty under Section 154 may be denied if the informant has not availed of the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the four exceptions from Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1. It also states that Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, concerns the Section 154 registration duty rather than entitlement to mandamus bypassing alternative remedies.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 was invoked to seek public law mandamus for investigation and FIR registration. The Court treated it as a jurisdiction available in narrow exceptional circumstances, rather than an ordinary substitute for the CrPC remedies. Chapter XII CrPC governs police investigation and Section 154 concerns cognizable information; Section 154(3) provides recourse to the Superintendent of Police. Section 156(3) provides for an application to the Magistrate for registration or proper investigation; the cited authorities explain the Magistrate's supervisory powers. Sections 190 and 200 provide the complaint and cognizance route; Section 203 was mentioned in the passage quoted from Divine Retreat Centre as permitting dismissal after inquiry where sufficient grounds were lacking.

4. Issues : (i) Could the Court grant an immediate Article 226 mandamus requiring the named authorities to investigate allegations about officials and contractors and register a criminal case, where the CrPC supplies complaint and Magistrate remedies? (ii) What exception permits intervention in a rare case of mala fide investigation involving clearly established abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII, and did that exception apply to the relief sought? (iii) What procedural remedy should remain available to Munnalal after dismissal? The Court was not determining whether the allegations in Annexure P/3 were cognizable or true, the propriety of a particular completed investigation, or the result of a future Magistrate complaint.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted the Supreme Court and Division Bench distinction between police duty, complainant remedy and discretionary writ relief. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe provide the ordinary remedy for non-registration or inadequate investigation: recourse under Section 154(3), followed where necessary by judicial oversight under Section 156(3), without asking the High Court to manage a particular investigation at first instance. Divine Retreat Centre also recognises a private complaint under Sections 190 and 200. It preserves Article 226 intervention in the rarest cases where investigative power is exercised mala fide and abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII are clearly made out. Even then, the High Court cannot direct how the investigation is conducted. Shweta Bhadauria subjects a direct mandamus to alternative remedies while expressly retaining Whirlpool exceptions; Lalita Kumari on the registration duty does not itself settle writ maintainability.

Munnalal sought investigation and registration of a criminal offence against officials and contractors on the basis of his complaint. Applying the cited authorities on statutory remedies and the limits of writ intervention, the Court refused the requested writ. It expressly left him free, if advised, to file a criminal complaint under Section 200 before the competent criminal court. Under the complaint procedure described in the cited authorities, the competent Magistrate would independently assess the complaint and the available procedural choices. The order did not adjudicate the merits of the allegations.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition. No direction was issued to the Principal Secretary, Commissioner, Lokayukta, EOW or police to register an FIR or commence a specific investigation. Munnalal was expressly given liberty, if advised, to file a criminal complaint under Section 200 CrPC before the competent criminal court.

Munnalal Wadiwa v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 3867/2024, 22/02/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Regular bail — COVID-19 decongestion / incomplete diary - In Re: Contagion of COVID 19 Virus in Prisons (Supreme Court order, 23 March 2020) required High Powered Committees to identify categories of prisoners eligible for parole or interim bail in light of Article 21 and prison overcrowding. The Committees were to consider the gravity of the offence, sentence and other relevant factors. In this first Section 439 CrPC application for alleged Sections 8/20 NDPS Act offences, the case diary was absent; on the limited material in the application and impugned order, the Court considered the submissions about her age, having taken a lift, lack of knowledge, short period in custody and expected trial time, alongside the need to decongest prisons, and granted bail without a merits finding.

Release conditions — health screening and safe transit - In Re: Contagion of COVID 19 Virus in Prisons (Supreme Court order, 7 April 2020) addressed transport or shelter of persons released during lockdown. The High Court required a ₹1,00,000 personal bond and a surety for the same amount to be furnished later, medical examination and testing if indicated, transport home if not suspected of infection or if the test was negative, hospital treatment if positive, compliance with public-health directions, and verification of criminal antecedents before release. If further registered cases were found before release, or if she violated a condition or jumped bail, the order would automatically cease to have effect; otherwise, it remained in force until the trial concluded. The quoted Supreme Court transport direction governed the arrangements for her release; the bail order did not determine the merits of the NDPS allegation.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Munni Bai filed her first application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC in MCRC No. 30338/2020. She had been arrested on 30 July 2020 in Crime No. 66/2020 at Police Station Lanch, Datia, on an allegation under Sections 8 read with 20 of the Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Act. Counsel said she was around 65 years old, had taken a lift from a co-accused and did not know that he was carrying ganja. Counsel submitted that she had no criminal history, had been in custody since her arrest and faced a trial likely to take a long time. The State opposed bail but, because the case diary was unavailable, could not inform the Court of her antecedents. These were the parties' submissions; the Court did not determine that she lacked knowledge or had no criminal antecedents.

The Court heard the parties by video conferencing on 28 August 2020. It expressly proceeded on the bail application and facts in the impugned order, without the case diary. At that phase of the COVID-19 pandemic, the Court considered Supreme Court prison decongestion directions from March and safe-transit directions from April. It granted bail subject to medical, transport, antecedent-verification and deferred-surety conditions.

2. Precedents — Considered : In Re: Contagion of COVID 19 Virus in Prisons, Suo Motu W.P. (C) No. 1/2020, Supreme Court order dated 23 March 2020, was quoted in paragraph 7. The Supreme Court treated overcrowding and the risk of viral spread in prison as an Article 21 concern and directed every State/Union Territory to constitute a High Powered Committee comprising the Chairman of the State Legal Services Committee, the Principal Secretary responsible for Home or Prisons, and the Director General of Prisons to determine categories of prisoners who could be released on parole or interim bail. It gave as an example prisoners convicted of, or awaiting trial for, offences punishable with imprisonment up to seven years or less, with or without a fine, where the sentence imposed was less than the maximum, but expressly left the categories to the Committee, depending on the nature of the offence, the sentence imposed or the severity of the charge, and other relevant factors. The High Court cited that policy reason while granting Munni Bai's individual regular bail.

The order of 7 April 2020 in the same Supreme Court proceedings, quoted in paragraph 9, directed that released prisoners not be stranded during lockdown: the Union was to ensure transport to homes or an option of temporary shelter, potentially through directions under the Disaster Management Act, 2005, and States/Union Territories through police leadership were to provide safe transit. The High Court incorporated that separate practical direction into its release arrangements, linking a doctor's pre-release assessment and any indicated virus test to safe home transfer or hospital treatment.

Both Supreme Court directions addressed the pandemic: the March order concerned categories of prisoners eligible for release to decongest prisons, and the April order concerned safe transit after release.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC was the power invoked for the first regular bail application; Section 437 and Section 439 ordinary conditions were expressly retained. Sections 8 and 20 NDPS Act identified the charged narcotic offence. Article 21 featured in the quoted Supreme Court overcrowding directive, while the Court granted bail without commenting on the merits. The Supreme Court's April order mentioned the Disaster Management Act, 2005 as a possible source of Union directions for safe transit; the High Court imposed medical and transport conditions.

4. Issues : (i) Whether, on a record lacking the case diary and therefore confined to the application and impugned-order facts, an older applicant seeking bail for the first time on an allegation under Sections 8/20 NDPS Act should be released under Section 439 in the pandemic circumstances without prejudging knowledge or culpability. (ii) How to implement the Supreme Court's March decongestion and April safe-transit directions through concrete conditions while guarding against unverified criminal antecedents, public-health risk, breach and flight.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court expressly identified the missing case diary and the consequent narrow factual basis. The explanation that she had taken a lift and did not know about the ganja was a submission by her counsel. The State opposed release but could not check antecedents without the diary. The Court considered the allegations, custody since 30 July, age and delay contentions on the available material, and the Supreme Court's direction to address overcrowded prisons in a public-health emergency. It granted bail without commenting on merits.

The Court then attached safeguards that determined whether release could actually occur. She was to furnish a ₹1,00,000 personal bond to the satisfaction of the Trial Court, Chief Judicial Magistrate or Remand Magistrate, whichever was available. She would undertake to obey Central, State and local COVID instructions. She was also required to furnish one surety for the same amount to the satisfaction of the Trial Court within one month after the lockdown was completely lifted. Before release, a competent doctor was to examine her, with testing if medically indicated; if she was not suspected of infection, or if her test report was negative, the local administration was to arrange transport home in accordance with the 7 April Supreme Court order, while a positive result required her immediate transfer to the appropriate hospital for treatment in accordance with medical norms. She had to give the residence-area police a copy of the order. The lower court was to verify antecedents before release, and if further registered cases appeared the order would lose effect and the lower court had no obligation to release her. The Court also retained the other conditions under Sections 437/439. If she violated any public-health instruction, whether general or specific, the order would automatically cease to have effect, and the local administration or police were to take her into custody immediately and return her to the same jail. The order was to remain in force until the trial concluded, but would automatically cease to have effect if she jumped bail or violated any condition.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application for regular bail, subject to verification of criminal antecedents before release; if additional registered cases were found, the order would lose effect and release would not be required.

Munni Bai v. State of MP, M.Cr.C. no. 30338/2020, 28/08/2020, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Writ mandamus — non-registration / alternative remedy - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, recognises Article 226 intervention at an aggrieved person's instance where the High Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. The power is confined to the rarest cases where abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII are clearly established. Even then, the High Court may insist on the Code's procedure but cannot direct how the police conduct the investigation. Shweta Bhadauria, W.A. No. 247/2016, states that mandamus to enforce the police duty under Section 154 may be denied if the informant has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, subject to the exceptions in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1. Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, concerns the duty to register an FIR and does not itself establish an entitlement to writ relief without using alternative remedies. Applying those authorities, the Court dismissed Munni Bai's writ because she had an effective alternative remedy of filing a criminal complaint.

De novo investigation — cited authority distinguished - Neetu Kumar Nagaich v. State of Rajasthan, W.P.(Crl.) No. 141/2020 (Supreme Court order, 16 September 2020), involved an unacceptable closure report despite a homicidal death and directed de novo investigation; it did not direct the initial registration of an FIR. Its facts did not govern this writ seeking both registration and fair investigation. The Court rejected that reliance without deciding the underlying allegations.

Private complaint — police inaction - Divine Retreat Centre, quoting Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768 and referring to AIIMS Employees' Union, (1996) 11 SCC 582, recognises the remedy of a complaint before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200, followed, as appropriate, by inquiry, investigation, dismissal under Section 203, or cognizance and issue of process. The writ was dismissed with express liberty for Munni Bai to lodge a complaint before the competent court, which must assess it independently.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Munni Bai petitioned the Gwalior Bench in WP No. 18117/2021 under Article 226, asking the respondent police to conduct a fair and impartial investigation and register an FIR against the accused person. Her counsel said she had made several complaints to respondent 4, without action, and sought de novo investigation by relying on a Supreme Court order in Neetu Kumar Nagaich. Her allegation was that the police had not acted on her complaints; the writ did not determine the underlying offence or the merits of an investigation.

The State opposed the writ, contending that an effective Section 200 CrPC private complaint remedy existed and citing Sakiri Vasu, Aleque Padamsee, Divine Retreat Centre and the M.P. Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria. The High Court framed the issue as whether an Article 226 petition for FIR registration was tenable. It quoted Divine Retreat Centre and Shweta Bhadauria, distinguished the Supreme Court authority cited by the petitioner because it concerned a different procedural setting and an unacceptable closure report, then dismissed with liberty to approach a competent criminal court by complaint. The hearing included counsel through video conferencing and concluded on 1 October 2021.

2. Precedents — Considered : Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for two related propositions. First, the High Court may issue appropriate Article 226 directions at an aggrieved person's instance if it is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide. That power is confined to the rarest cases where abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII are clearly established. Even then, the High Court may insist on compliance with the Code's procedure but cannot dictate how the investigation is conducted. Second, when police do not act on information, the informant has the Sections 190 and 200 complaint remedy and an ordinary writ for registration is not to be entertained. The quoted passage reproduces Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768, explaining the Magistrate's inquiry, possible order for police investigation before process, Section 203 dismissal or cognizance and process according to a prima facie case. It refers to All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union (Regd.) v. Union of India, (1996) 11 SCC 582, as support for that complainant-remedy approach. The High Court applied this reasoning to Munni Bai's complaint of police inaction and dismissed the writ with liberty to file a criminal complaint.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016, was the Division Bench decision quoted in paragraph 9. It states that mandamus compelling the police to perform their duty under Section 154 may be denied to an informant who has not used the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC, unless one of the four exceptions identified in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1, comes to the informant's aid. It distinguishes Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, on the duty to register cognizable information from a litigant's entitlement to bypass the statutory remedies through Article 226. Neetu Kumar Nagaich v. State of Rajasthan and Ors., W.P.(Crl.) No. 141/2020, order dated 16 September 2020, was invoked by the petitioner. The High Court explained that the Supreme Court there directed de novo investigation after finding a closure report unacceptable where the death was homicidal but the offender was said to be unknown. It was not a direction to register an FIR. The High Court distinguished it on that procedural and factual basis. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, were cited by counsel for the State in support of its objection to maintainability.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 was the source of requested mandamus; the Court treated it as a qualified public-law discretion ordinarily withheld when the complainant has adequate Code remedies, subject to the quoted exceptions. Section 154 CrPC concerns the police FIR duty; Section 154(3) provides recourse to the Superintendent of Police, as referred to in Shweta Bhadauria. Section 156(3) permits an application to the Magistrate for an investigation order. Sections 190 and 200 permit initiation of a private complaint before the competent Magistrate; the quoted Divine Retreat Centre passage describes inquiry and possible Section 203 dismissal or cognizance/process.

4. Issues : (i) Whether unacted-upon requests to police for FIR registration and a fair investigation warranted immediate Article 226 mandamus, given the statutory complainant remedies and the exceptional writ possibility. (ii) Whether Neetu Kumar Nagaich's de novo investigation following an unacceptable closure report applied to Munni Bai's request for initial registration and fair investigation in response to her complaints of police inaction. (iii) Which remedy remained open after refusing the writ.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court adopted Divine Retreat Centre's distinction: ordinary police inaction may be addressed by a complaint before the Magistrate. Article 226 intervention remains possible where the High Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide, in the rarest cases where abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII are clearly established. Even then, the High Court may insist on the Code's procedure but cannot prescribe how the police investigate. Shweta Bhadauria reinforces the Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 alternatives and preserves Whirlpool exceptions. Its Lalita Kumari distinction keeps the police registration duty separate from judicial selection of a remedy. The Court dismissed the writ because Munni Bai had an effective alternative remedy of filing a criminal complaint before the competent court.

The petitioner's Neetu Kumar Nagaich analogy failed for a separate reason. A Supreme Court direction to reinvestigate after a filed but unacceptable closure report in a homicidal-death case concerns a different procedural setting from asking the High Court to compel a first FIR for complaints on which police allegedly have not acted. The order itself says Neetu did not direct FIR registration. The High Court therefore distinguished that decision when refusing the relief sought by Munni Bai. The proper immediate route was a criminal complaint in a competent court, left for that court's independent consideration.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the writ petition with express liberty to Munni Bai to file a criminal complaint before the court of competent jurisdiction. No direction for FIR registration or de novo investigation was issued, and the underlying allegations were not adjudicated. The future complaint, if filed, would be judged under the ordinary CrPC process rather than predetermined by this writ dismissal.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — divorce, delay and disputed property - Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, applying State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal, 1992 Supp (1) SCC 335, precludes quashing a matrimonial FIR that, on its face, discloses a cognizable offence merely because a divorce petition preceded it or the wife delayed reporting while seeking reconciliation. Civil litigation and criminal allegations are assessed independently. Documents relied on by the defence cannot replace an examination of the FIR allegations taken at face value. The complainant explained her earlier silence and alleged later dowry-linked harassment, exclusion and assault. The applicants' public notice severing relations, proof of residence, reliance on employment elsewhere and claim to ownership of the house remained disputed matters. The FIR and proceedings were not quashed.

Relatives — specificity / prima facie scrutiny - Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, Monju Roy v. State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693, Chandralekha, Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, and Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, (2010) 7 SCC 667, were cited for protecting near relatives from vague allegations; Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, limits that protection where specific allegations of cruelty in connection with dowry require trial. The Court identified an allegation that applicants 1 and 2 had taken a ₹10 lakh loan and harassed the complainant when repayment was sought, as well as specific allegations of maltreatment and expulsion from the matrimonial home against the others.

Section 498-A IPC — continuing mental cruelty - Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, explains that trauma from matrimonial abuse and being driven away may persist at the parental home even after acts of physical cruelty at the matrimonial home cease. The High Court applied that principle to the alleged ouster and harassment, and referred to Amar Singh v. Vimla on compelling a wife to reside at her parental home. Meera v. State, (2022) 3 SCC 93, was quoted about cruelty by a mother-in-law. The uncontroverted allegations in the FIR were sufficient for the proceedings to continue; the allegation under Section 377 IPC was made only against the husband, who was not an applicant, and all questions concerning that offence were expressly left open.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Four applicants related to Vivek Singh sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC (the order also refers parenthetically to Section 528 BNSS) of Crime No. 627/2023 and ST No. 23/2024. The FIR cited Sections 377, 498-A, 323, 294, 506 read with 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The complainant said she married Vivek, a member of the Indian Navy, on 25 February 2020 and that her parents had given cash, ornaments and articles. She alleged recurring dowry-related mistreatment by in-laws and husband, an additional ₹10 lakh loan from her parents to two of the applicants followed by harassment when repayment was demanded, intermittent improvement in their behaviour when Vivek was on leave, and her own silence to preserve the marriage and avoid social consequences. She said Vivek later filed a divorce petition without informing her after taking her to her parents' place, and that she was locked out of the matrimonial home, beaten on later visits, and injured in July 2023. She also alleged a non-consensual sexual act by Vivek. These matters were allegations in the FIR, rather than facts proved at trial.

Charges against applicants 1–3 and Vivek had been framed while the quashing application was pending; a separate charge sheet against applicant 4 had been filed before the Juvenile Justice Board, whose proceedings were not expressly included in the prayer. The High Court declined to take a hypertechnical view and considered the allegations against all four, while its operative dismissal was of the application before it.

Applicants contended that the FIR followed Vivek's 10 August 2022 divorce petition as a retaliatory measure. They invoked a newspaper notice severing ties, a 2019 sale deed for the disputed house, a complaint alleging that the complainant and her brother were occupying it unlawfully, separate voter and Samagra IDs, and applicant 2's employment in Bharuch to argue false implication and separate residence. They denied the Section 377 allegation but acknowledged that it was not made against them. The State pointed to address entries in arrest memos and said that even separate residence would not negate the specific loan and harassment allegation against applicant 1 or the other applicants' alleged acts. Respondent 2 did not appear despite service. The Court heard the parties, examined the FIR allegations and cited Supreme Court authorities on inherent-power limits and matrimonial relatives.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi and Ors., (2007) 12 SCC 369, is quoted in paragraph 8. It applied the illustrations in State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal, 1992 Supp (1) SCC 335, to hold that a High Court should not quash a matrimonial FIR on extraneous considerations, including an inference that it is false merely because it was lodged after separation and the institution of the husband's divorce case. Attempts at settlement can explain why a wife reported later; civil and criminal proceedings arising from overlapping facts remain independent. In the prima facie inquiry under Section 482, the allegations in the FIR or complaint are examined to determine whether they disclose a cognizable offence; they are not treated as conclusively disproved by material outside those allegations. The High Court applied this principle to the complainant's express explanation that she hoped to preserve her marriage and to the applicants' contentions that the FIR was retaliatory and arose from a dispute over the house. It found that those contentions did not justify quashing at that stage.

Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207; Monju Roy v. State of W.B., (2015) 13 SCC 693; Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, 2013 (1) UC 155; Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741; and Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, (2010) 7 SCC 667, were considered together by the Court for the proposition that near relatives should not face the ordeal of trial on allegations that are not specific and clear. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, is quoted for the allegations in the complaint against the husband and parents-in-law and the Supreme Court's conclusion that, where the allegations on their face disclosed a case, whether the alleged dowry harassment had occurred was a matter for trial. The High Court applied that caution, subject to this qualification, to the specific allegations concerning the loan, dowry demands and physical harassment against the applicants.

Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, is quoted for the principle that cruelty under Section 498-A may be physical or mental: stress, fear and trauma caused by being driven from the matrimonial home can continue at a parental home even after acts of cruelty at the matrimonial home cease. The High Court used that principle in assessing the alleged exclusion and cruelty, and cited its own Amar Singh v. Smt. Vimla, Criminal Revision No. 2376/2020 (22 June 2021), on compelling a married woman to live at her parental home. Meera v. State by Inspector of Police, (2022) 3 SCC 93, was quoted for a stern observation about a woman subjecting her daughter-in-law to cruelty.

Paragraph 17 cites a series of Supreme Court decisions on quashing proceedings, including XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337; State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718; Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319; Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350; State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226; M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686; State of M.P. v.

Kunwar Singh, Cr.A. No. 709/2021 (30 June 2021); Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678; Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221; State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547; S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600; Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336; Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460; Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437; and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682. The order relies on these decisions collectively for the rule that proceedings may be quashed if the uncontroverted allegations fail to disclose an offence. The Court found that the allegations in the FIR, taken at face value, disclosed a cognizable offence.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC, with a parenthetical Section 528 BNSS reference in this 2024 order, was invoked as the source of the Court's inherent power to quash proceedings. The Court examined the allegations taken at face value and declined to resolve disputes arising from the applicants' documents and defences. Section 498-A IPC concerned alleged dowry-linked physical and mental cruelty; the passage from Rupali Devi explained how mental cruelty may continue after a wife has been driven from her matrimonial home. Sections 323, 294 and 506 read with 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act were among the recorded offences. Section 377 IPC concerned only the husband's alleged conduct, and the husband was not an applicant; the Court explicitly kept all questions about that charge open. Section 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, was the provision under which the divorce case relied on for the counterblast submission had been filed; that civil proceeding did not bring the criminal proceedings to an end.

4. Issues : (i) Did the husband's earlier divorce petition and the applicants' documents concerning the property, severance of relations and separate residence show, at the Section 482 stage, that the FIR was retaliatory or failed to disclose a cognizable offence, despite its explanation for the delay? (ii) Were the allegations against individual relatives sufficiently specific to overcome the caution against omnibus prosecution, and did claims of dowry, harassment over repayment of the loan, assault or exclusion require trial? (iii) Could the complainant's alleged expulsion from the matrimonial home still support a Section 498-A mental-cruelty case in view of Rupali Devi? (iv) Was any question about Section 377 concerning the husband, who was not an applicant, properly before this Court?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected the counterblast argument as legally insufficient. Pratibha required the Court to examine the allegations in the FIR rather than infer falsity merely because the complaint followed the divorce petition. The FIR itself mentioned Vivek's divorce notice and explained that the complainant initially kept quiet to preserve the marriage. A later report could therefore coexist with prior efforts at reconciliation. Neither the civil findings nor the pendency of the divorce proceedings determined the criminal case; the standards of proof in civil and criminal cases differ. The claim to ownership of the house, notice severing relations, identity documents, employment records and countercomplaint raised disputed defences. They did not justify conducting a mini-trial or rejecting the allegations taken at face value. The Court noted the complainant was already living in the house according to applicant 3's own complaint, but did not determine ownership or lawful possession.

The Court applied the authorities cautioning against the prosecution of near relatives to the allegations against each applicant. The Court identified an allegation that applicants 1 and 2 took ₹10 lakh from the complainant's parents in the guise of a loan and harassed her when repayment was sought. Applicants 2–4 faced further particularised allegations of dowry-related mistreatment and the complainant's ouster. Taramani Parakh showed why specific allegations may require trial even when parents-in-law or relatives deny them; whether those allegations are true is a matter for trial. Claimed separate addresses did not negate the alleged involvement in the loan and related harassment or the other described acts when the allegations were considered at face value. The Court assessed the conduct attributed to each numbered applicant.

Rupali Devi explained that physical separation from the matrimonial home does not itself end mental cruelty. The alleged stress, exclusion and fear of return could continue at the parental home even without new physical abuse there. The Court referred to Amar Singh and Meera; its conclusion was confined to whether the allegations disclosed a cognizable offence. The authorities cited in paragraph 17 reinforced the applicable test under Section 482: if the FIR's uncontroverted allegations disclose a cognizable offence, quashing is unavailable merely to examine the competing defence account. The Court concluded that the allegations disclosed such an offence in the present case and refused to interfere. It did not reach the merits of the Section 377 accusation because that was against Vivek, who had not filed this application, and expressly left those questions open.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the application. The Court declined to quash Crime No. 627/2023 or the challenged criminal proceedings in respect of the applicants. The order did not set aside the charges already framed or the proceedings separately instituted before the Juvenile Justice Board. Quashing of the latter proceedings had not been expressly sought, but the Court considered the allegations against all four applicants rather than taking a hypertechnical view. The Section 377 question concerning the non-applicant husband remained open.

Headnote :- Rape allegation — consent / lawyer-client pressure - The applicant advocate was alleged to have made success in his client's pending divorce case conditional on her obeying his instructions, had repeated sexual relations with her by exerting pressure and threatened that refusal would cause her to lose the case and disclosure would lead to public defamation. The Court treated these specific allegations, when taken at face value in the application under Section 482 CrPC, as inconsistent with free consent despite the complainant's married status and the applicant's assertion that the relations were consensual. A later Section 13B divorce decree and compromise-based acquittal of her husband under Section 498-A IPC confirmed that the matrimonial proceedings were pending at the relevant time. The Section 376(2)(n) IPC FIR and trial proceedings were not quashed; guilt and whether consent was freely given remain matters for trial.

Statements — FIR, Section 161 and Section 164 CrPC / quashing - The applicant relied on a later Section 164 statement said to deny rape and describe a dispute over legal fees and hospital signatures. The Court held that differences between the accounts in the FIR and Section 161 statement and the account in the Section 164 statement may be used to test omissions and contradictions but do not require the High Court to disregard the earlier allegations in a quashing proceeding. It declined to resolve the disputed accounts conclusively at that stage and dismissed the application to quash Crime No. 164/2024 and RCT No. 230/2024. The Section 164 statement remained available for testing omissions and contradictions.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Munshilal Dhakad, an advocate, invoked Section 482 CrPC in Misc. Criminal Case No. 23671 of 2024 to quash Crime No. 164/2024 at Police Station Sabalgarh, Morena, registered for an alleged offence under Section 376(2)(n) IPC, and the consequential proceedings in RCT No. 230/2024. The prosecutrix was his client in a pending divorce case against Deewan. According to the FIR as described in the order, she was a labourer, had been married about twelve years and had two daughters, then aged approximately twelve and nine years. She said her husband had harassed her, leading to the divorce case. This was her account of the matrimonial dispute, rather than findings reached at trial.

She alleged that around noon on 15 March 2022 the advocate visited her home, said the divorce claim was weak but he could make her win if she followed every instruction, and had physical relations with her. She said he threatened to defame her and harm the future of her children if she told anyone. According to the complaint, he returned repeatedly and exploited her vulnerable position. The judgment records a further alleged incident on 19 March 2024 at about 3 p.m., when she objected and he allegedly threatened to ensure she lost the pending case and would be publicly disgraced if she disclosed it. She claimed she had paid his full fee. The allegation was of repeated rape.

The applicant relied on a later statement of the prosecutrix recorded under Section 164 CrPC. As summarised by his counsel, it did not support the allegation of rape and instead described a 12 April 2024 dispute over the lawyer's fee, police taking her to the station, illness and signatures being obtained at the hospital; it said he had threatened her over fees but had not raped her. Counsel argued false implication and consent. The State opposed quashing. The applicant submitted a later divorce decree under Section 13B of the Hindu Marriage Act; a separate Section 498-A IPC prosecution against the husband had ended in acquittal following compromise. The High Court considered those documents as showing that the divorce proceedings were pending at the relevant time; they did not resolve the allegation of rape.

2. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked as the source of the Court's inherent power to quash the FIR and consequential trial proceedings. The Court considered the disputed material in deciding whether the proceedings should be quashed, rather than recording evidence and determining guilt. Sections 161 and 164 CrPC concerned the separate statements of the prosecutrix recorded by the police and the Magistrate. The Court said both statements could be used to test omissions and contradictions, and refused to discard the FIR and Section 161 version automatically because the Section 164 account differed. The later divorce decree was passed under Section 13B of the Hindu Marriage Act, and the husband was acquitted in the separate Section 498-A IPC case following a compromise; neither document was treated as determining consent to the alleged acts.

3. Issues : (i) Could a lawyer's alleged repeated sexual relations with a client be regarded as freely consensual where he allegedly made success in her pending divorce case conditional on her complying with his demands and threatened that she would lose the case or be publicly defamed? Her married status and the later divorce decree formed part of the procedural background; they did not resolve whether she had acted under pressure. (ii) Did a later Section 164 statement denying rape and describing a fee dispute compel quashing despite the FIR and Section 161 account, or instead raise contradictions for trial? The application concerned quashing of the criminal proceedings, rather than a determination of guilt.

4. Ratio / Findings : The Court framed the question as whether the prosecutrix could be regarded as having consented. It noted that she was married but litigating divorce and that the applicant was her advocate. The FIR alleged that he assured a favourable result in a case said to lack merit only if she obeyed him, and that he later threatened adverse litigation consequences and social disgrace while obtaining sexual relations with her. On those allegations, the Court held that the alleged consent had been obtained through coercion or pressure and could not be treated as free consent for the purpose of quashing. The Section 13B decree and the husband's compromise-based Section 498-A acquittal showed that the divorce proceedings were pending at the material time, but neither established that her rape allegations were proven. The Court assessed the alleged pressure and the competing statements in deciding whether the proceedings should be quashed.

The later Section 164 statement conflicted with the earlier account. According to counsel, that statement described a dispute over fees and expressly denied rape, whereas the FIR and Section 161 account described repeated coerced acts. The Court refused to prefer the later denial over the earlier accounts as a conclusive reason to quash. It stated that Sections 161 and 164 statements may be used to test omissions and contradictions, but the Section 161 account cannot simply be ignored because the Section 164 statement does not repeat it. As the prosecution account still contained specific allegations of pressure, threats and repeated acts, the inconsistency remained for consideration in the criminal proceedings and did not warrant terminating the FIR or prosecution.

5. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has dismissed the Section 482 application. Crime No. 164/2024 under Section 376(2)(n) IPC and consequential RCT No. 230/2024 proceedings were not quashed. The parties' competing accounts remained to be tested in the pending criminal proceedings.

Munshilal Dhakad v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 23671/2024, 04/03/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (497) Prev Next

Headnote :- Murder — Section 300 thirdly / firearm injuries - A Division Bench upheld Ashok's conviction for the double murder of Mataprasad and Tejram under Sections 302/34 IPC. Gunshot injuries to the chest and head caused fatal bleeding; the post-mortems described multiple entry and exit wounds. Applying Virsa Singh, the Court held that the required intention is to inflict the particular injury proved; whether that injury is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death is an objective question. A separate intention to cause death is unnecessary under clause Thirdly. The coordinated firearm attack, weapon used, parts of the body targeted and pattern of injuries supported murder rather than a Section 304 classification. The Court dismissed Ashok's appeal and affirmed his life sentence.

Common intention — Section 34 IPC / armed participation - The group arrived armed at the field, surrounded the fleeing victims, and Murarilal fired while Ashok carried a 12-bore double-barrel gun. Section 34 requires a joint criminal act, common intention and participation, which can be inferred from conduct; mere accompaniment does not suffice. On the evidence it accepted, the Court found a prior meeting of minds and participation by Ashok in the joint attack, although it did not identify a particular fatal projectile as fired by him. His conviction with the aid of Section 34 was sustained.

Evidence — related witnesses / medical corroboration - Harendra (PW-4) and Shailendri (PW-9), children of Tejram, were scrutinised as related witnesses. Their accounts, which the Court regarded as natural, Harendra's immediate FIR, the evidence of three independent witnesses from adjoining fields and the post-mortem findings supported the prosecution. Defence attacks on non-examination of two named witnesses, the alleged late arrival of some witnesses, missing breakfast articles and non-recovery of the alleged weapons did not undermine the prosecution evidence accepted by the Court. The Court affirmed the conviction, while deciding the State's appeal against other accused by a separate judgment.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Criminal Appeal No. 196 of 2003 under Section 374 CrPC challenged the 4 February 2003 conviction and life sentence in Sessions Trial No. 347/2000, Bhind, for the killing of Mataprasad and Tejram on 16 October 1999. The cause title retained Murarilal and others, but appellant No. 1 Murarilal died while the appeal was pending and his name was deleted under an order of 9 March 2011. This decision concerns the surviving appellant, Ashok. A State appeal from the acquittal of Ramavtar and Subhash was heard at the same time but decided by a separate judgment. The appeals of other accused, who had been tried separately after absconding, had been delinked. The Court affirmed Ashok's conviction and sentence under Section 302 read with Section 34 on two counts, one for each death.

The prosecution said Mataprasad and Tejram went to their field early to plough and asked their family members to bring breakfast. Harendra (PW-4), Shailendri (PW-9) and Dharmendra arrived while the men were cutting grass. An armed group came in a tractor-trolley; the victims tried to flee and start a tractor, were surrounded, and Murarilal fired at Mataprasad's chest. The children hid in a bajra field. Further gunfire and assaults resulted in both men dying at the spot. Neighbours working adjoining fields came to the scene. Harendra lodged the FIR that day. A spot map, bloodstained soil and cartridge cases were collected, and statements were recorded under Section 161 CrPC.

Ashok challenged the eyewitness accounts on the grounds of discrepancies, improvements and deliberation. He argued that enmity over land provided a motive for false implication and that Sitaram and Dharmendra had not been examined. He relied on Shailendri's account of the timing to contend that certain witnesses from adjoining fields arrived after the incident. He also submitted that the weapons said to have been used had already been deposited in connection with another crime in 1990 and none was recovered from him. The failure to recover breakfast articles or show them on the spot map, he argued, made the prosecution story suspect. The State supported the trial judgment. These were defence submissions, not findings that the prosecution witnesses had fabricated evidence.

Dr O.P. Kashtwar (PW-5) found seven injuries to Mataprasad, including blackened wounds to the neck and chest, a large back wound and fractured ribs; he identified three firearm entry wounds and three exit wounds. Tejram's post-mortem described three injuries, with two firearm entry wounds and one exit wound. He attributed both deaths to shock from excessive external and internal bleeding caused by gunshot injury; foreign material was sealed and handed over to the police. Shriprakash (PW-2), Ramkumar (PW-7) and Jaiprakash (PW-8) were described as independent field witnesses, while Harendra and Shailendri were Tejram's children.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, set out the four elements applied by the Court for Section 300 Thirdly: objective proof of the presence of a bodily injury and of its nature, intention to inflict that particular injury, and objective sufficiency in the ordinary course to cause death. The Court quoted and applied it to the deliberate firearm wounds and rejected the contention that the absence of a separate intention to kill necessarily excluded murder. Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra explained the distinctions between culpable homicide under Section 299, the four clauses of Section 300 and Parts I and II of Section 304; its discussion of knowledge under clause Secondly provided the legal background; the present Court's decision rested on clause Thirdly. Anda v. State of Rajasthan emphasised sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course of nature and the significance of the weapon used and the part of the body injured.

Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P. explained that a single blow does not invariably determine the classification of the offence; the injury, weapon and circumstances must be assessed. The Court considered that principle in this case involving multiple shots. Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P. listed non-exhaustive circumstances for discerning intention and distinguishing Sections 302 and 304, including weapon, vital part, force, premeditation, enmity and provocation. Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P. similarly inferred intention from the force of an assault directed at the head. Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., including its account of State of Karnataka v. Vedanayagam and Virsa Singh, likewise did not regard the number of injuries as decisive by itself and distinguished the intention to cause the particular injury from the seriousness of that injury. The Court relied on that principle in its analysis under clause Thirdly in this case involving multiple shots.

For Section 34, Suresh Sankharam Nangare, Shyamal Ghosh and Mrinal Das were cited on participation, common intention and prior concert; Ramashish Yadav recognised that the meeting of minds may develop at the spur of the moment. The Court then cited Bijay Singh on presence and prior plan, Hem Raj on the consequence of disbelieving co-accused participation, Dashrathlal on the insufficiency of mere accompaniment, Rajagopalswamy Konar on differing roles in a land-dispute assault, and Sheikh Nabab on failure to prove an overt act. In applying these authorities, the Court did not require proof that every participant had fired a gun. On the evidence it accepted, the Court found that Ashok participated in the joint attack while armed and shared the common design; his role was not confined to mere presence. Paragraph 15 quotes a test proposed by the UK Law Commission and a discussion of knowledge.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 299, 300 (especially clause Thirdly), 302 and 304 IPC framed the homicide distinction. Clause Thirdly requires consideration of whether the offender intended to inflict the particular bodily injury and whether it was objectively sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The judgment discussed the knowledge required by clause Secondly, the other clauses of murder and Exception 4 concerning sudden fights to explain the classification; it ultimately held murder under clause Thirdly and did not reduce the offence to either part of Section 304. Section 34 IPC supplied joint liability for a criminal act done by several persons in furtherance of their common intention. Section 149 appeared in the account of the charges and co-accused acquittal, but the conviction affirmed in this appeal was under Section 34; the Court did not make a fresh finding of liability under Section 149. Sections 374 and 378 CrPC governed Ashok's appeal against conviction and the separate State appeal against acquittal respectively; Section 161 CrPC identified investigative witness statements.

4. Issues : The appeal required the Court to decide whether the prosecution's ocular and medical evidence established an intentional fatal firearm assault amounting to murder under Section 300 Thirdly, rather than a lesser culpable homicide classification, and whether Ashok's participation and common intention supported conviction for both murders with the aid of Section 34. The defence also contested credibility in light of related witnesses, alleged contradictions and omissions, land enmity, non-examination of two named witnesses, weapon history and missing breakfast articles. The separate State appeal and proceedings involving the absconding accused were dealt with separately and were outside the operative decision in this appeal.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted that both deaths resulted from the firearm assault. Dr Kashtwar's evidence recorded multiple blackened entry and exit wounds to vital areas, extensive blood loss, and shock as the cause of death. The Court used the nature and placement of the injuries and the weapons described in the evidence to infer that the bodily injuries were intentional and sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death. Virsa Singh separates subjective intention to inflict the injury actually proved from objective sufficiency of that injury; a separate intention to cause death is not an additional element of Section 300 Thirdly. Its review of the single-blow and sudden-fight authorities provided the legal context, without a finding that the victims entered a mutual fight or that Exception 4 applied. The conclusion was murder under Section 302, not a Section 304 conviction.

The Section 34 analysis stated that a criminal act committed by several persons must be in furtherance of their common intention and each must participate in the joint activity, although an individual need not perform a separately identifiable fatal act. The Court's general illustrations included remote assistance and deliberate omission, while several cited cases warned against conviction based on mere accompaniment or unproved participation. In the present case, the prosecution evidence placed Ashok among the armed group that came to the field and surrounded victims who sought to escape; he had a 12-bore double-barrel gun as Murarilal fired. Independent witnesses identified both in the assault, and the Court found sufficient evidence of a prior meeting of minds. It inferred a common intention to inflict the fatal firearm injuries from the coordinated attack and repeated gunshot injuries to vital parts of the body. The Court did not attribute a specific cartridge or wound to Ashok. On the evidence it accepted, Section 34 supported his liability for the joint criminal act.

Harendra and Shailendri were related to Tejram, so the Court said their evidence needed careful scrutiny; it regarded their accounts as natural and consistent with the prompt FIR and the evidence of the independent witnesses from adjoining fields. Dr Kashtwar's post-mortems corroborated a fatal shooting. It found that the material testimony of the independent witnesses remained unrebutted in cross-examination. The non-examination of Sitaram and Dharmendra, the alleged late arrival of some witnesses, missing breakfast articles and weapons objection were stated by the defence, but the appellate reasons did not treat them as undermining the prosecution evidence it accepted.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has dismissed surviving appellant Ashok's appeal. It confirmed the trial conviction under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC on two counts, with life imprisonment and a fine of ₹5,000 on each count and six months' rigorous imprisonment on each count in default of payment. It directed communication of the result to him through the Jail Superintendent and return of the trial record. Murarilal had died during the pendency of the appeal and was deleted from the appeal. The separate State appeal against the acquittal of Ramavtar and Subhash was disposed of by a separate judgment and was not decided by the operative order in this appeal.

Headnote :- Dying declaration — mental fitness / delayed testimony - Rajendra, gravely injured in a 1992 assault, gave Ex. P.16 to a Naib-Tahsildar at about 4:40 p.m. after a medical fitness endorsement at 4:30 p.m. The recording officer's inability to recall peripheral details in 2010 did not by itself undermine the promptly recorded declaration: Nathu Singh's absconding had delayed his separate trial, the officer said Rajendra was conscious, Dr Taneja's MLC recorded responsiveness, and the reported injuries around the eyes and legs matched the account. The post-mortem doctor's general opinion that unconsciousness was likely after the head injury did not establish that Rajendra had actually lacked the capacity to make the declaration. Applying Laxman and related authorities, the Court held that medical certification is a precaution and a reliable voluntary declaration can support conviction without corroboration being an absolute requirement. This declaration was also supported by medical and eyewitness evidence.

Hostile testimony — identification / sifting - Bhan Singh identified Nathu in his examination-in-chief, then denied his identity in cross-examination, which had been deferred for four months at the defence's request. Under Khujji the Court treated this as a retreat from earlier testimony, and checked Nathu's identity against the evidence of Pan Singh, who knew him, the dying declaration and the medical record. Other witnesses turned hostile; an error in testimony or rejection of a witness's evidence concerning the separately acquitted Babu Singh did not require all testimony to be discarded under falsus in uno. The same-day FIR, medical findings concerning the eyes and legs and the evidence accepted by the Court supported Nathu's presence and role. A separate ruling under Section 174 CrPC rejected the claim that missing assailant names in the inquest showed an ante-timed FIR: the inquest records the apparent cause of death, while the assailant's identity was assessed through the prompt FIR, declaration, accepted testimony and medical evidence.

Alibi — burden / independent prosecution proof - The defence claimed Nathu was attending his mother-in-law's thirteenth-day ceremony elsewhere. A certificate issued ten years after the alleged death and the failure to examine his wife or in-laws to establish the relationship, death and his attendance left the alibi unproved. The defence's burden to establish that he was elsewhere did not reverse the prosecution's burden of proving his presence and participation. The Court found that burden discharged by evidence independent of the failed alibi.

Related witnesses — enmity / corroboration - Bhan and Pan were Rajendra's brothers, while Pan's involvement in an earlier murder case provided a possible source of animosity. Relationship alone did not make them interested witnesses; motive could support false implication or retaliatory assault, and reliability had to be assessed on the evidence in the case. Their accepted accounts were corroborated by a prompt FIR, Ex. P.16 and injuries. Nathu's separate conviction under Section 302/34 IPC and life sentence were affirmed on the evidence recorded in his own trial, rather than evidence taken in the co-accused's proceedings.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Nathu Singh's appeal under Section 374 CrPC challenged the 29 June 2010 judgment of the Third Additional Sessions Judge, Bhind, in Sessions Trial No. 177/1993. The operative trial disposition acquitted him of Sections 394, 147 and 302/149 IPC but convicted him under Section 302 read with Section 34 and imposed life imprisonment, a fine of Rs 2,000 and, in default of payment, two years' rigorous imprisonment. He was initially charged with others, was granted bail, which was later cancelled under Section 439(2) CrPC, and failed to appear after his revision was dismissed. A perpetual warrant of arrest was issued against him in August 1994. The judgment records that, on 30 April 1994 in Criminal Revision No. 71/1994, operation of an order dated 27 April 1992 was stayed. Three co-accused were convicted in March 1999 and Babu Singh acquitted; their appeal and SLP failed. Nathu was re-arrested and produced on 10 May 2007 and separately tried. Applying A.T. Mydeen, the Court expressly confined its assessment to the evidence recorded in his separate trial, excluding the evidence from the earlier co-accused proceedings.

Bhan Singh reported at about 16:05 on 21 August 1992 that, while grazing buffaloes with Sagar, he heard his brother Rajendra's cries near Bhopatpura culvert. He described Jagat and others stopping Rajendra on his scooter, Surendra striking his head with a farsa, and Nathu and Vishram using lathis on his legs. Bhan reported that, before losing consciousness, Rajendra had said that Nathu sat on his chest and pierced his eyes with a pointed object. Rajendra also said that money and watch parts had been taken. The injured was examined at Mehgaon, a Naib-Tahsildar recorded Ex. P.16, and Rajendra died after transfer to Gwalior. The charge-sheet referred to Sections 302, 394 and 34 IPC. The defence disputed the reliability of the declaration and Bhan's changed identification, relied on an alibi for a funeral ceremony, cited Babu Singh's acquittal and alleged bias from a previous murder case. The State supported the conviction.

Dr R.K. Taneja (PW-7) recorded a serious occipital incised wound, incised injuries around both eyes, leg and wrist wounds and conjunctival injury, but noted that the patient was responding to questions. He considered the head wound potentially fatal but did not say that unconsciousness would invariably follow. Dr Vijay Kumar Diwani (PW-8) performed the post-mortem, attributed death to shock, multiple injuries and haemorrhage and described it as homicidal. He had not seen Rajendra alive and could not say whether he had actually remained conscious after the head injury; several other injuries could conceivably result from a rough fall. The Court found homicidal death established, and separately assessed the reliability of Rajendra's account and the evidence of Nathu's identity and role.

2. Precedents — Considered : A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department, Criminal Appeal No. 1306/2021, required the trial records to be kept separate for evidentiary purposes: evidence taken in a co-accused's trial could not be used as evidence against Nathu in his later separate trial. Jeewan v. State of Uttarakhand cautioned against demanding arithmetical precision when testimony is recorded after a long delay. The Court applied that principle to the Naib-Tahsildar's cross-examination eighteen years after the event. Laxman v. State of Maharashtra rejected an overly rigid demand that a doctor certify mental fitness in a prescribed form of words; it discussed Harjit Kaur, disapproved the broad formulation in Paparambaka Rosamma and affirmed Koli Chunilal Savji. Govindappa treated medical certification as a rule of caution, while Jagbir Singh insisted that the recorder still ensure physical and mental capacity even without a doctor's certificate. In the present case, the doctor endorsed fitness, the officer observed that Rajendra was conscious, and the contemporaneous MLC recorded that he was responding to questions.

Ravi Kumar v. State of T.N. explained Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act and the need to scrutinise the possibility of tutoring, the opportunity to observe, fitness, truthfulness and voluntariness; corroboration is not an absolute prerequisite to reliance on a trustworthy declaration. Its further listed authorities —Paniben, Uka Ram, Laxman, P.V. Radhakrishna, State of Maharashtra v. Sanjay and Muthu Kutty— were cited within the discussion quoted from Ravi Kumar. Laltu Ghosh cautioned against demanding a meticulous account from a gravely injured declarant and unsupported fabrication accusations. Kalawati assembled the Paniben principles, including accepting a true voluntary declaration alone, caution on suspicious or infirm ones, and no automatic rejection for brevity or missing details; the nested illustrative cases were quoted as part of that test. Ramilaben Hasmukhbhai Khristi rejected an excessively technical approach where the substance of the statement inspires confidence. The Court applied these authorities to the prompt, medically consistent Ex. P.16.

Khujji v. State of M.P. was applied to Bhan's delayed cross-examination and denial of identity after identifying Nathu in his examination-in-chief, while the Court also sought independent confirmation from Pan Singh and the declaration. Brahm Swaroop v. State of U.P., referring to Section 174 CrPC and Radha Mohan Singh and other nested decisions, established that an inquest identifies apparent cause of death; it need not set out the assault, all accused or witnesses. The absence of assailant names in the inquest therefore did not undermine the direct evidence or by itself establish that the FIR was ante-timed. Rai Singh v. State of Haryana, Shakila Abdul Gafar Khan and Ranjit Singh rejected falsus in uno as a mandatory rule: the Court must separate trustworthy parts unless truth and falsehood are inextricably mixed. Babu Singh's acquittal in another trial did not establish Nathu's innocence without an assessment of the evidence against him.

Jitender Kumar v. State of Haryana, Sk. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, and Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), with Mukesh quoting Binay Kumar Singh, were applied to alibi: the accused must produce positive evidence excluding his presence once the prosecution has reliably established it, but failure of alibi does not itself prove guilt or lighten the prosecution's primary burden. Other authorities appeared as supporting citations within the quoted passages. Rupinder Singh Sandhu, Shamim, Rizan and Mohd Rojali Ali explained that close kinship alone does not make a witness interested; Rizan quoted Dalip Singh and several other authorities and Mohd Rojali Ali cited the test of an interest in the result or a motive arising from enmity and the need for consistency. State of U.P. v. Moti Ram described motive as a double-edged weapon where the opposing groups were mutually hostile. The Court applied that caution to brothers Bhan and Pan in conjunction with corroboration.

3. Statutes considered : Section 32(1) of the Evidence Act made Rajendra's statement about the cause and circumstances of his death relevant as a dying declaration; fitness, voluntariness, identification and truth governed its weight. Section 11 of the Evidence Act was identified through the Supreme Court quotation as the basis for the relevance of alibi evidence, rather than a provision reversing the burden of proof and relieving the prosecution of its obligation. Section 174 CrPC limited the inquest's object to the apparent cause and circumstances of unnatural death, not an exhaustive list of assailants. Section 374 CrPC provided the appeal, and Section 439(2) appeared in the history of bail cancellation. The operative conviction was under Sections 302/34 IPC, affirming murder liability through common intention; earlier charges and acquittals under Sections 148, 149, 394 and 147 were part of the distinct procedural history.

4. Issues : The Court had to determine whether Rajendra's death was homicidal; whether Ex. P.16 was a trustworthy declaration when the injured had sustained a severe head injury and the recording officer could not recall many formal details eighteen years later; and whether Nathu was reliably identified and participated in the assault despite Bhan's later reversal on identity, other hostile witnesses and possible family animosity. It also had to decide whether Babu Singh's acquittal or absence of names in an inquest undermined the proof, whether the asserted funeral alibi created reasonable doubt, and whether evidence from the earlier co-accused trial could be used against the separately tried appellant. The conviction and life sentence under Section 302/34 also required appellate review. These questions were decided on Nathu's own trial record; the co-accused's verdicts were not reopened.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical evidence showed a fatal head injury, multiple incised and blunt-force injuries, haemorrhage and homicidal death. Dr Diwani's opinion that consciousness after such a head injury was unlikely was qualified by the fact that he had not attended Rajendra while alive and could not determine his actual condition after the injury. Dr Taneja had examined Rajendra contemporaneously and noted responses to questions. The recording officer testified to consciousness; Ex. P.16 carried a doctor's fitness certification at 4:30 p.m. and was recorded about 4:40 p.m. Cross-examination occurred some eighteen years after the 1992 incident, a delay materially attributable to Nathu's absconding. The officer's inability to recall the doctor's name, requisition and some formal surroundings, and the absence of separate endorsements of fitness throughout the recording and of the statement having been read over, did not, on the evidence as a whole, make the declaration untrustworthy. The reported puncturing around the eyes and lathi assault on the legs matched the MLC. The Court treated the declaration as prompt, voluntary and reliable. The finding of reliability rested on the fitness evidence, prompt recording and medical corroboration in the present case.

Bhan promptly lodged the FIR and stated in his examination-in-chief that Nathu was known to him and assaulted Rajendra. His cross-examination took place four months later, after being deferred at the request of counsel for the appellant. Bhan then denied that the accused was the Nathu whom he had identified. Applying Khujji, the Court inferred that something had occurred in the interval to influence his testimony, but did not rest the case solely on that inference: Pan knew Nathu from a prior murder proceeding, placed him at the scene and gave an account of eye injury, while Rajendra's declaration and contemporaneous eye and leg findings supplied further support. Pan's omissions or inconsistent recollection after eighteen years were assessed in context. Sagar, Mehtab and Lakhan did not support the prosecution; Raja Bhaiya's assertion that Rajendra was already dead at the spot was inconsistent with Dr Taneja's treatment and the Naib-Tahsildar's recording. The Court accepted only portions it found reliable. The inquest's failure to list assailants did not contradict the FIR because Section 174 does not demand it. Babu Singh's earlier acquittal did not require application of the falsus in uno rule or rejection of the evidence against Nathu in his own trial.

The proposed alibi required proof that Chirojabai, whose death was said to have occurred on 9 August, was Nathu's mother-in-law and that he attended her thirteenth-day ceremony in Khirauli on 21 August. The death certificate was issued ten years after the stated death; no wife or in-law was examined to establish relationship or attendance, and the defence failed to exclude the possibility of his presence at the scene of the assault. The Court nevertheless applied the rule that prosecution bears the independent obligation to prove Nathu's presence and participation beyond reasonable doubt. It found that obligation satisfied by the declaration, accepted eyewitness portions and corresponding injuries, rather than by inferring guilt merely from the failure of the alibi.

Bhan and Pan's relationship to Rajendra called for careful scrutiny but was not a legal ground to reject them. Pan's admission that Nathu had testified against him in an earlier murder case disclosed a possible source of enmity and also confirmed acquaintance for identification. Enmity could provide a motive either for false implication or for retaliation, so the Court checked the promptly lodged FIR, declaration and injuries. It found their evidence trustworthy on the material points and described a possible retaliation arising out of Dhan Singh's death. That possible motive was not treated as a substitute for reliable proof. On the whole record of this separate trial, Nathu's acts with others in furtherance of common intention were proved and the conviction under Section 302/34 was sustained.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the trial judgment of 29 June 2010 convicting Nathu Singh under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC and imposing life imprisonment, a fine of Rs 2,000 and two years' rigorous imprisonment in default of payment. It noted that life imprisonment was the minimum sentence for the affirmed murder conviction and found no reason to interfere. The appellant was in jail and was directed to serve the remainder of his sentence; a free copy of the appellate judgment was to be given to him and the trial record returned with a copy for compliance. Neither Babu Singh's acquittal nor the earlier co-accused proceedings were altered by this appeal.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — matrimonial complaint / divorce counterblast allegation - The wife alleged repeated demands for a Fortuner and twenty tolas of gold, beatings, threats and expulsion from the matrimonial home. The accused in-laws said her 30 November 2021 FIR followed service of the husband's divorce petition and was retaliatory, particularly as she had made no complaint for several years. Applying Pratibha, the Court held that a wife may remain silent while trying to preserve her marriage; the filing of a divorce petition and later criminal complaint do not automatically establish mala fides or justify quashing. Civil and criminal proceedings have different standards of proof. Findings in one are not ordinarily binding in the other, subject to the relevance and effect of judgments under Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act. The uncontroverted allegations disclosed a cognizable case of cruelty; their truth was a matter for trial.

Dowry cruelty — specific allegations / defence material - The allegations specified dowry demands, violence, threats of death or exclusion from the matrimonial home, and forcible return to her parents when the demands were not met. The Court regarded compelling her to live with her parents because the dowry demands were not met as potential mental cruelty. The allegation that she had attacked her husband with a knife was contradicted by his own written statement that he had injured himself; counsel conceded that no criminal case had been registered against her. The acknowledgement relied on to establish removal of stridhan did not establish the quantity of ornaments, since they had not been weighed. The wife was the owner of her stridhan. Those disputed defence claims could not be conclusively adjudicated in the quashing proceedings; both connected applications were dismissed, without a finding of guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : By a common order dated 7 May 2024 the Jabalpur Bench decided M.Cr.C. No. 12469/2024 filed by the complainant's elder brothers-in-law and M.Cr.C. No. 48243/2023 filed by Seema Saraf, described as the wife of one applicant. The applicants sought to quash an FIR lodged by the complainant on 30 November 2021. She said she married Satyendra Saraf on 11 May 2017. She alleged that, after about four months, her husband and the applicants began scolding and beating her over inadequate dowry. They demanded a Fortuner and twenty tolas of gold and threatened that she would be allowed to stay only if these demands were met and would otherwise be killed. On 30 October 2021 they allegedly beat and expelled her. Her parents could not meet the demand and brought her back to her parental home. These are the FIR allegations, not findings after a criminal trial.

The applicants advanced three principal contentions. They asserted that the wife had stabbed her husband Satyendra in the abdomen and that a criminal case had been registered against her. They contended that her complaint was a counterblast to his divorce petition under Section 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act, filed on 16 November 2021, of which she received notice on 23 November. They also argued that the absence of a police complaint for four and a half years contradicted the allegation of continuing cruelty. They further said she had taken all her stridhan before departure, relying on an acknowledgement by Kuldeep Nigam, vice-president of Nagar Palika Parishad, Shahdol. The Court considered a complete charge-sheet filed after its order of 20 April 2024 and examined the applicants' documents for these specific objections; the factual truth of the allegations remained outside the determination required in the Section 482 proceedings.

The husband's written complaint to the Superintendent of Police, filed by the applicants themselves, said he caused his own abdominal knife injury. The Court found counsel's contrary assertion misleading, particularly because the relevant lines had been underlined and the underlining was then partly covered with whitener. When confronted with this, counsel admitted that no criminal case had been registered against the complainant. As to the property, Nigam admitted in his deposition that the ornaments had not been weighed; the Court observed that if the wife took her own stridhan, no complaint could be made against her on that account. The precise quantity of articles and the truth of the cruelty allegations remained for trial.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was directly applied. It rejected a quashing order that drew an adverse inference from delayed matrimonial reporting and relied on extraneous investigative or civil circumstances beyond the FIR; the wife in that case had tried to reconcile before a divorce petition, and a civil proceeding could not by itself end an otherwise cognizable criminal one. It referred to the Bhajan Lal illustrations as the framework for the quashing inquiry. The High Court applied that reasoning to the possibility that the present complainant maintained silence to preserve her marriage and acted after the divorce petition showed reconciliation had failed. That possibility explained why the timing alone was not conclusive.

Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, (2010) 8 SCC 775, was quoted for the different standards of proof in civil and criminal proceedings and the absence of any general rule making factual findings in one binding in the other. Its discussion cited Iqbal Singh Marwah, Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam, Vishnu Dutt Sharma and K.G. Premshanker, and recognised that judgments may be relevant in the circumstances defined by Sections 41–43 of the Evidence Act. Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2009) 5 SCC 528, was then quoted at length. It explained the framework under Sections 40–43 discussed in K.G. Premshanker: a final judgment can be relevant as the Evidence Act provides, sometimes for a limited fact or motive, but is not generally conclusive outside Section 41; it rejected the general proposition in Karam Chand that civil decisions bind criminal courts and examined the Constitution Bench reasoning in M.S. Sheriff and Iqbal Singh Marwah. The discussion of Sections 340, 341 and 343 CrPC and delay in perjury proceedings formed part of the quoted passage from Iqbal Singh Marwah; it was not a procedural issue decided in the present quashing proceedings.

Prem Raj v. Poonamma Menon, SLP (Crl.) No. 9778/2018, decided 2 April 2024, was also quoted in discussing the Karam Chand line of authority in light of K.G. Premshanker, Vishnu Dutt Sharma, Satish Chander Ahuja, Iqbal Singh Marwah and M.S. Sheriff. The principle applied in this order was that the proceedings must be decided independently under their distinct standards; the existence of a related civil matter does not automatically require a stay or bar criminal proceedings. M.S. Sheriff noted that criminal proceedings are often given priority, while rejecting an invariable rule. The Court did not order a stay of either proceeding.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked as the source of the Court's inherent jurisdiction to quash the FIR and consequential proceedings. The test at this stage is whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence; disputed defence accounts concerning the injury, articles, timing and credibility could not be finally determined in this jurisdiction. The order describes allegations of dowry demand and matrimonial cruelty. Section 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act concerned the husband's separate divorce petition, whose filing and service were relied on as part of the chronology but did not create a legal bar to the criminal proceedings. Sections 40–43 of the Evidence Act, discussed through the Supreme Court cases, govern the relevance and possible conclusiveness of previous judgments in specified statutory circumstances. In the present case, the divorce petition was pending; there was no conclusive civil finding determining the FIR allegations.

4. Issues : The Court addressed whether the applicants' version that the wife stabbed the husband had any foundation in the material they themselves filed; whether the chronology of divorce filing, service and FIR, with absence of an earlier police report, compelled a finding that the complaint was a false counterblast; whether the related civil proceedings or any civil findings automatically barred the criminal proceedings; whether a receipt describing removal of stridhan defeated the complaint; and whether the actual FIR allegations of specific dowry demands, violence and expulsion disclosed an offence on their face. These issues arose in connected petitions by different relatives, but were disposed of together. The Court could not determine ultimate guilt or the factual truth of the allegations in the quashing proceedings.

5. Ratio / Findings : First, the alleged criminal case concerning the stabbing had been materially misrepresented. The document filed by the applicants themselves attributed the knife injury to Satyendra himself, and counsel conceded that no criminal case against the wife had been registered. The Court treated the underlining and attempted erasure as an effort to mislead it. That finding concerned the contents of the document and counsel's oral submission; it did not establish all the allegations in the wife's FIR. The Court then rejected an automatic adverse inference from the sequence in which the proceedings were instituted. Marriage-related silence may be a genuine attempt to preserve or repair a relationship, and an eventual divorce petition may explain a decision to report earlier alleged cruelty. The law permits civil and criminal proceedings founded on overlapping facts to continue independently. Their standards of proof differ, and any previous judgment's evidentiary use must be assessed under Sections 40–43 rather than presumed to bind the criminal court. The pending divorce petition did not conclusively answer the FIR allegations. These principles defeated the asserted counterblast rationale for immediate quashing, while leaving credibility and the significance of the timing to be assessed on the evidence at trial.

Second, the contention based on removal of stridhan was not established by the material relied on. The vice-president admitted in his deposition that the recorded ornaments had not been weighed, so the acknowledgement did not conclusively establish the quantity of property; more fundamentally, the wife's taking property belonging to her did not by itself make the cruelty allegation false. Finally the FIR identified the relatives, the approximate onset of the alleged cruelty after the 2017 marriage, the vehicle and gold demanded, repeated scolding, assault and threats, and the date of expulsion. The Court held that compelling her to live with her parents because those demands were not met could itself constitute mental cruelty. At the Section 482 stage, these uncontroverted allegations disclosed a prima facie offence, and their factual truth could not be resolved by weighing competing assertions in the petition and charge-sheet. The conclusion rested on the specific conduct attributed to these applicants. It did not determine their guilt or finally resolve the evidentiary effect of the disputed defence documents.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the application and the connected application. The Court refused to quash the FIR. The prosecution and the separate matrimonial proceedings remained to be decided in the ordinary course.

Headnote :- FIR registration — Section 482 CrPC / alternative magistrate remedy - Neetu Goyal sought directions for registration and investigation of a police case arising from alleged dowry harassment and eviction from the matrimonial home. The Court considered whether an application under Section 482 seeking a direction to the police to register an FIR was tenable. Divine Retreat Centre identified the remedy of a complaint before the Magistrate having jurisdiction under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC after police inaction, with the Magistrate able to conduct the statutory inquiry and, where appropriate, direct investigation. The Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria identified remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 as alternatives to seeking a writ of mandamus, subject to recognised exceptions. Because the applicant had an efficacious criminal complaint remedy, the Court dismissed her application with express liberty to pursue it. It did not adjudicate the truth of the family allegations. The exceptional constitutional remedies discussed in the quoted authorities were distinct from the Section 482 request before it.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Neetu Goyal brought M.Cr.C. No. 24023/2022 under Section 482 CrPC. She asked the High Court to allow the application and direct the police to register a case and investigate her allegations concerning dowry demands and removal from the matrimonial home by her husband and his family. She also sought consequential directions concerning her husband's litigation, an opportunity for her to be heard and receive assistance, and consideration by senior police authorities of the failure to register an FIR. The merits of these ancillary requests concerning the family dispute were not separately addressed. The Court treated the controlling question as whether to direct FIR registration.

The State objected to maintainability and cited Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala and the Madhya Pradesh Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P. The Court did not resolve disputed factual questions about the family or assess the evidence of dowry harassment. The question it expressly considered was whether the inherent power under Section 482 could be invoked to obtain registration of an FIR when a statutory complaint remedy was available.

2. Precedents — Considered : Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, were relied on by the State in support of the availability of ordinary statutory remedies when police do not register a case.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted substantively. It recognised that the High Court could issue directions under Article 226 if convinced that the investigation was mala fide, but only in the rarest cases where a clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII warranted interference. Even then, the Court could insist on observance of the statutory process but could not direct how the investigation should be conducted. For a complainant faced with police inaction, it identified a complaint under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC and the inquiry before the competent Magistrate under Chapter XV, including an available direction for investigation and a decision whether the complaint prima facie discloses an offence warranting process or should be dismissed. That passage quoted Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre and referred to the All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union. The Court dismissed the application on the ground that an efficacious criminal complaint remedy was available.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., Writ Appeal No. 247/2016, a Division Bench authority, was quoted for the proposition that a writ of mandamus to enforce the duty under Section 154 may be refused where the informant has not availed of the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, unless one of the four Whirlpool exceptions referred to by the Division Bench applies; it also clarified that Lalita Kumari on the duty to register does not itself establish an entitlement to bypass alternative remedies and obtain a writ. That precedent concerns writ mandamus, whereas Neetu's application invoked Section 482; the present order relied on its reasoning concerning statutory remedies and dismissed the inherent-power application.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked as the source of the Court's inherent jurisdiction, but the Court found an efficacious alternative remedy for the specific FIR-registration request. Sections 190 and 200 CrPC provide for a complaint before the Magistrate having jurisdiction, examination and inquiry under Chapter XV, and a decision on whether investigation or issue of process is warranted. Section 203 CrPC appeared in the quoted Divine Retreat Centre passage as a possible dismissal after inquiry if no offence is disclosed. The quoted ruling in Shweta Bhadauria also identified recourse to superior police officers under Section 154(3) and investigation directed by the Magistrate under Section 156(3), and Article 226 for a mandamus subject to the ordinary alternative-remedy rule and recognised exceptions. The application concerned the availability of Section 482 relief for FIR registration in view of the alternative criminal complaint remedy.

4. Issues : The dispositive issue was whether this application under Section 482 seeking a direction for registration of an FIR was tenable despite the available criminal complaint remedy. The State's authorities also raised the relationship between police duty, Magistrate control and exceptional writ intervention. The order did not decide whether the husband's family had in fact demanded dowry, whether an offence would be established after inquiry, or the ancillary requests concerning the family dispute in the prayer.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court identified an efficacious remedy before the criminal court of competent jurisdiction. A person on whose information the police have taken no action can lodge a complaint before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200; that court can examine the material and take the action provided by law, including investigation where warranted. The cited Division Bench also identified Sections 154(3) and 156(3) among the available alternative remedies, while distinguishing Lalita Kumari's registration duty from an automatic right to a High Court writ of mandamus without availing of alternative remedies. The exceptional Article 226 power discussed in Divine Retreat Centre, requiring mala fide investigation, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII, formed part of the quoted law. The order made no finding that such extraordinary circumstances existed in Neetu's case. The conclusion was that an inherent-power petition asking the High Court to compel an FIR was not the appropriate route when an effective complaint remedy before the Magistrate was available. The applicant was expressly granted liberty to file a criminal complaint before the competent court.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC, with express liberty to Neetu Goyal to file a criminal complaint before the competent court. No FIR was ordered, and no determination was made about the alleged dowry harassment, husband's litigation, or guilt of any proposed accused.

Neetu Goyal v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 24023/2022, 12/05/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — fabricated loss narrative / cheque-theft FIR quashed - Two connected applicants challenged the charge-sheet in Crime No. 151/2016 and S.T. No. 24/2021 for Sections 420, 467, 468, 471, 379 and 120-B IPC. One had already filed a Section 138 NI Act complaint on a ₹25 lakh signed cheque in 2014; the drawer later alleged that the cheque had previously been lost, that Mangal had filled in its particulars and that Chauhan had misused it. On the Court's direction the original police inward register was produced; the State confirmed it contained no 20 May 2014 loss complaint. The seized cheque leaves from the old and new series, the undisputed signature and the chronology undermined the asserted four-year retention of an old signed blank leaf. The Court held the supposed police complaint fabricated and the FIR a false defence to dishonour proceedings, quashing both FIR and sessions trial.

Sterling defence material / Rajiv Thapar - The usual restraint against considering an accused's defence under Section 482 did not preclude reliance on the particular verified material in this case. Rajiv Thapar requires sound, indubitable material that decisively refutes the accusation; material not refuted by the prosecution or complainant and/or incapable of justifiable rebuttal; and continuation of trial amounting to an abuse of process rather than serving the ends of justice. The original station register, the seized records of cheque numbers and undisputed signature supported the Court's conclusion; allegations of a bank stop-payment request did not explain the alleged loss of cheques from the old series or the missing police entry.

Signed blank cheque / Bir Singh - A holder may fill the particulars of a voluntarily given signed blank cheque; that fact alone does not invalidate the instrument or relieve the signatory of the rebuttable statutory presumption that it was issued for a debt or liability. The Court used this principle against the allegation that filling in the particulars of the cheque by itself established the alleged forgery. It did not determine the merits of the pending Section 138 prosecution, which remained a separate proceeding.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : This common order decided M.Cr.C. No. 12431/2021 filed by Rajendra Kumar Mangal and M.Cr.C. No. 12403/2021 filed by Upendra Singh Chauhan. Both invoked Section 482 CrPC against the charge-sheet following FIR Crime No. 151/2016, Police Station Dabra, District Gwalior, for Sections 420, 467, 468, 471, 379 and 120-B IPC, and against S.T. No. 24/2021 before the Second Additional Sessions Judge, Dabra. Chauhan had lodged a complaint under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act on 26 August 2014 after statutory notice. He said the private respondent/drawer signed and issued cheque No. 099440 dated 2 July 2014 for ₹25 lakh on account of hiring a JCB, two dumpers, a hot mixer, a roller, a trolla, a paver and a tanker; on deposit it was returned with a stop-payment endorsement.

The drawer said he had misplaced signed blank cheque leaves numbered 099433, 099434 and 099440 while travelling between Dabra and Tekanpur on 20 May 2014 and had reported the loss to the police station and bank. He alleged that Mangal later filled in the particulars of the disputed cheque and Chauhan misused it. A prior W.P. No. 350/2016 had directed the police to look into his complaint in light of Lalita Kumari; an FIR followed on 10 March 2016. In M.Cr.C. No. 67/2017 the Court directed expeditious completion of the investigation and filing of a final report. Further applications in 2018 and 2019 concerned the inclusion of parties, the investigation and protection from arrest while specimen signatures were obtained. These earlier procedural orders did not adjudicate the truth of the loss allegation. The applicants called the later theft/forgery prosecution a counterblast to the pre-existing NI Act case, relying on the drawer's admitted signature and failure to appear in that proceeding; the drawer defended the charge-sheet and relied on a purported acknowledgment of his May 2014 loss report.

The police had seized cheque leaves 099426, 099427, 099429 and 099430, which had been used in 2010–11, and leaves 694242 and 694247 from a newer series. The disputed No. 099440 belonged to the older series although dated in 2014. The Court directed production of the original Police Station Dabra inward/outward records for May 2014 because the offered copy of the supposed loss complaint had no official seal and only an unidentified small signature. State counsel examined the original inward register and specifically reported that no complaint was received on 20 May 2014. The drawer urged that the bank had acknowledged a corresponding request or stop-payment instruction. The Court treated that as insufficient to account for the absent station entry, the retention of a signed blank leaf from the old series for four years despite the issue of a new cheque book, and the stop-payment endorsement on a cheque said to be out of circulation. The Court found that the purported police complaint was forged and that the FIR was lodged to create a false defence in the pending cheque case.

2. Precedents — Considered : Lalita Kumari v Government of Uttar Pradesh, (2014) 2 SCC 1, was referred to because the earlier writ order had directed police consideration of a complaint in its light. The earlier case-specific orders in W.P. No. 350/2016, M.Cr.C. No. 67/2017, M.Cr.C. No. 37721/2018 and M.Cr.C. No. 5481/2019 recorded the procedural steps concerning investigation, a final report, inclusion of parties and specimen signatures.

Rajiv Thapar v Madan Lal Kapoor, (2013) 3 SCC 330, was applied in answering the private respondent's objection that the accused's defence cannot be considered under Section 482. The Court quoted its four-step test: first, material advanced by the accused must be sound, reasonable, indubitable, sterling and impeccable; second, it must decisively rule out the accusation's factual basis; third, the material must not have been refuted by the prosecution or complainant and/or must be incapable of justifiable rebuttal; fourth, continuation must be an abuse of process and must not serve the ends of justice. A court satisfied on every step may quash to avoid a trial that would serve no useful purpose. Here the High Court relied on a register it had called for and the State had checked, the chronology established by the seized cheques and the undisputed signature, rather than merely an untested assertion made in the accused's own interest. The Court found that the purported loss report was forged and quashed the FIR and subsequent proceedings.

Bir Singh v Mukesh Kumar, Criminal Appeals Nos. 230–231/2019, judgment dated 6 February 2019, was quoted on a signed blank cheque: Sections 20, 87 and 139 of the NI Act provide that a person who signs and makes over a cheque remains liable unless evidence rebuts the presumption of debt or liability, and the payee's filling in the amount or particulars alone does not invalidate it or avoid Section 138 if the cheque is otherwise valid. The Court used this to answer the claim that Mangal's filling of entries necessarily supported a criminal forgery case. The quoted decision preserves the drawer's opportunity to rebut the presumption by evidence.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to prevent abuse of process and secure the ends of justice after investigation and filing of the charge-sheet. The applications sought quashing of both the FIR and the ensuing sessions proceedings. The alleged IPC offences were cheating (Section 420), forgery of a valuable security (Section 467), forgery for the purpose of cheating (Section 468), use of forged document (Section 471), theft (Section 379) and conspiracy (Section 120-B). The Court rejected the asserted loss narrative and found that the FIR had been lodged to create a false defence in the cheque case. The pending complaint concerning the dishonoured cheque was under Section 138 of the NI Act; Sections 20, 87 and 139 of the NI Act were discussed in the passage from Bir Singh concerning completion of signed instruments, alteration and the statutory presumption. The Court neither tried the NI complaint nor directed payment.

4. Issues : Could the Court quash a prosecution for theft, forgery and cheating after completion of the investigation where the signed-cheque drawer's claimed prior loss was contradicted by original station records and cheque chronology, notwithstanding the normal caution against entertaining an accused's factual defence? Was the alleged completion of a signed blank cheque inherently improper, and what did the parallel Section 138 complaint prove or leave open? The earlier orders concerned investigation or protected participation in it; they did not finally adjudicate the accusation. The question was whether verified material meeting the conditions in Rajiv Thapar made continuation of this particular criminal case an abuse of process. The merits of the ₹25 lakh cheque complaint and the drawer's guilt in that proceeding were not decided.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court inferred from the seized older-series leaves dated 2010–11 and newer-series leaves in use by 2012 that cheque 099440 came from an older book; it regarded the carrying of a signed but unused leaf from the old series in 2014 as implausible. More decisively, the copy of the supposedly contemporaneous police loss report had no official seal, and the original May 2014 inward register produced on the Court's direction bore no entry for it. State counsel confirmed the absence. The Court described the loss complaint as a fabricated or forged document and found that the drawer had issued the cheque, then sought to construct a false defence in the existing dishonour case. The alleged bank notice was considered, but the Court found it did not account for the missing police entry or explain the chronology of the cheque series. The Court also found the stop-payment endorsement unexplained when the leaf was said to be out of circulation. It inferred an intention to cheat the intended recipient.

The Court expressly confronted the argument that a quashing court must not consider material relied on by the accused. Rajiv Thapar permits the narrow exception where the material is objectively impeccable and decisively refutes the accusation; it has not been refuted by the prosecution or complainant and/or cannot justifiably be refuted; and continuation of trial would be an abuse of process rather than serve the ends of justice. The original official register, seized cheque records, admitted signature and the 2014 Section 138 chronology were considered together and found to meet that standard in this case.

Under Bir Singh, the drawer's signature and voluntary delivery of a blank cheque permit the holder to fill in its particulars without thereby invalidating it; the statutory presumption against the signatory remains rebuttable by evidence. In the context of the Court's rejection of the theft narrative, the allegation that Mangal filled entries did not justify continuation of the proceedings based on the charge-sheet. The quoted Bir Singh passages state that completion of a voluntarily delivered signed blank cheque does not itself invalidate the instrument and that the statutory presumption remains rebuttable.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed both M.Cr.C. applications and quashed Crime No. 151/2016 at Police Station Dabra and further proceedings in S.T. No. 24/2021 before the Second Additional Sessions Judge, Dabra. It made no order as to costs.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — face-value offence / defence not a mini-trial - A husband and mother-in-law sought to quash the charge-sheet already filed and the pending criminal case under Sections 498-A, 294, 323, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. They attributed the marriage to prior police pressure after a live-in relationship and the wife's complaint to retaliation against the husband's earlier approach to police. The Court did not treat that contested narrative as established. Following the Supreme Court's limits on inherent jurisdiction, it held that the uncontroverted accusations disclosed a cognizable offence; reliability, credibility and the competing defence account were matters for trial, rather than detailed evaluation of evidence under Section 482. Taramani Parakh's caution about omnibus accusations against relatives formed part of the quoted standard.

Mala fides — secondary where offence disclosed / continuing abuse exception - The applicants asserted a false, retaliatory case. The Court applied Renu Kumari and the Bhajan Lal framework: the absence of offence ingredients, a legal bar, inherent improbability or demonstrable abuse of process may warrant exceptional intervention, but mere allegations about an informant's motive cannot by themselves justify quashing a triable case. Once the allegations here were found to disclose a cognizable offence, the asserted malice was secondary; its factual basis was not decided. The application was dismissed without a guilt finding, and the applicants remained free to prove their defence at trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajendra Kumar Shah and other applicants moved under Section 482 CrPC to quash FIR Crime No. 16/2021 at Mahila Thana, Singrauli, and Criminal Case No. 1635/2021 before the JMFC, Waidhen. The reported charges were Sections 498-A, 294, 323, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. Applicant 1 was the husband and applicant 2 his mother; the Court recorded that those relationships were undisputed. Investigation had concluded and the police had filed a charge-sheet by the time of the quashing application.

The applicants asserted that the couple had previously lived together and that the wife pressed for marriage. They claimed that a police complaint and compromise led to a marriage on 30 June 2021 against the husband's wishes, after which she demanded that he move away from his widowed mother. They said the husband made a complaint to a women's help desk against the wife and her relatives, she threatened false implication, and the dowry/cruelty FIR was registered immediately after the police called her in relation to his complaint. Counsel characterised the allegations as false and malicious. These were the applicants' submissions, and their disputed factual claims remained to be proved at trial. The procedural question was whether the competing defence account could justify quashing a prima facie case disclosing a cognizable offence under the Court's inherent jurisdiction.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court considered and applied a series of Supreme Court decisions on restraint in exercising Section 482 powers. XYZ v State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, criticised pre-investigation quashing through a roving assessment of disputed consent and an allegedly coerced settlement in a blackmail complaint; it was cited here for the prohibition on prematurely deciding disputed assertions. State of Tamil Nadu v S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, was quoted for the error of merits assessment before investigation was complete; in the present case, a charge-sheet had already been filed. Ajay Kumar Das v State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, reproduced Bhajan Lal's caution that the inherent power to quash must be exercised sparingly and does not permit an inquiry into reliability or an arbitrary exercise of discretion. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, stated the general restraint against evaluating defence documents and the qualified exception for a public document or one whose veracity is not disputed by the complainant. State of A.P. v Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, distinguished a challenge based on the failure of allegations, taken at face value, to disclose an offence or on a legal bar from an attempt to secure an acquittal through premature evaluation of evidence. It warned against both using judicial process for a vendetta and using Section 482 to terminate a legitimate prosecution prematurely. M. Srikanth v State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, explained that the uncontroverted FIR allegations and supporting material may be examined to determine whether they disclose an offence; it was not used to find an ingredient absent here.

CBI v Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, rejected detailed findings by a High Court on disputed facts after cognizance, holding that the defence must be tested at trial. State of M.P. v Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021, stated that the FIR need not be an encyclopedia and a Section 482 court cannot scrutinise allegations in the manner of a trial court. Munshiram, Teeja Devi, Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, S. Khushboo, Sangeeta Agrawal, Amit Kapoor, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy and M.N. Ojha, collected in paragraph 15, were cited for similar principles of restraint. Taramani Parakh v State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was quoted more extensively: a triable case of matrimonial cruelty is not quashed merely because the reliability of the allegations is disputed, although courts should watch for omnibus allegations against relatives. Its quotation of Amit Kapoor set out the test based on allegations taken at face value, absence of offence ingredients, inherent absurdity and legal bars. It also addressed the limits of the prosecution record to be considered, the competing interests of personal liberty and prosecution, and the prohibition on detailed examination aimed at predicting conviction. Numerous authorities in that nested Amit Kapoor citation list, and Taramani's discussion distinguishing Neelu Chopra, Manoj Mahavir Prasad Khaitan and Geeta Mehrotra, appear within the passage quoted from Taramani Parakh. The Court held that the uncontroverted allegations disclosed a cognizable offence and that the applicants' defences required proof at trial.

Renu Kumari v Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was quoted for the three purposes for which inherent power may be exercised, the categories in R.P. Kapur concerning a legal bar, absence of an offence and absence of legal evidence, Bhajan Lal's illustrative seven categories and the distinction between a manifest absence of legal evidence and a dispute about the weight of evidence that must be decided at trial. It also explained why mere allegations of mala fides against an informant, if an offence is disclosed, do not by themselves justify quashing a case. R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal were thus considered through Renu Kumari's extended quotation and the Court's express reliance on it. The Court used that analysis to reject the proposed false-implication ground.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to prevent abuse of process or secure the ends of justice, but did not authorise a determination of disputed defence facts or a premature assessment of credibility. The investigation was complete and a charge-sheet filed; the relief sought was quashing of the FIR and pending case, rather than an order of acquittal. Sections 498-A, 294, 323, 506 and 34 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the reported accusations. The High Court held that the uncontroverted allegations disclosed a cognizable offence and declined to assess their credibility at the quashing stage. The quoted references to Sections 156(1), 155(2), 173(2) and 228 CrPC formed part of the general discussion in Bhajan Lal and Amit Kapoor of possible grounds for quashing or caution at the stage of framing charges; they were not independently adjudicated procedural defects here.

4. Issues : The principal issue was whether the prosecution allegations and record, taken at face value, failed to disclose a cognizable offence; whether the allegations were inherently absurd or a legal bar applied; or whether the proceedings amounted to a demonstrated abuse of process justifying quashing of the FIR and charge-sheet proceedings under Section 482. More concretely, the applicants asked the High Court to decide the credibility of the woman's dowry and cruelty allegations against their claim of a coerced marriage, separate-residence dispute, earlier police complaint and threatened false implication. The Court also had to decide whether alleged retaliatory motive alone could justify quashing once the allegations were capable of constituting an offence. The test was whether the allegations taken at face value disclosed a cognizable offence, rather than whether guilt had been proved beyond reasonable doubt.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court treated the applicants' narrative as a defence. It could examine the allegations and uncontroverted supporting material to determine whether they disclosed an offence, but could not decide whether the wife in fact pressured the husband to marry, demanded separate residence, harassed the husband, threatened him or fabricated the FIR. XYZ, Arvind Khanna, Kunwar Singh, Ajay Kumar Das and Taramani supported the rule against conducting a mini-trial under Section 482: a quashing court does not weigh rival factual probabilities, conduct a roving enquiry into reliability or require the FIR to contain an exhaustive account of every detail. Gourishetty Mahesh, M. Srikanth and Amit Kapoor allowed intervention where the allegations taken at face value do not constitute an offence, an express legal bar applies, or an abuse of process is demonstrated. The Court concluded that the uncontroverted allegations did make out a cognizable offence.

The applicants relied on the chronology of the husband's police complaint and the wife's FIR to allege a mala fide motive. Renu Kumari's application of Bhajan Lal preserves exceptional quashing where a prosecution is manifestly malicious or the allegations taken at face value disclose no offence, but warns that unproved hostility or personal grievance does not by itself justify quashing a triable accusation. Here, after finding a cognizable offence on the uncontroverted record, the Court treated the informant's motive as secondary. The Court did not decide whether the complainant was in fact malicious or determine the factual merits of the applicants' defence. The credibility of the complaint, the counter-version and any evidence for or against an accused were left to the competent trial court.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the application and refused to quash Crime No. 16/2021 and Criminal Case No. 1635/2021. The charge-sheet prosecution was left to proceed before the JMFC, Waidhen, subject to ordinary trial defences and proof.

Rajendra Kumar Shah and others v. State of Madhya Pradesh and others, M.Cr.C. no. 20135/2022, 22/02/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (504) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — police inaction / alternative magistrate remedy - The applicant sought a police progress report and explanation for not acting on a complaint he asserted disclosed a cognizable offence and had led to a preliminary enquiry finding. The Court framed the question as whether a petition invoking its inherent jurisdiction for registration of an FIR was tenable, rather than adjudicating the truth of the underlying allegations. Applying Divine Retreat Centre and the Madhya Pradesh Division Bench's Shweta Bhadauria formulation, it found an efficacious criminal-complaint remedy before the competent Magistrate and dismissed the Section 482 application with liberty to file such a complaint. No FIR or progress report was ordered and no finding on commission of an offence was made.

Police non-registration — statutory complaint route / limited writ exception - Divine Retreat Centre, through Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, described a complainant's Sections 190/200 route and the Magistrate's options to inquire, seek investigation, issue process or dismiss. Shweta Bhadauria identified Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 as alternative avenues that can justify refusal of mandamus, subject to recognised Whirlpool exceptions; it distinguished Lalita Kumari's duty to register from an unrestricted right to bypass remedies. The Supreme Court's statement on the High Court's exceptional power under Article 226 to intervene in a mala fide investigation was quoted; that power was not exercised in this Section 482 matter.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajendra Sharma filed M.Cr.C. No. 21172/2021 under Section 482 CrPC. His prayer asked that the respondents be directed to submit a progress report on his complaint, explain their inaction even after what he described as a preliminary enquiry finding that a crime was established, and take appropriate action. Counsel said the complaint pointed to a cognizable offence but the police had not acted. These were the applicant's assertions and requests; the Court did not adjudicate their merits. The State resisted maintainability, saying the complainant could file a criminal complaint under Section 200 CrPC and invoking Supreme Court and Madhya Pradesh Division Bench authority.

The Court expressly framed the question whether a Section 482 petition for registration of an FIR was tenable. Its disposition turned on the availability of an efficacious criminal complaint remedy. The prayer also sought a report and police explanation; the Court treated the application as an attempt to obtain intervention in the police's failure to register an FIR or otherwise act on the complaint.

2. Precedents — Considered : The State cited Sakiri Vasu v State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Aleque Padamsee v Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, for the proposition that statutory remedies should ordinarily be pursued where a complaint allegedly disclosing cognizable crime has not led to an FIR. The State also cited Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, which the Court quoted. Divine Retreat Centre distinguishes ordinary police inaction from the rarest cases warranting intervention under Article 226: the High Court must be convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide, and a clear abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII CrPC must be established. Even in such a case, the High Court may insist on observance of the process prescribed by the Code but cannot dictate the manner of investigation. Where the police fail to act on information, its quoted passage points to Sections 190 and 200 rather than routine writ intervention. In the present case, the Court did not determine that such exceptional mala fides existed or exercise jurisdiction under Article 226.

Divine Retreat Centre reproduced Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v State of Maharashtra: a complainant may lay a complaint before the jurisdictional Magistrate under Section 190 read with Section 200; the Magistrate must inquire into the complaint under Chapter XV and, on finding a prima facie case after recording evidence, may direct police investigation and a report instead of issuing process. The Magistrate may dismiss the complaint under Section 203 if it discloses no offence, or take cognizance and issue process if the complaint or recorded evidence prima facie discloses an offence. The nested passage also mentioned All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union. These authorities describe the available statutory remedy. The Court left Sharma at liberty to file a complaint without deciding how the Magistrate should dispose of it.

The Court separately quoted the Division Bench ruling in Shweta Bhadauria v State of M.P., cited in the order as Smt. Reeta Bais v State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016. It stated that mandamus to enforce the police's Section 154 duty can be denied where Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 alternative remedies have not been used, unless the recognised exceptions in Whirlpool Corporation v Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1, apply to the informant or victim. It also said Lalita Kumari v Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, concerns the statutory registration duty, rather than entitlement to mandamus without pursuing alternative remedies. The Court dismissed the application because an efficacious criminal-complaint remedy was available.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the source of the inherent power invoked. The applicant sought High Court directions concerning police action, but the Court found the application inappropriate because a complaint could be filed before the competent court. Section 154 CrPC appears in the Division Bench's statement of the FIR-registration duty, with Section 154(3) as an escalation alternative; Section 156(3) is the Magistrate-directed investigation route. Sections 190 and 200 provide the complaint and cognizance mechanism highlighted by Divine Retreat Centre, while its quotation describes Section 203 dismissal and Chapter XV inquiry. Article 226 of the Constitution is mentioned in the Supreme Court excerpt as an exceptional supervisory power where the High Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide and clear abuse of power and Chapter XII noncompliance are established; it was not the jurisdiction invoked or relief granted here.

4. Issues : The narrow issue was whether Sharma could obtain a Section 482 direction for a police progress report, explanation and action to secure registration of an FIR on his assertion that the complaint disclosed a cognizable offence but the police had failed to act, or whether he should instead use the statutory complaint process. The cited authorities also raised the distinction between the police's substantive Section 154 duty, the available statutory remedies before superior police officers and the Magistrate, and exceptional constitutional oversight where abuse is independently shown.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court upheld the objection based on the available alternative remedy in these proceedings. Divine Retreat Centre's quoted passage describes the judicial remedy where the police fail to act: the complainant may file a complaint before the jurisdictional Magistrate, who must inquire into it and may order investigation, take cognizance and issue process, or dismiss the complaint, as the statutory conditions permit. The Division Bench's Shweta Bhadauria formulation reinforces that availability of Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 may justify refusal of a direct request for mandamus, subject to recognised exceptions. Lalita Kumari's statutory rule about registration does not by itself dispense with the alternative remedies or establish entitlement to a High Court writ. Thus the Court declined the requested directions for a progress report and registration of an FIR under Section 482 because an efficacious remedy by complaint before the competent Magistrate remained available.

The quoted Supreme Court passage preserves intervention under Article 226 in the rarest cases where the High Court is convinced that investigative power has been exercised mala fide and clear abuse of power and Chapter XII noncompliance are established. Even then, the Court may insist on observance of the prescribed process but cannot direct how the investigation is to be conducted.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the application expressly reserving liberty to file a criminal complaint before the competent court. It issued no direction to register an FIR, submit a progress report, explain the alleged inaction or conduct an investigation in a particular way. It did not determine the truth of Sharma's accusations or the outcome of a future Magistrate complaint.

Headnote :- SC/ST Act — Sections 18/18-A anticipatory-bail bar / prima facie allegation - In an appeal under Section 14-A(2), the appellants faced Crime No. 75/2021 for offences under the IPC concerning obstruction of and assault on a public servant and related acts, as well as under the SC/ST Act arising from a dispute over MGNREGA work and payment. They contended that there was no allegation of insult by reference to caste. The State and complainant could not clarify whether the appellants were contractors or labourers entitled to payment; the FIR did not reproduce the actual words uttered. The Court held the anticipatory-bail bar may not apply on the material before it at this stage and granted conditional protection, without finally adjudicating the allegations or the financial dispute. The charged Section 3(1) sub-clauses are printed as "(द)" and "(ध)" in the judgment.

Pre-arrest conditions / pandemic and victim notice - Police stated they did not wish to arrest and had issued a Section 41(1)(a) appearance notice. The Court cited the Supreme Court's prison-decongestion order during COVID-19, required appearance before the investigating officer on or before 23 September 2021 and a ₹1 lakh personal bond with one surety in the same amount for each appellant, and imposed compliance with public-health directions and the other conditions under Section 438. It directed that the complainant be informed of the bail grant in light of Aparna Bhat; a breach would cause the order to cease to have effect in accordance with its terms. The Court also examined whether the prima facie allegations attracted the SC/ST Act bar.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : This was the first criminal appeal, CRA No. 5412/2021, under Section 14-A(2) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act seeking anticipatory bail. The appellants apprehended arrest in Crime No. 75/2021, Police Station Jamner, District Guna. The order lists Sections 353, 332, 186, 294 and 34 IPC and Section 3 provisions of the SC/ST Act, including Section 3(2)(va); the judgment prints the two Section 3(1) sub-clauses as "(द)" and "(ध)". The Court had the case diary; the State and complainant appeared.

The appellants contended that they demanded money legitimately payable for MGNREGA work and that the complainant wanted more work done. They said the FIR contained no caste-name humiliation or insult and that Sections 18/18-A's anticipatory-bail exclusion should not apply. They promised cooperation and stated that there was no risk of absconding or tampering with the prosecution case. The State and complainant opposed the application but could not clarify whether the appellants were contractors or workers themselves, or why payment was sought. The State said police did not wish to arrest them and had issued a notice under Section 41(1)(a) CrPC asking them to appear before the trial court.

2. Precedents — Considered : In Re: Contagion of COVID-19 Virus in Prisons, Suo Motu W.P.(C) No. 1/2020, order of 23 March 2020, was quoted at length. The Supreme Court, considering prison overcrowding and Article 21 during the pandemic, directed States and Union Territories to constitute High Powered Committees comprising the specified officials from legal services and the home and prison administrations to determine categories of prisoners eligible for parole or interim bail, with offences punishable by up to seven years among the possible categories and the seriousness of the offence, sentence or custody among the relevant factors. That order concerned prison decongestion and left the identification of categories to the High Powered Committees. It did not determine whether these appellants had committed an offence under the SC/ST Act. The High Court quoted the order and then considered the absence of the actual words from the FIR and the uncertainty about the appellants' MGNREGA work when assessing the Sections 18/18-A bar.

Aparna Bhat v State of M.P., Criminal Appeal No. 329/2021, decided 18 March 2021, was invoked specifically to require that notice of the grant of bail be sent to the complainant. The direction to inform the complainant forms part of the conditions attached to the grant of bail.

3. Statutes considered : Section 14-A(2) of the SC/ST Act provided the appeal route. Sections 18 and 18-A imposed the statutory bar on anticipatory bail, which the Court held might not apply on the prima facie allegations before it. The order lists Section 3(2)(va) and two Section 3(1) sub-clauses printed as "(द)" and "(ध)". Sections 353, 332, 186, 294 and 34 IPC remained among the reported police allegations, without a charge-by-charge merits ruling. Section 41(1)(a) CrPC was the State's reported notice to appear; Section 438 supplied the other conditions governing anticipatory bail. Article 21 appeared in the quoted COVID prison-decongestion order.

4. Issues : The immediate issue was whether the allegations, as presented at the anticipatory-bail stage, attracted the bar under Sections 18/18-A or permitted anticipatory bail, given the absence from the FIR of the actual words allegedly uttered and uncertainty about who performed the MGNREGA work and why payment was demanded. The conditions of bail concerned cooperation, appearance, surety, compliance with COVID-19 directions and notice to the complainant. The Court did not finally determine the alleged IPC or SC/ST Act offences or the merits of the claim for MGNREGA payment.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court considered the parties' submissions and relied on two matters: counsel for the State and the complainant could not clarify whether the appellants were contractors or workers under MGNREGA, and the FIR did not disclose the actual words they allegedly uttered. In light of the appellants' submission that there was no caste-name humiliation, the Court reached the cautious conclusion that the Sections 18/18-A bar 'may not apply.' This was a prima facie assessment at the bail stage. The Court did not finally determine whether the complainant had been insulted, whether a caste-based offence was established or whether the appellants' monetary demand was lawful. The Court granted anticipatory bail subject to conditions.

The reproduced prison-decongestion order referred to Article 21 and the High Powered Committee mechanism. The present appellants sought anticipatory bail; the High Court did not place them in a committee category or order the release of existing prisoners. It required appearance before the investigating officer on or before 23 September 2021, a ₹1 lakh personal bond with one surety in the same amount for each appellant, to the investigating officer's satisfaction. The appellants were required to furnish an undertaking to comply with all general or specific COVID-19 instructions issued from time to time by the Central Government, State Government or local administration, strictly follow those instructions, and supply a copy of the bail order to the police station having jurisdiction over their residence. It directed that a breach of those COVID-19 instructions would automatically cause the order to cease to have effect and that the local administration or police authorities must immediately take the appellants into custody. A breach of any other stated condition would also automatically cause the order to cease to have effect. The other conditions under Section 438 remained applicable. The Court directed that the complainant be informed of the bail grant under Aparna Bhat.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed the appeal for anticipatory bail.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — private property compromise / non-compoundable count - FIR Crime No. 246/2021 alleged offences under Sections 420 and 409 IPC after a housing-society president took payments totalling ₹37 lakh from a member's family but allegedly refused to grant them plots or refund their money. The parties reported a settlement involving return of money, affidavits, postdated cheques and surrender of society membership and plot claims. The Principal Registrar verified that the appearing family members and applicant compromised voluntarily. The mother did not attend; the Court accepted counsel's account that she was bedridden and relied on her affidavit and counsel's statement made on her authority. The verification report noted that Section 420 could be compounded with the Court's permission but Section 409 was not compoundable. Treating the matter as a private property dispute in which no government agency was alleged to have been defrauded, the Court applied Gian Singh and Narinder Singh and quashed the whole FIR under Section 482.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajendra Upadhyay applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime No. 246/2021, Police Station Sirol, District Gwalior, under Sections 420 and 409 IPC, on a compromise. The complainant said government land of 6.218 hectares at Alapur was leased to Annapurna Grih Nirman Sahkari Sanstha Maryadit, whose president was the applicant. To raise ₹1,87,35,859 for the lease, he allegedly induced the complainant and his family to become members, and allotted plots to them before execution of the society's lease. The complainant, brother and father each paid ₹9 lakh on 24 March 2009; the mother Shakuntala Sancheti paid ₹10 lakh in June 2009, altogether ₹37 lakh. The complainant alleged violation of Clause 8 of the allotment order, subsequent execution of a lease to the society on 14 August 2009, failure to execute plot leases in their favour despite granting leases to other members, and eventual refusal to grant them plots or refund the money with interest after family inquiries in March 2021. These are the FIR allegations, not facts finally established by this quashing order.

The applicant stated that the money had been returned, affidavits and postdated cheques had been given, and the four family members resigned from the society and relinquished their claims to plots or other property interests. By an order dated 21 April 2022, the Court had directed the parties to appear before the Principal Registrar for verification of the compromise. The Registrar recorded statements of the applicant, complainant, father and brother and reported their voluntary compromise without threat, inducement or coercion; the mother did not attend. The report noted the Section 320 CrPC distinction: Section 420 IPC may be compounded with court permission, while Section 409 IPC is not compoundable. Counsel stated that the mother was bedridden. She had provided an affidavit, resigned from the society and specifically authorised counsel to state on her behalf that she had no objection to the compromise and that her grievances had been redressed. The Court found no reason to disbelieve counsel's statement.

2. Precedents — Considered : Gian Singh v State of Punjab, (2012) 10 SCC 303, and Narinder Singh v State of Punjab, (2014) 6 SCC 466, were expressly invoked by the Court in paragraph 11 as authority for Section 482 quashing on compromise. The Court applied these authorities in exercising its inherent power to quash the FIR arising from this predominantly private dispute on the basis of the settlement and the nature of the allegations. This exercise of power under Section 482 was distinct from statutory compounding under Section 320. The Court relied on the dispute over society plots and payments between the applicant and the family, the verified voluntary compromise and the absent mother's separate affidavit and authority. It also noted that no government agency was alleged to have been defrauded. The Section 409 charge was non-compoundable under the Registrar's report but this did not prevent the Court from quashing this FIR under Section 482.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the source of inherent quashing power. Section 320 CrPC arose in the Registrar's verification report to distinguish compounding of Section 420 IPC with permission from the non-compoundability of Section 409. The High Court did not purport to compound Section 409 under Section 320; it quashed the FIR under Section 482 based on the private nature of the dispute and compromise. Sections 420 and 409 IPC were the offences in the FIR; their ingredients or evidentiary proof were not adjudicated.

4. Issues : The legal issue was whether, notwithstanding a non-compoundable Section 409 count alongside Section 420, the High Court could exercise inherent power to quash the entire FIR alleging cheating and criminal breach of trust on the basis of the reported settlement of the private property dispute. The factual questions were whether the settlement was voluntary, whether all affected family members' interests were addressed despite the mother's absence from personal verification, and whether any government agency was alleged to have been defrauded.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Registrar verified the voluntary compromise of the appearing complainant/family members and applicant. As to the absent mother, the Court considered counsel's statement of incapacity, her affidavit, resignation and authority for counsel to speak on her behalf, and found no reason to disbelieve it. Her consent was accepted on that basis, rather than through her personal appearance for verification. The settlement described repayment, postdated cheques and the relinquishment by all four family members of their society membership and plot claims. The Court characterised the allegations as a property dispute between the applicant and the family. It noted that no government agency was alleged to have been defrauded, although the dispute arose against the background of the government lease and the payments. In these circumstances, it held that the FIR could be quashed on the basis of the compromise.

The Registrar's observation that Section 409 cannot be compounded under Section 320 did not prevent the Court from considering quashing under Section 482. The Court, expressly relying on Gian Singh and Narinder Singh, concluded that this verified private settlement permitted it to quash the FIR as a whole. This was an exercise of the inherent power to prevent abuse of process or secure the ends of justice, rather than a declaration that a non-compoundable offence was compoundable.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has allowed the application and quashed FIR Crime No. 246/2021 at Police Station Sirol for Sections 420 and 409 IPC. The FIR was thus quashed on the basis of the compromise accepted by the Court in this private property dispute.

Headnote :- JJ Act Section 94 — disputed school record / medical age inquiry - In a murder case, the Sessions Judge held the accused wife to be 17 years 11 months on the incident date on the basis of a date-of-birth entry in a school register and transferred the case to the Juvenile Justice Board. The father who supplied that date at admission testified that he had deliberately understated her age by one year and maintained that account on cross-examination. A 2013 voter list recorded her age as 18, which was inconsistent with the other age evidence, and no corporation/municipal/panchayat birth certificate was produced. The Sessions Judge gave no cogent reason for rejecting the father's testimony yet relied on the school entry. Applying the documentary hierarchy in Section 94(2) and the principle in Ashwani Kumar Saxena that medical testing is a fallback when the specified documents are unavailable, the High Court found the school entry unreliable, set aside the finding of juvenility and ordered an ossification test or another medical test using the latest methods of age determination. It remanded to the Sessions Judge for a fresh determination of age within one month, staying the JJB proceedings in the meantime. The order did not declare the woman an adult or decide the IPC accusations.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Criminal Revision No. 693/2020 under Sections 397/401 CrPC challenged the First Additional Sessions Judge, Sabalgarh order of 9 December 2019 in S.T. No. 315/2017. The Sessions Court had held respondent 2, the deceased man's wife accused in Crime No. 307/2017, to be 17 years 11 months at the time of the incident. It held that it lacked jurisdiction and transferred the murder-related prosecution to the Juvenile Justice Board. The FIR involved Sections 302, 201, 120-B, 506 and 34 IPC following discovery of an unidentified body and a merg inquiry. The revision concerned her age and the proper forum for trial; it did not determine guilt on the underlying accusations. The charge-sheet had shown respondent 2 as a major. She sought juvenility, citing a school-register birth date of 20 July 1999.

Two witnesses, Mahesh Meena and Immamuddin Khan, proved the school-register entry. Her father Bheralal Rawat, who had supplied the date when enrolling her, testified in examination-in-chief and maintained under extensive cross-examination that he had falsely understated her age by one year and that the recorded date of birth was incorrect. The prosecution also filed a 2013 Sabalgarh voter list naming respondent 2, recording age 18; counsel pointed out it named her husband, suggesting a post-marriage entry. The Sessions Judge observed inconsistencies between that list, the register and the father's account but gave no cogent reason to reject the father's testimony and instead accepted the register and sent the case to the Board. The revision petitioner sought an ossification examination rather than reliance on a school entry whose accuracy had been repudiated by the person who supplied the date of birth. Respondent 2 defended the school-record finding.

2. Precedents — Considered : Ashwani Kumar Saxena v State of Madhya Pradesh, (2012) 9 SCC 750, was quoted for the age-inquiry sequence under the earlier Section 7-A and Rule 12 of the 2007 Rules: seek matriculation or equivalent certificate if available, then the birth certificate from the school first attended, other than a play school, then corporation/municipal/panchayat certificate; obtain medical opinion from a duly constituted board only if those documents are unavailable. Where exact assessment is impossible, the Court may, if it considers this necessary and records reasons, give the child or juvenile the benefit of an age on the lower side within a one-year margin. That quoted qualification does not establish an automatic benefit of one year in every contested case. The High Court read this documentary-priority principle alongside Section 94 of the 2015 Act and applied it where the person who supplied the school entry had repudiated its accuracy and no birth certificate from a corporation, municipal authority or panchayat had been produced.

The cited precedent's reference to the older statutory framework was used for the hierarchy and medical-test fallback; the present case was decided under the 2015 Act's Section 94. The Court applied these principles to the particular doubts about the school entry and its source and the absence of a birth certificate from a corporation, municipal authority or panchayat, and remanded the matter.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 397 and 401 CrPC supplied criminal revision jurisdiction. Section 94(1) of the JJ Act, 2015 requires the Board or Committee, where the person brought before it under the Act for a purpose other than giving evidence is obviously a child, to record the age as nearly as possible and proceed with the inquiry under Section 14 or 36 without awaiting further confirmation of age. Subsection (2) requires an age inquiry where there are reasonable grounds for doubting whether the person is a child, first seeking a date-of-birth certificate from the school or a matriculation or equivalent certificate, then in its absence a corporation/municipal/panchayat birth certificate, and only in the absence of those documents an ossification or other latest medical age test on the order of the Board or Committee. Such a test must be completed within fifteen days from the date of that order. Subsection (3) provides that the age recorded by the Board or Committee is deemed to be the person's true age for the purposes of the Act. The Court's application recognised that the school entry could not be treated as determinative in this case when the person who supplied the date had repudiated its accuracy and that evidence had not been cogently rejected; with no civic birth certificate, medical assessment was required before jurisdiction was transferred. Sections 302, 201, 120-B, 506 and 34 IPC identify the underlying prosecution, not an offence-ingredient finding in this revision.

4. Issues : The key issue was whether the Sessions Judge could accept the school date as determinative of juvenility while failing to give a cogent reason for rejecting the father who had supplied it and later admitted falsifying it, particularly in the face of a discordant voter list and absent statutory civic birth certificate. If not, the Court had to identify the next lawful step in obtaining age evidence and decide how the pending proceedings should be treated until a fresh age decision. The revision did not finally determine the correct date of birth on the basis of the father's testimony or the voter list, or whether the accused participated in the murder. The age conclusion would determine whether the Sessions trial or the Board could proceed.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Sessions Judge had treated the school certificate as controlling but had not specifically disbelieved the father who enrolled respondent 2 and repeatedly said he misstated her age by one year. That testimony made the authenticity and correctness of the date of birth recorded in the register doubtful. The 2013 voter list, recording her as 18 with her husband's name, reinforced the inconsistency rather than conclusively establishing the exact age at the time of the 2017 incident. No birth certificate from a corporation, municipal authority or panchayat was produced as the next category of statutory evidence. Applying Section 94(2) and the documentary-priority principle in Ashwani Kumar Saxena, the Court held that an ossification test or another medical test using the latest methods of age determination was required in these circumstances. The High Court therefore found material illegality in the finding that respondent 2 was a minor and the consequent transfer.

The Court set aside the age order but did not itself determine adult status. It remanded for the Sessions Judge to fix a date for production before a Medical Board, receive the test result and adjudicate age within one month. The JJB's ongoing proceedings were held in abeyance until the Sessions Judge authoritatively determined age. The quoted Ashwani Kumar Saxena passage also mentions the possibility of a reasoned determination on the lower side within a one-year margin where exact age cannot be assessed; this Court did not calculate or award such a margin on the present record and instead ordered a fresh inquiry.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has disposed of the revision by setting aside the First Additional Sessions Judge's 9 December 2019 order in S.T. No. 315/2017, remanding for medical age determination and a fresh age adjudication. The entire exercise was directed to be completed within one month of the date of this order. Proceedings before the Juvenile Justice Board, Morena, were to remain in abeyance pending that result. The applicant was to produce certified copies before the Sessions Judge and Board. Rajendra v. State of Madhya Pradesh and others, Cr.R. no. 693/2020, 16/03/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 273 CrPC — accused absent with dispensation / counsel present - The robbery complainant testified while the three appellants were personally absent, but the trial order recorded their Section 317 exemption requests, representation through counsel for cross-examination and an express statement that identity would not be disputed. Section 273 permits evidence in the pleader's presence when attendance is dispensed with. Following Mohan Meakins and distinguishing Atma Ram, where the defence had objected and there was neither consent nor dispensation, the High Court found no violation on this specific record. Although the exemption application bore no date, the Court read its terms together with the trial order.

Identification / discovery - The police TIP provided corroboration rather than substantive evidence. The Court relied on identification in court, the earlier parade and the defence's recorded concession that identity would not be disputed. Recovery of the motorcycle from Rahul in a separate case was proved. The number-plate fragment was recovered at Rajesh's instance from a field with a standing crop of mustard. The Court held that it was not readily discoverable merely because the field was open. The Court found it difficult to identify the unmarked cash as the money taken from the complainant and the seized shoes had not been identified in court. The Court nevertheless held the identification and recovery evidence, considered together, sufficient to affirm all three convictions, with Laxman's identity established although no distinctive article was seized from him.

Section 397 IPC minimum - The appellants asked that their sentences be reduced to the period already undergone, citing post-bail compliance. The Court found that the robbery had been committed at gunpoint. As Section 397 prescribes a minimum sentence of seven years, it affirmed that term and refused a reduction.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : This common judgment decided Criminal Appeals Nos. 678/2011 (Rajesh), 882/2011 (Laxman alias Bhura) and 701/2018

(Rahul alias Chhaviram) under Section 374 CrPC. On 20 January 2009 the complainant Veerendra Singh Parihar was allegedly waylaid near Mauch Ghati at gunpoint by three persons, dragged into a forest area, bound with his belt and shoelaces, and deprived of motorcycle MP 07 KA 8675, a mobile, ₹12,200 and shoes. After freeing himself he reported at Police Station Panihar. Rahul was later found with a motorcycle in a different police case; the investigation recorded Section 27 disclosures and seized a broken plate fragment, shoes and some cash. The trial court framed charges under Sections 392 and 397 IPC read with Section 13 of the Madhya Pradesh Dakaiti aur Vyapharan Prabhavit Kshetra Adhiniyam, 1981. Eight prosecution witnesses testified. The judgment's opening account records that Rajesh and Laxman were convicted in 2011 and sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹500, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default. Rahul absconded during trial, was arrested in 2017, was examined under Section 313 and was separately convicted and sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹5,000, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default.

The appellants challenged identification and the absence of recovery of any incriminating article. The State relied on the police test identification parade, the complainant's trial testimony, the exemption under Section 317 on 21 December 2010 and the concession that identity would not be disputed, recovery of motorcycle from Rahul, the plate fragment at Rajesh's instance and other seized items. The central procedural issue was whether the complainant's evidence was lawfully taken without the appellants' physical presence. Some Section 317 applications in the trial record were undated, but the order of 21 December 2010 recorded the dispensation and the concession on identity. Laxman's subsequent temporary nonappearance and Rahul's later abscondence and separate trial were procedural history distinct from the consent to take the complainant's evidence on 21 December 2010.

2. Precedents — Considered : U.P. Pollution Control Board v Mohan Meakins Ltd, (2000) 3 SCC 745, was quoted for the trial court's power, after an accused's first appearance, to dispense with continued personal attendance subject to conditions such as attendance by counsel, an undertaking not to dispute identity and personal appearance when imperatively needed. The Court applied that principle of conditional dispensation to the appellants' Section 317 requests, counsel's cross-examination and identity concession.

Atma Ram v State of Rajasthan, (2019) 20 SCC 481, was explained as recognising an accused's valuable Section 273 right to observe a prosecution witness and confining exceptions to express Code provisions such as Sections 299 and 317. There the defence objected when evidence was recorded in the accused's absence, and neither consent nor a court order dispensing with attendance existed; the Supreme Court regarded infringement as curable by re-examination rather than automatically invalidating the trial. The present Court distinguished those facts because the trial order in this case recorded the requested dispensation, counsel's participation and non-dispute of identity. The Court therefore found no infringement to cure in this case.

The High Court assessed identification under Section 9 of the Evidence Act and Section 54-A CrPC, the recoveries under Section 27 of the Evidence Act, and the minimum sentence under Section 397 IPC. The Court expressly held that a police TIP is not substantive evidence and that identification in court is substantive evidence. It relied on the statutory minimum in Section 397 when refusing to reduce the sentence.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC supplied appeal jurisdiction. Section 273 required trial evidence in the accused's presence or, where personal attendance is dispensed with, in the pleader's presence; Section 317 was the recorded exemption mechanism. Sections 299 and 317 were mentioned through Atma Ram as express exceptions, not a finding that the appellants were absconding during the complainant's 2010 evidence. Section 313 governed later accused statements, including Rahul after arrest. Section 54-A CrPC and Section 9 Evidence Act supported identification relevance; a police TIP remained corroborative of identification in court. Section 27 Evidence Act governed the disclosures leading to recovery, whose evidentiary value depended on the particular articles and the place of recovery. Sections 392/397 IPC and Section 13 MPDVPK Act were the provisions under which the appellants were convicted; Section 397's seven-year minimum controlled the sentence-reduction request.

4. Issues : First, did Section 273 prohibit using the complainant's testimony because the appellants were absent, or did their Section 317 applications, counsel's participation and recorded concession permit evidence to be taken in counsel's presence under the statutory alternative? Second, was their identity established by the corroborative TIP and substantive identification in court, rather than a police parade treated as substantive proof by itself? Third, did the recoveries reliably connect any of the three to the robbery, distinguishing common unmarked cash and unidentified shoes from the motorcycle and concealed number-plate fragment? Fourth, after conviction for gunpoint robbery under Section 397, could the court reduce seven years to the period already undergone?

5. Ratio / Findings : The trial order of 21 December 2010 showed that the complainant was present and all appellants sought exemption under Section 317; counsel undertook to cross-examine and said identity would not be disputed. Although the application the High Court found was undated and the judge had not dated a signature beneath it, its terms were consistent with the trial order. The Court held this was lawful dispensation and pleader participation under Section 273. Mohan Meakins supported conditional exemption; Atma Ram concerned the recording of evidence despite a defence objection, without consent or dispensation of personal attendance, and was therefore distinguishable. The Court found no violation of Section 273 on the recorded exemption requests and counsel’s undertaking. The complainant had identified appellants in police TIP Ex. P/14, which was not substantive by itself; the Court treated identification in court as reliable substantive evidence because it had been preceded by a TIP and identity had not been challenged in view of the express concession. Laxman was identified even though only generic cash, not a distinctive robbery item, was recovered from him.

The Court assessed the evidentiary value of each recovery separately. Laxman's initial disclosure led to a search of his house in which neither a mobile phone nor cash was found. Five ordinary ₹100 notes or other unmarked currency were not reliably identifiable as the money taken from the complainant. Shoes seized from Rahul were not identified by the complainant in court. The separate seizure of the motorcycle from Rahul by Police Station Pichhore on 28 January 2009 was proved through the seizure witness and memo Ex. P/11. A broken registration plate connected to the same vehicle was found following Rajesh's disclosure in another person's mustard field. The defence called this an open place; the Court rejected that objection because standing crop concealed the fragment, requiring knowledge of the exact location. It viewed the motorcycle and separated plate together as evidence that the plate had been broken and thrown after the theft. The Court relied on those corroborative links together with identification to find Rahul's and Rajesh's involvement proved beyond reasonable doubt. Laxman's identity was established despite the absence of a distinctive article recovered from him. The Court affirmed all three convictions under Sections 392/397 read with Section 13 MPDVPK.

On sentence, counsel asked for sentences limited to the period already undergone because Rajesh and Laxman had complied with bail and Rahul remained imprisoned. The Court rejected reduction because gunpoint robbery engaged Section 397 IPC's minimum seven years. In its operative sentencing paragraph, the Court stated that seven years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of ₹500, with four months' rigorous imprisonment in default, were affirmed. It ordered the appellants on bail to surrender, while Rahul remained in custody.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has dismissed all three appeals. Convictions under Sections 392/397 IPC read with Section 13 MPDVPK Act and seven-year terms were affirmed. Rajesh and Laxman's bail bonds were cancelled and they were directed to surrender immediately before the trial court to serve the remaining sentence; Rahul was already in jail and was to serve his balance. A free copy of the judgment was directed to be given to the appellants. No re-examination of the complainant was ordered because the Court found lawful dispensation on this record.

Headnote :- Criminal medical negligence — professional standard / grossness - The patient alleged that improper treatment during an operation to remove a stone, including a right-leg injection, culminated in amputation. Crime No. 818/2019 under Section 338 IPC and a charge-sheet followed. The Court examined Jacob Mathew and the later Supreme Court medical-negligence authorities: reasonable professional practice accepted at the time of treatment is the benchmark, a mere error or unsuccessful outcome does not by itself establish criminal negligence, and criminal liability requires negligence of a gross or very high degree, distinct from civil liability. The discussion of death under Section 304-A formed part of the cited precedents; that was not the offence charged in this case. The Court did not resolve causation or actual breach by making its own findings on the medical evidence.

Independent expert screening / relief limit - The doctor relied on the absence of a competent expert-committee report. Jacob Mathew requires an independent opinion from a suitably qualified medical practitioner before an investigating officer proceeds against a doctor, and discourages routine arrest; Martin F. D'Souza's quoted safeguard addresses specialist referral before a court issues notice. No such expert assessment had been obtained in this case. The High Court set aside the charge-sheet and further proceedings in RCT No. 86/2020, allowing the complainant to approach an expert committee and pursue available legal remedies if it found negligence. Although the application requested FIR quashing, the operative order does not expressly quash it; the order also does not finally acquit the doctor or bar future proceedings.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Dr Rajesh Batra sought Section 482 CrPC relief against Crime No. 818/2019, Police Station Kotwali, Katni, under Section 338 IPC, and the ensuing RCT No. 86/2020 before the Chief Judicial Magistrate. The State said investigation was complete and charge-sheet filed. The complainant's registered-post notices were treated as deemed served under Section 27 General Clauses Act and Rule 11(1), Chapter XV of the High Court Rules when no service report returned. This procedural service point did not determine negligence. According to the patient's FIR, he attended Dharmlok Hospital for stomach pain on 21 April 2019, was told of a stone and operation cost of ₹27,000 plus other charges, and underwent an operation on 23 April. He alleged an improper method of treatment and an injection in the leg, loss of sensation in his right leg on return home, further hospitalisation at Dharmlok, referral to Nagpur and back, and eventual treatment at Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose Government Medical College, Jabalpur where the leg was amputated. He attributed that grave injury to the doctor's improper treatment and said he spent about ₹1 lakh on subsequent care. This was the patient's account of the treatment and its consequences; the High Court did not independently determine medical causation.

The doctor's sole legal contention was that police had not obtained an expert committee report before registering or proceeding with the medical-negligence case. The State opposed, emphasising amputation. The Court framed whether police could investigate alleged medical negligence of a doctor and considered the principles governing professional negligence and procedural safeguards. Its decision turned on the absence of an independent expert assessment before proceeding with the prosecution, in which a charge-sheet had already been filed. The Court made no finding about the injection's causal role and did not compare clinical records to reach its own medical conclusions. The Court recorded that the patient had not approached the expert committee and held that the prosecution could not continue.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jacob Mathew v State of Punjab, (2005) 6 SCC 1, was the central authority extensively quoted and applied. It identifies duty, breach and resulting damage as the components of negligence, and distinguishes the standard applicable to medical professionals from the higher threshold required for criminal liability. A doctor is assessed by the standard of an ordinarily competent practitioner exercising ordinary skill in the field, with reference to the knowledge and accepted practice available at the time. The standard is not that of the most skilled specialist and is not applied with hindsight; a simple error, accident or reasonable alternative treatment choice does not prove professional negligence. The Bolam standard remains relevant. To support criminal prosecution, the negligence must be gross or of a very high degree. The doctor must have acted or failed to act in a way that no ordinarily prudent medical professional would have done in those circumstances; the likelihood of injury and mens rea are also emphasised. Civil res ipsa loquitur cannot per se establish criminal negligence. Jacob Mathew's quoted guidelines additionally require a credible competent medical opinion for a private complaint and an independent competent opinion, preferably from a qualified government doctor of the branch, before an investigating officer proceeds against a doctor. The guidelines also caution against routine arrest unless it is necessary to further the investigation or collect evidence, or the investigating officer is satisfied that the doctor would otherwise not make himself available to face prosecution. Its quotation describes Section 304-A IPC, but the present FIR was under Section 338 for causing grievous hurt by a rash or negligent act; the High Court invoked the general standard for criminal medical negligence and the safeguard of expert assessment, not a Section 304-A death charge. The Court's conclusion that the prosecution could not continue without the committee opinion directly rests on this authority.

Kusum Sharma v Batra Hospital and Medical Research Center, (2010) 3 SCC 480, was quoted for eleven guiding propositions including duty, culpable or gross negligence for criminal prosecution, ordinary reasonable skill, genuine differences of medical opinion, legitimate higher-risk treatment chosen in a patient's interest, and protection from harassment or compensation pressure while placing patient welfare first. The Court relied on these principles without deciding that Batra's injection conformed to accepted practice or that the patient had acted maliciously. Martin F. D'Souza v Mohd Ishfaq, (2009) 3 SCC 1, repeated the standard of an ordinarily skilled doctor under the Bolam test and the caution against equating unsuccessful treatment with negligence. The quoted passage also directed consumer fora and criminal courts to refer a complaint to a competent specialist or committee of specialists before issuing notice. Notice is to be issued only after that doctor or committee reports a prima facie case of medical negligence. The passage also cautioned police about arrest contrary to Jacob Mathew. The present order invoked these safeguards in requiring expert assessment. Bolam itself is a common-law test quoted within those Supreme Court opinions, not a separate Indian Supreme Court decision.

Malay Kumar Ganguly v Dr Sukumar Mukherjee, (2009) 9 SCC 221, was quoted for the different standards of proof and culpability in civil, tort and consumer proceedings and in criminal proceedings, discussing Section 304-A death elements, gross breach, direct or proximate causation, and the inadequacy of simple lack of care or error of judgment for criminal medical liability. The High Court did not determine death, direct cause of death or a Section 304-A count here. S.K. Jhunjhunwala v Dhanwanti Kaur, (2019) 2 SCC 282, was quoted for Jacob Mathew's accepted Bolam yardstick, reasonable competence rather than a guarantee of outcome, ordinary skilled practice accepted at the time and a genuine choice between reasonable courses. Eckersley and Hucks appear within the passage quoted from S.K. Jhunjhunwala. Kalyani Rajan v Indraprastha Apollo Hospital, 2023:INSC:921, was cited as laying down similar law. The authorities together stated the applicable legal threshold and the need for expert assessment before prosecution; the deciding Court's case-specific application was the admitted absence of expert assessment.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the invoked power to end a prosecution that proceeded without the professional-negligence safeguard. Section 338 IPC was the actual FIR offence concerning grievous hurt by a rash or negligent act; the Court did not parse its injury and causation elements on the basis of expert evidence or decide guilt. Section 304-A IPC appears only in quoted Supreme Court death-negligence discussions and was not the offence charged in this case. Section 27 General Clauses Act and Rule 11(1), Chapter XV High Court Rules governed deemed service of the private respondent; deemed service did not fulfil the separate requirement for a medical opinion. The cited Medical Council professional ethics material and Bolam rule described expected professional practice, not an independent statutory offence charged against Batra.

4. Issues : The decisive issue was whether a completed Section 338 criminal medical-negligence case could continue where an independent competent expert opinion or committee assessment of the doctor's conduct had not been obtained, notwithstanding a severe outcome alleged by the patient. The wider legal question was what distinguishes criminally gross negligence from negligence attracting civil liability or an unfortunate treatment outcome, and how the police or a criminal court should screen professional accusations. The Court did not decide whether the doctor's method fell below ordinary competent practice, whether the injection caused the amputation or whether a competent expert would find gross negligence. It reserved the complainant's liberty to pursue available legal remedies if the expert committee found negligence.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court considered the Supreme Court decisions distinguishing severe harm to a patient from a doctor's criminally gross departure from reasonable professional practice accepted at the time. The alleged amputation did not dispense with the requirement of expert assessment. Ordinary clinical skill, accepted choices among treatments and the higher criminal threshold require expert assessment. Jacob Mathew's specific safeguard expects a competent, independent medical view, preferably from a government practitioner qualified in the relevant branch, before the investigating officer proceeds against the doctor; its warning against routine arrest and the Martin F. D'Souza court-referral passage reduce the risk of harassment from an untested allegation. Kusum Sharma, Malay Kumar Ganguly and S.K. Jhunjhunwala reinforce these standards from their respective contexts, with Kalyani Rajan cited as similar. The Court did not use a clinical expert report to decide whether this doctor's injection was appropriate, nor hold that no medical negligence could ever be established; it found the required expert assessment absent from the prosecution record.

On that ground the Court stated the prosecution could not continue and set aside the charge-sheet and further proceedings in RCT No. 86/2020. It expressly left the complainant free to approach the expert committee; if that body concluded the doctor was negligent, he could take any legal remedy then available. The application sought quashing of both the FIR and the criminal case. Paragraph 20 of the order, however, sets aside only the charge-sheet and further RCT proceedings. The order did not grant express quashing of the FIR or a final acquittal, and did not impose a permanent bar on fresh lawful action.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed the Section 482 petition. The charge-sheet and further proceedings in RCT No. 86/2020 before the Chief Judicial Magistrate, Katni, were set aside. The complainant retained liberty to approach an expert committee and, if it found negligence, pursue whatever legal remedy was available. The operative paragraph did not expressly say Crime No. 818/2019 FIR itself was quashed, despite that relief being prayed.

Headnote :- Section 439(2) CrPC — perverse grant / forum and later misconduct distinguished - The deceased's father sought cancellation of the mother-in-law's Sessions bail in a dowry-death/cruelty case, challenging the original unexplained finding of parity and failure to consider the record rather than post-release misconduct. Puran v Rambilas distinguishes correction of an illegal or perverse bail grant from cancellation for supervening conduct; it permits an aggrieved person or State to approach the High Court where the challenged order was made by the Sessions Judge. The lower court neither examined the specific allegations of dowry demands and cruelty nor gave reasons. The High Court set aside its order and directed surrender within one week.

Parity — material differences in custody and conduct - The father-in-law had obtained Supreme Court bail after roughly 17 months in custody, while the mother-in-law had been in custody for less than two months. Her earlier conditional humanitarian anticipatory bail, obtained by presenting photographs of another woman's diabetic feet as her own, had been recalled with costs for fraud; she surrendered only over a year later. The lower court did not account for those differences, the death within three years of marriage, or the reported ₹2 lakh and four-wheeler demand. Parity did not justify the unreasoned grant. The order concerns the exercise of discretion in granting bail; it does not determine final culpability.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajesh Depuriya, father of deceased Archana, applied under Section 439(2) CrPC to cancel bail granted to respondent 2, Archana's mother-in-law, by the Twelfth Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior on 30 September 2020 in B.A. No. 2290/2020. Crime No. 42/2019, Police Station Maharajpura, involved Sections 498-A, 304-B and 34 IPC. The prosecution alleged Archana married respondent 2's son on 16 April 2016, was harassed for ₹2 lakh and a four-wheeler, and died in suspicious circumstances on 23 January 2019, within three years. Those allegations were relevant to the bail decision; this order did not determine guilt at trial.

Respondent 2 had earlier obtained a conditional humanitarian anticipatory-bail order on 30 May 2019 on the basis of photographs said to show her diabetic feet. That order required the investigating officer to have a District Medical Board verify that she personally had the depicted ailment before release. She then applied to recall the order, acknowledging that the feet pictured belonged to her mother-in-law, not her. The High Court recalled the order on 28 June 2019 as fraud on the court and imposed ₹25,000 costs. The complainant's own recall application was disposed of in light of that order. The cost, counsel said, had been paid on 16 August 2021. Respondent 2 surrendered on 7 August 2020, more than a year after recall. Her husband, the deceased's father-in-law, had been granted bail by the Supreme Court on 22 September 2020 in SLP(Crl.) No. 2957/2020 after about one year and five months in custody; respondent 2 had spent under two months in jail when the Sessions Judge granted bail on the ground of parity. She opposed cancellation and called the allegations against her vague and omnibus, and contended that the applicant should have approached the Sessions Court.

2. Precedents — Considered : Puran v Rambilas, (2001) 6 SCC 338, was expressly relied on and then quoted to distinguish an unjustified, illegal or perverse original bail order, made by ignoring material evidence and without giving reasons, from cancellation based on later misuse of liberty or new facts. An aggrieved person as well as the State may seek correction. Its quotation discusses Dolat Ram v State of Haryana, (1995) 1 SCC 349: cancellation of bail already granted ordinarily requires cogent and overwhelming grounds. Interference with justice, evasion of justice and abuse of the concession are illustrative grounds, rather than an exhaustive list. Puran explained that an initial perverse grant in a serious case is a distinct ground, which does not depend on proof of later misconduct. The High Court applied that distinction to the unreasoned order granting bail on parity; the application did not allege a fresh breach of bail.

Puran quoted Gurcharan Singh v State (Delhi Administration), (1978) 1 SCC 118: if new facts arise, the State may go to the Sessions Judge, but where the grievance is the Sessions Judge's own grant on material already before it, the State may approach the superior High Court under Section 439(2). The present Court applied that principle to reject the respondent's forum objection. Puran's facts involved an in-law dowry demand and death; the High Court referred to the need to assess the material allegations and give reasons, without making a final finding of guilt against respondent 2. Taramani Parakh v State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was invoked by the applicant and briefly referenced by the Court concerning taunts by in-laws. The Court's actual bail rationale was the specific allegations of dowry demands and cruelty, the period between marriage and death, the earlier fraud and delayed surrender, and the different periods in custody, all overlooked below.

The Supreme Court's order dated 22 September 2020 granting bail to respondent 2's husband was referred to because he had spent about seventeen months in custody. The High Court held that respondent 2's much shorter period in custody did not support the Sessions Judge's finding that the cases were identical.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439(2) CrPC empowered the High Court to review and cancel bail granted by a subordinate court. The two routes—correction of an initially perverse or unreasoned grant and later cancellation for misconduct—were distinguished in applying Puran. Sections 498-A and 304-B read with 34 IPC were the reported underlying cruelty and dowry-death allegations, not guilt findings. Section 438 CrPC governed the earlier conditional anticipatory-bail order and its verification of a medical claim, later recalled for fraud; it was not the order now under direct challenge. The Court's reference to a Supreme Court order concerning respondent 2's husband established the comparison on which parity had been claimed, not a statutory right to equal custody periods.

4. Issues : Was it necessary for the father to show later misuse or newly arisen facts, or could he invoke Section 439(2) in the High Court because the Sessions grant was unreasonable from the outset and had ignored material evidence? Was a return to the Sessions Judge required to ask it to correct its own merits decision? On the record, did the husband's bail after seventeen months of custody support parity for the mother-in-law after less than two months, when her earlier fraud, delayed surrender and specific allegations had not been weighed? The High Court did not finally determine proof of the demand, cruelty or the applicability of a dowry-death presumption. The earlier recall of anticipatory bail was not reopened.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected the forum objection: this was not a complaint of breach after release, but a challenge to the Sessions Judge's original assessment of the law and evidence. Puran and its Gurcharan Singh discussion allowed an aggrieved person to seek correction by the High Court under Section 439(2) without returning to the same Sessions Court where there were no new circumstances. Dolat Ram's caution against cancelling bail casually does not preclude setting aside a bail order made by ignoring material evidence and without giving reasons. The lower court's unexplained statement of parity and failure to consider the merits meant that the bail order could not stand.

The Court identified the overlooked material: Archana's death within three years of marriage and the specific allegations of a demand for ₹2 lakh and a four-wheeler and cruelty for non-fulfilment; the earlier anticipatory-bail order recalled as fraud when photographs of another woman's feet were presented as those of respondent 2; a delay of over a year before surrender; and the husband's substantially longer custody underlying his Supreme Court bail. Counsel for respondent 2 stated that the earlier costs had been paid on 16 August 2021. The mother-in-law's less than two months of detention was not comparable to the husband's one year and five months. The Court held that these circumstances required a reasoned assessment of respondent 2's individual case and did not justify bail on parity alone.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed the application for cancellation of bail and set aside the bail order dated 30 September 2020 of the Twelfth Additional Sessions Judge. Respondent 2 was directed to surrender immediately before the trial court within one week of the order, failing which the trial court was to issue a non-bailable warrant of arrest. The Registry was directed to communicate the order to the trial court immediately for information and compliance.

Headnote :- Section 125(3) CrPC — monthly imprisonment unit / six-month aggregate - A wife and daughter had obtained interim maintenance in 2009 and a final award in 2012, but the applicant admittedly paid only ₹1,500. The Family Court ordered custody for six months or until payment of ₹1,14,500, whichever earlier. The High Court held that the statutory one-month ceiling attaches to each month's allowance remaining unpaid after execution of the recovery warrant, rather than to all defaults taken together; an application to levy an amount must be made within the one-year period prescribed by the proviso. The multiple monthly defaults justified the total term of six months on this record. An offer of ₹20,000 did not require release in light of prolonged wilful non-compliance.

Continuing arrears / custody not discharge - Applying Poongodi and its quotation of Kuldip Kaur, the Court held that jail is a mode of enforcing payment, rather than satisfaction of the maintenance obligation; actual payment alone discharges the obligation. Shantha described a continuing liability and Shahada Khatoon recognised the remedy of successive applications for later defaults. The one-year warrant-application proviso was not treated as automatically extinguishing all older arrears.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajesh Dubey brought Criminal Revision No. 1257/2018 under Sections 397/401 CrPC against Family Court, Vidisha orders of 19 and 21 February 2018 in MJC No. 2/2015. His wife Rachna Tiwari and daughter had sought Section 125 maintenance. Interim maintenance of ₹1,500 per month was ordered on 17 December 2009. The final order, made in 2012, provided monthly maintenance of ₹1,500 to the wife and ₹1,000 to the daughter. Counsel conceded that the applicant had paid only ₹1,500 since 2009 and had not paid the balance. The judgment states arrears of ₹1,14,500. The dependants sought Section 125(3) recovery. After notice was issued and the applicant failed to appear, a warrant was issued, the applicant was arrested and produced on 19 February 2018, and the Family Court ordered imprisonment for six months or until payment of ₹1,14,500, whichever earlier. His request for release on an offer to pay ₹20,000 was rejected on 21 February.

The revision argued that Section 125(3) permitted imprisonment for at most one month, not six, and that amounts more than one year old could not be claimed. At the hearing he offered ₹20,000 and sought time to pay the balance and release in the meantime. The High Court considered the monthly basis of imprisonment under the provision, the time limit for making an application for a recovery warrant and the persistent non-payment.

2. Precedents — Considered : Poongodi v Thagavel, (2013) 10 SCC 618, was quoted and applied to explain that the obligation to pay maintenance under Section 125 continues until payment is made. Its passage reproduced Kuldip Kaur v Surinder Singh, (1989) 1 SCC 405, distinguishing imprisonment as a mode of enforcement from actual satisfaction of arrears. Jail is meant to induce compliance by a person who refuses to comply without sufficient cause; it cannot provide the wife or child with food or essential funds and does not wipe out their accrued entitlement. The High Court expressly adopted this distinction to reject the proposition that the one-year proviso or a term of imprisonment by itself cancels the liability to pay maintenance. It did not treat confinement as a substitute for recovery.

The Poongodi quotation also referred to Shantha v B.G. Shivananjappa, (2005) 4 SCC 468, for the continuing nature of maintenance liability, and Shahada Khatoon v Amjad Ali, (1999) 5 SCC 672, for successive Section 125(3) applications concerning subsequent defaults, in a somewhat different context. The High Court considered these decisions through the passage quoted from Poongodi. Its own reading of Section 125(3) treated each monthly default as a separate basis for imprisonment and supported the total term of six months for multiple monthly defaults.

3. Statutes considered : Section 125 CrPC supplied the interim and final wife/child maintenance obligations. Section 125(3) allows a Magistrate, where a person fails to comply without sufficient cause, to issue a warrant to levy the amount as a fine and, after execution of the warrant, sentence the person to imprisonment for up to one month for the whole or any part of each month's allowance remaining unpaid, or until payment is made if sooner. Its proviso requires application to levy any amount within one year of its due date. Under this reading of the monthly basis for imprisonment, a six-month total may comply with the maximum of one month for each monthly default when multiple months remain unpaid. The proviso regulates the warrant application; the Court's reasoning under Poongodi does not equate it with extinguishment of the underlying debt. Sections 397/401 supplied revision jurisdiction.

4. Issues : Was a six-month imprisonment order unlawful on its face under the Section 125(3) one-month cap, or could distinct monthly defaults support cumulative confinement? Did the one-year proviso to a levy application erase old maintenance obligations, or did it limit the enforcement remedy while leaving the liability continuing until payment? Finally, did a partial ₹20,000 offer compel release notwithstanding years in which almost no maintenance had been paid? The Court was reviewing two coercive-enforcement orders, not reopening the original maintenance entitlement or reconsidering the amount awarded.

5. Ratio / Findings : Reading Section 125(3), the Court rejected the argument that imprisonment for all defaults together could not exceed one month. The statute speaks of the whole or any part of each month's allowance remaining unpaid after execution of the recovery warrant and permits up to one month for every monthly breach. It stated that defaults for twelve preceding months could support twelve months of imprisonment and that six months here was therefore not invalid merely because the maximum for one monthly default was one month. It also stated the warrant application must be filed within one year of the relevant amount becoming due. The continuing liability did not alter the quoted proviso that an application to levy an amount must be made within one year of that amount becoming due. The holding that six months' imprisonment was permissible rested on successive monthly defaults.

The distinction in Poongodi and Kuldip Kaur between enforcing payment and satisfying liability answered the applicant's broader contention that the arrears had become barred or discharged. Maintenance is for a wife and child's subsistence; the liability is satisfied by payment, rather than by imprisonment or the mere expiry of the period for seeking enforcement. Shantha and Shahada Khatoon supplied continuing liability and successive applications for later defaults through the quoted authority. The applicant had paid only ₹1,500 since the interim order, despite the later final award. The High Court saw his prolonged non-compliance as lacking bona fides and rejected his request for release on an offer to pay ₹20,000 and for time to pay the balance; it affirmed the order for six months' imprisonment or earlier payment. The Family Court's orders were affirmed on the recorded non-payment and the interpretation of Section 125(3) permitting imprisonment for each monthly default.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the revision affirming the Family Court's orders of 19 and 21 February 2018: the applicant remained liable under the direction for six months' imprisonment or payment of ₹1,14,500, whichever occurred earlier, and the offer to deposit ₹20,000 did not secure release. The Court did not hold the maintenance debt discharged by the custodial period.

Headnote :- Externment — Article 19(1)(d) / close current nexus - An order under Section 5 of the MP Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam excluded the petitioner from Balaghat, Seoni, Mandla and Dindori for one year. Deepak v State of Maharashtra treats externment as an extraordinary interference with free movement requiring reasonable restriction, objective material and, for witness-intimidation grounds, satisfaction based on material showing that witnesses are unwilling to testify because of fear. The Court found that the cases from 2012, 2018 and 2020 lacked the required close connection in time to the proposed externment, while it regarded the 2022–23 IPC cases as relatively minor; no witness refusal was shown and the SHO acknowledged convictions in some cases. The Court also found that the proceedings had been initiated to keep the petitioner away from election proceedings. Applying MP decisions requiring a close connection in time, the Court quashed the externment and appellate orders, not the underlying prosecutions.

Fair hearing — undisclosed post-argument material / cross-examination - After final arguments, the SHO supplied information about a new 2024 FIR and preventive proceedings under Section 122, which the District Magistrate considered. The petitioner had not received the letter or an opportunity to answer it. He had requested cross-examination of departmental witnesses; the order-sheet did not record that he had refused to cross-examine, and he was not given the opportunity. The authority should have disregarded the additional material or reopened the hearing to allow him to answer it. These separate procedural defects also supported setting aside the order.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajesh Nagpure filed a writ petition under Article 226 challenging the District Magistrate, Balaghat's Section 5 MP Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam externment decision and the Commissioner, Jabalpur Division's appellate affirmance. The SP's recommendation of 17 October 2023 described a pattern of public abuse, threats and alleged intimidation and listed Crime Nos. 46/2012, 313/2018, 41/2020, 112/2020, 156/2022 and 169/2023. The cases were mainly under Sections 294, 323, 506 and 34 IPC, with Sections 147, 148 and 341 also included in one case. Three preventive steps, including Sections 107/116(3) and 110 CrPC reports, were also cited. Notice was issued on 18 October 2023. The petitioner appeared with counsel. The SHO testified on 6 November, but the record did not show that the petitioner had refused to cross-examine him. Multiple adjournments followed, departmental evidence closed on 18 January 2024 when the petitioner was absent, and on 7 March he requested cross-examination. Government meetings and election work led to further adjournments. The judgment records that final arguments were heard on 1 April 2024 and the final order was passed on 6 April 2024. A letter sent by the SHO on 2 April added Crime No. 36/2024 and an Ishtagasa under Section 122 CrPC. The District Magistrate considered that material without supplying a copy or allowing the petitioner to respond. The appellate order was dated 29 July 2024.

The petitioner said old and comparatively minor cases did not justify externment as a preventive measure, no evidence showed witnesses too afraid to testify, and the SHO's election concern suggested an improper motive. He argued the late letter and denial of cross-examination violated hearing rights. The State opposed. The Court obtained the externment record in sealed cover. The order excluded him from Balaghat, Seoni, Mandla and Dindori for one year; the High Court ultimately set it and the appellate order aside.

2. Precedents — Considered : Deepak v State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeal 139/2022, was extensively quoted and applied. Under Maharashtra's Section 56 externment law, the Supreme Court considered the right to free movement under Article 19(1)(d) alongside the power to impose reasonable restrictions under Article 19(5): externment is extraordinary, may prevent a person living with family or earning a livelihood, and must be sparingly used. A competent authority needs objective material on which to base its subjective satisfaction concerning the anticipated danger or violence; when relying on the provision concerning witness intimidation it must also be satisfied that witnesses are unwilling to come forward because of fear for safety or property. The registration of multiple FIRs concerning the specified offences is not enough. Deepak's quotation of Pandharinath Shridhar Rangnekar emphasized extraordinary circumstances and strict compliance with statutory hearing. The present High Court applied these principles when reviewing the record under Section 5 of the MP Act; it did not claim that Maharashtra Section 56 text governed directly.

Gangaram v Commissioner, Indore Division, 2022 (1) MPLJ 711, and Meena Sonkar v State of M.P., 2017 (2) MPLJ 565, were quoted as MP authorities requiring a close connection in time. Gangaram, discussing Sudeep Patel, explained the preventive aim, how delay between the alleged conduct and proposed externment can break the necessary connection, and why the authority must act promptly rather than treat externment as a formality even without an express limitation period. Its quotation from State of Maharashtra v Bhaurao Punjabrao Gawande, (2008) 3 SCC 613, distinguished preventive from punitive action. It included, through further quotations, statements in Haradhan Saha, Khudiram Das, V.G. Row and Naresh Kumar Goyal concerning anticipated risk and delay. The present Court applied the proximity principle to the old cases relied on for externment. Meena Sonkar reproduced Ashok Kumar Patel and other MP cases for a close connection in time between the relevant offences and proposed action under Section 5(b), and for genuine hearing and application of mind. The Court applied that local line to the old cases relied on in this proceeding.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 provided for judicial review of the District Magistrate and Commissioner. Article 19(1)(d) protects movement throughout India and Article 19(5) permits reasonable restrictions; externment directly restricts that freedom. Section 5 MP Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam, 1990 supplied the local preventive power under review. Its prospective focus required sufficiently recent conduct and, on the relied-upon intimidation theory, an objective basis for finding that witnesses were unwilling to testify. Sections 294, 323, 506 and 34 IPC (with Sections 147, 148 and 341 in one FIR) described reported cases, not guilt findings in this writ. Sections 107/116(3), 110 and 122 CrPC described preventive reports, including the post-hearing 2024 addition. The Supreme Court quotation concerned Section 56 of Maharashtra's 1951 Act as an analogous externment framework, not the exact MP text.

4. Issues : Did the District Magistrate have sufficiently current, relevant objective material to justify a restriction on movement across four districts for one year, including the specific proposition that witnesses feared giving evidence, or were old and trivial cases being used for a punitive or election-related purpose? Separately, could the authority rely on a new case and preventive report supplied after final arguments without notice and response, and deny the petitioner the requested opportunity to cross-examine, although the record did not show that he had refused to do so? The High Court assessed the legality of the externment and appeal.

5. Ratio / Findings : The principles stated in Deepak required externment, as an exceptional restriction on free movement, to be reasonable and based on material relevant to preventing future harm. The SP's October 2023 recommendation drew on 2012, 2018 and 2020 cases too old to establish the required connection with the proposed preventive action; the 2022 and 2023 cases involved the relatively minor listed IPC offences. No material identified proceedings in which witnesses stayed away due to intimidation. The SHO stated that there had been convictions in some trials. The Court inferred from this that witnesses had come forward to give evidence. The Court also found from the SHO's statement that the purpose of the proceedings was to keep the petitioner away from election proceedings. Applying Gangaram and Meena Sonkar, the Court held that reliance on old and stale cases and the relatively minor later offences, without material showing witnesses' fear, did not justify Section 5 externment.

There was also a separate denial of a fair hearing. The 2 April 2024 letter introducing Crime No. 36/2024 and Ishtagasa No. 01/24 arrived after final arguments on 1 April, yet the District Magistrate used it without giving the petitioner a copy or opportunity to answer it. The authority could have excluded the new material or reopened the hearing. The petitioner requested cross-examination, and the 6 November 2023 order-sheet did not record that he had refused to cross-examine; the opportunity should have been afforded. The Court set aside the appellate order along with the externment order. Together with the absence of a sufficiently current and supported basis for action under Section 5, these flaws required the externment order to be quashed.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has allowed the writ. The District Magistrate's order excluding the petitioner for one year from Balaghat, Seoni, Mandla and Dindori and the Commissioner's 29 July 2024 appellate order were quashed.

Rajesh Nagpure v. State of Madhya Pradesh and others, W.P. no. 22524/2024, 14/10/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC — prima facie FIR / disputed defence - Applicants sought quashing of a police FIR alleging that they damaged Dr B.R. Ambedkar's statue at about 11:15 p.m. amid a local dispute over government land. They relied on a purported allotment and later gift of the land to the Shakya community, an earlier confrontation between the complainant's community and the police, a counter-FIR and their claim that they were at the police station. These matters did not establish that the allegations taken at face value failed to disclose the alleged IPC offences. The Sarpanch's consent letter did not establish an allotment by a competent authority. The community Panchanama did not show a gift by Bhauran or his wife and was not a registered gift deed. The claim to an easement required civil adjudication. Following Supreme Court caution against a roving inquiry during investigation, the Court dismissed the quashing application, without determining the applicants' guilt or finally deciding title.

Supreme Court authority — exceptional quashing - Bhajan Lal, Amit Kapoor and the other reproduced Supreme Court decisions permit intervention where the allegations, accepted as stated, do not disclose an offence or are inherently improbable, or where the proceedings are legally barred or manifestly an abuse of process, but prohibit a mini-trial on contested defence material. The Court applied that distinction to the allegations in the FIR and the plea of alibi.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In his report dated 22 February 2021, Shanker Jatav alleged that he had seen Rajesh Shakya and the other applicants damaging an Ambedkar statue near his home at about 11:15 p.m. He said that he was afraid to speak and informed other members of his community. He also alleged that the applicants fled after damaging the statue. The statue had been installed on 2 January 2021 on land described in the FIR as government land. Police Station Vijaypur, Sheopur registered Crime No. 42/2021 under Sections 295, 427 and 147 IPC. The applicants invoked Section 482 CrPC to quash the FIR at the admission stage.

The applicants disputed the land description, pointing to a purported Sarpanch allotment to Bhauran for tethering cattle and a Dharamshala, and a 31 December 2020 Panchanama said to give land to the Shakya community for a community centre and Jhalkari Bai Bhavan. They said that the police had summoned them to the station the previous night and that they therefore could not have been at the statue. One of the applicants was a postman. They described an 8 January police FIR after officials respectfully removed an unauthorised statue and Jatav-community members allegedly blocked a road, damaged police vehicles and reinstalled it. Ratani Bai, described as Bhauran's wife, had also lodged a 16 February FIR about an alleged assault when she objected to the use of the land. The applicants alleged that the FIR was retaliatory because some relatives of respondent No. 2 had been named as accused in other FIRs. These were the applicants' competing allegations; they were not findings in their favour.

2. Precedents — Considered : Munshiram v State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, and Teeja Devi v State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, were used for the caution against prematurely quashing an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence before proper police investigation, subject to exceptional abuse or malicious and vexatious prosecution. State of Orissa v Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, quoting Swapan Kumar Guha and Jeffrey J. Diermeier, explained why investigation should ordinarily collect evidence where an offence is disclosed and why the wide inherent jurisdiction must nevertheless be exercised sparingly and to secure justice. XYZ v State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, and S. Martin were cited against a roving inquiry into disputed facts that obstructs investigation.

S. Khushboo v Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, recited Bhajan Lal's face-value absence-of-offence and manifest-mala-fide categories and discussed Medchl Chemicals, Zandu Pharmaceutical and Shakson Belthissor: exceptional quashing protects against plainly untenable prosecution but not genuine complaints. Sangeeta Agrawal v State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, required the Court to set out the factual background and give reasons for applying the law. Amit Kapoor v Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, supplied detailed principles, including the balance between accused liberty and prosecution, the prohibition on weighing the likelihood of conviction, and the difference between purely civil disputes and facts also amounting to offences. Ajay Kumar Das v

State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, repeated Bhajan Lal's caution that the power is not arbitrary and its exercise cannot be confined to rigid categories.

Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, noted a limited exception allowing a public document or a document whose veracity is not disputed by the complainant to be considered, while stating that the Court would ordinarily refrain from assessing the defence or verifying its documents when considering quashing. State of A.P. v Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, and Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, again distinguished the Court's abuse-prevention function from prematurely terminating a prosecution by evaluating the evidence; the latter reproduced Bhajan Lal's seven illustrative categories and other authorities in nested passages. M. Srikanth v State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, reiterated the ground that the allegations taken at face value fail to disclose an offence. M.N. Ojha v Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, recognised intervention where inherently improbable allegations are used for harassment, while cautioning against routine interference. CBI v Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, warned against judicial findings on contested defence facts in a Section 482 petition. The High Court applied the face-value offence test and declined to resolve the disputed defences in this quashing application.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the source of the requested inherent-power relief; the judgment addressed the boundary between investigating a disclosed cognizable crime and preventing abusive process. The FIR invoked Sections 295, 427 and 147 IPC in relation to the alleged damage to the statue, mischief and rioting. The charges remained allegations, and the order recorded no conviction. Section 397 CrPC, Section 228 CrPC, Section 173(2) CrPC, Sections 156(1) and 155(2) CrPC and Article 226 were mentioned principally within quoted Supreme Court explanations of quashing and revision, framing of charges and police investigation; the present application was not a revision, writ, charge order or dispute about authority to investigate a non-cognizable offence. The Court referred to the need for a registered gift deed when assessing the applicants' account of the purported transfer of land, without adjudicating a land-title suit or specifying a registration section.

4. Issues : Did the face-value FIR alleging group damage to the statue disclose a cognizable criminal case such that the applicants' counter-FIR narrative, alleged land rights and plea that they were at the police station could not justify immediate quashing? Could the Court resolve whether a Sarpanch had authority to allot the parcel, whether the Panchanama transferred title, or whether the applicants had an easement, in a Section 482 proceeding? The issue was whether the proceedings should continue at that stage. The Court was not determining proof of each alleged ingredient beyond reasonable doubt, the legality of installing the statue or final ownership.

5. Ratio / Findings : Drawing on the quoted Supreme Court decisions, the Court held that it must not conduct a roving inquiry into disputed facts as though conducting a trial, although an FIR may be quashed where the uncontroverted allegations themselves disclose no offence. On this record, the alleged deliberate damage by identified applicants in a group supplied sufficient allegations, taken at face value, for the investigation to proceed. The prior incidents and counter-allegations did not conclusively displace that account merely by showing hostility or a competing claim to the land.

The Sarpanch consent letter did not establish that the site was Abadi land or that the Gram Panchayat was competent to allot it to Bhauran. The 31 December Panchanama recorded Shakya-community members purporting to gift the parcel to themselves, not a gift by Bhauran or his wife; there was also no registered gift deed. The State described the land as government land, and the Court rejected the Panchanama as a basis for the applicants' title defence. Nor had the applicants obtained a civil declaration of the easement they claimed on the ground that their houses faced the open land. A petition invoking the Court's inherent power could not adjudicate that contested civil claim. The applicants' claim that they were at the police station was a disputed plea of alibi to be established at trial. The judgment stated that the accused must prove that plea beyond reasonable doubt. None of these defences warranted premature quashing.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has dismissed the Section 482 application. Crime No. 42/2021 at Police Station Vijaypur, District Sheopur under Sections 295, 427 and 147 IPC was not quashed.

Rajesh Shakya and others v. State of Madhya Pradesh and others, M.Cr.C. no. 14082/2021, 24/03/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Cheating versus civil default — deferred potato purchases / onward sale - The FIR alleged that the applicant, who ran a school, purchased 325 quintals of the complainant's potatoes at Rs 2,140 per quintal, paid Rs 1,30,000 in advance and failed to pay the balance. It further alleged that he similarly failed to pay several farmers, sold the produce, retained the proceeds and disappeared from his home. Subsequent nonpayment alone would not establish an intention to cheat from the inception of the transaction. On the allegations of resale and retention of the proceeds, however, the High Court drew a prima facie inference of such intention, distinguishing a case in which the purchaser had been unable to resell the produce. It declined to quash the FIR under Sections 406/420 IPC in the application under Section 528 BNSS. This was an assessment at the quashing stage, not a determination of guilt or proof of every ingredient of the offences at trial.

Civil/criminal overlap and disputed defence - The principles stated in Amit Kapoor and Naresh Kumar/Paramjeet Batra require the Court to examine whether the essential ingredients of a criminal offence are present and to prevent criminal proceedings from being used as a means of harassment in a civil dispute. The existence of a claim for the unpaid purchase price did not exclude the alleged criminal elements in this case. The applicant's account of abduction and a forcibly signed blank cheque, set out in his complaint to the Superintendent of Police, had not been proved. No order sheets were produced to show the status of his father's complaint under Section 175(3) BNSS. The application was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajesh Upadhya applied under Section 528 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023, to quash Crime No. 603/2024, registered at Police Station Ambah, Morena, under Sections 406 and 420 of the Indian Penal Code. The FIR described the applicant as having run Saraswati Shishu Mandir for four years, rather than as a potato trader, and alleged that he had promised farmers Rs 2,140 per quintal for their potatoes. The complainant stated that he supplied 325 quintals on 15 April 2024, received Rs 1,30,000 in advance and was promised a further Rs 5,22,000 within ten days. The FIR alleged that the balance remained unpaid, that the applicant had sold the potatoes and retained or misappropriated the money, and that he had disappeared from his home in Datia. It also alleged unpaid balances of Rs 3,37,000 to Rajkumar, Rs 5,74,000 to Raghvendra, Rs 1,55,000 to Vinod Parashar, Rs 90,000 to Annu and Rs 1,80,000 to Raju, besides amounts due to other farmers. Handwritten calculations and a blank cheque were said to be available.

The applicant stated that Omveer Singh Tomar and others had abducted him on 10 August 2024, taken Rs 90,000 from him and forced him to sign blank papers and the cheque. He complained to the Superintendent of Police on 27 August. His counsel submitted that his father had also lodged a complaint under Section 175(3) BNSS against Omveer, Pope Singh and several of the farmers, but produced no order sheets showing its status. Counsel described the dispute over the purchase price as civil. The State submitted that the transaction involved the misappropriation of money belonging to several farmers and the applicant's flight from his home, and was not merely a business transaction. The application was heard and dismissed on 15 April 2025.

2. Precedents — Considered : Amit Kapoor v Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, was reproduced at length. The directly relevant principles require the power to quash to be exercised sparingly and the allegations to be taken at face value when examining whether the essential ingredients of an offence are disclosed. They prohibit weighing the evidence or conducting a mini-trial and distinguish a predominantly civil wrong involving no criminal element from a transaction giving rise to both civil relief and criminal prosecution. The judgment also discusses the balance between personal liberty and lawful prosecution, statutory bars, inherently improbable allegations, use of the process for an ulterior purpose and material supplied by an accused from outside the prosecution record. Paragraph 28 explains that Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia does not lay down a universal rule requiring every proceeding arising from a transaction with civil elements to be terminated. The High Court quoted these principles while considering criminal proceedings involving civil elements.

Naresh Kumar and another v State of Karnataka and another, SLP (Cr.) No. 1570/2021, decided 12 March 2024, was quoted for the principle that criminal proceedings should not be used as a means of harassment in an essentially civil dispute. The passage quoted from Paramjeet Batra v State of Uttarakhand, (2013) 11 SCC 673, requires careful examination of whether the essential ingredients of a criminal offence are present despite the civil nature of a transaction, and permits quashing where a civil wrong is merely presented as a crime. The references in Naresh Kumar to Randheer Singh v State of U.P., (2021) 14 SCC 626, and Usha Chakraborty v State of West Bengal, 2023:INSC:86, reinforce the same principle. The High Court accepted that a mere breach should not be treated as a criminal offence, but distinguished the allegations of resale and retention of the proceeds in this case. It therefore declined to quash the FIR as a purely civil dispute.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS 2023 was the provision under which the applicant invoked the High Court's inherent power in this 2025 application for quashing. Section 482 of the earlier CrPC appeared in the quoted Supreme Court authorities as the provision governing the analogous power. Sections 406 and 420 IPC were the offences stated in the FIR. The Court considered whether nonpayment alone, as distinct from the alleged resale and retention of the proceeds, disclosed a prima facie intention to cheat. Counsel also referred to the applicant's father's complaint under Section 175(3) BNSS, but did not produce the order sheets showing its status. Other CrPC provisions in the Amit Kapoor quotation, including Sections 397, 228 and 173(2), formed part of the Supreme Court's discussion of the general principles governing quashing.

4. Issues : Was the FIR merely a civil claim for recovery of the purchase price presented as an offence under Sections 406/420 IPC, without an intention to cheat from the inception of the transaction? Or did the allegations of purchases from several farmers, followed by resale, nonpayment and retention of the proceeds, disclose a prima facie criminal element? Did the applicant's unproved account of abduction and forced signatures, or the asserted complaint by his father under Section 175(3) BNSS, require a different conclusion at the quashing stage?

5. Ratio / Findings : A subsequent failure to fulfil a promise to pay does not, by itself, constitute cheating or criminal breach of trust. The facts must indicate an intention to cheat from the inception of the transaction. This requirement prevents criminal proceedings from being used to recover a purely civil debt. In this case, however, the FIR described a series of transactions in which a person running a school agreed to purchase potatoes from several farmers, allegedly resold them in the open market and retained the proceeds without paying the purchase price. The Court distinguished a case in which the purchaser had been unable to sell the potatoes, which could have supported an innocent explanation. Here, the alleged resale and retention of the proceeds permitted an inference that the applicant had intended to cheat the farmers from the outset. The Court regarded the allegations as disclosing criminal ingredients alongside the civil claim and declined to quash the FIR at that stage. The decision concerned quashing and did not determine whether misappropriation or the requisite state of mind had been proved beyond reasonable doubt at trial.

The applicant's complaint to the Superintendent of Police alleged that he had been forced to sign the blank cheque and writings during an abduction, but those allegations had not been proved. Counsel conceded that the order sheets relating to his father's complaint under Section 175(3) BNSS had not been filed. The Court found the account of abduction solely to obtain signatures on blank papers implausible in the absence of any shown prior enmity. It expressed the prima facie view that the complaint to the Superintendent of Police appeared to have been made to create a defence to the handwritten accounts of the potato purchases. These were prima facie assessments made in deciding whether to quash the FIR.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 528 BNSS and declined to quash the FIR under Sections 406/420 IPC in Crime No. 603/2024.

Rajesh Upadhya v. State of Madhya Pradesh and others, M.Cr.C. no. 55597/2024, 15/04/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (515) Prev Next

Headnote :- MP externment — current nexus / fearful witnesses - The District Magistrate ordered the petitioner's externment for one year from Jabalpur and seven adjoining districts on the basis of old cases dating back to 1997 and one FIR registered in 2020. The Court stated two necessary conditions:

the alleged conduct must have close proximity to the externment order, and there must be some material showing that witnesses are not coming forward to give statements against the proposed externee. The police witness's bare assertion that witnesses were afraid, for which no documentary support was produced, did not provide the required reasoned assessment. The order did not examine the nature and outcomes of the earlier cases or explain why externment was necessary.

Hearing and reasons — cross-examination / mechanical appeal - The petitioner was required to advance final arguments before cross-examining the police witness and was given no further hearing to address her answers. The District Magistrate's order largely reproduced earlier material without explaining why the record justified externment from eight districts. The Commissioner overlooked these defects. Applying the principles on recording reasons stated in Kranti Associates, the Court set aside both orders and imposed costs of Rs 20,000 on the District Magistrate.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajjan Yadav filed a petition under Article 226 challenging the Commissioner, Jabalpur Division's order dated 11 November 2020 dismissing his appeal against the District Magistrate's order dated 28 July 2020. The latter order externed him for one year from Jabalpur, Mandla, Dindori, Narsinghpur, Seoni, Katni, Damoh and Umaria under the MP Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam. He had complied with an externment order made in 2016. A recommendation by the Superintendent of Police in March 2018 led to another externment order in 2018. On 20 February 2019, the Commissioner set that order aside because no departmental witness had been examined and remanded the matter for a fresh decision after giving the petitioner a full opportunity to present his defence. On 8 July 2020, Crime No. 184/2020 was registered at Khamariya against the petitioner and two others under Sections 327, 294, 506, 427/34 IPC. The Superintendent of Police renewed the recommendation for externment that day. The District Magistrate's record showed that notice was issued on 8 July; counsel appeared and Sub Inspector Nirupa Pandey was examined-in-chief on 10 July; a detailed reply was filed and arguments were heard on 14 July; the witness was cross-examined on 17 July; and the externment order was passed on 28 July. The petitioner submitted that no new case or preventive action had been taken during the long interval in 2017–19 and that only one case had been registered in 2020. He relied on the coordinate Bench's order dated 9 February 2021 in Ramlakhan Yadav, W.P. 18605/2020. The State conceded that the decision covered the case, but sought to distinguish it on the basis of the police witness's statement that people were afraid to depose. It acknowledged that no documentary support for that assertion had been produced.

2. Precedents — Considered : Ramlakhan Yadav v State of M.P. and others, W.P. No. 18605/2020, decided 9 February 2021, was relied on as a closely comparable coordinate Bench decision on externment. The State conceded that it covered the case, while relying on the additional statement of the Sub Inspector. Kranti Associates (P) Ltd. v Masood Ahmed Khan, (2010) 9 SCC 496, was quoted and applied on the duty to give reasons. It requires decisions prejudicial to a person, including quasi-judicial decisions, to state cogent and intelligible reasons showing that relevant factors have been considered. Reasons restrain arbitrariness and enable review; a rubber-stamp conclusion is insufficient. Paragraph 46 refers to S.N. Mukherjee and foreign authorities. Applying Kranti Associates, the High Court found that the District Magistrate had reproduced material verbatim and reached an unsupported conclusion, showing an absence of reasons and non-application of mind. The Commissioner had failed to scrutinise those defects on appeal.

3. Statutes considered : The petition invoked judicial review under Article 226 of the Constitution. The Superintendent of Police's request dated 8 July 2020 invoked Sections 4, 5 and 6 of the MP Rajya Suraksha Adhiniyam. Section 5 was the specific provision for externment identified in the earlier recommendation and relevant to the order under challenge. Externment is a preventive restriction on residence and movement and may affect livelihood. Sections 327, 294, 506 and 427 read with 34 IPC were the provisions under which Crime No. 184/2020 had been registered. The findings on proximity, the reluctance of witnesses, a fair hearing and reasons concerned the exercise of the discretionary power of externment and the appellate decision.

4. Issues : Could externment for one year from eight districts be ordered on the basis of numerous old cases, including cases from decades earlier, and one recent alleged offence without a reasoned assessment of their proximity to the order, their nature and outcomes, and reliable material showing that witnesses were unwilling to come forward? Was the hearing fair when final arguments preceded cross-examination of the police witness, no later opportunity was given to address her answers, and the record did not clearly show the position concerning defence evidence? Did an order largely reproducing earlier material, followed by a mechanical appellate decision, satisfy the duty to give reasons in proceedings affecting liberty and livelihood?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court stated that the alleged offences must have close proximity to the externment order and that there must be some material showing that witnesses are not coming forward to give statements against the proposed externee. The case history relied on by the petitioner included offences dating back to 1997, groups of cases from 1998 and 2014, and later cases up to 2017. The petitioner also submitted that no case had been registered during 2017–19 and that only one FIR had been registered in 2020. The Sub Inspector's general assertion that witnesses were afraid, which the State conceded had no documentary support, did not dispense with a reasoned examination of the required conditions. The District Magistrate had not assessed the seriousness, outcomes and age of the individual cases or explained why externment from the specified districts was warranted.

The Court examined the order sheets even though the petitioner had not specifically challenged the sequence of the hearing. The police witness's examination-in-chief was recorded on the day counsel sought time, and final arguments were heard before cross-examination. Although the witness was later cross-examined, counsel was given no opportunity to address that evidence afterward. The record also did not clearly show whether the petitioner had sought to lead defence evidence. The Court held that cross-examination was not a mere formality: requiring final arguments before it and allowing no further hearing on the answers violated natural justice. It expressly left open whether recording the examination-in-chief before supplying the Superintendent of Police's papers and awaiting the reply was itself improper. The procedural holding concerned the requirement to argue before cross-examination and the denial of a subsequent hearing.

The District Magistrate's 2020 order reproduced the 2018 order and successive procedural materials, then relied on the new FIR to reach a conclusion without reasons. Under Kranti Associates, an adverse quasi-judicial order must give clear reasons revealing the basis for the exercise of discretion and enabling review. This order did not do so. The Court held that the hasty procedure and unreasoned order were arbitrary and mala fide, noting that the earlier remand had already followed a failure to examine any departmental witness. The Commissioner had failed to examine and address the defects. An appeal required real scrutiny, particularly when removal from a person's home could deprive him of his livelihood. The finding of mala fides related to the procedure and administrative record in this case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the writ petition and set aside the District Magistrate, Jabalpur's externment order dated 28 July 2020 and the Commissioner, Jabalpur Division's appellate order dated 11 November 2020. The District Magistrate was directed to deposit costs of Rs 20,000 in the High Court Registry within 30 days. Rajjan Yadav was entitled to withdraw the amount.

Headnote :- Rape allegation — Section 90 IPC / job dependence - A hospital receptionist accused its director of repeated sexual violation during her employment and alleged that, after terminating her services, he induced further sexual acts by promising to restore her employment. He sought quashing on the ground that the continued relationship and her supplementary statements showed consent. The Court held that failure to complain did not conclusively establish voluntary participation where the employer was in a position to dominate the employee's wishes. An alleged false promise of reemployment could render apparent consent one given under a misconception of fact within Section 90 IPC. At the stage of considering quashing of the FIR and charge-sheet, the allegations were capable of constituting offences. The application was dismissed without finally determining voluntariness or guilt on the evidence to be recorded at trial.

Trial independence — limited Section 482 observations - The Court directed the trial judge to decide the case on the evidence adduced at trial, without being influenced by its observations at the quashing stage.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajkishore Shrivastava, the director of a hospital, applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash the FIR in Crime No. 8/2021 registered at Police Station AJK, Bhind, the charge-sheet and all consequential proceedings. The recorded offences were Sections 376(2)(n), 323, 294 and 506 IPC and Sections 3(2)(v), 3(2)(va), 3(1)(r), 3(1)(s), 3(1)(w) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act. The prosecutrix alleged that she joined the hospital as a receptionist in June 2020 and that, after returning from Gwalior and Delhi in July, the applicant sexually violated her repeatedly on the pretext of providing employment. She alleged that he pressured her to have sex with others and terminated her services when she refused. Thereafter, he allegedly continued to have sexual relations with her until December 2020 by promising reinstatement, but did not restore her employment. She also alleged beating, humiliation on account of her caste and threats. According to her account, the applicant made a complaint in his defence after she threatened to inform his wife of his conduct.

The applicant relied on four supplementary statements and submitted that the prosecutrix had consented, pointing in particular to the alleged continuation of the sexual relationship after termination of her employment. He argued that the continuation excluded consent under a misconception of fact. Counsel appeared for the State. The Court dismissed the application on 2 August 2021 and expressly directed that the trial be decided independently of its preliminary observations.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court reproduced Section 90 IPC and stated the settled principle that an FIR or charge-sheet may be quashed where the uncontroverted allegations do not disclose an offence. It applied the provision and that principle to the allegations concerning employment and the promise of reinstatement. Its observations on the applicant's alleged domination of the prosecutrix's wishes and consent under a misconception of fact were made within the limited scope of the quashing application. The trial judge was expressly directed to assess the evidence independently.

3. Statutes considered : Under Section 90 IPC, consent given under fear of injury or a misconception of fact is not the consent contemplated by the Code if the person doing the act knows, or has reason to believe, that the consent was given in consequence of that fear or misconception. The order also reproduced the provisions concerning incapacity and consent by a child, but applied the rule concerning fear or misconception to the employee's circumstances. Section 376(2)(n) IPC concerned the alleged repeated sexual acts. Sections 323, 294 and 506 IPC and the listed SC/ST Act subsections were the offences recorded in the FIR. Section 482 CrPC governed the Court's inherent jurisdiction to consider quashing of the FIR and charge-sheet at that stage; the observations did not determine guilt at trial.

4. Issues : Could the applicant establish free and legally effective consent at the Section 482 stage merely by relying on the absence of an immediate complaint, the continued relationship after termination and four supplementary statements, when the prosecutrix alleged dependence on the hospital director and a renewed promise of employment? Did the uncontroverted allegations disclose sexual acts capable of constituting an offence, so that the FIR and charge-sheet should proceed? What effect should the Court's preliminary observations on consent have on the trial judge's assessment of the evidence?

5. Ratio / Findings : Section 90 requires consideration of the circumstances in which apparent consent was given, including fear and misconception of fact. The Court rejected a conclusive inference of voluntary participation from the failure to complain. The Court considered that, as her employer, the hospital director was in a position to dominate her wishes. Even after termination, the alleged promise of reemployment could account for the continued relationship: if she participated in the hope and belief that her job would be restored, her apparent consent could not be treated as free from a misconception of fact. On the allegations, the Court regarded the consent as having been obtained through a false promise of reemployment and under a misconception of fact. It directed the trial court to decide on the evidence adduced at trial, without being influenced by these observations.

At the quashing stage, the question was whether the uncontroverted allegations failed to disclose an offence, rather than whether the applicant's interpretation of the supplementary statements would ultimately be accepted. On the allegations, the Court found no ground to quash the FIR in Crime No. 8/2021 or the charge-sheet. It expressly confined its observations to deciding the application and directed the trial court to decide strictly on the evidence recorded at trial, without being prejudiced or influenced by the High Court's comments.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC. The FIR, charge-sheet and consequential proceedings were not quashed. The trial court was reminded to decide the trial independently on the evidence adduced before it, without being influenced by the observations in the order.

Headnote :- Criminal writ — quashing / alleged counterblast - A former party officeholder sought quashing of four FIRs registered in Sagar, alleging that they were retaliatory responses to his representations against a private respondent. At the quashing stage, the FIR allegations, rather than the suspect's disputed defence, determine whether cognizable offences are disclosed. Renu Kumari, restating R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal, permits sparing intervention where no offence is disclosed or the process is abused, but treats the informant's alleged malice as secondary where the report discloses offences. The petitioner identified no ground arising from the allegations in any particular FIR that warranted quashing. Prayer A was rejected.

Police-action mandamus / CBI transfer - Counsel conceded that a direction to the police merely to examine the petitioner's complaints against the private respondent would, in substance, direct registration of an FIR. Applying Divine Retreat Centre, Sakiri Vasu, Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe and Shweta Bhadauria, the Court declined to issue that direction and left the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190/200 CrPC open. The request for transfer to the CBI also failed because no malice by the investigating authorities was identified. Prayer B was disposed of with liberty to pursue the statutory remedies; prayers A and C were dismissed. The cited authorities preserve exceptional intervention under Article 226, while ordinarily requiring recourse to statutory remedies.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajkumar Singh Thakur filed a petition under Article 226 seeking quashing of four FIRs registered against him in Sagar district, investigation of his complaints against respondent No. 8, and transfer of the investigations against him to the Central Bureau of Investigation. Crime No. 45/2023 at Motinagar concerned allegations under Sections 506, 507 and 34 IPC; Crime No. 23/2023 at Civil Lines concerned Sections 342, 506 and 120-B; Crime No. 9/2023 at Civil Lines concerned Section 419; and Crime No. 11/2023 at Rahatgarh concerned Sections 409, 420, 467, 468, 471 and 477-A. The petitioner stated that he had been president of a party's Kisaan Morcha, was removed from that post on 11 October 2022 and was suspended from party membership for six years on 14 October. His representations to the Prime Minister's Office, Chief Ministers, senior police authorities and Lokayukta alleged threats to his family and offences by respondent No. 8 and his relatives. He alleged that the FIRs were a counterblast to those representations. These were the petitioner's assertions, not judicial findings that the FIRs had been registered in retaliation.

The High Court considered the prayers separately. In relation to prayer B, counsel submitted that he sought only consideration of the petitioner's complaints, rather than an express direction to register an FIR. On being questioned by the Court, however, he accepted that such a direction would indirectly require FIR registration. He identified no malice by the investigating authorities to support prayer C. The petition was disposed of on 19 January 2024, with a separate disposition for each prayer.

2. Precedents — Considered : Renu Kumari v Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was quoted at length on the exercise of inherent power to quash, including the categories stated in R.P. Kapur and the seven illustrative categories in Bhajan Lal. Exceptional intervention remains available where the report, accepted as a whole, discloses no offence, where there is a legal bar or inherent improbability, or where abuse of process is demonstrated. The Court should not assess the reliability of incomplete evidence or quash proceedings merely because ill will is alleged against the informant when a cognizable offence is disclosed. Renu Kumari also refers to State of Karnataka v M. Devendrappa, State of M.P. v Awadh Kishore Gupta and State of Orissa v Saroj Kumar Sahoo as reiterating these principles. The High Court applied the principle that the accused's disputed claim of retaliation did not, by itself, justify quashing.

Divine Retreat Centre v State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, recognises exceptional intervention under Article 226 where a clear case of abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC is shown. Even then, the High Court cannot dictate how the investigation is to be conducted. On police inaction, it refers the informant to the Magistrate's complaint procedure under Sections 190 and 200, quoting Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre and AIIMS Employees' Union. Sakiri Vasu v State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, explains the remedies: a written representation to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), followed, if necessary, by an application to the Magistrate under Section 156(3) for registration, proper investigation and monitoring. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, applies the same approach to alternative remedies. In an appropriate case, the Magistrate may recommend a change of investigating officer, but cannot personally investigate. The MP Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria v State of M.P., W.A. 247/2016, holds that a writ of mandamus for registration may be refused where these alternatives have not been used, unless the Whirlpool exceptions apply. It distinguishes the police duty to register under Lalita Kumari from an unconditional entitlement to a writ of mandamus. The High Court applied these authorities after counsel conceded that the reformulated prayer still sought registration, and found no exceptional ground for writ intervention.

The Court treated transfer to CBI as exceptional and found no malice by the investigating authorities necessitating transfer.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 was the jurisdiction invoked for quashing the FIRs, a mandamus for police action and transfer of the investigations to the CBI. The quoted authorities on the inherent power under Section 482 CrPC supplied analogous principles of restraint, although the petition was under Article 226. Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 CrPC provide the alternatives identified for an informant aggrieved by non-registration or inadequate investigation. Chapter XII governs police investigation, while Chapter XV concerns inquiry into complaints. Sections 155(2), 203 and related provisions appeared in the Supreme Court quotations explaining the Magistrate's functions. The IPC provisions mentioned in the four FIRs were allegations of offences, rather than findings of guilt.

4. Issues : Could the four FIRs be quashed merely on the petitioner's disputed account of political retaliation, without showing from their allegations, taken at face value, that no cognizable offence was disclosed or that a recognised ground of abuse existed? Could the Court direct the police to examine his complaints against respondent No. 8 when that apparently narrower direction would, in effect, require registration of a new FIR despite the available remedies before senior police officers and the Magistrate? Was there material justifying the exceptional transfer of the investigations to the CBI when no malice by the investigating authorities was identified? The three prayers concerned distinct exercises of Article 226 jurisdiction and were considered separately.

5. Ratio / Findings : On prayer A, the Court considered the FIR allegations for the purpose of quashing and declined to examine the accused's defence. Renu Kumari recognises intervention to prevent abuse, but states that the informant's mala fides are secondary where cognizable offences are disclosed. An allegation of retaliatory purpose does not, by itself, justify stopping the investigation. The petitioner identified no ground arising from the allegations in any particular FIR, taken at face value, that warranted quashing at that stage.

On prayer B, Divine Retreat recognises exceptional writ intervention in a clear case of abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII, while the ordinary statutory scheme provides remedies before senior police officers and the Magistrate. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe explain that Section 156(3) permits the Magistrate to direct registration and proper investigation, and to monitor the investigation after appropriate recourse to the statutory remedies. Shweta Bhadauria distinguishes the police duty to register information disclosing a cognizable offence from an automatic entitlement to a writ of mandamus without using the alternatives. Counsel conceded that a direction merely to 'look into' his complaint would, in substance, direct FIR registration. The Court declined to grant that indirect relief, but expressly left the petitioner free to pursue the appropriate remedies under the CrPC.

On prayer C, transfer of an investigation to another agency is exceptional. The petitioner had identified no malice by the investigating authorities necessitating transfer to the CBI. The Court rejected the request.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the petition insofar as it concerned prayers A, for quashing the FIRs, and C, for transfer to the CBI. Prayer B, concerning investigation of the petitioner's complaints against respondent No. 8, was disposed of with the liberty recorded in paragraph 18 to pursue the appropriate remedies under the CrPC. No writ direction to register an FIR was issued.

Headnote :- Cheating versus breach — builder investment / flat agreement - A retired police officer alleged that persons known to him induced him to invest in, or lend money for, flats, received two cheques totalling Rs 5 lakh on a promise to repay double, failed to repay the balance after returning Rs 1 lakh, and misrepresented the building's location. The applicants relied on an agreement to sell identified flats. They stated that the complainant had refused to execute sale deeds and that they had filed a civil suit; applicant No. 2 had also lodged an FIR against him in Ahmedabad. The complainant admitted signing the Gujarati-language agreement but claimed that he could not understand it. The Court applied the requirement of due care under Section 52 IPC and relied on Section 92 of the Evidence Act. It found no foundation for dishonest intention at the inception of the transaction under Section 420 IPC and regarded the loan or sale dispute as predominantly civil. Crime No. 22/2024 under Sections 420, 406 and 34 IPC was quashed, leaving the complainant free to seek civil redress.

Section 482 — civil colour and authority limits - Vijay Kumar Ghai, including its discussion of Indian Oil and Hridaya Ranjan, and Radheshyam support restraint against using prosecution to compel contractual performance. The extensive discussion of forum shopping and repeated FIRs formed part of the quoted authorities; the Court's application concerned the distinction between civil and criminal liability. The order quashed only the specified Gwalior FIR and did not extend to the applicants' Ahmedabad FIR.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A retired Deputy Superintendent of Police lodged Crime No. 22/2024 at Police Station Thatipur, Gwalior, alleging offences under Sections 420, 406 and 34 IPC against Rajkumar Vasudev Prasad Sharma and others. Applicant No. 1, who was known to the complainant and visited him, described himself as a prosperous property dealer and a partner of Ahmedabad builder Dharmeshbhai Kantibhai Patel. In 2017, he offered two flats. When the complainant said that he did not need a residence in Ahmedabad, applicant No. 1 sought a loan of Rs 40 lakh, with the flats as security, promising to repay double within two years. The person introduced as his partner visited in September and described a building with 200 flats, including two flats worth at least Rs 1 crore. The complainant stated that he could not provide the amount sought, but signed a document in Gujarati, which he said he did not understand, and delivered cheques for Rs 2 lakh and Rs 3 lakh. He alleged that he repeatedly sought repayment, that the building's location was uncertain and was later stated to be Mahemdavad rather than Ahmedabad, and that he had been informed that applicant No. 1 was not the builder's partner and Patel was making losses. He alleged that Rs 1 lakh was deposited only after he threatened to lodge an FIR. These were pleaded accounts, not findings establishing the document's authenticity or the alleged partnership.

The applicants described the document as an agreement to sell Flat No. 501 on the fifth floor of Viththal Vinayak and Flat No. 601 on the sixth floor of Block E. They submitted that the complainant's refusal to execute sale deeds prevented resale and that they had filed a civil suit concerning the contract. Patel had also lodged an FIR in Ahmedabad against the complainant under Sections 211, 506(2) and 294(b) IPC. The State and the complainant opposed quashing. The State submitted that an interim order of the High Court had prevented police action. The Court identified the central dispute as the applicants' wish to complete the sale deeds and the complainant's wish to recover his money. It allowed the quashing application on 5 December 2024.

2. Precedents — Considered : Vijay Kumar Ghai v State of West Bengal, 2022 LiveLaw (SC) 305, was quoted extensively. Its relevance to the decision lay in the distinction between a contractual dispute and criminal cheating or breach of trust. It referred to Indian Oil Corpn. v NEPC India Ltd., (2006) 6 SCC 736, for the caution against using criminal prosecution to press civil claims, and to Hridaya Ranjan Prasad Verma v State of Bihar, (2000) 4 SCC 168, on fraudulent intention when a promise is made. The reproduced passages also discuss forum shopping through Cipla and the examples considered there; parallel complaints through Krishna Lal Chawla and T.T. Antony; disclosure of litigation through K. Jayaram; and the limits on quashing stated in Bhajan Lal, R.P. Kapur, Inder Mohan Goswami and Awadh Kishore Gupta. In this case, the Court applied the distinction between a civil dispute and allegations disclosing the ingredients of a criminal offence.

Radheshyam and others v State of Rajasthan and another, Criminal Appeal No. 3020/2024, decided 22 July 2024, was separately cited for the principle that a breach of contract should not be given a criminal character to compel execution of a sale deed. Criminal proceedings cannot be used to enforce specific performance of an agreement. The Court applied that principle in rejecting prosecution over this agreement and expressly preserved the complainant's civil remedy.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the provision under which the High Court's inherent power to quash was invoked. The Court stated that Section 420 IPC requires fraudulent or dishonest intention at the inception of the transaction; a later unfulfilled promise does not, by itself, establish that intention. The FIR also invoked Section 406 IPC and Section 34 on common intention. The Court treated the pleaded arrangement as a civil agreement. Section 52 IPC excludes from good faith an act or belief lacking due care and attention. The Court applied that provision to the retired officer's explanation for signing an agreement in Gujarati without understanding it. It also invoked Section 92 of the Evidence Act as prohibiting oral evidence contrary to the written terms. The IPC provisions cited in the Ahmedabad FIR identified a separate case, which was not decided in this order.

4. Issues : Did the allegations disclose deception or entrustment accompanied by criminal intent when the cheques were delivered and the written agreement was executed, or was the dispute over repayment, as opposed to conveyance of two identified flats, a civil contractual dispute? Could the complainant disown his signed Gujarati agreement merely by saying that he did not understand it and had trusted the applicants, in light of the Court's reasoning on due care under Section 52 and written terms under Section 92? Was criminal prosecution being used to obtain repayment or performance of the sale agreement when a civil remedy remained available?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court identified the parties' opposing positions under the transaction. The applicants treated the payments and document as an agreement for flats requiring execution of sale deeds, while the complainant sought repayment on the basis of a promise to return double the amount. Section 420 requires dishonest intention at the inception of the transaction; subsequent nonpayment or failure to deliver a flat does not, by itself, establish that intention. The complainant admitted executing the document. Applying the requirement of due care under Section 52, the Court rejected, for the purpose of deciding the quashing application, his attempt to disown the agreement merely because it was in Gujarati and he did not understand it. The Court also relied on Section 92 of the Evidence Act, which it treated as barring oral evidence contrary to the document's terms.

Vijay Kumar Ghai and Radheshyam reinforce the principle that a contractual dispute over repayment or sale cannot be presented as an offence under Sections 420/406 merely to compel performance. On the record before it, the Court found the FIR predominantly civil and lacking a foundation for dishonest intention at the inception of the transaction. It declined to allow criminal investigation to be used to obtain repayment or conveyance. The complainant remained free to pursue civil proceedings.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the application under Section 482 CrPC and quashed Crime No. 22/2024 at Police Station Thatipur, Gwalior, under Sections 420, 406 and 34 IPC. Respondent No. 2 was expressly left free to initiate civil proceedings for redress of his grievance.

Rajkumar Vasudev Prasad Sharma and others v. State of Madhya Pradesh and others, M.Cr.C. no. 5872/2024, 05/12/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 304-A IPC — revision / long pendency and sentence - A bus driver convicted of causing Annu's death by rash and negligent driving in 2002 was sentenced to one year's simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1,000. The appellate court reduced the imprisonment to six months. After more than 22 years, he sought a further reduction to the period already undergone, with an increased fine. State of Punjab v Dil Bahadur, reproducing Saurabh Bakshi and Surendra Singh, cautions against unduly lenient sentences in fatal road-accident cases merely because time has elapsed or compensation has been paid. Punishment must be proportionate to the act and take account of the victim's family and society. Applying those principles, the Court refused a further reduction, affirmed the appellate sentence, cancelled bail and directed the applicant to surrender immediately, and no later than 20 March 2025.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 28 June 2002, Raju Jaat drove bus MP07-F-0982 and, as found in the conviction, struck Annu while driving rashly and negligently, causing his death. On 15 February 2007, the JMFC, Vijapur, Sheopur, convicted him under Section 304-A IPC and sentenced him to one year's simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1,000, with one month's simple imprisonment in default. The Special Judge under the SC/ST Act, deciding Criminal Appeal No. 11/2007, partly allowed the appeal on 1 May 2008 and reduced the custodial sentence to six months' simple imprisonment. Raju filed a revision under Sections 397/401 CrPC against the conviction and sentence. His recorded submission sought reduction of imprisonment to the period already undergone, with an increased fine, because approximately 22 years had elapsed since the incident. The State opposed the revision.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Punjab v Dil Bahadur, Criminal Appeal No. 844/2023, decided 28 March 2023, was quoted extensively and applied. It emphasises the punitive and deterrent purpose of Sections 279/304-A IPC, proportionality in sentencing, the permanent loss suffered by the victim's family and the need to avoid merely nominal imprisonment through misplaced sympathy in fatal-driving cases. Dil Bahadur refers to State of Himachal Pradesh v Ramchandra Rabidas and considers the warning in State of Punjab v Saurabh Bakshi against reducing a Section 304-A sentence to a few days because compensation has been paid. It also reproduces State of M.P. v Surendra Singh, which disapproved reducing a two-year sentence to the period already undergone with modest compensation following a fatal accident caused by rash driving. The High Court applied these sentencing principles in rejecting Raju's request for reduction to time served. The passage from Surendra Singh reproduced in Dil Bahadur refers to Sevaka Perumal, Dhananjoy Chatterjee, Mahesh, Hazara Singh, Shailesh Jasvantbhai, Ahmed Hussein Vali Mohammed Saiyed and State of M.P. v Bablu. These passages address deterrence, relevant mitigating and aggravating circumstances, the interests of the victim and society, and proportionate punishment. The Court applied those principles to the request for reduction of the driver's sentence. The quotation also recognises the corrective aspect of sentencing and the need to consider the facts of each case.

3. Statutes considered : Section 304-A IPC was the provision under which the applicant was convicted and sentenced for causing death by rash or negligent driving. Section 279 IPC appeared in the quoted Supreme Court discussion of road-traffic offences; the applicant's stated conviction was under Section 304-A. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC governed the revision against the appellate judgment. The fine remained Rs 1,000, with the trial court's stated one month's imprisonment in default. The High Court affirmed the appellate judgment without imposing a new fine or compensation order. The Special Judge under the SC/ST Act was the appellate forum. Cancellation of bail bonds and the direction to surrender gave effect to the affirmed custodial sentence.

4. Issues : After the appellate court had reduced one year's simple imprisonment to six months for causing death by negligent driving, should the revisional court reduce the sentence further to the period already undergone and substitute an increased fine merely because the accident had occurred 22 years earlier? How should proportionality, deterrence, the irreversible loss suffered by the victim's family and the passage of time be weighed when considering that request?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court held that the passage of time did not, by itself, justify reducing the six-month sentence for fatal negligent driving to the period already undergone. The principles in Dil Bahadur, supported by Saurabh Bakshi and Surendra Singh, require the consequences of vehicular negligence and the family's loss to be given due weight, with punishment governed by proportionality rather than mere sentiment. The Court noted the increase in road casualties and the irreparable loss caused by a death. It held that undue sympathy would not serve the interests of justice and found no ground for a further reduction in imprisonment. The appellate court had already reduced the original term by half, and the High Court affirmed that sentence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision and affirmed the Special Judge's appellate judgment dated 1 May 2008 and the sentence of six months' simple imprisonment under Section 304-A IPC, with the fine recorded by the trial court. Raju's bail bonds were cancelled. He was directed to surrender before the trial court immediately, and no later than 20 March 2025. On failure to surrender, the trial court was at liberty to issue a warrant of arrest for the remaining sentence. The lower-court records were directed to be returned for compliance.

Headnote :- Section 482 — alleged rape, threats, delayed report and consent - The prosecutrix alleged rape on 21 March 2020, threats to kill her and her brother, a journey to a temple under threat on 30 March, confinement at Bhitarvar and rescue on 1 April, followed by the FIR on 2 April. The applicant relied on the reporting interval and her journey to the temple to contend that the relationship was consensual. The FIR attributed her silence and travel to fear. Delay may be explained; whether the threat explanation was credible and whether she went voluntarily were disputed questions for trial. Applying the Supreme Court's cautions against conducting a mini-trial under Section 482, including the observation in Kunwar Singh that an FIR need not be an encyclopedia, the Court held that the allegations, taken at face value, prima facie disclosed a cognizable offence. It declined to quash Crime No. 173/2020 or the trial, without determining guilt or finally deciding consent.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Raju Parihar applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash Crime No. 173/2020, registered at Police Station Karera, District Shivpuri, under Sections 376, 366, 342 and 506 IPC, and to terminate the criminal trial. The prosecutrix lodged her report on 2 April 2020 at 15:39. She alleged that, while she was alone at home at about 2 p.m. on 21 March, the applicant entered the house and raped her. He allegedly threatened to kill her and her brother if she told anyone, and she stated that fear prevented her from informing her family. On 29 March, he allegedly insisted that she come to Mangla Devi Temple to marry him and repeated the threat. She left home at about 4 p.m. on 30 March without informing anyone. According to the report, he took her from the temple to Bhitarvar and locked her in a rented room. Her neighbour Mohan Parihar reportedly rescued her on 1 April. She went to police outpost Sunari, her father was informed, and she returned home and described the events. The FIR was lodged the following day.

The applicant argued that the interval between 21 March and 2 April was substantial and that the prosecutrix's conduct showed consent, so no offence under Section 376 was disclosed. The State submitted that the adequacy of the explanation for the delay and the temple visit, and the question of consent, were disputed matters for the trial court. The High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 on 12 January 2022. The order concerned quashing and did not determine these allegations on evidence recorded at trial.

2. Precedents — Considered : Munshiram v State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, and Teeja Devi v State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, were quoted for caution against prematurely quashing an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence before completion of investigation, subject to exceptional cases of malicious and vexatious abuse. State of Orissa v Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, reproducing passages from Swapan Kumar Guha and Jeffrey J. Diermeier, explains the public interest in investigating a disclosed offence and the need to exercise inherent power sparingly to secure justice. XYZ v State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, and State of Tamil Nadu v S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, caution against a roving examination of disputed allegations under Section 482 when they must be established through investigation or trial. S. Khushboo v Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, reproduces the Bhajan Lal categories concerning absence of an offence and manifest mala fides. Sangeeta Agrawal v State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, requires the principles to be applied to the stated factual matrix.

Amit Kapoor v Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, was reproduced extensively on examining uncontroverted allegations and the basic ingredients of an offence without marshalling evidence, predicting conviction or accepting contested defence material at face value. Ajay Kumar Das v State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, emphasises the sparing exercise of power within the illustrative Bhajan Lal categories. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognises the limited exception permitting consideration of defence documents that are public documents or whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. State of A.P. v Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, and Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, balance prevention of abuse against interference with a genuine prosecution. Padal Venkata Rama Reddy reproduces the seven Bhajan Lal categories and discusses the limits on applying principles drawn from predominantly civil disputes. M. Srikanth v State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, addresses quashing where the allegations, taken at face value, disclose no offence. M.N. Ojha v Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, concerns truly absurd allegations used for harassment, while CBI v Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, disapproves findings on disputed facts at the quashing stage.

State of M.P. v Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal No. 709/2021, decided 30 June 2021, cautions against a detailed examination of evidence under Section 482 as though the Court were conducting a trial. It also states that an FIR need not be an exhaustive encyclopedia. Lalita Kumari v Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, was cited for the duty to register an FIR when the information discloses a cognizable offence. The Court applied these authorities to the disputes concerning delay and consent.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC governed the request to quash the FIR and criminal trial. At that stage, the Court considers whether the uncontroverted allegations disclose an offence and whether intervention is necessary to prevent clear abuse of process. It does not assess credibility or predict acquittal. Sections 376, 366, 342 and 506 IPC were the recorded allegations of rape, abduction, confinement and intimidation. Lalita Kumari was cited for the duty to register an FIR where the complaint discloses a cognizable offence. Sections 397, 228, 173(2), 156(1) and 155(2), appearing in the Supreme Court quotations, formed part of the discussion of the general principles governing quashing.

4. Issues : Was the interval of approximately twelve days between the alleged first assault and the FIR, by itself, fatal despite the specific explanation of threats and the later alleged rescue? Did the prosecutrix's journey to the temple establish voluntary sexual consent as an incontrovertible fact, or did her account that she went under threat require examination at trial? Did the uncontroverted allegations disclose cognizable offences of rape, abduction, confinement and intimidation, warranting rejection of quashing without assessing credibility or predicting conviction?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court held that delay in reporting does not, by itself, justify disbelieving the prosecution where the delay is plausibly explained. The FIR specifically attributed the prosecutrix's fear and failure to inform her family to the applicant's threats to kill her and her brother. It also described subsequent travel under threat, confinement and rescue. Whether fear adequately explained the reporting interval required assessment on the evidence. Deciding that issue under Section 482 would prematurely determine credibility and intrude on the trial.

The same limitation applied to consent. The applicant relied on the journey to the temple as showing voluntary participation, while the FIR attributed that journey to threats and described subsequent confinement in a locked room. Those competing accounts required findings on facts. The cited Supreme Court authorities, particularly Kunwar Singh, precluded a demand for encyclopedic detail in the FIR or a decision on consent based on weighing evidence under Section 482. Taking the FIR allegations at face value, the Court found a prima facie cognizable offence and declined to terminate the prosecution. Its reliance on Lalita Kumari concerned the duty to register an FIR disclosing a cognizable offence, rather than proof of guilt. The conclusion was procedural and provisional, leaving proof of the charges, credibility and consent for the trial court.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the application under Section 482 CrPC. Crime No. 173/2020 and the criminal trial under the stated IPC provisions were not quashed.

Raju Parihar v. State of Madhya Pradesh and others, M.Cr.C. no. 1868/2022, 12/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- NDPS Act — Section 67 statement — confessional use and police-officer bar - In the applicant's first application for bail under Section 439 CrPC, concerning 474 kg of ganja seized from a truck driven by a co-accused, the High Court applied Tofan Singh v. State of Tamil Nadu, Criminal Appeal No. 152/2013, decided 29.10.2020. Under the rule stated by the Supreme Court, NDPS officers exercising powers under Section 53 are police officers within Section 25 of the Evidence Act, and a statement recorded under Section 67 cannot be used as a confessional statement in an NDPS trial. The respondent's contention that Tofan Singh merely prevented conviction on a co-accused's confession, without affecting the statement's admissibility, was rejected. The co-accused Sonu's confession could not be used against this applicant in the present bail assessment. The applicant was apprehended at a dhaba, not in the truck, and the allegation of 13 calls was unsupported by call-detail records, which had not been collected. The Court also treated Sonu's statement described as having been made under Section 27 of the Evidence Act as inadmissible against this applicant. Bail was granted on stringent terms without deciding guilt or the merits of the trial.

Prison overcrowding during COVID-19 — release safeguards - The High Court also considered the Supreme Court's orders of 23.03.2020 and 07.04.2020 in In Re: Contagion of COVID 19 Virus in Prisons, Suo Motu W.P. (C) No. 1/2020. The order of 23.03.2020 required High Powered Committees in the States and Union Territories to determine which classes of prisoners were suitable for parole or interim bail in view of Article 21 and prison overcrowding; it did not itself make every prisoner eligible for release. The order of 07.04.2020 required arrangements for safe transit home or temporary shelter for prisoners released during lockdown. During the second wave, these considerations informed this particular bail order. Its safeguards included cash surety of ₹1,00,000, medical examination and testing if the doctor considered it necessary, hospital care if the applicant tested positive, and arrangements by the local administration for travel home if he was cleared, alongside compliance and appearance conditions.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The Narcotics Control Bureau, Indore, registered Crime No. 03/2020 for alleged offences under Sections 8/20(B)(ii)(C), 25, 27-A and 28 read with Section 29 of the NDPS Act, 1985. The applicant P. Laxman was arrested on 20.06.2020. According to the account advanced for the applicant, investigators stopped a truck from which 474 kg of ganja was seized; co-accused Sonu was driving it. The applicant was apprehended at a dhaba, rather than in the truck, allegedly on the strength of Sonu's confessional statement. These are the circumstances discussed in the bail order, rather than findings at trial on the charges.

In his first application under Section 439 CrPC, the applicant argued that Tofan Singh barred the use of a confession recorded under Section 67 of the NDPS Act and that no admissible material connected him with the seizure. He offered to comply with stringent conditions, including cash surety, and submitted that the trial would take considerable time and that he would neither abscond nor tamper with evidence. The respondent opposed bail, contending that Tofan Singh only prohibited conviction on a co-accused's statement and did not hold such a statement inadmissible. Counsel additionally asserted that the applicant and Sonu had spoken by mobile telephone 13 times, while conceding that call-detail records had not yet been collected. The Court had the case diary and heard the first bail application by video conferencing.

2. Precedents — Considered : Tofan Singh v. State of Tamil Nadu, Criminal Appeal No. 152/2013, decided 29.10.2020: the High Court quoted the Supreme Court's answer to the reference. The first part of that answer characterizes officers invested with powers under Section 53 of the NDPS Act as police officers for the purposes of Section 25 of the Evidence Act. A confession made to them is therefore barred under that provision and cannot be used to convict an accused under the NDPS Act. The second part states that a statement recorded under Section 67 of the NDPS Act cannot be used as a confessional statement at an NDPS trial. The High Court treated the Supreme Court's answer as directly governing Sonu's alleged confession and rejected the respondent's narrower characterization. It applied the principle at the preliminary bail stage, without purporting to decide guilt. It also treated Sonu's statement described as having been made under Section 27 of the Evidence Act as inadmissible against this applicant.

In Re: Contagion of COVID 19 Virus in Prisons, Suo Motu W.P. (C) No. 1/2020, orders of 23.03.2020 and 07.04.2020: the first Supreme Court order, quoted by the High Court, addressed overcrowding and the concern under Article 21 arising from the spread of COVID-19 in prisons. It directed States and Union Territories to constitute High Powered Committees to determine categories of prisoners for parole or interim bail. The committees could consider the nature of the offence, punishment, sentence and other relevant factors. The quoted direction left the relevant categories to the High Powered Committees, mentioning offences punishable with up to seven years' imprisonment as an example. The second order required the Union and States/Union Territories to make safe transit or temporary shelter available to released prisoners during lockdown. The High Court relied on the first order when considering prison decongestion during the second wave. Its release order gave effect to the second order through directions for examination, testing if necessary and travel arrangements by the local administration.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC supplied jurisdiction for the first application for regular bail; the order also maintained the conditions under Sections 437 and 439. The cited NDPS charge provisions were Sections 8/20(B)(ii)(C), 25, 27-A, 28 and 29. Sections 53 and 67 of the NDPS Act were relevant to the evidentiary issue under Tofan Singh: officers invested with powers under Section 53 were treated as police officers for the purposes of Section 25 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and statements recorded under Section 67 could not be used as confessions in an NDPS trial. The High Court also referred to Section 27 of the Evidence Act while declining to use Sonu's statement against the applicant. Article 21 formed the constitutional context of the Supreme Court's prison-decongestion order. The Disaster Management Act, 2005 was mentioned in the quoted Supreme Court transit direction as one possible source of directions by the Central Government.

4. Issues : (i) Whether, in assessing this applicant's first regular-bail request, the prosecution could rely on Sonu's alleged confessional statement under Section 67 NDPS Act in the face of the Supreme Court's decision in Tofan Singh, and whether the respondent's restrictive reading of that decision was tenable. (ii) What, if any, independent material connected the applicant, apprehended away from the truck, to the seizure when the respondent asserted 13 telephone conversations but conceded that call details had not been collected. (iii) Whether the applicant should be released under stringent conditions in the circumstances, including the second wave of COVID-19 and the Supreme Court's prison-decongestion and safe-transit directions.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the principal evidentiary issue, the Court reproduced both parts of the Supreme Court's answer in Tofan Singh. It expressly disagreed with the respondent's submission that the Supreme Court had not held a statement recorded under Section 67 inadmissible as a confession. Because Sonu's alleged statement was confessional, the Court concluded that it could not be used against this applicant in the bail assessment. That conclusion applied whether the statement was described as having been made under Section 67 of the NDPS Act or, in the Court's wording, under Section 27 of the Evidence Act.

The applicant was undisputedly not in the seized truck; the prosecution's own account placed him at a dhaba. The Court found the asserted telephone link unsatisfactory as presented: respondent's counsel simultaneously asserted that the complaint referred to 13 calls and conceded that call-detail records had not been collected. The Court therefore declined to treat either the co-accused's confession or the unsupported assertion of calls as establishing the connection relied on to oppose release.

Considering these circumstances, the Court held that the applicant could be released only on stringent conditions. It further noted the second COVID-19 wave and the need to decongest prisons, quoting the Supreme Court's March 2020 direction for High Powered Committees and its April 2020 safe-transit direction. It expressly refrained from commenting on the merits.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the first application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC. P. Laxman v. Union of India, M.Cr.C. no. 10079/2021, 27/04/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (522) Prev Next

Headnote :- Murder — Section 300 thirdly — intentional injury sufficient to cause death - The High Court discussed Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, with Anda v. State of Rajasthan, 1966 CrLJ 171, on proof that the particular injury was intentionally inflicted and that, assessed objectively, it was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. An intention to kill is unnecessary under clause Thirdly once the prosecution proves each of its distinct elements. Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, and State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, including the latter’s discussion of Arun Raj, Ashokkumar Magabhai Vankar and Leela Ram, reject a mechanical inference based on the number of blows and direct attention to the weapon, force used, vital part struck and circumstances. The Court introduced these rules before the evidence analysis; its final acquittal turned on failure to prove who caused the injuries, rather than a finding that the test of intentional injury was satisfied or that a single blow legally excludes murder.

Culpable homicide — Sections 299, 300 and 304 — intention and knowledge - The Court quoted Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeals 1078–1079/2005, on the successive inquiries under Sections 299 and 300 and the distinction between intention under Section 304 Part I and knowledge without that intention under Part II; Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, on the non-exhaustive circumstances from which intention may be inferred; and Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, as an illustration involving a forceful crowbar strike on the skull. The discussion set out how the offence might be classified. It was not applied to alter the conviction to one for a lesser offence because the identity of the assailants was not proved.

Sudden fight — Section 300 Exception 4 — cumulative requirements - Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, was reproduced on a fight involving mutual provocation, absence of premeditation, heat of passion, and absence of undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. Kanhaiyalal's quotation of Leela Ram reiterated these requirements, all of which must be satisfied. The High Court did not find these facts established or grant Exception 4 relief; the prosecution's evidence of the assault itself failed.

Common intention — Section 34 IPC — participation and concert - The Court discussed Suresh Sankharam Nangare v. State of Maharashtra, 2012 (9) SCALE 345, Shyamal Ghosh v. State of West Bengal, AIR 2012 SC 3539, Mrinal Das v. State of Tripura, AIR 2011 SC 3753, and Ramashish Yadav v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 1083, on joint participation and common intention. Common intention may form at the spur of the moment but cannot be inferred from mere association. Hem Raj v. Delhi (Administration), AIR 1990 SC 2252, Dashrathlal v. State of Gujarat, 1979 CrLJ 1078 (SC), Rajagopalswamy Konar v. State of Tamil Nadu, 1994 CrLJ 2195 (SC), and Sheikh Nabab v. State of Maharashtra, 1993 CrLJ 43 (SC), illustrated the limits of liability where a co-accused's role or common intention is not proved. The present Court did not sustain the alleged collective assault.

Hearsay — village informant and basis of report - Heera (PW-3) had seen Veer Singh's body but learned the accusation against the appellants from Ramkrishna Raghuvanshi, whom the prosecution did not examine. The High Court treated the allegation repeated by Heera as hearsay, declined to rely on it to identify the attackers, and held that the Dehati Nalishi and FIR, based on that untested source, had no evidentiary value in support of the prosecution's account in this case.

Eyewitness credibility — related witnesses — physical corroboration and reasonable doubt - Although post-mortem evidence proved homicidal death by blunt-force head injury, the Court found the prosecution's case based on purported eyewitnesses unreliable: Komal Bai's account of the location and her claim to have been the only person present conflicted with the spot map and other claimed eyewitnesses; no blood or drag marks supported the claim that the body had been dragged along the alleged route; lathi recoveries from all accused were inconsistent with the prosecution's account of only Phoolabai using one. Taken together, these defects meant that the surviving appellants' individual or joint responsibility was not established beyond reasonable doubt. Their Sections 302 and 302/34 convictions were set aside and they were acquitted; the separately dealt-with juvenile Halke was not the subject of a further operative order.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 8 May 2000 Veer Singh, husband of Phoolabai and father of Kalyan Singh and Halke, sustained bleeding head injuries and died. Phoolabai and the sons were said to have assaulted him in a public area near the home of daughter Komal Bai and her husband Basora and then taken or dragged his body to their house. It was accepted that the deceased bore head injuries and was moved to the accused persons' house, but the fact of their assault was contested. On 9 May village Kotwar Heera (PW-3) reported an allegation received from Ramkrishna Raghuvanshi; Heera had seen the body but had not witnessed the attack. A Dehati Nalishi and police report followed. The investigation recorded witness accounts, prepared inquest and site maps, seized blood-stained soil and clothes, and recovered lathis from the three accused after memoranda. Dr Mahesh Chand (PW-12) found nine injuries, including facial and parietal lacerations, and attributed death to head injury affecting the brain from a hard blunt object.

The First Additional Sessions Judge, Guna, in Sessions Trial 229/2000 on 31 October 2000 convicted each appellant separately under Section 302 IPC and under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC, imposing concurrent life sentences and ₹5,000 fine on each count, with six months' simple imprisonment in default of each fine. Phoolabai, Kalyan and Halke appealed under Section 374 CrPC in Criminal Appeal 744/2000. Pending appeal, the Juvenile Justice Board found Halke a juvenile on the date of the incident and subsequently acquitted him in a separate proceeding; it found Kalyan not juvenile. A High Court order of 19 February 2019 accordingly recorded that no further appellate order was required for Halke. The present merits decision concerns Phoolabai and Kalyan.

They disputed both the alleged intention and the allegation that they had committed the assault. The defence challenged Komal Bai's vantage point and conduct, inconsistencies among purported eyewitnesses, the unexamined source Ramkrishna, absent independent roadside witnesses, absence of drag marks or road blood, and the recovery of three lathis despite the prosecution version that only Phoolabai used one. The defence also relied on the prosecution witnesses' admission that Kalyan was barehanded. The State defended the convictions. These were submissions to be tested against evidence, not accepted facts. Phoolabai had been on bail after a 30 July 2018 suspension order; a 12 August 2021 jail report showed Kalyan remained imprisoned.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, was quoted at length for Section 300 Thirdly. The prosecution must establish the existence and nature of the bodily injury and the accused's intention to inflict the particular injury found; the sufficiency of that injury to cause death in the ordinary course is assessed objectively. The quoted rule retains the prosecution burden throughout and distinguishes intent to inflict the injury from intent to kill or awareness of its fatal seriousness. Anda v. State of Rajasthan, 1966 CrLJ 171, was discussed in the same context on whether the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, with the weapon and the part of the body being relevant. These authorities framed the Court's account of the homicide law; they did not establish the identity of an assailant in this case.

Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeals 1078–1079 of 2005, was quoted on the sequence of inquiry under Sections 299 and 300, including the exceptions, and the distinction between Section 304 Part I, which turns on intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death, and Part II, which turns on knowledge without that intention. Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, set out a non-exhaustive list of factors for carefully inferring intention: the weapon and its availability, the vital part targeted, force, sudden quarrel, prior animosity, provocation, heat of passion, unfair advantage and number of blows. Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, illustrated inference of intention from a forceful crowbar blow causing skull fractures. The High Court set out these tests of intention and knowledge, but did not alter the conviction to one under Part I or Part II or find that the defendants had inflicted the fatal injury.

Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, rejected a categorical rule that one blow excludes Section 302; weapon, vital site, manner and circumstances determine the requisite state of mind. State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, was quoted with its discussions of Arun Raj v. Union of India, (2010) 6 SCC 457, Ashokkumar Magabhai Vankar v. State of Gujarat, (2011) 10 SCC 604, and Leela Ram on single-blow assessment and, for Leela Ram, Exception 4. Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, rejected classification of an offence mechanically on the basis of a single injury; its quotation also discussed State of Karnataka v. Vedanayagam, (1995) 1 SCC 326, and further passages from Virsa Singh on the separate inquiries into intention and the sufficiency of the injury to cause death, including the possibility of an accidental injury unlike that intended. Those authorities were reproduced within the quoted decisions, not separately applied to the facts. The Court's actual result did not depend on counting the blows.

Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, was reproduced on Exception 4 to Section 300: a sudden fight involving both sides in the heat of passion, without premeditation, undue advantage, or cruel or unusual conduct; a quarrel alone is insufficient. Kanhaiyalal's quoted Leela Ram passage expressed the same cumulative conditions. The High Court did not find a specific appellant proved to have fought Veer Singh and did not grant the exception.

On Section 34, Suresh Sankharam Nangare v. State of Maharashtra, 2012 (9) SCALE 345, was cited for proof of common intention with participation, without a requirement of a separately attributed overt blow, but with prior concert. Shyamal Ghosh v. State of West Bengal, AIR 2012 SC 3539, and Mrinal Das v. State of Tripura, AIR 2011 SC 3753, were cited on a concerted plan and the prosecution's burden to prove joint participation. Ramashish Yadav v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 1083, allowed common intention to develop at the spur of the moment while requiring a meeting of minds. Hem Raj v. Delhi (Administration), AIR 1990 SC 2252, illustrated acquittal of other accused whose participation was disbelieved when one assailant alone was proved; Dashrathlal v. State of Gujarat, 1979 CrLJ 1078 (SC), said mere accompaniment does not attract Section 34. Rajagopalswamy Konar v. State of Tamil Nadu, 1994 CrLJ 2195 (SC), illustrated liability according to each accused's role in the offence, rather than liability of all alike under Section 302/34; Sheikh Nabab v. State of Maharashtra, 1993 CrLJ 43 (SC), was cited for failure to prove the attributed overt act. Bijay Singh v. State of M.B., 1956 CrLJ 897, was cited on the Court's formulation requiring presence and prior concert. None of these precedents was treated as a replacement for proof of the appellants' actual participation.

The rejection of the witnesses and the hearsay informant was the High Court's own case-specific evidentiary assessment, not an extension of the quoted homicide authorities.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC provided the appellate route against conviction. IPC Sections 299 and 300 supplied the culpable-homicide and murder definitions; the Court set out Section 300's four clauses, particularly clause Thirdly, and discussed the statutory exceptions through Exception 4. Section 302 was the substantive murder charge and the provision under which the trial court convicted the appellants. Section 304 Parts I and II appeared as possible lesser classifications in the legal discussion, with intention and knowledge differentiated, but neither part was the final disposition. Section 34 IPC supplied the basis of the charge of constructive liability: criminal act by several persons, participation in its doing, and furtherance of common intention were discussed. The Court quoted Section 8 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, on motive, preparation and conduct; it made no separate finding that accused conduct proved the murder. A Juvenile Justice Board inquiry and Halke's separate acquittal were reported procedurally, without interpretation of any cited juvenile justice enactment.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the post-mortem and other evidence established a homicidal death, and, separately, whether Phoolabai or Kalyan had caused or joined the fatal assault. (ii) If a particular assailant were proved, what mental element and injury-sufficiency tests under IPC Sections 299 and 300, including possible Exception 4 and Section 304, would govern classification; the failure to prove who committed the assault ultimately made it unnecessary to determine a lesser offence. (iii) Whether common intention under Section 34 and participation in the criminal act had been proved for each surviving appellant, as distinct from familial association and being involved in moving the body. (iv) Whether the Kotwar's report from an unexamined source, Komal Bai and other claimed eyewitnesses, scene and recovery evidence collectively met the criminal standard of proof. (v) What appellate relief was due for Phoolabai and Kalyan, given Halke's separately adjudicated juvenile status.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted homicidal death. Dr Mahesh Chand's post-mortem described facial, head, chest, elbow and ankle injuries, including bone-deep parietal wounds, and attributed death to a head injury affecting the brain, caused by hard blunt force. There was no dispute that Veer Singh had bled from the head and been moved to the house. Those observations established the cause and homicidal nature of death, rather than the identity of the assailants.

The Court first set out the statutory and Supreme Court tests that would apply if the offender's identity were proved. Virsa Singh requires proof of intentional infliction of the particular injury and objective sufficiency of that injury to cause death in the ordinary course of nature; single-blow precedents make context rather than blow count decisive. Arun Nivalaji More and Pulicherla Nagaraju distinguish intention and knowledge, while Dhirajbhai states Exception 4's cumulative conditions. Section 34 requires both proof of a joint criminal act or contribution to it and common intention; separate blows by everyone are unnecessary, mere presence or association insufficient. The Court did not go on to determine whether the conviction should be altered to a lesser offence, because it found that the appellants' commission of the assault had not been proved.

Heera (PW-3) personally observed the body but learned the supposed perpetrators' identities from Ramkrishna Raghuvanshi, whom the prosecution did not call. The Court treated the account he repeated as hearsay and declined to rely on the Dehati Nalishi and FIR to establish the accusation. Komal Bai (PW-1), presented as the direct observer, placed the beating at her doorway while the spot map located her house farther away. Her account that no one else was present and that Nanda and Pran Singh arrived after the event undermined their claim to have witnessed the incident; the claim that Ramkali and Basora were eyewitnesses was likewise rejected. The Court additionally viewed Komal Bai's failure to intervene or visit her father as unnatural in the particular setting, and noted that no independent roadside observer was examined. These are the Court's reasons for disbelieving these witnesses, rather than a legal rule applicable in every case concerning a relative's conduct.

The claimed dragging of a bleeding body along a public road was unsupported by road blood stains or drag marks. Witness accounts differed on whether the body was inside or in front of the accused persons' house. Lathis recovered from every accused did not accord with the prosecution account that Phoolabai alone used a lathi while Kalyan and Halke used fists and kicks. The Court treated moving the body into a family house, rather than concealing it, as another reason to doubt the account. Prathi Singh (PW-9) spoke of peaceful relations. The Court held that the gaps and inconsistencies, taken together, prevented proof beyond reasonable doubt of Phoolabai's and Kalyan's individual or joint guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal under Section 374 insofar as it concerned the remaining appellants, Phoolabai and Kalyan Singh. The Sessions Trial 229/2000 convictions and concurrent life sentences under Sections 302 and 302/34 IPC were set aside; Phoolabai and Kalyan Singh were acquitted of both charges. Phoolabai's bail bonds, following earlier suspension of her sentence, were discharged and she was not required to appear further in this case. Kalyan Singh, recorded as still in Central Jail, Gwalior, was directed to be released forthwith if he was not required in another case. The judgment and trial record were to be sent back. Halke had already been found juvenile on the date of the incident and acquitted by the Juvenile Justice Board; the High Court expressly passed no further order in this appeal concerning him. No alternative Section 304 conviction was entered.

Headnote :- Successive regular bail — examined witnesses — complete assessment - In a sixth application under Section 439 CrPC, following rejection of the previous application on the merits on 02.03.2020, completion of material eyewitness examination did not itself require release. The witnesses supported the prosecution; the reduced risk of future tampering was only one factor. The nature and gravity of the charges under Sections 302/307 IPC and the Arms Act, supporting material, the possibility of a life sentence, securing presence at trial and the interests of justice also required consideration. The Court applied its order in Bhupat Singh v. State of M.P., MCRC 14129/2018, which quoted Virupakshappa Gouda v. State of Karnataka, (2017) 5 SCC 406. That Supreme Court decision, citing Chaman Lal, Prasanta Kumar Sarkar and CBI v. V. Vijay Sai Reddy, set out the factors governing a prima facie inquiry at the bail stage, which does not require proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Its quotations from Neeru Yadav and Dinesh M.N. warned against arbitrary grants of bail and reliance on irrelevant material. The High Court stated that its Bhupat Singh order had been affirmed by the Supreme Court's order of 21.06.2018 in SLP (Crl.) No. 5103/2018. Three years' custody did not outweigh the other factors in view of the serious charges in the present case.

Bail-stage evidence — witness credibility — limits - The applicant asked the Court to infer that the witnesses were unreliable because they allegedly chose which accused to implicate. The Court declined to assess that contention on the merits in this bail application. Applying Satish Jaggi v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2007) 11 SCC 195, the Court declined to examine their reliability and credibility at this stage. In the earlier Bhupat Singh reasoning, Dinesh M.N. (S.P.) v. State of Gujarat, (2008) 5 SCC 66, was invoked against a bail order based on irrelevant factors. The rejection of bail is provisional and does not pre-judge witness truthfulness or ultimate guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pradeep Singh was arrested on 9 June 2017 in Crime 435/2017 at Police Station Janakganj, Gwalior, concerning allegations under IPC Sections 302 and 307 and Arms Act Sections 25/27. A prior bail application had been rejected on the merits on 2 March 2020 in MCRC 7414/2020. In this sixth Section 439 CrPC application, heard finally by video conference with the case diary available, counsel argued that prosecution witnesses had testified, so tampering was no longer possible. Counsel also attacked their reliability for allegedly supporting the prosecution selectively against some accused. The order acknowledges that the examined witnesses supported the prosecution. Roughly three years of pre-trial custody was also in issue. The State was represented by a panel lawyer.

2. Precedents — Considered : The High Court expressly reproduced its earlier Bhupat Singh v. State of M.P., MCRC 14129/2018, order of 11 May 2018 as the relevant ruling on whether testimony already recorded alone justifies bail. Bhupat Singh had quoted Virupakshappa Gouda and Another v. State of Karnataka, (2017) 5 SCC 406, on the factors to be considered in a bail inquiry: prima facie grounds and the nature of supporting evidence, seriousness and potential punishment, absconding and repeat offence concerns, witness influence, and the interests of justice. Virupakshappa reproduced factors from Chaman Lal v. State of U.P., Prasanta Kumar Sarkar v. Ashis Chatterjee and CBI v. V. Vijay Sai Reddy. The quoted Vijay Sai Reddy passage expressly distinguishes reasonable grounds and prima facie evidence at bail from proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Virupakshappa further quoted Neeru Yadav v. State of U.P. on the lawful limits of liberty in the interests of society, and Dinesh M.N. v. State of Gujarat on the vulnerability of an order that disregards relevant material and relies on irrelevant material. These authorities appear through the quoted Supreme Court and High Court passages; the present Court adopted their framework of relevant bail factors through Bhupat Singh, rather than separately deciding a bail-cancellation proceeding under each nested case.

Bhupat Singh additionally discussed Dinesh M.N. (S.P.) v. State of Gujarat, (2008) 5 SCC 66, directly on the danger of ignoring grave allegations and sentence merely because witnesses had testified. The present Court endorsed that reasoning in this sixth application. It noted that the Supreme Court had affirmed Bhupat Singh by an order of 21 June 2018 in SLP (Crl.) 5103/2018, Bhupat Singh Rawat v. State of Madhya Pradesh.

Satish Jaggi v. State of Chhattisgarh and Others, (2007) 11 SCC 195, was directly applied to decline the requested examination on the merits of prosecution witnesses' reliability and credibility at the bail stage. The Court declined to examine witness reliability and credibility at the bail stage.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC supplied jurisdiction for the sixth application for regular bail. IPC Sections 302 and 307 and Arms Act Sections 25/27 were the alleged offences; the High Court treated their seriousness and the potential life sentence for murder as bail factors, without adjudicating offence ingredients or Arms Act proof. The quoted decisions explain the ordinary prima facie inquiry under Section 439 and that proof meeting the trial standard is not required at the stage of considering release.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the examination of material prosecution witnesses, coupled with the reduced risk of influencing them, furnished a sufficient change to grant bail after a prior merits rejection, despite their supporting testimony and the seriousness of the accusations. (ii) Whether their allegedly selective testimony concerning different accused could be assessed as unreliable in this bail proceeding, rather than by the trial court. (iii) What weight the approximately three years' pre-trial detention carried against charges that could result in life imprisonment.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court relied on Bhupat Singh and the Supreme Court framework for bail reproduced in that decision. The disappearance or reduction of a concern about future tampering after a witness has testified does not, by itself, determine whether release is justified. The bail court must consider the prosecution's prima facie support, the gravity of the offence and potential sentence, securing presence at trial, potential interference and the interests of justice together. Here, witnesses already examined had supported the prosecution, the previous application had failed on merits, and the charges included murder and attempted murder. The Court concluded that witness examination alone did not warrant granting bail after the earlier rejection. It noted the Supreme Court's later affirmation of Bhupat Singh.

The assertion that witnesses were unreliable because they did not implicate every accused alike asked the bail court to decide credibility. Under Satish Jaggi the Court declined that detailed assessment at this stage. It did not declare the testimony true for final adjudication; its assessment remains for the trial court under the governing standard of proof. The Court also found that three years of detention did not, in the circumstances of a prosecution carrying life imprisonment, by itself suffice for release.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the sixth application for regular bail under Section 439 CrPC.

Pradeep Singh v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 25682/2020, 13/08/2020, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR delay — explanation and evidentiary effect - Sher Singh v. State of Haryana, (2015) 3 SCC 724, was considered on the principle that a delayed report need not be treated as fabricated if the delay is satisfactorily explained. Following the appellant's repeated stone assault on Prabhu and attempted attack on Kamlesh, she fled with two minor sons to Jigani, sought help from relatives, and only then lodged the FIR about five hours later. The Court accepted this sequence of seeking safety and then reporting as an adequate explanation; delay alone did not discredit the eyewitness account.

Alibi — Section 11 Evidence Act — positive proof and continuing prosecution burden - Applying Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, and its quotation of Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, the Court distinguished the prosecution's continuing duty to establish the accused's presence from the accused's burden, once that presence is proved, to establish that he was elsewhere and could not have been at the scene. Defence evidence of sufficient quality may still raise reasonable doubt. The bridge attendance register lacked the supervisor's signature, and his purported supervisory position was not proved. The worksite near Jigani was open. These features did not establish that the appellant could not have been at the place of the killing. The alibi was rejected for want of adequate proof; its rejection did not reverse the prosecution's burden.

Murder and culpable homicide — sudden attack — Sections 302 and 304 Part I IPC - Lavghanbhai Devjibhai Vasava v. State of Gujarat, (2018) 4 SCC 329, quoting Dhirendra Kumar v. State of Uttarakhand, set out the relevant contextual factors: how the incident began and whether it occurred in the heat of passion, whether the weapon was brought or picked up, the vital part targeted, force, prior enmity, provocation and undue advantage. The Court found a sudden confrontation over Kamlesh's departure, an unarmed appellant who picked up stones at the site, and repeated blows causing grave head injuries. It found that the culpable homicide was committed in the heat of passion and substituted a conviction under Section 304 Part I for the Section 302 conviction, imposing the 11½ years already served and ₹3,000 fine with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Kamlesh Adivasi, widowed after Banna's death and subsequently living as the appellant Prahalad's wife, set out with her young children and Prabhu, the brother of her father-in-law from the first marriage, toward Harinagar on 5 June 2010. Her FIR described a quarrel about the appellant's liquor consumption. Her testimony additionally spoke of earlier drinking-related assaults and a strained relationship, though some details of motive and the precise quarrel differed from the FIR and police statement. The appellant met and followed the group near Chharch. At about 3:30 –4 p.m. near Sumer Pond he threw Prabhu down and struck his head with stones, according to Kamlesh and her eight-year-old son Risdam (PW-2). Kamlesh said he tried to attack her when she intervened; she fled with the children to Jigani, notified relatives and then reported at Police Station Chharch at about 9:10 p.m. The five-hour interval and differing prior accounts were contested.

Crime 28/2010 was registered under IPC Section 302. Investigators mapped the site, recovered ten large and small blood-stained stones and soil, obtained the post-mortem and, after the appellant's arrest on 8 June 2010, seized blood-stained clothes. Dr Chandrashekhar Gupta (PW-3) recorded bilateral parietal hematomas, a mastoid laceration, compound fractures of both parietal bones and temporal bone, extradural hemorrhage and brain laceration. He attributed coma and death to the head trauma, found the death homicidal and rejected the suggested accidental vehicle impact or simple fall. Several relatives recounted what Kamlesh later told them; the Court treated them as hearsay on the attack, not additional eyewitnesses. Risdam's direct account contained no material discrepancy identified by the defence.

The Sessions Judge, Shivpuri, in Sessions Trial 127/2010 on 22 December 2010 convicted Prahalad under Section 302 and imposed life imprisonment with ₹1,000 fine and three months' rigorous imprisonment in default. In this Section 374 CrPC appeal he disputed the FIR timing, raised alibi through bridge supervisor Rajendra Awasthy (DW-1) and an attendance register, and alternatively sought Section 304 Part I treatment and a sentence limited to the period already spent in custody, over eleven and a half years. The State accepted that the confrontation was sudden but emphasized repeated fatal blows to the head. The appellant had not been released on bail during trial or appeal.

2. Precedents — Considered : Sher Singh v. State of Haryana, (2015) 3 SCC 724, was quoted on claimed FIR delay: the Supreme Court had held that a report lodged after ten hours, on the day after the incident, was not automatically to be treated as inordinately delayed, fabricated or an afterthought, in view of the journey and the family's need to come to terms with the tragedy. The High Court applied the conditional principle that mere delay does not vitiate a prosecution if satisfactorily explained and applied it to Kamlesh's escape with minor children and intervening contact with relatives before police reporting.

Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, was directly considered on alibi. Its reproduced Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar passage explains that alibi is a rule under Section 11 of the Evidence Act concerning the relevance of facts inconsistent with the fact in issue, not an IPC exception; the prosecution must always prove presence at the scene and participation, and only after satisfactorily doing so does the accused carry a substantial burden to prove a location incompatible with presence at the scene. Even then reliable defence evidence raising reasonable doubt about presence benefits the accused. Mukesh said the principle was reiterated in Gurpreet Singh, Sk. Sattar, Jitender Kumar and Vijay Pal. The High Court applied the test to the attendance register's evidentiary defects and the open nearby worksite, finding that presence at the scene had not been shown to be impossible, without shifting the prosecution's original burden.

Lavghanbhai Devjibhai Vasava v. State of Gujarat, (2018) 4 SCC 329, quoted Dhirendra Kumar v. State of Uttarakhand for factors distinguishing murder from culpable homicide: the encounter's circumstances, weapon type and whether it was carried or picked up, choice of vital part and force, participation in a sudden fight, previous enmity or sudden provocation, heat of passion and undue advantage or cruel conduct. The High Court expressly used those considerations to weigh stones available on the ground, repeated fatal head injury, the appellant's fear of losing Kamlesh and the sudden encounter.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal. Section 302 IPC was the provision under which the appellant was charged and convicted at trial; the appellate court considered the homicide's legal nature and substituted Section 304 Part I. The medical evidence and witness accounts supported causation and participation; the Court's discussion of intention and heat of passion led to the lesser classification. Section 11 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, entered through Mukesh/Binay Kumar Singh as the basis for the relevance of facts inconsistent with presence at the scene when an alibi is claimed. The Court did not apply a statutory presumption that a failed alibi proves guilt, or alter the prosecution's burden at trial.

4. Issues : (i) Whether Prabhu's death was homicidal and whether Kamlesh and Risdam's account, with the medical and scene evidence, established Prahalad as the assailant despite differences in narrated motive and blow count. (ii) Whether the approximately five-hour interval in lodging the FIR signalled fabrication or was explained by the witness's flight to protect herself and her children and the subsequent reporting sequence. (iii) Whether the bridge-work attendance evidence demonstrated an alibi incompatible with the direct evidence of presence. (iv) Whether a sudden confrontation, on-site stones and surrounding marital tension warranted substituting Section 304 Part I for the conviction under Section 302, notwithstanding repeated blows to the head, and what sentence then followed.

5. Ratio / Findings : The post-mortem's severe multiple head injuries, fractures, extradural hemorrhage and brain laceration established homicidal death and contradicted the suggested accidental impact or fall. Kamlesh directly described the stone attack and the attempted attack on her that led her to flee. Her son Risdam independently related the occurrence; the defence showed no material discrepancy in his evidence. The Court recognized that other relatives were told of the event afterward and did not treat them as direct eyewitnesses. It noted particular shifts or omissions in Kamlesh's account of earlier domestic discord, immediate quarrel and the number of stones, but the core assertion of assault with stones remained supported by the child and medical evidence. Ten blood-stained stones and soil were seized from the scene, although no reliable weight of each stone was proved.

On reporting time, the Court followed the approach in Sher Singh, which requires consideration of the facts. After the fatal attack and the attempt to attack her, Kamlesh prioritized the safety of herself and her sons, went to Jigani, contacted Pillu and Shrichand, and then accompanied relatives to view the body and report. That sequence explained the approximately five hours. The interval did not, without other proof, establish that the prosecution's account had been fabricated.

On alibi, the Court first accepted positive prosecution evidence of the appellant's presence at the scene. DW-1 purported to be bridge supervisor and brought an attendance register, but it omitted his signature despite a signature column and carried no serial number; he produced no independent document establishing his supervisory role. In any event, the bridge work was near Jigani in an open area, so attending work did not make a trip to the incident site impossible. Applying Mukesh and Binay Kumar Singh, the Court found the defence had not credibly established that the appellant was at a location incompatible with his presence at the scene. That rejection did not alone establish participation; the eyewitness and medical evidence provided the affirmative basis for that finding.

For offence classification, the Court considered the contextual factors in Lavghanbhai and Dhirendra Kumar. The appellant met and followed Kamlesh, who was leaving with Prabhu; he feared she might not return. He carried no weapon and used stones at the scene. The injuries were grave and repeated—about three blows inferred by the Court—but the weight of the stones was unproved and the scalp bones, though compound fractured, were not described as crushed. The Court nevertheless found that the incident occurred suddenly, in the heat of passion, and warranted a conviction under Section 304 Part I rather than Section 302.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court partly allowed the appeal. The appellant was acquitted of the Section 302 charge and convicted under Section 304 Part I IPC. Having been continuously in custody since 8 June 2010 for over eleven and a half years, he was sentenced to the period of imprisonment already undergone plus ₹3,000 fine, with three months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The Court ordered his immediate release if he was not required in another case, directed that he receive a free copy, and ordered the return of the trial record. The judgment also described the trial sentence as affirmed "with aforesaid modification".

Prahalad v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 72/2011, 03/02/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Deepak Kumar Agarwal, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Inherent power — Section 482 CrPC — face-value offence test - The Court considered Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, and XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, on restraint in quashing proceedings where an offence is disclosed and in deciding matters requiring investigation. S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, and Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, set out the Bhajan Lal categories, the exceptional grounds for preventing abuse of process, and the caution against arbitrary assessments of credibility. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, further distinguished the existence of a factual foundation for prosecution from an assessment, resembling a trial, of the likelihood of conviction; M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, and State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, recognise that quashing may be justified where the allegations, taken at face value, disclose no offence. The applicants established no such ground for quashing proceedings arising from the alleged wrongful confinement of a public official and others during MGNREGA monitoring. The Court applied the cited authorities to determine the scope of interference without making a finding of guilt.

Quashing — claimed political enmity — cognizable allegations - M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, recognises the power to intervene against inherently improbable complaints that result in oppression, while cautioning against routine interruption of prosecution. Renu Kumari, adopting Bhajan Lal and State of Orissa v. Saroj Kumar Sahoo, and Padal Venkata Rama Reddy's account of Saroj Kumar Sahoo, distinguish manifestly malicious prosecution from a mere allegation that the informant is hostile. The Court held that asserted political vendetta could not be adjudicated under Section 482 where the allegations themselves disclosed a cognizable offence; it left questions of motive and culpability to be determined in the ordinary course of the proceedings.

No mini-trial — disputed defence video — Section 207 CD - Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognises a limited exception permitting consideration of defence documents that are public documents or whose veracity is undisputed, while State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Cr.A. 709/2021 (30 June 2021), caution against deciding disputed facts or meticulously assessing evidence at the Section 482 stage. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, likewise cautions against roving inquiry. The applicants had not filed the CD supplied under Section 207 CrPC; their claim that they did not appear in the prosecution videograph could be tested by questioning witnesses at trial, but could not be decided in this petition. The Court made no finding on the authenticity of the video or the applicants' guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Arvind Mishra, describing himself as a sub-engineer at Janpad Panchayat Niwas in Mandla district, reported that at about 8:30 a.m. on 13 May 2020 he went to monitor work under MGNREGA at Gram Panchayat Bhikampur. According to his complaint, near petitioner Prahlad Gothiya's field Prahlad, his wife (petitioner no. 2 and Up-Sarpanch), and Ved Sharan Mishra caught Mishra, Sarpanch Lakhan Gotiya, Gram Rozgar Sahayak Bihari Lal Redhas and Virendra Pandey and tied them to a tree with rope. Labourers allegedly witnessed the event. Mishra said he called the Janpad Panchayat Chief Executive Officer, and about an hour later the Vice President of the Janpad Panchayat, Sanjeet Pandey, came with police and untied him. Crime No. 56/2020 was registered at Police Station Niwas under IPC Sections 342 and 353 read with Section 34. The report contained allegations; the Court did not determine the accused's participation or whether the ingredients of the offences were proved.

The applicants said the report was false and politically motivated. They claimed that a videograph taken by villagers and filed by the prosecution with the charge sheet showed that the villagers, rather than the applicants, had tied the officials; they also argued they did not appear in the footage. They invoked Section 482 CrPC to challenge the order dated 25 November 2023 passed by the Additional Sessions Judge, Niwas, District Mandla, in Criminal Revision No. 9/21. The High Court heard counsel for the petitioners and examined the limits of interference under its inherent powers without trying the charges.

2. Precedents — Considered : Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, cautioned against prematurely quashing an FIR before proper police investigation, unless continuation would amount to an abuse of process. Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, emphasised that investigation of a prima facie cognizable offence should ordinarily proceed, subject to exceptional cases of malicious or vexatious prosecution. State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, quoted Swapan Kumar Guha on the need for investigation to collect evidence of a disclosed offence, and Jeffrey J. Diermeier on the three purposes of Section 482 and the cautious exercise of its wide powers. The High Court quoted these principles on the limits of deciding factual questions at this stage. XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, rejected a roving inquiry into contested allegations before investigation into the facts had run its course; State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, cautioned against evaluating the material prematurely. These authorities address the limits of interference at the relevant stage; they do not determine the particular allegations in the present case.

S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, reproduced the Bhajan Lal categories concerning allegations that disclose no prima facie offence and proceedings manifestly attended by mala fides and stressed that genuinely untenable complaints should be stopped without suppressing a genuine prosecution. Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, called for explaining facts, governing principles and reasons in a quashing order; the High Court quoted that principle. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, set out principles governing the quashing of charges under Sections 397 and 482: consider the uncontroverted allegations as a whole, recognise clear legal bars or the absence of the ingredients of an offence, avoid minute assessment of evidence and speculation about conviction, distinguish purely civil disputes from conduct that also constitutes a criminal offence, and exercise caution where the prosecution has a factual foundation. Its quoted treatment of Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia, P.P. Sharma and M.N. Damani confines the 'bleak conviction' observation to its context; it does not authorise assessment of the prospects of conviction in every prosecution. The High Court invoked that distinction when examining the limited scope of its inherent powers; it did not find that the present case involved a purely civil dispute or a statutory bar. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, reiterated the caution in Bhajan Lal that the power must be exercised sparingly and that the truth of the FIR allegations must not be tested as though at trial. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, states that defence documents are ordinarily not evaluated when considering quashing, but recognises an exception, in an appropriate case, for public documents or documents whose veracity is undisputed, referring to Yin Cheng Hsiung, Bhajan Lal and Harshendra Kumar D. The High Court quoted the exception but did not find the contested video within it. State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, distinguishes allegations that disclose no offence, for which quashing may be appropriate, from premature assessment of reliability that would bring a legitimate prosecution to an end. Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, sets out the cautious exercise of inherent powers, the Bhajan Lal categories, and the principle in Indian Oil Corpn. that a complaint must contain a sufficient factual foundation. Its quoted Saroj Kumar Sahoo and related passages explain that the probabilities of the prosecution case are not to be assessed at this stage and that the informant's alleged mala fides are ordinarily secondary where an offence is disclosed. The High Court relied on these principles without excluding intervention in an appropriate exceptional case.

M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, recognises the power to quash where allegations taken at face value, or the uncontroverted allegations and evidence collected in their support, disclose no offence. M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, balances restraint in interrupting an inquiry against the need to intervene where an inherently improbable complaint results in harassment. CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, disapproved a High Court's findings on disputed defence facts in a Section 482 petition after cognizance. State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Cr.A. No. 709/2021, order of 30 June 2021, similarly prohibits meticulous scrutiny of evidence as though at trial and observes that an FIR need not be encyclopedic. The High Court applied these limits to the request for a finding on what the video showed; it did not decide the video's admissibility.

Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Kumar, (2008) 12 SCC 346, reproduced the purposes for which Section 482 preserves inherent powers, the R.P. Kapur categories concerning a legal bar, allegations that disclose no offence when taken at face value, or the absence of legal evidence, and the full illustrative Bhajan Lal categories. It distinguished a complete absence of legal evidence or evidence manifestly inconsistent with the accusations from evidence whose weight must be assessed at trial, and explained through Saroj Kumar Sahoo that alleged animosity on the part of the informant is secondary where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. The High Court drew a direct conclusion on political vendetta from this passage.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, governed the exercise of jurisdiction. It preserves the High Court's inherent powers to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of the process of a court or secure the ends of justice, to be exercised cautiously in an appropriate case; the case was a challenge to a revisional order. Section 207 CrPC appears in relation to the CD furnished to the accused with the prosecution papers: the petitioners had not filed their copy, and the High Court declined to resolve whether the footage showed them. IPC Sections 342, 353 and 34 are the provisions under which the alleged wrongful confinement and obstruction of a public servant, read with common intention, were registered, as recorded in the order. The Court neither held the charges proved nor separately examined whether their ingredients were established. Section 173(2) and Section 228 CrPC, and the distinction between investigations under Sections 156(1) and 155(2), occur within Supreme Court quotations on the general standards for quashing proceedings or charges.

4. Issues : (i) In a Section 482 challenge following Criminal Revision No. 9/21, did the allegations and the material described by the Court justify quashing the FIR in Crime No. 56/2020 and the related criminal proceedings at this stage? (ii) Could alleged political vendetta or inimical relations with the informant alone support quashing when the reported account otherwise disclosed a cognizable offence? (iii) Could the High Court determine the accused's identity or absence from the prosecution videograph, when the CD supplied under Section 207 had not been filed and the applicants sought a factual determination from the footage, or should the question be put to witnesses at trial? The Court did not decide whether the accused actually tied anyone to the tree, whether the informant was politically biased, or the final evidentiary meaning of the video.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court reviewed and applied the Supreme Court's principles governing quashing under the inherent jurisdiction. The power is broad enough to stop proceedings where allegations accepted at face value make out no offence, an express bar exists, or an exceptional abuse of process is shown; the court cannot, in exercising that power, act as an appellate court to determine disputed facts or prematurely predict an acquittal. Where there is a factual foundation for the prosecution and the evidence is disputed, the proceedings should ordinarily continue. The complaint recounted the alleged tying of a sub-engineer and others during official monitoring, release by officials and police, and registration of cognizable IPC offences. The Court found no ground to quash the proceedings on those allegations. It did not convert the allegations into trial findings.

The applicants alleged that the prosecution arose from political vendetta. Reading Renu Kumari and the Saroj Kumar Sahoo principle in the Supreme Court passages, the Court held that the informant's alleged mala fides are secondary where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. A mere allegation that the informant is hostile does not, by itself, justify quashing the prosecution at this stage. This conclusion concerns the limited scope of interference at this stage.

The video contention would require deciding whether the applicants appeared in the footage and who tied the officials. Although the applicants described a prosecution videograph accompanying the charge sheet, they had not filed the CD provided under Section 207. Even apart from the absence of the CD, the Court could not determine the applicants' disputed identity in the recording under Section 482. The Court left them free to question the witnesses at trial about their identity and presence in the video. In view of the limited scope of interference and the material before it, the Court found no basis to exercise its inherent powers.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 CrPC application against the Additional Sessions Judge's order of 25 November 2023 in Criminal Revision No. 9/21. The Court refused to quash the FIR and related criminal proceedings; it expressly left the applicants free to question trial witnesses about identity and presence in the video.

Headnote :- Juvenile bail — Section 12 and Section 15 — order of decision - Section 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 permits the Board to consider bail for a person who is apparently a child and is alleged to have committed a bailable or non-bailable offence without awaiting the Section 15 preliminary assessment of a child aged sixteen or more accused of a heinous offence. The assessment determines the appropriate mode of trial under Sections 15 and 18; it is not a prerequisite to the initial bail decision. Following Hardeep Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 3 SCC 92, on trial beginning only upon framing of charge, the Court reasoned that bail may precede that stage. The grounds for refusing bail under Section 12 and the requirement to record reasons remain applicable; the Board must subsequently perform its Sections 14, 15 and 18 duties. The absence of a prior assessment did not invalidate the bail order.

Juvenile bail — transfer to Children's Court — continued effect - Section 18(3) of the 2015 Act allows transfer for adult trial following a Section 15 assessment, while Rule 13 of the Juvenile Justice Model Rules, 2016 prescribes the Children's Court's procedure. The Court found no provision requiring a fresh bail determination by that court merely because the case moves there. A Board's Section 12 bail grant therefore remains in force through conclusion of trial even if the eventual forum differs.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The Principal Magistrate of the Juvenile Justice Board, Morena, ordered release on bail of respondents Nos. 2 and 3 on 24 August 2021 under Section 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015. Prahlad Singh Parmar brought Criminal Revision No. 3085/2021 under Section 102 of the Act to challenge that order. The sole substantive legal question, framed by the High Court on 11 March 2022, was whether the Board could decide a Section 12 application before completing a Section 15 preliminary assessment, or had to await completion of that assessment.

The Court reproduced Sections 12, 15 and 18 of the Act and Rule 13 of the 2016 Model Rules to determine the order in which bail and preliminary assessment could be considered and the effect of a later change in the trial forum.

2. Precedents — Considered : Hardeep Singh v. State of Punjab and others, (2014) 3 SCC 92, was the sole Supreme Court authority considered on the issue. The judgment quoted paragraph 38: in the criminal trial context addressed there, trial is the adjudication of guilt or innocence after the accused is told the charge, begins when charges are framed, and does not commence merely on cognizance. The High Court relied on that distinction between procedural stages to explain why a bail application can be heard before a trial, and why a preliminary assessment concerning the eventual mode of trial is not a statutory precondition to Section 12 bail. The passage from Hardeep Singh concerns the commencement of trial, rather than juvenile bail or the interpretation of Sections 12 and 15 of the 2015 Act. The conclusion that the two provisions operate independently rests on the High Court's reading of their text and scheme.

3. Statutes considered : Section 102 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act, 2015 provided the revisional jurisdiction. Section 12(1) governs bail for a person who is apparently a child and is alleged to have committed a bailable or non-bailable offence, notwithstanding the CrPC or other law, with or without surety, or under suitable supervision or care. Its proviso withholds release where there are reasonable grounds to believe that release is likely to bring the child into association with a known criminal or expose the child to moral, physical or psychological danger, or that release would defeat the ends of justice. The reasons for refusing bail and the circumstances leading to that decision must be recorded. Section 12(2)–(4) provide for keeping the child in an observation home until production before the Board, placement following the Board's refusal of bail, and reconsideration of bail conditions that remain unfulfilled after seven days. The Court reproduced these safeguards but did not reassess their application to the two respondents.

Section 15(1) requires a preliminary assessment for an alleged heinous offence by a child who has completed sixteen years, concerning the child's mental and physical capacity, understanding of the consequences, and the circumstances of the alleged offence; its explanation says the assessment is not a trial. Section 15(2) provides that, where the Board retains the matter, it must dispose of it by following, as far as may be, the procedure for trial of a summons case. Section 18(3) allows transfer to the Children's Court if the Board considers an adult trial necessary. Sections 14 and 18 continue to govern the subsequent proceedings and orders; these continuing duties do not make a preliminary assessment a prerequisite to bail. Rule 13 of the Juvenile Justice Model Rules, 2016, sets out the Children's Court's decision on trial route, appeals concerning age or assessment, child-friendly trial procedure and post-disposition monitoring. No provision in that rule required the Children's Court automatically to reconsider bail. The Court quoted Section 165 of the Evidence Act inside Rule 13's child-friendly witness procedure. The quoted CrPC provisions govern the procedure for a later trial rather than the decision on bail under Section 12.

4. Issues : (i) Is a completed Section 15 preliminary assessment a statutory prerequisite to the Juvenile Justice Board deciding a Section 12 bail application where a child is alleged to have committed a heinous offence and may be subject to that assessment? (ii) If the Board first grants bail and later orders transfer to the Children's Court for adult trial under Section 18(3), does the change of forum automatically call for a fresh bail determination, or does the original bail continue? (iii) Does deciding bail first relieve the Board of its subsequent duties under Sections 14, 15 and 18?

5. Ratio / Findings : On the first issue, the Court found no wording in Section 12 barring the Board from entertaining and deciding bail before assessment under Section 15. The provisions have different functions: Section 12 governs immediate release and the protective exceptions to bail for a person who is apparently a child; Section 15 addresses the capacity and circumstances relevant to determining the mode of trial for a child aged sixteen years or more who is alleged to have committed a heinous offence. Sections 15(2) and 18(3) contemplate either Board disposal or transfer to the Children's Court after assessment. Relying on the principle in Hardeep Singh that trial commences upon framing of charges, the Court reasoned that bail ordinarily can be considered before trial begins, and that the assessment's role in determining the mode of trial cannot, by itself, postpone consideration of bail. The decision does not declare every child entitled to bail regardless of Section 12's exceptions.

On the continued operation of bail, the Court acknowledged material differences between Board disposal and a Children's Court adult trial, including the possible punishment and the consequences for custody upon reaching the relevant age, as described in the judgment. Yet neither the Act nor Rule 13 required the Children's Court automatically to reconsider a bail order granted by the Board under Section 12 solely because the case had been transferred. It held that the existing bail order remained operative until the conclusion of trial.

The Board retains its statutory duties after the initial bail order. It must complete the inquiry and any preliminary assessment required, and pass the necessary orders under Sections 14, 15 and 18 as the case requires. The Court accordingly rejected the contention that the absence of a prior assessment invalidated the order dated 24 August 2021.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision challenging the Juvenile Justice Board's bail order dated 24 August 2021. The Court stated that Board-granted bail would continue until conclusion of trial and made clear that the Board remained obliged to pass the necessary orders under Sections 14, 15 and 18.

Headnote :- Unlawful assembly — Section 149 IPC — common object and coordinated assault - Where the appellants and other assailants waylaid Indar Singh with lathis and struck relatives intervening to save him, injured witnesses' accounts, prompt FIR and medical findings for seven persons, including two fractures, supported a common object. The Court treated prior hostility as capable of motivating both an attack and a false accusation, but found the Section 151 CrPC counter-proceedings and unsupported assertion that the accused had sustained injuries insufficient to discredit this evidence. It rejected the contention that only separately attributed blows could support liability once a common object and participation in the unlawful assembly were proved; mere presence was not the test it applied.

Attempt to murder — Section 307 IPC — intention and injury site - The statutory question was whether the lathi attack was accompanied by intention or knowledge such that death, if caused, would amount to murder; injury severity alone was not decisive. The blow by Prakash to the head, the blow by Om near the eye, Indar Singh's loss of consciousness and the frontal fracture confirmed by x-ray, viewed with the coordinated assault, supported the Court's inference of the required intention or knowledge and its affirmance of the conviction under Section 307/149. The doctor did not attribute the full injury pattern to a possible fall. The finding rests on the attack on vital parts in the particular circumstances, rather than an automatic presumption arising from a fracture.

Sentence — appellate disposition - The Court did not reduce the sentence of seven years' rigorous imprisonment under Section 307, referring to deterrence and the appellants' failure to appear before the High Court Registry for years. The convictions and sentences imposed by the trial court were affirmed, bail bonds cancelled, and the appellants directed to surrender for the remaining imprisonment.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : At about 8–9 p.m. on 21 March 1995, Indar Singh was returning home when, according to his account, Prakash, Om, Ramesh, Nandu, Jivan, Mohan and other participants waylaid and surrounded him with lathis. Jivan struck his lips, Om his eye area and Prakash his head, after which several blows were delivered and he lost consciousness. His family members heard his alarm and came to help; they were also beaten. Relatives took him by bullock-cart to Police Station Fatehpur, where he regained consciousness and reported the matter at about 1:30 a.m. The police registered Crime No. 40/1995, sent the injured for examination and, after the medical and x-ray findings, added Sections 325 and 307 IPC.

Indar Singh's parents Dayaram and Rajobai, grandmother Gangabai, aunt Kasturibai and other relatives gave supporting accounts. Phool Singh, also injured, did not support the prosecution fully and was declared hostile. Dr Sitaram Singh Raghuvanshi recorded lacerations or contusions among the injured persons. Indar Singh had a deep parietal scalp laceration, frontal contusion, blackened eye and other blunt injuries, was semi-conscious when examined, and x-ray showed a right frontal fracture. Phool Singh's right first metacarpal was fractured. The doctor accepted that a fall onto stones might cause some injuries, but stated that it would not explain all of Indar Singh’s injuries and that a lathi could have caused the head lacerations.

The defence denied guilt and said the complainant party had attacked Prakash earlier that day, leading to Section 151 CrPC proceedings against them, and had lodged a retaliatory false report. At trial the accused called no defence witness. The Third Additional Sessions Judge (Fast Track), Guna, in Sessions Trial No. 220/1995 on 27 November 2003 convicted the four appellants under IPC Sections 147, 341, 307 and 323 read with Section 149 where applicable, as detailed in the judgment, including a term of seven years’ rigorous imprisonment and ₹500 fine for Section 307. In this Section 374 CrPC appeal they argued that the incident arose suddenly without a common object, that the injuries did not establish attempted murder, and that the family witnesses were untrustworthy because of enmity. The State defended the convictions and relied on the parts of the body targeted in the attack. The appellants had ceased appearing before the High Court Registry from 2012 or 2013; the Court appointed experienced legal aid counsel as amicus curiae after repeated failures to appear and heard the appeal on its merits.

2. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the conviction appeal. IPC Section 149 imposed constructive liability for offences committed in prosecution of the common object of an unlawful assembly whose existence was proved; the Court found that common object from coordinated waylaying and the attack on those intervening. Section 147 covered rioting, Section 341 concerned the conviction for wrongful restraint, and Section 323 concerned the simple injuries caused to others. The Court reproduced Section 307 IPC, which turns on an act done with such intention or knowledge, and in such circumstances, that the offender would be guilty of murder if the act caused death; actual hurt affects the penalty, but the extent of injury alone does not determine whether the offence is established. Section 151 CrPC described earlier preventive proceedings against members of the complainant party; those proceedings did not adjudicate the truth of either assault. The police initially investigated Sections 148, 506 Part II and 325 among others; their inclusion in the charge-sheet or initial FIR did not amount to separate appellate findings on those offences.

3. Issues : (i) Whether the injured family members' testimony, physical injuries and prompt report remained credible despite an earlier counter-report and alleged enmity. (ii) Whether the common object required by Section 149 was established by the waylaying and coordinated lathi assault on Indar Singh and rescuers, despite the different roles attributed to the assailants and the contention that the incident arose suddenly. (iii) Whether the act and mental element for Section 307/149 were proved from the lathi attack to vital parts and the medical evidence, rather than solely by the classification of the injuries ultimately sustained. (iv) Whether the convictions or sentences warranted appellate interference and what consequences the appellants’ prolonged failure to appear before the Registry had for the continuation of bail and their surrender.

4. Ratio / Findings : The Court examined Indar Singh's direct account and cross-examination, the relatives' supporting observations and Dr Raghuvanshi's examination. It acknowledged Phool Singh's hostile testimony and that the injured witnesses were related to Indar Singh. Yet the record showed seven injured people, two fractures, an FIR lodged without material delay and medical findings consistent with lathi blows. The doctor did not say a fall explained all injuries. Proceedings under Section 151 had been instituted on the accused party’s report, but the defence produced no document substantiating its claim of injuries in the alleged earlier assault; the record did not justify treating the extensive injuries as self-inflicted to fabricate a counter-case. Hostility may motivate either a false accusation or the crime, so the Court assessed the evidence rather than treating animosity as decisive. The High Court stated the enmity principle and interpreted Sections 149 and 307 IPC from the facts and statutory text.

For Section 149, the group waylaid and surrounded Indar Singh with lathis, continued beating him and attacked people who attempted rescue. From this coordinated conduct, supported by eyewitness accounts and medical evidence, the Court found an unlawful assembly with a common object to assault the complainant party. It therefore rejected the contention that liability had to be confined to the individual blow attributed to each accused. Its conclusion rests on the specific conduct of the group that was proved.

For Section 307, the Court examined the statutory requirement of intention or knowledge in circumstances in which the assailant would be guilty of murder if the act caused death. The lathi blows were aimed at the head or eye area; Indar Singh lost consciousness and sustained a frontal fracture. The location and severity of the injuries, considered in the context of the group attack, permitted the inference that the assailants intended or knew their act could cause death. It affirmed the conviction under Section 307 read with Section 149 and the findings under Section 323/149 for other injured persons. The Court's analysis did not depend on the injury's seriousness alone.

On sentence, the Court referred briefly to deterrence and the appellants' failure over several years to appear before the Registry. It found no reason to alter the sentences imposed by the trial court.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal. The High Court affirmed the 27 November 2003 conviction and sentence of Prakash, Om, Ramesh and Nandu in Sessions Trial No. 220/1995, with the Section 147, 341, 307/149 and Section 323/149 dispositions set out. The sentence of seven years' rigorous imprisonment and the fine of ₹500 imposed for Section 307 were not reduced. Since the appellants were on bail, their bail bonds were cancelled and they were ordered to surrender immediately before the trial court to serve the remaining sentence.

Prakash and Ors. v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 707/2003, 16/12/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR registration — cognizable rape allegation — preliminary enquiry limits - Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, requires registration under Section 154 CrPC where the information discloses a cognizable offence; where the initial information does not clearly disclose such an offence but calls for inquiry, that inquiry is confined to whether an offence is disclosed, without testing the truth of the information. Requirements concerning diary entries, time limits and notice of closure also apply. National Confederation of Officers Association v. Union of India, (2022) 4 SCC 764, quoted CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, (2021) 18 SCC 135, and Manohar Lal Sharma, (2014) 2 SCC 532, on converting a limited preliminary enquiry into a regular case once material disclosing a cognizable offence is available; the Court relied on the principles discussed in their CBI context without treating the CBI Manual as governing the State police station. The prosecutrix reported rape by a head constable, yet the station conducted two enquiries that found the allegation false and registered FIR only after district intervention. The Court rejected the use of internal assessments of truthfulness to avoid registering a report disclosing a cognizable offence.

Closure of enquiry — informant notice and magistrate scrutiny - The closure-entry requirement in Lalita Kumari, the reporting safeguard under Section 157 and the subsequent final-report procedure under Section 173 do not permit police to withhold an internal finding of exoneration from the informant and judicial scrutiny. National Confederation of Officers Association considered the closure of a CBI preliminary enquiry despite conflicting internal opinions, and quoted the limited exceptional judicial power discussed in Shashikant v. CBI, (2007) 1 SCC 630; it illustrated that closing a preliminary enquiry does not place material disclosing a cognizable offence beyond independent scrutiny. The SDO(P) and Additional SP reports clearing the head constable were neither supplied to the prosecutrix nor placed before the Magistrate, yet the applicant had copies. The Court held that they had not attained finality, declined to accept them as proof that the allegation was false and dismissed the Section 482 challenge.

Fair investigation — police influence and contemporaneous record - The Court regarded the prolonged failure to register the FIR, the applicant's access to undisclosed enquiry reports, the Collector's intervention, the misleading reason recorded for the delay, and the State's account that the applicant was avoiding blood-sample collection as relevant to the fairness of the investigation. It declined to infer that the pending counter-FIR against the prosecutrix's husband proved her report a counterblast and reserved further comment on that trial. It directed the competent authority or DGP to transfer the applicant head constable to another part of the State, allowed consideration of service action, vacated the interim order restraining coercive action and left police free to take him into custody. Those directions protected the pending investigation without finally determining whether the rape allegation was proved.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The prosecutrix said she lived in a rented room at Ishagarh with her three children while her labourer husband worked elsewhere. Head Constable Prakash Pawaiya, known to her after attending a family dispute involving her husband, had begun visiting. She alleged that on 9 January 2018, when her husband was away and the children at school, he came to her room intoxicated, restrained and gagged her and raped her. She described losing consciousness and being awakened by her young daughter, then phoning her husband and attempting to lodge a report at Police Station Ishagarh the same day. She alleged a later attempt at sexual assault on 27 February 2018. The applicant disputed her account and his culpability; the Court did not determine guilt in this proceeding.

The applicant asserted the allegation was fabricated in reaction to Crime No. 87/2018, an FIR lodged by his daughter on 28 February 2018 against the prosecutrix's husband under IPC Section 354A. He relied on enquiry reports finding the allegation false, submitted by the SDO(P), Chanderi, dated 26 April 2018, and Additional SP, Ashok Nagar, dated 24 May 2018, and on a separate complaint the prosecutrix had made against her husband and mother-in-law involving alleged pressure to demand money from others. Her husband and mother-in-law were later acquitted after she turned hostile. He argued that the roughly eleven-month gap before the 2 December 2018 FIR in Crime No. 388/2018 under IPC Sections 342 and 376, and her earlier conduct, warranted Section 482 quashing. The prayer sought quashing of FIR Crime No. 388/2018 at Police Station Ishagarh and all proceedings arising from it.

The prosecutrix opposed quashing. She said the station where the accused was posted refused her complaint; his daughter's FIR was lodged in retaliation; and the internal police reports exonerating him were tainted and not put before a Magistrate. A Woman Empowerment Officer's inquiry and an Additional District Magistrate's opinion led the Collector to write the Superintendent of Police on 12 November 2018, criticizing non-registration and forwarding records including a CD for action. An FIR was registered at Serial No. 0 at Kotwali, Ashok Nagar, and sent to Ishagarh, where Crime No. 388/2018 was registered. The State said investigation was still pending and the applicant was unavailable when police sought a blood sample. The interim order dated 3 January 2019 had permitted the inquiry to continue while restraining coercive action. The High Court examined the police station's handling of the complaint, the two reports and the later FIR without determining the truth of the rape allegation.

2. Precedents — Considered : Lalita Kumari v. Government of Uttar Pradesh, (2014) 2 SCC 1, was quoted at length. The Constitution Bench distinguishes the lower threshold under Section 154 for registering information disclosing a cognizable offence from the later decision under Section 157 on whether sufficient grounds exist to investigate and Section 173's post-investigation final report. Registration is mandatory where the information itself discloses a cognizable offence; where it does not yet disclose one but calls for inquiry, the inquiry is limited to determining whether a cognizable offence is disclosed and may not test the truth of the information. If the inquiry ends in closure, reasons must be recorded and a copy of the closure entry supplied to the informant within a week; the General Diary must record information and the choice to inquire, and the inquiry should ordinarily be completed within fifteen days and, exceptionally, within six weeks, with reasons recorded. Lalita Kumari lists illustrative circumstances such as matrimonial, commercial, medical-negligence, corruption and unexplained abnormal-delay matters without making them automatic exceptions to the duty to register an FIR where a cognizable offence is disclosed. The High Court used these safeguards to reject a police practice of deciding that a rape report was false and withholding the resulting enquiry report. Its source quotation also discusses the Magistrate's role under Section 157.

National Confederation of Officers Association of Central Public Sector Enterprises v. Union of India, (2022) 4 SCC 764, was the second directly cited Supreme Court authority. It concerned a CBI preliminary enquiry into disinvestment, conflicting internal recommendations and a self-contained note closing that enquiry. Its quoted paragraphs reiterated Lalita Kumari's distinction and CBI Manual paragraph 9.1: a preliminary enquiry is permissible when the information is insufficient to register a regular case, but must be converted into a regular case once material disclosing a cognizable offence becomes available. The quotation discusses CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, (2021) 18 SCC 135, which explains that corruption cases do not all require preliminary enquiry and an FIR is not vitiated by omission of one; Manohar Lal Sharma v. Union of India, (2014) 2 SCC 532, which describes conversion and exceptional court monitoring without directing the mode or manner of investigation; and Shashikant v. CBI, (2007) 1 SCC 630, which recognises exceptional judicial intervention despite the CBI's closure of an enquiry, while maintaining the ordinary rule against interference in its functioning. The High Court relied on this passage when considering scrutiny of the police's internal closure of an enquiry. Other authorities referred to within the Supreme Court quotation, including Managipet, reiterate the principles governing conversion into a regular case; the High Court did not discuss them separately.

The quoted Supreme Court rules were applied to the police procedure and the unresolved allegation, without deciding the accused's guilt.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to quash the FIR; the Court refused interference. Section 154 CrPC, as explained through Lalita Kumari, required police to register information disclosing a cognizable offence. Sections 157 and 173 distinguish the decision to investigate and the subsequent final report, subject to scrutiny by the Magistrate, from the initial registration threshold; the Court stressed that police should not conceal a negative enquiry from informant or Magistrate. The Court stated that a police finding that the complaint appears false must be supplied to the complainant and forwarded to the Magistrate under Section 169 CrPC/Section 189 BNSS. The allegation was registered under IPC Sections 342 and 376; Section 354A concerned the daughter's separate, pending case against the prosecutrix's husband. Rules 9 and 14 of the M.P. Civil Services (Classification, Control & Appeal) Rules, 1966 were cited as possible service action for the head constable, left for the competent authority. The Right to Information Act arose only in noting his copies of the internal reports were not issued under it.

4. Issues : (i) Could police, after receiving an allegation disclosing rape, conduct preliminary enquiries into the truth of the allegation and exonerate the accused instead of promptly registering an FIR? (ii) If two officers closed such enquiries, could the department keep their findings to itself without furnishing the complainant a reasoned closure entry or placing the matter before judicial scrutiny, and could the accused use those reports as conclusive exoneration on Section 482 review? (iii) Did the delayed FIR, the daughter's earlier counter-FIR, and the separate complaint involving the prosecutrix's family demonstrate that Crime No. 388/2018 was an abuse of process requiring quashing, or did the police's non-registration explain the delay? (iv) What protective directions were appropriate for an ongoing investigation involving a head constable at the station where the report was initially refused? The guilt or innocence in either pending case was outside this proceeding.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court set out the events in chronological order: alleged assault on 9 January, non-registration at Ishagarh, daughter's 28 February counter-FIR, April and May internal police reports clearing the applicant, 12 November Collector intervention after Woman Empowerment Officer and ADM examination, and 2 December registration after an FIR registered at Serial No. 0 at Kotwali. It regarded a rape allegation as disclosing a cognizable offence and questioned the police choice to conduct enquiries into the truth of the allegation instead of registering it. Lalita Kumari does permit a limited preliminary inquiry when initial disclosure is unclear, but forbids using that process to assess veracity of information already disclosing an offence. The National Confederation passage reinforces that a preliminary enquiry cannot delay registration of a regular case once material disclosing a cognizable offence is available.

The two reports exonerating the applicant were retained within the police department, not put before the Magistrate or furnished to the prosecutrix. The applicant, a head constable, nevertheless produced copies that were not issued under the RTI Act. The Court considered closure confined to the police department without judicial scrutiny to be dangerous because police could suppress an unwanted case by withholding the result. It found the reports lacked finality and declined to treat them as conclusive proof exonerating the applicant. The Court required the finding to be supplied to the complainant and forwarded to the Magistrate, citing Section 169 CrPC/Section 189 BNSS.

The Court rejected the applicant's counterblast and delay arguments. It noted that the daughter's 2018 FIR against the prosecutrix's husband remained pending after more than seven years and she had not entered the witness box according to instructions relayed by counsel. It indicated the daughter's FIR appeared to be retaliatory, but expressly withheld further comment while that trial remained pending; this was not a finding that the daughter had committed an offence. The court found the prosecutrix had pursued multiple authorities and that the delay was attributable to the police, rather than to the absence of her mother. The explanation in the later FIR that it was lodged after her mother arrived was found misleading in view of the Collector's recorded intervention and the complainant's prolonged efforts. The Court also regarded the applicant's access to the closed enquiry reports and the State's account of the applicant's avoidance of blood-sample collection as signs of influence while investigation remained pending, not proof of the alleged rape.

In this setting the internal reports and the long interval did not justify quashing the cognizable FIR. To protect a free and fair investigation while it remained pending, the Court directed removal of the head constable from that part of the State, permitted consideration of service action and vacated the protection against coercive action. Those directions followed its findings about the police procedure and possible influence on the investigation; they did not determine guilt or dictate the final outcome of the investigation.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 CrPC application; Crime No. 388/2018 was not quashed. The competent authority or Director General of Police was directed immediately to transfer Prakash Pawaiya to another part of Madhya Pradesh so that he could not influence the ongoing investigation, and the authority could consider action under Rules 9 and 14 of the State Civil Services CCA Rules. The interim order dated 3 January 2019 restraining coercive action was vacated, and police were left free to take him into custody in accordance with law.

Headnote :- Age of prosecutrix — school proof — Evidence Act Section 35 and Rule 12(3) - Ram Suresh Singh v. Prabhat Singh, (2009) 6 SCC 681, requires proof of an entry recording age in a school record and separates its relevance from evidentiary weight. Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 3 SCC 263, applies the 2007 Juvenile Justice Rule 12(3) documentary hierarchy to a child victim, resorting to medical opinion only after the listed documents are unavailable. The headmaster brought the original school record underlying a transfer certificate recording a date of birth that established minority, supported by the accounts of the prosecutrix and her parents concerning her age. The Court found her below sixteen at the November 2007 incident, without relying on a later age threshold.

Age estimation — ossification margin — no automatic two-year advantage - Mukarrab v. State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210, distinguished the uncertainty in medical age assessment considered on the particular facts of Darga Ram and declined to apply that approach mechanically in every case. The 2007 Rule 12(3)(b) medical route, reached only when preferred documents are absent, permits a reasoned adjustment of the child's estimated age to the lower side; it does not require an automatic upward adjustment of two years for the benefit of the accused. Although the school record controlled, the Court also weighed the radiological estimate of above fifteen but below sixteen-and-a-half years and the dental estimate of fifteen–sixteen years, together with the family's evidence; the estimates did not undo the finding of minority below the relevant sixteen-year limit.

Kidnapping and abduction — prior enticement — minor leaving willingly - Anver Singh v. State of Gujarat, (2021) 3 SCC 12, distinguishes actual taking or enticement, including earlier subtle inducement, from mere later custody; its explanation limits S. Varadarajan to a minor who understands the consequences and independently leaves the guardian's care without inducement by the accused. Section 366 also requires the relevant marriage or illicit-intercourse purpose. The appellant had proposed taking the prosecutrix to Jaipur before calling her out at night. Her acknowledgment that she went voluntarily did not negate the Court's finding of enticement, and the Sections 363 and 366 convictions were affirmed.

Statutory rape — 2007 Section 375 sixthly — consent of girl below sixteen - Iqbal v. State of Kerala, (2007) 12 SCC 724, applies the pre-amendment under-sixteen threshold. Satish Kumar Jayanti Lal Dabgar v. State of Gujarat, (2015) 7 SCC 359, explains that apparent willingness by a girl below sixteen neither supplies legally effective consent nor mitigates the offence on that basis. The Court accepted the prosecutrix's statement that intercourse was consensual as a factual claim, but her proved age made it immaterial under the then applicable clause. The FSL finding of semen and sperm supported the account of intercourse despite the absence of fresh injury and the doctor's inability to give a definite opinion.

Prosecutrix evidence — reliability, medical limits and defence - The Court distinguished Sunil v. State of Haryana, (2010) 1 SCC 742, because reliable school records, radiological evidence and dental evidence had been adduced here, and Sham Singh v. State of Haryana, (2018) 18 SCC 34, because its combination of adverse medical evidence, unshaken defence, absent crucial witnesses and possible fabrication was not established. The appellant admitted presence in Morena, did not substantiate a stay with his aunt, and FSL supported the prosecutrix; the father's statement that his separate attempted-murder case arose after this prosecution was not rebutted. The Court affirmed convictions but reduced the sentence of rigorous imprisonment under Section 376 from ten to seven years, retained the fine and other terms, ordered concurrency and surrender.

Counsel of choice — record-based appointment of amicus - The appellant's retained lawyer reported no instructions after an unanswered letter. The Court found that the appellant had appeared before the Registry with that lawyer's identification, filed no change application and had missed one later date after the appeal was set for final hearing. It acknowledged counsel choice but found no demonstrated wish to replace counsel; appointing the same lawyer as amicus and hearing the appeal with his assistance did not infringe that choice in these circumstances.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 7 November 2007 the prosecutrix, who lived in the same locality as the appellant, left home at night after he had proposed the previous day that she accompany him to Jaipur. She said he called at her door, took her to a forest near Ghaorna Wala Temple and had intercourse with her there; they remained together overnight and later reached his house. Her father reported her missing the next day, after a relative had said he saw her going toward the market with Pramod following. Police recovered her from the appellant's house on 10 November. In testimony she described prior enticement and the sexual act, but also said she had gone willingly, had stayed without complaint and that intercourse was not without her consent. These apparently mixed statements were central to the kidnapping and rape issues.

The prosecution alleged she was a minor under sixteen. She said she was about fourteen; her father and mother placed her around thirteen or fourteen. Headmaster Rishi Kumar Sharma issued transfer certificate Ex. P.1 from school records recording a date of birth that established minority and brought original school records to court. Radiologist Dr Ashok Singh estimated more than fifteen but less than sixteen-and-a-half; dentist Dr R.C. Mishra estimated fifteen–sixteen. Dr Meera Bandil found no external or fresh genital injury and could not definitely opine on recent intercourse, but the FSL detected human semen and sperm on vaginal slides, swabs and clothes. The Court nevertheless found that she was below sixteen after considering the evidence as a whole and the prescribed order of preference.

The appellant denied guilt, argued that she was an adult and had left voluntarily, and claimed false implication because her father faced a prosecution for attempted murder involving the appellant's mother. He testified that he had come from Jaipur to Morena on 7 November and stayed at his aunt's village home; defence witness Asgar Khan supported seeing him there. The aunt was not called and there was no ticket or residence certificate. The prosecution examined the victim, parents, headmaster, doctors, other witnesses and investigators; the appellant and Khan were the two defence witnesses. The IV Additional Sessions Judge, Morena, in Sessions Trial No. 08/2008 on 30 September 2008 convicted Pramod under IPC Sections 363, 366 and 376 and imposed respectively one, three and ten years' rigorous imprisonment with fines and default terms. He appealed under Section 374 CrPC. An interlocutory surety-change application was withdrawn. Counsel initially reported no instructions after a letter, but the appellant had appeared regularly before the Registry and been identified by that counsel, and had made no application to change counsel; the Court asked the counsel to act as amicus and heard the merits, finding no infringement of the appellant's right to counsel of choice on those facts.

2. Precedents — Considered : Ram Suresh Singh v. Prabhat Singh, (2009) 6 SCC 681, concerned proof of age under Section 35 Evidence Act and the juvenile scheme. The quoted passage requires proof of the school register entry, permits a teacher familiar with the record to prove its contents, recognises that a photocopy unsupported by the original may fail, and places medical opinion after the relevant first-school certificate under the then Rules. The High Court applied its distinction between admissibility and evidentiary weight: the headmaster testified and brought original records for Ex. P.1, so the objection that a separate admission register had not been brought as asserted did not defeat the proved certificate.

Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 3 SCC 263, directly extended Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Rules, 2007, from children in conflict with law to child victims. The options are sequential: matriculation or equivalent certificate, then first-attended school birth entry, then corporation/municipal/panchayat certificate, and finally medical opinion. A higher available and properly proved option controls over lower ones. The High Court used this hierarchy in an IPC prosecution arising in 2007; it did not describe this as a POCSO prosecution. Mukarrab v. State of U.P., (2017) 2 SCC 210, was considered separately on the medical age margin. Its quoted distinction says Darga Ram's plus-or-minus two-year and juvenile-benefit approach rested on its particular facts and cannot be generalised. The High Court rejected the appellant's request automatically to add two years to the estimated age for his benefit, weighed the actual radiology, dental, school and family evidence, and noted the distinct benefit under Rule 12 permitting the estimated age to be reduced by up to one year in favour of the child where the medical route applies.

Anver Singh v. State of Gujarat, (2021) 3 SCC 12, set out the ingredients of kidnapping under Section 361: minority, lawful guardianship, and taking or enticement by the accused. Enticement may precede the actual departure or operate through gaining the minor's affection; recovery from custody alone does not establish it. Its discussion of S. Varadarajan limits the contention based on a minor's independent voluntary departure to a minor who understands the consequences and leaves without the accused's assistance or inducement. The quoted passage also describes Section 366's additional marriage or illicit-intercourse purpose. The High Court applied this to the appellant's prior proposal and calling the minor out, despite her admission of willingness. It did not purport to make mere recovery sufficient.

Iqbal v. State of Kerala, (2007) 12 SCC 724, was applied to the then Section 375 Sixthly IPC: intercourse with a girl under sixteen amounts to rape regardless of consent. Satish Kumar Jayanti Lal Dabgar v. State of Gujarat, (2015) 7 SCC 359, explained the child-protection reason why purported consent below sixteen lacks legal force and cannot be offered as mitigation merely because the girl appeared willing. The High Court applied both to the age it found proved and the prosecutrix's own admission of consent, while still addressing whether intercourse occurred.

Sunil v. State of Haryana, (2010) 1 SCC 742, was relied on by defence for unreliable school records concerning age and the failure to obtain radiological and dental evidence despite referral for those examinations. The Court distinguished it because the original school material and both kinds of medical age evidence, as well as family testimony, were available here. Sham Singh v. State of Haryana, (2018) 18 SCC 34, recognised that a trustworthy prosecutrix need not be corroborated as a mechanical rule but also cautioned against conviction where discordant medical evidence, unshaken defence, missing vital witnesses and possible false implication collectively weaken her case. The High Court found that combination absent: age witnesses were examined, FSL supported the intercourse account, the defence admitted Morena presence and the proposed aunt alibi was not proved. The Court did not lay down a general requirement of medical proof or corroboration.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal. The relevant version is the IPC as it stood in November 2007 before later sexual-offence amendments. Sections 361 and 363 concern taking or enticing a girl under eighteen out of the keeping of her lawful guardian without guardian consent. Section 366 requires the further purpose of compelling marriage or forcing or inducing illicit intercourse; the Court found enticement and upheld both counts. Section 375 Sixthly then made intercourse with a girl under sixteen rape with or without consent; Section 376(1) carried a seven-year minimum term on the Court's account. The applicable age thresholds were distinct: under eighteen for girl-kidnapping, under sixteen for the 2007 rape clause. The Court applied no later POCSO, BNS or amended IPC threshold.

Section 35 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, governs the relevance of an entry of fact in an official record or a record kept in performance of a duty, subject to proper proof and assessment of its evidentiary weight. Rule 12(3) of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Rules, 2007, prescribed an order of preference for documentary age evidence, with an opinion from a duly constituted Medical Board sought only when the specified records are unavailable, and a possible reasoned adjustment to the lower side under clause (b). Through Jarnail Singh, the Court used that age method for a crime victim. The medical slides and FSL report were weighed as evidence of sexual intercourse. The default imprisonment and the direction that the sentences run concurrently formed part of the operative order.

4. Issues : (i) Was the prosecutrix below sixteen on 7 November 2007, given the proved school certificate, family testimony and higher radiological and dental age estimates, and did a two-year medical margin automatically require treating her as adult? (ii) Did her apparent voluntary departure prevent Sections 363 and 366 liability, or had the appellant taken or enticed her from guardianship with the requisite additional purpose? (iii) Did her admission of consent negate the 2007 Section 375 Sixthly/376 charge, and did the medical/FSL and witness evidence establish intercourse and identity despite the doctor's limited opinion and no fresh injury? (iv) Did the alleged prior hostility, separate prosecution of her father or account of staying at his aunt's house create reasonable doubt; were Sunil and Sham Singh factually controlling? (v) What sentence and consequential surrender order followed affirmed convictions? (vi) Did the retained counsel's unanswered letter show that the appellant wanted to change representation and prevent final hearing with that counsel as amicus, given the Registry record and absence of a replacement application?

5. Ratio / Findings : Before reaching the merits, the Court rejected counsel's inference that an unanswered letter meant the appellant sought replacement. It examined the repeated Registry appearances at which that counsel had identified the appellant, the absence of an application to change counsel, and the single missed appearance after final hearing was scheduled. The right to counsel of choice did not require another adjournment on this record; counsel accepted the amicus request and argued the appeal. This finding depends on the absence of an actual replacement request, not a power to deny a stated choice.

On age, the Court separated Section 35 relevance from weight and found Ex. P.1 proved by the headmaster with original school records. The family and prosecutrix's accounts likewise placed her under sixteen. Under Jarnail Singh's application of Rule 12(3) to victims, the available school record, which had priority under the prescribed hierarchy, removed the need to determine age from ossification alone. It nonetheless considered the radiology and dental ranges. Rejecting an automatic addition of two years for the benefit of the accused under Mukarrab, it held the combined evidence showed she was below sixteen when she disappeared in 2007. The Rule's benefit of reducing the estimated age by up to one year applies in favour of the child when the conditions for medical assessment are met; it does not support the upward adjustment sought by the appellant.

On kidnapping, the appellant had made a prior proposal to go to Jaipur and called her out at night. She said she willingly accompanied and stayed with him, but Anver Singh requires examining whether her departure resulted from taking or inducement, not simply whether she walked without physical force. The Court found prior enticement and later recovery from his home, and affirmed Sections 363 and 366, finding that the kidnapping was intended to compel her to marry. Recovery alone is not the rule it adopted.

On intercourse and rape, the doctor found no fresh injury and offered no definite recent-intercourse opinion. The Court nevertheless considered the prosecutrix's account and FSL's human semen and sperm on slides, swabs and clothes. It accepted that she described the intercourse as consensual, then applied the pre-amendment under-sixteen clause: her willingness did not constitute legally effective consent for the purposes of Section 376. Iqbal and Satish Kumar Jayanti Lal Dabgar supplied the controlling threshold and its limits. The finding is for the November 2007 offence, and does not state the age thresholds under later statutory provisions.

The father acknowledged a Section 307 case against him, but said it arose after his daughter's case; the appellant supplied no refuting document, so the chronology did not support the alleged counterblast. The appellant's own testimony admitted he was in Morena on 7 November. His claim of staying at his aunt's house was not supported by her testimony, a ticket or proof of residence; Asgar Khan's account did not resolve that gap. The Court distinguished Sunil's missing age proof and Sham Singh's combination of serious corroborative weaknesses. It accepted the prosecutrix with the evidence actually adduced rather than inferring guilt solely from an unproved alibi. On sentence, it concluded that the statutory minimum sentence of seven years' rigorous imprisonment, rather than the ten years imposed by the trial court under Section 376(1), would serve the interests of justice in the case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court affirmed the convictions under IPC Sections 363, 366 and 376. The sentence of rigorous imprisonment under Section 376 was reduced from ten to seven years, with ₹5,000 fine and one-year rigorous imprisonment in default retained. The one-year rigorous imprisonment and ₹1,000 fine with three-month default term under Section 363, and three-year rigorous imprisonment and ₹3,000 fine with six-month default term under Section 366, remained intact. The sentences were ordered to run concurrently. Bail bonds were cancelled and Pramod Mahor, then on bail, was directed to surrender immediately before the trial court to serve the remaining sentence; the record was to be transmitted for compliance. The appeal was disposed of to this extent, without acquittal or remand.

Pramod Mahor v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 875/2008, 16/08/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Investigation control — Section 482 — arrest and charge sheet not predetermined - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, rejected mechanical High Court directions compelling police to arrest, seize property and file a charge sheet. The passage quoted from M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explains that arrest under Section 41 CrPC involves a discretion that must be exercised cautiously because it affects liberty. Arrest is not an automatic consequence of FIR registration. The reference to Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, stresses the need to hear persons likely to be affected by drastic judicial orders directing investigation. Applying those limits, the Court refused the informant's demand to direct arrest and challan in Crime No. 5/2022 under IPC Sections 307/34. It did not decide the evidence or preclude arrest if lawfully found necessary.

Timely investigation — Section 173(1) — choice of final report - The investigation of a registered FIR cannot be allowed to remain pending without necessary progress. Section 173(1) CrPC requires completion of investigation without unnecessary delay; D. Venkatasubramaniam also recognises that the lawful result may be a charge sheet or a closure report. The Court directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation promptly and take necessary steps according to law while leaving arrest, evidence collection and the final report to police assessment. The applicant could bring any continuing grievance to the Superintendent of Police. No fixed deadline or compulsory charge sheet was ordered.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pramod Singh Tomar made a complaint at Police Station Mahua, District Morena, on which Crime No. 5/2022 was registered for IPC Sections 307 and 34. He then applied under Section 482 CrPC, saying that despite registration the police had taken no further action and had not arrested the persons accused. His quoted prayer asked the High Court to order arrest, a challan after due inquiry and proceedings under "Section 82 and 82" CrPC. The Court therefore addressed the propriety of directing investigative acts and the general duty to complete the investigation, rather than the merits of the attempted-murder accusation. A proxy counsel appeared for the applicant and State counsel appeared. The Court first ruled that it could not grant an order to arrest named persons. It then considered the statutory duty of expedition and disposed of the application with a direction to the investigating officer, while leaving the applicant free to bring any grievance to the Superintendent of Police.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was quoted at length and directly applied. The Supreme Court had set aside a High Court order that, without adequate reasons and without hearing persons affected, directed police to record statements, arrest, seize property and file a charge sheet. It distinguishes between the police's statutory duty to investigate and judicial efforts under Section 482 to prescribe its method or result. A lawful investigation need not invariably end in arrest, seizure or a charge sheet; it may instead support a negative report. The exercise of inherent power is confined to its three statutory purposes and requires restraint. The present Court followed that ratio to reject the informant's request for arrest and a compulsory challan while retaining a limited direction for timely completion of the investigation.

Within that Supreme Court passage, M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explains that Section 41 permits but does not require arrest in investigations into cognizable offences. Police must assess necessity after relevant inquiry, exercising caution because arrest affects liberty, reputation and status. The High Court incorporated this rule by quoting D. Venkatasubramaniam. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, is quoted on a reasonable hearing before judicial orders that set criminal law in motion and gravely affect reputation. In D. Venkatasubramaniam, the Supreme Court treated the unreasoned order made without notice to the affected persons as a nullity. The High Court reproduced that qualification.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the basis of the request to exercise inherent jurisdiction. It permits orders to give effect to an order under the Code, prevent abuse of a court's process or secure the ends of justice; the judgment rejects using that power to control the conduct of a police investigation or command a specified arrest or charge-sheet decision. Section 41 CrPC appeared in M.C. Abraham's quoted discussion of police arrest discretion and the liberty consequences of its use. Section 173(1) CrPC expressly requires investigations under its Chapter to be completed without unnecessary delay; the Court used that positive duty to require prompt conclusion and a lawful final report, leaving the choice between a charge sheet and a closure report to the police on the basis of the evidence. IPC Sections 307 and 34 identify the alleged offence and joint liability referred to in the FIR; no element was determined. The prayer's “Section 82 and 82” reference appears in the quoted prayer.

4. Issues : (i) After registration of an FIR, could an informant obtain orders under Section 482 requiring the police to arrest the accused persons and file a challan, or would that predetermine investigative discretion and prejudice persons not heard? (ii) What judicial response was justified by the claim that the investigation following registration of the FIR had not progressed: could the Court insist on lawful and timely completion under Section 173(1) without commanding a particular outcome?

5. Ratio / Findings : The rule stated by the Supreme Court in D. Venkatasubramaniam, including the passage quoted from M.C. Abraham, limits judicial interference under Section 482 with police methods of investigation. Registration of an FIR for a cognizable offence does not itself oblige immediate arrest. Police must exercise their discretion under Section 41 carefully in view of liberty and reputation and decide after inquiry whether a charge sheet or a closure report is warranted. Unreasoned commands to arrest or charge, particularly without hearing affected persons, can inflict serious consequences. The applicant's specific demands would have put the High Court in charge of the manner of investigation in Crime No. 5/2022. The Court therefore refused those demands.

The refusal to direct particular investigative steps did not permit delay in completing the investigation. Section 173(1)'s mandate of completion without unnecessary delay required the officer to bring the investigation to a conclusion and file the legally appropriate report. The Court therefore directed prompt completion and necessary lawful steps. The direction does not require a charge sheet, fix a deadline or decide the merits. It preserves police discretion over the manner and outcome of the investigation while enforcing the statutory duty not to leave the investigation pending. Any continuing grievance could be brought to the Superintendent of Police, who would consider it according to law.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court disposed of the Section 482 application. No order for arrest, compulsory challan or the requested Section 82 process was granted. The investigating officer was directed to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take necessary steps under law; the applicant was free to make an application concerning any grievance to the Superintendent of Police, Morena, for consideration according to law. The FIR remained under investigation, with no guilt finding, quashing, fixed deadline or direction requiring either prosecution or closure.

Pramod Singh Tomar v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 10674/2022, 04/03/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Commercial transaction — civil and criminal overlap — quashing limit - Indian Oil Corporation v. NEPC India Ltd., (2006) 6 SCC 736, requires taking a complaint as a whole at face value without a mini-trial; a complaint containing a factual foundation for a criminal offence is not defeated by the availability of a parallel civil remedy, while quashing may be ordered sparingly where the allegations disclose no offence or constitute a manifest abuse of process. Trisuns Chemical Industry v. Rajesh Agarwal, (1999) 8 SCC 686, adds that arbitration does not adjudicate criminal culpability. Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of W.B., (2002) 1 SCC 555, Lalmuni Devi v. State of Bihar, (2001) 2 SCC 17, and M. Krishnan v. Vijay Singh, (2001) 8 SCC 645, reject the pendency of civil proceedings alone as a reason to stop the criminal process. The complainant's alleged investment and entrustment of partnership assets, followed by removal of machinery and unaccounted funds, provided a prima facie basis under Sections 405/406; the Court dismissed the challenge without finding guilt.

Discharge — defence documents — stage-specific Section 91 limit - State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, (2005) 1 SCC 568, distinguishes the prosecution record relevant when a charge is being framed from disputed defence materials. The need for such materials must be assessed at the relevant procedural stage. Section 91 is ordinarily unavailable to an accused at that point to compel documents intended to show innocence. Accounts, balance sheets, machinery and loan records offered outside the charge sheet required proof and could not be weighed in this challenge under Section 482 to the refusal of discharge under Section 239. The Magistrate's refusal to discharge and the revisional affirmation stood; merits were left for trial.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Krishna Mahobiya, the applicant Pramod Vishvaiya's sister, made a complaint concerning Mangeshi Construction Company, described as a partnership firm. She alleged that she had contributed ₹30 lakh for a 50% share, with accounts maintained through the firm; machinery was bought with a ₹20 lakh loan secured by a house. According to her, Pramod removed machinery intended for the company's work and failed to account for entrusted property or funds. Those assertions were the prosecution allegations, not findings that he had converted any particular machine or amount. A prior High Court writ order dated 15 June 2016 prompted FIR registration.

Pramod argued that a business and arbitration dispute had been turned into a criminal case. He denied embezzlement and asserted that the ingredients of Sections 405/406 IPC were absent, particularly dishonest conversion of company property against an obligation. He filed I.A. No. 2477/2019 asking to place partnership accounts, balance sheets, machinery purchase and loan-payment documents on record to support his explanation. The State opposed quashing because a civil aspect does not alone exclude a crime. The JMFC, Gwalior, in Criminal Case No. 1343/2017 rejected his Section 239 CrPC discharge application on 22 August 2017; the 10th Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior affirmed in Criminal Revision No. 453/2017 on 16 May 2018. The present MCRC No. 22856/2018 invoked Section 482 to quash the revisional order and thereby overturn the refusal of discharge.

2. Precedents — Considered : Indian Oil Corporation v. NEPC India Ltd., (2006) 6 SCC 736, was quoted for a structured test under Section 482: the complaint must be read as a whole and its allegations taken at face value, without assessing their truth or conducting a mini-trial; intervention is permissible where no offence is disclosed or there is clear malice or absurdity; the power must be used sparingly so that a legitimate prosecution is not stifled; and sufficient basic facts are required, rather than a verbatim statement of every element. It distinguishes purely civil, purely criminal and mixed wrongs. The High Court treated the sister's allegations of entrustment and diversion of partnership assets as a prima facie basis for criminal proceedings despite a civil remedy, without deciding the evidence.

Trisuns Chemical Industry v. Rajesh Agarwal, (1999) 8 SCC 686, says the civil character of a dispute and an arbitration clause cannot automatically replace criminal prosecution for an act disclosing an offence; quashing at the threshold remains confined to exceptional cases. Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of West Bengal, (2002) 1 SCC 555, reproduced and endorsed that principle against stopping criminal proceedings solely because civil litigation is pending. Lalmuni Devi v. State of Bihar, (2001) 2 SCC 17, accepts quashing where no offence is disclosed but rejects the assumption that the maintainability of a civil claim makes a prima facie criminal complaint untenable. M. Krishnan v. Vijay Singh, (2001) 8 SCC 645, concerned alleged forged documents and explained that criminal proceedings do not have to await a civil ruling on the authenticity of the documents, and the criminal allegations must be proved independently; the different burdens and possible eventual acquittal do not justify premature quashing. The High Court considered these authorities on the common principle governing the overlap between civil and criminal proceedings. It did not find document forgery in this partnership case.

State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, (2005) 1 SCC 568, was considered on the second issue. The quoted passage explains that production under Section 91 CrPC depends on necessity, the party seeking production and the procedural stage. When deciding whether to frame a charge, the court uses the Section 173 prosecution record; an accused ordinarily cannot invoke Section 91 to compel material to support a defence requiring proof before the appropriate stage. The High Court applied that limitation to Pramod's accounting, balance-sheet, purchase and loan documents outside the charge sheet. It does not finally examine the truth of the disputed documents.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to challenge the revisional order affirming the refusal of discharge. Section 239 governs discharge by the Magistrate in a warrant case on the police report; the decision here was a threshold review, not a trial verdict. Section 91 appeared in Debendra Nath Padhi's discussion of compelled production and its stage-specific limits; Section 173 identifies the police record considered when a charge is being framed in that precedent. Counsel invoked IPC Sections 405 and 406 in disputing entrustment and dishonest misappropriation or conversion. The Court found prima facie material to frame a Section 406 charge on allegations of entrusted partnership property and misappropriated funds. The Court found allegations sufficient at the prima facie stage but did not determine the precise ownership or evaluate the accounting evidence. Civil/arbitration remedies were material background.

4. Issues : (i) Did the complaint about partnership investment, machinery and allegedly unaccounted entrusted property disclose a prima facie Section 405/406 offence, notwithstanding the civil or arbitration character of the relationship, or was prosecution manifestly abusive? (ii) Could the accused place accounting and machinery documents not forming part of the charge sheet on record and have the High Court evaluate them to show innocence at Section 239 discharge and Section 482 review? (iii) Should the High Court interfere with the JMFC and revisional refusal to discharge, or leave contested facts and final determination of the ingredients of the offence to trial?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court quoted and applied the Supreme Court distinction between the availability of a civil claim and whether the complaint on its face discloses an independent criminal offence. A partnership can generate civil disputes, but that alone cannot justify quashing the prosecution if a basic factual foundation for entrustment and dishonest diversion exists. The sister alleged substantial contribution, a 50% interest, loan-financed machinery, the applicant's removal of equipment and failure to account for entrusted funds. At this stage those assertions supplied a prima facie Section 406 case. They were not tested as established facts, and the Court deliberately avoided detailed observations that could prejudice the trial. It did not say that every accounting disagreement proves dishonest misappropriation.

Pramod's accounts, balance sheet, machinery purchase and loan-payment material were outside the charge sheet and would require formal proof and contextual evaluation. Under Debendra Nath Padhi, Section 91 is not an ordinary route for the accused to bring a factual defence into the initial decision on framing a charge; nor could proceedings under Section 482 become a trial on the merits of those documents. The Magistrate's rejection of discharge, affirmed in revision, therefore warranted no interference on that basis.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The revisional order of 16 May 2018 affirming the JMFC's 22 August 2017 rejection of Section 239 discharge remained in force; the Section 406 prosecution could proceed. It expressly withheld merits observations to avoid prejudice to the trial court.

Headnote :- False certificate — created outside court before filing — Section 340 complaint objection - Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, (2005) 4 SCC 370, was applied for the distinction between manipulation of a document in custodia legis and alleged fabrication outside court before use in a judicial proceeding. The Court rejected the applicant's claim that the only procedure available in respect of a Sarpanch's suspected false repair certificate was a complaint by the court under Section 340 CrPC; a police FIR could follow if an inquiry established that the certificate had been falsely prepared before filing. The applicant produced no proof of sawmill ownership, licence or repair work, but the suspicion remained subject to a directed Superintendent of Police inquiry. Registration against the Sarpanch was conditional on a finding in that inquiry that the applicant was not a sawmill owner. Bail under Section 438 was independently refused in light of the large quantity of seized liquor and the packing material, alleged flight and Section 59-A of the M.P. Excise Act; no final finding of forgery or liability was made.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pran Singh Lodhi applied for anticipatory bail under Section 438 CrPC in Crime No. 150/2021 at Police Station Basai, Datia, under Sections 34(2) and 49-A of the M.P. Excise Act. The State's account was that police received information he and Salikram were packing illicit country-made liquor in Salikram's premises. The police allegedly saw both men packing liquor when they arrived, and both men ran into the nearby forest. Officers said they seized two 200-litre drums and four 50-litre containers of “OP” concentrated liquor, totalling 600 litres, 200 quarters of country-made liquor, a packing machine, empty quarters, caps and measurement apparatus. The applicant disputed identification and produced an address document showing that he resided in another village. The State responded that residence elsewhere did not make his presence at the site impossible. These were bail-stage accounts, not findings of guilt after trial.

Pran also filed what he described as an original certificate from the Sarpanch of Gram Panchayat Garetha stating that he had been getting a machine repaired at the relevant time. The certificate did not identify the machine. Counsel later described it as his sawmill, but he had produced no document showing ownership of a sawmill, a licence under the M.P. Kashtha Chiran (Viniyaman) Adhiniyam, 1984, or the actual repair work. The Court regarded the certificate as apparently false and potentially created for use in the proceeding before it. It refused bail, then ordered an inquiry into the sawmill and the certificate. When counsel argued that only a court complaint could be made for a false document used in court, the Court separately addressed whether the document had allegedly been created before filing or while it was in the custody of the court.

2. Precedents — Considered : Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, (2005) 4 SCC 370, was relied on in the Court's reasoning. The High Court cited it for the procedural distinction that an allegedly concocted document made outside court before production is not treated as one forged while in custodia legis for the court-complaint restriction counsel invoked. The present Court applied that distinction to a certificate supposedly issued by a Sarpanch and subsequently produced before the court in the bail proceeding, concluding that if the inquiry established that the certificate had been falsely prepared before filing, an FIR could be registered.

3. Statutes considered : Section 438 CrPC governed the application for protection from arrest. Sections 34(2) and 49-A of the M.P. Excise Act were the alleged liquor offences, and Section 59-A of that Act was expressly among the reasons to refuse anticipatory bail. The M.P. Kashtha Chiran (Viniyaman) Adhiniyam, 1984, was invoked to test whether the asserted sawmill could have a licence; the Court directed verification, not a final finding of an offence under that law. Counsel invoked Section 340 CrPC as requiring a complaint by the court as the sole procedure for an allegedly false document filed in court. The Court described a “bar” under that section and, through Iqbal Singh Marwah, distinguished creation outside court before filing from fabrication while the document was in the custody of the court. No criminal-document offence section was charged against the Sarpanch in the operative order; any registration depended on the inquiry.

4. Issues : (i) Did the liquor seizure allegations, reported flight, proposed alibi certificate and the M.P. Excise Act restriction warrant anticipatory bail? (ii) Did the absence of sawmill ownership, licence and repair details warrant an inquiry into the certificate issued by the Sarpanch, and was its suspected falsity at this point a final determination? (iii) If a document was fabricated outside court before being filed in a judicial proceeding, did counsel's objection that Section 340 required a complaint by the court prohibit a police FIR, and what conditional direction followed? The Court did not decide the Sarpanch's guilt, the authenticity of the certificate after full inquiry, or the applicant's culpability for the liquor offence.

5. Ratio / Findings : The State argued that the material concerning the address established where the applicant lived but did not negate his possible presence at another village. The Sarpanch certificate referred only to an unspecified machine. The later explanation concerning a sawmill was unsupported by proof of ownership, a licence or repair work. On this record the Court suspected that the certificate had been made for use in the bail proceeding. The Court considered the alleged seizure of 600 litres of concentrated liquor, the additional quarters and packing equipment, the alleged flight and Section 59-A together, and found no case for anticipatory bail. These are bail-stage assessments and do not prove the underlying offence or a forged certificate beyond reasonable doubt.

The Court directed the Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri to investigate whether Pran owned a sawmill and had a licence. It directed that an FIR be registered against the Sarpanch who issued the certificate if the inquiry found that the applicant was not a sawmill owner. Counsel then asserted that a case concerning a false document could proceed only on a complaint by the court under Section 340. The Court distinguished creation or manipulation while the document is in custodia legis from a certificate made outside court before filing. Applying the principle it drew from Iqbal Singh Marwah, the Court held that a certificate made outside court before filing was not subject to the asserted bar requiring a complaint by the court. An ordinary FIR could be registered if its falsity was established.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court dismissed the application for anticipatory bail under Section 438 CrPC. The Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri was directed to inquire into sawmill ownership and licence and, if the inquiry found that the applicant did not own a sawmill, to register an offence against the Sarpanch for issuing a false certificate intended for court use. The inquiry was to finish within two months and its report was to reach the Principal Registrar of the High Court by 5 April 2022. The order did not itself convict anyone or finally declare the certificate forged.

Pran Singh Lodhi v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 5067/2022, 03/02/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR mandamus / alternative remedy - Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, recognises the duty under Section 154 CrPC to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence but directs an informant faced with inaction to the complaint procedure before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200; its discussion distinguishes the question of police duty in Ramesh Kumari from the question of the proper remedial forum. Applying that distinction, the High Court declined the purchaser's Article 226 demand for registration, without deciding the underlying land-fraud allegations.

Exceptional writ control / investigative abuse - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, reserves intervention under Article 226 for rare cases in which mala fide abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII are clearly established and forbids the court from prescribing how police investigate; it also identifies the remedy of a complaint before the Magistrate where police take no action. The present Court reiterated this limit and issued no exceptional direction concerning the investigation on the basis of the alleged inaction.

Police inaction / statutory sequence - Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, identifies a written Section 154(3) application to the SP and, if the FIR remains unregistered or the investigation remains inadequate, a Section 156(3) application; the Magistrate may order registration or proper investigation and monitor it. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, applies that route, permitting a recommendation to the SP to change the investigating officer if necessary, while making clear that the Magistrate cannot investigate personally. The Court applied the alternative-remedy principle and left the petitioner free to approach the Magistrate; it made no prima facie finding that an offence had been committed.

Mandamus discretion / exceptions - Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (M.P. Division Bench, 20 December 2016), permits refusal of a mandamus directing FIR registration where the informant has not used Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 unless the Whirlpool exceptions apply. It distinguishes Lalita Kumari's Section 154 police duty from entitlement to a writ without resort to those remedies. The present single Judge followed that framework and dismissed the writ, with liberty under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC; the refund claimed against the private parties and the costs sought were not awarded.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pranav Tiwari brought Writ Petition No. 11935 of 2024 before the High Court of Madhya Pradesh at Jabalpur under Article 226 of the Constitution. His petition described a land purchase and named a vendor, two brokers and a bank manager as persons against whom he wanted a criminal case under Section 420 IPC, a colonizer law and the Gram Panchayat Swaraj Adhiniyam. He asked for a mandamus to the police and other authorities to register a case. He also sought reimbursement of the asserted purchase price of Rs. 6,50,000, registration expenditure of Rs. 25,000, approximately Rs. 1,11,000 paid as monthly instalments, interest and Rs. 1,00,000 litigation expenses. He referred to correspondence involving the Collector and Superintendent of Police and complained that no appropriate action had followed. The figures and allegations formed the basis of the relief sought in the petition; they were not findings of fraud or established loss.

Counsel submitted that despite the petitioner's complaint, the police had taken no action. The Court narrowly framed the question on which the petition turned: whether in Article 226 proceedings it should direct the police to register an FIR. The Court drew on four Supreme Court decisions and the M.P. Division Bench decision concerning the route for an aggrieved informant, and disposed of the petition on that procedural ground.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, 2007:INSC:760, (2007) 6 SCC 171: the quoted Supreme Court passage accepts that police must register an FIR on information showing a cognizable offence under Section 154 CrPC. It addresses the different question of what an informant should do if police fail, identifying a complaint before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200. It distinguishes Ramesh Kumari v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2006) 2 SCC 677, as addressing police action on cognizable information rather than the proper route for the complainant, and relies on the procedural approach stated in AIIMS Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh and Minu Kumari. The present Court invoked Aleque to distinguish the mandatory police duty from an automatic entitlement to a High Court mandamus directing FIR registration. The quoted Aleque disposition also says it did not determine the merits of its own underlying allegations.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, 2008:INSC:341, (2008) 3 SCC 542: the quoted Supreme Court paragraphs preserve the power to issue exceptional directions under Article 226 at an aggrieved person's instance in the rarest of rare cases where mala fide exercise of investigative power and clear non-compliance with Chapter XII amounting to abuse are shown. Even then the High Court cannot instruct police how to investigate, though it may insist on observance of the statutory process. Where police take no action on information, the passage directs an informant to the remedies under Sections 190 and 200 rather than to an ordinary writ petition. It quotes Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768, for the Magistrate's complaint inquiry, possible Chapter XII investigation, Section 203 dismissal, or cognizance and process on a prima facie case, also mentioning AIIMS Employees' Union. The present Court used Divine Retreat Centre to preserve the exception while declining intervention on the petitioner's inaction complaint; it made no affirmative finding that the identified exceptional abuse occurred.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., 2007:INSC:1243, (2008) 2 SCC 409: its quoted paragraph 11 gives the remedial sequence. For non-registration, the informant can apply in writing to the SP under Section 154(3); if the FIR is still not registered or investigation is deficient, a Section 156(3) application to the Magistrate permits an order for registration or proper investigation and monitoring of the investigation. The Court cited that authority as a reason for directing Tiwari to the statutory forum, without itself granting a Section 156(3) order or assessing the merits that a Magistrate would assess.

Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277: the reproduced Supreme Court discussion follows Sakiri Vasu. If prima facie satisfied on an application under Section 156(3), the Magistrate can ensure registration or proper investigation, monitor police progress and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer to the SSP/SP. The Magistrate cannot investigate personally. It explains the institutional reason for using that mechanism: indiscriminate writ petitions seeking FIRs and investigation directions would overwhelm High Courts. The present Court applied this approach based on the alternative remedy, without purporting to appoint an investigator or alter an existing investigation.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (M.P. Division Bench, Gwalior, 20 December 2016): the quoted division-bench formulation says mandamus to perform the Section 154 duty can be denied if the informant has not used Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, unless the four exceptions stated in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1, apply. It also says Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, addresses police registration duty rather than entitlement to bypass alternative remedies through a writ. The present single Judge followed that controlling approach of the Division Bench. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari appear through the Division Bench passage.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution supplied the jurisdiction invoked for mandamus to police and other public authorities. The Court treated this jurisdiction as available in principle but declined its use in an ordinary non-registration grievance given statutory alternatives; the qualification in Divine Retreat Centre concerning rare cases of clearly established abuse and the Division Bench's stated Whirlpool exceptions remain part of the quoted framework. Section 154 CrPC describes the police duty where information discloses a cognizable offence, and subsection (3) supplies a written approach to the Superintendent of Police when the police station fails to act. Section 156(3) provides a remedy before the Magistrate, who may on prima facie satisfaction direct registration or proper police investigation and monitor it, as the quoted Supreme Court cases explain. Sections 190 and 200 provide the procedure for a private complaint and cognizance, and Section 202 was expressly included in the liberty to approach the Magistrate in the operative paragraph. The Divine Retreat Centre quotation describes complaint inquiry under Chapter XV, possible dismissal under Section 203 and the issuance of process where the complaint or evidence prima facie discloses an offence; it is context for the alternative forum, not an order taking cognizance here. Chapter XII appears in the exceptional investigation-control passage. Section 420 IPC and the unspecified colonizer and Panchayat enactments occurred in the prayers as alleged offences; the Court did not construe their elements, choose charges or decide that an FIR was legally required on these specific allegations.

4. Issues : The immediate question, expressly framed in paragraph 3, was whether the High Court should, in proceedings under Article 226, compel the police to register an FIR because the petitioner said that no action had been taken on his complaint. That required distinguishing the statutory duty to register an FIR on information disclosing a cognizable offence from the proper judicial remedy after inaction, identifying the ordinary remedies before the Magistrate and the SP, and retaining the narrow possibility of extraordinary intervention where justified. The prayer for relief also sought criminal action against the named private persons and repayment of the amounts relating to the land purchase and loan. The Court did not adjudicate fraud, the applicability of a colonizer or Panchayat statute, private monetary liability, or the credibility or adequacy of any particular police response; those were not treated as separate decided criminal-law propositions.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court began with Aleque Padamsee's distinction between the police obligation and the informant's remedy: even if facts brought to the police disclose a cognizable offence requiring FIR registration, an informant faced with inaction ordinarily has the remedies under Sections 190 and 200 before a Magistrate. Thus the existence of the police's Section 154 duty does not itself establish entitlement to an Article 226 mandamus in the first instance. The quoted Aleque treatment of Ramesh Kumari makes clear that the holding on police duty does not itself determine that the writ forum is the proper remedy.

Divine Retreat Centre added that constitutional intervention remains possible in rare cases where clearly established mala fide abuse of investigative power and non-compliance with Chapter XII warrant it, while even such intervention cannot dictate the investigation's method. It also reinforced complaint remedies for mere non-action. Sakiri Vasu supplied the Section 154(3) written application to the SP followed, if needed, by Section 156(3) recourse. Under that provision, the Magistrate may, on the required satisfaction, order registration and proper investigation, and may monitor the investigation. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe reinforced the institutional and statutory reasons for directing these disputes to the Magistrate and explained a possible recommendation to change the investigating officer, without personal investigation by the Magistrate. The Court did not find a need to exercise the rare Article 226 power on this record or perform the Magistrate's prima facie evaluation itself.

Finally, Shweta Bhadauria provided the governing M.P. Division Bench approach: a mandamus to enforce Section 154 may be refused where the enumerated alternative remedies have not been pursued, subject to the stated qualification concerning the Whirlpool exceptions, and the rule on police duty in Lalita Kumari does not independently dispense with those alternatives.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the writ petition. Tiwari was expressly given liberty, if he chose, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Sections 156(3), 200 and 202 CrPC for redress. There was no direction to police to register an FIR, to an officer to investigate or to a private person or bank to reimburse the sums claimed. The eventual assessment by the Magistrate and any proceedings concerning the alleged land transaction remained open; the dismissal did not declare the named persons guilty or decide the requested money relief.

Pranav Tiwari v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 11935/2024, 09/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Minor-child maintenance / earning mother - Padmja Sharma v. Ratan Lal Sharma, (2000) 4 SCC 266, was applied for the principle that both earning parents must contribute to their children's maintenance in proportion to their income. The Family Court could not reject a minor daughter's Section 125 claim solely because her mother, an Anganwadi worker, received an honorarium of Rs. 2,500, particularly when that sum could not support both. The High Court assessed the child's need at Rs. 6,000 monthly and, applying a 2:1 apportionment on the facts of this case, fixed her father's contribution at Rs. 4,000. The 2:1 figure is an application here, not a fixed statutory allocation.

Income evidence / adverse inference - The father admitted working as an ambulance driver, while claiming that the employment was temporary, but did not testify to his own salary or produce an available salary slip. A witness's estimate of Rs. 4,500 and the unproved allegation of farmland did not justify placing the entire burden of proving the father's income on the mother. Both sides had withheld material earnings evidence, and the mother initially concealed her Anganwadi appointment; the trial court's reaction to that conduct could not replace an assessment based on evidence and law or extinguish the child's independent right to maintenance. The Court stated that an adverse inference can be drawn where a party suppresses the best evidence available to him, referring to the father's available salary slip.

Effective date / delay - Rajnesh v. Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, was applied for awarding maintenance from the date of filing the Section 125 application. The Court examined the 2015–22 procedural history and found no unnecessary delay by the child; the unavailability of the court and adjournments sought by the respondent could not deprive her of the earlier start date. The father's Rs. 4,000 monthly contribution was ordered from 25 April 2015. The Family Court's rejection was set aside only for the child, while the mother's revision was dismissed as withdrawn.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pratigya and her minor daughter, shown as applicants 1 and 2, respectively, sought maintenance from Neelesh Kumar under Section 125 CrPC. The marriage was recorded as having taken place on 15 May 2009; the daughter was born of that marriage. Pratigya was appointed as an Anganwadi worker by an order dated 31 August 2010, with a monthly honorarium of Rs. 2,500, a fact initially suppressed according to the Family Court and later established by the appointment order that Neelesh himself supplied. In MJC No. 66/2015, the Principal Judge, Family Court, Vidisha, dismissed both claims on 31 August 2016 mainly because the mother worked and could supposedly maintain herself and the child. The application had been filed on 25 April 2015.

The applicants invoked Sections 397 and 401 CrPC in Criminal Revision No. 983 of 2016. Counsel acknowledged the mother's employment and sought permission to withdraw the revision as to her own maintenance. He maintained that her earnings did not excuse the father's support obligation to the daughter. Neelesh opposed the daughter's revision, describing his private job as low-paid and saying the mother could support the child. In his response below, he had acknowledged working as a driver of a 108 ambulance but said the engagement was temporary. The applicants alleged Rs. 10,000 monthly wages and 10–20 acres of farmland, while a defence witness stated that Neelesh's monthly earnings were Rs. 4,500 and the father's own evidence omitted a salary figure. The child was about four on 18 August 2015, the date of her mother's examination. The Court had to address the child's independent entitlement, the parents' respective contributions and arrears after lengthy proceedings.

2. Precedents — Considered : Padmja Sharma v. Ratan Lal Sharma, (2000) 4 SCC 266, was cited for the proposition that both an earning father and an earning mother must contribute to their children's maintenance in proportion to their income. The present order says the Supreme Court directed payment by the parents in a 2:1 proportion in that case. The High Court then applied the 2:1 proportion to the child's assessed needs of Rs. 6,000, assigning Rs. 4,000 to the father and the balance implicitly to the earning mother. The Court applied that proportion in this case; it did not lay down a universal fixed statutory allocation or treat the honorarium of Rs. 2,500 as sufficient for both mother and child. The Court applied the precedent in allowing the child's revision and fixing the father's contribution.

Rajnesh v. Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, was quoted on the date from which maintenance is awarded. The excerpt from its paragraph 131 states that maintenance in all cases will run from the date of filing the maintenance application, with a reference to its own Part B-IV. The High Court adopted that rule on the commencement date and separately examined whether the applicants' procedural conduct presented any obstacle to applying it; it found no unnecessary adjournments by the child.

3. Statutes considered : Section 125 CrPC governed the wife's and minor daughter's original maintenance applications and the assessment of means and support. The Court kept the child's entitlement independent of the mother's decision not to contest dismissal of her personal claim. It assessed each earning parent's contribution rather than treating the mother's small honorarium as a full discharge of the father's duty. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC provided the revisional jurisdiction under which the Family Court order was examined and partly set aside. The Court applied its inference from the withholding of income evidence on the facts of this case when fixing maintenance.

4. Issues : (i) After withdrawal of the mother's personal revision, could the Family Court's refusal of the minor child's maintenance stand merely because her mother, an Anganwadi worker, earned Rs. 2,500 per month? (ii) How should both parents' means and a child's needs be evaluated where the father acknowledged employment as an ambulance driver but did not disclose his salary or produce the documents showing it, and where the mother had initially concealed her own work? (iii) What monthly amount should the father contribute and should it run from the 25 April 2015 application or the eventual order, given the procedural history? No final determination was sought or made on the mother's personal Section 125 entitlement after withdrawal, the father's alleged earnings of exactly Rs. 10,000 or landholding of 10–20 acres, or any criminal allegation.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court separated applicant 2's independent need from applicant 1's own claim. The mother was an Anganwadi worker, but her Rs. 2,500 monthly honorarium was plainly insufficient to maintain both herself and a young daughter. The Family Court had reacted to her suppression of employment, yet a maintenance court must decide on evidence and law rather than allow disapproval of the mother's conduct to defeat the child's right. Applying Padmja Sharma as expressed in this order, both earning parents contribute in proportion to their income.

The income evidence did not justify placing the entire burden of proving Neelesh's income on Pratigya. Neelesh admitted in his reply that he drove a 108 ambulance and had the means to produce a salary slip, yet omitted his income from examination-in-chief and in cross-examination only denied the asserted Rs. 10,000 figure. Laxman Chaurasiya (DW-3) mentioned Rs. 4,500 per month. Ramkrishna Chaurasiya (DW-2), Neelesh's father, remained silent on the alleged farmland; neither the alleged landholding nor the claimed salary of Rs. 10,000 was established as a precise measure of his income. Pratigya's father Bhanwarlal had acknowledged her Rs. 2,500 honorarium, and Neelesh filed the appointment order. The Court expressly said both sides suppressed material earnings evidence, and stated that an adverse inference can be drawn against a party suppressing the best evidence available to him, referring to Neelesh's salary slip.

Considering the child's approximate age of four when her mother was examined on 18 August 2015, the price index and the cost of ordinary needs, the Court fixed the child's monthly maintenance at Rs. 6,000. It applied a 2:1 apportionment under Padmja Sharma and directed the father to pay Rs. 4,000 per month. The mother's share follows from that calculation; the operative order only imposes the father's liability and does not direct a separate payment by her. As to the commencement date, Rajnesh v. Neha required maintenance to be awarded from the date of filing the application. The Court traced that the mother was examined on 18 August 2015, her father on 24 February 2016, the respondent's evidence was fixed for 24 May 2016, and the Family Court decided on 31 August 2016. The reasons for adjournment included the absence of a presiding officer and a bar reference following an advocate's death. In the revision, notice was initially issued in October 2016, and the matter was heard and later released by the judge. Requests by the respondent and a proposed compromise also delayed the hearing. It found no unnecessary adjournment attributable to the child.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has set aside the order dated 31 August 2016 passed by the Principal Judge, Family Court, Vidisha in MJC No. 66/2015 only as it related to applicant 2. The minor daughter's revision was allowed and Neelesh was directed to pay her Rs. 4,000 per month with effect from 25 April 2015, the date of her Section 125 application. Pratigya's revision as applicant 1 was dismissed as withdrawn on her request.

Headnote :- Police investigation / refusal to compel arrest and charge sheet - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, disapproved unreasoned judicial directions prescribing arrest, seizure, the recording of statements and the filing of a charge sheet. M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, quoted in that decision, explains that the power of arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because it affects liberty and reputation; an FIR does not compel automatic arrest. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, also quoted in that decision, requires a reasonable opportunity of hearing before drastic judicial directions against affected persons. Applying these limits under Section 528 BNSS, the Court refused the informant's demands to arrest persons accused in Crime No. 117/2024 and require prosecution.

Timely conclusion / report left to evidence - Section 173(1) CrPC was quoted for the requirement that every investigation under that Chapter be completed without unnecessary delay, with Section 193 BNSS named alongside it in the order. The investigating officer must reach a lawful conclusion and submit a charge sheet or closure report as warranted; the Court can require expedition without choosing the report or managing investigative technique. It directed the investigating officer to complete the investigation as early as possible and take the necessary steps according to law, and permitted the applicant to raise any grievance before the Superintendent of Police, Datia. The Court did not direct mandatory arrest or the filing of a charge sheet, prescribe a deadline, or adjudicate liability under the IPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pratap Ahirwar filed an application under Section 528 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023, in the High Court of Madhya Pradesh, Gwalior Bench. On his complaint, Police Station Badoni in Datia had registered Crime No. 117/2024 alleging IPC Sections 307, 341, 323 and 34. He said police had taken no further action and had not arrested the accused persons. The prayer sought fair investigation, arrest of the accused, and protection for him and his family. Paragraph 3 of the Court's order separately characterises the requested direction as arrest and filing of a charge sheet. This is an application by an informant seeking directions concerning the investigation, not a trial or bail adjudication.

This order concerns Pratap Ahirwar's case; it makes no separate finding in MCRC 51065/2024. The Court addressed the request for coercive steps and the distinct statutory obligation to complete an investigation.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan

Krishnamachari, 2009:INSC:1132, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was reproduced at length. There the Supreme Court examined a High Court order that had directed police to record witnesses' statements, arrest, seize property, inspect records and file a charge sheet within a specified period. The Supreme Court held that investigating crimes is ordinarily the police's statutory domain, and a High Court cannot mechanically prescribe those steps or predetermine the outcome under Section 482 CrPC. Depending on the investigation, a charge sheet may be filed or a finding that no case is made out may follow. Its discussion also identifies the limited statutory purposes of inherent power, the need for reasons and caution against casual judicial observations that influence the course of events. The present Court applied that governing restriction to refuse Ahirwar's demand for arrest and charge sheet under Section 528 BNSS; it did not treat the factual allegations in the Supreme Court case as facts of Crime No. 117/2024.

M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, 2002:INSC:575, (2003) 2 SCC 649, appears within the D. Venkatasubramaniam quotation. The reproduced paragraph explains that Section 41 CrPC gives police discretion to arrest in specified cognizable-offence circumstances without warrant, not a mechanical duty to arrest when a report is lodged. An investigator may first consider the evidence and necessity; the power affects personal liberty, status and reputation and must be cautiously exercised with regard to the offence and the persons concerned. The present Court treated this nested principle as part of the reason not to command immediate arrest, but did not itself assess whether the conditions under Section 41 were satisfied in relation to the particular suspects.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, 2008:INSC:341, (2008) 3 SCC 542, is also quoted within D. Venkatasubramaniam. Its paragraph 51 insists on a reasonable opportunity of hearing before a judicial order with drastic reputational consequences sets criminal law in motion against an affected person. D. Venkatasubramaniam separately found an unreasoned direction for investigation against appellants who had neither been impleaded nor heard to be unsustainable. The present Court reproduced that caution.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS was the provision conferring inherent power that the applicant invoked. The Court used D. Venkatasubramaniam's construction of former Section 482 CrPC, including the restricted purposes of giving effect to a Code order, preventing abuse of court process and securing justice, to decline to prescribe the police's decisions on arrest and the filing of a charge sheet. Section 41 CrPC was discussed inside the quoted M.C. Abraham passage as discretionary arrest power. The Court then quoted the requirement in Section 173(1) CrPC that an investigation under the Chapter be completed without unnecessary delay, and styled its reference “Section 173(1) of Cr.P.C./193 of BNSS”. The text it quoted was that of the former provision. This duty to complete the investigation formed the basis of the limited direction for timely conclusion and submission of a lawful final report, which may be a closure report or a charge sheet. IPC Sections 307, 341, 323 and 34 were the registered allegations only. No element or charge was adjudicated.

4. Issues : (i) Could an informant invoke Section 528 BNSS to direct police to arrest the accused persons in a registered IPC case and file a charge sheet, or would those directives impermissibly predetermine police discretion? (ii) While refusing those specific commands, should the Court require the investigating officer to complete the pending investigation without unnecessary delay and submit a lawful final report under the cited provision requiring completion? The Court did not decide the factual truth of the FIR, the necessity of any particular arrest, the identity or guilt of the alleged offenders, or what final report the evidence would warrant.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court distinguished decisions on arrest and the filing of a charge sheet from the obligation to investigate. D. Venkatasubramaniam demonstrated why an order made in exercise of inherent jurisdiction compelling steps such as arrest, seizure and the filing of a charge sheet could direct the investigation along a course chosen by the court despite uncertain evidence and potentially severe consequences for unheard persons. M.C. Abraham's quoted analysis of Section 41 explains that arrest is discretionary and requires caution, rather than following automatically from FIR registration alone. Divine Retreat Centre's quoted hearing principle marks a further safeguard against drastic judicial directions. In Crime No. 117/2024, the applicant complained that the investigation had not progressed and no arrests had been made. The Court found it could not grant his requests to direct arrest and require the filing of a charge sheet because that would amount to supervising the investigation. It did not state that the accused were entitled to avoid arrest or that no charge sheet could eventually be filed. The refusal did not relieve the officer of the obligation to complete the investigation. The Court expressly quoted Section 173(1) CrPC alongside its reference to the BNSS provision and held that every investigation should conclude without unnecessary delay. The officer must reach a conclusion on whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, including a closure report if no case is made out or a charge sheet if a case is made out. It therefore directed the investigating officer to complete the investigation as early as possible and take the necessary steps according to law, leaving the procedural choices and the substantive content of the report to the investigator. The order prescribed no fixed period and permitted the applicant to raise any grievance before the SP.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has disposed of the Section 528 application. The High Court refused directions to arrest accused persons and file a charge sheet. It directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take lawful steps, and permitted the applicant, if aggrieved, to make an application to the Superintendent of Police, Datia, to be considered in accordance with law. It did not direct an arrest, prescribe the outcome of the report or the manner of investigation, fix a deadline, or award compensation.

Headnote :- Abetment of suicide / contextual instigation - Section 107 IPC covers instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid; Section 306 requires a suicide and abetment. Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, permits an inference of instigation from the context where the conduct leaves the person feeling that there is no alternative, while excluding words uttered in anger without intending the consequences; Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, requires consideration of intention and circumstances, with only a tentative view at the stage of framing a charge. Sanju v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371, requires mens rea for instigation; Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797, explains Section 107's three modes. The Court treated the allegation of continuing harassment, grasping the girl's hands, demanding that she accompany the applicants and then challenging her to die immediately before she jumped into the well as more than an isolated angry utterance for the purpose of framing a prima facie charge, without finding guilt.

Positive act / causal caution - Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., (2010) 1 SCC 750, M. Mohan v. State, AIR 2011 SC 1238, and Gurcharan Singh v. State of Punjab, (2017) 1 SCC 433, require, for conviction, clear mens rea and an active or direct act that pushes the deceased towards suicide. Amalendu Pal v. State of W.B., (2010) 1 SCC 707, demands direct or indirect incitement with positive action proximate to the occurrence rather than mere harassment; S.S. Chheena v. Vijay Kumar Mahajan, 2010 AIR SCW 4938, rejects a mechanical formula and reiterates intended active conduct. State of W.B. v. Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73, cautions about ordinary discord and a victim's hypersensitivity. The Court considered these protections and found the alleged course of conduct, considered together with the immediate confrontation, sufficient to retain the Section 306 charge for trial; proof at trial and the assessment of causation remain open.

Framing charge / strong suspicion - Ajay Kumar Parmar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2013 SC 633, and Soma Chakravarty v. State (CBI), 2007 AIR SCW 3683, distinguish permissible judicial examination of the ingredients of an offence from a final evaluation of the evidence. P. Vijayan v. State of Kerala, 2010 Cri LJ 1427, Union of India v. Prafulla Kumar Samal, AIR 1979 SC 366, State of Bihar v. Ramesh Singh, AIR 1977 SC 2018, and Niranjan Singh v. Jitendra Bhimraj Bijjaya, AIR 1990 SC 1869, permit limited sifting for grave or strong suspicion and discharge where only weak suspicion remains; trial guilt requires a different standard. Applied here, the witness narrative taken at face value justified retaining the charge, with no final credibility decision.

Inherent quashing / stage and delayed witnesses - Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, was invoked twice: instigation under Section 107 can be inferred from the context when forming a tentative view under Section 228, and quashing of charges under Section 482 is exceptional where the uncontroverted material on record fails to constitute an offence even broadly or reveals grave abuse, without conducting a mini-trial or considering external defence evidence. The 38-day interval before Juli and Sunita's Section 161 statements did not by itself render them unreliable at the stage of framing a charge; the prosecution could explain delay and the trial court would determine reliability. The defence suggestion of a possible accidental fall, based on the father's statement, did not establish absence of strong suspicion.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pratap and other applicants challenged the order dated 28 April 2018 passed by the Second Additional Sessions Judge, Sabalgarh, Morena in Sessions Trial No. 320/2017 framing IPC Sections 354-A and 306 charges. Their application was under Section 482 CrPC. The deceased girl's father initially informed police that she had fallen into a well and her body remained there, resulting in a marg intimation. In investigation, Juli and Sunita later stated that applicants had harassed her for several days. According to their account, they were with the deceased at about 4 p.m. on the day in question, when applicants allegedly came, caught her hands, insisted she accompany them, and on refusal scolded and challenged her to die; she then jumped into the well. The witnesses attributed initial silence to fear and their Section 161 statements were recorded after a delay described by the applicants as 38 days.

Police filed a charge sheet for IPC Sections 354 and 306 and POCSO Sections 7 and 8, while the order under challenge framed IPC Sections 354-A and 306. The applicants relied on the father's reference in his Section 161 statement to the deceased's poor mental condition, suggesting an accidental fall, on the delay and earlier omission in witness accounts, and on the assertion that “go and die” showed no intention to incite suicide. The State answered that the words marked the culmination of persistent harassment, physical restraint and coercion, rather than an isolated angry outburst. The High Court evaluated whether the materials could sustain a tentative Section 306 charge, not whether anyone was ultimately guilty.

2. Precedents — Considered : Chitresh Kumar Chopra v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2009) 16 SCC 605, explained instigation as goading, urging, provoking or encouraging. Its quoted paragraphs say precise words commanding suicide are unnecessary if the conduct can be understood with reasonable certainty as inciting the consequence, including a continued course leaving a person feeling no alternative, while an unintended word in anger or emotion is insufficient. The Court applied this distinction to the alleged conduct before the deceased jumped into the well, refusing to isolate the final expression from the grasping and coercion. Praveen Pradhan v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 9 SCC 734, was quoted for intention of the alleged abettor, Section 107's modes, circumstantial inference where direct proof is absent, rejection of an unintended angry remark, and the tentative view appropriate when considering quashing or framing a charge under Section 228. Its own citations to State of Punjab v. Iqbal Singh, Surender, Kishori Lal and Sonti Rama Krishna support that quotation.

Sanju alias Sanjay Singh Sengar v. State of M.P., (2002) 5 SCC 371, was used for the three statutory modes and mens rea inseparable from instigation. Gangula Mohan Reddy v. State of A.P., printed as (2010) I SCC 750, was discussed for the requirements of a clear mental element and a positive or direct intended act, and for caution where ordinary discord affects an unusually sensitive person; the text recounts the outcome in that precedent, not a finding about the deceased in the present case. State of W.B. v. Orilal Jaiswal, (1994) 1 SCC 73, cautions at trial that ordinary petulance and hypersensitivity do not by themselves establish that the accused induced suicide. M. Mohan v. State, AIR 2011 SC 1238, reiterates clear mens rea, active conduct and an intended act that leaves the deceased perceiving no alternative. Kishori Lal v. State of M.P., (2007) 10 SCC 797, explains each Section 107 mode and the link of Section 109 punishment to the specific abetted offence. The Court quoted these convergent doctrinal limits, but applied a provisional threshold appropriate to the stage of the proceedings to the actual allegations.

Amalendu Pal alias Jhantu v. State of W.B., (2010) 1 SCC 707, was quoted for careful assessment before conviction: mere harassment without positive action proximate to the occurrence is inadequate; the accused must have a proved active instigating or aiding role with a nexus to suicide. Its quoted exposition distinguishes instigation under the first clause from intentional aid under the third clause, read with Explanation 2 to Section 107. S.S. Chheena v. Vijay Kumar Mahajan, 2010 AIR SCW 4938, reproduces Orilal and Chitresh cautions, recognises that individuals differ in their susceptibility to suicide, rejects a straitjacket formula, and insists on clear mens rea and active conduct for conviction. Gurcharan Singh v. State of Punjab, (2017) 1 SCC 433, is quoted briefly as adopting the principle in S.S. Chheena requiring a direct act. These authorities do not establish that allegations of grabbing, coercion and an immediate verbal challenge must be discarded without trial; the Court differentiated them from an isolated fit of anger on the allegations in the record.

Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, appears twice. Its quoted paragraph 35 says a Section 306/107 charge after alleged contextual pressure is a tentative decision from the record, not the stage at which to marshal the evidence to reach a verdict, referring internally to Ramesh Kumar v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2001) 9 SCC 618, on a continued course leaving no option. Its longer extract differentiates Sections 227 and 228, strong suspicion from trial proof, the sparing exercise of jurisdiction under Section 482 to quash charges, the ingredients disclosed by allegations taken at face value, patent improbability, abuse, legal bars, and the prohibition on a mini-trial or external defence materials. Some enumerated principles and a long list of references concern other factual settings and are not independent holdings applied to this case. The High Court used the charge-stage and quashing safeguards in retaining the order, without drawing a broad conclusion about the unrelated examples concerning civil disputes.

Ajay Kumar Parmar v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2013 SC 633, is quoted on preliminary judicial scrutiny of the complaint, case diary and statements under Sections 161 and 164, without finally weighing credibility. Soma Chakravarty v. State (through CBI), 2007 AIR SCW 3683, separates an opinion that the accused might have committed an offence from proof beyond reasonable doubt for conviction and requires judicial application of mind to prosecution material. P. Vijayan v. State of Kerala, 2010 Cri LJ 1427, permits limited Section 227 sifting; where two views are equally possible and the material gives rise only to suspicion rather than grave suspicion, discharge may be justified, and the judge is not a prosecution post office. State of Bihar v. Ramesh Singh, AIR 1977 SC 2018, says strong suspicion permits a charge though it could not replace proof at trial, subject to the limit that the prosecution material, even if accepted at face value, must be capable of showing commission of the offence. Union of India v. Prafulla Kumar Samal, AIR 1979 SC 366, allows limited sifting of broad probabilities and basic infirmities but no roving inquiry equivalent to a trial. Niranjan Singh v. Jitendra Bhimraj Bijjaya, AIR 1990 SC 1869, similarly limits weighing to whether record facts constitute the charged offence, quoting Ramesh Singh and Prafulla Kumar Samal. The Court deployed this group to reject a final determination of credibility or of the accidental-fall theory at the stage of framing a charge.

3. Statutes considered : Section 306 IPC punishes abetment where a person commits suicide. Section 107 IPC defines instigation, conspiracy with an act or illegal omission in pursuance, and intentional aid by act or illegal omission, with explanations on wilful misrepresentation/concealment and facilitation. The Court treated intention, active conduct and contextual nexus as material to the instigation theory. Section 109 IPC appeared in Kishori Lal and Amalendu Pal quotations explaining punishment where an act is committed in consequence of abetment; no independent Section 109 charge is adjudicated. Sections 227 and 228 CrPC govern the threshold for discharge or framing a charge; Section 482 supplied the applicants' inherent-jurisdiction challenge. Section 161 governed the challenged witness statements, the delay in recording which was left for explanation and examination at trial; Section 164 appeared only in a precedent's general list. Sections 354 and 354-A IPC appear in the charge-sheet account and the description of the framed charges, respectively; POCSO Sections 7 and 8 appear in the charge-sheet account. The 2019 decision applied the IPC, CrPC and POCSO provisions then considered by the Court.

4. Issues : (i) Taking the charge-sheet allegations at their face value, could a pattern of harassment, grasping and insisting on accompaniment, followed by a challenge to die immediately before the deceased jumped into the well, support a prima facie Section 306/107 instigation charge, or were the words necessarily an angry remark that could not attract criminal liability? (ii) Could the alleged mental condition and possible accidental fall, omissions in initial accounts, and 38-day delay in the Section 161 statements negate a charge at this preliminary stage, or were those trial questions? (iii) What degree of judicial scrutiny and Section 482 restraint applies to a Sessions Court's Section 228 charge, distinguishing strong suspicion from proof of guilt? The Court dismissed the challenge to the charge order as a whole.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court read Sections 306 and 107 together and tested the applicants' legal contention on the prosecution's account, rather than on findings reached after evidence was recorded. Supreme Court authority distinguishes a casual unintended “go and die” from intended pressure or conduct that could provoke a suicide. Alleged harassment over several days, the physical catching of the girl's hands, insistence that she accompany the applicants and the challenge on refusal, followed by her immediate jump into the well, could, at this stage, suggest instigation when considered in context rather than a mere emotional utterance. This is a provisional inference supporting a trial, not a settled finding that the witnesses' account is true, that mens rea is proved or that causation is established beyond reasonable doubt. The order attributes the collective conduct to the applicants without assigning different acts to named individuals.

The statements of Juli and Sunita were not automatically disqualified because they had been recorded late. The witnesses had said fear explained their earlier silence; the Court held the prosecution should be allowed to explain the delay and the trial should assess reliability. The father's reference to the deceased's mental condition gave rise to an accidental-fall theory, but the Court did not adopt it by conducting a trial of credibility at the stage of framing a charge. The account could support grave suspicion if taken as true. At Sections 227–228, the judge may sift whether the material broadly establishes ingredients and whether suspicion is grave, yet may not demand the proof required for conviction or decide contradictions through meticulous examination of the evidence. Under Amit Kapoor, Section 482 intervention to quash a charge is rare where face-value material is capable of constituting an offence and the factual dispute calls for trial. The Court found sufficient prima facie material and no demonstrated illegality in framing charges.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has dismissed the Section 482 application. The Second Additional Sessions Judge's order dated 28 April 2018 framing charges under IPC Sections 354-A and 306 remained undisturbed; the High Court did not quash or alter either charge. It expressly said its observations were confined to the limited interference inquiry and directed the trial court to decide strictly according to law and the evidence to be led. No applicant was convicted or acquitted.

Headnote :- Writ control / arrest and report not predetermined - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, disapproved mechanical High Court directives requiring investigative steps, arrest, seizure and a charge sheet. Its quotation of M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, emphasises Section 41 CrPC arrest discretion and the consequences for liberty and reputation; Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, also quoted in it, requires an opportunity of hearing before drastic orders affecting reputation. The present Court used those principles in an Article 226 petition to refuse directions requiring arrest and the filing of a predetermined charge sheet. The precedent's own procedural setting under Section 482 was not described as a holding in a writ proceeding.

Timely FIR investigation / alternative final reports - Section 173(1) CrPC mandates completion without unnecessary delay. The Court required the investigator of Crime No. 1224/2023, registered under Sections 420 and 34 IPC, to reach a conclusion and submit a lawful closure report or charge sheet as warranted by the evidence, as early as possible. Any further grievance could be raised before the SP, Jabalpur. The prayers sought addition of IPC Sections 467, 468 and 471, non-interference by respondent 7 and inquiry into an alleged diary-regulation breach. The Court disposed of the petition with the investigation-completion direction and SP grievance liberty.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Prateek Shukla and others filed Writ Petition No. 30937 of 2023 under Article 226 in the High Court of Madhya Pradesh at Jabalpur. Their complaint had led to Crime No. 1224/2023 at Police Station Panagar, Jabalpur under IPC Sections 420 and 34. Counsel said police had not arrested those accused and had not finished the investigation. The prayers asked for a speaking decision on a pending representation, the addition of the IPC provisions on forgery and use of forged documents, Sections 467, 468 and 471, protection of the investigation from interference by respondent 7, and inquiry against that officer for an alleged breach of a police general-diary regulation, relying on the Madhya Pradesh High Court decision in Rajendra Singh Pawar. The Court's narrative also identifies a demand for arrest. These were allegations and prayers, not findings that the suspected persons had committed forgery, that the officer had interfered or that a regulation had been violated.

The Court addressed the general limits on directing particular police steps in the writ proceeding and the distinct statutory duty to complete the pending investigation. It reproduced a substantial Supreme Court passage concerning unreasoned High Court intervention in another investigation.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, set out the principle that investigation ordinarily falls within the police's statutory domain. There the Supreme Court set aside a High Court's unreasoned directions prescribing the recording of witness statements, arrest, seizure, protection of accounts and the filing of a charge sheet. It explained that investigation is ordinarily the police's statutory task and may end in the filing of a charge sheet or a finding that no case is made out; inherent power under Section 482 CrPC cannot be used casually to dictate methods or results. The present Court applied that restraint by analogy in an Article 226 proceeding and declined to direct arrest or the filing of a charge sheet; it did not claim D. Venkatasubramaniam itself was an Article 226 case.

M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, was quoted substantively within D. Venkatasubramaniam. Section 41 CrPC permits police arrest in specified situations, but does not oblige immediate arrest on every cognizable complaint. An officer may investigate first and carefully decide whether arrest is necessary, since arrest affects liberty, reputation and status. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, also appeared within the Supreme Court quotation. It warned that no drastic judicial direction setting criminal law in motion against a person, particularly one impacting reputation, should issue without a reasonable opportunity of hearing. D. Venkatasubramaniam considered the absence of notice to its own accused appellants decisive.

Rajendra Singh Pawar v. State of M.P., ILR [2021] MP 289, was named only in the petitioners' prayer concerning respondent 7 and a general diary regulation. The Judge did not quote, analyse or apply its ratio.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution was the petition's chosen jurisdiction. The Court declined to use it to supervise particular police decisions on arrest and the filing of a charge sheet. Section 41 CrPC appears in the nested M.C. Abraham reasoning on discretionary arrest; Section 482 appears as the inherent-power setting of D. Venkatasubramaniam, not as the jurisdiction invoked by the petitioners here. Section 173(1) CrPC was quoted and applied for the duty to complete the investigation without unnecessary delay, with the lawful report depending on the police's evaluation. IPC Sections 420 and 34 identified the existing FIR; Sections 467, 468 and 471 appeared only in the request to add those offences, without any determination of their ingredients. The prayer referred to police General Diary Regulation 634 and an alleged breach. The 2024 judgment applies the CrPC provisions it quotes.

4. Issues : (i) Could the High Court, at the complainants' instance in an Article 226 writ, direct arrests and a particular charge-sheet outcome in a pending cognizable investigation? (ii) Was a limited direction for prompt conclusion justified by the explicit Section 173(1) duty while leaving the lawful outcome and manner of investigation to the police? The Court did not decide guilt, precise investigative status, officer misconduct or the eventual report type.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court said compulsory arrest could not be ordered. D. Venkatasubramaniam's criticism of an unreasoned order prescribing the course of an investigation, its reliance on M.C. Abraham's principle that arrest is discretionary and Divine Retreat Centre's safeguard of a hearing for affected persons supplied the reason. A registered IPC FIR triggers investigative duties but does not make arrest or prosecution automatic. A judicial command to arrest and file a charge sheet would substitute the Court's decision for the investigator's evolving assessment and prejudge the outcome. Although the precedent concerned Section 482 and the present case was a writ, the Court applied the same restraint against prescribing the conduct of an investigation.

The refusal to prescribe particular steps did not relieve the police of the duty to complete the investigation. The text of Section 173(1) requires completion without unnecessary delay. The officer must decide whether an offence is made out and then file a closure report or charge sheet as legally appropriate. The Court instructed early conclusion and necessary lawful action, without fixing a calendar deadline or directing the result. The stated remedy of raising a grievance before the SP, Jabalpur, remained open.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has disposed of the writ petition. No arrest or compulsory charge sheet was ordered. The investigating officer was directed to complete the investigation as early as possible and take steps required by law, and the petitioners were allowed to apply to the Superintendent of Police, Jabalpur in case of further grievance for consideration in accordance with law. The operative part does not separately require a speaking order on the representation, addition of IPC forgery charges, an inquiry or disciplinary action against respondent 7, or a prescribed method of investigation. The FIR remains subject to the eventual lawful police report and later criminal process.

Prateek Shukla and Ors. v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 30937/2023, 05/01/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Cheating / broker's separate role and pleaded duty - Where a buyer deposited Rs. 4,70,000 directly into the seller company's account for chicken feed and the seller did not deliver, a person described in the complaint as a dalal or broker was not automatically responsible for the seller's obligation to supply the goods. The complaint and Sections 200/202 CrPC record did not state any specific duty or legal liability of this broker, and the complainant's counsel could identify none when asked. Section 2(5) CGST Act defined agent to include a broker; Namdeorao Krishnaji Gajabhiye v. Agricultural Produce Marketing Committee, 1992 (1) MhLJ 49, distinguished a broker who arranges a bargain from a commission agent who holds goods and collects sale proceeds. The Court applied that limited role distinction, without treating the tax or market statute as the criminal charge, and found no prima facie Section 420 case against the applicant. The JMFC's order taking cognizance was set aside insofar as it concerned him and he was discharged; no merits relief for the seller or other accused followed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Parag Traders complained in JMFC Gwalior Complaint No. 4217/2019 that M/s Manglam Seeds Company and its proprietor Arun Sharma failed to supply chicken feed after a payment of Rs. 4,70,000. Praveen Gangil was described as a broker. According to the complaint, Gangil and Arun Sharma visited on 10 November 2018 to propose a sale and continued to urge a purchase after the buyer hesitated. On 14 November the buyer deposited Rs. 4,70,000 into Manglam Seeds Company's account on the assurance of supply. The company did not deliver. When Aadwani visited its warehouse with a truck on 3 December, Arun Sharma allegedly said the money had been used personally and the stock was mortgaged to a bank; supply would follow release of the goods. Later attempts to contact them reportedly failed, and Rajesh Aadwani's Section 200 account referred to a newspaper report about seizure by the bank and an auction. These remained complaint allegations rather than adjudicated proof of cheating by any party.

On 4 September 2019 the JMFC took cognizance of Section 420 IPC against the company, Arun Sharma and Gangil. The broker sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC, saying he had not received the payment and the seller alone had undertaken delivery. The complainant's counsel argued that the broker's assurances induced payment and that he should ensure supply. When asked to identify the broker's duties in the complaint or Sections 200/202 statements, or a statutory basis for an obligation to ensure delivery, counsel conceded that no such duties had been pleaded and identified no provision. The High Court examined the alleged role and differentiated brokerage from the seller's obligations.

2. Precedents — Considered : Namdeorao Krishnaji Gajabhiye v. Agricultural Produce Marketing Committee, 1992 (1) MhLJ 49 (Bombay High Court, Nagpur Bench), was quoted in paragraph 13. It distinguished a licensed adtiya/commission agent from a broker under the Agricultural Produce Market Committee Act, 1963. The quoted broker definition covers an agent who arranges and concludes bargains for the principal for remuneration but does not receive, deliver or transport the produce or collect or pay purchase/sale money. By contrast, the commission agent definition includes buying and selling for another, custody and control of the goods during the transaction, collection and payment of the price, and receipt of a commission. The present Court used that distinction to understand the role the complainant had assigned to Gangil, who was not described as a commission agent.

3. Statutes considered : Section 420 IPC was the sole offence in respect of which the challenged order took cognizance against Gangil. The Court assessed whether the material alleged an obligation or role capable of justifying criminal proceedings against a broker for the seller's non-supply. Section 482 CrPC supplied the High Court's power to set aside the process qua him. Sections 200 and 202 CrPC provided the record of the complainant's preliminary statement and inquiry, which lacked the claimed broker duty; the cited JMFC order was the cognizance decision. Section 2(5) of the Central Goods and Services Tax Act, 2017 defines an agent to include broker and other mercantile intermediaries acting on behalf of another in supply or receipt of goods or services. The definition assisted in identifying the broker's role; the case was not a CGST prosecution, and the definition did not establish that every broker must ensure delivery. The APMC Act definitions of broker and commission agent were quoted through Namdeorao for the functional distinction, not applied as an independently governing statute for a chicken-feed transaction.

4. Issues : The central question expressly framed by the Court was whether the broker could be criminally liable for the seller's failure to supply feed after the buyer deposited purchase money into the seller company's account. It required identifying any pleaded duty to ensure delivery or participation beyond persuasion, and whether the broker's role could be equated with that of a commission agent who has custody of goods and handles payment. It also required deciding whether the existing complaint and preliminary statement justified taking cognizance against this applicant under Section 420.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court compared the complaint with Aadwani's Section 200 account. For the purpose of this preliminary inquiry, it accepted that Gangil accompanied Arun Sharma and urged the purchase, while the buyer sent the money directly to Manglam Seeds and Sharma promised delivery. The complainant's assertion that the broker should guarantee supply did not identify how such an obligation arose. Repeated requests to counsel produced neither a broker's duty pleaded in the complaint or preliminary statements nor a statutory duty supporting the proposed criminal liability. The inclusion of a broker within the broad definition of agents in the CGST Act did not, by itself, make the broker the party receiving the money or holding the stock. Namdeorao's description showed why a person who merely arranges the transaction differs from a commission agent who buys and sells for a principal, holds goods and handles payment. The complainant called this applicant dalal/broker, not commission agent, and alleged no specific contrary conduct that would justify equating his role with that of a commission agent. The Court therefore held that on the allegations, no prima facie case justified taking cognizance under Section 420 against Gangil for the seller's non-delivery. Its finding is confined to the pleading and record against this applicant.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed the Section 482 application. The JMFC Gwalior cognizance order dated 4 September 2019 in Complaint No. 4217/2019 was set aside only insofar as it concerned Praveen Gangil, and he was discharged. The criminal complaint as to M/s Manglam Seeds Company and Arun Sharma was not quashed by this order, and no repayment or civil damages were awarded.

Praveen Gangil v. Parag Traders, M.Cr.C. no. 53597/2021, 02/03/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Parallel investigation / Section 36 limits - Deepak alias Preetam Verma v. State of M.P., MCRC 12592/2018 (11 September 2018), held that a separate inquiry by a superior officer conducted alongside a pending FIR investigation is not authorised by Section 36 CrPC. Surendra Singh Gaur v. State of M.P., Supreme Court SLP (Cri) 1345/2019 (18 January 2022), affirmed the objection, distinguishing a conforming police circular from the officers' unlawful parallel procedure; the earlier State challenge had also been dismissed. Mahendra Kumar Vaidya v. State of M.P., WP 23876/2022, followed that approach. Here a report from an SDO(P) inquiry obtained while the investigation against the applicant remained pending stated that he had not participated. The Court treated its findings as a nullity for want of jurisdiction and refused to use it to quash proceedings; this did not itself prove the FIR.

Alibi / allocation of proof and stage - Vijay Pal v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2015) 4 SCC 749, quoted Binay Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1997) 1 SCC 283, on Section 11 Evidence Act: the prosecution must first prove presence at the scene and participation, after which a pleaded alibi requires positive and strict proof excluding presence; strong defence evidence that creates reasonable doubt still benefits the accused. S.K. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, (2010) 8 SCC 430, separately cautions that failed alibi does not relieve prosecution of proof beyond reasonable doubt. The applicant's claim of being 40 km away conflicted with the FIR's second-phase axe-blow allegation and was left for evidence; the impugned cognizance and proceedings survived without a guilt finding.

Separate accused and prior orders - The FIR described an initial assault by Moti, Badam and Sultan against Ramsevak and a later arrival of Bharat, Mansingh and the applicant against intervening Ramesh. Charge sheets against several others and a disputed police closure concerning the applicant did not erase the Magistrate's 17 February 2021 cognizance, already upheld in revision on 5 April 2022. In MCRC 21356/2022 the applicant challenged only the immediate issue of a non-bailable warrant and obtained a modification directing his appearance, not quashing on the merits. This petition was dismissed, leaving the trial's assessment of participation and alibi open.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pravendra Sharma appeared in person in Misc. Criminal Case No. 9460 of 2025 and chose to argue himself; on his request his advocate and associates were discharged from the case. He sought quashing under the order's combined reference to Section 482 CrPC and Section 528 BNSS of Sessions Trial No. 20/2021 arising from Police Station Bahadurpur, Ashoknagar Crime No. 163/2020, alleging IPC Sections 307, 294, 324, 325 and 34. The FIR in the prosecution case described two phases on 24 July 2020 around 8 a.m. in a field. Moti, Badam and Sultan, said to carry an axe, pharsa and ballam, allegedly abused and assaulted Ramsevak, injuring his head and hands. When Ramesh attempted to intervene, those three fled. Bharat Adivasi, Mansingh and Pravendra allegedly then arrived; the applicant was said to strike Ramesh near the left eye with an axe, and the other two allegedly struck him with lathis. Those are FIR allegations, not findings after trial.

Police initially filed a charge sheet against Motilal and Badam and left investigation pending for others under Section 173(8) CrPC. A supplementary charge sheet was later filed against Mansingh, Sultan Singh and Bharat Singh on 17 February 2021, while the investigation against the applicant was said to remain pending. At his request, the SP directed the SDO(P), Mungavali, to conduct a separate inquiry. Its report dated 28 September 2020 reportedly found no indication that Pravendra participated. The judgment records that a closure report was rejected by JMFC Mungavali and cognizance under Section 190 CrPC was taken against him on 17 February 2021 with a non-bailable warrant. His revision of cognizance failed on 5 April 2022. In MCRC 21356/2022, decided 4 February 2025, he challenged only the immediate issue of a non-bailable warrant; the Court substituted an appearance direction for 28 February with liberty to issue a bailable warrant on default. The present application instead asserted the SDO(P) exoneration, a 40-kilometre alibi, old property enmity and alleged retaliatory cases including Crime Nos. 22 and 221/2020.

2. Precedents — Considered : Deepak alias Preetam Verma v. State of M.P., MCRC 12592/2018 (M.P. High Court, 11 September 2018), was cited for the absence of authority under Section 36 CrPC to conduct a separate inquiry while the police investigation of the same FIR is pending. Surendra Singh Gaur v. State of M.P., SLP (Cri) No. 1345/2019 (Supreme Court order 18 January 2022), was reproduced at length because it upheld that result. The Supreme Court addressed petitions by senior officers challenging critical observations about their parallel procedure, recorded that the State's earlier SLP 10015/2018 was dismissed, and concluded that neither Section 36 nor cited circulars permitted the independent inquiry alongside the FIR investigation. It distinguished the State's 26 June 2010 circular, which itself conformed to Section 36, from the officers' actual procedure, found no reason to interfere under Article 136 and dismissed their petitions. The present Court applied the affirmed jurisdictional principle to this applicant's SDO(P) report and did not treat it as a lawful exoneration. Mahendra Kumar Vaidya v. State of M.P., WP 23876/2022 (3 November 2022), was separately mentioned as reinforcing the same parallel-inquiry rule.

Vijay Pal v. State (Govt. of NCT of Delhi), 2015:INSC:194, (2015) 4 SCC 749, was quoted on alibi. Once prosecution establishes presence, an accused claiming to be elsewhere has to offer positive evidence; the quoted analysis from Binay

Kumar Singh v. State of Bihar, (1997) 1 SCC 283, explains why alibi under Section 11 Evidence Act is a relevant inconsistent fact rather than an exception. Prosecution still carries the initial and ultimate burden to prove participation. The claimed presence elsewhere must be sufficiently incompatible with presence at the scene, but strong defence proof that creates reasonable doubt yields benefit of doubt. The present Court applied this to leave the asserted 40-kilometre alibi as a disputed question requiring proper evidence, without reversing the prosecution's burden or declaring that the accused was present. Vijay Pal refers to Gurpreet Singh, Sk. Sattar and Jitender Kumar for reiteration, without a separate factual analysis of those decisions in the present order.

S.K. Sattar v. State of Maharashtra, 2010:INSC:546, (2010) 8 SCC 430, was quoted separately. It requires positive alibi proof with a stringent standard excluding presence, where the prosecution case requires the alibi to be examined, but explicitly holds that failure of alibi does not automatically establish guilt; the prosecution must independently prove its case beyond reasonable doubt. A nested Gurpreet Singh quotation relates to factual findings on alibi. Binay Kumar Singh was then independently reproduced in paragraph 14, reiterating prosecution's first burden, Section 11 relevance, the heavy burden on the defence that arises only after the prosecution has discharged its initial burden and possible benefit of doubt. The present Court used all three materially discussed Supreme Court authorities as a reason for declining to decide contested presence at the scene on the record in this quashing application, not as a trial verdict.

3. Statutes considered : The order describes the requested inherent jurisdiction as “Section 482 of Cr.P.C / 528 of B.N.S.S”, preserving its own transitional slash reference. Section 36 CrPC was decisive for the authority of superior police officers: neither it nor the circular in Surendra Singh Gaur permitted a parallel independent inquiry alongside an active FIR investigation. Section 173(8) CrPC provided the context for the pending investigation and supplementary charge sheets against different accused; this order did not state a general prohibition on lawful further investigation under it. Section 190 CrPC governed the Magistrate's challenged cognizance after rejecting the reported closure; Section 397 governed the prior dismissed revision. Section 11 of the Indian Evidence Act was discussed through Vijay Pal and Binay Kumar Singh for the relevance of an alibi fact inconsistent with presence at the scene. IPC Sections 307, 294, 324, 325 and 34 were the alleged charges, not proved offences. Article 136 was the Supreme Court procedural setting of the cited officers' petitions, not the applicant's invoked jurisdiction.

4. Issues : (i) Could the accused use an SP-directed SDO(P) parallel inquiry report asserting non-participation, made while the statutory investigation against him was pending, to challenge the Magistrate's cognizance and obtain quashing of the trial proceedings? (ii) Could his claimed presence 40 km away be conclusively accepted in inherent-jurisdiction proceedings against an FIR placing him in the second phase and attributing an axe injury, and how do the burden of proving an alibi and the prosecution's burden interact? (iii) What was the effect, if any, of the already dismissed merits revision and the later MCRC order confined to the issue of the warrant? The Court did not decide the veracity of either phase, injury causation, the alibi after evidence, or guilt of any named person.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first kept the chronology concerning each accused separate. Police filed reports against some first- and second-phase participants while investigation as to Pravendra was said to be pending. The FIR specifically placed him with Bharat and Mansingh in the second phase against Ramesh and alleged an axe blow near the eye. The SDO(P) report in his favour resulted from a parallel inquiry ordered after he approached the SP. Applying Deepak and the Supreme Court's Surendra Singh Gaur affirmance, the Court found that a separate concurrent inquiry had no basis in Section 36 and that a finding by an authority without jurisdiction was a nullity. This ruling prevented reliance on the parallel report as a lawful basis for quashing; it did not itself establish the truth of the FIR or invalidate all actions of a superior officer taken through lawful investigation channels.

The applicant's assertion he was 40 km away, the theory of enmity over property and the allegations about the other cases required factual proof. Vijay Pal, Binay Kumar Singh and S.K. Sattar require prosecution first to prove participation, while an accused's alibi, if it becomes material after that showing, must be established by cogent positive evidence incompatible with presence; strong defence evidence capable of creating reasonable doubt may succeed, and its failure does not prove the prosecution case. The Court therefore declined to treat the disputed alibi and invalid exonerating inquiry as conclusive under Section 482/528. The earlier Section 397 revision had already failed on the cognizance merits, and the intervening MCRC decision only changed immediate warrant process with an appearance direction. The present application did not establish grounds for quashing the trial. The rejection concerned jurisdiction and the preliminary stage at which factual disputes were raised, not a finding that the accused had struck Ramesh.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the application to quash Sessions Trial No. 20/2021. The proceedings arising from Crime No. 163/2020 and the Magistrate's cognizance remained in place. No final finding of scene presence, alibi failure after trial, guilt, or liability for the described injuries was made; those matters remained to be adjudicated in accordance with law. Separately, counsel Anil Kumar Mishra and his associates were discharged from representing the applicant at his request so he could argue in person. The order recounted the earlier modification concerning the warrant and did not reverse it.

Pravendra Sharma v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 9460/2025, 03/04/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Arrest and report / police discretion - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, rules out mechanical court directions requiring arrest, seizure and the filing of a charge sheet. The passage it quotes from M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explains that arrest under Section 41 CrPC is discretionary and must be exercised cautiously because it affects liberty, while the passage it quotes from Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, requires a hearing before drastic directions affecting the reputation of persons who have not been joined as parties. Applying the principle to this Article 226 case, the Court refused to direct arrest or require a particular prosecution outcome in Crime No. 683/2024. The petitioner's counsel conceded that a cognizable FIR does not invariably require arrest; the accused persons were not impleaded.

Closure report / magistrate options - Abhinandan Jha v. Dinesh Mishra, AIR 1968 SC 117, recognises that on a police final report stating that no case is made out a Magistrate can accept closure, direct further investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC if the investigation is unsatisfactory or incomplete, or take cognizance under Section 190(1)(b) on reported facts despite the officer's opinion. The High Court explained that a complainant may be heard before closure is accepted and may oppose the proposed closure at that hearing. No closure was yet filed here; a free and fair investigation did not guarantee a charge sheet in the complainant's favour.

Fair investigation / monitoring and transfer - Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary, (2014) 2 SCC 532, allows rare monitoring of progress, fairness and freedom from external influence but distinguishes impermissible court supervision that directs investigative methods or the conclusion in a report under Section 173(2) and may compromise the trial court's independence. Transfer of investigation requires exceptional grounds supported by the record. The State submitted that no IG direction for a second handwriting opinion was shown and that even such an opinion would not establish police collusion. The Court declined to change the investigating officer, transfer the investigation to CID or direct investigative methods on the basis of an unfounded impression, without resolving the handwriting merits.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Preeti Garg petitioned under Article 226 in Writ Petition No. 5413 of 2025 concerning Crime No. 683/2024. She alleged that persons had used a forged agreement to sell to pressure her to execute a sale deed. Police had registered an FIR after considering her complaint, what its opening description called a Q.D. report, and annexed documents. She requested a fair and impartial inquiry, arrest of the accused, a change of investigating officer and non-interference by police superiors, and transfer to CID for inquiry. Counsel said the existing investigator, allegedly under instructions of the Inspector General of Police, Gwalior, was seeking a second handwriting expert opinion, which, counsel alleged, indicated that the police were acting in concert with the accused. Those allegations were not judicial findings of forgery, collusion or improper police directions.

The State disputed the petition. It invoked Section 30 BNSS for superior-officer directions and said there was no record showing an IG direction to obtain a second handwriting report. In its submission, even a further opinion would not establish collusion; a fair investigation does not guarantee a result in the complainant's favour. It also noted that persons against whom the petitioner sought arrest or other consequences were not impleaded. The Court questioned counsel, who acknowledged police need not arrest in every cognizable case. It then assessed the evidentiary basis for alleged unfairness, the limited avenues for court intervention, and the safeguards available if the police later recommended closure.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, 2009:INSC:1132, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was extensively quoted. The Supreme Court had set aside an unreasoned High Court order instructing police to record statements, arrest, seize property and file a charge sheet, observing that investigation lies primarily with police and may conclude with a report that no case is made out. The order under challenge in that case arose under Section 482 CrPC; the present Judge used the police-autonomy principle while exercising Article 226, without changing the precedent's procedural setting. The Supreme Court criticised the consequences of directions issued without hearing the affected persons and without reasons from the higher court. The present Court noted the petitioner's non-joinder of accused and refused compulsory arrest or a directed report.

M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, was quoted within D. Venkatasubramaniam on Section 41 CrPC: arrest without warrant is permissive within statutory conditions, not an automatic consequence of cognizable information; an investigator may first inquire and assess necessity with caution because liberty, reputation and status are affected. The petitioner conceded that point. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, also appeared in the quotation from D. Venkatasubramaniam for reasonable hearing before drastic judicial orders affecting an unjoined person's reputation. D. Venkatasubramaniam found an order made without notice a nullity in its own case. The present Court relied on these quoted authorities to define the limits of intervention, but the present Court did not make arrest-necessity findings about individual suspects.

Abhinandan Jha v. Dinesh Mishra, 1967:INSC:112, AIR 1968 SC 117, was quoted for the Magistrate's independent consideration of a police report stating that no case is made out. The Magistrate can accept it and close proceedings, direct further investigation under Section 156(3) CrPC if the investigation is incomplete or unsatisfactory, or take Section 190(1)(b) cognizance if reported facts constitute an offence despite the police opinion. After further investigation the police still may submit either type of report. The present Court added that the complainant should receive a hearing at closure stage; this preserved a later remedy and did not pre-empt the judgment of either the police or the Magistrate before a report existed.

Manohar Lal Sharma v. Principal Secretary, 2013:INSC:839, (2014) 2 SCC 532, supplied a distinct public-law limit. In rare cases, court monitoring may track progress, impartiality, freedom from outside interference and completion according to law, while court supervision directs investigative methods and the formation of the police opinion, risking undue influence on the trial court that later considers the report under Section 173(2). The present Court used the distinction to refuse control of the investigation or its transfer on the basis of the petitioner's unsupported suspicion. The Supreme Court passage concerned CBI court-monitored inquiries; it was applied for the general monitoring/supervision distinction, not as a finding that this state police case had been court monitored.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 was the petition's jurisdictional basis for relief concerning an active investigation. Section 30 BNSS was cited in the State's submission as permitting a superior officer to issue directions to an investigating officer. The Supreme Court quotation of Section 41 CrPC addressed cautious discretionary arrest, and its Section 482 CrPC discussion concerned its original inherent-jurisdiction case, not the petitioner's chosen constitutional writ. Abhinandan Jha's Sections 173, 156(3) and 190(1)(b) CrPC framework governed the possible police closure report and the Magistrate's subsequent powers; Section 173(2) appears in Manohar Lal Sharma's caution about court supervision of a final police opinion. The Court also stated that police may file a closure report under the provisions of BNSS, subject to judicial scrutiny. The alleged agreement to sell and handwriting evidence were factual subjects, not a final statutory forgery adjudication.

4. Issues : (i) Did the alleged failure to arrest after an FIR, coupled with a claimed second handwriting examination, give a sound factual basis for ordering arrests or directing an investigation in the complainant's preferred direction? (ii) Could a future police closure report be treated as conclusive against the complainant, or would a Magistrate hear her and independently choose among the lawful options? (iii) Did supported exceptional circumstances justify replacing the investigating officer, transferring the case to CID or court direction of investigative methods, and what separates permissible monitoring from supervision? The Court did not decide handwriting authenticity, criminal guilt, the contents of an eventual report, or a later Magistrate decision.

5. Ratio / Findings : The petitioner focused on lack of arrests. Counsel conceded that police are not required to arrest every suspect after registration of a case involving a cognizable offence. D. Venkatasubramaniam and M.C. Abraham show why an unreasoned order compelling arrest or a charge sheet would intrude on discretion and liberty. The notice principle quoted from Divine Retreat Centre was relevant because the persons whose arrest was sought were not parties. The Court therefore rejected the premise that non-arrest itself established a biased investigation or entitled the complainant to a prescribed outcome. It did not hold that the police must never arrest in this case.

The State submitted that no IG direction to obtain a second handwriting opinion was shown and that even such a direction would not establish collusion. The Court stated that transfer cannot be ordered on an unfounded impression and that the allegations against investigating officers need not be considered at this stage. Manohar Lal Sharma permitted independent monitoring of progress in rare cases without a superior court prescribing investigative methods or the conclusion in the report; transfer or change of agency on an unfounded impression was refused.

Finally, fair investigation encompasses lawful closure if evidence warrants it. Under Abhinandan Jha, a report that no case is made out is not conclusive: the Magistrate can accept it, seek further investigation, or take cognizance on facts despite the police opinion. The High Court said the petitioner would have an opportunity to be heard if closure were filed and could present her objections then. This prospective safeguard was a reason not to interfere prematurely, not a finding that closure was imminent or justified.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the writ petition for want of grounds warranting interference. The Court did not order arrest, replacement of the investigating officer, transfer to CID, compulsory filing of a charge sheet or a court-directed handwriting procedure, or make a finding against the police officers. The Court left the investigation to proceed according to law and identified the complainant's opportunity to oppose a future closure report before the Magistrate. That future statutory review had not occurred in the judgment.

Preeti Garg v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., W.P. no. 5413/2025, 14/02/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty / individual role - In a prosecution under IPC Sections 498A, 506 and 34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, merely including a relative's name in a collective account of a dowry demand does not by itself justify compelling that relative to face trial when the charge-sheet material supplies no particular act or instance attributable to that relative. The Court applied Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, on avoiding the attribution of guilt merely on the basis of relationship or conjecture, Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, on specific tangible material and pragmatic scrutiny, and Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, on careful assessment of relatives' alleged participation. Here the uncle-in-law and unmarried sister-in-law appeared in the general assertion of a ₹5 lakh demand, while the detailed 22 March 2018 incident did not name them. This does not determine the allegations against the husband or other relatives.

Section 482 CrPC / omnibus accusations - Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, 2013 (1) UC 155, was considered for quashing vague allegations against relatives that specify no individual role; K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana, (2018) 14 SCC 452, for cautious but available intervention at an interlocutory stage to prevent abuse; Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, for particulars concerning each accused; and Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, for the inadequacy of casual naming. The Court applied their connected principle after discharge under Section 239 had been refused and that refusal affirmed in revision: the two orders, charge sheet and pending prosecution were set aside only as to the applicants, who were discharged. The discussion of Raja Lal Singh reproduced in Monju Roy and the quotation from G.V. Rao in Geeta Mehrotra reinforced the caution but did not create separate holdings on these facts.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married Virendra Chandel on 18 November 2013. In the FIR lodged on 19 April 2018, she alleged substantial expenditure and transfers around the engagement and wedding, followed by mental and physical harassment by her husband and a number of his relatives over a further demand of ₹5 lakh. She described restrictions on food, communication, education and medical care, removal to her parental home during pregnancy, a daughter born on 9 September 2014, continuing threats to her and the child, and an unsuccessful reconciliation attempt. She separately narrated a visit to her parental home on 22 March 2018 by her husband, father-in-law, mother-in-law and two younger brothers-in-law: they allegedly renewed the ₹5 lakh demand, abused and beat her and mistreated her mother before neighbours arrived. The present applicants, Prem Kumar (her uncle-in-law) and an unmarried sister-in-law, were among those named collectively in the earlier account but were not named as participants in that dated visit. These are allegations recorded from the FIR, not independent findings that the described conduct occurred.

Police filed a charge sheet against the applicants and other accused for IPC Sections 498A, 506 and 34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The applicants sought discharge under Section 239 CrPC. The JMFC, Gwalior refused discharge on 10 December 2018 in Criminal Case 1543/2018; the Xth Additional Sessions Judge affirmed on 19 February 2020 in Criminal Revision 23/2019. They invoked Section 482 CrPC in MCRC 37680/2020 against those orders. Their counsel said the uncle-in-law resided separately, the unmarried sister-in-law studied in Bhopal, and both were implicated to pressure the husband without an individual act being alleged. The State and complainant opposed and maintained that the applicants had participated in demanding dowry from the beginning. The High Court resolved the case on the specificity of the allegations; it did not make an evidentiary finding that the asserted residence or studies were established. The FIR alleged that the complainant's father spent approximately ₹20 lakh on the marriage and associated payments, apart from the later alleged additional ₹5 lakh demand. The expenditure allegation is part of the recorded complaint, not a finding establishing the applicants' individual involvement.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207, was quoted at length. In the context of evidence in a dowry-death case, it rejected the attribution of liability to a husband's relatives merely through relationship, conjecture or implication and called for proof of their attributed acts. The High Court used its caution against indiscriminately implicating relatives as part of the framework for assessing whether a specific role had been attributed to these applicants; it did not purport to apply the dowry-death proof standard as the final standard at a pretrial discharge stage.

Monju Roy v. State of West Bengal, (2015) 13 SCC 693, was reproduced. While accepting findings of dowry harassment there, the Supreme Court recognised the possibility of exaggeration in naming all family members, required tangible material for distant relatives, and also warned that an unnatural-death complaint must be assessed pragmatically, without demanding perfect precision. Its quoted discussion included Kans Raj and Raja Lal Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2007) 15 SCC 415, which in turn mentioned Kamesh Panjiyar; the present judgment reproduces the concern about implicating other relatives without sufficient basis. The High Court applied Monju Roy's distinction between an accusation supported by specific material and a general, collective accusation, without rejecting the complainant's entire account.

Chandralekha v. State of Rajasthan, 2013 (1) UC 155, involved extremely general FIR allegations against relatives, no individual role, uncertainty about whether they lived together and a long interval before the complaint. The Supreme Court quashed their prosecution as an abuse of process. The High Court invoked the specificity and abuse-of-process reasoning; it did not find the same delay or living arrangements proved on the present record.

K. Subba Rao v. State of Telangana, (2018) 14 SCC 452, dealt with a charge sheet against maternal uncles containing only bare assertions that they supported dowry harassment and were involved in a conspiracy. It explained both restraint in interrupting proceedings at an interlocutory stage and the ability to intervene to secure justice when omnibus allegations against relatives make continuation abusive. Its passage cited Bhajan Lal, Kans Raj and Kailash Chandra Agrawal as supporting context. The High Court applied that principle to these two applicants because the allegations against them did not specify any instances of their individual involvement.

Preeti Gupta v. State of Jharkhand, AIR 2010 SC 3363, warned that matrimonial complaints can implicate many relations and require careful, pragmatic scrutiny, especially where a relative is said to live elsewhere; on its own facts the Supreme Court quashed a complaint against its appellants. The High Court used this caution when reviewing the alleged role here, without accepting the applicants' disputed residence assertions as proved.

Neelu Chopra v. Bharti, (2009) 10 SCC 184, required particulars of the offence and the part played by each accused; a bare recital of statutory provisions and a vague accusation did not justify prosecution of the aged parents in that case. Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, treated casual naming of family members without active involvement as insufficient in its matrimonial-dispute context. The latter passage quoted G.V. Rao v. L.H.V. Prasad concerning unnecessary escalation of family disputes; the High Court relied on the caution that an individual role must be specified, rather than making the quoted social observations an independent test. The cases collectively supported the finding that these applicants should not face trial on the present undifferentiated material. No cited authority was used to decide the guilt or innocence of the remaining accused.

3. Statutes considered : Section 239 CrPC governed the applicants' request for pretrial discharge on the police report; the lower courts refused it. Section 482 CrPC supplied the High Court's inherent jurisdiction to examine whether continuation against these applicants on vague allegations would be an abuse of criminal process. IPC Section 498A concerned the alleged matrimonial cruelty; Sections 506 and 34 IPC and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act appeared among the charge-sheet offences and were included in the limited quashing and discharge. The IPC and CrPC provisions were the law applied to this proceeding.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the FIR and charge-sheet narrative supplied a sufficiently particular act or material role for the uncle-in-law and unmarried sister-in-law in the alleged dowry demand and harassment, or merely grouped them with the husband's family.

(ii) Whether, after refusal of discharge by the Magistrate and affirmance in revision, continuing the stated prosecution against those two applicants warranted intervention under Section 482 CrPC; and, if so, which orders and proceedings were to be affected. The Court was not asked here to finally adjudicate the allegations against the husband and other relatives.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court first considered the Supreme Court's related principles: relationship alone cannot establish a role in a criminal offence; courts should seek particular acts and supporting material when a distant or other relative is accused in a matrimonial prosecution; vague collective accusations may make continuation abusive. Kans Raj and Monju Roy arose against dowry-death evidence and caution against indiscriminate implication, while Chandralekha, K. Subba Rao, Preeti Gupta, Neelu Chopra and Geeta Mehrotra illustrate the need to examine individual roles and when quashing is justified. Monju Roy also requires a pragmatic view of serious complaints rather than a demand that every detail be weighed with artificial exactness. The High Court did not pronounce that every relative is immune, that a mere relationship category disposes of a charge, or that the complaint as a whole was false.

Applying that test, the Court compared the general first part of this FIR, in which the two applicants were named with other relatives in an asserted ₹5 lakh dowry demand and harassment, with the detailed allegation concerning 22 March 2018. The latter specified the husband, his parents and two brothers, but did not say these applicants were present. No other particular act was attributed to the uncle-in-law or unmarried sister-in-law. That omission was material to the case against these applicants individually, despite the State and complainant's claim of harassment from the outset. The assertions that one lived separately and the other studied in Bhopal remained counsel's submissions; the actual finding rested on the absence of specific accusation. On those allegations, compelling these two applicants to undergo a criminal trial would be unjustified. The Court therefore set aside the refusal of discharge and the revisional order affirming it and used its inherent power to terminate the charge sheet and prosecution as against them. The result is confined to this record and these two persons, without determining the liability of each remaining family member.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed the Section 482 application. The order of the Xth Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior dated 19 February 2020 in Criminal Revision 23/2019 and the JMFC order dated 10 December 2018 in Criminal Case 1543/2018 were set aside in relation to these applicants. The charge sheet for IPC Sections 498A, 506 and 34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, and the pending prosecution in Criminal Case 1543/2018, were quashed as against them; both were discharged from those offences. The judgment does not discharge the other accused or quash the prosecution against them and imposes no further conditions.

Headnote :- Article 226 / FIR registration / alternative remedy - A request for police action where no action has been taken on a complaint does not ordinarily justify an immediate writ in a criminal matter compelling FIR registration. Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for the complaint procedure under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC and the Magistrate's powers, including its reproduction of Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre; the Division Bench ruling in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. 247/2016, explained the relevance of Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 and the recognised exceptions to an alternative-remedy objection. Its quoted distinction was that Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, addresses the police's duty to register an FIR, not automatic entitlement to mandamus without using available remedies. The High Court cited Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, and dismissed this petition without deciding the complaint's merits, preserving liberty to lodge a criminal complaint before the competent court.

Investigation writ / exceptional intervention - The qualification in Divine Retreat Centre considered by the Court preserves Article 226 intervention in rare cases where mala fide exercise of investigative power, clear abuse and Chapter XII CrPC non-compliance are established; even then, a court may require adherence to lawful procedure without dictating the investigative method. The High Court reproduced that limitation when considering whether the writ petition was tenable. The petitioner was given liberty to file a criminal complaint before the competent court.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Premwati sought an Article 226 direction requiring the respondents to take action against persons she described as accused on a complaint she had made. The question the High Court expressly posed was whether a writ for FIR registration was tenable. It heard the matter in Writ Petition 22979/2019 and examined the statutory complaint procedure and the limits of writ intervention in criminal matters. No criminal prosecution, charge or investigative outcome was adjudicated in this order.

2. Precedents — Considered : Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was reproduced in substance. It recognises an exceptional Article 226 direction where an aggrieved person establishes mala fide investigative action, clear abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII CrPC, while distinguishing a court's insistence on lawful process from prescribing the manner of investigation. Its further passage says that ordinarily, where the police take no action on information given to them, the informant can invoke the Magistrate's complaint jurisdiction under Sections 190 and 200, rather than demand a writ. The quoted passage in turn reproduces Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra on the Magistrate's inquiry, possible direction for investigation, dismissal under Section 203 or cognizance and issue of process; it refers to All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union for the ordinary alternative-remedy proposition. These nested cases were considered through Divine Retreat Centre's quotation, rather than independently applied on separately stated facts. The High Court used these principles together to assess whether the writ petition was tenable; it made no finding that the exceptional abuse threshold was met.

The binding Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., Writ Appeal 247/2016, order of 20 December 2016, was quoted. It states that mandamus to perform the Section 154 CrPC duty can be refused when the informant has not availed of the remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the four recognised exceptions referred to in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1. The quoted Division Bench also distinguishes Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1: the FIR-registration obligation does not itself resolve entitlement to a writ bypassing alternative remedies. The High Court followed that distinction between the statutory duty and entitlement to a writ.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, were cited by the deciding Court as support for the efficacious remedy of a criminal complaint before a competent court. The Court relied on them in identifying the criminal-complaint remedy. Smt. Sudami Devi v. State of U.P., Writ-C 47416/2016, an Allahabad High Court order, was also cited for that result. No precedent was applied to determine whether the underlying allegations were true or whether an FIR must ultimately be registered.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 of the Constitution provides the writ jurisdiction invoked to seek police action. Chapter XII CrPC governs criminal investigation; the Divine Retreat Centre passage limits exceptional writ intervention to clearly established mala fide exercise of investigative power involving abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII. It also states that a court cannot dictate investigative methods. Section 154 concerns recording cognizable information, while Section 154(3) supplies recourse to a superior police officer, and Section 156(3) permits a Magistrate to direct investigation; the Division Bench identified these as alternatives. Sections 190 and 200 allow a complainant to approach the Magistrate for cognizance and complaint examination. The quoted Supreme Court passage describes possible inquiry, investigation report, dismissal if no offence is disclosed under Section 203, or cognizance and process if a prima facie offence appears. These were procedural routes, not findings that the complaint in this case satisfied their requirements.

4. Issues : (i) Whether Premwati could obtain an Article 226 direction for FIR registration or police action merely on an asserted complaint when the CrPC provided recourse to police superiors and a competent Magistrate.

(ii) Whether the exceptional scope for writ intervention in a criminal investigation displaced the ordinary statutory remedies on the record before the Court.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court expressly framed the question whether the writ petition was tenable. Divine Retreat Centre supplied both halves of the legal framework: mala fide exercise of investigative power, with a clear case of abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII, can justify rare constitutional intervention, but the High Court may insist on statutory process rather than control investigative technique; where the police simply take no action, the informant has the remedy of a complaint before the Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200. The Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria reinforced the alternative paths through Sections 154(3) and 156(3), while preserving the recognised writ exceptions. Its distinction of Lalita Kumari prevented conflating the police's statutory duty to register cognizable information with an unqualified right to immediate Article 226 mandamus. Sakiri Vasu and Aleque Padamsee were then cited for the availability of the remedy of a complaint before the competent criminal court.

The Court dismissed the petition with liberty to file a criminal complaint, expressly without entering into the merits of the case. It did not hold that the police had lawfully refused a cognizable complaint, that the described persons were innocent, or that Article 226 is categorically unavailable where a statutory remedy exists. The decision is a ruling on the proper forum and procedural remedy with express liberty to pursue a criminal complaint.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the writ petition. Premwati was given liberty to file a criminal complaint before a court of competent jurisdiction. No direction to register an FIR or prescribe investigative methods was issued, and no factual or penal merits determination was made.

Premwati v. State of M.P. and Ors., W.P. no. 22979/2019, 07/11/2019, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (544) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 125 CrPC / minor child - A child's maintenance entitlement is independent of the parents' marital dispute and an asserted Section 125 disqualification of the mother. The Court rejected the father's argument that the Family Court's refusal of Priyanka's maintenance necessarily defeated the maintenance awarded to their minor son Virat; considering his age and Priyanka's assertion that the father's monthly income was ₹30,000–35,000, it affirmed ₹4,000 per month and dismissed the father's Criminal Revision 5206/2019. No universal quantum rule or new effective date for the child was decided.

Wife / separate residence / restitution - Mere filing of a Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act petition does not by itself prove that a wife resides separately without sufficient reason or bar her Section 125 CrPC claim. The Court considered Rina Kumari alias Rina Devi alias Reena v. Dinesh Kumar Mahto, SLP (Crl.) 5896/2024, decided 10 January 2025, for the principle that even a restitution decree does not automatically extinguish maintenance. Given the parties' conflict and the Section 498A FIR, it could not uphold the Family Court's rejection of Priyanka's claim; the husband's alleged withdrawal of his restitution proceeding was a submission. The order does not decide criminal guilt or finally prove each cruelty allegation.

Final quantum / commencement - After setting aside the rejection of the wife's claim, the Court awarded her ₹6,000 monthly. Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, it made the amount payable from the date of her maintenance application. The figure is a case-specific assessment on the recorded circumstances, while the son's separate ₹4,000 award remained affirmed. Her Criminal Revision 4107/2019 succeeded to that extent; no costs were ordered.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : This common order disposes of Criminal Revision 4107/2019 by Priyanka Rajawat and her minor son Virat and Criminal Revision 5206/2019 by Rahul Singh alias Vijay Singh Rajawat, the husband and father. The revisions arose from the order dated 23 July 2019 passed by the Principal Judge, Family Court, Bhind in Case 138/2017 MJCR. The Family Court rejected the wife's Section 125 CrPC application on the view that she lived separately without sufficient reason, but awarded their son ₹4,000 each month.

The marriage on 30 April 2015 and Virat's parentage were undisputed. In the maintenance application Priyanka alleged that her husband and his family were dissatisfied with the dowry because a four-wheeler had not been given, subjected her to physical and mental harassment during pregnancy, left delivery expenses to her family, and resumed mistreatment after temporary reconciliation efforts through panchayats. She said her parents-in-law assaulted and expelled her with the child on 23 May 2017. These were her allegations, not findings in a criminal trial. She said she had no independent livelihood; she described Rahul as a Panchayat Secretary earning ₹15,000 salary, with land and a house, and claimed total monthly income of ₹30,000 –35,000. Rahul denied the allegations, asserted that he paid delivery expenses, blamed her conduct and said she left voluntarily despite his attempts to bring her back in January and June 2017. He referred to his Section 9 Hindu Marriage Act petition for restitution of conjugal rights.

The Family Court recorded the statements of witnesses before deciding the applications. Rahul's revision challenged the son's ₹4,000 award on the ground that the mother's separate residence also defeated the child's entitlement. Priyanka's revision challenged the rejection of her own claim. Before the High Court the parties also disputed the significance of an IPC Section 498A FIR and a submission that Rahul had withdrawn the restitution petition. The Court addressed each beneficiary separately.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rina Kumari alias Rina Devi alias Reena v. Dinesh Kumar Mahto alias Dinesh Kumar Mahato, SLP (Crl.) 5896/2024, Supreme Court decision of 10 January 2025, was invoked in the Court's own reasoning. The High Court described its operative proposition as preserving a wife's maintenance claim even where a decree for restitution under Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act has been passed. The present dispute involved only a petition said to have been filed and, according to the wife's counsel, later withdrawn. The Court applied the distinction to reject an automatic disqualification.

Rajnesh v. Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, was expressly applied to make the wife's final maintenance award payable from the date of the application. Neither judgment was invoked to transfer the child's entitlement to the mother or to fix a universal quantum.

3. Statutes considered : Section 125 CrPC supplied the wife and minor child's maintenance claims. The Family Court's refusal of maintenance to the wife rested on her allegedly unjustified separate residence, the issue addressed under the Section 125(4) sufficient-reason principle; the High Court rejected treating the husband's filing under Section 9 as conclusive of that question. The child's claim was assessed as an independent paternal obligation and could not be defeated through the mother's alleged conduct. Section 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act concerns restitution of conjugal rights; the Court distinguished a mere petition from an automatic maintenance bar and considered the Supreme Court's rule even concerning a decree. IPC Section 498A appeared as the subject of an FIR between the parties, supplying context for their conflict, not a determination of offence ingredients or guilt. The final award's effective date followed Rajnesh v. Neha.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the minor child's ₹4,000 monthly maintenance could be refused or reduced solely because the Family Court had found his mother to be living apart without sufficient reason, and whether that amount was supportable on the limited circumstances recorded.

(ii) Whether the husband's Section 9 restitution proceeding automatically disqualified Priyanka from Section 125 maintenance, and whether the Family Court's separate-residence conclusion survived the circumstances considered by the High Court.

(iii) If the rejection of her claim was set aside, what monthly amount and commencement date should be ordered. The revisions did not call upon the High Court to decide the Section 498A FIR's criminal merits.

5. Ratio / Findings : For Virat, the Court treated his minority and admitted parentage as establishing the father's independent duty to maintain him. A child cannot be blamed for the dispute between his parents. Rahul's attempt to defeat Virat's claim on the basis of Priyanka's alleged disqualification therefore failed. Looking at the child's age and Priyanka's assertion of Rahul's ₹30,000–35,000 monthly income, the Court considered the Family Court's ₹4,000 award neither excessive nor inadequate and affirmed it. This was a case-specific quantum assessment, not a finding on every asserted property or source of income.

For Priyanka, the Court framed the precise Section 9 question. It stated that cruelty, where present, is a reason a wife cannot be compelled to remain in the matrimonial home; merely bringing a restitution petition cannot itself establish that she left without cause. Rina Kumari was considered because it preserves maintenance even in the face of an actual restitution decree, which goes beyond the mere filing of the petition referred to here. The parties were in conflict and a Section 498A FIR had been lodged; the Family Court's conclusion that she lived separately without sufficient reason could not be affirmed on that basis. The Court did not conduct a criminal trial or pronounce the dowry and assault allegations proved. It set aside the refusal of her maintenance.

It then considered quantum separately. The order records her assertion about Rahul's earnings and his argument that her father was a police head constable; Rahul admitted his own father also worked in the police department. The Court regarded ₹6,000 monthly as sufficient in her circumstances. Applying Rajnesh v. Neha, the Court made this amount payable from the date of the maintenance application. No change was made to Virat's separate ₹4,000 award.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed Rahul's criminal revision and affirmed the son's ₹4,000 monthly maintenance. Priyanka and Virat's criminal revision was allowed to the extent of Priyanka's claim: the Family Court's rejection of her maintenance was set aside, and Rahul was directed to pay her ₹6,000 per month from the date of her application. The judgment made no order as to costs and did not decide the pending or past Section 498A allegations.

Priyanka Rajawat and Ors. v. Rahul Singh Rajawat, Cr.R. no. 4107/2019 & 5206/2019, 21/01/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (545) Prev Next

Headnote :- Bail order / appellate correction versus later cancellation - Mahipal v. Rajesh Kumar alias Polia, (2020) 2 SCC 118, was quoted and applied to distinguish two inquiries: the original grant may be set aside for perverse, illegal, arbitrary or unjustified exercise of discretion, while later cancellation for misuse generally concerns supervening conduct or breach. Its discussion of Neeru Yadav v. State of U.P., (2014) 16 SCC 508, makes later misconduct unnecessary when a superior court examines a grant that was legally defective from the outset. The Court also considered Vipan Kumar Dhir v. State of Punjab and its quotation of Daulat Ram on cogent reasons for a conventional post-grant cancellation, and Dr. Naresh Kumar Mangla v. Anita Agarwal on an order that ignores material or rests on irrelevant factors. Respondent 2's submission that no new threat or misuse had been alleged did not defeat the prosecutrix's challenge to the Special Judge's original reasoning; that bail grant was set aside, without a finding of post-release misconduct.

Serious allegation / reasons in regular bail - Mahipal, quoting Kalyan Chandra Sarkar v. Rajesh Ranjan, (2004) 7 SCC 528, requires a reasoned prima facie bail order without conducting an elaborate examination of the merits; formulaic statements that records and circumstances were considered do not show engagement with the decisive material. Dr. Naresh Kumar Mangla, drawing on Puran v. Ramvilas, (2001) 6 SCC 338, Kanwar Singh Meena v. State of Rajasthan, (2012) 12 SCC 180, and Myakala Dharmarajam v. State of Telangana, (2020) 2 SCC 743, reinforces intervention when grave accusations or crucial material are ignored. The Special Judge referred to the risk of absconding or tampering, antecedents and delay but failed to address the allegation that a teacher had repeatedly sexually assaulted a minor pupil, or the gravity of that allegation. The High Court set aside the order and directed surrender by 17 January 2022, with warrants on default. The extensive discussion of anticipatory-bail authorities reproduced within Mangla provides context; their special pre-arrest conditions were not applied as independent regular-bail holdings here.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The prosecutrix applied under Section 439(2) CrPC to set aside the order dated 28 August 2021 passed by the Special Judge (POCSO Act), Gwalior in Bail Application 2352/2021 granting regular bail to respondent 2. She asserted that she was a Class 10 pupil and a minor, about sixteen years old; the respondent had come to her home to teach from September 2020, then allegedly touched her private parts and sexually assaulted her repeatedly when her mother was away. She alleged a further rape on 29 March 2021 after he threatened her disabled brother, compelled her to consume pills, and caused bleeding and abdominal pain. She said he later called and threatened her mother, and she disclosed the events when her mother inquired. These are prosecution allegations recited for bail review, not adjudicated facts or findings of guilt.

The FIR was lodged on 9 July 2021 after the last specified incident on 29 March. The prosecutrix's counsel acknowledged that interval and referred to treatment at Lok Nayak Hospital, New Delhi, producing an outpatient registration card; the High Court did not finally determine the delay explanation or medical proof. Respondent 2 was arrested on 12 July 2021 and obtained the challenged bail. The prosecutrix argued that the Special Judge gave generic reasons without applying its mind to the seriousness of the allegations, the relationship between teacher and pupil, and the material allegations. Respondent 2 answered that bail could be cancelled only for post-release abuse of liberty and that no later threat or breach was alleged. The High Court recorded that it had not itself granted the bail under challenge and examined the Special Judge's original order.

2. Precedents — Considered : Mahipal v. Rajesh Kumar alias Polia, (2020) 2 SCC 118, was quoted at length and applied. It distinguishes superior-court review of whether a grant was an improper, arbitrary, perverse, illegal or unjustified exercise of discretion from conventional cancellation because the accused subsequently breached bail or new circumstances arose. Its quotation of Neeru Yadav v. State of U.P., (2014) 16 SCC 508, explains that an initial order based on irrelevant considerations or overlooking relevant bail factors may be set aside without proving a later violation. Its further passage requires the judge to state the material reasons for bail: a formulaic recital that the record and circumstances were perused is insufficient. It quotes Kalyan Chandra Sarkar v. Rajesh Ranjan, (2004) 7 SCC 528, for a judicious prima facie bail assessment and reasons, especially for serious allegations, while avoiding elaborate evidence adjudication. The High Court used Mahipal to reject the respondent's asserted post-release-misuse prerequisite and to examine the Special Judge's failure to consider the alleged conduct.

Vipan Kumar Dhir v. State of Punjab, for which the order gives no full reported citation, was also reproduced in para 6. It quotes Daulat Ram v. State of Haryana for the conventional need for cogent and overwhelming reasons where bail already granted is cancelled because of subsequent interference with justice, absconding risk or abuse. Its own discussion also recognises intervention where the original order ignored relevant material or considered irrelevant factors, including gravity, accused conduct and investigation risk. It refers to X v. State of Telangana. The High Court distinguished these two bases for interference; it did not find that this respondent had in fact intimidated a witness after release.

Dr. Naresh Kumar Mangla v. Anita Agarwal, cited as 2021 (1) MPLJ (Cri.) (SC) 353, was quoted extensively and considered as support for setting aside a legally untenable grant separately from later misconduct. Its passage invokes Puran v. Ramvilas, (2001) 6 SCC 338, for intervention where orders granting bail in serious cases ignore material or lack reasons; Kanwar Singh Meena v. State of Rajasthan, (2012) 12 SCC 180, and Myakala Dharmarajam v. State of Telangana, (2020) 2 SCC 743, for serious infirmities and miscarriage-of-justice review, with a prima facie assessment rather than the meticulous examination appropriate at trial. Mangla also reproduces Siddharam Satlingappa Mhetre, Jai Prakash Singh, the Constitution Bench in Sushila Aggarwal, and Pokar Ram's discussion of Gurbaksh Singh Sibbia on factors distinctive to anticipatory bail, including accusation gravity, specific role, flight/witness risks, investigative freedom and the difference between pre-arrest and post-arrest release. Those anticipatory-bail principles formed the quoted Supreme Court context; the actual impugned order was regular bail, so their special pre-arrest standard did not become an independent holding in this case. Mangla's own fact discussion of a dowry-death FIR and a later heading about CBI transfer were not transposed into this prosecution.

3. Statutes considered : Section 439(2) CrPC was the procedural basis of the prosecutrix's challenge to the lower court's release order. The Court explained its review function by reference to the Supreme Court's distinction between original-order invalidity and post-bail misconduct. The challenged bail order was passed by the Special Judge designated under the POCSO Act. The High Court's finding concerns the rational exercise of bail discretion in relation to the alleged serious sexual offence against a minor, not a final determination of criminal liability. The quoted Supreme Court material includes Section 438 anticipatory-bail standards and Section 439 regular-bail factors; those arise through precedent and the order under review was post-arrest regular bail.

4. Issues : (i) Whether absence of an allegation that respondent 2 misused liberty after release barred the prosecutrix from challenging a bail grant said to be initially arbitrary, unreasoned or inattentive to crucial circumstances.

(ii) Whether the Special Judge's recitals about non-absconding, non-tampering, antecedents, trial delay and general circumstances amounted to an adequately reasoned prima facie assessment given the specific allegations against a teacher concerning a minor pupil.

(iii) What consequence should follow if the grant was set aside, without adjudicating guilt, the disputed FIR delay or medical material.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court applied Mahipal and the connected Supreme Court line to distinguish two legally different bases for setting aside bail. Conventional cancellation following a sound grant may call for new misconduct, breach or supervening circumstances and cogent reasons. A superior court may also examine the original decision's legality and soundness and set it aside if the bail judge disregarded material considerations, relied on irrelevant ones or supplied no meaningful reasons. Respondent 2's assertion that there was no post-bail threat therefore did not answer the prosecutrix's actual challenge. The judgment's paragraph 7 describes these alternatives as misuse of liberty and grant without due application of mind; it did not find both established.

On reading the lower court's order, the Court found that it mentioned no likelihood of absconding or tampering, criminal antecedents, probable trial delay and general circumstances but did not address the central allegation: respondent 2, in the role of teacher, had repeatedly raped a pupil said to be about sixteen. It found no meaningful assessment of that role or the gravity of the accusation. The requirement to give reasons stated in Mahipal called for more than a stock formula even though bail does not call for full evidentiary adjudication. The omission constituted non-application of mind, so the order could not stand. The High Court did not find the respondent guilty or decide whether the outpatient card proved the alleged consequences. The lengthy Mangla extract about anticipatory bail did not change the procedural character of this regular-bail review.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed the application under Section 439(2) CrPC and set aside the Special Judge's bail order dated 28 August 2021 in Bail Application 2352/2021.

Prosecutrix v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 58368/2021, 10/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Writ monitoring / investigation autonomy - Manohar Lal Sharma v. Union of India, (2014) 2 SCC 532, was applied: Article 226 monitoring of a demonstrably tainted investigation checks fairness, the progress of the investigation and freedom from external influence in exceptional circumstances, while judicial supervision of its investigative conclusions would compromise the trial. The Court examined the police process, not the truth of the rape charge, and limited its factual observations to the writ and an independent CBI investigation.

Case diary / witness recording / evidence - Regulation 742(a) of the M.P. Police Regulations required investigative actions and their times to be recorded in the case diary. Written Section 161 CrPC statements omitted or added material when compared with the video recordings; footage was absent from the diary, preparation of the initial spot map and seizure of clothing and the DVR were delayed, and the police treated the implicated landlord's material differently from the complainant's. The Court found manipulation and a partisan investigation and ordered appropriate criminal inquiry. The findings do not decide guilt of the alleged sexual offences.

Custodial abuse / FIR against officers - The Section 164 CrPC complaint, magistrates' intervention, medical injuries and station chronology led the Court to find, for writ purposes, assault and overnight detention of the prosecutrix without authority, contrary to Article 21; Section 46(4) CrPC was invoked by analogy, not as an arrest charge against her. Chandra Deo Singh v. Prakash Chandra Bose, (1964) 1 SCR 639; Mohd. Yusuf v. Afaq Jahan, (2006) 1 SCC 627; Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1; Satishkumar Nyalchand Shah v. State of Gujarat, (2020) 4 SCC 22; Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v. State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626; W.N. Chadha, 1993 Supp (4) SCC 260; Anju Choudhary v. State of U.P., (2013) 6 SCC 384; and Samaj Parivartan Samudaya v. State of Karnataka, (2012) 7 SCC 407, were used to reject a general right to a hearing before registration or a requirement to join the suspected officers as parties. FIR, identification inquiry and departmental measures were directed, without convicting the officers.

SC/ST Act / public view - The prosecutrix's recorded version placed Ganga Singh Bhadoria outside her room when he allegedly used her caste name and threatened her. The Court treated that place as within public view at the prima facie stage and directed his addition to Crime 87/2021 with Sections 3(1)(r) and (s) of the SC/ST Act and Section 506 Part II IPC, leaving the ultimate ingredients to investigation and trial.

Suspect's role / victim's fair investigation - Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, with its treatment of Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt and E. Sivakumar, denied suspects control over the agency or investigative mode; Nirmal Singh Kahlon v. State of Punjab, (2009) 1 SCC 441, recognized the victim's equal entitlement to fairness, and Zahira Habibulla H. Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 4 SCC 158, supplied the caution against an investigative agency assisting the accused. The police's repeated reliance on the implicated landlord while neglecting the complainant made a further change of local investigating officer inadequate.

CBI transfer / exceptional power - State of W.B. v. Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571, and State of Punjab v. CBI, (2011) 9 SCC 182, preserve Article 226 power to direct CBI investigation while requiring exceptional, cautious use. R.S. Sodhi v. State of U.P., 1994 Supp (1) SCC 143; Kashmeri Devi v. Delhi Administration, 1988 Supp SCC 482; Rubabbuddin Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2010) 2 SCC 200; and Mithilesh Kumar Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2015) 9 SCC 795, were considered in relation to allegations against the police, confidence in the investigation, and a reasonable apprehension of partisan investigation based on the particular facts. After finding both original and changed local investigators tainted, the Court ordered CBI investigation of Crime 87/2021 and transfer of the original records; its merits observations are confined to the writ.

Victim identity / digital statements - Video statements missing from the case diary were produced with WhatsApp captions. The Court treated their unexplained transmission as a prima facie privacy and identity problem and directed registration of Section 228-A IPC against the officers responsible for recording or retaining the footage. Actual statutory guilt and individual roles remain for the independent investigation.

Police station CCTV / oversight - D.K. Basu v. State of W.B., (2015) 8 SCC 744; Shafhi Mohd. v. State of H.P., (2018) 5 SCC 311; and Paramvir Singh Saini v. Baljit Singh, (2021) 1 SCC 184, were considered on custodial CCTV, videography and oversight. Because Morar's CCTV had reportedly remained out of order for months, the Court directed the DGP to implement Paramvir and the SP to ensure functioning cameras providing comprehensive coverage of police stations. Protection of the prosecutrix, ₹50,000 costs and liberty to seek Article 21 compensation in a proper forum were separately ordered; compensation was not awarded.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The prosecutrix brought Article 226 W.P. 5321/2021 seeking police accountability, arrest of suspects, change of investigator and protection. She alleged that while living and working in the house of Ganga Singh Bhadoria, his grandson Aditya and another man came to her room on 31 January 2021, the other man raped her while Aditya watched, and she was threatened. Crime 87/2021 at Morar police station initially recorded IPC Sections 376 and 506 and SC/ST Act Sections 3(2)(va) and 3(1)(w)(ii). Her age was disputed: an Aadhaar copy indicated 1 January 2007 while school material indicated 7 March 2002; police declined POCSO registration on its adult-age view. The High Court did not finally determine age or sexual-offence guilt. The prosecutrix reported rape through Dial 100 around 20:29; the police were informed before the response vehicle delivered her to Morar around 21:04, yet the FIR was registered at 23:50. The State defended the investigation as honest and pointed to allegedly inconsistent accounts, disputed medical consent, competing allegations by Ganga Singh and his family, and an asserted plot arising from another murder case.

The Court obtained the case diary, time-stamped Dial 100 record, station diary, the file of the SP's incomplete internal inquiry and video recordings; the police initially withheld the diary portion recording investigative actions and the videos were absent from the diary. After the first hospital visit the prosecutrix remained at the police station through the night and next day, said she was beaten and pressed to change her account, and gave two further police statements. Before the Magistrate under Section 164 CrPC she complained of the assault; the Magistrate informed the CJM, who verified the complaint, sought examination, ordered a change of investigator and safe accommodation. The CSP sent her to One Stop Centre without a written judicial direction; a related habeas corpus petition later let her return to her parents. Medical records of 1 and 2 February described multiple injuries. The Court examined differences in the descriptions and timing of those injuries without treating the medical records as a determination that sexual assault had occurred. The subsequent investigator still failed to remedy the deficiencies in the case diary and handling of evidence. The Court's 188-paragraph order reviewed the entire chronology and the limited Article 226 remedy; it did not try the underlying offence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Manohar Lal Sharma v. Union of India, (2014) 2 SCC 532, was quoted in paragraph 16 and applied in 17: police normally investigate cognizable offences independently, but a constitutional court may exceptionally monitor a mala fide, abusive or legally improper process to secure a fair, timely investigation. Monitoring does not mean supervising individual investigative acts or predetermining the police opinion under Section 173(2) CrPC, which would prejudice trial. The High Court accordingly said it would assess the manner of investigation rather than pronounce upon the police's proposed merits conclusion.

On directions to register a case against officers who were not parties, Chandra Deo Singh v. Prakash Chandra Bose, (1964) 1 SCR 639, supplied the limit on participation before process is issued; Mohd. Yusuf v. Afaq Jahan, (2006) 1 SCC 627, explained that a Section 156(3) pre-cognizance investigation order may entail FIR registration under Section 154; Lalita Kumari v. State of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, supplied the mandatory-registration rule for information disclosing a cognizable offence. Satishkumar Nyalchand Shah v. State of Gujarat, (2020) 4 SCC 22, with nested W.N. Chadha, Narender G. Goel, Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki and Sri Bhagwan Samardha, and Dinubhai Boghabhai Solanki v. State of Gujarat, (2014) 4 SCC 626, addressed absence of an automatic proposed-accused hearing before further investigation. W.N. Chadha, 1993 Supp (4) SCC 260, explained why audi alteram partem does not ordinarily apply during the collection of evidence under Chapter XII and why an accused cannot dictate the mode of investigation. Anju Choudhary v. State of U.P., (2013) 6 SCC 384, addressed the absence of a general right of a suspect to be heard before FIR registration and the Code's registration scheme. Samaj Parivartan Samudaya v. State of Karnataka, (2012) 7 SCC 407, recognized possible judicial discretion to hear affected persons on agency transfer in particular cases, not a universal requirement. Together these authorities supported the narrow conclusion that non-joinder of suspected police personnel was no bar to a direction to register an FIR; they did not determine individual guilt.

Romila Thapar v. Union of India, (2018) 10 SCC 753, was quoted in paragraph 168 to establish that an accused cannot select the investigator or dictate the method; the quoted paragraphs trace Narmada Bai, Sanjiv Rajendra Bhatt and E. Sivakumar and their nested Dinubhai and Narender G. Goel propositions. Nirmal Singh Kahlon v. State of Punjab, (2009) 1 SCC 441, was quoted for a victim's entitlement to fair investigation alongside the accused's Article 21 right, and Zahira Habibulla H. Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2004) 4 SCC 158, for the failure of justice when an investigative agency assists the accused. The Court used them to reject the local police's continued reliance on Ganga Singh's account while the complainant's account and evidence were mishandled.

D.K. Basu v. State of W.B., (1997) 1 SCC 416, was invoked in paragraph 172 for the gravity of custodial torture and the court's human-rights duty. State of W.B. v. Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, (2010) 3 SCC 571 (Constitution Bench), held that Articles 32/226 preserve judicial review and permit an exceptional court-directed CBI investigation without treating the State-consent restriction imposed on the executive by Section 6 of the Delhi Special Police Establishment Act as a restriction on constitutional courts; State of Punjab v. Central Bureau of Investigation, (2011) 9 SCC 182, stressed cautious, sparing use to restore confidence or enforce rights. R.S. Sodhi v. State of U.P., 1994 Supp (1) SCC 143, and Kashmeri Devi v. Delhi Administration, 1988 Supp SCC 482, treated allegations against local police and shielding of officers as reasons to move investigation outside the force. Rubabbuddin Sheikh v. State of Gujarat, (2010) 2 SCC 200, illustrated independent investigation despite an already filed charge sheet where police were implicated. Mithilesh Kumar Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2015) 9 SCC 795, rejected transfer merely on request and required the Court's satisfaction, based on the facts of the case, that shoddy or partisan investigation endangers a credible search for the truth, without requiring an incontrovertible case of abuse. These were applied to transfer both the underlying crime investigation and records to CBI after the CJM's earlier change of local officer had failed.

The Court separately considered D.K. Basu v. State of W.B., (2015) 8 SCC 744, on police-station CCTV safeguards; Shafhi Mohd. v. State of H.P., (2018) 5 SCC 311, on phased investigative videography and oversight, including its reference to Karnail Singh; and Paramvir Singh Saini v. Baljit Singh, (2021) 1 SCC 184, on functioning audio-video coverage, maintenance and reporting by SHOs, oversight committees, retention of recordings and access to complaint mechanisms for citizens. It used Paramvir to require restoration and comprehensive coverage. Mahender Chawla v. Union of India, (2019) 14 SCC 615, on the Witness Protection Scheme, was noted to reinforce the CBI's specific duty to protect this prosecutrix.

3. Statutes considered : Article 226 supplied constitutional jurisdiction over a criminal investigation, confined by the separation between monitoring fairness and directing a Section 173(2) CrPC police opinion. Article 21 protected the victim's dignity, bodily security and entitlement to fair investigation as well as the accused's rights; the Court held the overnight confinement without lawful basis an Article 21 violation. Section 46(4) CrPC, ordinarily prohibiting a woman's after-dark arrest save exceptional safeguards and prior Magistrate permission, was invoked by analogy to show the impropriety of holding a rape complainant overnight; the Court did not purport to apply it as though she had been formally arrested. Sections 154, 156(3), 161, 164, 172 and 173 CrPC respectively informed FIR registration, pre-cognizance direction, police-statement and video-recording practices, judicial statements, limits on referring to case-diary proceedings, and autonomy in preparing the investigative report. Regulation 742(a) of the M.P. Police Regulations required the time of investigative action to be contemporaneously entered. Section 44 of the Police Act was discussed in relation to the station general diary. Police circulars of 2017 and 2019 concerned videography of sexual-offence investigation. Sections 82–83 CrPC were identified as unpursued absconder process despite SP instructions.

The initial FIR included IPC Sections 376 and 506 and SC/ST Act Sections 3(2)(va) and 3(1)(w)(ii); on the omitted video-recorded caste insult and threat the Court directed addition of Sections 3(1)(r),(s) of the 1989 Act and Section 506 Part II IPC against Ganga Singh on a prima facie footing. It directed registration of IPC Section 341 for alleged unlawful detention, Section 228-A for prima facie disclosure of rape-victim identity through video transmission, Sections 467, 468 and 471 for alleged statement manipulation, Section 201 for evidence suppression, and other offences disclosed by independent inquiry. These were directions to register and investigate, not convictions based on findings that every statutory ingredient was established. The POCSO Act was discussed only in the police's disputed age decision; the Court did not decide POCSO applicability. Section 6 of the Delhi Special Police Establishment Act arose through the constitutional precedent on transfer of investigation to CBI, not a bar to this Article 226 order. Compensation for the Article 21 violation was not sought and remained available in a proper forum.

4. Issues : (i) Whether Article 226 review could examine a claimed biased investigation without improperly supervising the investigator's substantive opinion.

(ii) Whether the FIR chronology, mismatched written/video statements, incomplete diary, police-station detention and medical record, failure to preserve scene evidence and treatment of the landlord's competing representations demonstrated a departure from fair investigation and custodial safeguards.

(iii) Whether the officers' absence as parties and a claimed pre-FIR hearing right prevented criminal registration for apparent custodial assault, falsified official statements, privacy breach and suppression of evidence; and whether the recorded caste insult and death threat required investigation of Ganga Singh.

(iv) Whether another local officer would cure the problem or exceptionally independent CBI investigation was needed under Article 226, preserving trial independence and suspect/victim rights.

(v) What CCTV, protection, discipline, costs and compensation-related orders followed from the findings.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first applied Manohar Lal Sharma's boundary. It had no role in determining which of the conflicting versions of the alleged rape was true or prescribing the content of the Section 173(2) report. It could, however, examine whether a police force acted impartially. The Dial 100 chronology made the near three-hour gap before FIR material. Comparison of the first video with the written Section 161 statement showed omitted accusations against Ganga Singh; supplementary recordings and other witnesses' footage likewise differed from the writing, and the officer did not reduce the accounts verbatim. The case diary omitted timings contrary to Regulation 742 and excluded the recorded videos; the initial investigators failed promptly to prepare a site map, seize torn clothing, secure the house DVR or preserve the room, while allowing the implicated landlord and relatives prolonged access to the evidence and their preferred theories. The changed investigator's diary, missing documents supporting the claimed searches for the absconding accused, repeated receipt of Ganga Singh's submissions, attempt to obtain court CCTV footage through the district prosecution office, and neglect of the complainant's father's complaint confirmed the continuing problem. The Court found the investigation tainted, but limited its observations to deciding this writ and left CBI free to investigate.

The Court evaluated the Magistrate's prompt response to the Section 164 complaint, the CJM's order, station chronology and the two medical examinations. It rejected a shifting claim that the victim had been kept safely at the station's Urja desk merely because her parental home was 25 km away; it found no court permission, diary explanation or evidence that she refused to leave. It concluded that she was detained at the police station overnight and next day and beaten to alter her version. The injury descriptions and disputed internal-examination consent did not determine the rape accusation, but supported an inquiry into the police treatment. It also rejected the CSP's alleged oral judicial order to send her to One Stop Centre, considered the cursory internal inquiry inadequate, and directed identification of additional assailants. These writ findings under Article 21 triggered registration, independent investigation and departmental measures, without foreclosing criminal proof and defence at trial.

Applying the Supreme Court authorities on FIR registration and the absence of a right to a prior hearing, the Court held that suspected officers' non-joinder did not prevent a direction for FIR registration. It identified the SHO Ajay Singh Pawar and SI Kirti Upadhyaya with other unknown officers for the alleged beating and detention; directed inquiry and registration under Section 341 and other applicable IPC offences; directed Section 228-A registration for the apparent disclosure of the victim's identity through videos transmitted on WhatsApp; and Sections 467, 468, 471 and 201 inquiry for alleged statement falsification and evidence suppression, leaving the independent investigator to determine the roles of all involved. The video-recorded account placed Ganga Singh outside the room while allegedly uttering the caste insult and threat. It found a place within public view and directed his addition under SC/ST Act Sections 3(1)(r),(s) and IPC Section 506 Part II, prima facie and without adjudging liability.

Romila Thapar prevented a suspect from steering the investigation; Nirmal Singh Kahlon and Zahira supported the complainant's equal fair-investigation claim. Ganga Singh's recurrent police access, the treatment of his DVR and allegations, the complainant's confinement and the first and replacement officers' actions made the proposal for a further change of local investigator unpersuasive. Under Committee for Protection of Democratic Rights, State of Punjab v. CBI and the cases concerning allegations against the police and the credibility of investigation, this was the exceptional record warranting transfer of Crime 87/2021 and related materials to CBI despite the petition's narrower express prayer for change of officer. The Court expressly kept its case-specific observations from binding the new investigation or trial. It also applied Paramvir's CCTV obligations to cameras reportedly out of service since July 2020, directing working coverage.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has allowed the writ petition with ₹50,000 costs, payable by the respondents into the High Court Registry within ten days for withdrawal by the petitioner. The SP Gwalior was directed to register the identified FIRs against the named and unknown officers, add the offences against Ganga Singh as directed, investigate other involved public and private persons, and identify the alleged police assailants. The DGP/competent officers were directed to institute departmental inquiries against the listed original and replacement investigators, CSP, Additional SP and participants in the assault, and to transfer the listed officers outside the Gwalior and Morena Range immediately. Crime 87/2021 was transferred to CBI; the SP must deliver the original case diary, Additional SP inquiry file, Dial 100 and station records in sealed cover, and the CBI Director must assign a senior officer. CBI must examine the specified telephone records. If those records show that Ganga Singh was in contact with any of the specified police officers, CBI must immediately forward the call-detail records to the DGP for action under service law and register an offence under Section 201 IPC and other applicable provisions. CBI must also protect the prosecutrix against pressure and preserve her dignity. The DGP must implement Paramvir Singh Saini and the SP ensure functioning comprehensive police-station CCTV. The Court retained a copy pen drive under seal, allowed the prosecutrix to pursue Article 21 compensation separately because none was prayed for, and left factual merits to independent investigation and trial.

Prosecutrix v. State of M.P. and Ors., W.P. no. 5321/2021, 23/06/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Arrest / investigative discretion - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was applied. Its quotation of M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, explains that Section 41 CrPC permits, but does not mechanically require, arrest merely because a cognizable offence is alleged; the power must be exercised cautiously because arrest affects liberty and reputation. The Supreme Court disapproved a Section 482 order dictating arrest, seizure, statements and charge sheet where police might lawfully conclude otherwise. The High Court therefore refused the prosecutrix's request to order arrest in the registered rape/kidnapping case. D. Venkatasubramaniam also quoted Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on notice to persons directly affected by an investigation ordered on an anonymous petition in that separate case; the present order did not issue such a directive against an unheard non-party.

Timely report / no predetermined result - Section 173(1) CrPC commands completion of Chapter XII investigation without unnecessary delay. The officer must decide on the collected material whether to file a charge sheet or closure report, rather than hold the case indefinitely. Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam's restraint against supervising investigative steps, the Court directed early completion and lawful action without ordering either arrest or a charge sheet; it left a further grievance to the SP Gwalior. The Section 482 application was disposed of.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The prosecutrix applied under Section 482 CrPC in M.Cr.C. 10230/2021. On her complaint, Crime 382/2020 had been registered at Police Station Vishwavidyalaya, District Gwalior, under IPC Sections 376(2)(n) and 365. Her prayer sought acceptance of her application and an order for proper investigation of the offence and arrest of the accused. Counsel alleged that the investigation had not advanced and the accused had not been arrested. The State was represented through a panel lawyer. The High Court considered the limits of its inherent power and the officer's separate duty to finish investigation without unnecessary delay.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, is reproduced at length in paragraph 4 and directly applied in paragraph 5. The Supreme Court had set aside a High Court's unreasoned Section 482 command for police to record statements, arrest, seize property and file a charge sheet, observing that the method and outcome of investigation are matters for the statutory agency. Arrest is not mandatory on every cognizable FIR, and investigation may legitimately culminate in either a charge sheet or no-case/closure report. A High Court may use Section 482 sparingly to give effect to Code orders, prevent process abuse or secure justice, but cannot dictate a particular investigative angle or make casual remarks with far-reaching consequences. The present Court applied that rule in refusing to direct arrest or the filing of a charge sheet.

Within D. Venkatasubramaniam, M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, is quoted on Section 41 CrPC. Police have discretion, on reasonable complaint, credible information or suspicion in the statutory situations, to assess whether arrest is necessary as the investigation progresses. They need not arrest automatically after registration; the power must be exercised cautiously because it intrudes on liberty and affects reputation, with regard to the allegations and the persons involved. That rule was substantively considered through the quoted Supreme Court passage and supplied the specific answer to the applicant's arrest prayer.

The longer extract also cites Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, on a different setting in which a court, acting on an anonymous petition, ordered investigation against persons without a hearing, with consequences for their reputation. The order’s quotation of paragraphs 33–34 of D. Venkatasubramaniam discusses that defect.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the procedural source of the application and inherent jurisdiction. It did not entitle the applicant to choose whom the police should arrest or demand a direction to file a charge sheet. Section 41 CrPC, addressed in the M.C. Abraham extract, makes warrantless arrest permissive on specified grounds and requires the officer to exercise judgment rather than act automatically. Section 173(1) CrPC expressly requires every investigation under Chapter XII to be completed without unnecessary delay. The Court distinguished that statutory timing obligation from judicial control over the gathering of evidence or the final report; the final report could be a closure report or charge sheet. IPC Sections 376(2)(n) and 365 identify the registered allegations only.

4. Issues : (i) Whether a Section 482 court should direct arrest of the persons named in a registered cognizable case, or require a particular charge sheet or investigative sequence, merely because the complainant says that police have taken no further action.

(ii) Whether the High Court could still insist on compliance with Section 173(1)'s independent command to complete investigation without unnecessary delay while preserving the officer's discretion over the investigation and its outcome.

(iii) What forum the prosecutrix could approach if she retained a grievance after that limited direction.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court adopted D. Venkatasubramaniam: an arrest order would substitute judicial choice for the statutory judgment of investigators. Section 41 does not make arrest obligatory merely because an FIR has been registered, and even a serious accusation cannot itself justify a mechanical judicial command to arrest. A direction to file a charge sheet would similarly assume the result before investigation concluded; police may lawfully submit a closure report if the evidence fails. The Court therefore declined to supervise investigative methods or predetermine a report under Section 482.

Conversely, the quoted text of Section 173(1) imposes a positive duty to finish investigation without unnecessary delay. The officer must evaluate whether an offence is disclosed and take the steps required by law to complete the investigation and submit the appropriate final report. This supports a neutral direction for early completion, not an order for a specific arrest, seizure, statement or charge sheet. The Court left room for the prosecutrix to present any remaining grievance to the SP, who must consider it under law. The narrow disposition preserves both the complainant's interest in timely action and investigative independence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court finally disposed of the Section 482 application. The High Court refused to order the accused's arrest or to supervise the investigative outcome. It directed the investigating officer to conclude Crime 382/2020 as early as possible and take necessary steps in accordance with law under Section 173(1), without a numerical deadline or predetermined final report. The applicant remained free to make a grievance application to the Superintendent of Police, Gwalior, for consideration in accordance with law.

Prosecutrix v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 10230/2021, 26/02/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Person identification / TIP versus dock - Sheo Shankar Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 3 SCC 654, including Malkhansingh v. State of M.P., (2003) 5 SCC 746, and Pramod Mandal v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 150, distinguishes substantive courtroom identification from investigative TIP corroboration, without imposing an inflexible requirement to hold a parade or a fixed period for doing so. Prakash v. State of Karnataka, (2014) 12 SCC 133, State of Rajasthan v. Daud Khan, (2016) 2 SCC 607, and Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, confirm that reliability must be assessed in context even without a TIP, including where the accused was already known to the witness; Suraj Pal v. State of Haryana, (1995) 2 SCC 64, and Dara Singh v. Republic of India, (2011) 2 SCC 490, stress the prudential weakness of first-time dock identification of a stranger without corroboration. Here the complainant had promptly named and previously knew Purshottam, identified him in court from close range, and her injuries matched her account. A failed TIP, plausibly affected by eyesight, did not defeat that combined proof. Ghanshyam and Preetam were neither named in the FIR nor identified in the parade or dock, and their involvement remained unproved.

Recovered property / ownership proof - The Section 27 Evidence Act disclosures and seizure testimony proved recovery of silver articles from Ghanshyam and Preetam and gold tops from Purshottam, including a hidden item at a public place. The complainant and the witness said to have conducted the property identification stated that the police displayed and handed over the jewellery at the outpost before the memo; that process did not prove the seized articles were hers. Recovery could not repair the missing person identification of Ghanshyam and Preetam, who were acquitted. Purshottam's gold-top recovery lost probative value, yet his independent prompt naming, reliable dock identification and medical corroboration sustained Sections 452 and 397 IPC. His ten-year rigorous-imprisonment term under Section 397 was reduced to the statutory seven-year minimum; the convictions and sentences of the other two appellants were set aside.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Three connected appeals arose from a nighttime robbery at the house of Gendibai on 7 November 2013. She reported that four men entered while she was alone, tied or gagged her, took silver ornaments, gold tops, a ring and cash, and inflicted injury to her ears and teeth. The FIR was lodged within about four hours, naming Purshottam, whom she later described as a known family relation by marriage, but not Ghanshyam or Preetam Dhakad. Police eventually seized a gold top from Purshottam, silver Khangwari from Ghanshyam and silver Kade from Preetam. All three were convicted of house trespass and robbery with Section 397 IPC in the same sessions trial. Separate judgments were delivered because two of them absconded after the evidence was recorded. Each received ten years' rigorous imprisonment for the robbery count.

The key dispute was identification. At the TIP of persons, Gendibai identified only another person, Laxminarayan, not these three. She later identified Purshottam in court when she moved closer to him, and the trial judge recorded that proximity; she had impaired vision after the attack and had known him before. She did not identify Ghanshyam or Preetam either at the parade or in court, and their names were absent from her early FIR. Her son Balram and neighbour Madan reported her prompt naming of Purshottam and corroborated the occurrence of the robbery and the injuries sustained; Madan did not support implication of the other two. Medical evidence recorded damaged teeth, ear wounds and other injuries. The complainant said the police had shown both accused persons and recovered property at the outpost. The alleged independent property-identification witness, Sarpanch Ramcharan, said the police handed over the items there and prepared the memo; this undermined the claimed property parade. The court distinguished proof of recovery of each item from proof that it belonged to the complainant and then assessed each appellant independently.

2. Precedents — Considered : Sheo Shankar Singh v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 3 SCC 654, is quoted in paragraph 33 and applied in paragraphs 34–35. It holds that courtroom identification is substantive evidence; a prior TIP tests and corroborates identification of a person otherwise unknown to the witness. A TIP is not compulsory under CrPC, nor can an accused demand one as of right; a failed or omitted parade does not make a court identification inadmissible, but weight depends on the witness and case circumstances. Its quotation of Malkhansingh v. State of M.P., (2003) 5 SCC 746, anchors this distinction in Section 9 Evidence Act and the prudent search for earlier identification of a stranger, subject to exceptions. Kanta Prashad, Vaikuntam Chandrappa, Budhsen and Rameshwar Singh are cited within that quoted discussion as examples of the same principle. Sheo Shankar Singh also quotes Pramod Mandal v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 150, against any universal TIP time limit or required number of identifying witnesses; Malkhansingh and Aqeel Ahmad are named as consistent. The Court used that contextual rule to avoid treating Purshottam's failed identification at the parade as conclusive when she knew and promptly named him, yet did not use the rule to fill the total absence of identification of the other two.

Prakash v. State of Karnataka, (2014) 12 SCC 133, was quoted twice: a parade aids investigation and corroborates sworn evidence, is especially desirable for a complete stranger, and can be unnecessary where the witness already knows the suspect or otherwise saw him sufficiently. The quoted passage invokes Ravi Kapur, R. Shaji, Rameshwar Singh, Mulla, Kishore Chand, Boota Singh, Malkhansingh and Visveswaran, including the qualification that identification is not a sine qua non where circumstantial proof otherwise establishes guilt. State of Rajasthan v. Daud Khan, (2016) 2 SCC 607, was considered for the admissibility of reliable dock evidence without a parade and its fact-specific weight; its references to Ashok Debbarma and Manu Sharma likewise illustrate the conditional, not automatic, acceptance of in-court identification. Mukesh v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2017) 6 SCC 1, repeated the Malkhansingh distinction and recognized that corroborative strength depends on the case, citing Santokh Singh, Visveswaran and Manu Sharma in its quoted treatment.

Suraj Pal v. State of Haryana, (1995) 2 SCC 64, was quoted for TIP's two safeguards where identity is initially unknown: checking the witness's visual memory early and protecting a suspect against a sudden unsupported dock identification. Dara Singh v. Republic of India, (2011) 2 SCC 490, was quoted for caution where identification of previously unknown offenders occurs for the first time at trial without a reliable earlier parade or other corroboration, while acknowledging that absence of TIP is not invariably fatal. Dara Singh's extended extract discusses photo identification and quotes Manu Sharma, Umar Abdul Sakoor Sorathia and Dana Yadav to distinguish an investigative aid from substantive sworn evidence. The Court applied the caution concerning identification of strangers alongside the substantive value of dock identification, taking account of prior acquaintance, prompt FIR naming, the judge's close-range observation and corroborative medical evidence.

The finding on property identification rested on the complainant's admission of advance exposure and Ramcharan's evidence that the supposed independent procedure occurred at the outpost. The Court accepted the actual seizures under Section 27 but found the link to the complainant's property unproved. It is a fact-specific evidentiary application based on the identification evidence in this record.

3. Statutes considered : Section 9 of the Indian Evidence Act makes facts establishing identity relevant; a TIP provides corroboration during investigation, whereas the witness's identification on oath at trial supplies substantive evidence. Section 162 CrPC governs prior police-stage identification statements as described in the Supreme Court passages. Section 27 Evidence Act concerned the disclosures made by the accused leading to concealed silver and gold recoveries; the court differentiated the fact of discovery from ownership identification. IPC Section 452 covered the house trespass, Sections 394 and 397 the charged robbery and the personal use/injury consequence as treated by the trial and appellate court. Gendibai's broken or dismembered teeth supported the Court's Section 397 affirmation as it framed the conviction. Section 397's statutory seven-year minimum was the stated basis for reducing Purshottam's ten-year rigorous term to seven, not for acquitting him. Paragraph 2 states that the appeals were filed under Section 372 CrPC.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the complainant's failure to identify Purshottam in TIP defeated her subsequent dock identification despite prior acquaintance, prompt naming, closer courtroom viewing and corroboration; and whether Ghanshyam and Preetam could be linked when they were neither named nor identified in either setting.

(ii) Whether proved Section 27 recoveries of hidden ornaments could establish that the articles were the complainant's after police had shown them before an ostensible property identification, and whether the failed article link affected the appellants differently.

(iii) Whether the surviving proof supported Purshottam's Sections 452 and 397 convictions, and how the convictions, terms, bail and custody of all three appellants should be disposed of.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court held that the robbery and injury occurred: Gendibai's account was materially supported by the medical evidence and the prompt post-event witnesses. That did not by itself establish the identity of every accused. Ghanshyam and Preetam were not named in the FIR; Gendibai could identify neither during the TIP nor in court. The prosecution therefore needed another reliable link. Witness Hazarilal and the investigator proved their Section 27 disclosures and recovery of concealed silver articles, including one hidden in a public location within the discloser's knowledge. Yet Gendibai admitted earlier police display at the outpost, and Ramcharan contradicted an independent property parade by saying the articles were handed over there and the police prepared the memo. The Court found no trustworthy identification of the items as hers and no remaining evidence tying those two men to the offence; it acquitted both because their guilt had not been proved beyond reasonable doubt. Recovery as an event was upheld, but its asserted link to this robbery was not.

Purshottam's position was different. His name was in the promptly lodged FIR, and Gendibai knew him as her Samadhi. Although she failed to identify him at the TIP, she identified him in court at closer range, and the trial judge's note and her reduced eyesight furnished an explanation for the earlier lapse. Sheo Shankar Singh and the related Supreme Court cases made dock identification admissible and potentially sufficient in these circumstances; the caution for first-time stranger identification did not turn the earlier unsuccessful TIP into an automatic acquittal. The evidence of Balram and Madan about her prompt naming of Purshottam and the medical evidence of her injuries supplied support. The gold top was recovered from Purshottam, but the tainted property-identification process stripped that recovery of importance; the conviction rested on the independent evidence. The Court affirmed his Sections 452 and 397 liability, referring to the dismemberment of teeth, and reduced the term of rigorous imprisonment under Section 397 from ten to seven years, the stated statutory minimum. It did not use the unreliable property parade against the acquitted co-appellants or treat the failed person TIP uniformly for a previously known and two unidentified suspects.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeals of Ghanshyam and Preetam Dhakad; their distinct convictions and sentences from the 12 May 2015 and 29 July 2017 trial judgments were set aside, and both were acquitted. Preetam's bail bonds were discharged; Ghanshyam, then in jail, was to be released unless wanted in another case. Purshottam's appeal was partly allowed: his Sections 452 and 397 IPC convictions were affirmed, but the Section 397 rigorous-imprisonment term was reduced to seven years with a ₹2,000 fine and six months' rigorous imprisonment in default as the appellate order states. He was on bail; the bonds were cancelled and he was ordered to surrender immediately to serve the remaining sentence.

Case Sr. no. (549) Prev Next

Headnote :- Territorial jurisdiction / continuing cruelty - Section 178 CrPC and Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, were applied: dowry-related expulsion at the matrimonial home may continue as mental trauma at the parental home, making that location relevant for a Section 498-A IPC investigation, even though physical acts took place elsewhere. The wife alleged that she was expelled from Jaipur for not bringing a further ₹25 lakh and was compelled to reside with her parents at Gwalior, where the applicants repeated their demand. The Court held that Police Station Mahila Thana, Gwalior, could investigate. Its decision rested on the alleged continuing cruelty and a further local act, without deciding the complaint's ultimate truth.

Relatives / specific allegations / quashing - The father-in-law, mother-in-law and husband were alleged to have jointly demanded further dowry, taunted, assaulted, expelled and threatened the wife, including a later visit and demand at Gwalior. Applying Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, on the significance of taunts over non-fulfilment of a dowry demand, the Court held that the allegations of participation by the near relatives were specific rather than vague accusations against the whole family and refused Section 482 quashing. Kahkashan Kausar, Geeta Mehrotra, Arnesh Kumar and Lalita Kumari were invoked by the applicants, in support of quashing; the respondents submitted that the husband's separate Jaipur FIR was absent from the charge sheet and its truth could not be determined in this proceeding. The quashing application was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Purushottam Lal Sharma (father-in-law), his wife (mother-in-law) and their son (husband) sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC of Crime 23/2022 registered at Mahila Thana, Gwalior, for IPC Sections 498-A, 506, 34 and Sections 3/4 Dowry Prohibition Act. The wife alleged a Hindu marriage in Jaipur on 16 February 2021, substantial money and valuables at marriage, initial normal treatment, then repeated taunts that her parents had spent less than the husband's family expected and a demand for another ₹25 lakh. She alleged physical and mental harassment, beating, expulsion with a warning not to return unless the demand was met, and a threat to kill her if she returned otherwise. Her brother tried to persuade the family and brought her to her parents' Gwalior home. She further alleged that the applicants visited that home, renewed the demand and told her father not to send her back without payment. Efforts at compromise failed and she lodged the complaint on 25 January 2022; the FIR was registered the same day.

The applicants said a preliminary inquiry should have preceded a matrimonial FIR, the accusations against the family were vague and motivated, and her husband had lodged a separate Jaipur FIR alleging she took jewellery and induced wedding expenditure. They also objected that the main matrimonial events were at Jaipur, outside Gwalior. The respondents answered that a charge sheet had already been filed, the husband's Jaipur FIR was not part of it and its truth could not be adjudicated in quashing, and the present allegations against each applicant were concrete.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was quoted in paragraph 15 and applied in paragraphs 13–17. It explains that Section 498-A cruelty can include the continuing mental trauma of being driven from the matrimonial home by physical abuse or humiliating dowry-related words and being unable to return for fear of ill-treatment. Emotional effects may persist where the wife shelters with her parents after overt physical acts elsewhere have ceased. The High Court coupled that principle with the alleged fresh local demand and Section 178 CrPC to reject the argument that Jaipur alone supplied territorial jurisdiction.

Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was invoked by the State in paragraph 8 and relied upon expressly by the Court in paragraph 19 for the proposition, as the order states it, that taunts for non-fulfilment of dowry demand may amount to cruelty. The decision was applied to the pleaded repeated demand, taunts, harassment and ouster. The Court held that these specific allegations against the husband and both parents-in-law justified trial-stage examination rather than pretrial quashing.

Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, was cited by the applicants for an asserted mandatory matrimonial preliminary inquiry because the complaint and FIR bore the same date. Kahkashan Kausar alias Sonam v. State of Bihar, Criminal Appeal 195/2022, Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, Arnesh Kumar v. State of Bihar, (2014) 8 SCC 273, and the coordinate-bench Alok Lodhi order were relied upon by applicants to urge false implication and vague allegations against the in-laws. The High Court found the complaint specific and clear. These authorities were cited by the applicants; Rupali Devi and Taramani Parakh were the two Supreme Court authorities materially relied upon in the Court's own reasoning. The respondents submitted that the husband's separate Jaipur FIR was outside the charge-sheet record and its truth could not be assessed here.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to quash the FIR after a charge sheet had reportedly been filed; the Court assessed the specificity of the allegations. Section 178 CrPC permits inquiry or trial in a local area where part of an offence occurs, including a continuing offence across areas. The Court used the claimed continuing mental effect at Gwalior and a pleaded new demand there to uphold local investigation. IPC Section 498-A provided the cruelty context, Section 506 the alleged threats and Section 34 common intention; Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act concerned the demand allegations. The cited Lalita Kumari preliminary-inquiry proposition was a submission, not an operative construction of Section 154 in this judgment.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the Jaipur location of most initial matrimonial conduct deprived Mahila Thana, Gwalior, of jurisdiction where the wife alleged forced residence at her Gwalior parental home, continuing mental cruelty and a further demand there.

(ii) Whether the allegations of a demand, taunts, beating, expulsion and a threat attributed to the husband and both parents-in-law were sufficiently specific for the prosecution to continue, despite the applicants' invocation of the general danger of false or omnibus matrimonial complaints.

(iii) Whether same-day FIR registration and the husband's separate Jaipur counter-FIR, which was not in the charge-sheet record, justified Section 482 quashing on this application.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court read the complaint as alleging that non-fulfilment of the demand for an additional ₹25 lakh led to the wife being forced from the Jaipur matrimonial home to her parents at Gwalior. Rupali Devi establishes that mental consequences of that treatment can continue where she takes refuge; the pleaded renewal of the dowry demand at Gwalior provided a further local act. With Section 178 CrPC, the Court found a part of the alleged cruelty arose within Gwalior and the local Mahila Thana could investigate. That conclusion addresses territorial competence at the allegation stage and does not prove the demand, threat or continuing trauma at trial.

The Court distinguished this complaint from one that merely listed the in-laws. It found specific allegations against the father-in-law, mother-in-law and husband of an additional quantified demand, dowry taunts, physical and mental mistreatment, expulsion and later pressure at the parental home. In the light of Taramani Parakh's treatment of dowry-demand taunts, it held that a close relative may be prosecuted when the complaint specifically alleges participation. It did not conduct a mini-trial on the accused's claim of false implication. The respondents submitted that the husband's separate Jaipur FIR was outside the charge-sheet material and its truth could not be assessed here. The applicants' Lalita Kumari and other citations were recorded as submissions, and the Court refused interference on the specific allegations and continuing cruelty at Gwalior. Thus no case for Section 482 intervention was shown.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application to quash Crime 23/2022 and the resulting criminal process. The Court upheld Gwalior police territorial authority to investigate and left the specific cruelty, threat and dowry allegations to be tested in the ordinary proceedings. It ordered no arrest, punishment or final finding of guilt, and gave no determination on the husband's separate Jaipur FIR.

Purushottam Lal Sharma and Ors. v. State of M.P. and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 20822/2022, 28/04/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Related eyewitness / corroboration - Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, including Darya Singh and Raghubir Singh, was applied to distinguish careful scrutiny from automatic rejection or a universal demand for independent corroboration. Neeraj was the only actual eyewitness to the charged stabbing; Chhotu admitted that he came down after the assailant had fled. Inconsistent accounts of the prior encounter, concealment of the presence of the wife and daughter, and the son's shaky testimony made corroboration appropriate on these facts. The prosecution's failure to call the widow, despite recording her police statement and citing her as a witness, mattered in that evidentiary setting.

Medical and physical evidence / suppressed genesis - The fatal chest stab established homicidal death, but the FIR's supposed nasal knife blow had no matching incised wound, other injuries and temporal ecchymosis were unexplained, and the chest-wound direction seemed difficult to reconcile with a victim lying on the cot. Chhotu wiped blood at the scene without explanation. The baniyan removed from the body at autopsy had no corresponding cut; the bloodstained torn garment and shirt seized at the scene were not produced for judicial inspection or evaluated for cuts. The court held that the prosecution had withheld material physical evidence and failed to prove its account beyond reasonable doubt.

Section 313 / late FSL report - Parsuram Pandey v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 189, Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, and Vikramjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2006) 12 SCC 306, were applied: an incriminating circumstance not put to the accused during examination under Section 313 cannot be used to convict him. The Section 293 admissibility of the FSL report did not dispense with that opportunity. The report arrived after final arguments and was not marked as an exhibit, and the accused was not questioned about its human-blood finding. The finding of blood on the knife was excluded from consideration against him.

Serology / disputed recovery - Kansa Behra v. State of Orissa, (1987) 3 SCC 480, was applied on the limited inference available from human blood where no blood group connected the stain to the victim. The knife seizure itself was doubtful because a seizure witness acknowledged tutoring and could not describe the accused's home. Even if the result were considered apart from Section 313, its ungrouped human-blood description did not positively connect the knife to Devilal. On the evidence as a whole, the Section 302 and 452 IPC convictions and concurrent sentences were set aside; the appellant was acquitted and ordered released unless wanted elsewhere.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Purushottam Pal appealed under Section 374 CrPC against the IV Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior's 3 February 2012 judgment in Sessions Trial 257/2011. He had been sentenced to life imprisonment and a ₹1,000 fine with two months' rigorous imprisonment in default for Section 302 IPC, and one year's rigorous imprisonment and a ₹1,000 fine with two months in default for Section 452 IPC; the substantive terms were concurrent. Neeraj reported on 9 March 2011 that his neighbour Purushottam, following an earlier exchange, abused his father Devilal, forced open the door after Neeraj closed it, entered the courtyard and struck the reclining Devilal near the ribs with a knife and then near the nose. The first FIR alleged Sections 307, 452 and 294 IPC; Devilal died in hospital, Section 302 was added, a knife was reportedly recovered on a memorandum, and the eventual charges were Sections 302 and 452. The appellant did not call defence witnesses.

The autopsy surgeon recorded a penetrating left lower chest wound traversing the rib/intercostal and thoracic structures, diaphragm, spleen and lung, fatal in the ordinary course and homicidal. There were a nasal laceration and abrasion, other abrasions, and deep ecchymosis in the temporal region. Thus homicide itself was not in issue after medical proof; the remaining questions concerned the identity of the assailant, the manner of assault and reliability of the prosecution's account. Neeraj (PW1), the deceased's son, became the only claimed eyewitness to the actual attack once his brother Chhotu alias Rameshwar (PW4) admitted in cross-examination that he came downstairs after the appellant had gone. The widow Kunta was cited and her police statement was taken more than a month later but she was given up by the prosecutor. A seized torn, bloodstained baniyan and shirt from the scene were not produced before the court, while the garment taken from the body on autopsy had no cut corresponding to the stab. Chhotu admitted wiping blood at the scene. The alleged knife recovery was witnessed by a son-in-law of the deceased who said an advocate had tutored him and who could not describe the recovery premises. An FSL report received after final arguments and not marked as an exhibit described human blood on the knife without determining its group; the accused was not further examined under Section 313 about that result.

The defence disputed Neeraj's reliability, the hidden presence and non-examination of the wife, the inconsistent blood and clothing evidence, medical contradiction, knife seizure and use of the FSL result; it alternatively urged Section 304 Part I with over eleven years already served. The State supported the trial judgment. The Court acquitted the appellant because the prosecution failed to prove the charges beyond reasonable doubt.

2. Precedents — Considered : Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, was quoted at paragraph 32 and applied at paragraphs 33–35. The quoted passage incorporates Darya Singh v. State of Punjab on careful appraisal of an interested relative who may share hostility to an alleged assailant: assess whether a witness was really present, the probabilities and every infirmity. It also explains that independent corroboration is not indispensable whenever the prosecution relies on apparently interested witnesses; quality rather than quantity decides credibility. Raghubir Singh v. State of U.P. appears within the same quotation for the related but narrower point that the prosecution need call material witnesses needed to unfold its case, not every possible witness, and the reluctance of outsiders to testify can be relevant. The present court expressly avoided a universal corroboration rule. It found Neeraj's testimony shaky, noted that Chhotu was not an eyewitness, and considered the widow's non-examination and concealment of the family's presence. In that setting, corroboration was appropriate but lacking. The widow's materiality arose from concrete inconsistencies, not a rule to summon every relative.

Parsuram Pandey v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 189, was quoted at paragraph 43. Its Section 313 rule requires the trial court to give the accused a personal chance to answer circumstances appearing in prosecution evidence; an incriminating circumstance not put to the accused cannot support conviction. Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, was quoted at paragraph 44 and reinforces exclusion of circumstances never put to the accused; its quoted discussion refers to the earlier Section 342 CrPC and instances of absconding and human-blood serology, carried into current Section 313. Vikramjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2006) 12 SCC 306, was quoted at paragraph 45, including its use of Tara Singh v. State: asking about recovery of a bloodstained item is distinct from asking about a later serologist's human-blood finding. The Court applied those authorities to the same procedural fairness requirement. The court applied them directly to the report received after arguments and the missing supplementary question. The references to Hate Singh Bhagat Singh, Shamu Balu Chaugule, Harijan Megha Jesha and Tara Singh occur within the Supreme Court quotations as earlier authorities and illustrations.

Kansa Behra v. State of Orissa, (1987) 3 SCC 480, was quoted in paragraph 46. Its cited passage cautions that human blood without grouping, stain dimensions or a reliable connection to the deceased cannot by itself positively attribute stained clothing to that deceased; small stains can have other sources. The High Court used that limit after excluding the FSL circumstance for failure to question under Section 313: in any event no blood group had been ascertained. The application is bounded by the doubtful recovery and absence of a reliable victim-specific link here.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 302 and 452 IPC were the convicted offences: murder and house trespass after preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint. The case was originally registered under Section 307 with Sections 452 and 294 after the FIR was lodged while the victim was injured. Section 302 was added on his death, and the Trial Court framed charges under Sections 302 and 452. Section 374 CrPC supplied the appeal. The alternative Section 304 Part I IPC submission did not call for conversion once the court held the identity of the assailant unproved. Section 313 CrPC required an opportunity to explain an incriminating circumstance personally; the report's receipt after final arguments could have called for further questioning before reliance, but none occurred. Section 293 CrPC made the FSL report potentially admissible as the judgment states, a different question from its use against an accused who had no opportunity under Section 313 to address its result. The report also was not marked as an exhibit. Its admissibility did not cure the evidentiary and fairness deficiencies. The prosecution's proof remained subject to the criminal beyond-reasonable-doubt standard; the court did not infer guilt merely from proof of homicide or a disputed recovery.

4. Issues : (i) Whether Neeraj's testimony, as the only witness to the actual stabbing, was reliable enough to prove this appellant was the assailant when Chhotu did not witness the assault, family presence was obscured and the widow was withheld.

(ii) Whether the scene, missing cut-mark evidence on garments, unexplained additional injuries and the autopsy wound's direction supported the claimed assault or instead generated material doubt about how the incident began.

(iii) Whether the disputed knife recovery and an unexhibited FSL finding received after final arguments could be used when its human-blood circumstance was never put to the appellant under Section 313; and what further inference could follow absent a blood-group connection to Devilal.

(iv) If guilt under Sections 302 and 452 were proved, whether the defence's alternative Section 304 Part I/period-served position arose for determination; and what order followed if the prosecution failed the proof threshold.

5. Ratio / Findings : The chest stab proved Devilal's homicidal death, but did not establish who inflicted it. Neeraj's account of the outside altercation changed in detail and he had not seen that earlier exchange; his suggestion that Chhotu helped expel the appellant at the first visit was not supported by Chhotu. Neeraj himself placed his brother upstairs until after the blow; Chhotu acknowledged the appellant was gone by the time he descended. Their accounts of the wife's and daughter's presence and family quarrels mattered because the accused disputed how the injuries arose. Kunta, the widow, was cited but not examined, and the court found the prosecution had kept back a material account in an evidentiary setting where Neeraj needed corroboration. Under Harbeer Singh, the witnesses' relationship to the deceased did not by itself discredit their evidence, but these concrete infirmities justified scrutiny and corroboration in this case.

The court also examined the account of the assault against the physical evidence. Chhotu wiped blood from the scene without explaining why and did not accompany his injured father to police or hospital. The autopsy garment lacked a cut despite the asserted penetrating wound, while torn, bloodstained clothing seized at the spot was withheld from production and there was no proof whether it bore matching cuts; the FSL report did not answer the investigator's question about garment cuts. The alleged nasal knife blow did not correspond to an incised wound. The other fresh injuries, temporal ecchymosis and downward direction of the deep stab were not explained in a way consistent with the claimed victim reclining on the cot. In the context of testimony about drinking and family quarrels, the court considered these defects material to whether the prosecution had disclosed the actual genesis. It treated the medical and scene evidence cumulatively. The knife did not repair the gap. The seizure witness, a son-in-law of the deceased, acknowledged tutoring by an advocate and lacked basic knowledge of the accused's home, so the court doubted the recovery. More decisively, the FSL report arrived only after final arguments; although potentially admissible under Section 293, it was not exhibited and its human-blood finding was not put to the accused in a further Section 313 examination. Parsuram Pandey, Sharad Birdhichand Sarda and Vikramjit Singh required exclusion of that incriminating circumstance because it had not been put to the accused. On the independent serological point from Kansa Behra, the laboratory did not identify a blood group to connect the stain to Devilal. The finding of merely human blood therefore did not positively identify a victim-specific link, even if procedural use had otherwise been possible. The combination of shaky sole direct testimony, withheld and discordant physical evidence, doubtful recovery and unusable or nonspecific forensic result left reasonable doubt as to whether Purushottam was the assailant. The court did not decide that Devilal's death was nonhomicidal; it found the particular charges against this accused not proved.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal appeal. The convictions and concurrent sentences under Sections 302 and 452 IPC and the trial judgment dated 3 February 2012 were set aside, and Purushottam Pal was acquitted of those charges. Being in jail, he was directed to be released immediately unless required in another case. The court directed a free copy of the judgment to him and return of the trial record with a copy for compliance. It did not impose a Section 304 Part I substitute conviction.

Headnote :- Anticipatory bail / co-operative plot allotment / delay - In considering a Section 438 CrPC application in a case alleging offences under Sections 420 and 409 IPC, the Court weighed the March 2009 payments, the April 2009 public cancellation notice, the more than 12-year unexplained delay before police complaint, the 3,000-square-foot-per-member allotment cap, payment to the society or Collector, and the applicant's offer to execute leases within the permitted limit and refund the excess amount. It granted protection subject to investigation and bond conditions while expressly leaving whether 15,600-square-foot promises reflected error or deliberate conduct undecided.

Victim intimation / bail order - The Court directed intimation of the grant to the complainant in light of Aparna Bhat & Ors. v. State of M.P., Criminal Appeal No. 329/2021 (18 March 2021).

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rajendra Upadhyay, president of Annapurna Grih Nirman Sahkari Sanstha Maryadit, filed his first application for anticipatory bail under Section 438 CrPC in Crime No. 246/2021 at Sirol Police Station, Gwalior, registered under Sections 420 and 409 IPC. The State opposed. The complainant was represented by counsel, but none appeared for the complainant; the complainant filed an interlocutory application opposing bail and additional allotment, banking and Nazul materials were placed on record. The society had received 6.218 hectares under the State's allotment of 25 September 2008 for residential use, but clause 8 capped any member's plot at 3,000 square feet. A Collector–society lease followed on 14 August 2009. The applicant disputed the personal description in the lease and claimed the society, not he personally, held the land.

The complainant Sanjay Sancheti and three family members alleged offers of 15,600 square feet each in return for payments totalling Rs. 37 lakh, mostly Rs. 9 lakh each and Rs. 10 lakh for Shakuntala Sancheti. They said leases had been made for other members, but not for them, and accused the applicant of failing to return money with commercial interest. The applicant said an erroneous excess-allotment letter was cancelled through a newspaper notice of 29 April 2009, a little over a month after payments dated 24 March 2009, and offered lawful 3,000-square-foot leases and refund of any excess. The Court did not treat his denial or the complainant's forgery assertion as finally proved.

2. Precedents — Considered : At paragraph 22 the Judge expressly invoked Aparna Bhat & Ors. v. State of M.P., Criminal Appeal No. 329/2021, order of 18 March 2021, to direct intimation of the bail grant to the complainant. The Court directed intimation of the bail grant to the complainant.

3. Statutes considered : Section 438 CrPC governed the first application for pre-arrest bail; Section 438(2) supplied additional conditions incorporated into the release order. Sections 420 and 409 IPC were the alleged cheating and criminal-breach-of-trust counts, not convictions. The clause 8 restriction in the State allotment of 25 September 2008 was crucial in determining the permissible size of plots allotted by the co-operative society. The grant was expressly without commenting on the merits of the case.

4. Issues : Whether the allegations of taking money against excessive plot promises called for custodial arrest notwithstanding the long interval, public correction notice, destination of funds, offer to execute leases of the permissible size and refund the excess amount, and investigation at a very early stage; whether any factual dispute about error versus deliberate deception should be decided on bail; and what conditions and complainant notification should accompany a grant. The case was not a final adjudication of the promised land, refund, interest or criminal responsibility.

5. Ratio / Findings : The investigation was at a very early stage: police had requested original allotment letters from the complainant and the Collector's original lease. The Court noted the applicant's public notice of 29 April 2009 and that the complainant's bail-opposition application did not dispute its purported publication. The money had been paid to the society's account or Collector (Nazul) around 24 March 2009, whereas the police complaint was made on 18 October 2021, more than 12 years later, with no explanation for the long silence. Clause 8 prohibited allotment above 3,000 square feet per member. The applicant offered to execute leases of that permissible size and said the society had offered repayment of the excess; the Court took those assertions into account in deciding bail, without treating them as proof that the liabilities had been discharged. Whether the 15,600-square-foot offers were mistake or deliberate conduct was expressly reserved. On these circumstances it considered anticipatory bail appropriate without commenting on merits.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application for anticipatory bail without commenting on the merits, subject to the applicant appearing before the Investigating Officer (Arresting Officer) on or before 15/11/2021. On such appearance, he was to be released on furnishing a personal bond of Rs. 1,00,000/- with one surety in the like amount to the satisfaction of that officer. He was required to remain available for interrogation as and when required, provide all original documents required by the Investigating Officer, refrain from tampering with prosecution evidence and witnesses, and comply with the other conditions under Section 438(2) CrPC. If he failed to appear by 15/11/2021, the order would lose its effect and the Investigating Officer would be at liberty to take him into custody. Intimation of the grant was to be sent to the complainant.

Rajendra Upadhyay v. State of M.P., M.Cr.C. no. 53177/2021, 08/11/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Police recovery witness / independent corroboration - State (NCT of Delhi) v. Sunil, (2001) 1 SCC 652, Praveen Kumar v. State of Karnataka, (2003) 12 SCC 199, and Yakub Abdul Razak Memon v. State of Maharashtra, (2013) 13 SCC 1, were quoted and applied: official testimony about recovery must be assessed on its own merits; independent signatures or corroboration are not rigid legal prerequisites, though careful scrutiny and corroboration may be prudent where reliability is in doubt. The investigating officer's status alone did not invalidate his account. The decisive deficiency was its content: he failed to state the information said to have led to discovery, while the other seizure witnesses had turned hostile.

Section 27 / proof of disclosure / robbery identity - Babu Sahebagouda Rudragoudar v. State of Karnataka, (2024) 8 SCC 149, incorporating Deoman Upadhyaya, Mohd. Abdul Hafeez, Subramanya and Ramanand, was applied: Section 27 admits only information distinctly connected to the discovered fact; Section 60 requires the officer who heard it to narrate the accused's relevant words and recovery sequence. Merely marking Ex. P.7 as an exhibit did not prove the disclosure or its connection with the discovery of the motorcycle. The complainant proved the occurrence but did not identify Pushpendra. Counsel submitted that no TIP had occurred. The other witnesses to the occurrence and seizure were hostile, and the motorcycle recovery was not proved. The Section 392 IPC read with Sections 11/13 MPDVPK Act conviction was set aside and the appellant acquitted.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pushpendra Singh appealed under Section 374(2) CrPC from a Special Judge (MPDVPK Act), Bhind judgment of 1 August 2012 in Sessions Trial 93/2007 (Dacoity). He alone was convicted under Section 392 IPC read with Sections 11/13 of the Madhya Pradesh Dakaiti Aur Vyapharan Prabhavit Kshetra Adhiniyam (MPDVPK Act), receiving four years' rigorous imprisonment, ₹1,000 fine and 15 days' default imprisonment; co-accused Rama Shanker and Pushpraj were acquitted. Diwan Singh had reported that, at about 7:45 pm on 26 June 2007, two of three motorcycle riders stopped him, one brandished a country-made pistol, and they took his motorcycle, generator parts and Nokia phone. The FIR concerned two unknown persons. Police subsequently arrested three people and asserted that a motorcycle was seized from Pushpendra after his Section 27 disclosure.

The appellant argued that the complainant Diwan Singh (PW8) supported the fact of robbery but not the accused's identity, no test identification parade had been conducted, other occurrence and independent seizure witnesses had turned hostile, and the investigating officer Ramesh Singh Bhadouria (PW4) did not state the part of the appellant's supposed information that led to discovery. Even if possession were proved, counsel urged that Section 411 IPC, rather than robbery by this appellant, might be the most that could be alleged; he cited the High Court's Niran decision. The State supported conviction. The court examined police testimony rather than treating the officer's status as disqualifying, then distinguished the marking of a document as an exhibit from proof of the information legally admissible on discovery. It ultimately found neither perpetrator identification nor the asserted recovery proved. The appellant was on bail at judgment.

2. Precedents — Considered : State, Government of NCT of Delhi v. Sunil, (2001) 1 SCC 652, was quoted in paragraph 15. It rejects a legal presumption that contemporaneous recovery papers are tainted for want of independent signatures or that police conduct begins under automatic distrust. The officer's testimony may be believed on its merits; an accused can expose unreliability by cross-examination or other material, and reasons to suspect a particular record may make the absence of independent persons relevant. The present Court used it to refuse the categorical contention that PW4 must fail because he was investigating officer or the independent witnesses had withdrawn support. It did not use Sunil as a substitute for proving the substantive disclosure and its resulting discovery.

Praveen Kumar v. State of Karnataka, (2003) 12 SCC 199, was quoted in paragraph 16 for Section 27's lack of a blanket requirement that information to police be made before independent witnesses. Corroboration where the prosecution relies on police alone is a matter of caution and prudence, not an absolute rule; a reliable officer can be accepted without it. Yakub Abdul Razak Memon v. State of Maharashtra, (2013) 13 SCC 1, was quoted in paragraph 17: a panch's brother being in police does not disqualify him, and absence of independent corroboration alone does not require rejecting credible official testimony, though greater care in appraisal is called for. The quotation also refers to Kalpnath Rai and several other decisions as earlier supporting authorities. The three authorities form one related proposition on the credibility of police recovery evidence. The High Court accepted that principle concerning the assessment of police testimony in paragraph 18 and then found an independent defect in what PW4 actually narrated.

Babu Sahebagouda Rudragoudar v. State of Karnataka, (2024) 8 SCC 149, was quoted extensively in paragraph 21 and directly applied in paragraph 22. Its quoted reasoning treats an officer's written memorandum as a record of what the accused told him, admits under Section 27 only the information distinctly linked to the fact discovered, and requires the officer to give direct oral evidence under Section 60 of the actual disclosure conversation and recovery sequence. State of U.P. v. Deoman Upadhyaya appears within it for the separation of the inadmissible confessional part. Mohd. Abdul Hafeez v. State of A.P. underscores who gave the information and what words were spoken, particularly when several accused are involved. Subramanya v. State of Karnataka identifies failure to depose to the exact statement said to have led to discovery and describes a two-stage panchanama practice, with witnesses at disclosure and then at the discovery site, to lend credibility. Ramanand v. State of U.P. states that exhibiting the memorandum alone does not establish its contents; the officer must narrate the events. The disclosure-proof principles in these quoted authorities formed part of the test reproduced by the High Court and applied to PW4's failure to narrate the disclosure. Niran v. State of M.P., 1988 JLJ 505, was counsel's citation to a Division Bench decision, recorded among his submissions.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374(2) CrPC supplied the criminal appeal. Section 392 IPC punished the charged robbery; Sections 11/13 MPDVPK Act accompanied it in the charge and conviction. The Court found the appellant's participation and the alleged recovery unproved. Section 411 IPC arose only as the appellant's alternative submission on the possible effect of possession; because the supposed motorcycle recovery itself was unproved, the court did not convert the conviction to receiving stolen property. Section 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is a limited exception to the exclusion of police-custody confessions: only so much information as distinctly relates to the fact discovered is provable. Section 60 demands direct oral testimony from the witness who heard the information. Merely tendering or marking the written memorandum Ex. P.7 does not prove the spoken words, the distinct discovery link, or the resulting seizure. Counsel submitted that no test identification parade had been conducted; the Court found that the complainant did not identify the appellant.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the complainant's proof that a robbery occurred, without identification of Pushpendra and with the other witnesses to the occurrence having turned hostile, proved he was one of the offenders.

(ii) Whether an investigating officer's evidence on a motorcycle recovery had to be rejected merely because he was a police officer and independent panch witnesses were hostile, or could be evaluated on its own merits.

(iii) Whether saying a Section 27 memorandum was recorded and exhibiting it, without giving the accused's relevant words and discovery sequence in direct testimony, proved the asserted recovery; whether the supposed recovery could sustain the Section 392/MPDVPK conviction or the suggested Section 411 alternative.

5. Ratio / Findings : The complainant supported the occurrence of robbery but not Pushpendra's identity. Kamlesh, Buddhe, Jagdish Kushwaha, Asharam and Sobaran were hostile. Counsel submitted that no TIP was conducted. Thus there was no evidence linking this appellant directly to the act of robbery. The court next considered whether the alleged motorcycle recovery could supply a legally established link. Under Sunil, Praveen Kumar and Yakub Abdul Razak Memon, PW4's police employment did not make him incompetent or presumptively unworthy; lack of independent support was not a conclusive rule of exclusion. The content and reliability of his own direct testimony remained decisive.

PW4 stated only that he had recorded the appellant's confessional/disclosure memorandum Ex. P.7; he did not narrate the words which supposedly led to the motorcycle, their distinct relation to the discovered fact or the sequence of discovery. The rule in Babu Sahebagouda and the authorities quoted within it required direct testimony; marking the memorandum as an exhibit could not take the place of proof. The remaining seizure witnesses were hostile. The court therefore declined to rely on PW4 and held the motorcycle seizure from Pushpendra unproved. Nor could the court infer that the appellant was the robber from an unproved recovery when the complainant did not identify him. The trial court's Section 392 read with Sections 11/13 MPDVPK conviction failed. Counsel raised Section 411 alternatively; the Court found the alleged seizure unproved and acquitted the appellant.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. The conviction and four-year sentence under Section 392 IPC read with Sections 11/13 MPDVPK

Act and the Special Judge's 1 August 2012 judgment and sentence were set aside as against Pushpendra. He was acquitted of all charges. Because he was on bail, his bail bonds were discharged and he was no longer required in this case.

Pushpendra Singh v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 611/2012, 29/11/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Chance witness / appellate review - Under Section 386(b)(ii) CrPC, the court considered the State's submission that it could alter the trial court's finding rejecting Amar Pandey (PW6) while maintaining sentence. Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, Jarnail Singh v. State of Punjab, (2009) 9 SCC 719, and Baby v. Inspector of Police, (2016) 13 SCC 333, were quoted and applied: a chance witness is not automatically rejected; presence and later conduct require close, context-sensitive scrutiny. The witness, related to the deceased, claimed his arrival there by chance late at night, made no report to nearby police, told no one for 17 days despite normal daily activity, and his claimed disclosure to Ramu found no support in Ramu's evidence. His fear explanation was insufficient and the trial court's rejection stood. The authorities quoted within those decisions distinguished an explained passerby's presence from doubtful, unexplained presence; they did not prohibit reliance on chance-witness testimony.

Hair seizure / DNA foundation - The scientist reported taking two hairs from the dead man's finger before 3:30 a.m.; the formal 6:10 a.m. seizure witness described 8–10 hairs collected by the investigating officer; the officer altered his account, and neither seizure nor laboratory forwarding specified their number. The unexplained discrepancies about who collected the hairs, when they were collected and how many were collected made proof of the tested material's origin doubtful. The knife was rusted, unsuitable for cut-mark comparison, and the blood on it was insufficient for further testing. A DNA profile could not by itself establish that the particular sample was securely recovered from the hand or prove this appellant was the killer.

Section 313 / late DNA report - Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, Ghulam Din Buch v. State of J&K, (1996) 9 SCC 239, and Vikramjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2006) 12 SCC 306, were applied: an incriminating circumstance omitted from Section 313 questioning cannot be used to convict. The accused's examination occurred before the DNA report arrived; the court later supplied a copy and marked it Ex. D.2 on no objection, but never put the reported profile to him for explanation. The DNA inference was excluded, separately from doubts about seizure. With the eyewitness unreliable and missing reliable forensic support, the Section 302 and 201 IPC convictions were set aside and the appellant acquitted and ordered released unless required elsewhere.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Puttu, also named Mohit Sharma in a medical-identification context, appealed against the XV Additional Sessions Judge, Gwalior's 19 April 2024 judgment in Sessions Trial 150/2022. He had been convicted under Section 302 IPC (life imprisonment, ₹1,000 fine and six months' default rigorous imprisonment) and Section 201 IPC (three years' rigorous imprisonment, ₹500 fine and six months' default rigorous imprisonment). The appeal was accompanied by an application for condonation of delay. The Division Bench condoned the delay because he was in jail. Instead of deciding his Section 389 CrPC/430 BNSS suspension application separately, it heard the appeal finally. Section 374 CrPC/415 BNSS is recited as the appellate route.

On 1 December 2021 Ramu alias Rameshwar told police his electrician brother Ganesh, who drank heavily after their mother's death, had been found dead on a handcart near a liquor shop after a neighbour informed him around 3 a.m. He saw bleeding from chest, abdomen and neck. Merg and scene investigation followed, some hairs were said to have been found in a hand of the body, the appellant was arrested, a knife was seized and a blood sample compared with a hair sample by DNA testing. The medical examination established numerous deep penetrating injuries as well as lacerations and death from hypovolaemic shock after multiple organ damage. The court accepted homicide but examined who inflicted it.

The prosecution relied on Amar Pandey (PW6) as an eyewitness and a laboratory profile said to match the appellant's DNA in a hair recovered from the deceased's hand. The trial judge rejected Amar but convicted on the DNA inference. Defence challenged the supposed eyewitness, continuity and count of the hairs, and the late DNA report. State counsel urged the appellate bench to alter the trial judge's adverse finding on Amar and sustain the convictions. The bench separately considered that permissible appellate task, the recovery foundation, Section 313 fairness, knife results and gaps in the investigation. It also noted unexplained early information received by the police, an unproduced small diary said to contain the deceased's lending accounts, unexplained lacerations alongside the asserted knife attack, and testimony that police beat the appellant after arrest and obtained signatures on papers. Those matters contributed context to overall doubt.

2. Precedents — Considered : Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, was quoted at paragraph 31. It discusses Puran v. State of Punjab's description of a suddenly appearing and disappearing witness, Mousam Singha Roy, Shankarlal and Jarnail Singh on doubtful presence and material contradictions. It does not make the borrowed label "chance witness" automatically fatal in India; presence and conduct must be tested. Jarnail Singh v. State of Punjab, (2009) 9 SCC 719, was separately quoted at paragraph 32. Its embedded Sachchey Lal Tiwari passage explains that a passerby may be the natural witness to a street crime, though the presence requires explanation; the expression's cultural origin should not generate rigid suspicion. Its other quoted authorities, including Satbir, Harjinder, Acharaparambath Pradeepan, Sarvesh Narain Shukla, Shankarlal and Thangaiya, explain careful scrutiny of presence, later disclosure and natural conduct. Baby v. Inspector of Police, (2016) 13 SCC 333, was quoted at paragraph 33 and refers back to Jarnail Singh: an explained chance witness can be believed, but contradictions and silence after witnessing a killing may defeat reliability. The present bench applied these related principles to the unexplained silence for 17 days and the unsupported account of disclosure to the victim's brother, rather than treating them as three separate rigid restrictions; it affirmed the rejection of Amar. Its Section 386 discussion allowed review of a finding in the conviction appeal but did not compel acceptance of the State's requested alteration.

Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, was quoted at paragraph 48 for complete exclusion from consideration of incriminating circumstances not put to the accused under Section 313. The reproduced reasoning refers to earlier Section 342 cases Hate Singh Bhagat Singh, Shamu Balu Chaugule and Harijan Megha Jesha as earlier authorities and illustrations. Ghulam Din Buch v. State of J&K, (1996) 9 SCC 239, was quoted at paragraph 49 to show that failing to give the accused an opportunity to explain the central allegation or circumstances makes a conviction relying on them unsustainable. Vikramjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2006) 12 SCC 306, was quoted at paragraph 50 with the embedded Tara Singh example: asking about recovery of an item is not the same as asking the accused to explain a later serologist's human-blood result. The same distinction applies to the late DNA result here. The three authorities explain the related Section 313 fairness requirement through distinct formulations, which the Court applied to Ex. D.2.

3. Statutes considered : Section 386(b)(ii) CrPC permits alteration of a finding while maintaining sentence in a conviction appeal, which led the bench to consider the State's request to reverse the trial judge's disbelief of Amar. Section 374 CrPC/415 BNSS framed the appeal and Section 389 CrPC/430 BNSS the suspension application, which became unnecessary for interim decision when the appeal was heard finally. Section 302 IPC concerned the homicidal stabbing and Section 201 IPC the alleged evidence-disappearance charge; after finding it unproved that the appellant had committed the offences, the court acquitted him of both. Section 313 CrPC required the trial court to put material incriminating circumstances to the accused personally. The report's marking as Ex. D.2 after a copy was furnished and counsel made no objection did not supply the omitted personal question. This is distinct from doubts whether a sample from the hand had been proved to reach the laboratory intact and identified. The court assessed proof beyond reasonable doubt, not the abstract accuracy of DNA methodology. The order identifies both the CrPC and BNSS appellate provisions.

4. Issues : (i) Whether appellate power under Section 386(b)(ii) justified altering the trial court's rejection of Amar, whose claimed late-night presence, 17-day silence, lack of help or report and unsupported account of speaking to Ramu were disputed.

(ii) Whether two hairs reportedly removed by the scene scientist before 3:30 a.m. were shown to be the same 8–10 hairs a seizure witness said the investigator removed at 6:10 a.m., when official seizure and dispatch papers gave no number.

(iii) Whether a DNA profile reported after the accused's Section 313 examination and never put to him personally could be used, despite a supplied copy and exhibit marking without counsel objection. (iv) Whether the remaining knife, medical, missing diary and uncertain first-information evidence proved guilt under Sections 302 and 201 beyond reasonable doubt, and what appellate relief should follow.

5. Ratio / Findings : The medical proof established homicide. The State's bid to rely on Amar did not succeed. The bench accepted in principle that chance presence at a public place does not disqualify a witness; it examined his claimed return from Supawali, stop at a liquor shop, family relationship, proximity of posted police at Baradari Square and a station near his home, failure to raise alarm or seek treatment, regular opening of his shop, and no disclosure to anyone for 17 days. His explanation of fear did not fit the whole course of conduct. He said Ramu first heard the story and escorted him to police; Ramu did not mention either event. The investigating officer recorded his first statement on 17 December and confirmed no prior information from Amar. Harbeer Singh, Jarnail Singh and Baby supported scrutiny, not automatic exclusion, and the trial court had rightly found his presence and reliability wanting. The appellate bench considered the adverse finding under Section 386(b)(ii) but declined the State's desired change.

The evidence about the hairs allegedly recovered from the hand did not consistently establish their origin. Scene scientist Akhilesh Bhargava said he found two small hairs with a lens on the left little finger and secured them before his 3:30 a.m. report; the investigator was present. Yet the formal seizure memo was made at 6:10 a.m., and Ramu said he watched the investigator collect roughly 8–10 hairs then. The investigator first claimed he seized the hairs and later attributed the act to the scientist. Neither the seizure memo nor the 22 December laboratory-forwarding memo specified the count. The court asked why a seizure was not documented when the scientist said he removed the material and why it appeared to remain on the hand hours later if already taken. These conflicts made the foundational seizure doubtful, before any inference from a profile. The laboratory could not compare the rusted knife to clothing cuts; too little blood was present on it for the stated test. The knife did not independently prove that the appellant was the assailant.

The accused was examined under Section 313 on 29 January 2024. The DNA report was received only on 18 March, marked Ex. D.2 on 15 April after counsel did not object, and the trial court delivered judgment on 19 April without re-examining him on the profile. Sharad Birdhichand Sarda, Ghulam Din Buch and Vikramjit Singh required exclusion of this central incriminating circumstance because it had not been put to the accused. Receipt of a report, supply of a copy, lack of objection to exhibiting it and a fair opportunity for the accused to explain its content are different steps. The trial judgment had depended on this single DNA inference; it could not stand once the proof of the specimen's origin was doubtful and the reported result could not be used against him. The court further questioned who first alerted police before the recorded merg, observed that a small accounts diary described as seized was missing, and noted unexplained lacerations in a case attributed solely to knife blows. It called the investigation casual and unsatisfactory and observed evidence of police beating and signatures after arrest. Taken together, the prosecution failed to prove that this appellant committed murder or disappearance of evidence beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. The life and other sentences and 19 April 2024 trial judgment were set aside, and Puttu was acquitted of the Sections 302 and 201 IPC charges. Since he was in jail, the bench ordered immediate release unless required in another case and return of the trial record with the judgment for compliance. The suspension application was not separately determined after the final appeal hearing; the delay in filing had been condoned at the outset.

Puttu v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 8991/2024, 25/06/2025, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Hirdesh, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- FIR refusal / magistrate remedies / inherent power - A complaint of police inaction in registering an FIR concerning a cognizable offence ordinarily calls for recourse to the statutory sequence of remedies. Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, and Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, distinguished the police duty to register cognizable information from the informant's remedy before a Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, explained that the informant may apply in writing to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), followed, if necessary, by Section 156(3), under which a Magistrate may direct registration or proper investigation and monitor it without taking over police work. Divine Retreat Centre permits Article 226 intervention only in very exceptional cases involving mala fide exercise of investigative power, where a clear case of abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII is made out. Even then, the High Court may insist on lawful process but cannot dictate how the police conduct the investigation. The quoted local Division Bench decision in Shweta Bhadauria recognizes limited writ exceptions. In this Section 482 application, no basis for ordering police to lodge the FIR was shown. It was dismissed as not maintainable with liberty to use Section 200 CrPC/223 BNSS; the Court expressed no opinion on the merits of the alleged offence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Radha Kushwah filed Miscellaneous Criminal Case 47365/2024 under Section 482 CrPC saying police had not registered an FIR despite her complaint and seeking a direction to do so. The prayer sought the status report in Merg 55/2024, impartial investigation by CBI or a senior IPS officer, preservation of CCTV footage of the incidents, and an FIR against the accused. The State objected that Sections 190 and 200 CrPC supplied an efficacious Magistrate remedy.

The Court framed the question whether a direction to the police to register an FIR was maintainable, cited four Supreme Court decisions together with the explanations in their quoted passages, as well as a local Division Bench ruling, and dismissed the application as not maintainable while leaving the applicant liberty to approach the Magistrate.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted at paragraph 6. It accepts that police should register an FIR when facts brought to them disclose a cognizable offence, but asks what an informant should do if police do not comply. Its answer is the complaint machinery in Sections 190 and 200 CrPC. The passage distinguishes the question of police duty in Ramesh Kumari from the remedial procedure considered in All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh and Minu Kumari; Lallan Chaudhary reiterates the registration duty. The quotation distinguishes the police registration duty from the Magistrate remedy for inaction. The present Court applied the remedial route to a Section 482 applicant asking for a direction to the police to register an FIR, without testing whether her allegations themselves disclosed a cognizable offence.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted at paragraph 7. It recognizes that Article 226 may provide relief in very exceptional cases where investigative power has been exercised mala fide and a clear case of abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII is made out. Even then, the High Court may insist on compliance with the Code but cannot dictate how the investigation is conducted. Its discussion of Gangadhar explains the Magistrate's complaint procedure: the court may examine under Chapter XV, dismiss a complaint under Section 203 when no prima facie offence appears, take cognizance and issue process where justified, or direct police investigation where the Code allows. For mere police inaction the complaint route, not a routine writ, is indicated. The High Court used this as a qualification to the general remedy.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, quoted at paragraph 8, supplies the complementary sequence: written application to the Superintendent under Section 154(3) for FIR refusal, then Section 156(3) to the Magistrate if that fails or the investigation remains unsatisfactory. The Magistrate can order registration, proper investigation and monitor its progress. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, quoted at paragraph 9, reiterates Sakiri Vasu to avoid routine High Court petitions and states that a Magistrate may, where appropriate, recommend a change of investigating officer and monitor investigation but cannot personally conduct it. The latter decision explains the same statutory remedies; its quotation does not independently direct a change of investigating officer in Radha's case. The Court did not direct any particular investigative act.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. 247/2016 (Gwalior, 20 December 2016), was the local Division Bench authority quoted at paragraph 10: alternative remedies under Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 can justify denial of a writ mandamus to enforce Section 154, subject to the recognized Whirlpool exceptions; Lalita Kumari addresses police registration duty, not an unrestricted entitlement to writ mandamus despite alternative remedies. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari occur within this local quotation in the Division Bench's discussion of alternative remedies. The High Court followed the alternative-remedy approach in its Section 482 disposition.

3. Statutes considered : Section 154 CrPC states the police registration duty for cognizable information; Section 154(3) offers written recourse to the Superintendent. Section 156(3) empowers the Magistrate to direct registration or lawful investigation in a supervisory capacity. Sections 190 and 200 allow the Magistrate to entertain and examine a complaint, with further Chapter XV alternatives including dismissal under Section 203 or proceeding on a prima facie offence. The High Court's final liberty specifically identifies Section 200 CrPC and Section 223 BNSS as the corresponding complaint procedure. Section 482 CrPC was the actual petition provision and did not warrant a routine direction to police to lodge an FIR. Article 226 appeared within the quoted Supreme Court and Division Bench discussion as a distinct, rare public-law route, subject to its qualifications; this was not an Article 226 petition. The operative liberty was to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/223 BNSS.

4. Issues : (i) Whether a Section 482 applicant whose complaint has not produced an FIR can bypass the remedies before the Superintendent of Police and the Magistrate and obtain a direct High Court direction that police register it.

(ii) What powers do police, the Superintendent and the Magistrate exercise under Sections 154, 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, and how does the exceptional Article 226 jurisdiction in cases of abuse of investigative power qualify the general alternative-remedy rule?

(iii) What liberty remains available to the applicant when the application is dismissed without deciding whether a particular cognizable offence has been alleged?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted the police duty to register cognizable information as stated in Aleque Padamsee and the authorities on police duty discussed within its quoted passage, but distinguished the question of remedy when the informant alleges inaction. The aggrieved informant can complain to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and then seek Section 156(3) action where appropriate; alternatively the Sections 190/200 complaint route brings the allegations before a Magistrate able to consider cognizance, investigation or dismissal as the Code permits. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe explain Magistrate monitoring and its limit: the Magistrate may ensure proper investigation but may not personally conduct the police investigation. Divine Retreat Centre preserves very exceptional Article 226 intervention where investigative power is exercised mala fide and a clear case of abuse of power and non-compliance with Chapter XII is made out. Even then, the Court may insist on lawful process but cannot dictate police investigative methods. Shweta Bhadauria applies the alternative-remedy principle with acknowledged writ exceptions. The Court found no case for a direction to police to register the offence. The Court therefore declined the Section 482 direction and left statutory Magistrate recourse open. It reached no conclusion on the merits of the underlying complaint and did not order arrest, investigation steps, registration or a charge sheet.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application seeking a direction to the police to register an FIR, holding it not maintainable. The applicant was expressly left free to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS if she considered that an offence had occurred. The Court made no determination on the truth of her complaint and gave no direction to register it.

Radha Kushwah v. Bharat Sarkar and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 47365/2024, 19/11/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Murder / Section 300 thirdly / intended injury - The four-part test in Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, separates intention to inflict the particular proved injury from its objective sufficiency to cause death in the ordinary course; a distinct intention to kill is unnecessary. Anda v. State of Rajasthan stresses sufficiency and the nature of the weapon and target. The Bench found close-range pellet injuries, arterial rupture and fatal haemorrhage sufficient and maintained the Section 302 convictions.

Single injury / Section 302 or 304 - Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, were used to explain why weapon, force, target, manner and surrounding circumstances govern classification rather than a mechanical count of blows. Arun Nivalaji More explained the sequence of inquiry under Sections 299, 300 and 304. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak's sudden-fight conditions were quoted.

Common intention / Section 34 IPC - A shared design, formed before the act even if on the spur of the moment, and participation in the combined criminal act are required; identical blows are unnecessary and mere accompaniment is insufficient. Suresh Sankharam Nangare, Shyamal Ghosh, Mrinal Das and Ramashish Yadav explained the requirement of prior concert, while Hem Raj, Dashrathlal, Rajagopalswamy Konar and Sheikh Nabab illustrated limits on liability where participation in, or a shared intention to commit, the principal offence was not established. The Bench affirmed Raju's direct Section 302 conviction and the Section 302/34 convictions of Pappu and Shivram on the accepted account of firing, restraint and instigation.

Contradictions / eyewitness account - Mallikarjun v. State of Karnataka, (2019) 8 SCC 359, incorporating Bakhshish Singh, Sunil Kumar Sambhudaya Gupta and Raj Kumar Singh, distinguishes trivial discrepancies from omissions that materially affect the core of the prosecution case. The Bench found the challenged Section 161 CrPC omissions and variations insufficient to undermine the prosecution case on this record and relied on material consistency supported by the postmortem.

Related witnesses / careful scrutiny - Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, and its Darya Singh and Raghubir Singh discussion require scrutiny of presence, hostility and infirmities but impose no inflexible requirement of corroboration by independent witnesses. The Bench accepted the family witnesses after examining their account and medical support; kinship alone did not render their evidence unreliable.

Motive / trustworthy direct proof - Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, was applied: absence of proved motive is not decisive when credible direct evidence establishes the crime. This depended on the Bench's acceptance of ocular and medical proof, not on a presumption of guilt.

Medical evidence / fatal injury - The doctor's evidence of pellet wounds, blackening, arterial rupture and severe haemorrhage established homicidal death and the objective sufficiency of the particular injury to cause death. The Court held that the gunshot injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The connected Criminal Appeals Nos. 381 and 390 of 2010 challenged the judgment dated 6 May 2010 passed by the Special Judge (MPDVPK Act), Bhind, in Sessions Trial No. 92/2007. On 3 August 2007 at about 6 p.m., Gangole Rathore was shot near the platform outside his home at Raun, Bhind. The first account attributed the shot from a 12-bore country-made firearm to Raju alias Ravindra Rajawat and alleged that Pappu alias Jitendra Rajawat caught Gangole while Raju and Shivram Singh Rajawat exhorted the assault. The account also alleged theft of cash and a gold necklace from the house; later witnesses differed over precisely who held the deceased, what they personally saw and when they reached the scene. Gangole died there. A merg intimation and Dehati Nalishi led to Crime No. 107/2007. Police drew a spot map and inquest, seized soil, an empty cartridge and material articles, recorded statements and pursued the alleged firearm recovery. The prosecution charge sheet cited IPC Sections 302, 394 and 34, Arms Act Sections 25/27 and MPDVPK Act Sections 11/13. Thirteen prosecution witnesses testified; the accused denied guilt and called no defence witness.

The postmortem on 4 August recorded pellet punctures, blackening and charring in the thigh and adjacent region, ruptured thigh arteries and substantial haemorrhage; the doctor classified death as homicidal and the injuries as sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course. The trial court did not sustain the dacoity or Arms Act charges on the evidence, but sentenced Raju under Section 302 IPC and Pappu and Shivram under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC to life imprisonment and a fine of ₹5,000 each. A separately filed appeal by Raju, Criminal Appeal No. 573/2010, had already been dismissed as not maintainable because Appeal No. 390/2010 was earlier. The present Bench jointly heard Nos. 381 and 390. The defence disputed the firearm link, common intention and the relatives' eyewitness accounts, pointing to Section 161 omissions, witnesses said to have arrived after the shot, lack of independent corroboration and uncertain motive. The State relied on the eyewitness and medical evidence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, supplied the decisive Section 300 Thirdly sequence: prove the injury and its nature, prove intention to inflict that particular injury rather than an accidental or different injury, and objectively establish sufficiency for death in the ordinary course. The Bench used this distinction to reject the argument that intention to kill itself must be shown. Anda v. State of Rajasthan similarly explained the high probability inherent in an ordinarily fatal intended injury and the relevance of weapon and body part. Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeals Nos. 1078–1079 of 2005, was reproduced for the progression from Section 299 to Section 300, its exceptions and Section 304 Parts I and II; its detailed discussion of the offender's special knowledge under clause Secondly was background, because this Bench resolved the case under clause Thirdly.

Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, rejected a universal rule requiring a lesser conviction merely because a single blow was inflicted and assessed the weapon, site and circumstances. Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, supplied a non-exhaustive set of indicators of intention, including weapon, force, sudden fight, premeditation, provocation, undue advantage and number of blows. Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, drew intention from a crowbar blow and grave skull injury in its own facts. State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, rejected a fixed one-blow rule and discussed Arun Raj, Ashokkumar Magabhai Vankar and Leela Ram within its extract. Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, treated single injury as non-conclusive and discussed Vedanayagam's application of Virsa Singh. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, stated the cumulative conditions for applying Exception 4 to a sudden fight: absence of premeditation, sudden mutual fight in the heat of passion, no undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct, and a fight with the person killed. Tularam v. State of M.P. was invoked by counsel on murder ingredients.

On Section 34, Suresh Sankharam Nangare v. State of Maharashtra, 2012 (9) SCALE 345, distinguished common intention without a separate overt act of inflicting a blow from participation without shared design. Shyamal Ghosh v. State of West Bengal, AIR 2012 SC 3539, Mrinal Das v. State of Tripura, AIR 2011 SC 3753, and Ramashish Yadav v. State of Bihar, AIR 1999 SC 1083, were used for prior concert, prosecutorial proof of participation and formation of a design even on the spur of the moment. Hem Raj v. Delhi Administration, AIR 1990 SC 2252, Dashrathlal v. State of Gujarat, 1979 Cri LJ 1078 (SC), Rajagopalswamy Konar v. State of Tamil Nadu, 1994 Cri LJ 2195 (SC), and Sheikh Nabab v. State of Maharashtra, 1993 Cri LJ 43 (SC), illustrated the need to prove the other accused's contribution and the basis for joint liability, rather than attribute a principal actor's offence merely because they accompanied that actor. Balvir Singh and Sonu alias Sunil were cited by appellants.

Yogesh Singh v. Mahabeer Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 195, supplied the rule that trustworthy direct testimony reduces the significance of an unproved motive; the Bench applied it to the ocular account. Mallikarjun v. State of Karnataka, (2019) 8 SCC 359, was relied on to distinguish immaterial discrepancies from contradictions affecting the core. Its quoted discussion included Bakhshish Singh, Sunil Kumar Sambhudaya Gupta, State v. Saravanan and Raj Kumar Singh; the Bench accepted their common approach of assessing materiality and reading testimony as a whole. Harbeer Singh v. Sheeshpal, (2016) 16 SCC 418, was applied to relatives' testimony; its reproduced Darya Singh reasoning calls for careful scrutiny of interested witnesses' actual presence, probabilities and infirmities, while its Raghubir Singh passage rejects unnecessary multiplication of witnesses. The appellants' Parvat Singh, Imrat Singh and the Madhya Pradesh Baliraj Singh citations were relied on by the appellants to challenge the eyewitness evidence.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Section 299 distinguishes intention to cause death or likely fatal injury from knowledge of likely death. Section 300's clauses define when culpable homicide is murder; under clause Thirdly, an intended particular bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death attracts murder even without a separately proved desire to kill. The Bench considered the other clauses, the sequence of inquiry leading to Section 304 Parts I and II and the quotation on Exception 4, but affirmed liability under Section 300 Thirdly and punishment under Section 302. IPC Section 34 attributes a joint criminal act done in furtherance of common intention to each participant; the shared design must be proved, and participation can differ in form. Section 149 appeared only as a comparison in the Court's explanation, not as the charge decided. The alleged Section 394 IPC, Arms Act Sections 25/27 and MPDVPK Act Sections 11/13 formed the investigation and trial background; the judgment records trial acquittal on the special and Arms Act charges and does not independently determine appellate guilt on those charges. The defence used omissions in police statements under CrPC Section 161 to attack witnesses; the Bench assessed their materiality.

4. Issues : (i) Did the proved firearm injuries cause Gangole's homicidal death and, assessed through Sections 299 and 300, particularly clause Thirdly, amount to murder rather than a lesser form of culpable homicide? This required separating the intended injury from an intention to cause death and testing medical sufficiency. (ii) Did the prosecution's account of Raju's shot and the alleged acts of Pappu and Shivram justify direct Section 302 liability for the shooter and Section 302 read with Section 34 for the others, notwithstanding the defence challenge to concert and participation? (iii) Were the related witnesses' claimed presence and accounts reliable after the omissions and variations in police statements, the lack of independent support urged by the defence and the acquittal on other charges? (iv) Did the absence of a proved motive, or the absence of a conviction on the firearm-possession charge, undermine the direct and medical proof? Exception 4's sudden-fight test and Section 304 classifications were quoted within the homicide discussion.

5. Ratio / Findings : The doctor's account of close-range pellet injuries, blackening, arterial rupture and extensive blood loss established an ante-mortem firearm assault and death from haemorrhage. The Bench treated the injury intentionally inflicted by the gunshot as sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death; under Virsa Singh's distinction between subjective intention and objective sufficiency, an express intention to kill or a wound to the chest or head was not required. The cases concerning a single injury and Section 304 ruled out an automatic reduction merely because of the location or number of injuries; the Court concluded that Section 300 Thirdly and Section 302 applied.

On common intention, the Bench explained that a joint criminal act and a prior shared design, which may develop immediately before execution, permit Section 34 attribution; identical acts are unnecessary, but participation cannot be supplied merely by association. It considered the alleged holding of Gangole and instigation alongside Raju's firing. In the detailed witness recitals, Surendra could not explain why instigation was omitted from his first report; Ramsanehi's asserted eyewitness and restraint details were not recorded in his police statement; Gangacharan and Munnesh described seeing the men flee, with parts of their accounts learned from Surendra; Sudha and Suman supported the holding account. The Court then characterised the variations as minor, found the eyewitnesses firm on material aspects and affirmed all three convictions. The Court affirmed the convictions on its assessment of the evidence.

The related witnesses were not discarded for family connection. Applying Harbeer Singh and the Darya Singh test quoted within that decision, the Court scrutinised the testimony and found Surendra's account materially supported by Munnesh, Gangacharan and Ramsanehi and by the autopsy, even though particular witnesses' claimed personal observation and Section 161 omissions were contested. Mallikarjun and the authorities quoted within it directed attention to whether contradictions materially affect the core of the prosecution case, rather than to isolated trivial variations. The Bench decided they did not here. Under Yogesh Singh, the apparent absence of prior enmity or an independently proved property motive could not displace the direct evidence that the Bench found trustworthy.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed both criminal appeals. The trial court's sentences of life imprisonment and fines of ₹5,000 each were affirmed: Raju alias Ravindra Rajawat under Section 302 IPC, and Pappu alias Jitendra Rajawat and Shivram Singh Rajawat under Section 302 read with Section 34 IPC. Pappu and Shivram, the appellant in Criminal Appeal No. 381/2010, who were then on bail, were directed to surrender immediately; their bail bonds were cancelled. Raju, in jail, was to be informed through the Jail Superintendent. The trial record was to be returned.

Shivram Singh Rajawat and Others v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 381/2010 & 390/2010, 08/12/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Defence evidence / Section 243(2) CrPC - After entering on the defence, an accused may seek process for relevant documents; the court must consider the request's bona fides and relevance. If it refuses process on the statutory grounds of vexation, delay or defeating the ends of justice, it must record its reasons in writing. T. Nagappa v. Y.R. Muralidhar, (2008) 5 SCC 633, recognises that the accused ordinarily determines how to prove the defence. The trial court rejected the request to summon the bank loan and industrial registration records without finding that the records were irrelevant or that the request was intended to delay the proceedings; its order was set aside.

Fair trial / Constitutional opportunity - J. Jayalalithaa v. State of Karnataka, (2014) 2 SCC 401, was applied for the Article 21 fair-trial guarantee and the possibility that hindrance to a fair trial may violate Article 14. The accused's opportunity to obtain and lead material defence evidence cannot be defeated by an unexplained preference for another means of obtaining the evidence, though the court may prevent irrelevant proof and unnecessary protraction.

Third-party documents / alternative access - An assertion that the accused could procure records himself under the Right to Information Act was insufficient where he said the loan and registration records were third-party material unavailable to him. The court's summons procedure remained available, and the disputed question of whether proprietorship or use of the premises could form the basis of liability under the Electricity Act was left for trial.

Production / proof and weight - Summoning a document does not prove it, make it conclusive, or establish the accused's defence. The accused must prove it in accordance with law; the trial court then determines its significance for liability. The petition was allowed and the eleven-year-old trial was directed to finish within three months.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A vigilance team inspected the M/s Deepti Polycon factory at Morena on 7 September 2005 and alleged that its electricity meters had been tampered with so that consumption was not properly recorded. A complaint invoking Sections 135 and 151 of the Electricity Act, 2003, proceeded before the Special Judge (Electricity Act), Morena, in Case No. 194/2005. Ramjidas was described as accused No. 1 and proprietor of the concern. Shivshankar Mandil, accused No. 2, disputed that he was the proprietor. During cross-examination of the complainant's witnesses he put forward that defence. After the prosecution witnesses had been examined, he applied under Section 243(2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure for the State Bank of India, Jiwajiganj branch, records of a loan to the concern and the District Industrial Centre's registration register. He said that these records would show that Ramjidas, rather than Mandil, was the proprietor. The application asserted that he could not obtain third-party records under the Right to Information Act.

The Special Judge rejected the request on 28 May 2016. In the trial court's view a person using the premises could be a consumer liable for electricity theft even if not proprietor, and Mandil could obtain title records from the department himself. Mandil invoked Section 482 CrPC to challenge that refusal, saying he was denied a reasonable chance to prove his defence without any finding that the documents were irrelevant, or that his application was vexatious or dilatory. The respondent pointed to a Commercial Tax certificate already produced for Ramjidas's proprietorship, Mandil's signature on an inspection Panchnama under Sections 126 and 135 of the Electricity Act, and his presence at the premises. These matters supported the respondent's contention about possible liability as a user; they were not final findings of guilt in this petition. The trial had already been pending approximately eleven years.

2. Precedents — Considered : J. Jayalalithaa and Others v. State of Karnataka and Others, reported in (2014) 2 SCC 401, was cited by the Court for the principle that a free and fair criminal trial is indispensable to Article 21 and that impediments to it may violate Article 14. The High Court used that constitutional principle to assess whether denying process for potentially useful defence records had deprived the accused of a real opportunity.

T. Nagappa v. Y.R. Muralidhar, (2008) 5 SCC 633, was relied on for Parliament's recognition in Section 243(2) CrPC of the accused's right to defend by adducing evidence and for the proposition that the accused generally knows the nature of evidence needed to prove the chosen defence; that choice is not left entirely to the Court's discretion. The High Court applied this to records bearing on Mandil's asserted non-proprietorship. It simultaneously retained judicial screening for bona fides, relevance and unnecessary delay.

3. Statutes considered : Section 243(2) CrPC provides that, after an accused has entered on his defence, the Magistrate shall issue process for a witness or the production of a document or thing on application, unless the court considers the request made for vexation, delay or defeating the ends of justice and records the ground in writing. Its proviso restricts compelling a witness already cross-examined, or whose cross-examination was available, absent necessity for justice. This case concerned documents, not recall of such a witness. The High Court also required attention to whether the material was relevant and the request bona fide; it rejected a refusal that lacked an adverse finding on either relevance or dilatory purpose. Section 482 CrPC supplied the High Court's jurisdiction to correct the trial court order, rather than to determine in advance whether the defence would succeed.

Electricity Act Sections 135 and 151 formed the prosecution background: alleged meter tampering/theft and the complaint. Section 126 was mentioned in the respondent's description of the inspection Panchnama. Whether Mandil's use of the premises could independently attract Section 135 liability was argued and assumed in the trial court's refusal but was not finally adjudicated by the High Court. The Right to Information Act was raised only as a suggested means of obtaining the loan and registration papers; the applicant's third-party access difficulty made that suggestion insufficient to deny court process. Articles 21 and 14 supplied the fair-trial context through J. Jayalalithaa.

4. Issues : (i) When the accused had already disputed proprietorship during cross-examination, was he entitled under Section 243(2) to summon bank loan and industrial registration records relevant to that defence, or could the trial court deny process because a user of the premises might also incur liability? (ii) Did an already-produced Commercial Tax certificate and a suggested RTI route justify refusing further third-party records without a finding of irrelevance, vexation or delay? (iii) Would an order summoning documents settle their authenticity, legal effect or the accused's role, and how should the long-pending trial be managed? The High Court decided the opportunity to produce evidence, not the underlying electricity-theft charge.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court read Section 243(2) in the light of the fair-trial guarantee and the Supreme Court's insistence that an accused may choose evidence to establish a bona fide defence. Mandil wanted to test the allegation that he was proprietor by summoning records relating to the loan and registration of M/s Deepti Polycon. The trial judge had not determined that these records were irrelevant to the asserted defence; nor had he found that the request was made to vex or delay. The possibility that a user, as well as a proprietor, might be a consumer liable under Section 135 did not make the requested records automatically immaterial or justify deciding their ultimate effect before production. The Court granted the opportunity to summon defence evidence despite the respondent's reliance on the Commercial Tax certificate and Mandil's signature on the Panchnama.

The trial court's suggestion that Mandil obtain the papers himself also failed because his application expressly explained the obstacle to accessing third-party information under RTI. The Court did not require him to exhaust that proposed route before invoking the summons procedure. The High Court acknowledged the converse limit: courts should not compel irrelevant witnesses or documents or permit the accused to protract a trial through an application that is not bona fide. Its order did not authenticate any bank or registration record. Production is distinct from proof, and the accused remains responsible for proving the documents according to law. The trial court must then decide what they establish, whether the defence succeeds and whether liability follows from the facts and applicable Electricity Act provisions. Given that the case had been pending since 2005, the Court fixed a time limit for completing the trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Section 482 petition, set aside the Special Judge's order dated 28 May 2016, and allowed Mandil's application to summon the bank loan documents and District Industrial Centre registration register described in it. It directed the trial court to conclude the trial within three months of communication of the High Court's order. The trial court remained responsible for assessing the proof and effect of the summoned documents.

Shivshankar Mandil v. G.S. Lamba, M.Cr.C. no. 9606/2016, 18/11/2016, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Prosecution witnesses / unexplained abandonment - An Additional Public Prosecutor's prediction that material eyewitnesses would not support the case did not justify giving them up without an identified basis. The deceased's father Sarnam Singh and Hariom were not present when dropped; the APP's affidavit did not assert prior contact with them, and a different witness who failed to support the case was nonetheless examined. The Court found this choice arbitrary, removed the APP from this trial and directed an inquiry into his continued suitability. No final disciplinary guilt or witness credibility finding was made.

Section 311 CrPC / omitted eyewitnesses - The Public Prosecutor was directed to apply immediately to examine Hariom and Sarnam Singh, but the trial court was to decide the application on their importance. The direction did not compel automatic examination or assume what these witnesses would eventually say.

Bail / distinct disposition - The fourth regular-bail application, based on four examined witnesses not supporting the prosecution, was refused on the Court's assessment of the murder allegations and total circumstances. That factual refusal was distinct from the supervisory directions concerning the prosecutor and witnesses.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Shivsingh Tomar, arrested on 25 March 2020 in Crime No. 19/2020 of Police Station Baraso, Bhind, faced allegations under IPC Sections 302 and 34 and Arms Act Sections 25/27. The prosecution case, as briefly stated in the order, alleged that Shivsingh and his son Ashok fired upon Ashok, son of Sarnam Singh, causing his death. Shivsingh's fourth application under Section 439 CrPC followed dismissal of an earlier application on 7 May 2021 in MCrC No. 22310/2021; he relied on the fact that four examined eyewitnesses, Ramdas (PW-1), Munnesh Singh (PW-2), Veer Singh (PW-3) and Deepak (PW-4), had not supported the prosecution. A coordinate Bench noticed that on 27 August 2021 the trial court had, at the prosecutor's request, given up two other cited eyewitnesses, Hariom and Sarnam Singh, as prosecution witnesses. Sarnam was the deceased's father. The coordinate Bench sought an explanation. At the present hearing an affidavit of Additional Public Prosecutor Sanjay Kumar Sharma was produced in a sealed envelope, opened and read in court, shown to defence counsel, and taken on record. The affidavit stated that the four witnesses already examined had not supported the prosecution and that Hariom and Sarnam had been given up to avoid wasting court time and delaying the case because the prosecutor believed they would not support it; it disclaimed improper intent. The Court observed, however, that the affidavit did not say those two witnesses had contacted Sharma or conveyed that position. The 27 August order sheet indicated they were not present. Deepak, who also did not support the case, had been examined rather than similarly omitted. The Bench considered this unexplained selectivity while separately deciding bail.

2. Statutes considered : Section 439 CrPC governed the application for regular bail. The Court refused bail after considering the alleged firing and the totality of the circumstances. Section 311 CrPC was invoked for an application to seek examination of Hariom and Sarnam after the APP had given them up. The High Court required the application, while expressly reserving the question of the witnesses' importance and permission to the trial court. IPC Sections 302 and 34 and Arms Act Sections 25/27 identified the offences in the underlying prosecution. The direction temporarily to withdraw other serious trials from the APP referred to murder, attempted murder and sexual offences including POCSO as a protective administrative measure pending inquiry, not a ruling on those statutes' merits.

3. Issues : (i) Did the failure of four examined witnesses to support the prosecution warrant bail in this fourth Section 439 application, notwithstanding the alleged fatal shooting and the remaining trial evidence? (ii) Was the APP's decision to drop two other material eyewitnesses, one the deceased's father, justified by his stated expectation of non-support and desire to save time, when neither was present and no communication from them was identified? (iii) What corrective steps could preserve the trial's opportunity to hear material witnesses while leaving the Section 311 application to the trial court, and how should the APP's conduct be examined? The High Court did not decide the truth of either unexamined witness's anticipated evidence.

4. Ratio / Findings : The Court read the APP's affidavit, including its account that Ramdas, Munnesh Singh, Veer Singh and Deepak had not supported the prosecution and that the other two were dropped to avoid consuming time. It contrasted that explanation with the absence of any assertion that Hariom or Sarnam had communicated an intention not to support the case. The trial order showed they were not present when they were given up as prosecution witnesses. Deepak had been examined despite also not supporting the prosecution, a difference for which the affidavit supplied no explanation. Particularly because Sarnam was the deceased's father and an alleged eyewitness, the Bench found the unexplained act of giving up both witnesses arbitrary and said the APP had lost the Court's confidence. It deliberately refrained from further findings about motive or misconduct and ordered a competent authority's inquiry into whether he should continue in office. The order refers to the earlier dismissal of Shivsingh's bail application and to the coordinate Bench's request for the APP's affidavit as procedural history.

As to examination of the omitted witnesses, the Court did not itself declare what Hariom or Sarnam would say, whether they would support the prosecution, or that permission to examine them must automatically be granted. It directed the Public Prosecutor to seek permission under Section 311 and required the trial court to decide after assessing importance. It also ordered the existing trial removed from Sharma and, pending the inquiry, serious sessions matters withdrawn from him. Those protective and inquiry measures were distinct from a final disciplinary determination. As to bail, the Court referred to the allegation that Shivsingh and his son fired on the deceased and found the totality of circumstances unsuitable for release, despite the four examined witnesses' lack of support. The bail conclusion is confined to this interlocutory record.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the fourth application for regular bail. The Public Prosecutor, Bhind, was directed immediately to take over this trial from APP Sanjay Kumar Sharma and keep him away from it; the competent Principal Secretary, Law and Legislative Affairs, or District Magistrate, Bhind, was directed to inquire into his continuation and decide suitability within two months from the date of the High Court's order. Pending that report, the Public Prosecutor was to withdraw from Sharma all sessions trials involving offences under Sections 302, 307 or 376 IPC or under the POCSO Act, as well as all other important matters. Cases were to be reassigned to him only after receipt of the inquiry report and only if his continuation in office was found desirable. The Public Prosecutor was also to apply immediately under Section 311 CrPC for examination of Hariom and Sarnam, leaving the trial court to decide their importance.

Headnote :- Final criminal order / Section 362 CrPC - Once a criminal case has been disposed of by a signed final order, the court cannot alter or review that order except as otherwise authorised by law or to correct a clerical or arithmetical error. Mohd. Zakir v. Shabana, (2018) 15 SCC 316, rejects correction on the merits under Section 362 even for an allegedly erroneous earlier order; the remedy must be one known to law. Daljit Singh Gujral v. Jagjit Singh Arora, (2014) 12 SCC 198, was cited for the same finality principle. The applicants sought a fresh fifteen-day period for an application concerning documents before the JMFC. Applying those authorities, the Bench held that describing the request as a modification rather than a recall did not change its substantive effect, and dismissed the Section 482 application.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In MCrC No. 12526/2024, a coordinate Bench had made a final order on 12 April 2024 giving Shreemati The Big Saree Mall and the other applicants fifteen days to present a fresh application before the Judicial Magistrate First Class, Bhopal. They were to explain the proposed documents' relevance and importance, when the documents were obtained, and whom they wished to recall or examine to prove them. The trial court would then decide according to law in the pending case under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. The present judgment records the earlier order's reference to the accused's burden in that case.

The applicants said they failed by mistake to apply within fifteen days and that the trial court would not entertain the late request. They characterised the request as an extension, not a recall of the prior order. The question before the Court was the power to make that alteration to a concluded criminal order, rather than the underlying merits of their application concerning documents for the defence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Mohd. Zakir v. Shabana, (2018) 15 SCC 316, was relied on for the rule that Section 362 CrPC does not authorise correction of a final order on the merits. Even an earlier order said to be patently erroneous must be challenged or corrected by a procedure known to law, rather than a rehearing on the merits disguised as correction of a clerical or arithmetical error. The High Court applied that distinction to the applicants' requested extension: it would change the period granted by the earlier order, not repair a transcription or calculation mistake.

Daljit Singh Gujral v. Jagjit Singh Arora, (2014) 12 SCC 198, was cited as laying down similar law on the finality restriction. The Court cited it as laying down similar law.

3. Statutes considered : Section 362 CrPC prohibits a court, after signing its judgment or final order disposing of a case, from altering or reviewing it unless the Code or another law otherwise provides; correction of a clerical or arithmetical error remains permitted. The Bench distinguished a procedural label or form of review from substantive alteration of the order's operative content. Section 482 CrPC was the provision under which this new application was made, but it did not authorise an alteration contrary to the specific Section 362 bar. Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act identified the underlying trial and the context of the proposed documents.

4. Issues : Could the applicants obtain, by a fresh Section 482 application, another fifteen days to exercise an opportunity created by the final order of 12 April 2024 after the original fifteen-day period had expired? More specifically, did describing that request as 'modification' rather than 'recall' place it within Section 362's narrow clerical or arithmetical exception, or would it alter the substance of the signed order?

5. Ratio / Findings : The earlier coordinate Bench had disposed of the prior matter by granting a defined fifteen-day opportunity, coupled with a specified procedure for applying to the trial court and having that application considered. A second fifteen-day period would replace or enlarge that operative limit. The Court held that this was neither a clerical transcription correction nor an arithmetical correction. Mohd. Zakir makes clear that Section 362 cannot be used to revisit a final criminal order's merits; Daljit Singh Gujral supports the same limitation. The applicants' description of their request as 'modification' rather than 'recall' did not alter the effect of their prayer. Because the proposed change was substantive, Section 482 could not be used to make it in this application.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application for modification and an additional fifteen-day period. The High Court left the 12 April 2024 order as it stood and granted no direction requiring the JMFC to consider a late document application.

Headnote :- Private complaint / cognizance / application of mind - At the stage of taking cognizance and issuing process on a complaint, the Magistrate must judicially examine the allegations with the statements and inquiry material to see whether they disclose an offence and sufficient ground to summon the proposed accused; summoning is a serious judicial act, not a mechanical formality. Mehmood Ul Rehman v. Khazir Mohammad Tunda, (2015) 12 SCC 420, and Pramatha Nath Talukdar v. Saroj Ranjan Sarkar, AIR 1962 SC 876, were considered. The requirement of judicial scrutiny does not authorise a trial-level determination of disputed veracity at this preliminary stage.

Section 202 CrPC / limited inquiry / sufficient ground for process - The preliminary inquiry tests whether there is a prima facie basis for proceeding and screens out false, vexatious or harassing complaints; it is not a full trial and does not require evidence sufficient for conviction. Rosy v. State of Kerala, (2000) 2 SCC 230; Kewal Krishan v. Suraj Bhan, 1980 Supp SCC 499; Mohinder Singh v. Gulwant Singh, (1992) 2 SCC 213; Pramatha Nath Talukdar, AIR 1962 SC 876; and Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, were considered for the respective limits of Section 202 and the prima facie meaning of "sufficient ground". The alleged execution and signatures on the disputed power of attorney, and the probative value of the handwriting comparison, required adjudication at trial rather than conclusive resolution before process.

Criminal revision / process order / impermissible meticulous appreciation - When reviewing a Magistrate's process order in revision, the Sessions Court exceeded the proper inquiry by disbelieving preliminary witnesses and the handwriting material after detailed evidentiary appraisal. The High Court set aside the revisional order dismissing the private complaint and restored the Magistrate's cognizance order; it did not decide that the alleged forgery or cheating was proved.

Complaint delay / Section 203 CrPC / limitation distinction - Where cognizance is not barred by limitation, mere lateness in presenting a complaint cannot by itself justify dismissal under Section 203. The complainant's explanation that payments of agricultural income continued until she became suspicious, the timing of her discovery, and the disputed significance of further delay remained matters to be evaluated on evidence at trial; the High Court did not finally accept the explanation or resolve the factual dispute.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Snehlata brought a private complaint alleging that her relatives had used a power of attorney bearing her forged signatures and thumb impressions to deal with her share in agricultural land, survey no. 693/1 at Sirsod, Gwalior. She stated that her brother-in-law Ravindra Singh Ghuraiya had looked after the land and remitted agricultural income; when payments stopped she made inquiries, obtained copies from the Sub-Registrar, denied having executed or consented to the disputed power of attorney, and approached the police and Superintendent of Police before filing the complaint. The allegations of forgery and dishonest disposal remained unproved at this stage.

In her Section 200 CrPC statement, Snehlata denied signing or putting thumb impressions on the authority and said that she was not at Gwalior at the relevant time. Phayaji and Pakeeja gave Section 202 statements about her presence, pregnancy and bed rest at Rampur Manihar on 13 June 1988. A Sub-Registrar office witness produced the recorded power of attorney; Rajiv Verma said the disputed signatures differed from signatures on the complaint. The respondents contested the relevance and reliability of these materials, including the absence of comparison with indisputably admitted signatures. The Magistrate's order of 31 July 2021 took cognizance under IPC Sections 420, 463, 467, 468 and 471. Three revisions by the proposed accused were allowed by the Additional Sessions Judge on 18 November 2021, setting aside that order and dismissing the complaint. Co-accused Virmadevi died during those revisions. Snehlata invoked Sections 397 and 401 CrPC in the High Court to challenge the revisional court's detailed assessment of preliminary evidence and its treatment of delay.

2. Precedents — Considered : Mehmood Ul Rehman v. Khazir Mohammad Tunda, (2015) 12 SCC 420, was used for the positive duty to apply judicial mind before issuing process. The complaint, statements and inquiry must be considered together to ask whether alleged facts constitute an offence warranting the proposed accused's appearance; the exercise cannot be mechanical. The cited passage refers to Pepsi Foods Ltd. for the seriousness of activating criminal process. The High Court adopted this scrutiny while rejecting an inquiry into disputed evidence applying the standard required at trial.

Rosy v. State of Kerala, (2000) 2 SCC 230, supplied the two limited purposes of a Section 202 inquiry: to ascertain a prima facie case for process and to prevent process on complaints that are false, vexatious or intended to harass. Its cited passage says that evidence is not meticulously appreciated, the Section 202 standard differs even from the charge stage, and the proposed accused has no right to intervene at that inquiry. Rosy itself quoted and cited earlier cases, including Ranjit Singh, Chandra Deo Singh, Vadilal Panchal, Pramatha Nath Talukdar, Nirmaljit Singh Hoon and Mohinder Singh.

Kewal Krishan v. Suraj Bhan, 1980 Supp SCC 499 (also reported at 1981 SCC (Cri) 438), was quoted at length. Its discussion of Sections 200, 202, 203 and 204, particularly for a complaint concerning an offence triable exclusively by the Sessions Court, contrasts the cursory prima facie threshold for process with both the charge and ultimate conviction standards and warns against weighing preliminary evidence as a trial court. Its additional discussion of commitment, bail and discharge belonged to the quoted source context; the High Court applied that threshold to the present revisions, together with the principle that preliminary evidence must not be meticulously weighed. It did not decide a new bail or committal issue.

Mohinder Singh v. Gulwant Singh, (1992) 2 SCC 213, described a Section 202 inquiry as restricted to whether the complaint and preliminary witnesses provide sufficient ground for process under Section 204 or dismissal under Section 203. It is not a full trial of guilt, and adequacy for conviction is judged later. The High Court used this distinction against the revisional court's assessment of the expert and witnesses.

Pramatha Nath Talukdar v. Saroj Ranjan Sarkar, AIR 1962 SC 876, was quoted for judicial application of mind to the complainant's and witnesses' statements and any inquiry or investigation result in deciding sufficient ground under Sections 202–204. The reproduced extract also addresses when a second complaint may follow an earlier dismissal. No second complaint was before the High Court, and that separate exception was not applied to Snehlata's case.

Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, defined "sufficient ground" in Sections 203, 204 and 209 as satisfaction of a prima facie case against the proposed accused, rather than proof sufficient for conviction. The passage cites Ramgopal Ganpatrai Ruia, Vadilal Panchal, Chandra Deo Singh, Nirmaljit Singh Hoon, Kewal Krishan, Mohinder Singh and Chief Enforcement Officer v. Videocon International Ltd. in support. Together, these authorities informed the High Court's conclusion that judicial scrutiny was required but final determination of the issues concerning the disputed power of attorney, handwriting opinion and witness credibility had to await trial.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 200 and 202 CrPC governed the complainant's and preliminary witnesses' statements and the limited inquiry before process; Sections 203 and 204 governed dismissal for want of sufficient ground or issuance of process. The Court distinguished prima facie sufficiency for proceeding from trial proof and applied Sections 397 and 401 CrPC in correcting the Sessions Court's exercise of revisional powers over the Magistrate's process order. It expressly addressed limitation as a possible statutory bar to cognizance, but identified no applicable limitation bar on this complaint. IPC Sections 420, 463, 467, 468 and 471 were the offences in the Magistrate's cognizance order; Sections 464, 472 and 120-B/34 appeared among the original complaint allegations. Their ingredients and the respondents' guilt were not finally adjudicated in this revision.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the Section 202 inquiry and the Magistrate's decision to issue process permitted detailed assessment of the credibility of the complainant's supporting witnesses and handwriting opinion, or required a prima facie inquiry with genuine judicial application of mind. (ii) Whether the Sessions Revisional Court could overturn process and dismiss the complaint by concluding that the complainant had not herself asserted pregnancy, that the preliminary witnesses or expert should be disbelieved, and that the allegation concerning the power of attorney was unpersuasive. (iii) Whether delay in presentation of this complaint, absent a bar on cognizance by limitation, justified dismissal under Section 203 at the preliminary stage; the factual sufficiency of the explanation was left for the trial court. The High Court did not decide whether the power of attorney was forged, whether the respondents committed the charged offences, or whether the expert opinion would ultimately be accepted.

5. Ratio / Findings : The High Court held that issuing summons on a complaint requires application of judicial mind, as explained in Mehmood Ul Rehman and Pramatha Nath Talukdar, but the limited purposes of the Section 202 inquiry are to decide whether there is sufficient prima facie ground to proceed and to guard against abusive complaints. Rosy, Kewal Krishan, Mohinder Singh and Shivjee Singh established that this threshold is distinct from framing a charge or proving guilt and that preliminary evidence is not to be meticulously weighed as at trial. The cited authorities were considered for their relevant process-stage tests.

On these allegations, Snehlata expressly denied executing the disputed authority or affixing signatures and thumb impressions. The witnesses' account of her whereabouts and the comparison offered by Rajiv Verma were part of the preliminary material. Whether the expert used reliable exemplars, whether the witness accounts were credible and whether the signatures were forged were disputed evidentiary questions. The Sessions Court exceeded the limited stage by resolving them against the complainant, including by treating the absence of a pregnancy assertion in her own statement as a reason to disbelieve the other witnesses. The High Court did not itself authenticate the document, accept the expert conclusion as conclusive, or make a guilt finding.

The Court further held that a complaint cannot be dismissed under Section 203 solely because it was brought late where cognizance is not time-barred. The complainant's account of receiving agricultural income until suspicion arose and the respondents' challenge to the later timeline presented factual matters for assessment after evidence. A plausible explanation, if established at trial, could render the delay immaterial; whether it was established was not finally determined. The revisional decision therefore could not stand, while the accused retained their opportunity to contest authenticity, delay and culpability at trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal revision. The Additional Sessions Judge's common order of 18 November 2021 in Criminal Revision Nos. 507/2017, 506/2017 and 497/2017 was quashed, and the JMFC's order of 31 July 2021 in Complaint Case No. 3230/2017 was restored. The parties were directed to appear before the Trial Magistrate on 13 June 2022. The Magistrate was directed to proceed according to law, conclude the trial within one year because the 2017 complaint had remained stalled while the record was in revision, and keep intervals between hearing dates within 15 days. Restoration of process was not a conviction or a final finding on the alleged forgery.

Snehlata v. Vireshwar Singh and Others, Cr.R. no. 3494/2021, 02/05/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- POCSO / age of child / school documents - Applying Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, the Court treated the statutory document hierarchy for determination of a child's age as relevant to the sexual-offence victim, with resort to medical opinion in the absence of the preferred documents. The proved school register and Class VIII marksheet established the child's recorded birth date; the entry was made before the incident, no material cross-examination challenged the date, and the child was approximately fifteen on 20 December 2014. The register's admissibility under Section 35 Evidence Act was considered with its provenance; a bare visual estimate was not the sole foundation.

Minor sexual-offence victim / disability / alleged consent - The prosecutrix had substantial speech and hearing difficulty reflected in the trial court's notes. Her failure to cry out when taken from a tent where her parents slept did not, on the evidence assessed, establish willing participation, particularly given her vulnerability and the appellant's age. In any event, once minority was established, the suggested consent could not defeat the Section 376 IPC and Section 4 POCSO findings on these facts. The State relied on the reported finding of human sperm in the vaginal slide in support of the allegation.

Delayed FIR / child sexual offence / evidentiary explanation - The three-day interval before reporting a sexual assault on a fifteen-year-old girl was assessed in the setting of the family's concern for her future and social standing, and the father's evidence that the parents deliberated. The Court rejected the suggestion that the delay alone rendered the allegation fabricated because of an asserted unpaid labour debt; it evaluated the proffered explanation against the actual circumstances.

POCSO and IPC rape / statutory minimum / same act - The appellant's age and time already spent in custody could not justify reducing the seven-year terms below the statutory minima applicable to Section 4 POCSO and the charged form of Section 376 IPC. Although the victim was below sixteen, the appellate court did not substitute a conviction under Section 376(2), as no charge under that provision had been framed; the conviction under Section 376(1) remained. Treating the two convictions as arising from the same sexual act, the Court affirmed the seven-year rigorous-imprisonment term and fine under Section 4 POCSO and imposed no separate sentence under Section 376 IPC.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In a prosecution arising from the night of 20 December 2014, the minor prosecutrix, who had marked speech and hearing difficulty, was missing from the tent-shed in which she slept between her parents. She was soon found frightened in a nearby relative's hut. Her account, as interpreted by her mother, was that Sukhua, a man known to the family who had performed labour work for them, had taken her near a school, removed her undergarments, sexually assaulted her and threatened her. Her mother said fear and concern for the family led to the report on 23 December 2014. The appellant maintained that the account was false because of a wage dispute, that the girl was an adult and consenting, and that the three-day reporting interval undermined the prosecution. These were defence contentions, not facts established by the Court.

The prosecution relied on the prosecutrix and her parents, the woman who recorded the FIR from the mother's interpretation, medical evidence, school admission register and Class VIII marksheet, seizure and FSL evidence. The trial judge appended notes when the prosecutrix's answers could not be understood. The doctor recorded a torn hymen and sent vaginal slides; the State submitted that human sperm was found in the vaginal slide. The school documents recorded a birth-date entry placing her at about fifteen on the occurrence date. The Special Sessions Judge, Shivpuri, convicted the appellant under Section 376 IPC and Section 4 POCSO on 6 November 2015, awarding seven years' rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 1,000 fine with one month's default imprisonment for each, concurrently. Section 506 Part II had been charged but was not among the convictions listed in the appellate judgment. Under Section 374 CrPC, the appellant challenged age, consent, delay and sentence, seeking in the alternative a term limited to custody already undergone.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jarnail Singh v. State of Haryana, (2013) 7 SCC 263, was the Supreme Court authority relied on by the deciding Judge. Its quoted discussion of Rule 12 of the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Rules, 2007, framed under the 2000 Act, sets a hierarchy of documentary proof for an age inquiry: matriculation or equivalent certificate if available; failing that, the date-of-birth certificate of the first school attended other than a play school; failing that, a birth certificate from the competent local authority; and medical-board opinion only when the preferred documents are unavailable. The quoted rule also requires a recorded age finding, identifies specified proof as conclusive for the inquiry, and limits repeated inquiry after the prescribed documentary proof, subject to the rule's qualifications. In applying this hierarchy to the prosecutrix's child status, the High Court considered the Class VIII marksheet and proved admission register, the basis of the register entry, its admissibility under Section 35 Evidence Act, its creation before any incentive to fabricate this incident, and the absence of material challenge to the date in cross-examination. It found her fifteen at the incident and accordingly rejected the adult-consent premise. The Court did not direct a medical-board inquiry because it found adequate documentary material.

3. Statutes considered : Section 4 of the Protection of Children from Sexual Offences Act, 2012 governed the child sexual assault conviction and seven-year minimum sentence applicable to the incident and charge as addressed by the Court. Section 376 IPC governed the parallel rape conviction; the appellate court identified a statutory minimum of seven years for the offence as charged. It said that although the girl was under sixteen, the trial court had not framed a charge under Section 376(2), so the appellate conviction remained under Section 376(1). Sections 376 and 506 IPC and Section 4 POCSO had been charged; the listed convictions were for rape and the POCSO offence, with no appellate adjudication of a separate criminal-intimidation conviction. Section 374 CrPC supplied the appellate route. Section 35 of the Indian Evidence Act was invoked for admissibility of the regularly maintained school record. Jarnail Singh's quotation considered Rule 12 of the 2007 Juvenile Justice Rules and its enabling 2000 Act for the age-proof sequence.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the school register and marksheet proved the prosecutrix was a child on 20 December 2014, in light of the appellant's majority claim and the Jarnail Singh documentary hierarchy. (ii) Whether the three-day FIR delay and asserted wage dispute made the accusation unreliable, and how the family's stated reasons for delay affected that inference. (iii) Whether the prosecutrix's failure to raise an alarm while being taken from her parents' tent proved consent, considering her communication disability and, separately, the legal consequence of her established minority. (iv) Whether the convictions and punishment could be disturbed or reduced to time served given statutory minimum terms, the absence of an aggravated Section 376(2) charge, and the two convictions for the same sexual act.

5. Ratio / Findings : First, the Court applied the age-proof approach in Jarnail Singh rather than treating apparent age or an unsupported assertion of adulthood as decisive. The Class VIII marksheet and admission register agreed on the recorded birth-date entry. The register witness proved the record and said the entry came from a transfer certificate; the Court treated a register maintained according to law as admissible under Section 35 Evidence Act. The records predated the alleged assault and their date-of-birth entry was not materially challenged in cross-examination. Against the incident date of 20 December 2014, the Court found the prosecutrix about fifteen. This finding made any suggested consent legally immaterial to the charged child sexual offence.

Second, the Court assessed the three-day FIR interval in its actual setting. The mother attributed it to fear, and the father described parental deliberation; the Court accepted that parents of a minor sexual-assault complainant might consider her future and family reputation before reporting. It therefore declined to infer fabrication merely from this interval, despite the suggested wage dispute. The Court assessed the delay in the circumstances of this case.

Third, it examined the contention based on her failure to raise an alarm in the light of the girl's testimony, her mother's ability to interpret her communication, and the trial judge's contemporaneous notes that some answers could not be understood. Her difficulty in speech and hearing, the circumstances in which she was taken and the substantial age difference did not support the claimed voluntary participation. The State relied on the vaginal-slide result; the Court held the appellant guilty under Section 376 IPC and Section 4 POCSO. Its separate minority finding meant that even a suggestion of voluntary participation could not provide a defence to the child sexual offence charged.

Fourth, the appellant's age and custody already served could not override the seven-year minimum terms that the Court identified for the charged Section 376 IPC and Section 4 POCSO offences. Although the victim was under sixteen, the Court held that it could not substitute a conviction under Section 376(2), because no charge under that provision had been framed; the Section 376(1) finding stood. Because both convictions reflected the same sexual act, the Court declined to add a separate rape sentence while affirming the seven-year rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 1,000 fine, with one month's default imprisonment, under Section 4 POCSO.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the conviction under Section 376(1) IPC and Section 4 POCSO. The appellant's request to reduce the sentence to custody already undergone failed. The appellate court affirmed the seven-year rigorous-imprisonment term and Rs. 1,000 fine, with one month's default imprisonment, for Section 4 POCSO, and directed that no separate sentence be awarded for Section 376 IPC because it concerned the same act. It did not introduce a conviction on the unframed aggravated rape charge. The appellant, already in jail, was directed to undergo the entire custodial sentence.

Case Sr. no. (561) Prev Next

Headnote :- Evidence / injured eyewitnesses / credibility - State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324, Baleshwar Mahto v. State of Bihar, (2017) 3 SCC 152, Balwan v. State of Haryana, (2014) 13 SCC 560, and Jodhan v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 52, were considered for the special evidentiary weight of testimony by a witness injured in the occurrence: the injury supports presence, though major contradictions or strong contrary grounds can defeat reliance. The High Court applied that qualified principle to Narottam, Ramu, Veeru and Prakash, whose injuries were medically recorded; the defence witness also accepted the presence of several of them. Cross-examination and the initially confused attribution of Ganga Singh's fatal forehead blow did not, after clarification, discredit the material account.

Evidence / related versus interested witnesses - Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, and Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, were invoked to reject automatic exclusion or a requirement of corroboration solely because of kinship. A related witness is not interested merely because of relationship; a concrete motive for false implication and the evidence's inherent reliability, probability and consistency remain material. The High Court scrutinised the relatives' accounts and recorded injuries, and accepted them notwithstanding the absence of an independent eyewitness and the existence of a cross-case; it did not hold that relationships or hostility can never affect credibility.

Evidence / ocular-medical variance / axe and laceration - Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy v. State of A.P., (2014) 12 SCC 457, Bhajan Singh v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 421, Ramanand Yadav v. Prabhu Nath Jha, (2003) 12 SCC 606, and Shamsher Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 7 SCC 536, supplied the Court's distinction between a possible medical inconsistency and a medical opinion that completely rules out the eyewitness account. Applying it, a lacerated head wound on Prakash did not make testimony that Sultan struck with an axe impossible: its edge might have been blunt or its blunt side or handle might have struck. The eyewitness account was not discredited by this particular objection, while the medical proof separately established Ganga Singh's fatal cranial injury.

Section 34 IPC / common intention / sudden dispute - Dani Singh v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 203, was considered for the requirements of shared intention and participation, the possibility of concert developing at the scene before the act, and the distinction between similar individual intentions and an intention shared by all. The High Court found that renewed discharge of waste water despite the previous day's objection brought about a sudden confrontation. On this record it could not infer a shared intention to commit murder, notwithstanding the three appellants' participation in the assault; Sultan and Jitendra were relieved of Section 302/34 liability, and each appellant was held accountable for his own proved acts.

Sections 300 Exception 4 and 304 Part I IPC / sudden fight / undue advantage - Raj Paul Singh v. State, (2012) 10 SCC 144, was considered for the limitation that a sudden quarrel does not attract Exception 4 if an assailant takes undue advantage, acts cruelly or inflicts fatal violence on an unarmed non-threatening intervener; Lavghanbhai Devjibhai Vasava v. State of Gujarat, (2018) 4 SCC 329, supplied a multifactor assessment including weapon, target, force, participation, provocation and undue advantage. In the particular waste-water confrontation, Brijendra used a hockey stick, delivered a single fatal forehead blow, did not repeat head blows and, as found by the Court, took no undue advantage and did not act cruelly. His Section 302 conviction was altered to Section 304 Part I. Suddenness alone did not decide the conversion.

Section 323 IPC / individual hurt liability - After rejecting murder liability under Section 34, the Court separately considered the blows to Prakash, Narottam, Ramu and Veeru and the medical records of simple injuries. It affirmed or recorded convictions under Section 323 for the appellants' proved personal assaults. The counter FIR and assertion of a free fight did not establish collective murder liability or erase the individual hurt findings; the complainant party's acquittal in the cross-case was expressly acknowledged.

Sentence / altered convictions / custody already undergone - Sultan and Jitendra's life sentences under Section 302/34 were set aside, while their Section 323 punishment was limited to custody already undergone, the Court recording 11 months and 26 days against the one-year term and considering remission. Brijendra's Section 304 Part I sentence was fixed at imprisonment already undergone, more than ten years, with a Rs. 10,000 fine and six months' rigorous imprisonment in default, and release if not required in another case. The appeal was allowed to that extent; the trial judgment was otherwise affirmed subject to these express modifications.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A dispute arose on 23 February 2010 between Sultan Singh and Prakash Singh over waste water from Prakash's house. According to the prosecution, Sultan called his sons Jitendra and Brijendra from Gwalior; the three came to Prakash's house the next morning, objected again to discharge of water and assaulted members of his family. The written complaint made by injured Narottam attributed an axe blow on Prakash's head to Sultan, a hockey blow on Ganga Singh's forehead to Brijendra, and further assaults on Ramu and Veeru to Jitendra. The record contains some divergent descriptions of assailants and implements among witnesses, especially in Prakash's examination-in-chief; the appellate court assessed the material attribution after cross-examination. Ganga Singh sustained multiple head injuries and a skull fracture, was treated at Bhind and Gwalior, and died on 3 March 2010. The post-mortem recorded fractured right parietal-temporal bones and subdural and subarachnoid haemorrhage, with head injury causing cardio-respiratory failure. The Court found his death homicidal. Prakash, Narottam, Ramu and Veeru also had medically recorded injuries.

The initial FIR was registered under Sections 294, 323, 506B and 34 IPC; investigation after Ganga's death led to a charge-sheet including Sections 302, 294, 323, 506(2) and 34. There was a counter FIR, Crime No. 31/2010, by the appellants' side. Defence witness Vinod asserted the complainants had attacked the appellants over the water discharge; the appellants' counsel acknowledged that the complainant party had been acquitted in that cross-case. The trial court framed Section 302 or alternatively Section 302/34 charges, together with other hurt, abuse and intimidation counts. By judgment dated 1 November 2011 in Sessions Trial No. 255/2010, the 1st Additional Sessions Judge, Bhind convicted Sultan and Jitendra under Sections 302/34 and 323/34, and Brijendra under Sections 302 and 323/34, imposing life imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 5,000 on each murder conviction and one year's rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 1,000 fine on the hurt conviction, with the specified default terms and concurrent sentences. The three invoked Section 374 CrPC in Criminal Appeal No. 971/2011. They argued that the incident was sudden, the cross-case showed a free fight with individual rather than shared liability, and Brijendra's act at most fell under Section 304 IPC. The State supported the conviction. The appeal required separate scrutiny of the eyewitness evidence, medical consistency, common intention, the offence committed by the assailant who inflicted the fatal injury, the remaining hurt convictions and their sentencing consequences.

2. Precedents — Considered : On injured witnesses, the High Court quoted State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324, for due weight to the testimony of a witness whose injury supports presence, subject to major contradictions or discrepancies. Baleshwar Mahto v. State of Bihar, (2017) 3 SCC 152, reproduced Abdul Sayeed's reasoning that injury is an inbuilt indication of presence and convincing grounds are needed to discredit the witness; that passage also discussed Jarnail Singh and other supporting decisions. Balwan v. State of Haryana, (2014) 13 SCC 560, and Jodhan v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 52, reiterated the special evidentiary weight, which could be displaced by sufficient contrary grounds. These authorities were applied, rather than treated as an irrebuttable presumption: the High Court compared the medically documented injuries, defence admission of presence, cross-examination and the clarification of which accused delivered Ganga's forehead blow before finding the prosecution witnesses reliable.

On kinship and alleged interest, Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, held that relationship alone does not make evidence untrustworthy. Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, recognised the usual weight of close family testimony, without making it conclusive. Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, required a foundation for a claim of false implication and careful assessment of whether the evidence was cogent; its quotation of Dalip Singh rejected an automatic corroboration rule for relatives while recognising the possible effect of enmity and the need to judge each case on its facts. Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, distinguished a related witness from one who has a direct or indirect stake in falsely securing punishment, and called for inherently reliable, probable, cogent and consistent testimony rather than mechanical rejection. The present Court adopted the distinction and found the injured family witnesses' material account trustworthy despite the family relationship and the cross-case.

On medical and ocular evidence, Putchalapalli Naresh Reddy v. State of A.P., (2014) 12 SCC 457, explained that an axe may strike with a blunt edge or reverse side and a laceration does not of itself refute eyewitness identification of the weapon. Bhajan Singh v. State of Haryana, (2011) 7 SCC 421, drew on Hari Chand and Abdul Sayeed to distinguish medical evidence that makes an oral account less probable, which remains relevant to evaluation, from evidence that completely rules out its truth; oral evidence normally has primacy unless that incompatibility is established. Ramanand Yadav v. Prabhu Nath Jha, (2003) 12 SCC 606, likewise treated medical opinion as insufficient to override oral testimony unless it specifically excludes the claimed injury. Shamsher Singh v. State of Haryana, (2002) 7 SCC 536, cautioned against isolating a doctor's sharp-weapon observation where the blunt head or stick portion of an axe could account for the wound. Applying those qualifications, the High Court did not discard testimony about Sultan's axe blow merely because Prakash had a lacerated rather than incised wound; it did not assert that all ocular-medical conflicts are immaterial.

For Section 34, Dani Singh v. State of Bihar, (2004) 13 SCC 203, explained the requirement that the participants share the intended result and participate in the criminal act. It also addressed the possibility that concert develops on the spot but anterior to the offence, the distinction from merely similar intentions, and the insufficiency of mere presence. The High Court applied it to the facts of the renewed water dispute and declined to infer a common intention to murder, limiting the appellants to their own acts. For Exception 4, Raj Paul Singh v. State, (2012) 10 SCC 144, reproduced the important qualification that a sudden quarrel cannot excuse taking undue advantage, cruelty, or fatal violence against an unarmed non-threatening intervener; its reference to Narayanan Nair and Kikar Singh informed that limit. Lavghanbhai Devjibhai Vasava v. State of Gujarat, (2018) 4 SCC 329, quoted Dhirendra Kumar's contextual factors for choosing between Sections 302 and 304: circumstances, weapon, source of weapon, vital target, force, deceased's participation, prior enmity, provocation, heat of passion and undue advantage or cruelty. The High Court applied the multifactor inquiry to Brijendra's one hockey blow, lack of repetition and the sudden water dispute, found no undue advantage or cruelty on this record, and altered his murder conviction to Section 304 Part I. It did not treat the cross-case as proof that the complainants were convicted or that every sudden quarrel qualifies.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 supplied the appeal against the Sessions conviction and sentence. The Indian Penal Code, 1860 supplied the substantive counts. Section 302 governed murder; Section 304 Part I governed Brijendra's altered culpable-homicide conviction when the Court found the sudden-fight exception applicable while retaining culpability for the intentional fatal assault. Exception 4 to Section 300 was assessed through the absence or presence of premeditation, sudden fight in the heat of passion, undue advantage and cruel or unusual manner; the Court's factual finding was that Brijendra had not taken undue advantage or acted cruelly. Section 34 concerns constructive liability only where the participants shared the relevant common intention and acted in its furtherance; it was rejected for murder in this incident, so each appellant's liability depended on his own acts. Section 323 governed the simple hurt injuries, retained or recorded separately against the appellants. The original FIR, charge-sheet and framing also referred to Sections 294, 325 and 506(2), but the appealed convictions and the final modification identified in the judgment concerned Sections 302, 302/34, 323/34, 323 and 304 Part I; the appellate court did not announce a separate conviction on the other charged counts. The Court addressed statutory punishment for Section 323 as up to one year and Section 304 Part I as life imprisonment or imprisonment up to ten years, with the sentence and fine described in the operative order. References to remission and custody already served were used in its individual sentence calculation; no general remission entitlement was adjudicated.

4. Issues : (i) Whether Ganga Singh's death was proved homicidal and the medically supported and cross-examined eyewitness accounts reliably identified the assailants, despite family relationships, the cross-case and Prakash's initially inconsistent attribution of the fatal blow. (ii) Whether Sultan's alleged axe assault was excluded by a lacerated wound rather than a sharp incised wound, in light of the governing threshold for rejecting ocular testimony because of medical evidence. (iii) Whether Sultan, Jitendra and Brijendra shared an intention to murder Ganga under Section 34, or whether the sudden renewed water-discharge dispute required their culpability to be separated according to individual acts; the existence of a cross-case was advanced for a free-fight theory. (iv) Whether the fatal hockey blow by Brijendra remained murder under Section 302 or fell under Section 304 Part I through the sudden-fight analysis and its qualifications concerning absence of undue advantage and cruelty. (v) Which Section 323 hurt findings survived separately for the individual appellants and how custody already undergone, fine and release were to be reflected in the modified sentences. The Court did not decide a right to discharge waste water or a separate conviction in the cross-case.

5. Ratio / Findings : The contemporaneous medical examination documented several injuries to Ganga's skull, the X-ray showed a frontal-bone fracture, and the post-mortem found extensive cranial fracture and haemorrhage causing death from head injury. The High Court found homicide proved. Narottam, Ramu, Veeru and Prakash were injured witnesses whose examinations showed actual injuries; Vinod for the defence conceded several were present. Applying the Supreme Court's rule that such testimony carries special weight but may be discredited on sufficient grounds, it examined the extended cross-examination and found no major contradiction discrediting their material account. Although Prakash's examination-in-chief confused which son struck Ganga's forehead, the appellate judgment treated his cross-examination as clarifying Brijendra's blow; that conclusion was considered with the other accounts. Kinship did not automatically make these witnesses interested in a false conviction, and the absence of independent witnesses did not mandate rejection. The Court acknowledged the counter FIR and the counsel's concession that the complainants had been acquitted in that case, rather than treating it as a conviction of the complainants or conclusive proof of a mutual free fight.

Prakash's lacerated head wound was the basis for the defence's contradiction argument against the evidence of Sultan's axe. The medical-ocular precedents required the Court to ask whether the medical evidence actually excluded the asserted manner of attack, not merely whether a sharp edge would normally produce another kind of wound. A blunt axe edge, reverse side or handle could explain a laceration, and Prakash could not specify whether sharp or blunt side had struck him. The Court therefore held this variance insufficient to discredit the eyewitness account. This was a compatibility finding for this injury; it was not a ruling that medical evidence never overcomes oral evidence.

Turning to liability for murder under Section 34, the Court used Dani Singh's distinction between common intention, which entails shared design and participation, and simultaneous but unshared intentions. The spot map showed the houses separated by a stone road. There had been an objection and a heated exchange on 23 February, but Prakash again discharged water on 24 February; the judgment found that renewed act prompted a sudden incident. Despite the appellants' collective arrival and their various blows, the Court held it difficult on these facts to find a shared intention to murder. It set aside Sultan and Jitendra's Section 302/34 convictions and concluded each appellant was liable for his own proved conduct. It did not absolve the two of every assault merely because Section 34 murder liability failed.

For Brijendra, a single hockey blow on Ganga's forehead proved fatal. The High Court considered the Raj Paul Singh limit that a sudden fight cannot justify undue advantage or a cruel or unusual fatal attack, and the factors reproduced in Lavghanbhai, including the implement, target, force, prior dispute and participation. It found the dispute over continuing waste water sudden and unpremeditated; a hockey stick was not treated as a lethal weapon in these circumstances, no further head blow by Brijendra was proved, and the Court found no undue advantage or cruel conduct. It accordingly altered Brijendra's Section 302 conviction to Section 304 Part I. This conclusion is specific to the Court's assessment of this fatal blow and its qualifications, not an automatic classification of a single blow as culpable homicide.

The evidence and medical records also established simple injuries inflicted on Prakash, Narottam, Ramu and Veeru. For Sultan and Jitendra, the Court calculated custody as approximately 11 months and 26 days against a one-year hurt term, considered remission, and imposed the period already undergone if the full year had not already been completed. For Brijendra, whose custody exceeded ten years by the appeal judgment, it imposed custody already undergone on the altered Section 304 Part I conviction plus a Rs. 10,000 fine, six months' rigorous imprisonment in default, and concurrent operation as ordered.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal appeal to the stated extent. Sultan Singh and Jitendra Singh were acquitted of Section 302/34 IPC liability; their Section 323 convictions were retained, with imprisonment limited to the period already undergone if the one-year term including remission had not already been served. Their bail bonds were cancelled and they were no longer required in this case. Brijendra Singh was acquitted of Section 302 and convicted under Section 304 Part I, sentenced to the period of imprisonment already undergone, a Rs. 10,000 fine, and six months' rigorous imprisonment in default. The Court held the appellants answerable under Section 323 for their individual simple-hurt acts and ordered the relevant sentences to run concurrently. Brijendra, then in custody, was to be released immediately if not required in another case. The trial judgment dated 1 November 2011 stood only as modified by these party-specific and offence-specific directions; copies were to be provided free to the appellants and the trial record returned for compliance.

Headnote :- Wife maintenance / separate residence / lawful lifestyle - The husband sought to set aside only his wife's monthly maintenance, pointing to her Facebook posts and a "modern" way of life as inconsistent with his orthodox family. The Court observed that lawful personal choices could not be condemned merely by the husband's moral preferences. Without material showing that she lived separately without reasonable justification, that objection did not disentitle her to maintenance. The Court did not find any criminal activity by the wife or determine the full factual cause of separation; it rejected the specific ground advanced for denying maintenance.

Rule of law / morality / Supreme Court precedent - Nagarathinam v. State through the Inspector of Police, Criminal Appeal No. 1389/2023, decided 04.05.2023, was judicially considered for its caution that a court should not sermonise on societal morality and ethics at the expense of the rule of law. Though Nagarathinam arose in a different criminal context, the High Court applied that limited institutional principle to the husband's request for a moral judgment on his wife's lawful lifestyle. The quoted passage did not itself decide Section 125 maintenance eligibility; the High Court's separate-residence reasoning supplied the application of that principle in this case.

Quantum and relief / Section 482 CrPC - The High Court held that ₹5,000 per month for the wife was not excessive in light of price levels, living costs and daily necessities, and found no jurisdictional error in the maintenance order. The husband expressly did not challenge the separate ₹3,000 monthly award to the other respondent and undertook to pay it. His Section 482 application was dismissed. The order expressly left respondents free to seek enhancement by an application under Section 482; it neither granted enhancement nor resolved any future claim.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The Judicial Magistrate First Class at Amarpatan, District Satna, by an order dated 23 September 2022 in M.J.C.R. No. 115/2017, awarded monthly maintenance of ₹5,000 to Sneha, respondent No. 1 and the applicant's wife, and ₹3,000 to respondent No. 2. The Second Additional Sessions Judge at Amarpatan made an order dated 2 August 2023 in Criminal Revision No. 16/2022 arising from that maintenance proceeding. Sukhendra Chatuvedi approached the High Court under Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to challenge the revision order and the wife's maintenance. He did not object to the award to respondent No. 2 and said he would continue paying it.

The applicant's counsel said he came from a very orthodox family while his wife led a modern life, as he claimed her Facebook posts annexed to his application showed. He urged the Court to quash her ₹5,000 monthly maintenance because of that lifestyle. When asked whether a court could bypass legal provisions in favour of morality, counsel maintained that law could not exist apart from morality and that morality should prevail. These were the applicant's submissions, not findings of immoral or unlawful conduct. The Court heard his counsel, considered the cited posts as the asserted basis of the objection, and examined whether any other material was pointed out to show that the wife lived separately without reasonable justification.

2. Precedents — Considered : The deciding Judge quoted and applied Nagarathinam v. State through the Inspector of Police, Criminal Appeal No. 1389 of 2023, decided 4 May 2023 (Supreme Court). The quoted paragraph 17 arose in a different criminal case involving an appellant's attempted suicide with her children following a quarrel connected with an illicit relationship; the Supreme Court rejected an imputed motive that she tried to murder her sons in order to continue the relationship. Its institutional observation was that the court's role is to apply the rule of law rather than deliver sermons on morality and ethics. The High Court used that limited observation to answer counsel's proposition that his subjective moral disapproval of his wife's lawful modern lifestyle should determine maintenance entitlement. It did not adopt the different case's facts as facts about Sneha or attribute to Nagarathinam a specific holding about maintenance, Facebook posts, separation or quantum. The High Court's own reasoning was that lawful personal choice was not a statutory ground for denying maintenance and no material beyond the lifestyle assertion had been identified to show separate residence without reasonable justification.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, was the jurisdiction expressly invoked to challenge the maintenance and revisional orders. The Court rejected interference after finding no jurisdictional error in the ₹5,000 monthly award and dismissed the application. The Court expressly addressed whether the wife could be denied maintenance for residing separately without reasonable justification. The applicant's moral objection could not bypass the governing legal entitlement. The cited Nagarathinam passage concerned the judicial duty to apply law, not an amendment or exception to the maintenance provision. The Court's final statement leaves respondents at liberty to file an application under Section 482 for enhancement; it is a reservation in this order, not a decision fixing a different amount or interpreting the general procedural route to enhancement.

4. Issues : (i) In a Section 482 challenge to the revisional order arising from the maintenance proceeding, could the husband's disapproval of his wife's "modern" lifestyle and Facebook posts itself establish a legally sufficient reason to quash her

₹5,000 monthly maintenance, or was material needed to show she resided separately without reasonable justification? (ii) Did the Court have any basis to regard the wife's ₹5,000 monthly award as excessive in light of prevailing prices and daily living needs or to identify a jurisdictional error warranting interference? (iii) What was the scope of relief when the husband expressly accepted respondent No. 2's separate ₹3,000 monthly maintenance, and did dismissal foreclose a later enhancement request by respondents? The Court did not adjudicate a separate factual finding on the exact cause of marital separation or a future enhancement application.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the first issue, the Court pressed counsel to explain whether a preference for morality could override legal provisions, and whether merely living a modern life made Sneha's behaviour immoral. Invoking Nagarathinam's rule-of-law caution, it held that the husband's moral assessment could not make lawful lifestyle choices blameworthy. As long as no criminal activity was shown, the wife was free to make her own choices, orthodox or modern. The maintenance objection required a legally relevant showing that she was residing separately without reasonable justification. Apart from asserting that her lifestyle, illustrated by Facebook posts, was unacceptable to him, the applicant identified nothing to establish that condition. The Court therefore rejected the ground he advanced for denying maintenance. This is not a finding that all circumstances of living separately were proved in the wife's favour; it is the rejection of the particular unsupported ground he advanced.

On the second issue, the Court considered the ₹5,000 monthly amount awarded to the wife against the price index, cost of living and cost of ordinary daily goods. On that assessment, it found the amount could not be called excessive and found no jurisdictional error in the maintenance award. It did not state a general minimum or prescribe a formula for every wife's maintenance. On the third issue, the applicant expressly did not challenge the ₹3,000 monthly maintenance for respondent No. 2 and undertook to continue paying. The order consequently contains no adverse determination of that recipient's entitlement. The Court expressly said its dismissal would not prevent respondents from applying under Section 482 for enhancement; the reservation neither decides whether enhancement is justified nor increases the sums awarded.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. It declined to quash the wife's ₹5,000 monthly maintenance, finding no jurisdictional error and no sufficient basis in the asserted Facebook posts or lawful modern lifestyle to deny it. The applicant's stated acceptance of respondent No. 2's ₹3,000 monthly award was recorded; no modification of that award was made. The Court expressly preserved respondents' freedom to bring an application under Section 482 CrPC seeking enhancement. There was no enhancement, remand, new payment timetable or finding of criminal wrongdoing in this order.

Sukhendra Chatuvedi v. Sneha and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 54170/2023, 04/04/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Separate trials / evidence / connected appeal - Applying A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department, Criminal Appeal No. 1306/2021, the High Court held that evidence recorded in the separately conducted trial of Ram Kumar and Shiv Kumar could not be read as evidence in the later trial of the six appellants. Ram Kumar's remanded Criminal Appeal No. 1670/2010, although heard analogously, was reserved for separate decision. Witnesses initially examined while Pramod alone faced trial were re-summoned after the other appellants' arrest; the Court distinguished that record from evidence in the earlier, separate trial. Joint hearing of the appeals did not permit evidence from one separate trial to be used in the other.

Evidence Act Sections 141, 142 and 154 / leading questions / fair trial - Varkey Joseph v. State of Kerala, 1993 Supp (3) SCC 745, was applied to disallow prosecution questions that suggested answers on disputed, material facts in examination-in-chief. Age of the witness and elapsed time did not bring the proposed instigation allegations within Section 142's introductory, undisputed or sufficiently proved matters; permission under Section 154 had not been granted for the non-hostile Phoolmati. The answers elicited by leading questions were excluded, so her prompted allegations that Omkar and Sai Lal instigated the killing could not be used. The ruling concerned the improperly elicited part, not a wholesale rejection of everything the witness said.

Evidence Act Section 145 / prior police statement / unproved omission - Major Som Nath v. Union of India, (1971) 2 SCC 387, and V.K. Mishra v. State of Uttarakhand, (2015) 9 SCC 588, required the intended contradictory part of a prior written statement to be put to the witness and, if denied, proved through the investigating officer. Mohwati was not confronted with the suggested omission concerning Omkar; it therefore could not be read for the defence merely because the police statement differed. This procedural bar did not compel acceptance of her entire court account: the High Court separately disbelieved her assertion that Omkar strangled Manraman because her own cross-examination placed her unconscious or away from observation at the material time.

Sections 141 and 149 IPC / common object / individual strangulation - Manjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2019) 8 SCC 529, Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, Bhanwar Singh v. State of M.P., (2008) 16 SCC 657, and Kirtan Bhuyan v. State of Orissa, 1993 Supp (1) SCC 558, were considered for the two limbs of constructive liability: an offence committed in prosecution of the shared object or one members knew likely in its pursuit. Common object may arise on the spot; an overt act by each is unnecessary once sharing and membership at the crucial stage are proved, but a mere bystander or member unaware of an independent escalation must not be held liable for murder on that basis. Here the group's unarmed entry, dragging and fist assault proved a common object to assault, while Shiv Kumar's sudden strangulation with the deceased's shirt was his individual act and was not shown to be within the other appellants' object or foresight. Their Sections 147, 323/149 and 452/149 convictions stood; all six were acquitted under Section 302/149.

Party-specific evidence and disposition / hostile witnesses / sentences - The Court found Pramod's participation in dragging and beating proved from the FIR and usable testimony despite conflicting accounts, but no instigation or strangulation by him. The same collective assault was proved against Sai Lal, Awdhesh, Rakesh, Rajendra and Omkar, subject to exclusion of prompted instigation and scrutiny of Mohwati's claimed perception. Their one-year rigorous-imprisonment terms for rioting, hurt and house trespass, the ₹1,000 fine and one-month default term under Section 452/149, and the direction that the sentences run concurrently were affirmed. The Court recorded that the appellants had served more than one year, discharged their bail bonds, and allowed the two appeals only to the extent of setting aside their Section 302/149 convictions. Ram Kumar's remanded appeal was not disposed of in this judgment.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 11 March 2009 at about 2:30 p.m. in village Kumharwara, Manraman Patel confronted Shiv Kumar Patel about an earlier dispute and alleged ruckus involving Sai Lal and Awdhesh. Biharilal's report said he pacified the initial exchange and took Manraman into his house. The prosecution alleged that Shiv Kumar returned after some minutes with seven others; several entered the house, brought Manraman into a courtyard and struck him with fists. It attributed words of instigation to Omkar and Sai Lal, said Awdhesh twisted Manraman's arm and stated Shiv Kumar strangled him using Manraman's shirt. Manraman died shortly thereafter. The post-mortem described neck ecchymosis and a ruptured trachea and gave asphyxia from throttling as cause of death. The doctor found no ligature mark and said pressure from a hard, blunt object could account for the neck injuries. The Court held death homicidal. There was no other external or internal injury recorded that established the alleged fractured arm or severe fist blows. An FIR was registered under IPC provisions including rioting, house trespass, murder, abuse, intimidation and Section 149; the defence disputed whether all participants shared or foresaw the killing. Initially only Shiv Kumar and Ram Kumar were tried. They were convicted by a 19 August 2010 judgment; their appeals were dismissed on 14 September 2018. The Supreme Court remanded Ram Kumar's appeal because it had been dismissed without him and his counsel, and his revived Cr.A. No. 1670/2010 was heard analogously with the present matters. Shiv Kumar did not further challenge his dismissal and was reported to have completed his sentence. The other six accused were apprehended later, between 2011 and 2012. Pramod @ Bholi was charged and some witnesses examined while he alone faced trial; after the other five were arrested, witnesses were re-summoned and all six were tried under the common judgment of the IV Additional Sessions Judge, Katni, dated 30 January 2020 in Sessions Trial No. 172/2009. The six were convicted under Sections 147, 452/149, 323/149 and 302/149 IPC. The first three carried concurrent one-year rigorous-imprisonment terms (with a ₹1,000 fine and one-month default term on the house-trespass count); the murder count carried life imprisonment, ₹5,000 fine and three months in default. Sai Lal, Awdhesh, Rakesh @ Tidku, Rajendra @ Chiju and Pramod filed Cr.A. No. 2874/2020; Omkar filed Cr.A. No. 3171/2020.

They argued that the deceased initiated the exchange, none of the group came armed, the group intended at most a fist assault, and no appellant knew Shiv Kumar would use the deceased's shirt to strangle him. The State said the coordinated return, entry, dragging, assault and alleged exhortations established a common object to kill. Because some testimony had been taken at different procedural stages, the Court evaluated the testimony recorded earlier in Pramod's trial separately, scrutinised testimony after re-summons and ruled on the admissibility and use of answers elicited by leading questions and alleged contradictions.

2. Precedents — Considered : A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner, Customs Department, Criminal Appeal No. 1306/2021, described in this judgment as decided on 31 October 2021, was applied for the proposition that evidence from an independent trial of a co-accused cannot simply be read in another accused's trial. The High Court accordingly separated Ram Kumar's remanded appeal from the two appeals decided here, despite analogous hearing.

Varkey Joseph v. State of Kerala, 1993 Supp (3) SCC 745, was quoted at length and applied. It addressed prosecution examination-in-chief that put suggested answers to witnesses on the material connection between accused and offence without properly treating them as hostile. Sections 141–143 Evidence Act distinguish a question suggesting a desired answer, the restricted permission for leading in chief or re-examination, and leading in cross-examination; Sections 145 and 154 provide structured means to confront a prior statement or seek leave to question one's own witness as on cross-examination. The Supreme Court held the prosecution's use of material suggestive yes-or-no questions unfair to the accused's Article 21 fair-trial right, and not a mere curable irregularity. The present Court found the trial court's permission to lead Phoolmati because of her age and the time elapsed could not justify suggesting the contested instigation narrative; she was not declared hostile and the alleged facts were not introductory, undisputed or already sufficiently proved. Her answers to those questions could not be used against Omkar or Sai Lal. It did not turn every fact she had independently stated into inadmissible evidence.

Major Som Nath v. Union of India, (1971) 2 SCC 387, explained that a prior written statement may be used to contradict only after the witness's attention is called to the relevant passage under Section 145; merely proving the witness signed the writing does not make the whole earlier statement substantive evidence. V.K. Mishra v. State of Uttarakhand, (2015) 9 SCC 588, set out the sequence: put the exact part to the witness; an admitted part needs no further proof; if denied, mark the intended contradiction and prove it through the investigating officer. A court cannot itself treat an unconfronted police statement as a proved contradiction. The High Court used those principles to refuse the appellants the benefit of Mohwati's alleged omission about Omkar in her police statement, since she was not confronted. It separately assessed her ability to perceive the event and disbelieved her new allegation that Omkar himself strangled Manraman.

Manjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2019) 8 SCC 529, explained Sections 141, 142 and 149 IPC and reproduced Sikandar Singh, Masalti and Subal Ghorai on formation and proof of a common object and caution against sweeping passive onlookers into vicarious guilt. The two alternatives in Section 149 require the actual offence to further the common object or to be one the members knew likely in pursuing it. A shared object can form at the scene, need not be the product of prior consultation, and can be inferred from conduct, words, arms, motive and the sequence; proof of an overt act by each member is not required once membership and the relevant object at the crucial stage are shown. Yet the object and its evolution must be proved against the persons concerned, so mere presence or a general allegation against a crowd is insufficient. The present Court applied these limits to distinguish the proven collective beating from Shiv Kumar's independent fatal escalation.

Bhagwan Jagannath Markad v. State of Maharashtra, (2016) 10 SCC 537, likewise explained that conduct and surrounding circumstances establish common object and that an eyewitness need not allocate a separate blow to every member; it reproduced Gangadhar Behera and Masalti for the genuine crowd-assault setting. The High Court considered this as permitting collective assault liability without erasing the requirement that murder fall within the object or known likelihood. Bhanwar Singh v. State of M.P., (2008) 16 SCC 657, through Charan Singh, explained that a Section 141 object must be shared, may be adopted or changed as the incident develops, and differs from common intention because prior concert is unnecessary. This required inquiry into when the common object existed or changed, rather than an assumption that an object to beat was always an object to kill. Kirtan Bhuyan v. State of Orissa, 1993 Supp (1) SCC 558, illustrated attribution of a fatal neck injury to its author under Section 302 while other group members remained liable for rioting and hurt under Sections 147 and 323/149. The High Court used that distinction in limiting liability here.

3. Statutes considered : Sections 141 and 142 IPC define an unlawful assembly of at least five with an enumerated common object and membership with awareness; the third clause of Section 141 includes criminal trespass or other offence, and an initially lawful group can become unlawful later. Section 149 attaches constructive liability for an offence a member commits in prosecution of the common object or that the others knew was likely to be committed in its prosecution. The Court held the common object here supported the convictions for Section 147 rioting, Section 323/149 simple hurt and Section 452/149 house trespass, but not Section 302/149 murder. Section 302 remained applicable to the separately convicted direct actor Shiv Kumar in the background, whose appeal was not reopened here; the six appellants' Section 302/149 convictions were set aside. Section 294 and other initial charges appear in the procedural history, but the appealed 2020 conviction and final disposition did not retain a separate Section 294 count.

Sections 141 and 142 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 govern definition and restrictions on leading questions in examination-in-chief and re-examination, with introductory, undisputed or already sufficiently proved matters treated specially; Section 154 allows the court to permit a party to put to its own witness questions available to the adverse party and allows the party to rely on usable portions of the witness's evidence. Section 145 requires confrontation with the precise prior writing before it may be proved as a contradiction, with the investigating officer's proof required if denied. The High Court applied these provisions to Phoolmati and Mohwati, respectively, with Article 21 fair-trial concerns expressed through Varkey Joseph. Section 428 CrPC supplied the certificate of undertrial detention used in the final custody reckoning; the Court recorded concurrent one-year sentences and discharge of bail bonds, not a fresh general interpretation of set-off.

4. Issues : (i) Whether Ram Kumar's evidence from a separate trial could be used to decide these six appellants' case merely because his remanded appeal was heard analogously, and how to treat the re-summoned witnesses in Pramod's later combined trial. (ii) Whether the trial court could let the prosecutor prompt non-hostile Phoolmati with suggested answers about material instigation because she was elderly and years had passed, and what use could be made of those answers under Evidence Act Sections 142 and 154. (iii) Whether Mohwati's police-statement omission about Omkar could be used as a contradiction without putting the passage to her under Section 145, and whether her in-court assertion of Omkar's strangulation was independently credible. (iv) Whether the witnesses proved the six appellants' roles in entering the house, dragging and assaulting Manraman, particularly Pramod amid the conflicting initial testimony, and whether the FIR was delayed in a way affecting that assessment. (v) Whether the established unlawful assembly shared an object to kill, or knew Shiv Kumar's use of the deceased's shirt for fatal strangulation was likely, so as to sustain Section 302/149 in addition to Sections 147, 323/149 and 452/149. (vi) What offence-wise and party-specific conviction, sentence and custody consequences followed for the six appellants while the separate appeal of Ram Kumar remained pending for another decision.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first applied the rule in A.T. Mydeen that evidence from one separate trial could not be used in another. Ram Kumar's earlier independent trial had its own evidence and the Supreme Court had remanded his appeal for hearing in his and counsel's presence. Listing the appeals for analogous hearing did not make that record admissible against these appellants. Ram Kumar's revived appeal would therefore receive a separate judgment. Within this six-appellant trial, some prosecution witnesses first testified while Pramod alone faced proceedings, and after the others were arrested they were re-summoned; the Court examined the evidentiary histories separately rather than borrowing the earlier Ram Kumar trial testimony. The witnesses examined earlier in Pramod's trial gave conflicting accounts. Biharilal at one point described him as trying to save Manraman, but also admitted his role in dragging and spoke of involvement; Jagroop's cross-examination suggested Pramod was absent at the murder; Phoolmati and Sudama did not support his presence in that phase. Mohwati described his participation in dragging and beating. The FIR named him and attributed dragging and fist blows to him, and it was lodged about four to four-and-a-half hours after the event with the police station roughly 25 km away and conveyance difficulties explained. The Court did not regard it as materially delayed and held beyond reasonable doubt that Pramod had dragged and assaulted Manraman, but not that he instigated or strangled him. For the other five, the court reviewed later Biharilal, Jagroop, Phoolmati, Mohwati and Sudama testimony, including hostility, changes in account and discrepancies as to who pressed the neck. Medical evidence showed fatal throttling, without a hand fracture or other material assault injury. It distinguished proof of collective entry and beating from proof of participation in the lethal act.

Phoolmati's unprompted testimony did not initially attribute words of instigation to Omkar and Sai Lal. She later agreed with the prosecutor's suggestions after the trial judge permitted leading questions on account of age and a six-year gap, without declaring her hostile. Applying Varkey Joseph and Sections 142 and 154 Evidence Act, the High Court held the suggested material facts were neither introductory, undisputed nor already sufficiently proved, and that the questions were not those the adverse party would have put on cross-examination. The prompted answers could not be read; the allegations of instigation elicited through them therefore could not be used against Omkar and Sai Lal. This exclusion directly affected the assessment of whether murder was within the shared common object.

Mohwati's police statement lacked the later allegation concerning Omkar, but the defence had not confronted her with the passage it wanted to use. Major Som Nath and V.K. Mishra prevented the Court from treating an unproved omission as a proved contradiction in the appellants' favour. In her cross-examination, she acknowledged being pushed and falling unconscious, and said the incident was over by the time she reached the courtyard. The High Court accordingly disbelieved her claim that Omkar himself strangled Manraman for lack of reliable observation.

Finally, under Manjit Singh, Bhagwan Jagannath Markad and Bhanwar Singh, the Court inferred a shared object to enter Manraman's home, drag him out and beat him with fists; no appellant had brought a weapon. The earlier exchange began with Manraman's scolding of Shiv Kumar, the group assembled thereafter, and Shiv Kumar used Manraman's own shirt for fatal strangulation. No appellant was proved to have acted during the strangulation or to have expected that sudden escalation. Although Section 149 needs no separate overt act by every member once the requisite common object or known likelihood is established, neither limb was proved for murder. Kirtan Bhuyan supported separating the direct killer's fatal act from the others' rioting and hurt. The Court thus maintained the six appellants' Sections 147, 323/149 and 452/149 convictions and removed Section 302/149. The one-year rigorous terms for the retained counts, ₹1,000 fine and one-month default term on Section 452/149, and the direction that the sentences run concurrently remained. It recorded individual undertrial periods and post-conviction custody exceeding the surviving one-year sentence for all, and ordered their bail bonds discharged.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal appeals in part. Sai Lal Patel, Awdhesh Patel, Rakesh @ Tidku Patel, Rajendra @ Chiju Patel, Pramod @ Bholi Patel and Omkar Prasad Patel were acquitted of Section 302/149 IPC. Their convictions for Sections 147, 323/149 and 452/149 IPC, the concurrent one-year rigorous-imprisonment terms, the ₹1,000 fine for Section 452/149 and its one-month rigorous-imprisonment default term were affirmed. The trial court's Section 428 CrPC certificate recorded undertrial periods of 167 days for Pramod, 29 days each for Rajendra and Rakesh, 355 days for Awdhesh, 158 days for Sai Lal and 117 days for Omkar; the High Court considered ensuing custody and found all had already served more than the surviving one-year imprisonment. Their bail bonds were discharged and no further custody in these appeals was required. The record and judgment were to be returned to the trial court for compliance. Ram Kumar's remanded Cr.A. No. 1670/2010, although heard analogously, was expressly reserved for a separate decision; this order did not dispose of it or revisit Shiv Kumar's completed appeal.

Sai Lal Patel and Others v. State of Madhya Pradesh; Omkar Prasad Patel v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 2874/2020 & 3171/2020, 04/10/2024, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Vishal Mishra, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Section 482 CrPC / pending FIR investigation / arrest and charge sheet - Applying D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, the High Court refused the informant's request to direct arrest of the accused in Crime No. 661/2020 or to require a charge sheet. Investigation is the police's statutory domain; a court exercising inherent power does not routinely supervise witness examination, arrest, seizure or the ultimate report. The cited Supreme Court decision explains, with M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, that Section 41 gives the officer discretion and a cognizable allegation does not make arrest automatic. The investigation may end in a charge sheet or a closure report according to the material found. The Court applied this restraint to the requested investigative outcome; the separate fair-hearing discussion quoted from Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was part of the Supreme Court passage, not an independently decided nonjoinder question here.

Section 173(1) CrPC / completion without unnecessary delay / lawful final report - The refusal to direct arrest or prosecution did not permit the police to leave the investigation pending indefinitely. Section 173(1) mandates completion of every investigation under the relevant Chapter without unnecessary delay. With FIR No. 661/2020 pending and the applicant complaining that the police had taken no further action, the High Court directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take the steps required by law, including submission of the appropriate final report, whether closure report or charge sheet. It fixed no particular investigative method or outcome, and left the applicant free to raise any grievance with the Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri, for consideration in accordance with law.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Sapna Prajapati invoked Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, in MCRC No. 13285/2021 before the Gwalior Bench. On her complaint, Police Station Karera, District Shivpuri, had registered Crime No. 661/2020 for offences alleged under Sections 376 and 506 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860. Her counsel said that the police had taken no further action and had not arrested the accused persons. The application sought intervention during the pending investigation; the operative analysis addresses the request to compel arrest and filing of a charge sheet. The prayer reproduced in paragraph 1 seeks prompt arrest of the accused in Crime No. 661/2020, investigation and filing of a charge sheet before the competent court. The High Court had to decide whether its inherent power could direct particular police action and what the Code required of the officer despite the Court's refusal to supervise the investigation. It disposed of the application on 10 March 2021.

2. Precedents — Considered : D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was expressly quoted and applied. In the passage reproduced here, the Supreme Court set aside a High Court order that, without adequate reasons and without hearing affected persons, had described recording witness statements, arrest, seizure and filing a charge sheet as obligatory police steps. Investigation is a statutory police function; Section 482 is exercised sparingly and cautiously on its stated grounds to give effect to orders under the Code, prevent abuse of a court's process or secure the ends of justice. A court must not prescribe a particular investigative angle or assume that every investigation produces arrest, seizure and a charge sheet: the lawful conclusion may instead be that no case is made out, resulting in a final closure report. The quoted Supreme Court order also cautioned that even casual judicial observations may influence the investigation and affect persons' reputation. The present High Court used this authority to refuse the requested arrest and charge-sheet directions as impermissible supervision. It did not find the merits of the underlying FIR proved or decide whether the police should ultimately prosecute.

Within that quotation, the Supreme Court invoked M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649, on Section 41 CrPC. The officer may arrest without a warrant on statutory grounds, but need not mechanically arrest upon receipt of a cognizable complaint. The need for arrest is judged during investigation, with caution because arrest intrudes on liberty and affects reputation; the nature of the alleged offence and the persons concerned matter. This nested principle supplied the specific reason the High Court could not command arrest merely because the informant alleged inaction. The quoted passage also cited Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, for a reasonable opportunity of hearing before a judicial order likely to affect a person, especially an order setting criminal law in motion with reputational consequences. D. Venkatasubramaniam applied that principle to persons not joined or heard in its own proceedings. This fair-hearing principle forms part of the quoted D. Venkatasubramaniam passage. These nested authorities were considered through the controlling Supreme Court extract, not as new findings of fact in this FIR.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC is the inherent jurisdiction invoked. As explained through D. Venkatasubramaniam, it permits necessary orders to give effect to an order under the Code, to prevent abuse of a court's process or to secure the ends of justice; it is exercised sparingly and does not ordinarily authorise the Court to run a pending police investigation or dictate its methods and outcome. Section 41 CrPC, discussed in the Supreme Court passage through M.C. Abraham, confers a discretionary power to arrest without a warrant on specified grounds rather than a mandatory arrest obligation on every cognizable FIR. Section 173(1) CrPC, quoted and independently applied by the High Court, states that every investigation under the relevant Chapter must be completed without unnecessary delay. The officer must reach a lawful conclusion on whether an offence is made out and submit the appropriate final report, whether closure report or charge sheet; the Court did not require either result. IPC Sections 376 and 506 identify the offences alleged in Crime No. 661/2020 and were not interpreted on their ingredients or proved facts.

4. Issues : First, when an informant complains in a Section 482 application that police have not acted on an FIR alleging Sections 376 and 506 IPC, can the High Court direct arrest of the accused and filing of a charge sheet, or would that impermissibly control the investigating officer's statutory discretion? This required separating the officer's power to arrest from any supposed automatic obligation following an FIR and distinguishing a lawful final report from a compelled prosecution. Second, despite the refusal to direct those steps, does Section 173(1) require a pending investigation to be concluded without unnecessary delay, and what relief can be given while leaving investigative methods and the outcome open? The Court did not determine the truth of the complaint, the necessity for arrest on facts not recorded, the ultimate sufficiency of evidence, or a distinct nonjoinder/fair-hearing issue discussed within the quoted Supreme Court decision.

5. Ratio / Findings : On the requested arrest, the High Court stated that it could not issue the direction. It adopted D. Venkatasubramaniam's distinction between the police obligation to investigate according to law and an order spelling out what evidence to collect or coercive acts to perform. The Supreme Court's M.C. Abraham discussion made clear that Section 41 allows but does not compel arrest merely because a cognizable offence is reported; the decision calls for investigation, caution and attention to liberty and reputation. A charge sheet is likewise contingent on the evidence gathered and the investigating officer's lawful assessment; a closure report remains possible. For those reasons, a judicial command to arrest the accused and file a charge sheet would make the Section 482 Court the supervisor of the ongoing investigation. The Court refused those commands in paragraphs 3–5. The Supreme Court extract's separate warning about not passing adverse orders without hearing affected persons supported restraint in D. Venkatasubramaniam, but the High Court did not make a separate procedural ruling about parties to this application.

The High Court then quoted Section 173(1) and identified a distinct statutory duty under it. An investigating officer cannot leave a case pending indefinitely and must determine whether any offence is made out. The Court directed completion as early as possible and necessary steps under law so that an appropriate final report, closure or charge sheet, is filed without unnecessary delay. This was a direction to perform the statutory investigation and reporting duty, not to predetermine the finding, arrest, evidence collection, or the kind of report. No fixed calendar deadline or order against a named accused was made. The applicant's further grievance could be put to the Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri, who would consider it according to law.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court disposed of the Section 482 application. The Court denied any direction requiring arrest of the accused or filing of a charge sheet. It directed the investigating officer to conclude the investigation as early as possible and take necessary lawful steps under Section 173(1), leaving the eventual report to the evidence and governing law. The applicant was given liberty to apply to the Superintendent of Police, Shivpuri, with any grievance; such application was to be looked into in accordance with law. The order did not quash the FIR, adjudicate guilt, grant a predetermined investigative outcome, or fix a specific completion date.

Sapna Prajapati v. State of M.P. and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 13285/2021, 10/03/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (565) Prev Next

Headnote :- Section 125 CrPC — wife's status — summary proof of marriage - Strict proof of an asserted temple ceremony and its rituals was not required as a precondition to the respondent's maintenance claim where the Magistrate had made no specific finding that she was not the applicant's legally wedded wife, but found that the parties had cohabited as spouses for a considerable period and had a child. Applying Kamala v. M.R. Mohan Kumar, (2019) 11 SCC 491, and the Chanmuniya principle discussed there, the Court affirmed that such cohabitation supports a rebuttable presumption of marriage for the summary Section 125 remedy; it did not convert an unproved particular ceremony into proof of a valid marriage for every purpose. The objection to status failed and the maintenance award stood.

Precedents — Kamala and nested authorities - Kamala distinguished Section 125's summary standard from strict matrimonial or Section 494 IPC proof and treated long cohabitation and children as grounds for a rebuttable marriage presumption. Its reproduced account of Dwarika Prasad Satpathy permits maintenance on evidence supporting living together; the quoted Chanmuniya reasoning favours a broad reading of "wife" to advance Section 125's social object, while acknowledging divergent authority. Kamala's discussion of Gokal Chand, Badri Prasad and Tulsa described the presumption and its rebuttable character. The High Court applied that line to the findings before it, cited Chanmuniya directly and also cited Badshah v. Urmila Badshah Godse, (2014) 1 SCC 188. The contrary Yamunabai and Savitaben holdings appeared within Kamala's quoted discussion of divergent views, not as an independently resolved invalid-marriage issue in this case.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Anita Bopche obtained an order from the Magistrate, Gram Nyayalaya, Balaghat, in MJC No. 36/2010 dated 16.07.2012 directing Shailesh Bopche to pay her ₹1,500 per month under Section 125 CrPC. His Criminal Revision No. 54/2015 was dismissed by the First Additional Sessions Judge, Balaghat, on 03.12.2015. He then invoked Section 482 CrPC in MCRC No. 30262/2023 to challenge both orders. Counsel acknowledged the interval of approximately nine years after the revision order but submitted that Section 482 had no limitation period and the petition was not barred merely by delay. The trial court had not accepted proof of the particular alleged temple marriage and rituals, yet found that the parties had lived as husband and wife for a considerable period and that Anita had given birth to a child. Shailesh argued that the absence of proof of a lawful marriage defeated her status under Section 125. He also raised an age difference, caste and family circumstances, alleged false implication, a past Section 376 IPC case in which he said he had been acquitted by the Juvenile Justice Board, and his own asserted work as a labourer in Nagpur. Counsel did not have the Board's judgment or know the reasons for acquittal. These were submissions, not findings establishing that Anita was not his wife. The Court identified the marriage-status objection as the sole substantive controversy before it; the ₹1,500 quantum was not challenged.

2. Precedents — Considered : Kamala and Others v. M.R. Mohan Kumar, (2019) 11 SCC 491, was extensively reproduced and applied. In the quoted passage, the Supreme Court explained that Section 125 provides a summary remedy intended to prevent vagrancy and does not require the strict proof of marriage demanded in matrimonial proceedings. It invoked Dwarika Prasad Satpathy v. Bidyut Prava Dixit, (1999) 7 SCC 675, for the less exacting Section 125 standard and the relevance of evidence of living together, and recognised a presumption of marriage where a couple cohabit for years as spouses. Kamala's account of Chanmuniya v. Virendra Kumar Singh Kushwaha, (2011) 1 SCC 141, explained an expansive interpretation of "wife" in cases of long cohabitation to advance the provision's social purpose, while acknowledging that Chanmuniya recorded divergence and referred questions to a larger Bench. The quoted discussion traced older Privy Council authorities, Gokal Chand v. Parvin Kumari, (1952) 1 SCC 713, Badri Prasad v. Director of Consolidation, (1978) 3 SCC 527, and Tulsa v. Durghatiya, (2008) 4 SCC 520, on the presumption favouring wedlock. Gokal Chand emphasised that circumstances can weaken or destroy it; Badri Prasad placed a heavy burden on one denying legal origin after a long spell of cohabitation. These authorities appear within the quoted Kamala passage. Kamala also quoted Chanmuniya's account of Yamunabai Anantrao Adhav v. Anantrao Shivram Adhav, (1988) 1 SCC 530, and Savitaben Somabhai Bhatiya v. State of Gujarat, (2005) 3 SCC 636, which had taken a restrictive view where a woman was not lawfully married; the present Court did not adjudicate a proved subsisting marriage or other invalidating impediment. It applied Kamala and expressly cited Chanmuniya and Badshah v. Urmila Badshah Godse, (2014) 1 SCC 188, in its conclusion. The Court also mentioned its earlier Smt. Pushpa Pandey v. Suresh Pandey, Criminal Revisions Nos. 348/2006 and 356/2006, decided 24.11.2016, as taking a similar view.

3. Statutes considered : Section 125 CrPC governed the respondent's summary maintenance claim. The legal question was whether the applicant's contention that the marriage ceremony had not been proved prevented recognition of her entitlement despite findings of cohabitation as husband and wife and childbirth. Section 482 CrPC supplied the procedural jurisdiction invoked against the Magistrate's and revisional orders. Section 494 IPC appeared only in the quoted Kamala comparison concerning stricter proof of marriage in a criminal offence trial. Section 376 IPC arose only in the applicant's account of an earlier prosecution and was not adjudicated here.

4. Issues : (i) Did inability to prove the asserted temple ceremony and rituals, without a specific finding that Anita was not legally married, defeat her Section 125 claim despite considerable spousal cohabitation and the birth of a child? (ii) Was there any reason within the issue actually argued and decided to interfere under Section 482 with the maintenance order affirmed on revision? The asserted absence of a Section 482 limitation period was a submission, not a separately decided issue. The amount of maintenance was expressly left unexamined because it was not challenged.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Magistrate's inability to accept proof of a particular temple ceremony was distinct from an affirmative finding that the parties were not legally married. The Court relied on the trial court's findings that they had lived as husband and wife for a considerable time and had a child. Kamala supplied the governing Section 125 standard: the summary remedy intended to prevent destitution does not demand the strict ceremonial proof required in other proceedings; sustained cohabitation as spouses may support a presumption of marriage for the claim. The presumption described in Kamala's quoted authorities is rebuttable, with Gokal Chand requiring attention to circumstances that undermine it. The present Court found no specific trial-court finding of non-marriage to displace the maintenance order. It did not resolve a case of a proved legal impediment, pronounce on the ultimate validity of a temple marriage for all legal purposes, or establish that childbirth by itself conclusively proves marriage. The applicant's assertions about age, caste, wealth, the prior criminal case and his work did not alter the identified marriage-status analysis. In light of Kamala, Chanmuniya, Badshah and the similar High Court decision cited, the Magistrate had committed no error in awarding maintenance. No further quantum analysis was warranted because the figure was not challenged.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The Magistrate's direction to pay Anita ₹1,500 per month, already affirmed in revision, remained undisturbed. The Court imposed no new condition, modification, costs or independent direction and expressed no separate decision on the quantum or the delay submission.

Headnote :- FIR registration — police inaction — statutory complaint remedy - An allegation that police have not registered an FIR does not, without more, warrant a direct Section 482 direction to investigate and register an FIR if an offence is found. Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was applied for the distinction between the police duty on cognizable information and the informant's recourse under Sections 190 and 200 CrPC when police fail to act. Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, supplied the remedies before the superior police officer and the Magistrate under Sections 154(3) and 156(3), with a prima facie Magistrate assessment and power to secure proper investigation. The Court dismissed the application with liberty to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS; it did not decide the merits of the proposed FIR.

High Court intervention — limits and exceptions - Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was considered for the distinction between ordinary police inaction, addressed through the Magistrate, and rare Article 226 intervention where mala fide exercise of investigative power is established and a clear case of abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII is made out; even an exceptional direction must insist on Code compliance rather than dictate the manner of investigation. The Division Bench ruling in Shweta Bhadauria treated alternate remedies as a ground to deny FIR mandamus, subject to the recognised Whirlpool exceptions, and distinguished Lalita Kumari's police-registration duty from an automatic right to High Court mandamus. The present order did not find an exceptional basis for direct intervention.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Shreepat Shakya complained to the police about persons whom he sought to have investigated and prosecuted. He asserted that the police had not registered an FIR despite the complaint. In Misc. Criminal Case No. 54768/2024 he invoked Section 482 CrPC before the High Court of Madhya Pradesh, Gwalior Bench, asking for a direction to investigate his application and, if an offence were found, register an FIR. His counsel relied on police inaction. The Public Prosecutor opposed the petition on the ground that the applicant could approach the trial Magistrate by private complaint under Section 200 CrPC, now Section 223 BNSS. There was no adjudication of the allegations' truth or of whether any cognizable offence actually arose.

The order does not identify the underlying transaction, the proposed accused, the contents of the police complaint or any prior approach to the Superintendent of Police.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted for two linked, distinct propositions. Police ought to register an FIR when disclosed facts show a cognizable offence; if police fail, the aggrieved person has the Code's Section 190 read with Section 200 Magistrate complaint route. Its discussion reconciled Ramesh Kumari's account of the police duty with the procedure for seeking a remedy in All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, Hari Singh and Minu Kumari. Those underlying cases and Lallan Chaudhary appear inside the quoted Aleque passage. Aleque had expressly left the underlying merits undecided, a distinction relevant to the present refusal to prejudge the proposed FIR.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for the ordinary Magistrate remedy under Sections 190 and 200 and the confined possibility of Article 226 directions in a rare case of clear mala fides, abuse and noncompliance with Chapter XII. Even then the court cannot prescribe how the police must investigate. Its quotation from Gangadhar explained that the Magistrate may inquire into a complaint, dismiss it under Section 203 if no offence is disclosed, take cognizance and issue process on a prima facie case, or direct investigation under the Code.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, was quoted for sequential access to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3) and the Magistrate under Section 156(3) if the FIR is still not registered or a proper investigation is not conducted. The Magistrate may, on the application, direct registration and investigation and monitor the investigation. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, restated that route instead of routine Article 226 petitions, subject to the Magistrate's prima facie satisfaction; its quoted passage allows Magistrate supervision and a recommendation to change an investigating officer where necessary, while stressing that the Magistrate does not investigate personally. The present Court relied on these remedial principles, not on a finding that an FIR was already required on Shreepat's unspecified allegations.

The Division Bench decision Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016, decided 20.12.2016, was quoted. It permits denial of FIR mandamus for failure to use Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200, subject to the four recognised exceptions discussed in Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1. It distinguished Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, on the police's statutory registration duty from the separate question of entitlement to High Court mandamus without first using alternative remedies. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari appear as part of the quoted Division Bench formulation.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was the provision invoked for direct High Court relief. Section 154 CrPC concerns police registration of cognizable information, with subsection (3) providing recourse to the Superintendent of Police; Section 156(3) permits a Magistrate to order investigation and, as the quoted authorities explain, oversee its proper conduct. Sections 190 and 200 CrPC provide the complaint/cognizance route before the Magistrate; the quoted Gangadhar passage also describes Section 203 dismissal if the complaint fails to disclose an offence. Section 223 BNSS, 2023, was identified by counsel and in the operative liberty as the current complaint provision corresponding to Section 200 CrPC. Article 226 was discussed in the cited authorities as a distinct writ jurisdiction, including its rare public-law exception, but the present application was styled under Section 482.

4. Issues : Whether the High Court should entertain this Section 482 application to compel the police to investigate and register an FIR conditionally when the applicant alleges police inaction, or require him to use the statutory remedies before the superior police officer and the Magistrate. A subsidiary distinction was between the police's duty to register cognizable information and the judicial remedy available to an informant when police allegedly fail. The underlying offence, factual merits and any exceptional mala fide or abuse justifying unusual writ intervention were not determined.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court framed the matter as the maintainability of a petition seeking a direction to the police to register an FIR. Aleque Padamsee recognises the duty of police to register when facts disclose a cognizable offence but directs an aggrieved informant facing police inaction to the Magistrate complaint procedure. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe supply the more specific Section 154(3)/156(3) route and the Magistrate's power, on prima facie satisfaction, to direct registration or proper investigation and monitor it. Divine Retreat Centre reserves exceptional Article 226 oversight for clearly established mala fide exercise of investigative power where a clear case of abuse of power and noncompliance with Chapter XII is made out, and confines even that oversight to lawful process. Shweta Bhadauria reinforces that Lalita Kumari's police duty does not itself establish a right to bypass statutory remedies by asking the High Court for FIR mandamus; its formulation recognises limited exceptions to the ordinary alternative-remedy principle. Applying this body of law to the relief Shreepat sought, the Court declined a direct High Court command and preserved the available Magistrate remedy. It made no finding on whether his unspecified police complaint satisfied the cognizable-offence threshold, whether any proposed accused committed an offence, or whether a Magistrate should ultimately direct investigation. The decision is a procedural forum ruling, not a merits dismissal of his allegations.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. Shreepat was expressly left free, if he wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC or Section 223 BNSS for redressal. No FIR, investigation, or police action was directly ordered; the Magistrate's future assessment was not prejudged.

Shreepat Shakya v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 54768/2024, 20/12/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Food adulteration — manufacturer added after shelf life — retesting prejudice — A 500 g packet of Kamdhenu Shuddh Ghee was sampled from a vendor on 17 March 2011; the Public Analyst reported adulteration on 11 April 2011. After the vendor's evidence and final arguments, he moved in August 2018 to add the stated manufacturer under Section 20A of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954. The sample's shelf life had ended in November 2011, while the manufacturer was brought into the proceedings in 2018 and charged on 7 May 2019. Section 13(2) gives a person receiving the analyst report a ten-day opportunity to seek analysis of the retained sample by the Central Food Laboratory. The Court found that this very late impleadment made the manufacturer's retesting right practically unavailable; the vendor had himself been acquitted following delayed supply of the analyst report near the sample's expiry. The summons and charge against the manufacturer were set aside.

Warranty — manufacturer–vendor link — Section 14 requires the prescribed written warranty accompanying sale to a vendor and treats a bill, cash memorandum or invoice from the manufacturer, distributor or dealer as such a warranty. The vendor produced no receipt connecting the applicant manufacturer to the sampled ghee, and no trial witness was said to implicate him. The Court treated the absent document as an additional defect in fixing him with responsibility, observing that adulteration could have occurred after supply. This was a finding on the record and statutory warranty route before the Court, not a blanket rule immunising every manufacturer whenever a retailer lacks a receipt. The vendor's earlier acquittal and the applicant's discharge are separate dispositions.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Shyam Agrawal challenged under Section 482 CrPC the Special Magistrate (Food Adulteration and Prevention Act), Bhopal's order of 7 May 2019 in Criminal Case No. 8439/2011, which framed a charge under Section 7(i) read with Section 16(1)(a)(i) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954. He described himself as manufacturer of Kamdhenu Shuddh Ghee and disputed any direct dealership or retail relationship with respondent 2. The Food Inspector had inspected that respondent's establishment on 17 March 2011 and purchased three 500 g ghee packets, among other foods, for ₹369. The Public Analyst's report dated 11 April 2011 treated the ghee sample as adulterated. After sanction under Section 20(1), a complaint was pursued against the vendor. The three prosecution witnesses and the vendor as defence witness were said not to implicate Agrawal. Final arguments in the vendor's trial were heard on 13 July 2018; judgment was deferred when the vendor was absent. On 3 August 2018 the vendor sought to join Agrawal as manufacturer under Section 20A. The order says notice to Agrawal was not received by him. On 18 December 2018 the trial court acquitted the vendor because the analyst report had been supplied to him only on 15 November 2011, with sample shelf life lasting only until November 2011, and permitted destruction of the sample under Section 18. The trial court nonetheless proceeded against Agrawal and framed charge in May 2019. He argued that his late addition destroyed the Section 13(2) opportunity for Central Laboratory retesting and that no Section 14 manufacturer-to-vendor receipt or warranty had been produced. Respondent 2 supported the trial court order.

After the final arguments of 13 July 2018, judgment had initially been fixed for 26 July 2018 but was deferred because the vendor was absent. An arrest warrant was subsequently issued against the applicant before the charge-framing order of 7 May 2019.

2. Statutes considered : Section 7(i) read with Section 16(1)(a)(i) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act supplied the charge the Magistrate framed. Under Section 13(2), after institution of prosecution the Local (Health) Authority must forward the adverse Public Analyst report to specified concerned persons and inform them of the ten-day right, on receipt, to apply to court for Central Food Laboratory analysis of the retained sample. The Court treated expiry of the sample's shelf life before the manufacturer, who was added later as an accused, could exercise that right as substantial procedural prejudice. Section 20A was the vendor's route to seek impleadment of a manufacturer during the existing prosecution; its use in 2018 could not restore an already lost practical retesting opportunity. Section 20(1) appeared in the account of sanction for the original prosecution. Section 14 requires a manufacturer, distributor or dealer selling to a vendor to give a written prescribed warranty; its proviso deems a bill, cash memorandum or invoice in respect of that sale to be a warranty. Section 18 appears in the vendor's earlier order permitting destruction of the sample. Section 482 CrPC was the High Court jurisdiction invoked to challenge the charge order.

3. Issues : (1) Did joining the stated manufacturer as an additional accused many years after the 2011 sampling, and after the sample's shelf life expired, deprive him of the effective Section 13(2) Central Laboratory retesting right and vitiate the subsequent charge? (2) Was a sufficient manufacturer–vendor documentary sale or warranty link shown under Section 14, given the absence of any receipt from the vendor and the possibility of adulteration after supply? (3) Could the order summoning the manufacturer and framing the charge survive those combined defects notwithstanding the earlier Public Analyst report and separate vendor prosecution? The Court was not asked to retest the sample or finally determine how, when and by whom adulteration in fact occurred.

4. Ratio / Findings : Reading Section 13(2), the Court identified a valuable procedural right to apply for analysis by the Central Food Laboratory. The analyst had reported in April 2011 and the ghee shelf life ended in November 2011; Agrawal was added only in 2018 and charged in 2019. A merely formal opportunity after expiry could not provide effective retesting, so the delayed addition impaired his valuable right. The vendor's earlier proceeding had itself resulted in acquittal because the analyst report was supplied late. Independently, the Court read Section 14 as requiring a written manufacturer/distributor/dealer warranty to the vendor, with a bill, cash memorandum or invoice deemed to fulfil it. Respondent 2 produced no receipt connecting the applicant to his purchase; the Court accordingly found that no warranty or indemnification link had been shown and noted that goods might be adulterated after supply. On the combination of a lost effective opportunity for retesting and an absent transaction record, it found error in summoning Agrawal and framing charge. The vendor's trial-court acquittal of 18 December 2018 is a procedural fact relevant to prejudice. The High Court reasoned directly from Sections 13(2) and 14 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, the dates of sampling, report, addition and charge, and the absence of a vendor purchase receipt.

5. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Section 482 application, set aside the Special Magistrate's order dated 7 May 2019 in Criminal Case No. 8439/2011, and discharged Agrawal. The earlier acquittal of the vendor is recorded as background and was not the direct order under challenge.

Shyam Agrawal v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 33063/2019, 20/02/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- POCSO Act — Section 7 — physical contact at charge stage - Section 7 requires physical contact with sexual intent and without penetration; the Supreme Court's Attorney General of India v. Satish, Criminal Appeal No. 1410/2021, decided 18.11.2021, rules that skin-to-skin contact is unnecessary. On allegations of possession of the minor girl's photographs and threats to post them, the High Court inferred some contact sufficient for a prima facie Section 7 charge under the limited charge standard. The particular contact and sexual intent were not finally proved.

IPC Section 354C — voyeurism — images and disclosure - The Court quoted Section 354C, including the private-act requirement and Explanation 2 on consent to capture without consent to third-party dissemination. The alleged threat to circulate photographs and the girl's Section 164 statement that images were sent to her father were held sufficient to sustain the charge prima facie.

Framing charge — material-based grave suspicion — limited revisional scrutiny - M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. CBI, (2020) 2 SCC 768, permits sifting the prosecution record and considering broad probabilities without a roving inquiry or assessment of probative value as at trial; it distinguishes suspicion from grave suspicion supported by material. Soma Chakravarty v. State through CBI, (2007) 5 SCC 403, requires judicial application of mind and a prima facie view, based on material, that the accused might have committed the offence, not proof beyond reasonable doubt. State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, (2020) 2 SCC 290, likewise confines evaluation to whether the material, taken at face value, discloses offence ingredients and gives rise to strong suspicion; State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, (2017) 3 SCC 198, applies that limit to Section 397 revision after charge. Applying these standards, the Court found no ground to interfere with the two contested charges and dismissed the revision.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A Special Judge under the POCSO Act at Gwalior framed charges against Shivam Sharma on 26.11.2021 in Special Sessions Trial No. 191/2021 under Sections 354C, 354D and 506 Part II IPC and Sections 7 read with 8 POCSO. Shivam sought revision under Sections 397 and 401 CrPC, expressly limiting his challenge to voyeurism under Section 354C and sexual assault under POCSO Sections 7–8. According to the FIR and statements recounted in the order, the approximately 16-year-old girl knew him from school for about a year. She alleged persistent harassment and stalking, proposals of marriage, and threats to kill her if she refused. She described his approaching and staring at her while driving near her and her elder sister on the way to a temple around 5 p.m. on 28.03.2021; she also alleged calls and messages and a threat to upload her video and photographs on social media. The allegations were reported to her father and an FIR followed. Counsel for Shivam argued that, even accepting the allegations, there was no physical contact under POCSO Section 7 and no Section 354C offence. The Court further referred to photographs said to be held by him and to the girl's Section 164 CrPC statement that images had been sent to her father. These remained prosecution allegations and charge-stage material, not findings after trial.

2. Precedents — Considered : Attorney General of India v. Satish, Criminal Appeal No. 1410/2021, judgment dated 18.11.2021, was invoked by the Court for the narrow Section 7 POCSO proposition that skin-to-skin contact is not required. The present order used that principle in addressing the applicant's objection that there was no physical contact; it does not dispense with Section 7's physical-contact and sexual-intent requirements.

M.E. Shivalingamurthy v. Central Bureau of Investigation, Bengaluru, (2020) 2 SCC 768, was extensively quoted for the charge/discharge threshold. It allows limited sifting of police statements and documents, attention to broad probabilities and basic infirmities, and discharge where only weak suspicion arises or the proposed prosecution proof taken at face value cannot disclose the offence. The judge is not a mere post office. At the same time, grave suspicion grounded in material can justify trial, without roving evaluation of probative value or a defence evidentiary trial. Its quotation referred to P. Vijayan; its separate discussion cited State of J&K v. Sudershan Chakkar and State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi on the prosecution record and the limits on accused-produced defence material at Section 227.

Soma Chakravarty v. State through CBI, (2007) 5 SCC 403, was quoted to distinguish a judicial view, based on material, that an accused might have committed an offence, enough for a charge, from proof beyond reasonable doubt needed to convict. It cautions that strong suspicion must rest on some materials and the court must apply its mind to the different accused where relevant. The High Court used its general standard.

State (NCT of Delhi) v. Shiv Charan Bansal, (2020) 2 SCC 290, was quoted for limited sifting and weighing to see whether face-value material discloses alleged offence ingredients, without a roving inquiry or meticulous assessment as at trial. Its passage referred to State of Bihar v. Ramesh Singh and Dipakbhai Jagdishchandra Patel on strong suspicion founded on material capable of becoming evidence, not a prediction of conviction. These authorities appear within the quoted Shiv Charan Bansal passage.

State of Rajasthan v. Fatehkaran Mehdu, (2017) 3 SCC 198, was applied for the restricted scope of revision under Section 397 after charges have been framed: the inquiry is whether strong suspicion is supported by material, not final proof or certain guilt. These four charge-stage authorities collectively informed refusal to interfere.

3. Statutes considered : Section 7 POCSO defines sexual assault by touching specified parts of a child's body with sexual intent, causing the child to touch such parts, or another act with sexual intent involving physical contact without penetration. Section 8 supplies punishment for that offence and was part of the challenged charge; the Court did not decide sentence. Section 354C IPC defines voyeurism by watching or capturing an image of a woman engaged in a private act in circumstances of expected privacy, or dissemination of such image; Explanation 1 elaborates "private act," and Explanation 2 treats dissemination without consent as an offence despite consent to capture. Sections 354D and 506 Part II IPC remained charges but were not substantively challenged or independently reviewed in the revision. Section 164 CrPC concerned the girl's recorded statement, referred to for the image allegation. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC governed the revision; the cited charge cases discussed Section 227 and Sections 227–228 standards. The Court did not make a final finding under any charged statute.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the applicant's no-physical-contact contention defeated, at charge stage, a Section 7 POCSO accusation despite the child's reported images and the controlling no-skin-to-skin rule. (ii) Whether the alleged threat to circulate images and the Section 164 account of sending them to her father sufficed to sustain a Section 354C charge, subject to its actual statutory private-act and dissemination ingredients. (iii) What degree of scrutiny and suspicion the revisional court may apply to the charge order without trying the prosecution evidence or determining guilt. The unchallenged stalking and intimidation charges and final credibility or guilt were not decided.

5. Ratio / Findings : On POCSO, the Court set out Section 7's physical-contact definition, recognised the applicant's argument that the narrated pursuit and threats included no direct contact allegation, and relied on his alleged possession of photographs to infer some contact. It cited Satish to reject any requirement of skin-to-skin contact and found a prima facie Section 7 charge. This was a provisional inference from the materials as described, not a final account of which act involved sexual contact.

On Section 354C, the Court quoted the definition and Explanations, then referred to the alleged threat to make images viral and the girl's statement that they had been sent to her father. It held the charge prima facie supportable. The charge was sustained at the prima facie stage; the statutory ingredients remained to be proved at trial.

For charge scrutiny, M.E. Shivalingamurthy, Soma Chakravarty, Shiv Charan Bansal and Fatehkaran Mehdu collectively require a foundation in actual prosecution material and grave suspicion, while prohibiting detailed merits inquiry and leaving proof sufficient for conviction to the trial. The Court determined that the allegations before it raised grave suspicion that Shivam might have committed the contested offences. It did not weigh defence proof as at trial or interfere with the Special Judge's charge order. The dismissal did not determine the final truth of the child's allegations or dispense with proof at trial of the essential elements of an offence.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal revision for want of a ground to interfere. The charge order dated 26.11.2021 continued, including the challenged Section 354C IPC and Sections 7–8 POCSO charges. The High Court did not convict, sentence, quash any charge, remand the matter, or issue further conditions. Sections 354D and 506 Part II IPC were present in the order below but not the subject of counsel's confined challenge.

Shivam Sharma v. State of M.P. and Others, Cr.R. no. 448/2022, 02/05/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Regular bail / prosecution sanction / stalled trial - Where sanction had not been received and, according to the CBI's own position, the trial could not proceed, the High Court held that a person could not remain in custody without progress in the trial merely because the investigating agency had not removed that impediment. The alleged corruption by a CBI inspector and the claimed recovery of ₹2 lakh were serious considerations, but the liberty concern justified temporary bail subject to a bond, appearance and surrender upon production of sanction. The Court expressly distinguished this basis from default bail under Section 167(2) CrPC or Section 187 BNSS. The reproduced Preeti Tilakwar order treated the timing of the charge-sheet in relation to that earlier bail request as immaterial to its liberty-based ground for bail.

Complainant intimation - The Court invoked Aparna Bhat v. State of M.P., (2021) 16 SCC 179, for sending notice of the grant of bail to the complainant.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Sushil Kumar Majoka, described in the order as an Inspector in the CBI, was arrested on 19 May 2024 in Crime No. RC 216-2024-A0004 of the CBI Anti-Corruption Branch/Unit-I, New Delhi. The prosecution alleged offences under Section 120-B IPC and Sections 7, 7-A, 8, 9, 10 and 12 of the Prevention of Corruption Act. In the Court's account when deciding bail, the applicant was involved in verification of nursing and paramedical colleges under High Court orders, allegedly demanded ₹2 lakh as illegal gratification and the money was recovered from his possession. These allegations and the Court's seriousness assessment were not a final finding of guilt. The applicant had remained in jail while the CBI filed a charge-sheet without obtaining prosecution sanction. His counsel argued that cognizance and further proceedings before the trial court were consequently blocked, and described the filing as potentially incomplete. The investigating officer acknowledged that sanction had not been received. The CBI sought an adjournment because the case diary had not been sent, although advance notice of the application had reached the agency on 22 October 2024. The Court heard the matter, deprecated the agency's handling of a detained accused's liberty, and reproduced its earlier order in Preeti Tilakwar concerning the same officer's conduct. The Director of CBI was asked to consider that conduct. Majoka's first regular bail application was decided on 25 October 2024.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court reproduced its order in Preeti Tilakwar v. Union of India, M.Cr.C. No. 28035/2024, principally so the Director of CBI could assess the investigating officer's conduct. In that reproduced order, the Court had distinguished a liberty-based bail request arising from the inability of the prosecution to proceed for want of sanction from statutory default bail, and had rejected the officer's argument based on whether the bail application preceded the charge-sheet. The reproduced order concerned another applicant, described there as a private person, and its separate bond terms and duration belonged to that earlier order; they did not govern Majoka's temporary bail. Aparna Bhat & Ors. v. State of M.P., Criminal Appeal No. 329/2021, reported in the order as (2021)

16 SCC 179, was invoked for the direction to intimate the complainant of the grant of bail. The name 'XYZ' in paragraph 25 is immediately corrected parenthetically to Aparna Bhat in the order.

3. Statutes considered : The application was presented as the first regular bail request under Section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 / Section 483 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023. The Court considered the absence of prosecution sanction as an impediment to cognizance and trial progress on the prosecution's own position. Section 167(2) CrPC / Section 187 BNSS was expressly distinguished: temporary release was granted because continued detention accompanied a stalled trial, not because the applicant had established the statutory default-bail entitlement. Section 120-B IPC and Sections 7, 7-A, 8, 9, 10 and 12 of the Prevention of Corruption Act were listed as alleged offences; their ingredients were not adjudicated.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the matter should be adjourned because the investigating agency had failed to send the case diary despite notice while the applicant remained in custody. (ii) Whether the applicant should continue in jail when sanction had not been obtained and, according to the prosecution's own stance, the trial could not progress, despite the gravity of the alleged corruption and recovery. (iii) Whether temporary release was justified by the stalled trial rather than statutory default-bail provisions, and what temporary release and surrender conditions were appropriate. The alleged legal incompleteness of the charge-sheet was raised by counsel. The investigating officer's conduct was separately referred to the Director of CBI for consideration.

5. Ratio / Findings : The CBI had been informed of the application but failed to place the case diary before the Court. The Court refused to let that omission dictate an adjournment affecting a detained person's liberty and heard the matter. The investigating officer conceded that prosecution sanction had not been obtained. The Court proceeded on the stated position that the trial could not, for the time being, advance because of that legal hurdle. It regarded the allegation of a CBI inspector exploiting a court-ordered college inspection and receiving ₹2 lakh as grave, yet held that gravity did not justify custody without progress in the trial. Temporary release addressed the lack of progress in the trial and preserved the ability to require surrender once sanction was produced. The Court did not grant default bail: Section 167(2) CrPC / Section 187 BNSS was expressly excluded as the basis. The reproduced Preeti Tilakwar order rejected the investigating officer's timing objection to that earlier bail application. The prior Preeti Tilakwar order was quoted for the Director's consideration of the investigating officer's conduct; it was not an independent disposition of Majoka's application.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application for temporary bail, requiring the applicant to surrender when the CBI produced prosecution sanction. Separately, the Director of CBI was directed to consider the investigating officer's conduct and whether he should remain in the agency. *Sushil Kumar Majoka v. Headnote :- Group murder and private defence — Two injured, related witnesses were found credible, and their accounts were supported by medical evidence despite peripheral inconsistencies. Four armed appellants jointly attacked after a grass dispute, causing fatal head wounds with sharp weapons and other injuries. Minor superficial injuries on accused, a cross-case and small site-plan differences did not establish complainant aggression, private defence or a false occurrence. No sudden fight or provocation sufficient to displace the finding of murder was established. The convictions under Section 302/34 and for the associated hurt offences, and the concurrent sentences including life imprisonment, were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Rambali and Ramveer encountered Gudda, Sangram, Kutaria and Kaptan over bundles of grass on 26 January 2011. The group used lathi, farsa, axe and luhangi; Rambali and intervening Rambai were injured and Ramveer suffered several head wounds from sharp weapons and also sustained skull fractures; he subsequently died. A cross-case reflected minor injuries on accused, who claimed complainant aggression, alibi, private defence and sudden provocation. The trial court imposed concurrent sentences of life imprisonment and imprisonment for the hurt offences.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab and later Supreme Court homicide authorities were discussed for intended bodily injury and Section 300 Thirdly. Jayabalan v. Union Territory of Pondicherry, Seeman v. State and Jodhan v. State of M.P. addressed injured and related testimony. Jai Dev v. State of Punjab, Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh and Sucha Singh v. State of Punjab addressed the duration and limits of private defence; Hare Krishna Singh v. State of Bihar concerned unexplained minor accused injuries. Other authorities on Sections 34 and 307 were canvassed as general principles.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 34, 96–102, 105, 299, 300, 302, 307, 323, 324 and 341; Evidence Act Section 8; CrPC Sections 174, 313 and 374.

4. Issues : Did witness interest, differences in site and roles, or alibi undermine proof of a joint fatal assault? Did accused injuries and the cross-case establish private defence? Could a grass dispute or old enmity reduce murder to culpable homicide?

5. Ratio / Findings : Rambali and Rambai were injured natural witnesses whose accounts were supported by the medical findings. Devendra's doubtful claimed presence and inconsistencies about Bholaram's minor wounds did not defeat the core account. The police plan located the event at the crossroads along the victims' route, and the Court did not require the first report to describe every blow. Alibi lacked substantial proof. Superficial accused injuries did not compel an inference that the complainant party was the aggressor, and the circumstances established did not justify the use of deadly force. Armed joint action and repeated blows to the head with sharp weapons proved common intention and murder; the evidence did not show a qualifying sudden fight or deprivation of self-control.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal. The convictions and concurrent sentences, including life imprisonment under Section 302/34, were affirmed. The bail of Gudda and Kaptan was cancelled and they were directed to surrender; steps were ordered to secure custody of Sangram and Kutaria, who were on parole.

Headnote :- Murder acquittal — Homicidal death was medically proved, but the child eyewitness on whose evidence the prosecution case ultimately depended gave inconsistent accounts of her school attendance, residence and the route to hospital. A school register showed repeated alteration from present to absent, and the asserted 4 p.m. incident could not be reconciled with the 7:35 p.m. FIR and the doctor's account that the injured was brought to hospital by police alone. The recovery of an axe did not corroborate the allegation that Gudda had used a lathi; seizure timing and forensic proof were weak. The benefit of doubt required the appellant's acquittal and release.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Keshav was assaulted on 26 October 2009 and died days later. His 12-year-old daughter Bharti reported that Gudda struck him with a lathi near a temple; the trial court disbelieved the other claimed eyewitness and a hearsay witness and convicted Gudda under Section 302. On appeal, the court examined Bharti's opportunity to witness the assault, a school attendance record, timing of FIR and hospital visit, the delayed site plan, and an axe recovered from Gudda.

2. Precedents — Considered : The disposition turned on appraisal of the trial evidence and reasonable doubt.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 302 and 34; CrPC Section 374.

4. Issues : Could the child's solitary account establish Gudda's identity and participation beyond reasonable doubt? Did the chronology of the first report and recovered axe supply independent support despite contradictions?

5. Ratio / Findings : The child first said she attended school until 5 p.m. but then denied attendance on the incident date, gave inconsistent residence accounts, and acknowledged being in Kurwai even before her father's death. The school register appeared altered from P to A for her alone across consecutive dates. Her version of an initial family trip to hospital conflicted with the doctor's account that police alone had brought the injured to hospital. The account of a 4 p.m. attack and a short journey was not reconciled with the 7:35 p.m. FIR and 7:45 p.m. examination; the map was made two days later. The recovery of an axe did not support the prosecution case: Gudda was alleged to have wielded a lathi, the seizure witness gave conflicting accounts of the time, and the forensic blood test was inconclusive. Homicidal death was established, but Gudda's responsibility for causing it was not proved.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal; the Section 302 conviction and life sentence were set aside. Gudda was acquitted and ordered to be released unless required in another case.

Gudda v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 347/2012, 20/07/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Sentence appeal — Even where an appellant states that he does not wish to contest the conviction and seeks reduction of the sentence to the period already undergone, the appellate court must examine the merits. Multiple witnesses and medical evidence proved a blow to the head with a lathi fitted with copper and injuries to an intervenor. Although Section 307 does not require a potentially fatal wound and the trial acquittal reasoning was unsound, no appeal against the acquittal had been filed and the court declined late suo motu notice. The passage of seventeen years did not justify reducing the concurrent one-year and three-month hurt terms.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Following a complaint about the cutting of forest wood, Gulabnath attacked Chokhelal with a copper-fitted lathi on the head and injured Chokhelal's father, Roop Singh, when he intervened in January 2007. The trial court acquitted him under Sections 307, 294 and 341 but convicted under Sections 324 and 323 with concurrent one-year and three-month terms. In 2023 the appellant stated that he would not contest the conviction and sought reduction to roughly one month already spent in custody.

2. Precedents — Considered : Nagpal Traders v. Davinder Singh, (2017) 11 SCC 431, discussing Jeetu v. State of Chhattisgarh, required merits review despite a concession on conviction. State of M.P. v. Harjeet Singh, (2019) 20 SCC 524, State of M.P. v. Kanha, (2019) 3 SCC 605, and State of M.P. v. Saleem, (2005) 5 SCC 554, set out Section 307's focus on intention and overt act rather than the fatality of the resulting injury.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 294, 307, 323, 324 and 341; CrPC Section 374.

4. Issues : Could the appeal be disposed of on the concession and custody served? Were the remaining hurt convictions and concurrent sentences justified? Did the Section 307 acquittal's doubtful reasoning warrant reopening without an acquittal appeal?

5. Ratio / Findings : Counsel's concession did not relieve the appellate court of examining evidence. The injured complainant, another injured witness and others consistently described the blow; bleeding, vomiting and dizziness were medically recorded. An injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death is not essential for Section 307, so the trial court's reason for acquittal was not approved. There was no appeal against that acquittal, however, and the Court declined to issue a suo motu notice after roughly 17 years. The sentences actually imposed under Sections 324 and 323 were already lenient for the proved attack and were not reduced to the period already undergone.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal against conviction. The existing concurrent sentences and fines were affirmed without changing the acquittal under Section 307. Bail was cancelled and the appellant was directed to surrender by 15 January 2024.

Headnote :- Dacoity with murder appeals — A temple caretaker died of grave head injuries, but the injured eyewitness changed the named attackers between the initial report and court testimony; his medical history referred to unknown thieves and no identification parade was held. The family members' evidence was hearsay, and another witness had a wage dispute. The presence of human blood without a determined blood group, coupled with unproved ownership of the seized articles, did not establish the attackers' identity. Homicidal death alone did not prove the five appellants' Section 396 participation. All convictions and life sentences were set aside.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Jagannath Maharaj and attendant Sunil were attacked at an ashram in December 2007 and property was said to be missing. Jagannath died from head injuries. Five appellants were convicted under Section 396 and sentenced to life imprisonment. Sunil was injured, but changed his account of the assailants; police recovered assorted articles, clothes and weapons, some bearing human blood. Defence counsel and later amicus failed to appear, so the appellate court reviewed the record and heard the State.

2. Precedents — Considered : Surya Baksh Singh v. State of U.P., (2014) 14 SCC 222, permitted merits disposal despite absent counsel. Ramvilas v. State of M.P., (2016) 16 SCC 316, and Raja Ram v. State of M.P., 1997 SCC (Cri) 908, addressed weight and limits of injured-witness evidence. Uma Shankar v. State of U.P., Vidyadharan v. State of Kerala and Akalu Ahir v. Ramdeo Ram informed careful scrutiny of enmity and false implication. Kansa Behra v. State of Orissa, (1987) 3 SCC 480, concerned inconclusive human-blood grouping.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 307, 323, 396 and 460.

4. Issues : Did Sunil's injury make his shifting assailant identification reliable? Could witnesses arriving after the event, blood whose group had not been determined or unproved ownership of seized goods establish the five appellants' Section 396 participation?

5. Ratio / Findings : The fatal skull injury proved homicide. Sunil's first report and police statement attributed his assault to Gorelal and Ramlal, while at trial he named Som Singh and Baliram without having named them earlier, without an identification parade and without explaining the change; he had told the doctor of unknown thieves. An injured witness deserves weight, but this material change in identifying his assailants made his account unreliable. Jagannath's sons lacked direct knowledge. Bhaskar's later sighting of two men and ear injury did not connect them to the ashram attack, especially amid a wage dispute. Human blood on some exhibits could not be assigned to the deceased without a blood group or other dependable link. Recovered items were never identified as the deceased's by his sons in court or by parade. The evidence taken together did not prove dacoity with murder beyond doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed both appeals; all five convictions under Section 396 and life sentences were set aside. The bail bonds of four appellants were discharged and Baliram was ordered to be released if not wanted in another matter.

Headnote :- Stolen property appeals — The court decided both conviction appeals on the record despite repeated nonappearance of defence counsel. Police evidence of Gurujlal's motorcycle seizure could be relied upon after careful scrutiny despite independent witnesses turning hostile; the matching chassis and engine numbers and his diary supported knowing possession. Lala, charged only with robbery under Section 394 and acquitted of it, could not be convicted instead under the uncharged Section 411, whose ingredients were different. Gurujlal's conviction stood, but his custodial sentence was reduced to about three months already served and the fine was enhanced; Lala was acquitted.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A complainant was waylaid and deprived of his motorcycle, phone, card and keys in May 2013. Police later seized the motorcycle and a diary from Gurujlal. The trial court convicted Gurujlal and Lala under Section 411, although Lala had been charged under Section 394 and acquitted of that charge. Both appealed. Their lawyers failed to appear at consecutive listings, so the court considered the record and State submissions.

2. Precedents — Considered : Suryabaksh Singh v. State of U.P., (2014) 14 SCC 222, supported deciding a criminal appeal on its record when counsel remained absent. Baldev Singh v. State of Haryana, (2015) 17 SCC 554, explained that a police witness's evidence can be relied on after careful scrutiny without an automatic independent-corroboration requirement.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 383, 390, 392, 394 and 411; CrPC Sections 215, 221 and 374; Evidence Act Section 73.

4. Issues : Did hostile seizure witnesses invalidate the proof of Gurujlal's possession? Could Lala's Section 411 conviction stand despite absence of that charge and his acquittal under Section 394? What punishment remained appropriate for Gurujlal a decade later?

5. Ratio / Findings : Police evidence was not rejected merely for official status. The chassis and engine numbers of the seized motorcycle matched those of the complainant's motorcycle; Gurujlal's seized diary noted a mortgage by Naresh and Lala; the trial court's Section 73 comparison attributed the entries to his handwriting, and he offered no explanation for possession. His conviction for receiving stolen property was sustained. Lala was charged with robbery, whose elements, on the allegations of extortion in this case, differed from those of receiving stolen property; no charge under Section 411 had been framed, even in the alternative, and the absence of that charge was not a harmless irregularity. For Gurujlal, the Court noted that Section 411 prescribed no minimum term, that no criminal history had been placed on record and that about three months had been served; the fine was increased to reflect dealing in stolen goods.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court set aside Lala's conviction and sentence under Section 411 and acquitted him. Gurujlal's conviction was affirmed, his custodial sentence was reduced to the period already undergone and the fine was raised to ₹5,000, payable within three months of the judgment; failure to pay would revive the original one-year term of rigorous imprisonment. The appeals were allowed to those extents.

Headnote :- Ransom kidnapping and murder — A skeleton recovered on Gyani's disclosure from beneath stones in a remote hill area was identified by DNA as the missing 19-year-old. The Court rejected the suggestion of an animal attack because the remains had been concealed and bore no animal bite marks. A ₹6 lakh ransom letter seized well before Mahendra's arrest was matched to his handwriting. Those circumstances, with ransom communications and missing-person evidence, formed a complete chain supporting Sections 364-A, 302 and 201 convictions with special Act provisions. The life sentences were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Brajesh Kumar, 19, went for yoga in November 2007 and vanished. His father received ransom calls and a letter demanding ₹6 lakh. Police later recovered hidden skeletal remains after Gyani's disclosure; DNA testing identified the remains as those of the parents' biological son. A handwriting expert attributed the seized ransom letter to Mahendra. The trial court convicted both of kidnapping for ransom, murder and concealment, with the applicable Madhya Pradesh dacoity/kidnapping special Act provisions, while three co-accused were acquitted.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of H.P. v. Jeet Singh, (1999) 4 SCC 370, Gurjinder Singh v. State of Punjab, (2011) 3 SCC 530, Asar Mohd. v. State of U.P., (2019) 12 SCC 253, Sunder v. State and Anuj Kumar Gupta v. State of Bihar discussed discovery of a body and the probative value of knowledge of its location. Sharad Birdhichand Sarda v. State of Maharashtra, (1984) 4 SCC 116, governed a complete circumstantial chain.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 201, 302, 364-A, 365 and 120-B; Madhya Pradesh Dakaiti Aur Vyapharan Prabhavit Kshetra Adhiniyam Sections 11/13; Evidence Act Sections 8 and 27; CrPC Sections 174, 313 and 374.

4. Issues : Was the skeleton Brajesh's and was its discovery on Gyani's information incriminating despite an open hill location? Was the death consistent with an animal attack? Did a letter already seized before Mahendra's arrest prove the ransom connection, and was the circumstantial chain complete?

5. Ratio / Findings : DNA testing established that the remains were those of the biological son of both parents. Remains concealed under stones in a remote place were discovered at Gyani's instance; he offered no convincing innocent explanation for knowing the spot. The panchas' suggestion of an animal attack, which the Court regarded as casual, was unsupported by bite marks and could not account for deliberate concealment. Mahendra's handwriting matched the ransom letter, which police had seized long before his arrest. The call and letter sequence, discovery, DNA and concealment collectively excluded a reasonable innocent hypothesis.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal. The convictions under Sections 364-A and 302 IPC read with Sections 11/13 of the special Act, and under Section 201 IPC, were affirmed, as were the life sentences. The trial court was directed to issue perpetual arrest warrants following the reported failure to return from parole.

Headnote :- Dowry death appeal — Conflicting evidence about the period since marriage failed to prove death within seven years of marriage, so the Section 113B presumption did not arise. Allegations of ₹10,000 and gold demands lacked dates and proof of cruelty soon before death. The family informed neighbours and parents and waited for the deceased's mother before cremation; the asserted suppression of post-mortem and evidence was unproved. The convictions under Sections 304B, 498A and 201/34 were set aside.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Chanderbai died at her matrimonial home in July 1994 and was cremated without post-mortem. Her mother later alleged injuries, a demand for ₹10,000 and two tolas of gold, and hasty last rites. The trial court convicted her husband and relatives under Sections 304B, 498A and 201/34. One appellant died pending appeal and his appeal abated. The surviving appellants disputed the marriage period, alleged cruelty and suppression.

2. Precedents — Considered : Rajaram v. State of Rajasthan concerned use of an unchallenged prosecution witness. Baijnath v. State of Madhya Pradesh, (2017) 1 SCC 101, and Bakshish Ram v. State of Punjab, (2013) 4 SCC 131, explained foundational proof of proximate dowry cruelty before the Section 113B presumption and the appellate court's duty to assess facts independently.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 176, 201/34, 304B and 498A; Evidence Act Section 113B; CrPC Section 374.

4. Issues : Was death within seven years of marriage proved, and was dowry-linked cruelty established soon before it? Did cremation without autopsy and the relatives' conduct prove destruction of evidence?

5. Ratio / Findings : The mother's six-year estimate and uncle's 11–12-year account did not establish marriage within seven years; the unconfronted prior statement of the mother could not supply proof. Alleged demands were not tied to a reliable time or incident, and several witnesses did not support them. The presumption could not substitute for those foundational facts, nor was Section 498A cruelty independently proved. Neighbours and parents were informed, and the last rites were performed only after the mother arrived; no credible proof supported the claimed ignored post-mortem objection or concealment. The prosecution failed to prove any of the charges beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the surviving appellants' appeal. Their convictions and sentences under Sections 304B, 498A and 201/34 were set aside, and their bail bonds were discharged. The deceased appellant's appeal had abated.

Hakamsingh and Others v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 594/1999, 21/08/2018, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Unlawful assembly murder appeal — Evidence identifying the armed attackers in examination-in-chief was not automatically rendered unreliable by recantations in cross-examination after a break of ten months or overnight, where the record indicated that the witnesses had been influenced. An omission from a police statement could not be used without drawing the witness's attention to it as required by Section 145. The injured widow knew the accused as neighbours and had an opportunity to identify them even in poor evening light. The circumstances of her treatment explained the delay in giving her police statement. Medical evidence and the evidence of witnesses found reliable sustained the murder and hurt convictions under Section 149 and the life terms.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Due to old enmity, eight persons attacked Kashiram's family in October 2009. Kashiram was chased and fatally assaulted on the head. Goverdhan suffered jaw and leg fractures, and Santosh and Bandrobai were also injured. Six appellants challenged their convictions and sentences. The judgment's opening sentencing table records two counts under Section 302/149, along with the hurt offences, and states that all sentences shall run concurrently. Two other accused were held guilty but absconded before sentence could be imposed. Several witnesses turned hostile or changed their evidence after adjournments.

2. Precedents — Considered : Khujji v. State of M.P., (1991) 3 SCC 627, supported scrutiny of a witness's attempt to resile from examination-in-chief during cross-examination held after a delay. V.K. Mishra v. State of Uttarakhand and Tahsildar Singh v. State of U.P. governed the proof of omissions by drawing the witness's attention to the relevant part of the previous statement as required by Section 145 of the Evidence Act. State of U.P. v. Naresh, (2011) 4 SCC 324, concerned the weight to be given to the evidence of an injured witness. Ramesh v. State by Madhugiri Police, (2010) 15 SCC 49, addressed the identification of familiar neighbours when there was less light in the evening.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 148, 302/149, 307/149, 325/149, 323/149 and 506; Arms Act Sections 25/27; Evidence Act Section 145; CrPC Sections 161, 162 and 374.

4. Issues : Could the witnesses' initial accounts be relied on after they resiled from them in cross-examination held after a delay? Had an omission from a police statement been proved by drawing the witness's attention to it? Could the injured widow have seen and identified the familiar assailants in darkness, and did the delays or the fact that other witnesses had turned hostile defeat the case under Section 149?

5. Ratio / Findings : Sanju gave a direct account supporting the prosecution case in examination-in-chief but resiled from that evidence in cross-examination ten months later. The record contained circumstances indicating that he had been won over during that period, and the Court disregarded the later recantation. The defence had not drawn his attention to the relevant omission from his police statement as Section 145 required; that omission could not therefore be used against the prosecution. Gyarsi's evidence that the accused were present at the spot with weapons was found reliable despite his change of testimony the next day. His improved account that he had witnessed the fight was excluded because he had been confronted with the relevant omission and it had been proved. Bandrobai was an injured witness who knew the accused as neighbours. Her route to the spot and the nearby line of sight gave her an opportunity to witness the incident. The treatment of her family members and her bereavement explained the delay in recording her police statement. The medical evidence of the injuries and other eyewitness evidence accepted by the Court established the joint attack, even though some injured victims did not support the prosecution case.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the murder and hurt convictions and the sentences awarded by the trial court, including the concurrent life terms for two murder counts recorded in the judgment's opening sentencing table. Halkai's bail bonds were cancelled, and he was directed to surrender to undergo the remaining jail sentence. The other appellants were to undergo their remaining sentences. The trial court was directed to take coercive steps to secure the arrest of the absconding accused.

Halkai and Others v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 76/2012, 07/07/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Compromise quashing — Although the minor and her father voluntarily entered into a compromise with the accused, the allegations concerned about two years of stalking, catching hold of her hand in public and threats to kill her or throw acid on her. The POCSO charges could not be compounded, and the alleged sustained conduct constituted an offence affecting the girl's dignity and public interest. The High Court refused to quash the pending criminal and POCSO proceedings under Section 482.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : A 17-year-old girl reported that Hani Sharma had stalked and harassed her for about two years, caught her hand in public during a holiday visit and threatened to kill her and throw acid on her if she reported the incident. A charge sheet had been filed under the IPC and POCSO provisions, and the trial was pending. The trial court rejected an application for compounding; the High Court registrar subsequently verified that the victim, her father and the accused had entered into a voluntary compromise.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court assessed whether the proceedings could be quashed on the basis of compromise in light of the specific allegations and the non-compoundable POCSO charges.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 354, 354D and 506; POCSO Act Sections 7, 8, 11 and 12; CrPC Sections 320 and 482.

4. Issues : Should the verified settlement end the prosecution for alleged continuing stalking and sexual harassment of a minor?

5. Ratio / Findings : The registrar found the compromise voluntary, but the child merely stated that she had now compromised the matter. The FIR alleged continuing harassment during her school years and renewed physical misbehaviour and grave threats after she had moved away. In view of the non-compoundable POCSO charges and society's interest in a minor's dignity and safety, the Court held that the proceedings could not appropriately be quashed on the basis of compromise in exercise of its inherent powers.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application; the criminal trial remained pending.

Hani Sharma v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 58525/2021, 14/01/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Electricity prosecution quashing — The complaint alleged not only unpaid consumption dues but also illegal reconnection after the supply had been disconnected. The applicant was alone in the house during inspection, and her claim that only her husband occupied the official residence involved disputed facts. The uncontroverted allegations in the complaint disclosed a prima facie offence under the Electricity Act. The Court therefore refused to quash the proceedings, leaving the trial court to determine the merits fully.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Electricity dues of ₹1,47,641 had accrued on a connection in the name of an earlier allottee of the official accommodation. The company disconnected the supply on 4 December 2020 and alleged that an inspection on 5 April 2021 revealed that it had been illegally reconnected. Hansraja, who was alone in the house during the inspection, argued that she visited only occasionally and that the accommodation was allotted to her husband. She sought to quash the complaint under Section 138 of the Electricity Act.

2. Precedents — Considered : Supreme Court decisions on quashing, including Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718, and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, were cited in support of examining the uncontroverted allegations rather than disputed defence evidence at this stage.

3. Statutes considered : Electricity Act, 2003 Section 138; CrPC Section 482; BNSS, 2023 Section 528.

4. Issues : Did the complaint allege more than unpaid bills? Could a factual claim about the husband's allotment and applicant's residence negate the prima facie case in inherent jurisdiction?

5. Ratio / Findings : The allegations of disconnection followed by unlawful reconnection and use disclosed a prima facie offence, rather than a mere dispute over payment. Hansraja conceded that she was alone in the house at the time of inspection, and there was no pleading or proof of her husband's exclusive possession. These disputed facts concerning residence could not be adjudicated under Section 482/528. The Court expressed only a preliminary view and left the merits for trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the quashing application; the special complaint proceedings remained to be tried on the evidence.

Headnote :- Oral dying declaration and molestation appeal — The prosecution produced only an unexhibited copy of the hospital notes and did not examine the doctor who had recorded the alleged account and could assess the severely burnt patient's ability to speak. The relatives' testimony could not be rejected merely because of their relationship with the deceased, but omissions from earlier statements and a disputed, delayed police statement undermined their accounts of the oral dying declarations. The appellant had already been acquitted of rape and abetment, and the remaining conviction under Section 354 could not stand on the evidence. The appeal was allowed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Lalita Bai sustained severe kerosene burns and died after an alleged sexual assault during a visit to the forest. Her husband, son and brothers spoke of disclosures made in hospital. The trial court acquitted Hari Narayan under Sections 376 and 306 but convicted him under Section 354 and sentenced him to one year's imprisonment. The original bed-head ticket was not produced, and the doctor who reportedly recorded the hospital history was not examined, despite opportunities.

2. Precedents — Considered : Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi) and other Supreme Court authorities explained that relationship with a victim does not, by itself, make a witness interested or justify rejection of the testimony. Sadhu Saran Singh v. State of U.P., (2016) 4 SCC 357, addressed the non-examination of independent witnesses. Here, however, the failure to produce the treating doctor and original record left an essential gap in the evidence.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 306, 354 and 376; CrPC Sections 161 and 374.

4. Issues : Could the relatives' oral accounts support a conviction under Section 354 when the original medical notes, treating doctor and proof of the dying woman's fitness were absent? Were their earlier statements sufficiently consistent to prove the declaration and the alleged molestation beyond reasonable doubt?

5. Ratio / Findings : The family members' presence in hospital was natural, and their relationship with the deceased did not, by itself, discredit their testimony. Nevertheless, the prosecution failed to prove the original clinical notes or examine the doctor who could address the deceased's capacity to make a statement shortly before her death. An unexhibited photocopy produced by the prosecution could not be used against the accused. One brother had stated earlier that she was already dead when he arrived, another had omitted any disclosure from his earlier statements, and a third's delayed police statement was disputed. The son had not himself heard any statement. The husband's statement remained insufficient in view of the acquittal on the rape charge and the other gaps in the evidence. The alleged act under Section 354 was not proved beyond reasonable doubt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal, set aside the conviction under Section 354 and the one-year sentence, acquitted the appellant and discharged the bail bonds.

Headnote :- Post-appeal sentence challenge — The trial court convicted the applicants of cruelty and dowry death. On appeal, they were acquitted of dowry death, but their conviction for cruelty and the existing one-year sentence were affirmed. A fresh hearing on sentence under Section 235(2) is required when an appellate court converts an acquittal into a conviction or proposes to enhance the sentence. Mere affirmation of the trial court's conviction and sentence did not require such a hearing. The application under Section 482 seeking probation or a reduction of sentence to the period already undergone was dismissed. The interim order was vacated, and the applicants were directed to surrender.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The trial court sentenced the applicants for offences under Sections 498A and 304B of the IPC. In their earlier appeal, they were acquitted of dowry death, but their conviction under Section 498A and the one-year sentence were affirmed. They then applied under Section 482 for probation or a reduction of sentence to the period already undergone, alleging that the appellate court had not heard them separately on sentence.

2. Precedents — Considered : Shankar Kerba Jadhav v. State of Maharashtra, (1969) 2 SCC 793, addressed notice and hearing where the accused participates in the appeal. Fedrick Cutinha v. State of Karnataka, 2023 INSC 384, required an opportunity of hearing on sentence when the appellate court convicted persons who had been acquitted. Narayan Singh v. State of M.P., 1989 MPLJ 298, similarly concerned reversal of an acquittal.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 304B and 498A; CrPC Sections 235(2), 360 and 482; the applicants sought the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act.

4. Issues : Did partial acquittal, coupled with affirmation of the existing sentence for cruelty, require a fresh appellate hearing on sentence and permit alteration of that sentence after the appeal through inherent jurisdiction?

5. Ratio / Findings : The earlier appellate court had neither convicted an acquitted person for the first time under Section 498A nor enhanced the trial court's sentence. Authorities requiring an opportunity of hearing when a conviction is recorded for the first time on appeal were therefore distinguishable. Affirmation of the one-year sentence did not require a second hearing under Section 235(2). Accordingly, the asserted procedural ground for granting probation or reducing the sentence to the period already undergone failed.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application, vacated the interim order and directed the applicants to surrender to undergo the remaining sentence.

Headnote :- Police-recorded dying declaration — After first aid, the shooting victim, who was conscious though restless, dictated a Dehati Nalishi. The officer read it back to him and obtained his thumb impression. The doctor's statement that the victim could not speak at an earlier examination was considered alongside the MLC and the officer's evidence of their conversation; a formal medical certificate was not invariably required. On the victim's death, the report became admissible under Section 32, even though it had formed the basis of the FIR. The pellet injuries and firearm evidence corroborated the declaration despite many witnesses turning hostile. The convictions for murder and offences under the Arms Act were affirmed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pritam Singh sustained injuries from a .12-bore firearm in July 2008. The police took him for immediate treatment and then recorded his Dehati Nalishi, obtained his thumb impression and registered the FIR on that basis. He died after being transferred. Many civilian witnesses turned hostile. Harimohan was convicted of murder and offences under Sections 25 and 27 of the Arms Act and sentenced to life imprisonment and three-year terms, to run concurrently. He challenged the victim's capacity to speak.

2. Precedents — Considered : Laxman v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 6 SCC 710, rejected an inflexible requirement of formal medical certification where fitness is otherwise established. Dharam Pal v. State of U.P., (2008) 17 SCC 337, supported treating a report dictated by the victim as a dying declaration after his death. Dayal Singh v. State of Uttaranchal, (2012) 8 SCC 263, supported an overall assessment of the evidence despite an adverse answer by a prosecution witness.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Section 302; Arms Act Sections 25 and 27; Evidence Act Section 32(1); CrPC Section 374.

4. Issues : Was the deceased fit to make the Dehati Nalishi recorded by the police despite the doctor's contrary answer in cross-examination? Could that report be used as a dying declaration, and did it prove guilt despite the hostile witnesses?

5. Ratio / Findings : The MLC described Pritam as conscious but restless. The officer spoke with him during transport, gave priority to treatment, and then recorded his statement and read it back to him. The officer's account was not effectively challenged as to the victim's ability to speak or mental fitness at that time. The doctor's answer concerning his earlier examination did not conclusively negate the victim's later capacity to make the statement. After the victim died from the documented pellet wounds, his account of the circumstances resulting in his death became admissible under Section 32. The medical evidence of gunshot injuries, the seized country-made gun found to be in working condition, and the official witnesses' testimony supported the declaration and established guilt of murder and the Arms Act offences.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the life sentence under Section 302, the convictions under the Arms Act and the concurrent terms of imprisonment.

Headnote :- State and complainant appeals against acquittal — Three people were killed in an ambush by several gunmen using vehicles. Umesh directly identified Dinesh as an armed participant. His relationship with Sughar Singh, the nine-day delay in recording his police statement that was not explored in cross-examination, minor differences in the sequence of events, and non-recovery of the gun nearly 21 months later did not discredit his account. Hariom corroborated the occurrence, but his evidence as to Dinesh's identity was hearsay. Injured witness Yuvraj proved the manner of the attack, but did not identify the assailants. The High Court held that the trial court's acquittal rested on an erroneous appraisal of the evidence. It reversed the acquittal in respect of the three murder charges under Section 302 read with Section 149 and rioting, while affirming the acquittal under Section 307. Life terms were imposed after a hearing on sentence.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In July 2006, armed men using a Scorpio and a motorcycle surrounded councillor Sughar Singh's Safari vehicle and fired at it amid political enmity. Sughar Singh, driver Jagdish and bystander Sintu died; Yuvraj survived. Dinesh Singh Yadav was arrested nearly 21 months later, tried separately and acquitted. The State and the complainant appealed. The High Court re-examined Umesh's eyewitness identification, the accounts of Hariom and Yuvraj, the timing of the first report and site plan, and the non-recovery of the gun.

2. Precedents — Considered : Supreme Court decisions on review of acquittals discussed the rule applicable where two views are possible and intervention where findings are contrary to credible evidence. V.K. Mishra v. State of Uttarakhand, (2015) 9 SCC 588, John Pandian v. State and Sheo Shankar Singh v. State of Jharkhand addressed delayed statements under Section 161. Rakesh v. State of U.P., (2021) 7 SCC 188, and Krishna Gope v. State of Bihar concerned non-recovery of weapons. Sambhu Das v. State of Assam discussed measures taken at the scene before registration of the FIR.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 120B, 147, 148, 149, 302 and 307; Arms Act Sections 25/27; CrPC Sections 157, 161 and 162.

4. Issues : Was the trial court's acquittal based on a reasonably possible view of the evidence? Could Umesh, a relative, reliably identify Dinesh despite the delay in recording his statement, the omission of his name from the first report and his taking cover? Did preliminary preservation of the scene before registration of the formal FIR and non-recovery of Dinesh's gun undermine proof of guilt? What sentence should follow reversal of the acquittal?

5. Ratio / Findings : Umesh described Dinesh firing as a member of the unlawful assembly and had seen the attack begin under streetlight before taking cover. His relationship with Sughar Singh did not discredit his testimony; the defence had not asked him or the investigator to explain the nine-day delay in recording his statement. Hariom's account supported the occurrence, but his knowledge of Dinesh's identity came from Umesh. Injured witness Yuvraj supported the manner of the attack, although he turned hostile on identity. Hariom's immediate departure for hospital with his brother explained the absence of his signature on the early spot map, which mainly recorded conditions visible at the scene. Under Section 162, details in the site plan based on information supplied by witnesses could be used only for omissions or contradictions, while the investigator's own observations were admissible. Protective seizures following cryptic telephonic information did not invalidate the FIR registered later. The prolonged abscondence explained the non-recovery of the firearm, and recovery was not essential in the face of trustworthy direct evidence. The High Court held that the trial court had rejected this evidence on flimsy grounds. The three murders through firing in furtherance of the common object, and rioting with deadly weapons, were proved. The evidence of Yuvraj's injuries was insufficient to sustain a conviction under Section 307.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the State's and the complainant's appeals in part. Dinesh was convicted under Section 302/149 on three counts and under Sections 147 and 148. No separate sentence was imposed under Section 147, as it was the lesser offence. His acquittal under Section 307 was affirmed. After a separate hearing on sentence, the Court imposed life imprisonment and a fine of ₹15,000 on each murder count, and one year's imprisonment under Section 148, with all sentences to run concurrently. His bail was cancelled, and he was directed to surrender.

Headnote :- Fratricide appeal — The victim's own signed FIR, recorded the next morning before he died on the way to hospital, was treated as a dying declaration concerning the fatal transaction. His wife consistently testified that Hariram restrained his arms while Veer Singh struck his head with an axe; the autopsy revealed a depressed skull fracture and brain injury. Several family members and local witnesses turned hostile, but reliable direct evidence did not require a particular number of corroborating witnesses. The overnight reporting interval and absence of bloodstains on the recovered axe did not establish an accidental fall. The convictions under Section 302 and Section 302 read with Section 34 were affirmed, as were the life sentences.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Brothers Hariram and Veer Singh had a dispute with Shishupal over land and a tractor. On the evening of 15 December 2010, Shishupal's wife Rajkumari saw Hariram hold Shishupal's hands while Veer Singh struck his head and eye with an axe. Shishupal reported the incident the next morning, underwent medical examination and died during transfer. The trial court convicted Veer Singh under Section 302 and Hariram under Section 302/34 and sentenced each to life imprisonment. Several family members and local witnesses later suggested an accidental fall or turned hostile.

2. Precedents — Considered : The judgment discussed Supreme Court authorities on clause Thirdly of Section 300 and on Section 34, including Jasdeep Singh alias Jassu v. State of Punjab, concerning constructive liability arising from a common intention. It applied the established principles that the quality of evidence, rather than the number of witnesses, is decisive and that the timing of the FIR must be assessed in context.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 34, 299, 300 and 302; Evidence Act Section 27; CrPC Sections 161, 174, 313 and 374.

4. Issues : Did the hostile witnesses' accounts and the delay until the next morning in lodging the FIR undermine the wife's eyewitness account? Could the deceased's own report be used after his death? Did Hariram's act of restraint establish common intention, and was the theory of an accidental fall reasonably supported?

5. Ratio / Findings : Rajkumari's testimony remained consistent and was corroborated by Shishupal's written report made the next morning, which was proved by the officer who recorded it. After Shishupal's death, his report concerning the fatal transaction was treated as a dying declaration. The incident occurred at night, and the police station was about 20 km away; the timing of the report was therefore assessed in light of the circumstances concerning transport and treatment. The autopsy revealed extensive skull and brain injuries consistent with the account of the assault. The hostile witnesses' accounts, including the child's admission that his account of a fall had been coached, did not displace the reliable evidence. Hariram intentionally restrained the victim while Veer Singh delivered the fatal blow, attracting Section 34. Although the recovered axe had no bloodstains, the direct testimony and medical evidence were sufficient.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the appeal and affirmed the murder convictions and life sentences. Hariram's bail was cancelled, and he was directed to surrender; Veer Singh remained in prison.

Hariram and Another v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 408/2012, 27/07/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Private complaint and process — A complainant alleged that his brother-in-law induced him to invest ₹10,000 by promising ₹8.25 lakh at maturity and supplied a receipt and certificate. The revisional court wrongly required examination of attesting witnesses to prove a receipt that did not require attestation by law. It also wrongly required a detailed inquiry into the certificate's authenticity before process could be issued. The complaint and supporting statements provided sufficient prima facie grounds for proceeding under Sections 200–204. The revisional remand was set aside, and the Magistrate was directed to proceed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Hariram alleged that Harnarayan persuaded him in 1997 to pay ₹10,000 into a forest-company scheme promising ₹8.25 lakh after twenty years. He relied on a signed receipt, witnesses and a Teak Certificate; the promised sum was not paid. The Magistrate issued process under Section 420. The revisional court set that order aside and remanded the matter for examination of the receipt's attesting witnesses and an inquiry into the certificate. Hariram challenged the remand.

2. Precedents — Considered : Shivjee Singh v. Nagendra Tiwary, (2010) 7 SCC 578, and the authorities it discussed, including Chandra Deo Singh and Kewal Krishan, explained that Sections 203–204 require sufficient prima facie grounds rather than proof sufficient for conviction or an inquiry equivalent to a full trial.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 420, 467, 468, 471 and 506B; CrPC Sections 200, 202, 203, 204 and 482; Evidence Act Sections 64, 65, 71 and 72.

4. Issues : Was examination of attesting witnesses legally necessary to rely on the receipt? Must a Magistrate fully investigate a possibly forged certificate before finding sufficient ground to proceed on a cheating complaint?

5. Ratio / Findings : A receipt that is not required by law to be attested can be proved as if it were unattested under Section 72. Witnesses described the payment and the promised return. If the Teak Certificate was found to be forged, that would provide additional evidence at trial, but such a finding was not a condition for issuing process. The Magistrate's task was to determine whether the complaint materials disclosed prima facie grounds for proceeding, rather than to weigh the evidence as though deciding guilt. The revisional court imposed an erroneous evidentiary prerequisite and required an unduly detailed inquiry.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Section 482 application, set aside the revisional order and directed the trial Magistrate to proceed with the complaint. No final finding on guilt was made.

Hariram v. Harnarayan, M.Cr.C. no. 38325/2022, 28/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Civil and criminal proceedings / forged affidavit in pending title litigation - M.S. Sheriff v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 SC 397, was applied for the ordinary precedence of criminal proceedings in the interest of timely justice, while rejecting a rigid rule and requiring consideration of the likelihood of embarrassment. M. Krishnan v. Vijay Singh, AIR 2001 SC 3014, requires independent proof of forgery in criminal court and rejects quashing merely because a civil suit concerns the document; Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of West Bengal, AIR 2001 SC 3846, and P. Swaroopa Rani v. M. Hari Narayana, (2008) 5 SCC 765, likewise permit parallel proceedings, with any stay depending on the circumstances. The pending second appeal and civil character of the land dispute did not justify rejecting the complaint alleging a forged affidavit.

Civil judgment findings / independent criminal proof / limited relevance - Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Administration), (2009) 5 SCC 528, and K.G. Premshanker v. Inspector of Police, (2002) 8 SCC 87, reproduced within it, were explained: a prior civil judgment's relevance is tested under Evidence Act Sections 40–43 and is generally not conclusive except to the extent specified in Section 41; the court determines its effect in context. Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, (2010) 8 SCC 775, explains the differing civil and criminal proof standards, rejects automatic binding effect and discusses the incompatibility of the earlier Karam Chand dictum and V.M. Shah with the controlling authorities. A civil court's disbelief of the affidavit without a forgery finding neither resolves the criminal allegation nor prevents its independent examination.

Court-complaint bar / pre-existing forged document filed in court - Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, (2005) 4 SCC 370, was applied: Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC applies to the specified offences committed in relation to a document after it has been produced in court and while it is in the court's custody. An allegation that respondents filed an affidavit forged before its production in court therefore did not require a complaint by the civil court; a Section 200 private complaint was maintainable at this threshold. The Court did not adjudicate whether the affidavit was in fact forged.

Private complaint / Section 203 dismissal / inherent correction - The Magistrate and revisional court erred in rejecting the forgery complaint at the outset because a civil suit was pending, no complaint had been made by the court and the civil court had not declared the document forged. Both orders were set aside under Section 482 CrPC and the matter remanded for lawful further proceedings, without an order to summon respondents or a final finding on offence ingredients.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Kailash brought a civil suit for declaration of title and permanent injunction over agricultural land, survey Nos. 307 (0.836 hectares) and 308 (0.251 hectares), in village Garethi, Tahsil Isagarh, Ashoknagar. Respondents 1–6 filed a copy of an affidavit attributed to him, dated 18 June 2001, stating that a sale deed executed by his father was security for a loan rather than an outright sale. Kailash denied executing it and alleged that the respondents had filed a forged affidavit to undermine his title. The civil trial court decreed his suit on 16 November 2015 in Civil Suit No. 63-A/2015 and disbelieved the copy. The District Judge dismissed Civil Appeal No. 82-A/2015 on 10 August 2016 and likewise treated it as suspicious, without recording a finding that it was forged. A second civil appeal remained pending; counsel said it had not been admitted.

Kailash filed an unregistered criminal complaint alleging IPC Sections 193, 196, 465, 471 and 120-B. On 9 April 2018 the JMFC, Ashoknagar, dismissed it under Section 203 CrPC: the civil court itself had not complained, Kailash complained after the first civil appeal, and the dispute was civil. The First Additional Sessions Judge dismissed Criminal Revision No. 6/2019 on 21 September 2021. It emphasized that the civil courts had disbelieved, rather than declared forged, the unregistered copy of the affidavit in contrast to the registered sale deed; no civil court had directed prosecution; and Kailash had examined only himself without a witness or document establishing forgery. In his Section 482 application Kailash argued that the alleged forgery preceded filing in court, that civil and criminal proceedings can coexist, and that handwriting-expert evidence was not a precondition to process. Respondents defended the lower orders. The High Court addressed the legal grounds for threshold dismissal, rather than trying the document's authenticity.

2. Precedents — Considered : M.S. Sheriff v. State of Madras, AIR 1954 SC 397, was quoted for giving criminal proceedings ordinary priority over parallel civil proceedings because delay can undermine criminal justice. Its Constitution Bench rule expressly avoids a hard-and-fast stay rule; the possibility of conflicting outcomes is not by itself decisive, whereas likely embarrassment and special case circumstances may affect which proceeding waits. The High Court used it to reject dismissal merely because civil litigation continued, without directing a stay here.

M. Krishnan v. Vijay Singh, AIR 2001 SC 3014, was quoted at length. Allegations of forged documents and gain from their use must be independently established in criminal court; the mere pendency of a civil suit about the same documents cannot justify quashing the criminal case, since such a rule could be exploited to frustrate prosecution. The civil standard of probability differs from the criminal requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt. The High Court applied this to reject the reasoning that the dispute was civil in nature, without assuming the allegation ultimately proved. Kamaladevi Agarwal v. State of West Bengal, AIR 2001 SC 3846, was considered for the distinct point that even pending civil action in a court of higher status does not itself quash criminal proceedings under the CrPC. P. Swaroopa Rani v. M. Hari Narayana, (2008) 5 SCC 765, was quoted for simultaneous proceedings and a stay depending on the circumstances. Its embedded mentions of M.S. Sheriff, Iqbal Singh Marwah and Institute of Chartered Accountants of India v. Association of Chartered Certified Accountants, (2005) 12 SCC 226, identified the authorities on which that proposition rested.

Syed Askari Hadi Ali Augustine Imam v. State (Delhi Administration), (2009) 5 SCC 528, was quoted on concurrent civil and criminal proceedings, cognizance on a prima facie criminal case, a stay depending on the circumstances, and separate assessment of the records in the two proceedings. It reproduces K.G. Premshanker v. Inspector of Police, (2002) 8 SCC 87: a final prior judgment may be relied on as Evidence Act Sections 40–43 permit; res judicata may apply in civil litigation between the same parties and Section 300 CrPC addresses repeat criminal trials; a civil judgment on the same cause is relevant when those evidence provisions make it so, but ordinarily not conclusive, save for Section 41's statutory operation. Its effect must be assessed case by case, including any limited relevance. The High Court applied the independent-proof principle to the absence of a finding of forgery by the civil courts; it did not rule that the decrees were categorically inadmissible.

Kishan Singh v. Gurpal Singh, (2010) 8 SCC 775, was also quoted extensively. It contrasted the older Karam Chand Ganga Prasad v. Union of India dictum suggesting civil findings bind criminal courts with M.S. Sheriff's Constitution Bench approach, noted that V.M. Shah v. State of Maharashtra was not approved in K.G. Premshanker, and described the Karam Chand approach as per incuriam for overlooking the larger Bench. It explained separate standards and evidence, with possible relevance of prior judgments under Evidence Act Sections 41–43. The quotation also invokes King Emperor v. Khwaja Nazir Ahmad, P. Swaroopa Rani, Iqbal Singh Marwah, Syed Askari and Vishnu Dutt Sharma v. Daya Sapra to explain the development of that principle. The present Court used Kishan Singh to reject any automatic binding effect of the civil findings on the forgery complaint.

Iqbal Singh Marwah v. Meenakshi Marwah, (2005) 4 SCC 370, supplied a second, distinct controlling rule. The quoted paragraph 33 approves Sachida Nand Singh and confines Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC to specified offences committed with respect to a document after its production or admission in evidence, while in custodia legis. The High Court applied that distinction based on when the forgery occurred and whether the document was then in court custody to the allegation that the copy was already forged before filing. Iqbal Singh Marwah's separately quoted paragraph 32 within Kishan Singh also explains different civil and criminal proof standards and absence of an automatic binding finding. The Court made no forgery finding.

3. Statutes considered : Section 195(1)(b)(ii) CrPC governs when a complaint by the court is required for enumerated offences concerning a document produced or given in evidence in court. As interpreted through Iqbal Singh Marwah, the relevant bar attaches to the specified offence committed after production in court custody, not merely to the subsequent use in litigation of a document allegedly forged beforehand. Section 200 CrPC supplies the route for Kailash's private complaint on the allegation of forgery before production in court. Section 203 governed the Magistrate's dismissal; Section 482 supplied High Court jurisdiction to correct the materially erroneous orders rejecting the complaint at the threshold. IPC Sections 193, 196, 465, 471 and 120-B were alleged in the complaint, but the Court did not finally decide their individual ingredients or guilt. Evidence Act Sections 40–43 frame the relevance of prior judgments; Section 41 has the statutory conclusive operation identified in K.G. Premshanker. Section 300 CrPC and civil res judicata appeared in the incorporated precedent's explanation, not as independent bars decided on these facts.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the pending civil proceedings and title dispute justified dismissal of a private complaint alleging a forged affidavit, or required a stay; (ii) whether the civil courts' disbelief of the affidavit, without a formal forgery finding, controlled the criminal court's threshold decision and what legal relevance a prior judgment could have; (iii) whether Section 195(1)(b)(ii) barred a private complaint because the disputed copy had been filed in civil court, where the alleged forgery occurred beforehand; and (iv) whether the Section 203 dismissal and revisional affirmation could stand or the Magistrate should reconsider the complaint. The Court did not decide the authenticity of the document, the ultimate proof of each IPC offence or entitlement to summons.

5. Ratio / Findings : First, parallel civil and criminal proceedings are legally possible. M.S. Sheriff recognizes ordinary priority for criminal justice but no inflexible stay rule. M. Krishnan, Kamaladevi Agarwal and P. Swaroopa Rani reject the premise that civil litigation alone extinguishes a criminal allegation, with any stay evaluated on circumstances. Thus the pending second appeal and the fact that the underlying dispute concerned property could not justify rejection under Section 203 of the complaint alleging forgery. The complainant's timing after the civil appeal likewise did not make the complaint legally untenable on the grounds used below.

Second, the criminal court must examine its own evidence and the applicable requirements at the preliminary stage, rather than require the civil court to have labelled the affidavit forged. The civil courts had disbelieved a copy and found it suspicious; those civil findings did not bind the criminal court. The difference between the civil standard of preponderance of probabilities and the criminal requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt matters. K.G. Premshanker's qualification remains: a previous judgment may be relevant under Evidence Act Sections 40–43, and its precise effect must be determined under those provisions; Section 41 gives the specified judgments conclusive effect. Kishan Singh rejects automatic binding effect of civil findings on criminal courts. The High Court did not determine that Kailash's sole preliminary testimony would ultimately prove the charged offences; it found the lower courts' reliance on the lack of an earlier civil forgery declaration and their related reasoning for dismissal at the threshold materially erroneous.

Third, the Section 195(1)(b)(ii) restriction depends on when the alleged offence concerning the document occurred and whether the document was then in court custody. Under Iqbal Singh Marwah, it applies when an enumerated offence occurs after production in court, while the document is in custodia legis. Kailash alleged the affidavit was forged before the respondents filed it. On that pleaded basis, a complaint by the civil court was not a prerequisite and the complainant could proceed under Section 200. Whether forgery actually occurred remained to be addressed through lawful process. Taken together, these errors made the dismissal at the outset and its affirmation in revision unsustainable. They warranted correction under Section 482 without deciding guilt or directing issuance of process against the respondents.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the application, set aside the First Additional Sessions Judge's order of 21 September 2021 in Criminal Revision No. 6/2019 and the JMFC's Section 203 order of 9 April 2018 in the unregistered 2016 complaint, and remanded to the Magistrate for further proceedings in accordance with law. It made no costs order. The civil proceedings were not stayed, and no final determination of affidavit authenticity, cognizance, summons or criminal liability was made.

Headnote :- Evidence / police and seizure witnesses / hostile independent witness - Baldev Singh v. State of Haryana, (2015) 17 SCC 554, was applied: official testimony is not inadmissible or inherently unreliable merely because the witness is a police officer and an independent witness does not support the prosecution. The incorporated Girja Prasad v. State of M.P. principle permits conviction on trustworthy police evidence after careful scrutiny; its nested references to Aher Raja Khima and Tahir reinforce the rejection of a categorical corroboration requirement. After independently assessing the seizure officers' evidence, the documents and the ballistic report, the Court affirmed the Section 5 Explosive Substances Act conviction notwithstanding a hostile independent witness.

Sentencing / long appellate delay / custody undergone - The 1992 incident preceded appellate disposal by over 31 years; Section 5 carried no minimum sentence, and the appellant had already served 10 months and four days of a one-year term. The Court reduced imprisonment to time served while enhancing the fine from ₹250 to ₹5,000, subject to payment by 29 February 2024. Failure to pay would revive the trial court's sentence of imprisonment and permit a warrant for the remaining term. The conviction was affirmed and the appeal allowed only to this qualified sentencing extent.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 19 September 1992, police acting on information searched a house in New Anand Nagar Colony, Jabalpur, in the presence of officers and independent witnesses. The prosecution alleged recovery of six country-made hand grenades, raw explosive material, tools and an unfinished .315-bore country-made pistol; seizure was recorded in Ex. P/2. After arrest, FIR and investigation, the seized articles went for ballistic examination, prosecution sanction was obtained, and a charge-sheet was filed under Section 25 Arms Act and Sections 3 and 5 Explosive Substances Act. The trial court framed charges under Section 5 and Section 25 on 2 April 1993. The prosecution examined five witnesses; the appellant led no defence evidence. The Seventh Additional Sessions Judge, Jabalpur, convicted him under Section 5 on 6 January 2000 and imposed one year's rigorous imprisonment and a ₹250 fine. In his Section 374 CrPC appeal, no one appeared for the appellant, so the High Court examined the trial record itself. It reviewed the search and seizure officers, the district magistrate's sanction clerk, one independent witness who turned hostile, and the ballistic report, which was exhibited before the appellant was examined under Section 313 CrPC. The appellant's custody certificate showed 10 months and four days as an undertrial.

2. Precedents — Considered : Baldev Singh v. State of Haryana, (2015) 17 SCC 554, was expressly quoted and applied. It rejects any legal rule that police officers' evidence is unworthy without independent support; because an official may be interested in the investigation's outcome, prudence requires careful scrutiny and independent appreciation, but police status alone creates no presumption of untruthfulness. The quoted Baldev passage includes Girja Prasad v. State of M.P., (2007) 7 SCC 625, which explains that a conviction may rest on otherwise reliable and trustworthy official testimony, with careful scrutiny a prudential safeguard rather than a mandatory corroboration rule. Girja Prasad in turn refers to Aher Raja Khima v. State of Saurashtra, AIR 1956 SC 217, on the presumption of honesty and to Tahir v. State (Delhi), (1996) 3 SCC 338, on reliable police testimony despite absent local corroboration. Those latter decisions appear within the incorporated Supreme Court quotation.

3. Statutes considered : Section 5 of the Explosive Substances Act supplied the conviction that was affirmed; the Court stated that no minimum imprisonment was prescribed for the offence in this case. Section 25 Arms Act and Section 3 Explosive Substances Act appeared in the charge-sheet, and Section 25 was charged, but the order under appeal and the High Court's dispositive ruling addressed conviction under Section 5 rather than a separate conviction under those provisions. Section 374 CrPC governed the appeal. Section 313 CrPC was relevant because the ballistic report was exhibited and specifically put to the accused in his examination. The Section 428 CrPC certificate supplied the verified undertrial custody period used for sentence modification.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the seizure and related evidence remained sufficient to sustain the Section 5 conviction when the independent witness turned hostile and the case substantially depended on police officers; and (ii) whether the one-year custodial term should remain in full after the appellant had served most of it and more than three decades had passed since the incident. The Court reviewed the record despite the appellant's nonappearance.

5. Ratio / Findings : C.K. Tiwari (PW/1), Satish Kumar (PW/4) and investigating officer K.S. Bhatia (PW/5) described the search and recovery; Bhatia proved the seizure memorandum, search panchnama, arrest memo, lodging of the FIR and ballistic referral. C.P. Pandey (PW/2) proved the prosecution sanction; Ajay Kanojiya (PW/3) did not support the prosecution. Bhatia explained that a crime number appearing on the seizure memo was entered after return to the police station. The ballistic report was tendered immediately before the appellant's Section 313 statement and its substance was put to him. Applying Baldev Singh, the Court refused to reject the officers solely for their employment or the hostile independent witness. It accepted their evidence and held the conviction well founded. On sentence, it distinguished affirmation of guilt from the remaining custodial consequence. The offence was committed in 1992, no minimum sentence constrained the Court, and the certified detention of 10 months and four days covered most of the one-year term. The Court considered that returning the appellant to jail for approximately two further months would serve no useful purpose in the circumstances and balanced reduction of imprisonment with a higher fine and a clear default consequence. It did not set aside the conviction.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court affirmed the conviction under Section 5 Explosive Substances Act. Imprisonment was reduced to the 10 months and four days already undergone; the fine was increased to ₹5,000, to be deposited by 29 February 2024. If unpaid, the trial court's original jail sentence would revive and it could issue a warrant to secure service of the remaining term. Bail and surety bonds were cancelled, a copy and record were to be sent to the trial court, and the appeal was allowed only to the stated sentencing extent.

Case Sr. no. (588) Prev Next

Headnote :- Criminal medical negligence / professional standard / grossness - Jacob Mathew v. State of Punjab, (2005) 6 SCC 1, was applied: a doctor's negligence must involve a gross or very high degree of departure from the conduct of an ordinarily competent practitioner, assessed by accepted practice and the knowledge available at the time, to attract criminal liability; a poor outcome, treatment risk, error of judgment or available alternative is insufficient. Kusum Sharma v. Batra Hospital, (2010) 3 SCC 480, reinforced reasonable skill, acceptable alternatives and the need to guard against misuse of criminal process; Martin F. D'Souza v. Mohd. Ishfaq, (2009) 3 SCC 1, reiterated the Bolam professional standard and that unsuccessful treatment alone is not culpability. Malay Kumar Ganguly v. Dr. Sukumar Mukherjee, (2009) 9 SCC 221, distinguished civil and criminal thresholds, duty, causation and grossness under Section 304-A IPC; S.K. Jhunjhunwala v. Dhanwanti Kaur, (2019) 2 SCC 282, restated ordinary competence and contemporaneous accepted practice; Kalyani Rajan v. Indraprastha Apollo Hospital, 2023:INSC:921, was cited as similar law. The present Court found no material establishing a departure in treatment amounting to criminal negligence despite the patient's death.

Criminal negligence complaint / independent medical opinion / Section 175(3) BNSS - Jacob Mathew requires a credible opinion from a competent doctor before a private complaint proceeds and an independent, qualified medical opinion before proceeding against a doctor; Martin F. D'Souza addresses specialist or committee screening before notice and safeguards against routine arrest. On this record, the magistrate's FIR direction could not stand: the available CMHO committee report did not identify treatment contrary to medical protocol, and the complaint lacked the necessary evidentiary basis for gross negligence. This did not foreclose a later FIR or complaint if an expert committee substantiates negligence or record manipulation.

Medical records / alleged fabrication / evidentiary inference - Employment of a doctor at another private hospital did not prove that he could not visit the treating hospital or that prescriptions in his name were fabricated. The alleged change in the husband's consent time was unsupported by his affidavit and was not shown to affect the medical conclusion. The Court declined to treat unsupported suspicions as proof of falsification while preserving inquiry into the allegation. The JMFC and revisional orders were set aside; the Section 175(3) application was dismissed with the specified liberty.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant, Dinesh Kumar Sharma, brought his pregnant daughter-in-law to Dr. Kanti Lahariya on 1 January 2024; she was admitted to Sarvodaya Hospital, Gwalior. He alleged that plasma was transfused unusually rapidly on 2 January, that injections caused chest pain and breathing difficulty, and that Dr. Kanti Lahariya, Dr. Prashant Lahariya and associates then conducted a hurried caesarean delivery. The infant was referred to the NICU at Link Hospital and remained there until 13 January. The mother was transferred to Birla Hospital after her condition deteriorated and died there on 15 January 2024. These are the complainant's allegations and sequence, not a judicial finding of negligent causation. After claiming that police had not accepted or acted on his complaint, he applied to the JMFC under Section 175(3) BNSS. The JMFC, by order of 19 February 2025 in Unregistered Complaint Case No. 0/2024, directed FIR registration; the IX Additional Sessions Judge dismissed the doctors' Criminal Revision No. 83/2025 on 28 March 2025. The doctors invoked Section 528 BNSS to challenge both orders. They relied on the Supreme Court's criminal medical-negligence safeguards. The complainant, an advocate appearing personally, further alleged an altered consent time, treatment notes supposedly created later in Dr. Rohit Khandelwal's handwriting, his fee despite asserted nonattendance, and treatment before laboratory reports. He argued that the allegation of fabrication was independent of medical negligence. The Court also considered a CMHO-appointed two-doctor inquiry into the care.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jacob Mathew v. State of Punjab, (2005) 6 SCC 1, was the central authority expressly quoted and applied. Its conclusions separate ordinary/civil negligence from gross criminal negligence, recognize the Bolam standard of an ordinary competent professional following an accepted practice in light of knowledge then available, reject liability solely from a better alternative or a treatment mishap, require an act or omission no ordinarily prudent medical professional would undertake with likely imminent injury, and limit res ipsa loquitur in criminal liability. Its paragraph 52 safeguards require a credible competent medical opinion before entertaining a private complaint and independent qualified opinion before proceeding against a doctor; arrest should not be routine. Kusum Sharma v. Batra Hospital, (2010) 3 SCC 480, was quoted for reasonable skill and care, the legitimacy of medically acceptable treatment choices and treatment involving greater risk reasonably selected for the patient's welfare, and the need to prevent malicious pressure on professionals; the Court used it consistently with grossness, not as immunity from accountability. Martin F. D'Souza v. Mohd. Ishfaq, (2009) 3 SCC 1, was quoted for the Bolam ordinary-skill test, the difference between an unsuccessful outcome and substandard conduct, and referral to a competent specialist or committee before notice on a medical-negligence complaint, with a caution against routine police arrest. Its nested references to Bolam, Jacob Mathew and Indian Medical Assn. v. V.P. Shantha were part of that quoted reasoning, rather than separate new holdings by the Court in the present case. Malay Kumar Ganguly v. Dr. Sukumar Mukherjee, (2009) 9 SCC 221, was quoted for the Section 304-A IPC ingredients and the distinction between civil or consumer negligence and criminal culpability: death, a causative rash or negligent act, duty, breach, proximate causation and gross degree must be considered; error or ordinary lack of care does not suffice. S.K. Jhunjhunwala v. Dhanwanti Kaur, (2019) 2 SCC 282, was quoted for its discussion of Jacob Mathew and Bolam, restating the ordinary competent practitioner benchmark, acceptable contemporaneous practice and no guarantee of successful surgery. Kalyani Rajan v. Indraprastha Apollo Hospital, 2023:INSC:921, was cited as similar law. The complainant cited Rajinder Prasad, Neeharika Infrastructure, Lalita Kumari, Sindhu Janak Nagargoje, SAS Infratech, Vinubhai Haribhai Malaviya and two High Court cases; those authorities were relied upon by the complainant.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS was invoked for High Court interference with the magistrate's and revisional orders. Section 175(3) BNSS was the complainant's route for seeking a judicial direction for police investigation or FIR registration, and that application was ultimately dismissed. The Court mentioned the first proviso to Section 223(1) BNSS, requiring an opportunity of hearing before cognizance, when commenting on the complainant's omission to array the doctors; its observation was ancillary to the decisive lack of a supported criminal-negligence case. Section 304-A IPC appears in the Supreme Court authorities quoted on causing death by criminal negligence, including the difference from civil liability.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the allegations about plasma transfusion, caesarean delivery and subsequent death, considered with the available professional inquiry, met the gross criminal-negligence standard that permits a Section 175(3) FIR direction against the doctors without credible independent medical support; (ii) whether the alleged later-created prescriptions and altered consent time supplied a supported, independent record-fabrication basis that could change the outcome; (iii) what significance should be given to the complainant's omission of the doctors from the Section 175(3) application and to the Section 223 hearing observation; and (iv) whether both lower-court orders should stand, and what remedy remained available after expert investigation. The Court did not decide the doctors' ultimate guilt or civil liability.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court considered the allegations made in the complaint and applied the distinct criminal standard from Jacob Mathew and the reinforcing authorities. It rejected an inference of a gross departure from accepted professional practice based only on rapid plasma administration, an emergency operation, an adverse reaction and the later death. The CMHO inquiry by Dr. Swechha Dandotiya and Dr. Nitesh Mudgal recorded that prophylactic platelet transfusion before major surgery could reduce bleeding risk in thrombocytopaenia; the decision was documented, treatment for the reaction included Avil, Dexa and Efcorlin, the operating and post-operative areas had necessary equipment, and the operation involved another doctor with a pediatrician present. The report did not find a violation of medical protocol; its inability to obtain CCTV about two months later did not establish negligence. The Court then distinguished the allegation of fabrication from proof of it. Dr. Khandelwal's employment at Birla Hospital did not prevent a visit to Sarvodaya Hospital, the complainant had not arrayed him as a suspect, and the assertion that notes in his handwriting were created later did not follow merely from the complainant's belief that he did not attend. As to a purported 4:40-to-4:10 pm change in transfusion consent, the person who signed—the complainant's son—supplied no affidavit, and the Court found that no effect on the negligence assessment had been shown. The doctors were not arrayed in the Section 175(3) request, which the Court criticized in connection with the opportunity before cognizance under Section 223(1), but it returned to the substantive insufficiency of the negligence and manipulation allegations. On those materials the magistrate should not have ordered FIR registration; the revisional court's affirmation also could not stand. The findings concern the present threshold and record, not a categorical prohibition on pursuing evidence-supported medical misconduct.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application under Section 528 BNSS. The IX Additional Sessions Judge's order dated 28 March 2025 and the JMFC's order dated 19 February 2025 were set aside, and the complainant's Section 175(3) application was dismissed. The complainant was expressly given liberty to approach the Medical Council of India for a committee of expert doctors to examine both alleged negligence and record interpolation. If that committee supports either allegation, he may lodge an FIR or file a complaint before a competent court. The order did not itself finally determine professional misconduct, liability or innocence.

Case Sr. no. (589) Prev Next

Headnote :- Inherent powers / quashing / matrimonial cruelty / husband's relatives - Vague and general accusations against relatives are insufficient, but the FIR attributed assault and expulsion to all five applicants and a vehicle demand to the husband and mother-in-law. Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, Monju Rai v. State of West Bengal and Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P. were invoked for scrutiny of accusations against brothers-in-law, and Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P. for those against parents-in-law; applying those authorities did not warrant quashing on the facts alleged in the FIR. A brother-in-law's transfer and separate residence did not establish absence from the alleged incident.

Cruelty / alleged disease / dowry demand - An asserted pre-marital concealment of the complainant's psoriasis, even if assumed for argument, could not justify mistreatment or ouster. Specific allegations of demand, beating and expulsion were capable of sustaining an allegation of cruelty at the stage of considering quashing under Section 528 BNSS; guilt remained for the competent court to determine.

Cruelty / continuing mental effect / parental home - Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was applied for the principle that distress flowing from matrimonial cruelty may continue at the wife's parental home after physical abuse at the matrimonial home ends. The Court also applied Amar Singh v. Vimla on dowry-driven forced residence with parents. The application to this case was tied to the alleged dowry demand and expulsion; the quashing application was dismissed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married applicant No. 4 in 2022. In Crime No. 79/2024 at Police Station Veerpur, District Sheopur, she alleged that after an initially peaceful period her in-laws taunted her, that the mother-in-law and husband accused her of mental illness and demanded a four-wheeler, and that all five applicants assaulted and expelled her when her family could not meet a further dowry demand. She said she had lived with her parents for about a year; following a June police approach, the husband allegedly promised to take her back but did not. The FIR dated 13 August 2024 invoked Sections 498-A and 506 IPC and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The applicants comprised two brothers-in-law (Nos. 1 and 5), the father-in-law (No. 2), mother-in-law (No. 3) and husband (No. 4). They sought quashing under Section 528 BNSS. Their counsel asserted that the wife had psoriasis concealed before marriage, that they had themselves complained to police, and that applicant No. 1, a forest guard transferred to Sheopur in 2021, lived separately. The State opposed quashing, emphasizing the individual allegations. These were competing allegations and submissions, not trial findings.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Judge invoked Kans Raj v. State of Punjab, (2000) 5 SCC 207; Monju Rai v. State of West Bengal; and Geeta Mehrotra v. State of U.P., (2012) 10 SCC 741, when testing the FIR against the brothers-in-law. The common principle expressly stated in the order is that near relatives of a husband should not be made to face trial on vague, general allegations: their alleged conduct must be examined specifically. Taramani Parakh v. State of M.P., (2015) 11 SCC 260, was invoked to test the allegations against the parents-in-law. The Court used these authorities as the framework for assessing specificity and concluded that the actual FIR allegations survived it. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was quoted and applied to the alleged continuing mental effect: mental trauma caused by physical cruelty or abusive conduct at the matrimonial home can continue after a wife takes shelter with her parents, even though the physical acts there have stopped. This explained why the alleged ouster and continuing separation remained relevant. The Court also relied on its own Amar Singh v. Smt. Vimla, Criminal Revision No. 2376/2020, decided 22 June 2021, for the proposition that compelling a married woman to live with her parents because of a dowry demand constitutes cruelty. These authorities formed the basis of the refusal to quash; none was treated as a finding that the applicants had already been proved guilty.

3. Statutes considered : Section 528 BNSS supplied the High Court's inherent jurisdiction to consider quashing the FIR. The FIR alleged Section 498-A IPC, criminal intimidation under Section 506 IPC, and Sections 3/4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, 1961. The order set out the text of Sections 85 and 86 of the new penal statute, describing cruelty in terms of wilful conduct likely to cause grave injury or danger to mental or physical health and harassment to coerce an unlawful demand for property or valuable security.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the FIR contained only omnibus accusations against the brothers-in-law and parents-in-law or specific allegations sufficient to withstand quashing; (ii) whether an alleged illness concealed before marriage could justify the complained-of conduct or negate the cruelty allegations at this stage; (iii) whether the wife's alleged dowry-driven removal and subsequent residence with her parents remained relevant to mental cruelty; and (iv) whether the first brother-in-law's asserted separate residence conclusively excluded his participation. The application did not call for a trial finding on the truth of the competing accounts.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court distinguished vague implication of relatives from the FIR before it. It found an allegation that all five applicants beat the complainant when expelling her, and a specific vehicle demand against the mother-in-law and husband. On those pleaded facts, the Supreme Court authorities about general allegations did not justify terminating proceedings against the brothers-in-law or parents-in-law. The asserted concealment of psoriasis could not furnish a legal justification for cruelty or expulsion even if a disease existed; the question whether the allegations were ultimately proved was left open. Applying Rupali Devi, the Court treated the alleged psychological effects of compelling the wife to reside with her parents as capable of continuing after she left the matrimonial home. Amar Singh supplied the further proposition concerning forced residence with parents on account of a dowry demand. As to applicant No. 1, transfer to another location in 2021 and alleged separate residence did not demonstrate his absence on the unspecified day in the second half of 2023 when assault and ouster were alleged. These findings concerned whether interference with the FIR was warranted, not a determination of guilt or an independent adjudication of each charge.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court held that no case for interference was made out and dismissed the Section 528 BNSS application. The FIR remained in force against the five applicants. No acquittal, conviction or final resolution of the disputed illness and presence claims was ordered.

Kaushal Sharma and Ors. v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 37490/2024, 20/11/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Anticipatory bail — superior-court review — initial illegality versus later misuse - An application under Section 439(2) may seek review of whether the original bail grant ignored material allegations and relevant context; proof of post-grant misconduct is needed for the distinct inquiry into cancellation on that ground, rather than this form of review. The victim's application was therefore maintainable even though no later misuse or non-cooperation was alleged (¶¶6–10).

Dowry cruelty and alleged sexual assault — delayed disclosure at bail stage - The wife alleged demand of Rs. 50 lakh and an Audi car, cruelty, and a specified 05.08.2020 non-consensual unnatural act accompanied by a threat. The Court held that the Sessions Judge's adverse view of the delayed complaint was casual: an attempt to preserve married life may explain silence, and the FIR alleged disclosure to her in-laws. With the seriousness of the allegations inadequately considered, the anticipatory-bail grant was set aside, without any adjudication of guilt (¶¶2, 5, 11–14).

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Meghna Agarwal applied under Section 439(2) CrPC to challenge the First Additional Sessions Judge, Ganj Basoda's 05.10.2021 anticipatory-bail order in Bail Application No. 407/2021 for her husband Anurag Bagadiya. The underlying FIR alleged their January 2020 marriage, substantial dowry at marriage, later demands for Rs. 50 lakh and an Audi car, physical and mental harassment, retention of jewellery and expulsion from the matrimonial home in November 2020. It separately alleged that Anurag forced an unnatural sexual act on 05.08.2020 while they stayed at her parental home and threatened to kill her if she disclosed it; she said she told her in-laws, later told her mother in September 2021 and lodged the FIR. These remain allegations. The Sessions Judge noted roughly ten months after her return home and thirteen months after the alleged sexual act before the written complaint, no medical injury, and a view that custodial interrogation was unnecessary. Meghna contended that saving the marriage could account for delayed disclosure and the lower court had improperly discounted grave allegations. The respondent's answer stressed the absence of any subsequent misuse of liberty or non-cooperation.

2. Precedents — Considered : Manoj Kumar Khokhar v. State of Rajasthan, Supreme Court Criminal Appeal No. 36/2022, 11.01.2022, was extensively quoted for the need to consider the actual accusation, prima facie material, severity, risk to witnesses, antecedents and reasons in the grant of bail, with a review of an illegal or perverse original grant distinct from later-misconduct cancellation (¶9). Its excerpt assembled Gudikanti Narasimhulu, Prahlad Singh Bhati, Ram Govind Upadhyay, Kalyan Chandra Sarkar, Prasanta Kumar Sarkar, Ash Mohammad, Neeru Yadav, Anil Kumar Yadav, Ramesh Bhavan Rathod, Bhoopendra Singh/Mahipal, Brijmani Devi and Kranti Associates. These nested authorities support the consolidated bail-discretion and reasons propositions. Ms. Y v. State of Rajasthan, Supreme Court Criminal Appeal No. 649/2022, was quoted on the same distinction between forms of bail review:

superior review asks whether the bail grant ignored relevant factors or was arbitrary, illegal or perverse, while cancellation for later misconduct turns on supervening events (¶10). Its quoted discussion refers to Prasanta Kumar Sarkar, Mahipal, Jagjeet Singh and Neeru Yadav; this Court applied the distinction to the husband's answer that he had not misused his liberty rather than treating the quotations as separate holdings on this case. Rupali Devi v. State of U.P., (2019) 5 SCC 384, was materially invoked to explain that compelling a wife to stay at her parental home following dowry-related maltreatment may itself constitute cruelty, supporting the contextual assessment of the alleged continuing harm (¶11). No authority was used to decide the truth of the charge.

3. Statutes considered : Section 438 CrPC was the husband's anticipatory-bail jurisdiction below. Section 439(2) CrPC supplied the victim's challenge to that grant, while the Court distinguished same-court cancellation for misuse from superior-court annulment of an initially unsound order. The FIR's alleged unnatural act was discussed as Section 377 IPC and the alleged dowry harassment as cruelty; the judgment did not finally adjudicate those offences. The Court assessed the FIR and surrounding circumstances at a provisional bail stage, not at trial. The bail order's delayed-disclosure and injury observations could not be treated as findings disproving the allegations.

4. Issues : Could the complainant seek a superior court's correction of the original anticipatory-bail order without proving post-bail misconduct? Did the Sessions Judge exercise bail discretion on all material allegations and their context, including the delayed disclosure of a marital sexual allegation, the threats and dowry demands? What operative effect should follow if its order materially omitted those considerations? The judgment did not decide whether Anurag committed any charged act, whether evidence ultimately proves consent or injury, or the outcome of investigation.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected the respondent's treatment of the two forms of bail review as the same. A court that granted bail may cancel it if liberty is misused; a superior court may set aside the original grant if it ignored material on the record, even absent later misconduct. Supreme Court authority required brief but meaningful attention to the nature of accusation, prima facie material and pertinent risk factors. Here the FIR specified demands for money and a car, alleged physical and mental harassment and a dated unnatural sexual act with a threat. The lower court's emphasis on the time before reporting and lack of medical injury did not adequately consider why a wife might delay approaching police while attempting to preserve marriage. The FIR alleged that she did tell her in-laws about the sexual act, rebutting the inference that she had maintained complete silence; the Court also applied Rupali Devi's understanding of continued cruelty through compelled parental residence. The High Court called the delay observation casual and unwarranted, and held the seriousness of the allegations had been overlooked in granting anticipatory bail. Its assessment concerned the legality of the anticipatory-bail protection on the allegations on record and did not prove the underlying charges. The conclusion was tied to these alleged circumstances and the lower court's reasoning.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application for cancellation of anticipatory bail and set aside the First Additional Sessions Judge's order dated 05.10.2021 in Bail Application No. 407/2021. The respondent No. 1, Anurag Bagadiya, was directed to surrender before the Investigating Officer immediately and no later than 30 April 2022.

Headnote :- Maintenance / Section 125 CrPC / voluntary loan deduction - The house-loan instalment repaid a voluntary advance and was not treated as a statutory or mandatory deduction from the husband's earnings when fixing maintenance; on this record, he could not reduce his July 2024 net-salary figure by ₹13,700 merely by invoking that instalment. This was a fact-specific assessment of capacity, not an exclusion of all liabilities.

Maintenance / quantum / Rajnesh v. Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324 - The Supreme Court's multifactor approach balances the claimant's needs, parties' status and accustomed standard of living against the payer's actual capacity, reasonable expenses, lawful dependants and liabilities, with attention to inflation; an award should be realistic and neither oppressive nor inadequate.

Overlapping remedies / Section 125 CrPC and Section 20 DV Act / adjustment and commencement - The enhanced Section 125 figure remained subject to adjustment against maintenance awarded under the DV Act or another statute and became payable from the date of application. The Court reasoned on the assumption that adjustment applied without determining whether the separate DV Act amount had actually been paid; its order did not authorise double recovery.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Monika sought maintenance from her husband Praveen under Section 125 CrPC. By order dated 14.12.2023 in M.Cr.C. No. 1049/2018, the Second Additional Principal Judge, Family Court, Indore awarded ₹5,000 per month, subject to adjustment of amounts received under other statutes. She filed a revision under Sections 397/401 CrPC read with Section 19(4) of the Family Courts Act, maintaining that the figure was too low. A July 2024 salary slip furnished by the husband showed net salary of ₹38,373. He opposed enhancement by referring to an order dated 13.12.2019 in Criminal Appeal No. 176/2019 awarding ₹7,500 per month under Section 20 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, a ₹13,700 monthly house-loan instalment, and responsibility for parents living in Badwani. He argued that the loan left only about ₹25,000 monthly. Monika said the loan was taken after separation and had been used to depress take-home pay. Her counsel did not know whether the separate DV Act award was regularly paid. The High Court addressed the loan, the adjustment and whether the resulting total allowance was adequate.

2. Precedents — Considered : The High Court expressly relied on Rajnesh v. Neha, (2021) 2 SCC 324, quoting its paragraphs 77–85 on interim and permanent maintenance. In that discussion the Supreme Court said maintenance is protective rather than punitive, has no straitjacket formula, and calls for a fair balance between claimant need and payer capacity. It identified status, reasonable wants, adequate independent income, previous standard of living, employment history, family care responsibilities, litigation cost, actual income, reasonable personal expenses, legally dependent family members, liabilities, inflation and cost of living as relevant considerations. A reasonable and realistic amount should avoid both oppressive excess and penury. The High Court applied that framework to reject the claimed reduction of income by the voluntary loan instalment and assess the effective ₹7,500 total as inadequate. The Rajnesh extract itself refers to Jasbir Kaur Sehgal v. District Judge, Dehradun, (1997) 7 SCC 7 and Vinny Parmvir Parmar v. Parmvir Parmar, (2011) 13 SCC 112 concerning factors; Manish Jain v. Akanksha Jain, (2017) 15 SCC 801 concerning the immateriality of the claimant wife's parents' means and insufficiency of education alone; Reema Salkan v. Sumer Singh Salkan, (2019) 12 SCC 303 on an able-bodied payer's duty; Chaturbhuj v. Sita Bai, (2008) 2 SCC 316 on balanced quantum; and Delhi High Court's Bharat Hegde v. Saroj Hegde, (2007) 140 DLT 16 on practical factors and adjustment. These authorities appeared within the reproduced Supreme Court discussion.

3. Statutes considered : Section 125 CrPC governed the wife's maintenance and the Family Court award under revision. Sections 397 and 401 CrPC and Section 19(4) of the Family Courts Act, 1984 were the stated revision route. Section 20 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005 supplied the husband's asserted concurrent ₹7,500 monetary-relief award; adjustment against that or another statutory award remained a condition of the Section 125 order. The quoted Rajnesh passage referred to the criterion in Section 20(2) DV Act that relief be adequate, fair, reasonable and consistent with the accustomed standard of living and Section 23(2) of the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956 as guidance on status, reasonable wants and resources.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the husband's voluntary house-loan instalment should reduce the income considered for fixing his wife's Section 125 maintenance, notwithstanding the disclosed salary slip. (ii) Whether ₹5,000 under Section 125, subject to adjustment against a separate claimed ₹7,500 DV Act award, produced an adequate and realistic effective allowance under the Rajnesh factors. (iii) What enhanced amount, adjustment condition and commencement date should be ordered. Whether the DV Act award was being regularly paid was unknown to the applicant's counsel and was not factually determined in this revision.

5. Ratio / Findings : The loan was a voluntary repayment of a lump sum received in advance, not a compulsory statutory deduction. The Court therefore declined to subtract its ₹13,700 instalment from the July 2024 net salary of ₹38,373 to accept the husband's proposed lower effective income. It recorded the wife's allegation that the loan was taken after separation and noted the voluntary nature of the deduction and the advance already received. The Court then applied the quoted Rajnesh guidance: maintenance is meant to protect a dependent spouse, without punishing the payer, through a realistic balance of resources, needs, status and prices rather than a formula. The husband said a separate DV Act award was ₹7,500, while payment regularity was unknown. Assuming that the Family Court's adjustment condition applied to that award, the additional ₹5,000 Section 125 order would have no practical effect and the total monthly entitlement would remain ₹7,500. In view of the price index, the parties' status and the cost of daily necessities, the Court regarded that amount as too low. It raised the Section 125 figure to ₹7,500 but retained adjustment against the DV Act or other statutory maintenance; the finding concerns the adequacy of maintenance on this record and does not provide for double payment.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the criminal revision. The ₹5,000 monthly Section 125 award was enhanced to ₹7,500, subject to adjustment of maintenance awarded under the DV Act or another statute. The enhanced amount is payable from the date of Monika's application, not merely from the revision order.

Headnote :- Domestic Violence Act — interim residence / concurrent Section 125 rent - A rent component in an existing Section 125 CrPC maintenance order does not, by itself, bar interim residence in the shared household under Sections 19 and 23 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005. The Court rejected the respondents' claim that the two forms of relief were mutually exclusive; an alteration of maintenance may instead be sought under Section 127 CrPC. A pending divorce petition did not sever the admitted subsisting marital ties or make the 2005 Act inapplicable.

Domestic Violence Act — shared household / interim prima facie burden - Where the wife asserted that she had lived in the house after marriage and the respondents could point to no reply or material to the contrary, the Court held that the Magistrate and appellate court erred in putting a reverse burden on her at the interim stage. It set aside both refusals and ordered peaceful residence; the main Section 12 proceeding remained pending, with no final title or domestic-violence merits finding.

Adjournment — counsel's preparedness / court control - After respondents had appeared for months without filing a reply, their request for further time was refused. Relying on its earlier Nandu @ Gandharva Singh decision and its discussion of N.G. Dastane v. Shrikant S. Shinde, (2001) 6 SCC 135, and Noor Mohammed v. Jethanand, (2013) 5 SCC 202, the Court stressed counsel's duty to prepare, avoid needless delay and assist timely adjudication. The quoted Supreme Court discussions concern misconduct and the systemic harm of routine adjournments; this order did not finally adjudicate a disciplinary complaint against the respondents' counsel.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Neha Jain, describing herself as the legally wedded wife of respondent Rahul Jain, pursued an application under Section 12 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005. She sought an interim order under Section 23 permitting her to reside in a house that she said was the shared household where she had lived after marriage. The Judicial Magistrate First Class, Bhopal, rejected the interim request on 13 April 2022 in MJC R No. 2991/2019. The 14th Additional Sessions Judge, Bhopal, affirmed that decision on 12 January 2023 in Criminal Appeal No. 305/2022. The stated reason was that an earlier maintenance order under Section 125 CrPC already included rent for her separate residence. The wife invoked Section 482 CrPC to have those orders set aside.

At the High Court hearing the respondents, whose counsel had appeared in August 2023, sought time to file a reply; no reply had been filed. The Court first dealt at length with this request and rejected the adjournment. It also noticed that the original vakalatnama had not been filed and that the online copy lacked the requisite court-fee and welfare-fund contributions under the High Court Rules. It directed the Registrar General to seek explanations from identified Registry personnel and take lawful action, and directed initiation of a proceeding concerning a dealing assistant's conduct in Court. These were separate administrative directions, not a judicial finding that the respondents' counsel was guilty in a completed disciplinary process.

On the merits, the wife argued that the 2005 Act permitted relief notwithstanding maintenance and rent under Section 125. The respondents relied principally on that existing rent component, although the maintenance order itself was not placed on the High Court record, and referred to a pending divorce petition. They also contended that she had not filed documents proving that the house was a shared household. When asked, counsel could not point to a reply to the interim application, saying evidence could be led in the still pending Section 12 case. The Court determined interim relief on this record rather than finally trying title, domestic violence, or the main application.

2. Precedents — Considered : On adjournment, the Judge quoted the High Court's earlier order in Nandu @ Gandharva Singh v. Ratiram Yadav and others, M.P. No. 1887/2017, dated 9 January 2019. That discussion treated repeated, unjustified postponement and an advocate's duty to the Court as serious professional concerns. The present Judge used it to refuse an adjournment requested after prolonged inaction; the cited matter did not supply a finding of misconduct against this counsel in an independent disciplinary proceeding.

Nandu reproduced substantial extracts from N.G. Dastane v. Shrikant S. Shinde, (2001) 6 SCC 135. The quoted Supreme Court reasoning distinguishes professional misconduct from mere inadvertent negligence, explains an advocate's duty when court proceedings and witnesses are needlessly delayed, and describes the Section 35 Advocates Act referral threshold for a genuine complaint. The present order adopted the need to resist unnecessary delay.

The quoted Nandu passage also reproduced Noor Mohammed v. Jethanand, (2013) 5 SCC 202. Noor Mohammed's treatment of procedural time limits cautions that a directory provision should not be turned into an automatic substantive bar to a defence merely because of delay; its extensive discussion of routine adjournments stresses effective progress, reciprocal duties of Bar and Bench, and public confidence in timely justice. The present Court relied on that discussion of avoiding delay to deny further time on the facts. Authorities appearing only inside those long Supreme Court quotations—among them Shiv Cotex, Ramon Services, Lt. Col. S.J. Chaudhary, Mahabir Prasad Singh, Babu Singh, Hussainara Khatoon and Zahira Habibulla H. Sheikh—were part of the quoted Nandu discussion.

3. Statutes considered : Section 12 of the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005 governed the main pending application. Section 23 supplied the mechanism for interim orders, including interim residence relief under Section 19. The Court read Section 19 as remaining available despite a rent component in a separate maintenance order. Section 20(1)(d), invoked by the wife concerning monetary relief alongside Section 125 CrPC, formed part of her submission; the Court's operative reasoning on residence centred on Sections 19 and 23. Section 125 CrPC was the source of the pre-existing maintenance/rent order, which was not produced before the High Court; Section 127 CrPC was identified as the route by which respondents could seek alteration of that maintenance amount if appropriate. Section 482 CrPC was the jurisdiction invoked to challenge the Magistrate's and appellate court's orders. The High Court Rules were separately invoked for original vakalatnama, court-fee and welfare-fund filing requirements.

4. Issues : (i) Whether an existing Section 125 CrPC order said to include rent for separate accommodation automatically excludes interim residence in a shared household under Sections 19 and 23 of the 2005 Act.

(ii) Whether the pendency of a divorce petition, while the parties' marital ties admittedly subsist, prevents application of the 2005 Act.

(iii) What prima facie treatment of the claimed shared household was required on the interim application when the wife alleged prior residence there and the respondents could identify no filed reply or contrary material.

(iv) Whether respondents who had appeared months earlier without a reply were entitled to an adjournment, and what weight should be given to the cited judicial discussion of counsel's preparedness and delay. The separate Registry directions concerned filing irregularities, not the merits of residence.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court rejected the proposition that the Section 125 rent component made Section 19 inapplicable. It observed that a residence order under Section 19 was not subject to the exclusion claimed by the respondents merely because they had been directed to pay rent for separate accommodation. The two forms of relief were not treated as automatically mutually exclusive; the respondents remained free to seek alteration of the Section 125 amount under Section 127 CrPC. Because the divorce petition was pending and the marriage had admittedly not been dissolved, the Court found no basis to decline to apply the 2005 Act on that ground.

The wife's assertion that she had lived in the house after marriage supplied the factual basis for the interim request. The respondents offered no identified reply to the Section 23 application and no material showing that the property was not a shared household. The Court held that, at this provisional stage, placing a reverse burden on the complainant to prove the character of the house through documents before granting any interim protection was erroneous. It therefore found material illegality in both orders refusing interim residence. This conclusion is tied to the interim record and does not decide ownership, every statutory ingredient in the pending Section 12 case, or the final merits after evidence.

On the adjournment, respondents' counsel had entered appearance on 19 August 2023, but no reply had followed. The Court reasoned that notice calls for a defence rather than repeated requests for postponement and that counsel must prepare and assist the Court. In relying on Nandu and the reproduced N.G. Dastane and Noor Mohammed discussions, it stressed the harm that unjustified adjournments cause to the administration of justice while recognising that the quoted authorities arose in their own contexts. It refused time. The quoted Nandu order contained broader comments about professional misconduct and expressly declined action at that stage in that earlier matter. The specific action directed against Registry personnel was separate from this conclusion.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the Section 482 petition, set aside the appellate order dated 12 January 2023 in Criminal Appeal No. 305/2022 and the Magistrate's order dated 13 April 2022 in MJC R No. 2991/2019, and directed respondents to allow Neha Jain to reside in the shared household without hindrance to peaceful possession or harm during her stay. The adjournment was refused. The main Section 12 application was still pending on the record described by the Court; no final ownership or domestic-violence adjudication was made. Separately, the Registrar General was directed to seek explanations and take lawful action concerning the original vakalatnama, court fee and welfare-fund issues, and to initiate a proceeding concerning the dealing assistant's conduct.

Headnote :- Related and interested witnesses / prior enmity - The Court followed Jayabalan v. UT of Pondicherry, (2010) 1 SCC 199: relationship alone did not disqualify testimony; the evidence required cautious scrutiny for consistency, without automatic suspicion. Prior hostility could cut either way. On the evidence, the Court accepted the deceased's family witnesses after considering their accounts with the dying statements and medical evidence.

Contradictions and omissions / materiality - The Court treated the identified variations, including an omission in Vinod's police statement and differing accounts of participation, as insufficient to overturn what it regarded as the consistent core of the prosecution case. Its conclusion depended on the entire record.

Seizure / independent witnesses - Although the two named witnesses denied that Ex. P9 was prepared in their presence, the investigating officer's testimony supported seizure of the burnt clothing, matchbox and container and dispatch to FSL. The Court did not accept that this objection alone left the seizure unproved.

Dying declaration / truth, voluntariness and corroboration - Applying Mannu Raja v. State of M.P., [1976] 2 SCR 764, State of U.P. v. Ram Sagar Yadav, and Ramawati Devi v. State of Bihar, (1983) 1 SCC 211, the Court held that a true, voluntary declaration can form the basis of a conviction without a mandatory corroboration rule. It considered Surajdeo Oza v. State of Bihar, 1980 Supp SCC 769, on brevity not itself requiring rejection, and found Ex. P7 trustworthy, with other evidence also supporting it.

Police-recorded dying statement / fitness and form - Following Laxman v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 6 SCC 710, and Nanhau Ram v. State of M.P., 1988 Supp SCC 152, the Court accepted that a definite oral statement reduced to writing by police is not inadmissible merely for want of an oath, Magistrate or doctor's fitness certificate. Fitness, truth and voluntariness must still be established from the circumstances; the Court accepted Rambai's Ex. P7 on that basis.

Dying declaration / serious burns and communication - Considering Mafabhai Nagarbhai Raval v. State of Gujarat, and State of M.P. v. Dal Singh, (2013) 14 SCC 159, the Court rejected an automatic inference of incapacity from the extent of burns. It found Rambai capable of speaking despite severe injuries and relied on her statement after assessing its reliability.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 18 October 2009 in Sarkhandi, Vidisha district, Rambai was burned after a confrontation outside her house. Her Dehati Nalishi, Ex. P6, recorded on the spot by Head Constable Bharat Singh Thakur, alleged that Pooran poured kerosene on her and Omkar lit it with a match, with Chintoo and Pooran holding her; she also named Pratap, Hukum and Kallu in the encounter. The account attributed a prior dispute with neighbour Pratap. Police registered Crime No. 247/2009 initially under IPC Sections 147, 148 and 307. Bharat Singh also reduced Rambai's further account to writing as Ex. P7. At medical examination Dr P.K. Jain recorded extensive burns, assessed at about 70%, and testified that Rambai identified Pooran and Omkar as having set her alight. She was transferred for burn treatment at Hamidia Hospital, Bhopal and died. The post-mortem doctor described second- to third-degree burns and cardio-respiratory failure resulting from those injuries; he could not determine from the examination alone whether the burning was suicidal, homicidal or accidental.

Police seized burnt clothing, a matchbox and a container under Ex. P9 and sent articles for forensic examination. Two seizure witnesses said that the memo had not been prepared in their presence; the investigating officer testified to the seizure and dispatch. Shakunbai (PW7), Vinod (PW8) and Rupabai (PW11), all family members, supplied testimony about the encounter or its immediate aftermath. Their descriptions of the participants varied, Vinod's earlier police statement omitted the asserted pouring and lighting, and the defence pointed to earlier hostility. Rupabai's evidence placed her arrival when Rambai was already burning. The defence also relied on Randhir Singh (DW1), who attributed the burning to Rambai's husband Harisingh. It alleged false implication arising from enmity and argued that Rambai's severe burns, lack of a doctor's recorded statement or certification and police recording made Ex. P7 unreliable. The judgment records Harisingh's subsequent death after taking a sulphur tablet.

After a Sessions trial, the First Additional Sessions Judge, Vidisha convicted and sentenced the appellants under IPC Section 302 to life imprisonment, a fine of ₹5,000 each and five months' further rigorous imprisonment in default. In Criminal Appeal No. 646 of 2011 under CrPC Section 374, they sought reversal for alleged errors in evaluating related witnesses, contradictions, seizure and Rambai's statements. The State defended the conviction.

2. Precedents — Considered : Jayabalan v. UT of Pondicherry, (2010) 1 SCC 199, was quoted for a careful but not pedantic approach to interested testimony: the court should look for consistency without disregarding a witness solely for close relationship to a victim. The Division Bench used that approach in evaluating the deceased's relatives and the alleged enmity, rather than treating kinship as disqualification.

Mannu Raja v. State of M.P., [1976] 2 SCR 764, was invoked for the absence of an absolute rule of law or prudence demanding corroboration of a dying declaration. State of U.P. v. Ram Sagar Yadav, and Ramawati Devi v. State of Bihar, (1983) 1 SCC 211, supplied the associated true-and-voluntary test permitting conviction on a declaration without corroboration. These authorities framed the Bench's acceptance of Ex. P7; the Bench also examined eyewitness and medical evidence.

Nanhau Ram v. State of M.P., 1988 Supp SCC 152, was cited on assessment of the maker's mental fitness: medical opinion is ordinarily sought, while evidence that the declarant was conscious and fit may establish capacity. Laxman v. State of Maharashtra, (2002) 6 SCC 710 (five-Judge Bench), was discussed at length. It recognises declarations made orally, in writing or through another positive and definite form of communication, and recording by a police officer as well as a doctor or Magistrate; a Magistrate, oath and doctor's certificate are not absolute conditions. The recorder's satisfaction about fitness and the court's assessment of voluntariness and truth remain central; certification is a caution, and evidentiary weight depends on the facts. The Bench applied these principles to Ex. P7, an oral account written by police, despite the absence of a doctor's statement or certificate. It did not hold that any police-recorded statement is automatically reliable.

Surajdeo Oza v. State of Bihar, 1980 Supp SCC 769, was cited for the proposition that brevity alone does not justify rejecting a dying declaration. The Bench included this among the reliability principles before accepting Rambai's account.

Mafabhai Nagarbhai Raval v. State of Gujarat, and State of M.P. v. Dal Singh, (2013) 14 SCC 159, were discussed for the limited point that even extensive burns do not necessarily prevent a person from making a reliable dying declaration. The Bench used those authorities, together with the medical description and its view of Rambai's consciousness, to reject the appellants' capacity objection. It also referred to Mody's Medical Jurisprudence on burn degrees; that reference was explanatory medical material, not a judicial precedent or a substitute for proof of capacity in this case.

3. Statutes considered : Section 32 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 governed the relevance and evaluation of Rambai's statements concerning the cause of her death. The Bench assessed the trustworthiness and voluntariness of her police-recorded Ex. P7, the adequacy of her ability to communicate, and whether a doctor's certificate, Magistrate or corroboration was legally essential.

IPC Section 302 was the offence of conviction and sentence under appeal. The FIR initially invoked Sections 147, 148 and 307; the police report and charges also referred to Sections 149 and 302 after Rambai's death. Those sections appear in the procedural background. CrPC Section 374 supplied the appellate route. Section 313 CrPC statements recorded the accused's denials and false-implication defence; Section 174 concerned the inquest after death.

4. Issues : (i) Whether close relationship to Rambai and the prior dispute required rejection of the prosecution witnesses, and whether contradictions and omissions undermined the core account of the burning. (ii) Whether the two seizure witnesses' denial of presence rendered Ex. P9 unproved despite the investigating officer's evidence. (iii) Whether Rambai's Ex. P7 and Ex. P6 could be relied on as statements concerning her fatal injuries, including whether a police-recorded oral declaration required a Magistrate, doctor's recording or fitness certificate, or mandatory corroboration. (iv) Whether the severity of her burns showed incapacity to communicate. (v) Whether DW1's alternative accusation against Harisingh and the post-mortem doctor's inability to classify the manner of burning created reasonable doubt requiring reversal of the murder conviction.

5. Ratio / Findings : On witness credibility, the Bench adopted Jayabalan's distinction between careful scrutiny and automatic suspicion. It acknowledged variations in the relatives' evidence and the earlier hostility, but regarded the discrepancies as minor in the totality of what it considered a consistent account. It held that enmity could be a motive for assault or false implication and called for deeper scrutiny, not an automatic adverse presumption. The court compared the eyewitness accounts, Rambai's own statements and medical evidence before affirming the trial court's reliance on those witnesses.

On seizure, PW4 and PW5 said Ex. P9 was not prepared in their presence. PW12, the investigating officer, described seizure of the burnt articles and container and their dispatch to FSL Sagar. The Bench held that this testimony answered the defence contention that the seizure was unproved. The Court relied on the statements, witnesses and medical cause of death.

On Rambai's statements, the Bench applied Section 32 and the Supreme Court principles requiring truth and voluntariness, without an inflexible corroboration prerequisite. It treated Ex. P7 as Rambai's oral account reduced to writing by police and also relied on the earlier Dehati Nalishi Ex. P6. Laxman supplied the distinction between a useful medical fitness certification and a legal condition of admissibility; the absence of a Magistrate, oath or doctor's recording did not by itself defeat this statement. The Bench found Rambai conscious, able to speak and trustworthy when she gave the account. Its use of Mafabhai and Dal Singh concerned this factual capacity and reliability inquiry, while fitness still had to be established. The Court also noted that a short declaration is not automatically suspect under Surajdeo Oza.

The doctor attributed death to burn injuries, while conceding that the post-mortem examination alone could not determine whether the fire was inflicted, accidental or self-caused. The Bench used the accepted declarations and other testimony to resolve that evidentiary question. It disbelieved DW1's account implicating Harisingh, noting his asserted position at the scene and failure to help extinguish the flames and finding his defence version unreliable. It concluded that the trial court's murder conviction and sentence warranted no appellate interference.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the criminal appeal and affirmed the First Additional Sessions Judge's judgment of 10 June 2011 in Sessions Trial No. 03/2010, including the appellants' life imprisonment under IPC Section 302, fine of ₹5,000 each and five months' additional rigorous imprisonment in default. The appellants stated to be in jail were directed to remain there to serve the remaining sentence. Copies were directed to the jail authorities and, with the lower court record, to the trial court for information and follow-up. No acquittal, offence conversion or sentence modification was ordered.

Headnote :- FIR non-registration / High Court route and alternative remedy - Applying Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, and Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, the Court distinguished the police duty to register cognizable information from the complainant's procedural remedy for inaction. The Court declined a routine direction to the police in view of the remedies before the Magistrate; the quoted authorities preserved rare Article 226 intervention for a clear abuse or mala fide investigation. Shweta Bhadauria, W.A. 247/2016, applied restraint in view of the alternative remedies subject to recognised exceptions. The Section 482 petition was dismissed without assessing the complaint's merits.

Magistrate redress / FIR and proper investigation - Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, were adopted: after recourse to the police superior under Section 154(3) CrPC, an aggrieved person may invoke Section 156(3), and a Magistrate who is satisfied that prima facie grounds exist may order registration, proper investigation and monitoring without investigating personally. Aleque Padamsee and Divine Retreat Centre, drawing on Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre and AIIMS Employees' Union, also identified the Sections 190/200 complaint route. Liberty was given to approach the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Omprakash Jatav asserted that he had complained to police but no FIR was registered. He filed Misc. Criminal Case No. 54263 of 2024 under Section 482 CrPC, seeking a direction to police to register an FIR. The prayer reproduced in paragraph 1 sought registration of an FIR against respondents 5–8 and legal action against the police-station officer identified in that prayer. Counsel for the State objected that an effective remedy lay before the Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC, identified also as Section 223 BNSS. The Court considered whether this direct High Court route for FIR registration was maintainable, cited Supreme Court and Madhya Pradesh Division Bench authority, and reserved the applicant's recourse to the Magistrate.

2. Precedents — Considered : Aleque Padamsee v. Union of India, (2007) 6 SCC 171, was quoted at length. It distinguished the substantive police duty to register information revealing a cognizable offence under Section 154 CrPC from the remedy for failure: complaint to the competent Magistrate under Sections 190 and 200. Its treatment of All India Institute of Medical Sciences Employees' Union v. Union of India, (1996) 11 SCC 582, Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre v. State of Maharashtra, (2004) 7 SCC 768, Hari Singh v. State of U.P., (2006) 5 SCC 733, and Minu Kumari v. State of Bihar, (2006) 4 SCC 359, concerned the procedural route. It explained that Ramesh Kumari v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2006) 2 SCC 677, reiterated in Lallan Chaudhary v. State of Bihar, (2006) 12 SCC 229, spoke to the police's registration duty, not to bypassing that Magistrate route. The present Court used this distinction to reject routine direct relief.

Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, was quoted for the exceptional Article 226 power where a clear abuse of investigation or mala fide action and Chapter XII non-compliance are shown. Even then, a court may demand observance of the statutory process but not dictate how police investigate. Its quotation of Gangadhar Janardan Mhatre, which in turn referred to AIIMS Employees' Union, explained a Magistrate's options on a private complaint: enquire, direct police investigation and a report when warranted, dismiss under Section 203 if no offence emerges, or take cognizance and issue process on a prima facie case. The Bench adopted the alternative-remedy framework.

Sakiri Vasu v. State of U.P., (2008) 2 SCC 409, supplied the staged recourse to the Superintendent of Police under Section 154(3), then to the Magistrate under Section 156(3) if registration or proper investigation still fails. A Magistrate may order registration, proper investigation and monitoring. Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe v. Hemant Yashwant Dhage, (2016) 6 SCC 277, applied that line to prefer Section 156(3) over routine Article 226 petitions; upon prima facie satisfaction a Magistrate may ensure proper investigation, monitor it and, if necessary, recommend a change of investigating officer, but cannot investigate personally. The present Bench quoted and applied these as available procedural remedies.

Shweta Bhadauria v. State of M.P., W.A. No. 247/2016 (Division Bench, Gwalior, 20 December 2016), was treated as the local Division Bench authority on restraint in issuing mandamus for FIR registration when Sections 154(3), 156(3), 190 and 200 have not been used, subject to the four recognised Whirlpool Corporation v. Registrar of Trade Marks, (1998) 8 SCC 1, exceptions. It distinguished Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, as governing the police's Section 154 duty rather than automatic entitlement to a High Court writ without exhausting statutory alternatives. Whirlpool and Lalita Kumari entered through that adopted Division Bench passage.

3. Statutes considered : The application invoked Section 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973. Section 154 concerned police registration of cognizable information and subsection (3) recourse to a senior police officer. Section 156(3) permits a Magistrate, upon appropriate satisfaction, to direct registration or proper investigation. Sections 190 and 200 provide the complaint and cognizance route on police inaction; the quoted Gangadhar passage discussed a Magistrate's inquiry, police referral, dismissal under Section 203 and process if a prima facie offence appears. Article 226 was addressed in the precedents and the Division Bench's writ-remedy discussion, while Jatav's application was labelled Section 482. The final order referred to Section 223 of the Bharatiya Nagarik Suraksha Sanhita, 2023 as the corresponding complaint route. The liberty was expressed in both statutory references.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the applicant's allegation of non-registration warranted a direct High Court direction under Section 482 when ordinary remedies before the senior police officer and Magistrate were available. (ii) How the police's Section 154 duty relates to the procedural course for an aggrieved informant, including a Magistrate's power to order and monitor investigation. (iii) Whether any exceptional constitutional intervention displaced the alternative-remedy approach on the material stated in this order.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court adopted Aleque Padamsee's distinction: police must register information that discloses a cognizable offence, but an aggrieved informant ordinarily pursues the specified statutory remedies if the officer does not comply. The Court did not treat that substantive duty as entitling the informant to a writ of mandamus as a matter of course. The Supreme Court's reconciliation of Ramesh Kumari and the complaint-route cases prevented confusion between what police must do and what an informant aggrieved by police inaction may ask a High Court to compel in the first instance. On the petition as presented, Jatav had an effective remedy before the Magistrate.

Divine Retreat Centre preserved rare Article 226 intervention for demonstrable mala fides or clear abuse of statutory investigative power, while limiting a court's ability to prescribe particular police methods. Sakiri Vasu and Sudhir Bhaskarrao Tambe provided the more direct Sections 154(3) and 156(3) course and the Magistrate's conditional power to secure proper investigation. The Division Bench in Shweta Bhadauria applied restraint in view of alternative remedies while preserving Whirlpool exceptions and distinguishing Lalita Kumari's treatment of the duty to register an FIR. The present Court therefore declined to issue the FIR-registration direction, while making clear that a Magistrate could entertain the applicant's grievance according to law.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application. It granted liberty, if Jatav wished, to approach the concerned Magistrate under Section 200 CrPC/Section 223 BNSS for redress. The requested direction to register an FIR and take legal action against the station officer was declined.

Headnote :- Adverse judicial strictures / prior hearing - Applying Manish Dixit v. State of Rajasthan, (2001) 1 SCC 596, including its reliance on Dilip Kumar Deka v. State of Assam, the Court held that serious remarks affecting an identifiable officer's reputation or career require an opportunity to answer the proposed criticism. The Single Judge's paragraphs 12–13 had been issued without notice; they were set aside. Paragraph 12 was treated only as prima facie reasons supporting a show-cause notice, the officer was allowed one month to reply, and the Single Judge was to reconsider any final adverse remarks or DGP referral. Writ-appeal maintainability remained pending before a Full Bench; bail granted in the underlying criminal appeal was left intact.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In Criminal Appeal No. 13186/2024, a Single Judge had granted bail and, in paragraphs 12 and 13 of the same order dated 23 January 2025, made adverse remarks about the working and integrity of Omprakash Rawat, an officer connected to the prosecution/investigation, with consequential directions to the Director General of Police. The appeal against those paragraphs was Writ Appeal No. 267 of 2025 under Section 2(1) of the M.P. Uchcha Nyayalaya (Khand Nayaypeeth Ko Appeal) Adhiniyam, 2005. Rawat's only stated challenge to the strictures was the absence of prior hearing or show-cause notice.

The State raised a preliminary objection that an intra-court writ appeal could not lie against remarks made in a criminal appeal, suggesting Supreme Court recourse. Rawat replied that the same maintainability question was pending before a Full Bench in W.A. No. 990/2021. The Division Bench expressly did not resolve that larger question. It addressed the specific denial of an opportunity to be heard without waiting for the reference, because this dispute did not call for factual adjudication of the officer's alleged lapses at that stage. The Bench made no finding that Rawat was innocent of any investigative lapse or that final strictures were justified.

2. Precedents — Considered : Manish Dixit v. State of Rajasthan, (2001) 1 SCC 596, was quoted for the Supreme Court's repeated caution that a court should first hear a person before making castigating remarks, especially where career consequences may follow. The quoted passage expressly framed the requirement as natural justice, not a determination of the truth of the proposed criticism. It also referred to earlier Supreme Court rulings, including State of U.P. v. Mohd. Naim, Ch. Jage Ram v. Hans Raj Midha, R.K. Lakshmanan v. A.K. Srinivasan, Niranjan Patnaik v. Sashibhusan Kar, and State of Karnataka v. Registrar General, High Court of Karnataka, as a supporting line.

Manish Dixit reproduced the material reasoning of Dilip Kumar Deka (Dr.) v. State of Assam: severe aspersions on persons who were not parties to the proceeding, made without an opportunity to defend themselves, could affect character, reputation and career and violated fundamental natural justice. The present Division Bench adopted that precise notice rule for Rawat, whose integrity had been questioned without a show-cause notice. The Full Bench reference in W.A. No. 990/2021 was pending, not a precedent deciding maintainability, and the Division Bench made no contrary holding on it.

3. Statutes considered : Section 2(1) of the M.P. Uchcha Nyayalaya (Khand Nayaypeeth Ko Appeal) Adhiniyam, 2005 was the provision invoked for the intra-court writ appeal. The State disputed its application to an order in criminal proceedings, and a related question awaited the Full Bench. The Division Bench did not finally construe the section or settle the jurisdictional objection; it confined its decision to the denial of an opportunity to be heard. The bail in the underlying Criminal Appeal No. 13186/2024 remained governed by the Single Judge's order and was expressly preserved.

4. Issues : (i) Whether adverse remarks questioning a person's working and integrity, with possible DGP action, could stand when the person had not been notified or heard before the criminal appellate order. (ii) What limited corrective order would allow a fair response without prejudging the officer's conduct or disturbing the bail already granted. (iii) Whether the State's objection to intra-court appeal maintainability had to be decided while an equivalent question remained with the Full Bench; the Division Bench expressly left that issue unresolved.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Bench accepted that honest and efficient investigation matters to public order, but held that this did not remove the affected officer's entitlement to an opportunity to answer proposed integrity findings. The Manish Dixit and Dilip Kumar Deka passages supplied the natural-justice rule for serious strictures that could affect a person's career. Since no show-cause notice was issued before paragraphs 12 and 13 were made, those final observations could not stand in their existing form. The court did not test the substance of the prosecution lapses or the officer's defence. It converted paragraph 12 into prima facie reasons and a show-cause notice only, expressly withholding any finding of guilt, then required the Single Judge to decide afresh whether adverse remarks or a DGP referral remained justified after the reply and the available prosecution and defence material were considered.

The court noted the State's jurisdictional objection and the pending Full Bench reference, but resolved this appeal's specific hearing defect for complete justice without announcing a general rule that such writ appeals are maintainable. The Court expressly left the maintainability question open and confined the remand to the adverse remarks. It did not alter the criminal appeal's bail determination.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court set aside the observations in paragraphs 12 and 13 of the Single Judge's order of 23 January 2025 as final strictures. Paragraph 12 was treated as a show-cause notice and prima facie grounds only. Rawat was directed to file his reply in criminal appeal within one month of the date of this order. The Single Judge was requested to decide thereafter whether any adverse remarks or referral to the DGP, Bhopal, should be made after considering the prosecution lapses and Rawat's defence. The matter was remanded for that purpose alone; the previously granted bail remained intact. The writ appeal was disposed of, with its general maintainability question left to the pending Full Bench.

Omprakash Rawat v. Deepak Sengar and Ors., W.A. no. 267/2025, 13/07/2026, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Anuradha Shukla, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Matrimonial FIR / civil proceeding and alleged counterblast - Following Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, the Court held that a criminal complaint after divorce proceedings is not retaliatory merely because it was filed later. The High Court cannot quash under Section 482 CrPC by substituting extraneous civil findings for the FIR's allegations; civil and criminal questions proceed independently with different standards. The pending appeal from dismissal of the civil suit did not, by itself, establish bad faith or defeat the Section 498-A/34 IPC and dowry allegation.

Preliminary inquiry / cognizable matrimonial information - Applying Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, and CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2021 (8 October 2021), the Court held that an inquiry may be desirable in some family disputes but is not a mandatory pre-registration safeguard whose omission vitiates an FIR. Section 154 CrPC requires immediate registration where information discloses a cognizable offence; any permissible inquiry tests whether the information discloses a cognizable offence, rather than whether the accusation is true. Thommandru's discussion of Yashwant Sinha, Managipet and Charansingh reinforced the contextual, non-mandatory nature of preliminary inquiry. The quashing application failed.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Omprakash Uikey and other applicants challenged Crime No. 0006/2024 at Mahila Thana, Mandla, registered on 23 February 2024 for IPC Sections 498-A and 34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The FIR had been lodged by respondent No. 2. The applicants had already instituted proceedings under Section 27 of the Special Marriage Act. According to counsel, respondent No. 2 appeared and moved an Order VII Rule 11 CPC application on 20 December 2023; the civil court allowed it and dismissed the suit as not maintainable on 11 January 2024. First Appeal No. 447/2024 against that dismissal remained pending. The applicants argued that the later FIR was a retaliatory counterblast to the civil proceedings, that police had conducted no preliminary inquiry before registering it, and that applicant No. 4's cancer and kidney ailment made her prosecution untenable.

In Miscellaneous Criminal Case No. 13457 of 2024 under Section 482 CrPC, the relief as reproduced primarily asked the High Court to call for the FIR record, but the Court addressed counsel's express grounds for quashing the FIR/proceedings. The Public Prosecutor appeared. The Court dealt successively with chronology and alleged counterblast, the claimed preliminary-inquiry requirement, and applicant No. 4's medical position.

2. Precedents — Considered : Pratibha v. Rameshwari Devi, (2007) 12 SCC 369, was quoted and applied to the matrimonial counterblast argument. In that case the Supreme Court found it wrong to quash by adverse inference from delay and pendency of a divorce petition, since attempted reconciliation could explain waiting to complain and civil litigation cannot itself extinguish independent criminal proceedings. It invoked the State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal, 1992 Supp (1) SCC 335, illustrations and required the Section 482 court to assess the complaint or FIR allegations for a prima facie offence rather than rely on extraneous investigation or civil material. The present Judge used that limited principle to reject an automatic inference from the Special Marriage Act chronology. The Court observed that civil findings do not bind a criminal court and standards of proof differ. The suit had been dismissed on maintainability and its appeal was pending.

Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1 (Constitution Bench), was quoted for Section 154's mandatory registration when information reveals a cognizable offence, the limited inquiry to determine cognizability when it is not clear, and the rule that preliminary inquiry does not test veracity. Its illustrative possible inquiry categories included matrimonial/family disputes, commercial offences, medical negligence, corruption and abnormal reporting delay; they were not an exhaustive list or an automatic entitlement for accused persons. The quoted directions included prompt recording, closure reasons and diary entries, with a seven-day inquiry limit in the cited ruling. The Judge concluded that inquiry in a family matter may be desirable but its absence did not automatically invalidate this FIR.

CBI v. Thommandru Hannah Vijayalakshmi, Criminal Appeal No. 1045/2021, decided 8 October 2021, was then quoted extensively for its analysis of Lalita Kumari. It held that a preliminary inquiry is not mandatory even in the illustrated corruption category and cannot be made a precondition to an FIR on prima facie cognizable information; the CBI Manual is administrative guidance, not a statute overriding Section 154. Thommandru discussed P. Sirajuddin v. State of Madras, (1970) 1 SCC 595, for the sensitivity of corruption accusations against public servants; the Yashwant Sinha concurrence for a permissible preliminary inquiry where public-figure corruption or delay raises the question; Managipet for the absence of an accused's right to an inquiry and for assessment of the FIR as a whole under Bhajan Lal; and Charansingh for a permissible, contextual pre-FIR inquiry in disproportionate-assets allegations. Those corruption examples were part of the quoted Supreme Court reasoning; they were not held to be facts of this matrimonial FIR. The present Court adopted the common non-mandatory inquiry conclusion to reject the applicants' objection.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC was invoked to challenge the FIR under the Court's inherent powers. The Court used the prima facie FIR and abuse-of-process limits described in Pratibha, without conducting an evidentiary trial. Section 154 CrPC governed police registration of cognizable information and the limited place of preliminary inquiry explained in Lalita Kumari and Thommandru. IPC Sections 498-A and 34 and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were the alleged offence provisions in Crime No. 0006/2024. Section 27 of the Special Marriage Act governed the earlier matrimonial proceedings; Order VII Rule 11 CPC concerned dismissal of that suit as not maintainable, with a civil first appeal pending. The Court held that civil-court findings are not binding on the criminal court. Applicant No. 4's potential personal-appearance exemption was left to the trial court on a supported future application.

4. Issues : (i) Did the FIR's lodging after notice of Special Marriage Act proceedings alone show a retaliatory counterblast warranting quashing under Section 482? (ii) Was a preliminary inquiry mandatory before registration of this matrimonial FIR, such that omission vitiated it? (iii) Did applicant No. 4's asserted serious illness justify quashing her prosecution, and what narrower procedural remedy could she request?

5. Ratio / Findings : On counterblast, the Court rejected an inference based on timing alone. Pratibha explained why efforts to preserve a marriage may precede a later complaint after divorce litigation begins and why civil and criminal processes are independent even if their facts overlap. The Judge considered the 23 February FIR after the earlier suit and its 11 January dismissal, but found no basis in that sequence alone to label the FIR malicious. Civil-court findings were not to control the criminal case, and the burdens of proof differ. The ruling was confined to the ground advanced, not an independent finding that every FIR allegation was true or that genuine mala fides could never justify quashing.

On preliminary inquiry, the Court adopted Lalita Kumari's governing distinction: if the information discloses the commission of a cognizable offence, police must register an FIR. If it does not itself disclose a cognizable offence but calls for inquiry, that inquiry may be limited to whether such an offence is disclosed, rather than whether the information is true. Matrimonial disputes appear in an illustrative list in which inquiry may be considered, not as a mandatory procedural step. The Thommandru quotation reinforced through the corruption-related cases that the absence of an inquiry does not itself confer a right to have the FIR quashed. The Judge therefore rejected omission of preliminary inquiry as a defect automatically vitiating Crime No. 0006/2024.

Applicant No. 4's illness was not doubted for purposes of this narrow decision but, without more, did not bring the criminal proceedings to an end. The Court separated prosecution from the practical burden of attendance and permitted her to seek permanent exemption from personal appearance and representation through counsel, with the trial court to decide upon medical documents. This was a case-specific procedural liberty, not an acquittal or a finding on her alleged role. No other argument was advanced; the Section 482 application disclosed no ground for interference on the matters argued.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the application and did not quash the FIR or prosecution. Applicant No. 4 could apply to the trial court for permanent exemption from personal appearance, asking to be represented by counsel; the trial court was directed to consider and decide any such application after reviewing her medical documents. No exemption was granted outright.

Case Sr. no. (598) Prev Next

Headnote :- Public-servant sanction / reasonable official-duty nexus - Applying Gauri Shankar Prasad v. State of Bihar, (2000) 5 SCC 15, K. Kalimuthu v. State, (2005) 4 SCC 512, Shambhoo Nath Misra v. State of U.P., AIR 1997 SC 2102, and D. Devaraja v. Owais Sabeer Hussain, (2020) 7 SCC 695, the Court held that Section 197 CrPC requires a reasonable connection between the alleged act and the protected public servant's actual or purported official duty. Excess does not alone remove protection; duty cannot be a cloak for an unrelated crime. Gauri Shankar Prasad and Kalimuthu also explained that sanction may be considered at a later procedural stage on appropriate material. The Court found the ranger's forest-protection arrest and ensuing scuffle sufficiently connected, so the CJM should not have taken cognizance without sanction.

Sanction / former officer - Section 197(1) expressly says "is or was"; retirement did not defeat protection for an otherwise qualifying act while the applicant was a forest ranger. The complainant's retired-status objection failed, subject to the same protected-status and official-nexus requirements.

Quashing / no prima facie hurt offence on the assessed account - Independently, the Court found the arrest memo and two FIR accounts showed forest personnel acting to protect land and custody against a village attack. It held that reasonable force in that setting did not disclose IPC Sections 323 or 325 by the ranger on the facts it assessed, rejected the unsupported Section 4 Forest Rights Act claim, set aside the 20 March 2018 cognizance order, and accepted the police closure report.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The dispute arose around forest officials' taking Ramdas into custody on 11 July 2007 near Village Thega, District Harda. According to Munni Bai's FIR (Crime No. 90/07, lodged 12 July), ranger Omprakash Patel and forest staff took her husband from their home, villagers intervened to release him, a scuffle followed, and officials assaulted her, Rambhaors and Phoolwati; police registered IPC Sections 323 and 325. Patel's separate FIR, Crime No. 76/07, alleged that the party found Ramdas and others ploughing forest land unlawfully, arrested Ramdas in forest-protection work, and was then surrounded, assaulted, held overnight and deprived of articles by villagers seeking his release. That counter-FIR named numerous IPC offences, and counsel said police charge-sheeted multiple villagers. The Court referred to an arrest memo in the case diary. These were competing accounts; the order ultimately assessed them for the sanction and cognizance issues.

Police filed a closure report in Munni Bai's case. After recording statements of the complainant and witnesses, the Chief Judicial Magistrate, Harda, rejected it and on 20 March 2018 took cognizance of Sections 323 and 325 against Patel in Criminal Case No. 190/2018. Patel applied under Section 482 CrPC to set aside the cognizance order and ensuing proceedings and to have the closure report accepted. His counsel argued, even assuming the complainant's account for the limited purpose of the petition, that the incident was inseparable from an official arrest and forest work and required previous sanction under Section 197. He also disputed the assault allegation. Respondent No. 2 acknowledged his former public office but argued he was no longer a government servant, and invoked forest dwellers' rights under Section 4 of the Forest Rights Act, 2006 to resist allegedly unlawful forest action. When asked for material showing qualifying possession of the forest land at the relevant commencement date, her counsel conceded none was on record. The Court held the statutory protection applicable to the facts and status it assessed.

2. Precedents — Considered : Gauri Shankar Prasad v. State of Bihar, (2000) 5 SCC 15, was quoted extensively for Section 197's two threshold conditions: an eligible public servant not removable except with government sanction and an alleged offence committed while acting or purporting to act in official duty. The offence must have a reasonable and rational connection to that duty, not simply occur during service. The quoted ruling drew on Matajog Dobey v. H.C. Bhari, AIR 1956 SC 44, to explain that even an act exceeding what was necessary can retain the requisite connection if reasonably related to performance. It used Suresh Kumar Bhikamchand Jain v. Pandey Ajay Bhushan, (1998) 1 SCC 205, for the mandatory jurisdictional bar on cognizance and the possibility of raising sanction at any stage with relevant material; State v. B.L. Verma, (1997) 10 SCC 772, for purported-duty protection despite alleged abuse; and N.K. Ogle v. Sanwaldas, (1999) 3 SCC 284, as an illustration of a revenue officer's ostensibly official seizure. The present Court adopted the nexus and cognizance bar, not the facts of those other officials' cases.

K. Kalimuthu v. State, (2005) 4 SCC 512, was quoted for the middle course between treating every service-time offence as protected and denying all protection because crime is never an official duty. It reproduced B. Saha v. M.S. Kochar, (1979) 4 SCC 177, and Matajog Dobey's reasonable-connection formulation: colour of office and even excess may suffice, but a fanciful duty claim or unrelated private crime cannot. The quoted ruling referred to State of H.P. v. M.P. Gupta, (2004) 2 SCC 349, State of Orissa v. Ganesh Chandra Jew, (2004) 8 SCC 40, S.K. Zutshi v. Bimal Debnath, (2004) 8 SCC 31, and P.K. Pradhan v. State of Sikkim, (2001) 6 SCC 704, for the same nexus and the possibility that sanction be evaluated at successive stages. The present Judge used that standard to assess the ranger's conduct at the cognizance challenge stage.

Shambhoo Nath Misra v. State of U.P., AIR 1997 SC 2102, was quoted for sanction where the charged act is integral to public duty, coupled with the important limit that public office cannot camouflage a crime unrelated to duty. D. Devaraja v. Owais Sabeer Hussain, (2020) 7 SCC 695, was quoted for the same distinction in the context of a police officer: the nexus is not lost merely by excess or illegality in an official investigation, but an unrelated assault is outside Section 197. That case also considered Section 170 of the Karnataka Police Act, which did not itself govern this Madhya Pradesh forest ranger. The Judge applied the general Section 197 test, not a Karnataka-specific sanction rule.

Counsel additionally cited Rishipal Singh v. State of U.P., (2014) 7 SCC 215, and the Madhya Pradesh decision Lalaram Khattar v. Himanshu Singh, (2002) 1 MP Weekly Note 11.

3. Statutes considered : Section 197(1) CrPC barred cognizance without previous Central or State Government sanction, as applicable, for an eligible person who "is or was" a public servant not removable except with government sanction where the alleged offence was committed while acting or purporting to act in official duty. The court applied the official-duty nexus and the temporal wording after Patel's retirement. Other subsections of Section 197 were reproduced in the judgment, including their Armed Forces, President's Rule and prosecutorial-selection provisions. Section 190 CrPC was the general cognizance power displaced by the sanction prerequisite where Section 197 applies; Section 482 supplied the High Court's route to test the cognizance order and allegations. IPC Sections 323 and 325 were the hurt charges in Munni Bai's FIR and the CJM order. Patel's counter-FIR listed other IPC allegations against villagers.

Patel's account invoked Section 26 of the Indian Forest Act for the arrest in forest-land protection. Respondent No. 2 invoked Section 4 of the Scheduled Tribes and Other Traditional Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Act, 2006. The Judge asked for evidence of possession at the relevant commencement date, found none presented, and rejected that assertion as an answer on this record. Section 170 of the Karnataka Police Act appeared only in the quoted D. Devaraja precedent and was not a governing local statute.

4. Issues : (i) Whether Section 197(1) prior sanction was necessary before the CJM could take cognizance against this ranger for alleged hurt occurring during an arrest and resistance to forest officials, including the boundary between reasonably connected official conduct and unrelated crime. (ii) Whether retirement at the time of cognizance removed the protection despite the statutory phrase "is or was". (iii) Whether, apart from sanction, the complaint's allegations and record as assessed disclosed Sections 323 or 325 against Patel, in light of his arrest record and counter-FIR. (iv) Whether respondent No. 2's claimed forest rights displaced the official-duty context on material actually before the Court.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Judge first set out the Supreme Court authorities on Section 197. Gauri Shankar Prasad and K. Kalimuthu required protected public-servant status and a real, rational official-duty nexus. Matajog Dobey, B. Saha and D. Devaraja showed that conduct in excess of duty can still be connected, while Shambhoo Nath Misra and Devaraja warned that office is not a shield for an unrelated private crime. Suresh Kumar Bhikamchand Jain and P.K. Pradhan explained the bar on cognizance and the possibility of assessing the need for sanction at different stages. Applying those rules, the Court noted that even Munni Bai's version involved officials taking Ramdas in custody and villagers obtaining his release, while Patel's FIR and the arrest memo described enforcement against attempted encroachment and an attack on the forest party. It found Patel acting in forest protection and the disputed force arising from that duty. It held that Section 197 sanction was required and the CJM had not addressed it before taking cognizance. The judgment's conclusion concerns this record, not an automatic entitlement for every forest employee or any assault simply occurring on duty.

The retirement objection failed separately because Section 197 expressly covers a person who "is or was" in protected public office when alleged official conduct occurred. The timing of retirement did not remove a protection otherwise established by status and nexus. On the Forest Rights Act argument, respondent No. 2 supplied no documents establishing qualifying possession of the land as counsel was asked to do. The Court rejected that justification for the villagers' intervention in the context of this petition.

The Court gave an additional, independent ground. It read the competing FIRs and the arrest record as showing that the forest party was attacked while taking a lawfully arrested person and could use reasonable force to prevent his removal from custody. In the Court's assessment, even the complainant's account taken at face value did not disclose hurt offences by Patel in this setting and instead supported the essentials of his counter-FIR. That is the judgment's finding on whether the material prima facie disclosed an offence, not a final acquittal after trial of every participant's disputed conduct. The combination of the sanction bar and no-offence conclusion required reversal of the CJM's rejection of the closure report.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the application. It set aside the Chief Judicial Magistrate, Harda's order of 20 March 2018 in Criminal Case No. 190/2018 taking cognizance under IPC Sections 323 and 325 against Ompraksh Patel, and accepted the police closure report in Crime No. 90/07. The challenged criminal proceedings against this applicant consequently did not continue on that cognizance order.

Ompraksh Patel v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Ors., M.Cr.C. no. 21846/2018, 06/05/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Case Sr. no. (599) Prev Next

Headnote :- Homicide — Section 300 thirdly / intentional injury - Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, required proof of the bodily injury and its nature, intention to inflict that very injury, and its objective sufficiency in the ordinary course of nature to cause death; an intention to kill or an appreciation of the injury's lethal gravity is not a further element of Thirdly. The Bench explained the Section 299/300 distinction with Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra (Criminal Appeals 1078–1079 of 2005) and Anda v. State of Rajasthan, 1966 Cri LJ 171, before testing the fatal head injuries and, separately, whether the appellant inflicted them. Homicidal deaths were proved, but it was not proved that the appellant inflicted the injuries.

Homicide — single injury / intention / exception - Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, and Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, were considered for the proposition that a killing by a single blow does not automatically fall under Section 304: the weapon, vital site, force and surrounding circumstances determine intention; a single deliberately inflicted injury may amount to murder. Kanhaiyalal discussed Arun Raj, Ashokkumar Magabhai Vankar and Leela Ram; Bavisetti discussed State of Karnataka v. Vedanayagam and Virsa Singh. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, and Kanhaiyalal explained Exception 4's cumulative requirements of sudden mutual fight, heat of passion, no premeditation and no unfair advantage or cruelty. The Bench considered these principles before evaluating the evidence and ultimately acquitted the appellant.

Evidence — FIR / hearsay / eyewitness reliability - Atar Singh's immediate FIR named Battu and Shobharam; he arrived after the attack, and his attribution rested on what others told him, which the Court treated as inadmissible hearsay. The original informant was not examined; Diman described only a blow to one victim; other purported eyewitnesses were hostile, and material witnesses contradicted one another. These combined defects prevented reliable identification of Pahalwan as the assailant.

Evidence — recovery and medical proof - The officer recovered a luhangi from Pahalwan's room, while Diman described a lathi blow and expressly excluded a luhangi; Dr. Shakya considered the fatal injuries to both victims consistent with a lathi, which was not recovered from the appellant. The postmortems established homicidal deaths, but did not establish that he caused them. The inconsistency added substantial doubt to the defective ocular case.

Evidence — motive and rival suspects - The house-possession dispute, a quarrel with Battu and Shobharam two days earlier, and the FIR against those men supported a rival line of investigation; the prosecution established no motive for Pahalwan to kill his mother and daughter. Motive was one element in the cumulative assessment, not a substitute for proof that the other men were guilty.

Investigation — accountability / further investigation - Following Ankush Maruti Shinde v. State of Maharashtra, (2019) 15 SCC 470, and the guidance quoted in it requiring the responsible investigating or prosecuting officials to be identified after acquittal and their lapses assessed as innocent or blameworthy, the Court ordered DIG and Chief Secretary inquiries into what it found to be S.D. Nayar's intentional fabrication of the prosecution story and appropriate departmental action against erring serving officers within two months. It also ordered further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC against the FIR-named Battu and Shobharam; their guilt remained to be investigated. A proposed investigation app and supervisory access under Section 165 Evidence Act were ancillary expectations, not the ground of acquittal.

Constitution — Article 21 / public-law compensation - The appellant's almost six years of incarceration following false implication warranted more than acquittal. Ankush Maruti Shinde's Article 142 award was considered alongside State of Gujarat v. Islamic Relief Committee of Gujarat, (2018) 13 SCC 687, which confined public-law compensation to serious fundamental-right violations rather than every official default, and S. Nambi Narayanan v. Siby Mathews, (2018) 10 SCC 804, on malicious investigation violating liberty and dignity. Islamic Relief discussed Hindustan Paper Corporation, Rabindra Nath Ghosal and Nilabati Behera concerning the distinction between constitutional and private-law remedies; Nambi Narayanan reproduced Delhi Judicial Service Association's fair-investigation principle. The Bench applied these principles to award ₹2,00,000 from the State, payable within one month with proof of payment within 45 days, while allowing recovery from the investigator and two witnesses and preserving a further civil suit without adjustment.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On 28 October 2000, Brijrani and Chandni, respectively the mother and daughter of Pahalwan Singh, suffered fatal head injuries in a village house associated with Pahalwan and his brother Atar Singh. Atar had bought the house for ₹12,000, paid by Pahalwan, while Battu Jatav and Shobharam Jatav occupied part of it and resisted vacating it. An informant told Atar of a quarrel; when he arrived, Brijrani was dead and Chandni injured. His prompt FIR named Battu and Shobharam as the killers and recorded their presence with a lathi. Chandni later died. The investigating officer, S.D. Nayar, instead prosecuted Pahalwan, relying in part on a memorandum and recovery of a luhangi from his room. Dr. M.M. Shakya's postmortems established homicidal death from destructive head injuries to both victims. In Sessions Trial 46/2001, the Additional Sessions Judge at Camp Seondha convicted Pahalwan under Section 302 IPC on two counts on 22 December 2003, imposing life imprisonment and ₹200 fine on each count, concurrent sentences and two months' additional rigorous imprisonment on each count in default. In his appeal under Section 374(2) CrPC, Pahalwan challenged the eyewitness accounts, the weapon mismatch, omission of named witnesses from the spot map, lack of motive and alleged false implication. The State defended the conviction. He had served almost six years in custody by the appellate decision.

2. Precedents — Considered : Virsa Singh v. State of Punjab, AIR 1958 SC 465, supplied the four-stage enquiry under Section 300 Thirdly: injury and its nature, intention to inflict that injury, and its objective ordinary-course sufficiency to cause death. The Court explained and used the test as the governing legal framework, without treating fatal injury as proof that Pahalwan inflicted it. Arun Nivalaji More v. State of Maharashtra (Criminal Appeals 1078–1079 of 2005) explained Section 299's intention and knowledge limbs, the movement to the clauses and exceptions of Section 300, and the corresponding application of Section 304 Parts I and II when murder is not made out; the Bench reproduced this framework. Anda v. State of Rajasthan, 1966 Cri LJ 171, explained the ordinary-course sufficiency threshold and relevance of weapon and bodily site. Mahesh Balmiki v. State of M.P., (2000) 1 SCC 319, rejected automatic conversion of a single-blow killing to Section 304, emphasizing weapon, injury, site and manner. Pulicherla Nagaraju v. State of A.P., (2006) 11 SCC 444, supplied a non-exhaustive set of circumstances for inferring intention and distinguishing Sections 302 and 304; Sangapagu Anjaiah v. State of A.P., (2010) 9 SCC 799, illustrated intention from a forceful crowbar strike on a vital part. State of Rajasthan v. Kanhaiyalal, (2019) 5 SCC 639, reinforced that the number of blows is not decisive and discussed Arun Raj v. Union of India, (2010) 6 SCC 457 (weapon and vital site), Ashokkumar Magabhai Vankar v. State of Gujarat, (2011) 10 SCC 604 (forceful pestle blow) and Leela Ram (Exception 4 conditions). Bavisetti Kameswara Rao v. State of A.P., (2008) 15 SCC 725, likewise rejected a mechanical single-injury approach and quoted State of Karnataka v. Vedanayagam, (1995) 1 SCC 326, and Virsa Singh on the distinction between intending the actual injury and intending death. Dhirajbhai Gorakhbhai Nayak v. State of Gujarat, (2003) 9 SCC 322, set out the conjunctive Exception 4 conditions: no premeditation, mutual sudden fight and heat of passion, and no undue advantage or cruel or unusual conduct. The Bench considered those homicide authorities before the evidence. Ankush Maruti Shinde v. State of Maharashtra, (2019) 15 SCC 470, was used for the requirement to identify and act on culpable investigative/prosecutorial lapses, and separately as an example of an exceptional ₹5 lakh Article 142 award to falsely implicated accused. The quoted passage within Ankush refers to Kishanbhai. State of Gujarat v. Islamic Relief Committee of Gujarat, (2018) 13 SCC 687, supplied the limit that judicial-review compensation in public law depends on infringement of Article 21 rather than every statutory or official wrong; its reproduced discussion of Hindustan Paper Corporation, Rabindra Nath Ghosal and Nilabati Behera differentiated constitutional compensation from private damages and required a sufficiently grave rights violation or conscious abuse. S. Nambi Narayanan v. Siby Mathews, (2018) 10 SCC 804, treated malicious criminal proceedings as an injury to liberty and dignity calling for a public-law remedy; its reproduced Delhi Judicial Service Association passage stressed fair police investigation and respect for an arrestee's constitutional rights. The Bench applied the compensation line to this appellant's unjust custody, while acknowledging that the Supreme Court's Ankush award rested on Article 142 and that compensation remains fact-sensitive.

3. Statutes considered : IPC Sections 299 and 300 distinguish culpable homicide from murder by intention, knowledge, injury and the specified exceptions; clause Thirdly of Section 300 concerns an intended bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and Exception 4 requires the conditions of a sudden fight without premeditation or unfair advantage. Sections 302 and 304 provide the corresponding murder and lesser-homicide consequences. The original conviction was under Section 302 on two counts; the Court did not enter a Section 304 conviction. CrPC Section 374(2) supplied the appellate jurisdiction; Section 161 statements, the recovery memorandum and Section 173(8) further investigation arose in the inquiry, with the latter expressly ordered against Battu and Shobharam. Article 21 protected personal liberty and grounded this Court's compensation order for unjust incarceration; the cited Supreme Court's ₹5 lakh award was expressly under Article 142, and Articles 226 and 32 arose in the quoted discussion of public-law relief. Section 165 of the Evidence Act was mentioned only in the Bench's ancillary expectation for technology-enabled access to investigation material during trial; it was not a basis for the acquittal or compensation.

4. Issues : (i) Were the deaths culpable homicide and, applying Sections 299 and 300 and the Supreme Court's injury/intention tests, murder? (ii) Did the FIR, eyewitness evidence, medical opinion, weapon recovery and motive establish beyond reasonable doubt that Pahalwan caused both deaths, despite the initial attribution to Battu and Shobharam? (iii) What response was required to the investigator's apparent diversion of the case and the outstanding suspicion against the FIR-named men? (iv) Did almost six years of confinement following false implication infringe Article 21 so that compensation and ancillary recovery or civil remedies should follow? The cited sudden-fight exception and single-injury distinction were examined as legal context.

5. Ratio / Findings : The postmortems showed severe ante-mortem skull fractures and brain injury to both victims, sufficient to cause death, so homicidal death was established. Under Virsa Singh, intention to inflict the specific proved injury and objective fatal sufficiency are conceptually distinct, while the single-blow authorities reject automatic reclassification from murder. Those propositions did not establish that this appellant had inflicted the injuries, which required separate proof. Atar Singh had not witnessed the attack, and the Court treated his account of what others said about the perpetrators as hearsay. The original informant was not examined. Diman spoke of Pahalwan's lathi blow to Brijrani but did not account for the injury to Chandni; several purported eyewitnesses failed to support the prosecution, and material omissions and contradictions affected Battu, Shobharam and Dayaram. The claimed recovery was a luhangi, whereas Diman specifically denied that implement and the doctor considered the head injuries caused by a lathi; no lathi was recovered from Pahalwan. The FIR instead named Battu and Shobharam, and the house-possession dispute and their recent quarrel suggested a motive for them, while no motive was established for Pahalwan to kill his own mother and daughter. In the totality, the Bench found that Nayar had molded the investigation to implicate Pahalwan, rejected the two-count conviction and directed official inquiry under the accountability approach reproduced from Ankush Maruti Shinde. Its Section 173(8) direction reopened investigation into the other two men without determining their guilt. The idea of a police investigation app and access for trial judges was an ancillary expectation, not a condition of guilt. On compensation, the Court distinguished an ordinary acquittal from this finding of false implication and almost six years of unjust confinement. Islamic Relief Committee confined public-law damages to a qualifying fundamental-right injury; Nambi Narayanan addressed liberty and dignity harmed by malicious prosecution. Applying those limits, the Bench found an Article 21 infringement and awarded compensation, preserving separate civil relief.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court allowed the criminal appeal; the 22 December 2003 conviction and life sentences under Section 302 IPC on both counts were set aside, and Pahalwan Singh alias Chimme was acquitted. The concerned Deputy Inspector General was directed to inquire into investigator S.D. Nayar and take necessary action; the Chief Secretary, Home Department, was directed to inquire and take departmental action against erring serving officials within two months. Further investigation under Section 173(8) CrPC was ordered against Battu Jatav and Shobharam Jatav. The State was ordered to pay Pahalwan ₹2,00,000 within one month and file proof before the Principal Registrar within 45 days. It was permitted to recover that sum from Nayar's salary or pension and from Battu and Shobharam as land-revenue arrears. Pahalwan was left free to sue those three for additional compensation without adjustment of this award. Although then released on a 90-day parole, he was to be released forthwith if not wanted in another case; the trial record and a copy of judgment were to be returned promptly. The Chief Secretary and Director General of Police were also expected to consider the proposed investigation software and supervision arrangements.

Pahalwan Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, Cr.A. no. 73/2004, 01/09/2021, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Inherent powers — FIR threshold / police investigation - Section 482 CrPC permits quashing when uncontroverted allegations, read as a whole, disclose no prima facie offence or reveal a recognised abuse of process; the High Court cannot decide disputed evidence or conduct a trial before the investigation is complete. Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678, Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221, State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547, XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337, State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226, CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686, and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021, were considered in support of restraint against premature interference. The alleged offline grain distribution and later payment demand presented matters for investigation; an accurate POS record of online transfers did not resolve them.

Inherent powers — recognised quashing grounds / qualifications - S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, reproduced the categories in Bhajan Lal concerning allegations that disclose no offence when accepted at face value and proceedings instituted mala fide; Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, required caution and confined intervention to cases involving the absence of basic ingredients or exceptional abuse. It prohibited a mini-trial and ordinarily excluded reliance on material tendered by the accused. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, reinforced the same exceptional threshold; a narrow exception permits consideration of a public document or a document whose veracity the complainant does not dispute. The civil features of a dispute do not exclude criminal proceedings where the allegations otherwise disclose an offence. The Bench did not find any of the listed exceptions on the allegations before it.

FIR — public servant / preliminary inquiry - Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, requires registration under Section 154 CrPC where cognizable information is disclosed and permits a limited, time-bound preliminary inquiry only in appropriate circumstances to ascertain disclosure, not to verify truth. The Bench rejected the contention that a preliminary inquiry was mandatory merely because the complaint concerned a public servant. The Collector's Food Branch had complained of the officers' alleged demand, so the absence of a prior inquiry alone could not vitiate the FIR.

Special statute — general criminal law - State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, was applied for the rule that a separate statutory procedure does not by itself bar general criminal law. No bar to applying IPC Sections 420 and 409 to the alleged misconduct connected with PMGKA foodgrains was shown merely because a procedure under the Essential Commodities Act might also apply; those allegations remained investigable.

Quashing — disputed stock and official authority - The allegation was that officers promised POS adjustment for offline foodgrain distribution and later demanded payment of half the supposed shortage under threat of FIR. The applicant's reliance on online POS reconciliation, his transfer date, the absence of physical verification and his objection concerning formal authority did not resolve the alleged offline shortfall or demand. His nodal role and the shopkeepers' possible impression of authority made his actual participation an investigative issue, not a judicial finding of guilt.

Proceedings — earlier bail / material suppression / counsel remarks - The Court would not review its concluded anticipatory-bail refusal within the Section 482 case. S.J.S. Business Enterprises (P) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 7 SCC 166, held that suppression has consequences only if the suppressed fact could affect the merits; Neeraj Garg v. Sarita Rani, Civil Appeals 4555–4559/2021, cautioned against unnecessary criticism of counsel. Since prior inquiry was not mandatory, the alleged misstatement about its occurrence was immaterial to quashing; the Bench did not determine whether counsel had misled it.

Arrest protection — no coercive steps after dismissal - Neeharika Infrastructure Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeal 330/2021, following Habib Abdullah Jeelani and Ravuri Krishna Murthy, held that a blanket no-arrest direction after refusing to quash an FIR effectively bypasses Section 438 CrPC and obstructs a live investigation. The Bench declined the applicant's alternative request, particularly as anticipatory bail had already been refused, and dismissed the quashing application.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Fair-price shopkeepers at Dabra reported that Junior Supply Officer Surbhi Jain had directed distribution of foodgrains under the pandemic PMGKA scheme offline and promised that those quantities would later be deducted from the electronic POS closing balances. According to the report, the adjustment was not made and Jain threatened prosecution over the apparent stock shortage. They alleged that on 9 March 2021 she and Pankaj Karoriya visited and demanded 50% of the market value of the shortage, threatening an FIR if it was not paid. The Collector's Food Branch made the complaint; the Collector had suspended Jain. The police registered Crime 251/2021 at University Police Station, Gwalior, under IPC Sections 420 and 409. Karoriya, a public official who said he had left Dabra by 30 April 2020, sought quashing under Section 482 CrPC. He asserted that no preliminary inquiry preceded the FIR, the matter arose under a special foodgrain scheme or the framework of the Essential Commodities Act, POS data revealed no discrepancy in online allotment and distribution, no physical stock check established loss, and he had neither received money nor held authority to direct the alleged offline distribution. He relied on a claimed May 2020 permission for offline supply. The State answered that the real allegation concerned quantities distributed offline on an unfulfilled promise of POS adjustment and the later demand under threat of prosecution, so reconciliation of online POS figures and the dispute about his tenure did not resolve that allegation. His anticipatory-bail application had already been refused; he also sought no-coercive-action protection if the FIR challenge failed and complained of a possibly misleading statement at the bail hearing about preliminary inquiry.

2. Precedents — Considered : On premature quashing and the legitimate investigation of a disclosed offence, the Bench quoted Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678 (caution before quashing an uninvestigated FIR); Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221 (the statutory police investigation ordinarily proceeds, subject to exceptional malicious and vexatious cases); State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547 (public interest in collecting evidence for a disclosed offence and the three purposes for which Section 482 may be exercised carefully and without arbitrariness, quoting Swapan Kumar Guha and Jeffrey J. Diermeier); XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337 (no roving factual inquiry while allegations of blackmail or coercion remained matters for investigation); S. Martin (cited only for disapproval of a pre-completion assessment); State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226 (no assessment of the reliability of evidence or premature termination of prosecution, with recognised exceptions); CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686 (an accused's contested defence and minute factual findings belong at trial); and State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021, 30 July 2021 (the FIR is not an encyclopedia, particularly for financial irregularities in a public scheme). These authorities supported refusal to decide Karoriya's stock and tenure disputes on a Section 482 petition.

The Bench also explained the limits of that restraint. S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600, reproduced State of Haryana v. Bhajan Lal on allegations that disclose no offence when accepted at face value and on proceedings manifestly attended with mala fides, and cited Medchl Chemicals, Zandu Pharmaceutical and Shakson Belthissor on exceptional intervention to prevent a plainly false prosecution. Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336, called for a reasoned application of quashing principles to the particular facts. Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460, furnished the fuller Section 397/482 framework: examine the uncontroverted prosecution record for essential ingredients, patent improbability, legal bars and process abuse; balance liberty with investigation; avoid a mini-trial, ordinarily exclude external defence material, and recognise that a civil claim may coexist with a crime. Its discussion limited Madhavrao Jiwajirao Scindia's special civil-dispute observation through State of Bihar v. P.P. Sharma rather than accepting a universal rule permitting quashing merely because the prospects of conviction appeared bleak. Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319, reiterated Bhajan Lal's exceptional and cautious character. Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350, recognised consideration of a public or genuinely undisputed document as a narrow exception to the usual bar on considering defence documents. Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437, reproduced the full Bhajan Lal categories, alternative-remedy caution and Indian Oil Corporation's point that basic factual allegations need not reproduce the legal ingredients verbatim and civil as well as criminal consequences can coexist; it explained the restricted Madhavrao civil-dispute setting. M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373, confirmed quashing if full face-value allegations disclose no offence. M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682, balanced intervention against absurd, harassing proceedings with caution against obstructing genuine inquiries. The Court applied the shared threshold and found that the allegations in this FIR provided an adequate basis for investigation.

For registration, Lalita Kumari v. Government of U.P., (2014) 2 SCC 1, supplied the Section 154 requirement: cognizable information mandates an FIR, while a limited, ordinarily time-bound preliminary inquiry in illustrative categories depending on the facts, including corruption and commercial allegations, asks whether an offence is disclosed rather than whether the informant is truthful. The Court applied this to reject automatic invalidity merely because no inquiry preceded the registration of a case against a public servant. State of M.P. v. Rameshwar, (2009) 11 SCC 424, rejected the contention that the special statute provided the exclusive remedy when it did not bar recourse to general criminal law; by analogy the Bench refused to exclude IPC allegations merely because a foodgrain scheme or Essential Commodities Act procedure might also govern. S.J.S. Business Enterprises (P) Ltd. v. State of Bihar, (2004) 7 SCC 166, confined suppression consequences to facts material to the decision; Neeraj Garg v. Sarita Rani, Civil Appeals 4555–4559/2021, 2 August 2021, counselled restraint in irrelevant remarks about advocates. The Bench treated the disputed assertion about preliminary inquiry as immaterial, declining to find misconduct. Neeharika Infrastructure Pvt. Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, Criminal Appeal 330/2021, 13 April 2021, reiterated Habib Abdullah Jeelani and Ravuri Krishna Murthy against blanket no-arrest or no-coercive-step relief after declining quashing, because it effectively grants protection under Section 438 without its safeguards; the Bench applied that rule to reject the alternative prayer.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC preserved the High Court's inherent power to implement Code orders, prevent abuse of process and secure justice, exercisable with caution at the FIR stage where cognizable allegations are made. Section 154 CrPC governed FIR registration and the limited role of preliminary inquiry under Lalita Kumari. Section 438 CrPC supplied the distinct anticipatory-bail framework that a no-arrest direction could not bypass; the prior bail refusal was not reviewable in this Section 482 application. IPC Sections 420 and 409 were the registered accusations; their ingredients, proof and ultimate culpability were left to investigation or trial and were not finally adjudicated. PMGKA distribution rules, an alleged later offline permission and a suggested Essential Commodities Act procedure provided context, but no legal bar to investigation under the general provisions of the IPC was identified. Article 226 and CrPC Sections 397, 156(1), 155(2), 173(2) and 228 appeared within cited quashing authorities to explain the scope or illustrative categories; the present petition was decided under Section 482.

4. Issues : (i) Whether the allegations, taken at face value and in their entirety, disclosed a cognizable offence warranting investigation against Karoriya, or his POS balance, lack of physical verification, transfer date and asserted absence of authority made quashing proper without a factual inquiry. (ii) Whether a public-servant or scheme-related complaint required a preliminary inquiry before FIR registration and whether a special statutory or scheme procedure barred IPC Sections 420 and 409. (iii) Whether this petition could reopen the rejected anticipatory-bail request, or the alleged statement about inquiry at that hearing warranted adverse remarks. (iv) Whether the Court could dismiss the FIR challenge yet direct that no coercive steps be taken during the ongoing investigation. The legitimacy of actual offline instructions, shortage, demand, and participation remained investigative questions, rather than factual issues finally decided on their merits.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Supreme Court authorities establish a test based on allegations taken at face value, with recognised exceptions where essential ingredients are not disclosed, a legal bar applies, the allegations are inherently improbable or the proceedings are manifestly malicious; they also prohibit assessing contested evidence or the prospect of conviction as though conducting a trial. The alleged request to distribute foodgrains offline, uncorrected POS balance and 50% payment demand under threat of prosecution formed the nucleus of the Collector's complaint. Figures showing correct online stock transactions did not answer whether offline distribution occurred or should have been credited. Whether the officers ordered it, how the stock was handled, whether money was demanded, the applicant's actual dates of involvement and the shopkeepers' impression of his authority required inquiry; his appointment as a nodal officer meant that his assertion that participation was impossible could not be resolved at this initial stage. The Court treated these as sufficient prima facie allegations, not as established guilt or an express final finding on the legal elements of IPC Sections 420 and 409. Under Lalita Kumari, mandatory registration follows cognizable information. A preliminary inquiry may be desirable in a matter involving a public servant, but it is not a universal prerequisite whose absence invalidates an FIR; a complaint by the Collector's Food Branch strengthened the context. Rameshwar precluded automatic displacement of the IPC merely because a special law or scheme supplies another procedure, unless a bar is demonstrated. The rejected anticipatory-bail order could be challenged in the appropriate forum but not reargued as the Section 482 case. Since preliminary inquiry was not a legal prerequisite here, the Court considered the alleged misstatement on that question immaterial under S.J.S. Business Enterprises and applied Neeraj Garg to avoid gratuitous criticism, without deciding whether counsel actually misled the Court at the earlier hearing. Finally, Neeharika barred the requested blanket arrest protection when investigation was to proceed and bail had already been refused; the proposed order would evade Section 438's conditions.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the application under Section 482 to quash Crime 251/2021. No interim or final no-coercive-action direction was granted, and the earlier anticipatory-bail refusal was not reopened. Investigation into the allegations under IPC Sections 420 and 409 could continue; the Court made no final finding of criminal guilt, actual shortage or receipt of money.

Headnote :- Matrimonial cruelty — husband and relatives / scope of earlier quashing - Priyanka Sharma v. State of M.P., 2023 (2) MPLJ (Cri) (SC) 586, had quashed the proceedings against the husband's parents and sister because their alleged involvement was general and the FIR was retaliatory as to those appellants. The Bench read the Supreme Court's express limitation in paragraphs 21–23 and distinguished the husband, against whom the wife alleged specific demands, assault, abuse and continuing harassment. A decision quashing proceedings only against the relatives does not extinguish the husband's separate Section 498-A/34 IPC and Section 4 Dowry Prohibition Act case.

Foreign judgment — divorce / Section 13 CPC conclusiveness - The husband described the Swedish divorce as one by mutual consent, but his own petition sought divorce for the wife's alleged cruelty and she had not jointly petitioned. The decree gave no reasons on those allegations, contained unclear observations about the wife's right to divorce, and did not adjudicate the merits of the material allegations in a manner consistent with the applicable Indian law. The Court treated it as inconclusive under Section 13 CPC and of no assistance to quashing; it made no universal pronouncement against foreign decrees.

Inherent powers — face-value allegations / no mini-trial - Neeharika Infrastructure (P) Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, was quoted for the police duty to investigate cognizable allegations, exceptional quashing where none are disclosed, and restraint against testing the truth of the allegations or treating the FIR as an exhaustive account of every detail. The Bench applied that framework to the wife's specific allegations against the husband and left the assessment of their reliability to the appropriate process for determining the facts. Its paragraph 19 list of earlier Supreme Court quashing cases was invoked collectively for the same threshold.

Inherent powers — mala fides / legal evidence distinction - Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Sharma, (2008) 12 SCC 346, discussed the Section 482 purposes, R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal categories, and the distinction between absence of legal evidence and contested evidence requiring assessment at trial. It further explained that an informant's alleged mala fides are secondary where the allegations disclose a cognizable offence. The Bench followed that qualification in rejecting the husband's retaliation claim at the quashing stage; dismissal did not establish guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The complainant married Pankaj Kumar Mishra on 3 February 2014. In her FIR she alleged that her father gave ₹5 lakh, gold, a diamond ring, clothes and household articles at marriage, but her husband and his family later demanded more dowry and taunted her family for insufficient spending. She attributed physical assault to her husband in Rewa, abuse during a pregnancy and its termination, further monetary demands around family engagements in Gwalior, and continuing harassment while living with him in Sweden. She alleged a renewed ₹50 lakh demand, assault in 2016, a threat to her parents in March 2017, and deprivation of food and sustained humiliation. These remained her allegations, not findings of guilt. Crime 139/2018 at Mahila Thana, Padav, Gwalior, invoked Section 498-A/34 IPC and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The husband applied under Section 482 CrPC to quash the FIR, charge sheet and consequential proceedings. He relied on the Supreme Court's earlier quashing of proceedings against his parents and sister in Priyanka Sharma, asserted that a Swedish court had already divorced the spouses, and alleged a false retaliatory FIR. The State and complainant opposed him. The Court examined the Swedish petition and decree and distinguished the allegations against the relatives from those against the husband.

2. Precedents — Considered : In Priyanka Sharma v. State of M.P., 2023 (2) MPLJ (Cri) (SC) 586, the Supreme Court had quashed the case against this husband's parents and sister. The present Court read paragraphs 21–23 closely: the description of the FIR as retaliatory was expressly confined to those appellants, and the absence of a convincing occasion for the wife to visit and reside with relatives after the Swedish divorce affected their alleged involvement. The Supreme Court applied the need for clear and specific allegations before relatives are put on trial. The Bench distinguished the husband's directly alleged conduct, so it did not extend that disposition to him. Paragraph 19 of the present judgment names XYZ v. State of Gujarat, (2019) 10 SCC 337; State of Tamil Nadu v. S. Martin, (2018) 5 SCC 718; Ajay Kumar Das v. State of Jharkhand, (2011) 12 SCC 319; Mohd. Akram Siddiqui v. State of Bihar, (2019) 13 SCC 350; State of A.P. v. Gourishetty Mahesh, (2010) 11 SCC 226; M. Srikanth v. State of Telangana, (2019) 10 SCC 373; CBI v. Arvind Khanna, (2019) 10 SCC 686; State of M.P. v. Kunwar Singh, Criminal Appeal 709/2021; Munshiram v. State of Rajasthan, (2018) 5 SCC 678; Teeja Devi v. State of Rajasthan, (2014) 15 SCC 221; State of Orissa v. Ujjal Kumar Burdhan, (2012) 4 SCC 547; S. Khushboo v. Kanniammal, (2010) 5 SCC 600; Sangeeta Agrawal v. State of U.P., (2019) 2 SCC 336; Amit Kapoor v. Ramesh Chander, (2012) 9 SCC 460; Padal Venkata Rama Reddy v. Kovuri Satyanarayana Reddy, (2012) 12 SCC 437; and M.N. Ojha v. Alok Kumar Srivastav, (2009) 9 SCC 682. The Court cited these authorities together for the accepted rule that Section 482 does not permit a roving credibility inquiry where the allegations, taken at face value, disclose an offence.

Neeharika Infrastructure (P) Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, (2021) 19 SCC 401, was discussed in detail. Its quoted principles recognize the statutory police investigation of cognizable offences, exceptional intervention if the FIR discloses none, the requirement that quashing be rare and undertaken cautiously, no premature credibility assessment, and the fact that an FIR is not an encyclopedia. The passage also preserves the Court's jurisdiction under R.P. Kapur and Bhajan Lal parameters to prevent abuse; it does not make police investigation immune from judicial review. The Bench applied those limits to the present detailed allegations. Renu Kumari v. Sanjay Sharma, (2008) 12 SCC 346, was quoted on the three purposes of inherent power, its exceptional use, and R.P. Kapur categories of a legal bar, allegations that disclose no offence when accepted at face value, or clear absence of supporting legal evidence. Its reproduced Bhajan Lal illustrations address absence of cognizable allegations, patent improbability, legal bar and manifestly malicious proceedings. Renu Kumari distinguishes plainly absent legal evidence from evidence whose probative force requires assessment at trial and observes that informant mala fides are secondary when the complaint states a cognizable offence. The Bench expressly applied that last limit to the husband's claim. Other cases named in the nested Renu quotation were supporting references in that Supreme Court passage.

3. Statutes considered : Section 498-A IPC governed the allegations of cruelty to a married woman, Section 34 the alleged shared action, and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act the alleged dowry demands. The Court did not try or conclusively determine whether their ingredients were established in the Section 482 application. Section 482 CrPC, whose counterpart in Section 528 BNSS was also mentioned in the judgment, supplied the power to quash where accepted allegations disclose no offence or continuation of the proceedings would be an abuse of process, subject to the restrictions explained by the cited authorities. Section 13 CPC was applied to test whether the Swedish divorce judgment was conclusive: the Court focused on the absence of adjudication on the merits and the treatment of applicable Indian law among the section's listed exceptions. The other exceptions, including competence, natural justice, fraud and breach of Indian law, were reproduced from the statute but were not all found to exist independently on the facts.

4. Issues : (i) Did Priyanka Sharma's quashing of the FIR as to the husband's relatives also determine this husband's application, given the distinct allegations against each? (ii) Was the Swedish divorce a conclusive foreign judgment given on the merits under Section 13 CPC that displaced the later criminal allegations, and was the petition genuinely joint? (iii) Did the wife's accusations against the husband, taken as true solely for assessment under Section 482, disclose the registered offences, or could the Court decide his denial and accusation of retaliatory malice without a trial? The Court did not determine whether the alleged assaults, demands or miscarriage-related events were true.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Supreme Court's Priyanka Sharma decision dealt with parents and sister, and qualified its retaliatory-FIR observation to those appellants. Its concern that general accusations against relatives should not force them into trial did not address the present husband's separately pleaded demands, assaults and conduct in Rewa, Gwalior and Sweden. On the foreign judgment, the husband's Swedish filing itself sought divorce for her alleged cruelty and stated that she would not agree to mutual divorce; the decree's short formulation did not explain the pleaded ground, gave no reasons on material issues and referred unclearly to her right to divorce although she had not sought it. The Bench regarded that decree as inconclusive under Section 13 CPC and unable to support his request, without deciding matrimonial status for every purpose. Applying the Section 482 test stated in Neeharika and the cited quashing cases to the allegations taken at face value, the Bench found specific prima facie cruelty and dowry allegations against the husband. Their disputed truth and the assertion of malice could not be resolved through a roving enquiry in this proceeding. Renu Kumari did not make motive alone decisive once a cognizable offence was alleged; investigation and trial would determine the evidentiary merits. The finding that allegations sufficed for prosecution remained a determination at the preliminary stage and did not amount to a conviction.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the husband's application. The FIR, charge sheet and consequential proceedings in Crime 139/2018 under Section 498-A/34 IPC and Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act were not quashed as to him. The judgment did not disturb the Supreme Court's separate relief already granted to his parents and sister, did not grant other protective directions, and left the question whether the wife's accusations were proved or disproved to the continuing proceedings.

Headnote :- Trial — Section 319 CrPC / additional accused - Hardeep Singh v. State of Punjab, (2014) 3 SCC 92, was quoted and applied. The evidence produced before the court need not yet have been tested by cross-examination. It must show more than a mere probability of involvement and make out a stronger case than the prima facie case required at the stage of framing a charge. However, the required satisfaction falls short of a conclusion that the evidence, if unrebutted, would lead to conviction; the Court must not form an opinion on guilt at this stage. The complainant's examination-in-chief specifically attributed instigation of an assault to Pankaj Yadav, as did his FIR and police statement; the Bench held the trial evidence sufficient to uphold the summons for him to be tried with the existing accused.

Trial — police exoneration / trial evidence - The investigating officer had omitted Pankaj from the charge sheet after obtaining statements of witnesses who said he was absent. The Court considered the consistent direct allegation by the complainant and expressed concern that the officer had sought to protect the applicant, a head constable, against the background of a strained family dispute and a separate prosecution under Section 498-A. The police conclusion did not bind the trial court's assessment under Section 319. The summons and revisional order were affirmed without deciding the applicant's guilt.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : After a complaint concerning an altercation at a funeral, police registered Crime 268/2019 at Civil Line, Harda, for IPC Sections 294, 323, 506 and 34. Complainant Hari Narayan Yadav alleged in the FIR and Section 161 CrPC statement that Pankaj Yadav scolded him and instigated Santi Devi, who assaulted him. The families' relations were strained because a complaint by Hari Narayan's daughter had already led to a Section 498-A prosecution involving Pankaj's family. The police interviewed several persons who stated that Pankaj was not present and excluded him from the charge sheet. During trial, Hari Narayan repeated the specific instigation account in his examination-in-chief. The Chief Judicial Magistrate, Harda, in RCT 659/2019 summoned Pankaj as an additional accused under Section 319 CrPC by order dated 1 September 2022. A criminal revision, No. 90/2022, was dismissed on 10 January 2023. Pankaj invoked Section 482 CrPC to challenge both orders, arguing that, in view of the police witnesses' contrary accounts and his omission from the charge sheet, the Supreme Court's standard under Section 319 had not been met. His counsel disclosed that he was a police head constable and that the complainant too was a constable.

2. Precedents — Considered : Hardeep Singh v. State of Punjab and Others, (2014) 3 SCC 92, paragraph 106, supplied the controlling Section 319 standard. Evidence before the trial court can be considered at the examination-in-chief stage without necessarily waiting for cross-examination. Mere probability of a person's involvement is insufficient: the degree of satisfaction is higher than the ordinary prima facie standard at the stage of framing a charge, though below the level of assurance that the evidence, if unrebutted, would compel conviction. The statutory phrase concerns a person who could be tried with the accused, not a person already found guilty. The Bench applied this standard to Hari Narayan's trial testimony, supported by his consistent earlier accounts, and sustained the summons notwithstanding the police decision to omit Pankaj. The applicant himself relied on Hardeep Singh for the opposite conclusion; the Court did not adopt his appraisal of the police witnesses.

3. Statutes considered : Section 319 CrPC allows a trial court, on evidence emerging during trial, to proceed against an additional person who appears to have committed an offence for which that person could be tried with the existing accused; its heightened threshold and absence of a guilt determination governed the decision. Section 161 CrPC statements and the FIR were part of the consistency and investigation background; the decisive in-court evidence was the complainant's examination-in-chief. Section 482 CrPC was invoked to correct alleged jurisdictional error in the summoning and revision orders. IPC Sections 294, 323, 506 and 34 were the registered offences, and Section 498-A was background to family hostility, without a finding of those offences in this application.

4. Issues : The issues were whether the complainant's in-court allegation that Pankaj instigated Santi Devi's assault met Section 319's threshold for summoning an additional accused even though the police had omitted him from the charge sheet and recorded several statements asserting his absence; and whether the trial or revisional court had committed a jurisdictional error warranting Section 482 intervention. The truth of the alleged instigation and the applicant's guilt were reserved for trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court identified the complainant's specific accusation at three stages: the FIR, his Section 161 statement and his examination-in-chief. Under Hardeep Singh, the in-court account was available for Section 319 consideration before cross-examination, subject to a standard higher than the prima facie standard applicable at the stage of framing a charge. The Bench considered the statements recorded by the police asserting the applicant's absence but was concerned by the investigating officer's apparent effort to obtain accounts that Pankaj was absent; it expressly inferred that the investigating officer had attempted to protect him. The earlier Section 498-A case explained strained relations and context, while the applicant's police rank was noted in assessing the officer's approach. On the specific trial evidence, the Bench held the threshold satisfied and found no jurisdictional error. Section 319 concerns joint trial and does not permit an opinion on guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the application under Section 482. The Chief Judicial Magistrate's Section 319 order dated 1 September 2022 and the revisional order dated 10 January 2023 were affirmed; Pankaj remained summoned as an additional accused for trial. No finding of guilt or sentence was imposed.

Pankaj Yadav v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 27121/2023, 02/04/2024, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Charge — misdescription / Section 216 CrPC - The FIR named Najma Begum as the informant, whereas the charge incorrectly named Jaswant Singh. The applicant had not moved the trial court under Section 216 for alteration or correction of the charge and had not shown that the mistake would cause serious prejudice. The Court held that he could apply to the trial court for correction. The error did not justify setting aside the charge or the revisional order in the Section 482 proceeding.

Charge — defence material / limited judicial review - State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, (2005) 1 SCC 568, was followed for the rule that charges must be framed on the material relied on by the prosecution, without considering the accused's defence. The claim of old enmity was not substantiated. The reference to hot curry in the medical history, as against hot meat in the FIR, did not displace the recorded burning sensation in both eyes. The charges were upheld, with an express direction that the trial court must decide independently on the evidence led at trial. The order records one of the charges as '504-A IPC'.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : The prosecution case was that Pappan had thrown hot meat on Muskan's face, causing a burning sensation in her eyes. The medical record mentioned a history of hot curry being thrown into her eyes and recorded burning in both eyes. The applicant also relied on the interval between the MLC on 17 September 2018 and hospital treatment on 20 September. Najma Begum had lodged the FIR, but the framed charge incorrectly named Jaswant Singh as the complainant. Pappan alleged false implication on account of old enmity. On 13 February 2020, the JMFC, Gwalior, framed charges described in the order as IPC Sections 352, 324 and '504-A' in Criminal Case 4430/2020. The 17th Additional Sessions Judge affirmed that order in Criminal Revision 112/2020 on 2 September 2021. Pappan then sought interference under Section 482 CrPC.

2. Precedents — Considered : State of Orissa v. Debendra Nath Padhi, (2005) 1 SCC 568, was invoked and followed for the rule that, at the stage of framing charges, the accused is not entitled to raise a defence to oppose the charges. The trial court considers the prosecution material for that limited purpose. The Court applied this rule in declining to conduct a detailed inquiry into the applicant's asserted enmity and the factual inferences he sought to draw from the medical wording and treatment interval. It did not decide whether the accusation was true or finally assess the evidentiary weight of the medical record.

3. Statutes considered : Section 216 CrPC permits alteration or addition of a charge and enabled the applicant to bring the incorrect complainant's name to the trial court's attention. Section 482 CrPC was the inherent jurisdiction invoked after revision. The Court did not exercise it in place of the available application for correction of the charge when no serious prejudice had been shown. The order describes the framed charges as IPC Sections 352 and 324 and, in its own wording, '504-A'.

4. Issues : Did the incorrect mention of Jaswant Singh instead of Najma Begum in the charge require the charge order to be set aside when an application under Section 216 was available and no serious prejudice was claimed? Did the applicant's asserted enmity, the reference to hot meat in the FIR as against hot curry in the MLC, and the interval before treatment sufficiently undermine the prosecution material to justify interference under Section 482 at the stage of framing charges? The nature of the substance and injury, and the applicant's guilt, remained questions for trial.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court accepted that the complainant's name in the charge differed from the name in the FIR. However, the applicant had not sought correction from the trial court under Section 216 and had not shown that the mistake caused serious prejudice to the defence. He could apply for correction under that provision; the error was not treated as fatal to the charge. Applying Debendra Nath Padhi, the Court considered the prosecution material and declined to determine the unsupported defence of old enmity. The FIR could not be discarded merely because the medical history referred to hot curry rather than hot meat. A burning sensation in both eyes was recorded. These limited findings justified allowing the charges to stand, but were expressly not to prejudice the trial court's assessment of the evidence led at trial.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court dismissed the Section 482 application. The JMFC's charge order dated 13 February 2020 and the revisional order dated 2 September 2021 affirming it remained in place. The applicant could apply to the trial court under Section 216 CrPC to correct the complainant's name. The High Court directed that its observations, made within the limited scope of review at the stage of framing charges, must not prejudice the trial. The trial court was to decide the case strictly on the evidence subsequently brought on record.

Pappan v. State of M.P. and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 52364/2021, 07/12/2021, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Criminal appeal — sentence completed / surviving conviction challenge - The appellants completed the five-year sentences and paid the fines in this case during pendency of their Section 374 CrPC appeal. The Court held that completion of punishment does not make an appeal against conviction infructuous; it considered the evidence and set the convictions aside. They remained under life imprisonment in another case, so their acquittal in this case did not result in an order for their immediate release.

Identification — dock evidence without a prior test identification parade of the accused - Absence of a test identification parade is not by itself fatal if reliable dock identification establishes identity. Here, the injured Meerabai did not identify anyone. Ramjilal admitted that he was attacked while asleep and lost consciousness. Mohan's claim at trial that he could identify the assailants and that there was adequate light was materially inconsistent with his police statement and the spot map, which showed no source of light in the field. The Court found no reliable identification of Pappu, Chand Khan or Shaukat beyond reasonable doubt.

Identification — seized property / contaminated parade - The later seizure of ornaments from Pappu could not connect the appellants to the robbery. Meerabai had been shown the very articles by police before identification. No similar pieces were mixed despite what the identification memo recorded; officers were present, the memo was signed at the police station on the SHO's instruction and the conducting officer was not examined. The earlier memoranda had stated that the stolen articles had been sold to a jeweller in Aligarh, who was never questioned; the mangalsutra was not recovered. The Court rejected the property identification and acquitted all three on the charged IPC and MPDVPK Act offences.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : In the early hours of 8 June 2013, an attack by intruders was reported at a family's home. Kalyan Singh heard his nephew Mohan's cries and found Mohan, Ramjilal and Meerabai injured; ornaments were missing, and the injured were initially unable to identify the attackers to him. His prompt report, approximately 45 minutes after the alleged event, led to Crime 72/2013 under Section 394 IPC against unknown persons. The prosecution alleged that Pappu alias Sartaj, Chand Khan alias Chandmiya and Shaukat alias Toofan had assaulted the family and robbed gold and silver ornaments. The police did not conduct a test identification parade of the accused. The initial memoranda recorded after arrest stated that the stolen articles had been sold to a jeweller in Aligarh; a later Pappu memorandum led to seizure of earrings, a nose pin and bangles from his house, followed by a disputed identification of the ornaments. The Special Judge (MPDVPK Act), Gwalior, in Special Sessions Trial 30/2014 convicted the three under Section 394 IPC read with Section 13 of that Act on 11 August 2017 and imposed rigorous imprisonment for five years with fines and default terms, with the main sentences concurrent. In their jail appeal under Section 374 CrPC, they denied that identification and recovery proved guilt. By December 2021 the appellants had served the custodial terms in this case and paid the fines, but they remained imprisoned for life in another crime. The Court therefore first determined that their conviction appeal still required adjudication.

2. Precedents — Considered : The Court assessed the witness testimony, police statements, spot map, seizure memoranda and identification procedure in deciding the appeal.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC provided for the appeal against conviction; completion of the sentence did not dispose of it. IPC Section 394 was the provision under which robbery causing hurt was charged, read with Section 13 of the MPDVPK Act as named in the judgment. The police had also filed a charge sheet referring to Sections 11/13 of that Act, while the framed charges and appealed conviction were described as Section 394 IPC read with Section 13. The decisive issue was proof of identity and connection to the loot beyond reasonable doubt. The police statements and identification of the material objects were assessed as evidentiary circumstances.

4. Issues : (i) Did the injured witnesses reliably identify each appellant as an attacker when no test identification parade of the accused had been conducted and their accounts identifying the appellants in court conflicted with their opportunities to observe the assailants and their prior statements? (ii) Were the ornaments genuinely recovered and reliably identified as the victims' stolen property, considering the inconsistent memoranda, the prior police display, lack of mixed articles and the unexamined identification officer? (iii) Did completion of the custodial sentence end the appeal, and could acquittal result in their release when the appellants were serving life imprisonment in a separate case?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court held that the appeal remained for adjudication despite completion of the five-year sentence. As to the identity of the assailants, the absence of a prior test identification parade did not automatically rule out identification in court; its reliability still depended on whether the witnesses had seen the assailants and could consistently recognise them. Meerabai did not identify any of the appellants. Ramjilal's claim in examination-in-chief could not be relied on in view of his admission that he was assaulted while asleep and immediately became unconscious. Mohan's claim to recognise the assailants and to have had light in the field was weakened by material omissions and contradictory details in Ex. D/2, and neither a pole nor a bulb or other light appeared in the spot map. Thus no reliable identification of the three appellants was established. As to the identity of the property, Pappu's first memorandum stated that the articles had been sold; a later memorandum led to the recovery of ornaments said to be at his home, while the named Aligarh jeweller was not questioned and the mangalsutra mentioned in the FIR was not recovered. More decisively, the purported identification was suggestive: police displayed the pieces to Meerabai beforehand, no comparable jewellery was intermingled, officers attended, Ramjilal signed the memo at the station on the SHO's instruction, and the person conducting identification did not testify. The Court found that the apparent recovery could not be reliably linked to the victims' property. With neither the appellants nor the articles reliably identified, the prosecution had failed to prove the charges beyond reasonable doubt as to any appellant.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court allowed the appeal. All three appellants were acquitted of the charged offences, and the Special Judge's conviction and sentence dated 11 August 2017 were set aside. The Court issued no release order because the appellants were serving life imprisonment in a separate Crime 237/2014; service of the sentence and payment of the fine in this case had already been reported.

Pappu and Others v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 1219/2017, 07/02/2022, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Connected criminal appeals / separate trials - A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner (Criminal Appeal 1306/2021, 29 October 2021) was applied: the testimony recorded in Pappu's trial could not be read for or against Phulle in the latter's separate trial, or conversely, although their appeals were heard together. Separate judgments were delivered. The present appeal concerned the murders of Imambaksh and Jameel; the connected Jainuddin case also arose from a distinct trial.

Identification / evening light - Ramesh v. State, (2010) 15 SCC 49, cautions against discounting identification by rural witnesses familiar with the accused solely because illumination was meagre and against measuring their accustomed visual capacity by urban standards. Applying that context-dependent rule, the Court found sufficient opportunity at the market on the April evening: a gas lantern, residual light, firearm wounds indicating firing from close range and longstanding acquaintance supported the eyewitness identification despite power shedding. The principle did not substitute for examination of their actual viewing opportunity.

Related and interested witnesses / credibility - Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, and Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, reject kinship as an automatic reason to disbelieve witnesses who are close relatives. Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, quoting Dalip Singh and Masalti and referring to Guli Chand, Jagir Singh and Lehna, requires a foundation for false-implication claims and cautious appraisal without mechanical rejection or a universal corroboration rule. Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, drawing on Kalki, Ganapathi and Jayabalan, distinguishes a naturally present relative from one who derives a benefit from conviction or has a motive to secure punishment through false implication. It requires evidence that is probable, cogent and consistent. The Court applied these principles to the relatives' natural presence near adjoining shops and contemporaneous hospital attendance, then accepted their accounts after scrutiny; it did not equate relationship alone with interest.

Motive / inimical witnesses - State of A.P. v. Dr M.V. Ramana Reddy, (1991) 4 SCC 536, recognises that bitterness can lead to deliberate false implication or mistaken inference. Anil Rai v. State of Bihar, (2001)

7 SCC 318, requires anxious scrutiny for exaggeration or the false implication of others, but permits otherwise convincing direct evidence despite prior disputes; Sushil v. State of U.P., 1995 Supp (1) SCC 363, also treats enmity as a possible motive for both crime and accusation and requires caution and reliable corroboration. Applying these authorities, the Court examined the competing Section 307 cases and counterblast theory, found the eyewitness account credible, and treated pressure to compromise as the motive for the attack. Mere enmity did not create reasonable doubt.

Firearm proof / inconclusive FSL - The seized pistol showed firing but could not be linked conclusively to empty cartridges lacking percussion caps. Rakesh v. State of U.P., (2021) 7 SCC 188, treats a recovered gun that does not match the ballistic evidence, at most, as a case of non-recovery of the actual weapon; recovery is not a sine qua non for conviction. Gulab v. State of U.P. (Criminal Appeal 81/2021, 9 December 2021) found that non-recovery does not discredit otherwise proved gunshot injury, and Krishna Gope v. State of Bihar, (2003) 10 SCC 45, rejected benefit from failure to find a concealed firearm. The Court applied these limited principles in light of the accepted eyewitness testimony and medical findings of firearm injuries; it did not claim the FSL positively matched this pistol to the murders.

Independent witnesses / public reluctance - Ambika Prasad v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2000) 2 SCC 646, applying State of U.P. v. Anil Singh, explains why independent persons may avoid investigation and court attendance and rejects an automatic adverse inference or a requirement of independent corroboration when the testimony of the examined eyewitnesses is otherwise true and acceptable. The Court therefore did not reject the established family eyewitness accounts merely because no independent market bystander testified.

Murder / differentiated participation - On the accepted evidence, Pappu shot Imambaksh, while Phulle shot Jameel when he intervened. Pappu's Section 302 IPC conviction for the first murder, Section 302 read with 149 IPC conviction for the second, Section 148 IPC conviction and Sections 25 and 27 Arms Act convictions were affirmed. The finding in this appeal did not determine Phulle's separately tried appeal by using this trial's evidence.

Concurrent sentences / default imprisonment - Section 427(2) CrPC makes a subsequent sentence of imprisonment for life or for a fixed term run concurrently with an existing life term. O.M. Cherian v. State of Kerala, (2015) 2 SCC 501, was applied to the concurrent operation of life and fixed sentences; Pappu's substantive sentence in this trial was directed to run with the earlier life term in Sessions Trial 125/2008. Sharad Hiru Kolambe v. State of Maharashtra, (2018) 18 SCC 718, was applied to keep default sentences consecutive. The appeal was dismissed and the conviction and sentence affirmed subject to that direction concerning execution of the sentences.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : Pappu alias Matiuddin appealed under Section 374 CrPC from the judgment of 23 April 2010 in Sessions Trial 84/2008 at Datia. The trial court convicted him under Section 148 IPC (two years' rigorous imprisonment and ₹2,000 fine, three months' default), Section 302 IPC for Imambaksh's murder (life and ₹3,000 fine, one year's default), Section 302/149 IPC for Jameel's murder (life and ₹3,000 fine, one year's default), and Sections 25 and 27 Arms Act (respectively two and three years' rigorous imprisonment, ₹2,000 fine and three months' default each), with substantive sentences concurrent. The prosecution alleged that on 21 April 2008 around 7:30 p.m. Pappu and four armed companions approached Imambaksh's shop, pressed him to compromise a pending Section 307 case, and Pappu shot Imambaksh twice. When Jameel intervened, Phulle alias Kabuluddin shot him. According to the differing accounts, Imambaksh died at the scene or hospital; Jameel was examined at Bhander, referred to Gwalior and died in transit or on arrival. Ali Baksh reported after the journey at about 11:50 p.m. The police registered Crime 79/2008, examined the scene and witnesses, recovered cartridges and medical materials, seized a .315-bore pistol after Pappu's arrest, obtained an FSL report and filed a charge sheet while the others were absconding. The framed charges included Section 148, two counts of Section 302 or alternatively Section 302/149, and Arms Act Sections 25/27. Pappu denied guilt and called a defence witness on the whereabouts of Lalu and Balle. Medical witnesses detailed fatal firearm wounds caused by close-range firing in each deceased and the bullets recovered from each deceased. Ali Baksh, Nazeer, Rashid, Basheer and Shakeel described the shooting and nearby shops; Islam was hostile and was not an eyewitness of these two killings. Pappu argued that family witnesses, contradictions, inadequate light, FIR delay, failure to call independent witnesses and inconclusive weapon comparison defeated the case. He also contended the report was a counterblast to his FIR alleging murder of his father Jainuddin by the complainant side. That killing produced a distinct Sessions Trial 125/2008 and connected Criminal Appeal 246/2010. Phulle, apprehended later, was separately tried and appealed in Criminal Appeal 2567/2018, heard simultaneously but decided independently. The present record and judgment concern Pappu's own trial for Imambaksh and Jameel.

2. Precedents — Considered : A.T. Mydeen v. Assistant Commissioner (Supreme Court, Criminal Appeal 1306/2021, 29 October 2021) was invoked at the outset for the separation of evidentiary records of separately tried accused: material in Pappu's trial could not be used for or against Phulle in his later trial, or conversely; the Court accordingly issued separate judgments despite joint hearing. Ramesh v. State, (2010) 15 SCC 49, concerned identification by rural witnesses who knew the accused and saw him in reduced evening light; the Court used its caution about villagers' visual capacity in their accustomed conditions alongside the proved lantern, twilight, close range and familiarity here, without treating rural residence alone as proof of visibility.

On kinship, Rupinder Singh Sandhu v. State of Punjab, (2018) 16 SCC 475, holds that relationship does not inherently make evidence untrustworthy and ordinarily a relative would not shield a culprit to accuse an innocent. Shamim v. State (NCT of Delhi), (2018) 10 SCC 509, recognises the weight often due to the testimony of a deceased's close family without a categorical rule. Rizan v. State of Chhattisgarh, (2003) 2 SCC 661, requires a foundation for a plea of false implication and careful assessment of the cogency of the evidence; its reproduced discussion of Dalip Singh v. State of Punjab rejects an automatic rule demanding corroboration from relatives while recognising that intense personal grudge can cause innocent persons to be dragged in. The Rizan passage also cites Guli Chand and Vadivelu Thevar, quotes Masalti against mechanical exclusion of partisan witnesses while insisting on caution, and mentions Jagir Singh and Lehna to similar effect. Mohd. Rojali Ali v. State of Assam, (2019) 19 SCC 567, distinguishes a related witness naturally present from an interested one who benefits from conviction or has a motive to implicate falsely, relying in its quoted reasoning on State of Rajasthan v. Kalki, Amit, Gangabhavani, Ganapathi, Dalip Singh and Jayabalan; the relevant test is inherent reliability, probability, cogency and consistency and calls for cautious assessment rather than suspicion. The High Court used these authorities to assess the witnesses' locations, family practice and Basheer's recorded hospital attendance before accepting their accounts.

On enmity, State of A.P. v. Dr M.V. Ramana Reddy, (1991) 4 SCC 536, warns that animosity can prompt deliberate false accusation or an honest but erroneous assumption about a rival's guilt. Anil Rai v. State of Bihar, (2001) 7 SCC 318, explains the dual function of enmity as motive and basis for false implication, requires anxious scrutiny for exaggeration and the false implication of additional accused, and permits otherwise convincing consistent eyewitness evidence. Sushil v. State of U.P., 1995 Supp (1) SCC 363, applies the same two-sided approach and recognises the value of positive direct evidence. It requires caution in assessing relatives' testimony and attention to its reliability and independent corroboration. The Court applied these to the reciprocal Section 307 proceedings, the alleged counterblast and the accepted evidence of the shooting; it also referred to its separate companion judgment about the sequence of Jainuddin's death, which remains a distinct appeal and record.

On the gun, Rakesh v. State of U.P., (2021) 7 SCC 188, treats a recovered firearm inconsistent with the ballistic evidence as no recovery of the actual weapon, which is not indispensable to conviction on adequate other evidence. Gulab v. State of U.P. (Supreme Court, Criminal Appeal 81/2021, order of 9 December 2021) says non-recovery of the weapon does not by itself discredit a prosecution based on a gunshot injury; Krishna Gope v. State of Bihar, (2003) 10 SCC 45, holds that an accused cannot claim an advantage merely because the police did not find a concealed country-made gun. The High Court did not turn the inconclusive FSL into a positive match; it applied the limited non-recovery principle to credible eyewitness and medical evidence. Ambika Prasad v. State (Delhi Admn.), (2000) 2 SCC 646, explains public reluctance to become witnesses because of safety and repeated court attendance, and reproduces State of U.P. v. Anil Singh against automatic rejection merely because all bystanders were not examined or independent corroboration was absent when the examined accounts are otherwise acceptable; this answered the objection that the incident occurred at a public place but no independent witness was examined. For sentence execution, O.M. Cherian v. State of Kerala, (2015) 2 SCC 501, discussed Section 31 CrPC and the practical impossibility of requiring fixed terms to be served after imprisonment lasting for the convict's natural life, favouring concurrent life and fixed terms or multiple life terms. The Court applied Section 427(2) CrPC across the separate trial sentences and, citing Sharad Hiru Kolambe v. State of Maharashtra, (2018) 18 SCC 718, expressly kept default imprisonment consecutive.

3. Statutes considered : Section 374 CrPC governed Pappu's conviction appeal. IPC Section 148 punished his armed participation in a rioting/unlawful-assembly offence; Section 302 supported direct liability for shooting Imambaksh, and Section 302 read with 149 supported liability for Jameel's killing in the assembly even though Phulle fired the shot. Section 307 IPC appears as the pending attempt-to-murder litigation and alleged pressure for compromise; no Section 307 conviction was under appeal here. Arms Act Sections 25 and 27 were the separate weapon convictions upheld, with the trial evidence including sanction from the District Magistrate. CrPC Section 427(2), quoted and expressly applied, makes a later term or life sentence concurrent where the convict was already undergoing life imprisonment; Section 427(1) generally governs the different situation of an earlier imprisonment term subject to a concurrency direction. The quoted analysis of Section 31(1) in O.M. Cherian addresses multiple sentences at one trial, while the present direction applies Section 427(2) across the March and April 2010 trial judgments. The Court separately directed default sentences to run consecutively under the cited Sharad Hiru Kolambe ruling.

4. Issues : (i) Could evidence from Phulle's later separate trial be read in the appeal from Pappu's own trial, notwithstanding simultaneous hearing? (ii) Did the medical record prove homicidal firearm deaths, and did the eyewitnesses have an adequate opportunity to identify familiar assailants in evening light with load shedding? (iii) Were the related witnesses naturally present, sufficiently reliable despite possible omissions or contradictions, old enmity and the claimed counter-case, and did the absence of independent bystanders undermine them? (iv) Did an inconclusive FSL linkage of seized pistol and cartridges create reasonable doubt even if the actual firearm could be treated as unrecovered? (v) Were Pappu's own shooting of Imambaksh and his assembly liability for Phulle's shooting of Jameel established distinctly, along with the rioting and Arms Act convictions? (vi) How should this trial's life and other substantive sentences operate in relation to the earlier life sentence in Sessions Trial 125/2008, and how should imprisonment in default of payment of fine operate?

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court first kept the trial records distinct under A.T. Mydeen; Phulle's separately tried appeal would receive a separate judgment. Dr Parihar's examination and postmortem of Jameel, and Dr Shakya's postmortem of Imambaksh, disclosed firearm entry/exit wounds with blackening and tattooing, internal damage, haemorrhage and recovered bullets; despite omissions in medical recording and inability to identify the exact gun, both deaths were found homicidal. Ali Baksh and other examined family witnesses placed the armed group at the shop and distinguished Pappu's two shots at Imambaksh from Phulle's shot at Jameel. Islam did not see those murders and his hostile account was not recast as direct proof. The Court evaluated the 7–7:30 p.m. time in April, an operating gas lantern, nearby shops, close firing evidenced by medical marks and the longstanding familiarity of the rival groups; with Ramesh's qualified rural-vision principle, it found an actual and adequate opportunity to see and identify the assailants despite power shedding.

The eyewitnesses were relatives, but the shops' proximity, shared residence and routine gathering at the elder brother's shop made their presence natural; Basheer appeared as Jameel's attendant in the 7:40 p.m. medical record. The Court applied the distinction between related and interested witnesses and the requirement of cautious assessment for consistency from Rupinder Singh Sandhu, Shamim, Rizan and Mohd. Rojali Ali. It did not reject them because of kinship and accepted their testimony after considering actual circumstances. Competing Section 307 cases and the allegation that the prosecution case countered Pappu's report about Jainuddin required scrutiny, not automatic belief or rejection. The pending date for Imambaksh's evidence on 25 April and the pressure to compromise supplied a motive, while the direct accounts, natural presence and supporting medical evidence answered the possibility of false attribution. Dr M.V. Ramana Reddy, Anil Rai and Sushil were relied on for the principle that enmity can motivate the offence and prompt false implication, requiring careful evaluation of the evidence. Paragraph 54 referred to the companion appeal's finding that Imambaksh and Jameel died before Jainuddin and to the rejection of the asserted defence there; the present conviction was affirmed on the evidence in this trial, without transferring testimony from the other trial.

The FSL found evidence of firing in the recovered .315 pistol but could not attribute empty cartridges to it without percussion caps. The Court did not find a conclusive ballistic match. Applying Rakesh, Gulab and Krishna Gope, it treated the uncertainty, taken at its highest, as non-recovery of the actual weapon, which did not displace accepted direct and medical evidence. No independent market witness was called, but Ambika Prasad and its Anil Singh passage rejected an automatic adverse inference when otherwise acceptable witnesses had testified; reluctance of outsiders was an explanation, not a substitute for assessing this evidence. On that assessment of the evidence as a whole, the Court found Pappu present as an armed member of the unlawful assembly, personally shooting Imambaksh, and liable under Section 302/149 for Jameel when Phulle shot him upon intervention. It affirmed Sections 148, 302, 302/149 IPC and 25/27 Arms Act, and found no basis to alter the minimum life punishment under Section 302.

Although counsel had not sought concurrency, the Court addressed sentence execution. The life sentence in Trial 125/2008 dated 9 March 2010 preceded this trial's 23 April 2010 life sentences. Section 427(2) CrPC requires the later sentence to run concurrently when the prisoner is already undergoing life imprisonment; O.M. Cherian supplied the reasoning on concurrent operation of life sentences and fixed terms. The Court directed the substantive sentence in this appeal to run with that earlier trial sentence but, under Sharad Hiru Kolambe, directed default sentences to run consecutively.

6. Relief : The Hon'ble High Court has dismissed the criminal appeal. The Datia Special Judge/Additional Sessions Judge's judgment and sentence of 23 April 2010 in Sessions Trial 84/2008 were affirmed: Pappu's separate Imambaksh and Jameel murder convictions, armed rioting and Arms Act convictions remained in force with the fines and default terms imposed at trial. The substantive sentence in this case was directed to run concurrently with the sentence in Sessions Trial 125/2008; imprisonment in default of payment of fine was expressly directed to run consecutively. Pappu was already in custody and was to undergo the remaining term. A copy of the judgment was to be provided to him without charge, and the trial record returned with the judgment for compliance. The connected Phulle appeal and the Jainuddin appeal were separate judgments, not additional disposals within this order.

Pappu v. State of M.P., Cr.A. no. 401/2010, 07/04/2022, D.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia & Rajeev Kumar Shrivastava, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Cognizance / omitted suspects / defence alibi - The FIR specifically accused Badshah and Rakesh of separate shootings injuring Parimal and Dharmendra, but police excluded them based on medical records, witness statements and CCTV footage. Harjinder Singh v. State of Punjab (Supreme Court, SLP (Crl.) 1891/2024, 6 May 2025) was applied for the principle that an accused bears the burden of proving an alibi, and unproved defence documents cannot be accepted as conclusive at the preliminary stage in preference to the prosecution allegations. The quoted holding in Harjinder arose under Section 319 CrPC, which requires evidence emerging in court, in a case of alleged abetment under Section 306 IPC. The present Court applied its caution on alibi in the distinct context of Section 193 cognizance, without deciding the truth of the shootings or the eventual defence. Rakesh's April 2021 COVID prescription did not establish inability to leave home on 1 June; no record showed that he was confined to bed.

Electronic proof / CCTV alibi - The private-house DVR date and time could be entered manually, allowing footage of an entry or departure to be presented with a different time. On this record the father's and neighbours' statements and footage did not establish the two suspects' absence. The Court relied on its earlier Mukesh Singh Rawat v. State of M.P. (Criminal Revision 2319/2022, 3 August 2022), whose quoted passage additionally noted unidentified footage and the absence of a certificate under Section 65B of the Evidence Act in that separate case, and its Chandrakant Yadav v. State of M.P. (MCRC 25903/2024, 30 July 2024); the cited Supreme Court orders declining to disturb those decisions were mentioned. The Court found the present material insufficient, without finding actual alteration or separately deciding a Section 65B defect here.

Committal / sessions cognizance / active versus passive magistrate - Balveer Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2016) 6 SCC 680, distinguishes a committal Magistrate's active consideration on the merits from a merely passive committal. If the Magistrate actively considers and refuses to summon persons omitted from a charge sheet, a similar Section 193 application before Sessions ordinarily cannot be used to reverse that refusal; Section 319 then operates on trial evidence. The Magistrate here rejected the Section 190 request only because the offence under Section 307 IPC was triable by the Court of Session and expressly left involvement to that court. Applying Balveer, Section 193 remained available. The High Court set aside the Sessions Judge's refusal and directed cognizance against Badshah and Rakesh for Sections 307 and 294 IPC and any other offence supported by the case's circumstances.

Case-note :- 1. Facts : On the complainant Ramvilas Gurjar's account, he was riding with applicant Parimal Singh Gurjar at about 4 a.m. on 1 June 2021, while Dharmendra travelled on another motorcycle. At a farmhouse on Piparsa Station Road they encountered Badshah, Rakesh, Rahul and Lalla alias Janavar, allegedly armed with lathis amid prior enmity. After abuse and an objection, Badshah allegedly shot Parimal in the back of the waist, and Rakesh allegedly shot Dharmendra in the back of the waist. They fled, leaving a scooter. The injured were taken to Morena hospital, referred to Gwalior and admitted there before the FIR was lodged. These were allegations at the cognizance stage, not findings of guilt. Police charged Rahul and Lalla but omitted Badshah and Rakesh. The applicant said the omission rested on Badshah and Rakesh's complaint of false implication, Rakesh's COVID medical material, other statements and neighbourhood CCTV. A Section 190 CrPC application to include them failed before the committal Magistrate, whose stated reason was that the offence under Section 307 IPC was triable by the Court of Session and the issue belonged there. The applicant then applied under Section 193 before the Third Additional Sessions Judge, Morena in Sessions Trial 315/2023; that court rejected the request on 24 June 2024. In this Section 482 challenge, the applicant argued that unproved medical material and footage could not conclusively establish an alibi against a specific FIR account. Respondents 2 and 3 contended that the Magistrate had already considered the request, leaving only Section 319 CrPC after trial evidence emerged.

2. Precedents — Considered : Harjinder Singh v. State of Punjab and Another (Supreme Court, SLP (Criminal) 1891/2024, decided 6 May 2025) was quoted and applied to the alibi issue. Its Section 319 context required evidence surfacing in court, not conjecture, before adding an accused. The accused's parking, chemist, OPD and CCTV documents were unproved and, even taken at face value, did not necessarily exclude presence during an alleged earlier confrontation. The Supreme Court cautioned against elevating an untested defence before the prosecution had led its full evidence, reversing High Court interference under Section 482 and leaving guilt in its Section 306 IPC abetment case for trial. Its quoted reference to Mahendra Awase concerned the standard for proving abetment at trial, not a separate issue decided here. The present Court used the burden of proving alibi and the principle concerning the reliability of defence material at the preliminary stage in a different Section 193 setting; it did not declare that Section 319's trial-evidence trigger governed this application. The Court also quoted its decision in Mukesh Singh Rawat v. State of Madhya Pradesh (Criminal Revision 2319/2022, 3 August 2022), which had found a home-video alibi inadequate where identification, manually set date/time, Section 65B Evidence Act certificate and other circumstances remained unresolved; the judgment states that the Supreme Court affirmed that order on 7 November 2022 in SLP (Criminal) 10484/2022. Chandrakant Yadav and Another v. State of M.P. and Another (MCRC 25903/2024, 30 July 2024) was cited for a similar view, with a Supreme Court order of 16 December 2024 in Jagdish Prasad Dixit v. State of M.P. (SLP (Criminal) Diary 48079/2024) reported as affirming it.

Balveer Singh v. State of Rajasthan, (2016) 6 SCC 680, was quoted and applied to the Section 190/193 jurisdiction dispute. There the committal Magistrate heard a complainant's application against people whom the police had not charged and, after applying its mind to the merits, rejected it; the Supreme Court called that an active rather than passive role and held that a similar application to the Sessions Court ordinarily could not simply reverse that decision. It contrasted a Magistrate's mere forwarding of the request with the committed case. The High Court here examined the 30 September 2023 committal order as described in a certified copy provided by respondents' counsel (the order was otherwise not in the record) and found no merits adjudication, so Balveer did not bar Sessions cognizance under Section 193. The Court identified Section 319 on trial evidence as the route relevant when a Magistrate had already made an active merits decision, not the only route in this passive-committal case.

3. Statutes considered : Section 482 CrPC supplied the applicant's route to challenge the Sessions Judge's refusal. Section 190 CrPC concerned the earlier committal-stage request; Section 193 CrPC was the Sessions Court's cognizance power after committal, available here because the Magistrate had not determined the omitted suspects' involvement on the merits. Section 319 CrPC was invoked by the respondents as the exclusive power available later and discussed by Balveer and Harjinder in the distinct setting of adding persons on evidence arising during trial. IPC Section 307 was the alleged attempt-to-murder offence making the case Sessions triable, while Section 294 was another offence for which the High Court expressly directed cognizance. The Court left other offences open only to the extent made out by the case facts; it did not predetermine them. The defence burden to establish alibi was explained by reference to Harjinder; the defence was not finally determined in this order.

4. Issues : (i) At the stage of seeking cognizance against two suspects omitted from the charge sheet despite direct FIR allegations, could the COVID prescription, statements of witnesses related to the suspects and private-house CCTV collected by the police conclusively establish their alibi and preclude examination of that defence at trial? (ii) Could Sessions exercise Section 193 CrPC after a committal Magistrate had rejected a Section 190 request because the offence under Section 307 was triable by the Court of Session, or did that earlier order constitute an active merits decision making Section 319 trial evidence the only later route? (iii) If the refusal rested on those grounds, what relief was warranted in the Section 482 application? Actual presence and guilt, the ultimate value of defence exhibits after proof, and possible other charges were left to ordinary trial processes.

5. Ratio / Findings : The Court acknowledged the FIR's precise attribution of a shot to each omitted suspect, then rejected the premise that the police material conclusively excluded them at this preliminary stage. Harjinder placed the alibi burden on the accused and warned that unproved defence records cannot be accepted in preference to allegations or sworn testimony before those records are tested, while its Section 319 setting remained distinct. Rakesh's prescription related to COVID in April 2021; it did not establish that he was bedridden or unable to leave home one month later on 1 June. No document showing confinement to bed was supplied. Statements of the suspects' father and neighbours did not establish their absence either. The date and time on a home DVR may be set manually, so the apparent chronology of an entry or exit could be recreated by altered settings; the Court found the CCTV-based inference insufficient, not that actual tampering was proved. Its Mukesh Singh Rawat and Chandrakant Yadav references reinforced caution, but the missing Section 65B certificate described in Mukesh's separate record was not an independent finding about this footage.

On the jurisdiction issue, Balveer distinguishes a committal Magistrate's active merits rejection from passive forwarding. The Magistrate here said only that Section 307 was triable by Sessions and that Sessions should decide whether Badshah and Rakesh participated or were falsely named. The certified copy was provided by respondents' counsel; the order itself was not otherwise on the record. The stated reasons showed no application of mind to the merits of summoning them. Accordingly, the Magistrate had played a passive committal role and the Sessions Court retained Section 193 power. The contention that Section 319 after trial evidence was the exclusive route was rejected. In view of the direct allegations, the insufficient basis for the inference excluding the suspects and the available jurisdiction under Section 193, the Sessions Judge materially erred by declining cognizance. This is a threshold cognizance decision, not proof beyond reasonable doubt of either person's guilt.

6. Relief : The Hon’ble High Court has allowed the application. The order dated 24 June 2024 passed by the Third Additional Sessions Judge, Morena, in Sessions Trial 315/2023 was set aside, and Parimal's Section 193 application was allowed. The trial court was directed to take cognizance against respondents 2 and 3, Badshah Dandotiya and Rakesh Dandotiya, under IPC Sections 307 and 294, as well as any other offence made out on the facts and circumstances. The order did not convict them, finally reject a proved alibi, or make a separate Section 319 summoning order.

Parimal Singh Gurjar v. State of Madhya Pradesh and Others, M.Cr.C. no. 31252/2024, 09/05/2025, S.B., Hon'ble Justice Shri Gurpal Singh Ahluwalia, Honorable High Court of Madhya Pradesh.

Headnote :- Investigation / arrest discretion / Section 482 CrPC - D. Venkatasubramaniam v. M.K. Mohan Krishnamachari, (2009) 10 SCC 488, was applied in refusing an informant's request that the High Court order arrest and the eventual filing of a charge sheet. That decision invokes M.C. Abraham v. State of Maharashtra, (2003) 2 SCC 649: Section 41 CrPC permits police arrest on a cognizable allegation but does not require automatic arrest; liberty and reputation call for caution and an assessment of necessity in the course of investigation. The Supreme Court also rejected unreasoned directions compelling arrest, seizure and prosecution under Section 482, observing that police may lawfully find a case for prosecution or no case and that persons affected by directions with drastic consequences should be heard; its quoted discussion of Divine Retreat Centre v. State of Kerala, (2008) 3 SCC 542, concerns that hearing safeguard. The High Court accordingly refused to supervise the investigation by specifying an arrest or charge-sheet result. It did not decide whether any accused was guilty or whether arrest would ultimately be lawful.

Investigation / prompt completion / Section 173(1) CrPC - The separate duty to finish an investigation without unnecessary delay remained enforceable. The Court read Section 173(1) as requiring the investigating officer to reach a conclusion on whether an offence is made out and promptly file a lawful final report, either a closure report or charge sheet according to the evidence, without a predetermined outcome. It directed early completion and necessary lawful steps, and allowed the applicant to approach the Superintendent of Police, Morena, with any grievance. This was a direction concerning prompt completion and lawful procedure, not an order to arrest, seize property or prosecute.
